Mark Juergensmeyer is Professor of Sociology and Global Studies, Affiliate Professor of Religious Studies, and Director of the Orfalea Center for Global and International Studies at the University of California, Santa Barbara. He is regarded as a pioneer in the study of global religion and one of the founders of the academic field of global studies. Since the 9/11 attacks, he has been a frequent commentator in the news media on topics of religion in global affairs, including BBC, CNN, PBS, the New York Times, the San Francisco Chronicle, and the Huffington Post. He has served as coordinator of the religious studies program at the University of California, Berkeley; Director of the Office of Programs in Comparative Religion at the Graduate Theological Union; and dean of the School of Hawaiian, Asian, and Pacific Studies at the University of Hawai'i. He has been a visiting professor at Punjab University and Guru Nanak Dev University in India and is past president of the American Academy of Religion. He is the recipient of honorary doctorates from Lehigh University in Pennsylvania and Roskilde University in Denmark. He received the Grawemeyer Award in Religion for his book Terror in the Mind of God: The Global Rise of Religious Violence. The book is based on interviews with religious activists around the world—including individuals convicted of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, leaders of Hamas, and abortion clinic bombers in the United States—and was listed by the Washington Post and Los Angeles Times as one of the best nonfiction books of the year. A previous book, The New Cold War: Religious Nationalism Confronts the Secular State, was listed by the New York Times as a notable book of the year. He is the author or editor of 20 other volumes, including Global Rebellion: Religious Challenges to the Secular State, Sikh Studies: Comparative Perspectives on a Changing Tradition, Gandhi's Way: A Handbook of Conflict Resolution, The Oxford Handbook of Global Religion, Global Religion: An Introduction, Rethinking Secularism, and Religion in Global Civil Society. He has also coedited The Encyclopedia of Global Studies, published by SAGE.

Capps Center for the Study of Ethics, Religion, and Public Life at the University of California at Santa Barbara. In 2007, he held the Tocqueville-Fulbright Chair in American Studies at the École des hautes études en sciences sociales in Paris. He is one of the leading sociologists of religion in the United States and the author or editor of 12 books and more than 100 scholarly articles and essays. His research has focused primarily on the challenges of religious diversity in modern societies and particularly generational religious and cultural change in the United States. His publications include Religious Pluralism and Civil Society, Religion and Public Life in the Pacific Region, Fluid Identities (edited with Mark Silk), Bridging Divided Worlds: Generational Cultures in Congregations (with J. Carroll), Contemporary American Religion, A Generation of Seekers, and Spiritual Marketplace: Baby Boomers and the Remaking of American Religion. Introduction

The Encyclopedia of Global Religion has been created to be the standard reference work for the emerging field of global religion. It covers the entire range of topics related to religion in its global context. It explores contemporary transnational issues and the diverse intellectual approaches of scholars who analyze the religious aspects of the global world. Their analyses, presented in more than 750 entries, include the diaspora of cultures and dispersions of peoples, the transnational aspects of religious ideas and practices, the cultural diversity and variations within religious traditions, and the religious responses—both positive and negative—to globalized multicultural societies.

The entries in the Encyclopedia are authoritative. At the outset of the project, the editors created an editorial board of some of the world's most significant scholars in the field, who have played an important role in crafting the overall themes of the Encyclopedia. They have also helped suggest both topics and appropriate authors. Most of the entries have been written by leading authorities around the world. A select group of promising younger scholars has also been invited to author some of the entries, under the guidance of senior faculty, in their fields of specialization.

The Encyclopedia is different from other reference sources on religion that are available online or in print, in at least three ways. First, it is reliable—the entries are written by the most learned and competent scholars in the field. Second, it is contemporary—it explores aspects of religion and society that are unfolding in the contemporary global era. And third, it is specific—the entries are written specifically for the field of global religion. Every article illumines some aspect of global religion or a subject related to it, such as globalization, transnational activity and themes, and aspects of global society including nationalism, terrorism, cyber culture, and the effects of information technology. A special feature of this Encyclopedia is its inclusiveness: It contains an essay on the religious aspects of every nation in the world, from the smallest Pacific island to the largest countries of Asia and Europe. No other sourcebook is as culturally diverse and geographically comprehensive.

The creation of an Encyclopedia of this magnitude is an enormous undertaking involving hundreds of colleagues over several years. We wish to acknowledge the army of those who supported and labored on this publishing venture, beginning with our colleagues at the University of California, Santa Barbara. Our able graduate student staff at Santa Barbara included Kendall Busse, Jonathan Lee, Emily Linthicum, Martie Smith-Roberts, John Soboslai, Stephanie Stillman, and Jamel Velji, and some of them have since become professors in colleges and universities around the country. Professor Nathalie Caron of the University of Paris 12 was very helpful in suggesting the names of potential contributors. The editors and staff at SAGE Publications were consistently supportive and encouraging, and we are grateful especially for the diligence and perseverance of Diana Axelsen and Yvette Pollastrini. Most of all, we thank the hundreds of colleagues who contributed entries to this project, knowing that their primary reward would be the satisfaction of having helped create an enduring fountain of information about an emerging field of studies to which they, and we, are deeply committed.

The facts in these entries have been checked to ensure that they are as authoritative as possible. Locating reliable numbers for members of religious communities and groups has been especially problematic. Often we have compared several sources, such as country-by-country census figures, where available; statistics from the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency's World Factbook; and information gathered by the compilers of the website www.adherents.com, who have used several sources, including David B. Barrett's religious statistics organization, which provides data for other encyclopedias such as the Encyclopedia Britannica and the World Christian Encyclopedia.

Regarding transliterations from languages that do not use the Roman alphabet (such as Chinese, Japanese, Arabic, and Hindi), we have tried to follow conventional standards and use diacritical marks sparingly. Exceptions have been made with regard to proper names that have their own customary transliterations (e.g., "Tagore" rather than "Thakar"). The authors of some entries have preferred a certain pattern of transliteration and the use of diacritical marks appropriate to their subject matters. We realize, however, that such judgments are matters of taste as well as practice and that transliteration is often a subjective decision.

Finally, we want to honor the memory of Ninian Smart, one of the world's great scholars of religious studies and a pioneer in the field of global religion. We were privileged to work with him as colleagues at the University of California, Santa Barbara, and we are indebted to his vision of a world in which the best of the religious imagination provides a moral and spiritual stratum for an emerging global civil order. In tribute to his profound intellectual legacy, and in recognition of the high standard of scholarship that he has set for us all, we gratefully dedicate this project to his memory.

ABAKUÁ SECRET SOCIETY

Abakuá is an all-male secret society, also known as ñañigo, primarily located in Cuba. The lodges associated with Abakuá emerged in the western, urban, and coastal areas of Cuba in the 1820s to 1840s, especially in the areas of Havana (Regla, Guanabacoa, and Marianao), Matanza, and Cárdenas. Ideas that undergird Abakuá were transported across the Atlantic Ocean by West Africans captured in their continental homelands and delivered as slaves to the largest island of the Caribbean. There, they and their island-born (Creole) descendants enlarged and reinvented aspects of customs and practices from the homeland regions of Calabar—known in Cuba as Carabalí.

Whereas Cuba's imported, enslaved Africans were originally from regions of West Africa, the ideas and practices of the first Abakuá lodge, Efik Buton, were drawn from a wide range of Africa-based knowledge and appealed to a range of ethnic groups in the island. Without the Cuban environment, it is questionable if Abakuá would have arisen the way it did in the Americas. African ethnicity was not the criterion for membership. Rather, the initiation ritual and adherence to the blood oath were the bases for becoming Abakuá in the Cuban context, where economic exchange—trust, collateral, and debt—was a critical component in Abakuá activities.

Cuba's distinctive character challenged the binary ideas about Black-versus-White identity within Abakuá membership. The earliest lodges, called potencias, appear to have been composed of Africans and their island-born descendants. Non-“pureblood” Afro-Cubans became members in Havana's Akanarán Efó Muñón Ekobio Mukarará society before 1863 and were recognized to be blanco, rich, and gentlemen of the easy life. A debate arose in 1863 regarding the accusation of selling for profit of the Abakuá secret to Whites, and this was countered with the contention that revenue from the initiations served to buy Abakuá brethren out of slavery.

Given that it was not until late in the 19th century that the term race came into wide use, Cuba's complex social and cultural history could produce confusion in racial identification. The island—and most of Latin America—used a combination of phenotypical “color,” “legal color,” and social position to identify a person's category. To claim the Havana Abakuá lodge as “White,” therefore, would be something of a misnomer.

Abakuá constitutes a potencia (“society”) wherein the baroko fundamento, or “collective pact,” is consecrated. The consecration requires 13 men, or plazas, who have been jointly initiated, and other obonekue (“men already initiated”) are subsequently incorporated. However, a potencia lives beyond the individual Abakuá because it is all of the potencia's altar objects that together form the ekue, the Abakuá spiritual source, that is, the enduring embodiment of the socially situated and gendered corporate group—its past and present male members.

Abakuá ritual activities normally occur in a society's sacred house or temple. Women are strictly prohibited from the Abakuá rituals. The contents of these rituals, as well as the complexity of Abakuá scripting, are beyond the scope of this entry.

'ABBĀSĪD CALIPHATE

Within the 'Abbāsīd period (750–1258), Islam developed into a world religion, transcending ethnic boundaries. For five centuries, the 'Abbāsīd caliphs were recognized by most Sunnī Muslims as at least their nominal rulers. Iraq, Syria, Egypt, and North Africa became Arabized during this period, while Iran more successfully retained its indigenous identity, experiencing a cultural renaissance in the 10th and 11th centuries. Meanwhile, most dhimmīs (a non-Muslim subject of a state governed in accordance with the Shari'a law), along with the newly arrived Turks, adopted Islam.

The 'Abbāsīd period began after a rebellion arising in Khurasān in 747 toppled the last Umayyad caliph, replacing him not with a descendant of Muhammad XII, as many expected, but with al-Saffāh (750–754), a descendant of the Prophet's uncle al-'Abbās. Al-Mansūr (754–775) built Baghdad as his new capital, and there the caliphs adopted the traditions of pre-Islamic Sasanian bureaucracy and autocracy. 'Abbāsīd power reached its zenith under Harun al-Rashid (786–809), but his reign was followed by civil war, and provincial governors increasingly established independent dynasties. The Shi'a Fātimids even proclaimed a rival caliphate (910), eventually basing it in Cairo (969–1171).

Al-Mu'tasim (833–842) and subsequent caliphs recruited foreign soldiers, often Turkish slaves (singular ghulām or mamlūk), but their assassination of al-Mutawakkil (847–861) started a period of instability. From 936, real authority in Baghdad was held by a commander-in-chief (amīr al-umarā'), a position taken over by the Shi'a Būyids in 945. At least their successors from 1055, the Turkish Seljuk sultan (singular sultan, meaning "authority"), having already conquered the eastern 'Abbāsīd lands, were vigorous defenders of Sunnī Islam against the Fātimids and the Byzantines.

Seeking a symbol of communal legitimacy, the ulema somewhat ambivalently endorsed early 'Abbāsīd rule while expounding Islamic standards of government and personal conduct in works of jurisprudence (fiqh) based on the Qur'an and sunna. They defeated an attempt by al-Ma'mūn (813–833) and his immediate successors to make the caliphs themselves arbiters of Islamic doctrine and practice, largely securing that role for themselves. Alongside and sometimes in tension with the teachings of conservative Sunnī scholars, though, there developed philosophical, theological, and mystical interpretations of Islam—the last of which would profoundly influence popular religion and provide a basis for new forms of religious association, the Sufi confraternities (singular tariqah). As the dynasty declined, Sunnī apologists argued—in opposition to the increasingly coherent Shi'a sects—that an impotent caliph could, indeed must, fulfill his responsibilities by delegating them to the sultans and the ulema.

When Saljuk authority fragmented in the 12th century, numerous ephemeral principalities and some more substantial successor states emerged under contending warlords who offered at best nominal loyalty to the caliph. The last significant 'Abbāsīd, al-Nāsir (1180–1225), was little more than one petty ruler among others. After the Mongols sacked Baghdad and killed most of the family (in 1258), the Mamlūk regime in Cairo maintained a shadow 'Abbāsīd caliphate (1261–1517) until the Ottoman conquest. It was not widely recognized at the time, but later it was said to have conferred the caliphal title on the Ottoman sultans.

ABDUH, MUHAMMAD (1849–1905)

Many scholars consider Muhammad Abduh—controversial teacher, jurist, theologian, and reformer—to be the founder of Islamic Modernism. Abduh was born in rural Egypt to a family committed to religion and education. In 1869, he left for Cairo to study at Al-Azhar University (where he eventually became its modernizing rector). There he studied with Jamal al-Din al-Afghani, who introduced Abduh to Islamic theology and mysticism as well as more “Western” subjects such as social and political science. Afghani also instilled in Abduh an appreciation of activism and Pan-Islamism (regarding all Muslims as one global community). Afghani’s influence, it seems, was to further make Abduh anticolonialist. The government eventually appointed Abduh chief editor of the official Egyptian gazette, where he increasingly influenced public thought and opinion. During this period of rising Egyptian nationalism, though, Abduh’s outspoken criticism of the government’s pro-Britain policies led to his exile.

Abduh settled in Paris, where he formed with al-Afghani an influential society that aimed to unite Muslims in renewed adherence to Islamic principles against European interference. Their journal, al-Urwa al-Wuthqa, was one of the most important of the early journals devoted to modernizing Islam. In 1888, the Egyptian government granted Abduh permission to return to Cairo on the condition that he refrain from teaching. Initially a judge, he advanced to membership in the administrative council and ultimately became Grand Mufti of Egypt. Here, he dedicated himself to the reform of Egypt’s educational system and religious courts. He remained in this position until his death in Alexandria in 1905.

Essentially, Abduh situated himself against those secularized Egyptians who claimed that religion held back a progressive society. Abduh came of age when European ideas, politics, and economics were encroaching on the Islamic world. Abduh traced the problem of shifting power relations to external factors (such as European might and colonialism) as well as internal ones (such as religious stagnation, corruption, and sectarianism). He argued that Egyptians could only bring about necessary reform through a discriminating and active return to the essentials and ethics of Islam (with the Qur’an serving as a cornerstone).

Though Abduh warned against submission to Europe, he did believe that mutual and beneficial change could result from interaction and thus advocated against isolationism. What he saw as rampant secularization disturbed him, however, and led to his concentration on Islamic principles as solutions to the major problems of his time. Confronted with unchecked European advances, he saw a pressing need for the Muslim world to progress by maintaining the core of Islam while simultaneously modernizing its outmoded elements, such as education.

Abduh therefore stood between the two poles of absolute conservatism and modernization. One consequence of this middle ground was an eventual split among his disciples between those who highlighted Abduh’s focus on a return to religious tradition and those who underscored his attention to progressive social policy (such as his political involvement with educational reform and women’s rights). In the end, Abduh’s project of reviving Islam in a modernizing world has had an undeniable influence on global religion.

ABORTION

Religions of the world are divided on the subject of abortion. Pro-choice views coexist alongside no-choice views in the world’s major and indigenous religions.

All religions are united on reverence and awe and concern for the preservation of life. For that reason, life and death issues are of prime concern for all the world religions. Mysteries such as birth and death particularly stimulate the emotion of the religio-sacred, making religion an inevitable factor—for good or for ill—in the ethics and policies of family planning. Religion has always been a dominant presence in discussions of abortion rights.

Many factors are involved in fertility motivation (such as education level, affluence, the status of women, etc.), and thus, it is notoriously difficult to say with certainty how much the official teachings of the various religions relate to fertility decisions. Positions held by religious leaders are not necessarily shared by the adherents of those religions. Within Christianity, for instance, the Roman Catholic hierarchy opposes both contraception and abortion, and yet France was the first country to experience a transition from high fertility to replacement levels or lower, and Italy (which hosts the Vatican) and Spain have among the three lowest fertility rates in the world. The implication is that birth control measures are widely used in these Catholic countries. In Judaism, there is strong support for abortion under certain circumstances. In some cases, abortion is not only permitted, it is, in fact, mandated, as when the physical or mental health of the woman is at risk or when there is a prospect of having a severely disabled child, such as a child with Tay-Sachs disease. Jewish scholars cite texts from the Bible and from the classical commentaries on the Bible in support of this position.

In Christianity, abortion became widely discussed only in the Middle Ages. Delayed ensoulment was broadly accepted throughout Christian history. The early embryo/fetus was thought to have a vegetative soul. This was succeeded by an animal soul. But only when the fetus was “formed” could God infuse a spiritual soul into it, and only at that point did the fetus attain the moral status of a person. Prior to this, therapeutic abortion could be permitted. There was debate as to when the fetus became “ensouled.” Some held that it happened after 40 days of pregnancy; some said it happened at 80 or 90 days into the pregnancy. In practice, “quickening,” detectable movement of the fetus in the woman, was taken as the arrival of a “person” status for the fetus. Early abortion was permissible for many reasons, such as to save the woman’s life or to end a pregnancy conceived outside marriage, as when a girl was betrothed to one man but pregnant from another. The Catholic hierarchy today holds conservative views on both contraception and abortion. These are not shared by all modern Catholic theologians or by all Catholic parishioners.

In Islam, there is also a great diversity of views on abortion. Legal positions range from total prohibition of all abortion to unqualified permission for abortion up to 120 days into the pregnancy. Islam also holds that the moral status of the fetus depends on its age. Only when the fetus is sufficiently developed can God’s angel breathe spirit into the fetus.

The “First Precept” of Buddhism is “I will not willingly take the life of a living thing.” That would seem to preclude abortion. However, in all religions, seemingly unambiguous commands are modified when the various complexities of life emerge. The intention is of paramount importance in Buddhist ethics: When there is no greed, hate, or delusion, abortion may be compatible with a good Buddhist life. A woman may have an abortion and still be considered a good Buddhist in Japan. Acceptable reasons offered by Buddhist scholars for an abortion are saving the life of the woman or if the expectant mother is HIV positive. Other reasons are also permitted. Buddhist scholars who see negative karma resulting from an abortion say that it can be compensated for by good deeds. Some Buddhists believe, based on the concept of reincarnation, that abortion merely defers the birth of the being about to be born to another time.

Like Buddhism, Hinduism places a high premium on life in the womb. In Hindu tradition, abortion is even described as a mahapatakas (“an atrocious act”). Ahimsa, the teaching of nonviolence, is central to Hinduism as it is to Jainism. Nonetheless, Hindu thought has traditionally rejected absolutism in moral matters and urges consideration of all competing rights and values. Reflective of this is the fact that abortion has been legal in India since 1971, with the passing of the Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act, which makes abortion easily accessible.

Native American religions tended to advocate living in close harmony with nature. They recognized the need for family planning, including abortion when necessary, and there was broad insistence that the decision of the pregnant woman was authoritative. Native African religions also show pluralism on the subject of abortion.

The pluralism in world religions on abortion has important legal implications. Some assert that a blanket prohibition of abortion would infringe on the moral freedom that religion allows and validates.

ADAMS, JAMES LUTHER (1901–1994)

James Luther Adams was a preeminent Unitarian Universalist theologian and ethicist of the 20th century. Born in Ritzville, Washington, he was the son of a Baptist country preacher and farmer. After working on the Northern Pacific Railroad, Adams attended the University of Minnesota and Harvard Divinity School. Training to become a Unitarian minister, he moved from his childhood pre-millenarian fundamentalism to liberal Christianity. Adams served as the minister of two congregations: from 1927 to 1934 with the Second Church, Unitarian, in Salem, Massachusetts, and from 1934 to 1935 with the First Unitarian Society in Wellesley Hills, Massachusetts. During this time, he earned a master's in comparative literature from Harvard and taught from 1929 to 1932 in the Department of English at Boston University.

In 1935, Adams accepted a call to join the faculty of the Meadville Lombard Theological School in Chicago on the condition that he might study for a year in Europe before assuming his teaching duties. During this year, he joined the underground church movement resisting the rise of Nazism and befriended Karl Barth and Albert Schweitzer. Adams returned to the United States in 1936, convinced that liberal religion needed to seek relevancy in the face of the world's evils. He taught at Meadville Lombard from 1936 to 1943, and he then served as a professor in the Federated Theological Faculties of the University of Chicago from 1943 to 1956, earning his PhD in 1945. During his years in Chicago, Adams worked with Independent Workers of Illinois, a grassroots political organization dedicated to governmental reform. In 1957, Adams left Chicago to become a professor of Christian social ethics at Harvard Divinity School.

Adams served as president of the Society of Christian Ethics, the American Theological Society, and the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion and was an active member of the American Civil Liberties Union. Adams strongly influenced American Christian ethics by making the works of liberal German theologians, including Paul Tillich, Ernst Troeltsch, and Karl Holl, accessible by translating, editing, and interpreting their writings. In turn, Adams had a profound influence on Tillich, who claimed that Adams taught him the importance of the emphasis on the practical, social, and political applications of agape to the situations of the society in which we live. Following his retirement from Harvard, Adams continued teaching at Andover Newton and Meadville Lombard until his death.

Adams believed in the role religious institutions play by passing on political and social values shaped by the demands of love and justice. He was concerned that liberal religion too often moves in the direction of individualism, arguing that religion involves both personal and social concerns. Adams's method of reformulating religious liberalism was intentionally dialectical, focusing on the community, the individual, God, and then the human. Adams maintained that in developing ethical formulations for a new age, no answer is final because the application of any ethical theory to the present situation and reflection on the interaction of event and theory are in constant flux.

AFGHANISTAN

Formed by the political expansion of Pashtun tribes and unified in the 19th century, the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan harbors a population that is almost entirely Muslim. The Pashtun ethnic group is joined by Persian-speaking Tajiks, Hazaras, and Aymaqs as well as Turkish-speaking Uzbeks and Turkmens, and Islam provides a unifying force for the disparate groups. Ninety-nine percent of Afghans are Muslim, with 84% following the Sunnī tradition (mostly of the Hanafi variety) and 15% following the Shi'a tradition (mostly Hazaras in the Imami school, with smaller groups of Ismailis). In 1990, Afghanistan had the largest refugee population living outside its border, mostly in Pakistan, Iran, and the Arabian Peninsula. Its people began leaving en masse following the coup of 1978 and the ensuing war, and though some returned after the fall of the communists in 1992, many still remain in other countries. This entry will trace the historical development of the Islamic nation, through its engagement with Britain and the Soviet Union during the Cold War, and offer some insight into Afghanistan's situation at the beginning of the 21st century.

Early History

Supposedly the home of Prophet Zoroaster, Afghanistan's location on trading routes to China lent it value to various empires of the past, and it was incorporated into Cyrus the Great's Achaemenid Empire and later conquered by Alexander the Great in 327 BCE. Buddhism was introduced to the region under the Mauryan Empire, which ruled from the fourth to the second century BCE, and those practices endured through the Sassanid Empire to the sixth century CE. The 'Abbāsīd Dynasty gained dominance in the seventh century, and through the ninth century, the inhabitants of the area were mostly converted to Sunnī Islam. Meanwhile, agricultural conditions brought many to settle in the Hindu Kush area, and they began to assimilate into the already thriving Pashtun culture.

Following the weakening of the 'Abbāsīd Caliphate in the ninth century, Afghanistan began to be ruled by local dynasties such as the Samanids, who preferred and promoted the Shi'a tradition. The area was conquered by Genghis Khan in the 13th century, but his rule did not displace the Islamic faith that had taken hold. By the time the dynasty's reign had concluded, most of Genghis Khan's descendants and successors had converted to the faith. The Mughal emperor Zahir ud-din Muhammad Babur captured Kabul from the Mongols in 1504, and though his center of political power was in India, he expressed his love for the land of Afghanistan in his memoirs.

The Mughal rule, Islamic in character, lasted until the 18th century. During this period, Afghanistan saw regular warfare between the Mughals and the Safavids as well as the Uzbeks of Central Asia. The Pashtuns were able to gain concessions from all sides of the conflict as Kandahar changed hands several times. While the Pashtun Hotaki Dynasty was able to give Afghanistan indigenous rule for a short time, they were ousted by the armies of Nadir Shah of Persia in 1738. None of the myriad governors attempted to alter the religious attitude of the region, but its Muslim character would be challenged by communist zeal during the Cold War.

The Great Game

In 1826, Dost Mohammad named himself Emir of Afghanistan, and his rule saw the beginning of what has become known as the Great Game, the struggle between the Soviet Union and Britain over the mountains of Afghanistan. The Sikh forces of Maharajah Ranjit Singh occupied Peshawar in 1834, and following their expulsion and amid fears of a repeat invasion, Mohammad turned to the British for aid. The British conditions for aid included the relinquishing of Peshawar, recognition of that province's independence along with the independence of Kandahar, and an immediate cessation of negotiations with Russia and Iran, countries whose reach the British sought to impede. When Mohammad agreed to the terms, Britain installed Shuja Shah Durrani, who was under the influence of British agents, as emir. In 1839, the British invaded Afghanistan, but in 1842, Shuja was assassinated by forces that had repelled the British attack and supported Dost Mohammad's son Mohammad Akbar.

Following what became known as the Second Anglo-Afghan War, the country was consolidated under Abdur Rahman, who attempted to destroy tribal ties by forcibly relocating many Pashtuns. Rahman brought religious leaders into his ruling council with the aim of modernizing Afghanistan, but his harsh tactics of rule increased the enmity between the Sunnī and Shi'a communities. In 1893, he agreed to the Durand Line, which would mark the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan in the foreseeable future, cutting directly through Pashto lands. The boundary continued to foment violence into the 21st century.

Afghanistan secured its independence from Britain following the Third Anglo-Afghan War. Amānullāh Khān took control of the country in 1919 and signed the Treaty of Friendship with Russia in 1921, after the Bolshevik Revolution and Russia's attempts to placate its Muslim inhabitants, but that relationship soon dissolved following perceived injustices done to Russian Muslims. Amānullāh Khān put many reforms into place, such as encouraging the wearing of Western-style clothing, discouraging the seclusion and veiling of women, as well as promoting secular education. In part due to these issues, he was ousted from power by Pashtun tribesmen in 1929, and he was succeeded by the more rigorously religious leader Nader Shah. Shah managed to reunify the broken country and tried to combine religious fervor with modern leanings. Afghanistan joined the League of Nations in 1934, leading to its formal recognition by many countries, including the United States.

With the appointment of Mohammad Daoud as prime minister in 1953, modernization attempts were revitalized. Daoud shocked his country by appearing with his wife and the wives of his ministers unveiled during Independence

Day celebrations, demanding that religious leaders provide verses from the Qur'an in support of their objections, and jailing several of them when they failed to do so. The constitution written in 1964 was considered secular, even though it contained phrases identifying Islam as the religion of Afghanistan and making Shari'a law applicable on issues not covered by secular law. A new constitution was written in 1977, by which time the ranks of the so-called fundamentalists had swelled despite their suppression since 1964. Daoud was assassinated in a coup the following year.

Communism and the Cold War

The year 1978 saw the emergence of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan, which supported the Soviet Union and promoted communism in Afghanistan. In response to the growing communist threat, many Afghans fled to Pakistan and Iran, where they began organizing a resistance movement to bring down the "atheistic" and "infidel" communist regime backed by the government. The terms bring to light the intrinsic connection for Afghans between the state and religion; the communists were doubly evil, in faith and in their foreignness.

The resistance was formed by a coalition of groups generally designated as "fundamentalist" and "traditionalist" that were at odds with one another over their political goals. The fundamentalists, composed of members of the Jamaat-e-Islami, Hizb-e-Islami, and Ittehad-i-Islami, sought a state that redefined Islam in Afghanistan through mass politics. The traditionalists wanted rule defined by Shari'a but were less concerned with a redefinition of Islam in political terms. Members of the Mahaz-e-Milli-Islami dominated that group, and it incorporated Shi'a Muslims of the Hazarajat and Sufi orders.

The Soviet Union became involved in 1979, and a decade of guerrilla warfare ensued, waged by the mujahideen ("those waging jihad," "holy warriors"), who linked moral considerations with their political purpose. The United States, along with Pakistan, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia, aided the mujahideen in the defeat of the Soviet forces, and in 1988, Afghanistan came to an agreement with Pakistan to provide for the repulsion of Soviet troops and the establishment of a neutral Afghan state. This deal was not well received by the mujahideen, and when the Soviet Union left the country under the new president Mikhail Gorbachev, Afghanistan quickly became involved in a civil war. Islam became central to the new Afghani state, and in April of 1992, the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan came into being.

Growth of the Taliban and the U.S. War

Many mujahideen followed their religious zeal into the folds of the Taliban, who ruled over nearly two thirds of Afghanistan in 1996 and sought to create a new Afghani Emirate under Mullah Mohammed Omar. Most of the group members are young men who were trained in Pakistani madrasas (many run by the Jamiat Ulema-e-Islam) and were inspired by the Deobandi brand of Islam. The Taliban are infamous for their strict interpretation of Shari'a law and their harsh treatment of women, including the requirement of women to wear the burka in public. They engaged the United Front of the North in a civil war that lasted from 1996 to 2001 and earned a reputation for ruthlessness. During the war, they allied with the Pakistani national army, an alliance that continued into the 21st century and was bolstered by Pakistani soldiers allied with the Taliban, estimated to be 20% to 40% of the fighting force. The war against the northern alliance ended in 2001 with the assassination of its leader, Ahmad Shah Massoud, shortly before the September 11 attacks, an act said to have been orchestrated by al Qaeda to win Taliban support for its terrorist program.

In the wake of the September 11 attacks on the United States by al Qaeda, the Taliban offered protection to Osama bin Laden (d. 2011), who the American government believed to be implicated in the attacks. On October 7, the United States launched an offensive in Afghanistan that sought to capture al Qaeda terrorists and disband their hosts, the Taliban. They were quickly successful in toppling the Taliban regime, though the capture of bin Laden would remain an elusive hunt until 2011. In 2006, there were indications that the Taliban was regrouping and gaining influence in Afghanistan despite the ongoing war. Suicide attacks and a particular (but by no means universal) interpretation of jihad (holy war) characterized the Taliban's strategy, and the flourishing opium trade provided its wealth.

In the first decade of the 21st century, the Taliban was still active in the area surrounding the Durand Line, extending their reach to the Swat Valley of Pakistan in 2009 and gaining recognition from the Pakistani government for their rule. American attacks on Afghanistan continued, commonly through the use of unmanned drone aircrafts, but the sway of the Taliban is evident in much of the country. President Barack Obama stated in 2010 that U.S. troops would begin to withdraw from Afghanistan in 2012, but many remain unconvinced, and defense officials have speculated that the conflict could continue into the foreseeable future, though in 2011 secret negotiations between the U.S. government and the Taliban to create a truce were made public. Afghanistan is a country created by, and for the majority of its past governed by, foreign administrations, but its Islamic character has remained a unifying element for its diverse population.

AFRICA

In Africa, more than 1,000 languages are spoken across a landmass that holds 53 nations, countless terrains, and diverse cultural practices, ethnolinguistic groups, and religious worldviews. Though Christianity, Islam, and African Traditional Religion (ATR) are the three predominant religions of Africa, Rastafarianism, Hinduism, Black Judaism, Cargo Cults, and multifarious new religions creatively exist and persist in pockets across the continent. While stereotyping often presents Africa and Africans monolithically as part of a primordial, unchanging past, in reality, Africa and its people are continually transforming, influencing, and creatively adapting to modern challenges, global interchange, and cultural interactions. As part of the global community, Africa's people affect and are affected by trade, national debts, technological advancements, health reform, industry, and governmental sanctions. Global economic processes interplay and transform, on a local level, social interactions, religious ideologies, educational practices, consumer preferences, and daily activities. As access to electricity, clean running water, and substantive nutrition becomes more available to larger populations, Africa's potential role as a significant player within the global market and transnational cultural relations exponentially increases. This entry discusses the social impact of different religious worldviews; slavery, colonization, and the formation of nations and governments; the global society; globalization and technology; the religions of Africa; and cultural practices and competing values on the continent.

Social Impact of Religious Worldviews

Because for many Africans, the sacred is imbued in everyday life, fiscal concerns, emotional well-being, spiritual developments, and material realities are not just interconnected but dependent on one another. As conversions to Christianity rapidly expand in West, Central, and South Africa and Islam continues to have a stronghold on many North, West, and East African countries, the ways in which these religious traditions are embraced, interpreted, and practiced within Africa society must be recognized as filtered through lenses that generally honor the fusion between material manifestations and spiritual realities. Because of this holistic interrelationship between the invisible and visible worlds, religious traditions often become integrated with farming practices, market vending, trade relationships, family units, social ceremonies, and daily functions.

Understanding this vital connection forces the impact of religious traditions to be placed on the same ideological table as the impact of global factors on Africa's economy. It becomes relevant to examine not only the philosophies of religious traditions across Africa but also global factors that shape day-to-day realities and decision-making processes: globalization and technology, historical factors such as slavery and colonization, government and economy, education, health, environmental factors, migration patterns, and social concerns.

Colony, Government, Economy

Africa's most recent postcolonial development, and, in turn, its place within the economic world order and global market, has been affected by several key historical factors: slavery, colonization, and the formation of nations and governments.

Brief Early History of Africa

The earliest human descendants scientifically discovered inhabited the African subcontinent; crude tools such as hand axes have been dated back from 60,000 to 1 million years ago in West Africa, implying a long human presence; rock paintings in Namibia have been dated back 27,000 years; decorative pottery dating back nearly 10,000 years has been found across North and West Africa. By 3000 BCE, cattle herders and hunter-gatherer communities predominated in West Africa; by 2000 BCE, hierarchical communities developed, with flourishing examples of art and kingship present among the Egyptians, the Nok of Nigeria (500 BCE), and empires and city-states of the 8th to the 15th century CE, including the Songhai State, the Soninke Kingdom of Ghana, the Mali Empire, the Benin Kingdom, and the Yoruba and Hausa city-states.

Several ancient Egyptian and Roman records, as well as Muslim travelers like Ibn Battuta, refer to powerful empires and city-states across northern, western, and eastern Africa engaged in inter-African trade and trade relations with the Mediterranean world hundreds of years prior to the transatlantic slave trade and European colonization of Africa. This is significant to note because many Western scholars, from early historians to Hegel, inaccurately believed that Africa had no history or global interface prior to 15th-century European interests promoting continental domination.

Many early Christian scholars, or patricians, such as Origen and Augustine, wrote theological arguments interpreting Christian doctrine, canonical orthodoxy, and biblical legitimacy while residing in North Africa. Ethiopia, which had a strong Jewish presence from the time of the Queen of Sheba, converted as a nation to Christianity in the first centuries of the Common Era. While Christianity and indigenous traditions predominated in North Africa prior to Islam, by the 9th to the 10th century, Islam had spread across the Sahara and Sahel, with Islamic libraries and scholastic centers established in places such as Niger, Nigeria, and Mali as early as the 13th century. Mansa Musa, the Islamic ruler of the Mali Empire from 1307 to 1332, stands out in history: Accompanied by 8,000 men and several tons of gold in 1324 to 1325, Mansa Musa went on hajj, the Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca (Makkah), carrying so much wealth with him that his gifts of gold to other rulers were purported to have disrupted their local economies.

In the 15th century, the Ife (Nigeria) and Benin kingdoms, recognized for metal casting, indigenous traditions, and wealthy, powerful shrines, began trading relationships with the Dutch and Portuguese as early as 1432. By 1517, however, the Spanish had instituted the slave trade from West Africa to the Caribbean; by 1617, the Dutch West India Company entered the lucrative slave trade; and by the 1780s, Britain became the leader in the slave trade, which at its peak in the late 18th century shipped off an estimated 70,000 enslaved Africans per year. Throughout this process, African kingdoms such as the Oyo and Asante states increased in wealth and power through arbitrating the slave trade with European merchants in the 17th and 19th centuries, respectively. It was not uncommon for Christian missionaries and explorers from Europe to establish contact with African communities as a vehicle for obtaining wealth; conversion and the claiming of natural resources often went hand in hand. In Central Africa, for example, Portuguese explorers, who arrived on the Gabonese coast in 1470, converted the royal court of Kongo to Christianity in 1491 and began the exportation of enslaved Africans to the Americas by 1520.

Slavery and Colonization

The impact of the trans-Saharan and transatlantic slave trades is still present on the continent today. The numbers of Africans enslaved is difficult to calculate, since they include not only those who survived the capture and sea voyage to be sold into slavery in the New World but also those who died in the process through warfare, capture, and transport associated with slavery. It is estimated that between the 16th and 19th centuries anywhere between 12 and 25 million Africans were involved in the New World triangular trade. West and Central African communities suffered the most human loss through death, regional disputes over slave trade power dynamics, and forced emigration. West African port cities such as Elmina held European outposts that became the gateway of transport to the Caribbean and the Americas.

In 1807, Britain outlawed the slave trade to British colonies, later enacting the outlaw of the entire institution of slavery in British colonies in 1834 to 1838, which prompted other European nations with Caribbean colonies to follow suit. Surrounded by the North-South controversy and a brutal Civil War, slavery in the United States was not entirely outlawed until 1865; Cuba and Brazil protected the institution of slavery legally until 1886 and 1888, respectively. Because of the contraband demand for slave labor in the Americas, the trans-Saharan slave trade remnants in East Africa, and the established local practice of regionalized enslavement, many African nations upheld continental slavery as a lawful practice until the turn of the 20th century. Mauritania did not officially abolish slavery until 1981.

The 19th-century outlaw of the slave trade within the New World, which was reliant on the labor resources of Africa's able-bodied individuals, was shortly followed by the 1884 to 1885 Berlin Conference on Africa, held for European nations to divvy up African landmasses into colonies. At the conference meetings, African leaders were noticeably absent: The purpose was not to engage with African leaders civilly but, rather, to create peaceable treaties between the war-torn European nations struggling for increasing power within a highly competitive world market. Seeking for “untapped” resources, European nations arbitrarily cut the African continent into distinct colonies, for the most part regardless of long-established regional and ethnic boundaries.

In the “scramble for Africa,” France, Britain, Belgium, Portugal, and Germany became the primary players deciding the future of Africa based on its regional economic viability, access to natural resources, and potential for colonial capital. Nearly every African nation today, excluding Ethiopia, was forcibly colonized by a European nation from the late 19th to mid-20th century. Dispersed African peoples were more easily quelled; strong states such as the Asante in present-day Ghana and the Sokoto Caliphate in present-day Nigeria upheld battle and massive resistance to the attempts at European control.

This process of European colonization disrupted local and regional hierarchies and established new systems of government as well as transforming laws, global relations, market input, urban development, the African elite, vocational opportunity, social displacement, and trade relations in the 20th century. African soldiers, fighting under colonial banners, significantly affected the outcomes of World War I and II. French Algeria and southern Africa had the largest population of European colonists; much of West and Central Africa was predominantly ruled from the Metropole.

The era of African independence began in 1957, when the British-ruled Gold Coast became the independent nation of Ghana. Francophone West and Central African colonies followed Britain’s model and became independent in 1960, closely correlating to the timeline of the civil rights period in America and the independence movements in the Caribbean. The Organization of African Unity was founded in 1963 in Ethiopia with 32 newly formed African nations joining, promoting Kwame Nkrumah’s early visions of Pan-Africanism. In nations such as South Africa, which initiated a system of apartheid in 1948, colonization did not technically end until 1994, when the ANC’s (African National Congress) Nelson Mandela was elected president after being imprisoned for 27 years.

In the postcolonial environment, many nations experiencing social and political upheaval have worked hard to transform peacefully. The formerly war-torn South Africa has shown how to nationally facilitate reconciliation among the discontented parties postapartheid through the success of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Assisting in peace matters across the continent, the African Union (formerly the Organization of African Unity) consists of 53 nations and aids in humanitarian, political, financial, social, health, and border issues. Ten Muslim nations in northern and eastern Africa are also regionally affiliated to the Arab League, founded in 1945.

While some humanitarian organizations have pointed to problems in Africa with questionable elections, voter intimidation, and ballot miscounting, there has also been a steady rise in women leaders and government officials, such as Liberia’s 24th president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf. Access to education, including postsecondary, trade, technical, medical, and university schooling, has become more readily available to the general populace as initiatives foster access for women and rural communities. Microcredit loans are also enabling more start-up small businesses.

Several nations in the past decade have created government-issued national insurance programs, which have been moderately to highly effective in decreasing infant mortality rates and making health care more affordable en masse. For the majority of citizens, however, stipends for retirement, unemployment, medical leave, welfare, or disaster coverage are rare, making community relations critical to social advancement and stability in times of crisis or illness. Families must band together for economic reliance, meaning that the healthy and able often support the weak and infirm. This social network in rural areas makes individual social advancement more difficult, because greater wealth invites further responsibility to extended family members in need. This communal reliance is reflected in the South African phrase ubuntu, meaning “I am because we are, and we are because I am.”

Africa and Global Society

At the beginning of the 21st century, Africans have encountered and engaged in many acts of globalization that have significantly affected choice in livelihoods, styles of dress and music, modes of transport, types of communication, available materials for trade and consumption, as well as tools that promote access to healthier styles of living.

Global Market Exchange

Western and Asian products flood into African markets and become a part of country, regional, and village life transactions. From used clothing to plastic products, car parts, eating utensils and cookery, medicines and food, Nike shoes, and Coca-Cola, disparate items from across the planet are becoming more readily accessible and available for individual and community use. Regionally consumed and locally interpreted, global products are often transformed, refurbished, and used for localized means and purposes: Used tires become sandal soles; oil drums store uncooked beans, rice, and grains for market vendors; wool hats become symbolically reidentified with particular garb for religious initiations; glass soda bottles are reused as storage for local perfumes and gasoline; and plastic labels and telephone wires are refashioned into stylish bags and bowls. When money is scarce but services and products are desired and needed, ingenuity creates a number of new, viable items that match social interest and the local economy.

Glocalization

As the promotion of global trade has enabled dialogue between rural communities and world capitals, cooperatives that create clayware, jewelry, art products, soaps, cloths, stoneware, and utilitarian products for the benefit of rural development are steadily on the rise. The promotion and success of these groups is reliant on global exchange. Microcredit loans have also proved beneficial to rural and urban communities. In areas where illiteracy is prevalent among women, it is often difficult for female traders to receive traditional loans from banking institutions. Working cooperatives enacted locally but engaged with a global playing field change the way global actors are perceived and community members are locally received.

Farming Production and Export

Local raw products such as shea butter, tea, cocoa, bauxite, palm oil, gasoline, and coffee are exported to nations in Asia, Europe, the Middle East, and the Americas. The fiscal value of monoculture farming products, such as peanuts and cacao, are often based on pricing models regulated on a global scale. Living on limited incomes, small farmers in rural areas are often forced to sell to transnational monopolies listing global pricings below production value cost. Creating this overreliance on monoculture farming products, shown to be economically fluid within the global market, can cause societal disturbance and overwhelming bouts of poverty in communities depending on an individual product's success.

Industrial Development and Product Access

Countries such as South Africa and Libya are taking the lead in African intercontinental trade and development. South African companies, from beer brewers, to clothing manufacturers, to building developers, have become the leading marketers presenting Westernized products and models of consumption to a growing African audience. Malls, supermarkets, and high-end retail shops have sprouted rapidly in the past 5 years across West African capitals. Whereas a decade ago many global products were unavailable to African patrons, today in most capitals nearly any marketable item, from foodstuffs to entertainment, to luxury watches, to computers, is available to well-financed African consumers and expatriates, if only they are willing to pay for the product's convenience and accessibility.

Globalization and Technology

With increasing access to Western and Asian consumables, scholars and communities alike discuss the impact of global products with competing value systems on African transnational exchange, regional development, and discussions of cultural capital through examining how local traditions interact with business models of multinational expansion.

Shifts in Technological Advancement

At the end of the 20th century, many places in Africa had few access points to telephone landlines, making global communications for the majority limited to calling booths and traveling to major ports of business for global transactions. By 2007, however, many African nations skipped the process of landline development entirely, moving directly to cell phone usage, which requires less infrastructure and is more technologically practical. This has meant that many rural communities, unaccustomed to affordable phone access, have become or are in the process of becoming hotbeds for cell phone usage and the opening of Internet cafés.

With greater access to cell phones, CDs, DVDs, radio, the Internet, and television, news outlets are projecting world stories into local homes. Homes made of clay and cement, without running water, and with only sporadically working electricity can have residents that have access to the Internet and Shakira's latest platinum album on their iPhone. Nollywood, Nigeria's booming movie industry, reigns over visual entertainment over the entire continent. Music conglomerates such as MTV Africa, projecting Rhianna's music videos from movie screens into city clubs and university nightlife, promote Western-produced music as a global standard for audio entertainment. Radio stations across sub-Saharan Africa present a combination of locally performed music and transnational televangelical missionaries preaching for the listener's salvation. Internet cafés can provide access to anything: family members' e-mails across the globe, local single's groups formed online, job sites, pornography, political blogs, nongovernmental organizations and scholastic opportunities, world media, Internet-based universities, and medicinal advice published in the latest scientific weekly. Without the paced induction of technology into daily realities, the consequences of increases in telephone usage, TV watching, Internet browsing, and computer reliance have for many African communities remained a subject yet to be determined.

Impact of Technological Change

The recent increase of technology, mobility, media, and communications across the continent has invited a whole new way for many Africans to engage in global dialogue. For example, rural communities that only 40 years ago developed their first Western-style schools, 20 years ago received access to clean running water, 15 years ago had minimal access to electricity, 10 years ago had phone booths a bus ride away, 8 years ago had access to motorcycles, 6 years ago gained access to workable roadways, 4 years ago had access to cell phones, 2 months ago had access to the Internet, and 1 week ago had access to iPods are sure to bring new innovations, market products, and social expectations tomorrow and the next day. As technological advancement invites more opportunity for individual and collective development, social obligation and community function will have to shift to match the adoptive change.

For example, with radio as an accessible medium for nearly all Africans, regardless of class status or education level, grassroots movements and global initiatives can be better publicized, promoted, and supported across rural and urban communities.

Because battery-charged radios and cell phones are becoming more affordable, millions of rural dwellers are engaging in localized global exchange through a newfound awareness of economic and social opportunity. As other vehicles of communication, such as newspapers and the Internet, become more accessible to the majority of Africans across economic lines, an increase in dialogue, engagement, and interrelationship with global partners and communities will have a greater effect on local businesses, farmers, traders, and mothers as well as on country GDPs, international trade deficits, and national growth and development.

Modes of Transport

Air transport throughout Africa is becoming increasingly more available; whereas capital cities used to be the only transport hubs, and travel across African nations used to include a stopover in Amsterdam or London, today stable nations have transcontinental planes and daily regional flights. While African air travel is constantly improving, the steep prices limit flight usage to the elite, the tourist, and the expatriate. Conversely, motor transport, including privately owned cars, publically run buses, and motorcycles for hire, has become much more accessible to the average African citizen.

As in Asia, motorcycles have become highly sought after commodities as quick, affordable vehicles capable of traversing unpaved rural paths and small town roads. For villagers with undeveloped roadways, access to motorcycles and other off-road vehicles enables their products' entry into entirely new markets of trade, formerly inaccessible due to their being beyond walking distance. Because Africa has almost no intracontinental production of motor vehicles, nearly all modes of transportation must be internationally tariffed and shipped, making costs of new and used cars often exorbitant according to U.S. standards. As more used vehicles saturate Africa's transport market, lowered costs will make gas-run vehicles more available for the masses. While enabling more trade, further development, and easier travel, poorly kept roads and overcrowded vehicles have led to increases in fatal transport accidents, pollution, and theft.

Religions of Africa

Across Africa, very little atheism exists; regardless of tradition, there is almost a unanimous belief in a higher power governing and regulating daily life and communal relationships.

Islam

The Muslim calendar began in 622 CE, when Prophet Muhammad settled in Medina. By the late 600s, most of North Africa had already converted to Islam, and by the late 700s, Islam had spread as far south as present-day Senegal. Islam traveled from northern and eastern Africa to western Africa through trade relations. From the 10th to the 13th century, Berbers and Muslim Arabs began converting the royalty of the Sahel, such as the Ghanaian and Malian kings. Many kings and traders practiced both local and Islamic traditions. Islamic missionary activities for the general populace in West Africa became relatively successful from the 13th to the 17th century, followed by nearly 60 years of Fulani-led holy wars (1804–1862). In the 16th and 17th centuries, the Arabic Timbuktu Tarikhs recorded West African history, showing that postconversion, many African Muslims went on pilgrimage to Mecca and returned with renowned scholars and lawyers to help rebuild cities such as Timbuktu as centers of Islamic learning. The late 1800s showed an increase in citizen conversions to Islam, with a steady number of followers converting as Muslim schools, services, and businesses became greater strongholds within the community. Today, North Africa is almost entirely Muslim, and approximately two thirds of West Africans profess a Muslim faith, with the more northerly regions holding higher percentages of Muslims than the southern regions, which are more Christian.

In West Africa, forms of Islam called Kharijism and Sufism predominate. Practicing Sufis are part of a contemplative, mystical tradition. Kharijism is considered more democratic and less conservative than Islamic practices in the Middle East and East Africa, with veils rarely required and many Muslims peacefully and harmoniously living among Christian and ATR practitioners. In locales where mosques are established, the call to prayer is publicly announced across the region five times a day, eating restrictions are adhered to during Ramadan, alcohol is abstained from year-round, and the Five Pillars of Islam are faithfully followed.

Generally, Muslim men wear single-tone, two-piece tunics, and women wear loose print dresses with a head tie. While the Qur'an allows the practice of polygyny, a husband is required to adequately provide for his wives and children economically and love his wives equally, having no more than four wives in total—though having two wives is more common. Many West African Muslims combine local practices with Muslim beliefs. Robinson refers to this as the “Africanization of Islam” and the “Islamization of Africa.” For example, some Muslims may use amulets for protection with written script from the Qur'an or consult Muslim scholars for divination sessions. Countries such as Nigeria, which instituted Shari'a law in six northern states in 2000 and 2001, conversely have stricter expectations for Muslim practitioners, including limiting female mobility and education, requiring veils, and promoting a stronger categorical distinction between Muslims and nonbelievers.

In contemporary East and North Africa, increasing militancy among Muslim groups has raised concern among Western nations. Chad and Sudan, for example, were on USAID's (U.S. Agency for International Development) 2009 CPC (Critical Priority Country) list. The Horn of Africa has maintained strong ties for more than a millennium with Muslim Indian Ocean trading networks and Arabian Peninsula social contacts, and today, it remains a strategic area for rising insurgent movements across the Muslim world. Central Africa, comparatively, has had relatively little Muslim influence, with most practitioners following Christianity or local traditions. Mid-19th-century slave raids of Central Africans by East African Muslim traders, however, have remained in historical memory. In southern Africa, Muslims only account for about 1% of the population, many of whom are Asian immigrants.

Christianity

North Africa had been exposed to Christianity and the Mediterranean world since the religion's inception in the ancient Roman Empire at the turn of the Common Era. While widespread conversion to Christianity did not occur in North Africa, citizens traveling in the ancient world could be exposed to the tenets of Judaism, Christianity, the ancient Egyptian religion, indigenous practices from a variety of African communities, and to some extent Hinduism and Mesopotamian practices. Through trade routes and contacts, cultures were able to intermingle and hybridize, with knowledge of powerful gods and traditions often being transferred along with material exchanges.

Because many African communities used oral histories rather than written narratives, speculation ensues about exactly how much North and East Africa influenced and were influenced by the Mediterranean, Persia, and Arabia. Nevertheless, by the 10th to 16th centuries CE, trade networks existed between East Africa and Arab and Indian traders. Indian and Chinese traders had dealings in India, and Indonesian sailors traded with Madagascar and central-eastern Africa, meaning that ideas and products were exchanged across multiple continents. Portuguese merchants had arrived at the Cape of Good Hope and Central and West Africa by the early 1500s, with the Dutch, British, and Germans later building trading forts, slave castles, and mission stations.

While some royalty and scattered citizens across Africa converted to Christianity as early as the late 1400s, up through the 1800s, Christianity was not a major religious factor in Africa until increased European and American missionary activities were widely propagated by Catholic, Anglican, Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist denominations in the late 1800s. Formerly enslaved Africans in Britain and the Americas began missionization when resettlement began in West African Liberia (1847) and Sierra Leone (late 1700s). By the 1930s, Christianity was practiced by less than a quarter of Africans. However, by the time of African independence from colonization in the 1960s, African independent churches (AICs), run by Africans and catering to community concerns, became popular and enabled locally interpreted Christian doctrines to be widely practiced. Post-Vatican II practices also promoted a more inculturated form of Catholicism that invited African communities to hear and interpret liturgy in their native tongue.

Many White-led mission stations brought the idea of Christianity to African communities, but few have strong impacts on current Christian practitioners. Most Protestant churches use African styles of music and worship and are more charismatic than their European or American counterparts. Healing sessions, anointings, overnight prayer sessions, dance, and glossolalia (speaking in tongues) are common practices in many African churches. In Ghana, for example, in 50 years, Christianity has moved from being a minority religion to the predominating practice.

For many Africans, despite inculturated practices, Christianization is associated with Westernization and education, which is associated with wealth and social betterment. For some, this can mean that with conversion comes an expected de-Africanization or complete social isolation from African indigenous practices, sometimes imposing a dual reality or competing religious and social identities. Protestant and AIC movements today generally preach the gospel of prosperity, with global evangelists earning converts through promised get-rich-quick schemes. African Catholicism is seen by the Vatican as a burgeoning hope for the global future, with African priests and practitioners holding steady or increasing as European counterparts steadily decline.

African Traditional Religion

Indigenous religious practices have historically been stigmatized by missionaries and converts as pagan, demonic, heathen, and a form of witchcraft. What was misunderstood was often deemed as superstitious, rising from an assumed ignorance or a form of primitivism. This oversimplification came from groups using patronizing colonial models to justify imprisonment, enslavement, and degradation of African peoples: Dehumanization was often necessary to validate the social mandate for acquiring African labor, land, and resources for powerful people abroad. It is no surprise that the history of Africa is often overlaid with Europe's political history, for it was inaccurately assumed by influential philosophers that prior to engagement with Europeans, Africa was ahistorical. Where linear histories were left unrecorded, socially carried oral histories were denied scholastic relevancy. Because systems of analysis and ways of being were different from European standards, African modes of thought were presumed subpar at best and nonexistent at worst: These misperceptions have produced more than a century of Eurocentric research validating the colonial manifesto.

Many Western-trained 19th-century anthropologists assumed that Africans had no religion because there was often no identified name specifically tied to localized practice. However, it soon became clear that specific titles were unnecessary within a worldview where life encompasses the full spectrum of religious practices: Life is religion, and religion is life. ATR or African Indigenous Religion is literally the air you breathe: all-encompassing, life supporting, and societally nourishing. Everything is interconnected: plants, animals, peoples, spirits, ancestors, the weather, and nature. ATR has been termed polytheist, pantheist, panentheist, animist, and monotheist, depending on the writer, the era, and the perspective. Diffused monotheism is probably the most accurate description, as many traditions and locales have multiple divinities or spirit intermediaries that work on behalf of a Supreme Being or a highly esteemed deity that is hierarchically powerful. Some traditions have one or few divinities, while others have countless; ancestors play a greater or lesser role depending on a community's ritualization of the life cycle process.

Whereas in Abrahamic traditions exclusionary practices are promoted through standardized forms of ideological orthodoxy, backed by written documents classified as sacred texts, African traditions are more associated with orthopraxis: Right action and positive results lead to a communally accepted response. Rather than tenet based, African philosophies are performance based.

Indigenous traditions generally include ancestors and the not yet born as a part of community life and decision-making processes. Clear distinctions between the visible and invisible worlds do not exist when the dead can be invoked by mediums and ancestors can speak to the living through dreams, prophecies, and visions. Local beliefs and practices are constantly adapting and transforming new images, traditions, and materials to match current community needs and social interests. ATRs embrace multiple elements from competing traditions when methods and potential outcomes are viewed as compatible and socially valuable. As communities trade, transform, migrate, and adapt, hybrid forms of beliefs and practices are adopted and initiated. When conversions to Christianity and Islam occur, many of the cultural practices associated with ATR often still remain for the practitioner, as it is almost impossible to completely separate religious tenets from communal praxis. Today, while pockets of ATR practitioners remain across the continent, Togo, Benin, Liberia, Burkina Faso, Guinea-Bissau, and ethnolinguistic groups across Central Africa have the highest percentage of ATR followers in self-designating polls.

In most indigenous worldviews, time is measured cyclically, and lifetimes are malleable, with once-living ancestors and the not yet born (or the rebirthed) serving as guardians of and liaisons between spiritual forces and humanity. Life cycles and time are viewed cyclically rather than linearly. While African Christians and Muslims have reinterpreted this worldview to match ideological criteria, the spiritual realm is still viewed as a significant factor in daily decision making.

Style Aesthetics and Signification

Facial markings, styles of dress, and worn accessories can indicate a person's religious affiliation, societal status or cult affiliation, spiritual connections, community roles, birth order, and vocation. These external modes of spiritual and social recognition foster right action and relationship by visually presenting an individual's interior state of being to the community.

Supernatural Powers

Secret societies based on competing trials or rites of passage often connect to community expectations that with knowledge comes power and with power, social responsibility. With energetic formations often holding a neutral status, able to be manipulated for good or ill based on the personal user of such powers, out of respect and awe of the powers themselves, and the understanding of the destructive nature of such powers in the wrong hands, esoteric practices remain hidden because of their associative power. Tradition becomes distorted into a form of witchcraft when natural and supernatural energetic forces are mismanaged or used with ill intentions by an individual or group for personal gain or harmful purposes.

Witchcraft

Fears of witchcraft abound, not because they are superstitious remnants of old practices but rather as an expression of modern global times: As spiritual powers become diffused and transferable through market means based on capital costs, rather than through more traditional means of spiritual apprenticeships, the ability for powers to be mismanaged steadily increases in probability. In a system that acknowledges the power of the invisible, manipulation of energetic forces (divinities, individual spirits, and the dead) is seen as a real threat, and hence fears of witchcraft often remain among African Christian and Muslim communities, despite religious conversion. Christian and Muslim converts often proclaim that ATR in its entirety is a form of witchcraft, while practitioners of ATR clearly distinguish between witchcraft and tradition based on a person's intention of malice. Because converts must often publicly revoke prior traditional practices, it is not uncommon for the services of ATR priests and diviners to be used in secret by converts still seeking ancestral advice or for AICs to incorporate elements of local traditions within communally interpreted Christian practices.

Cultural Practices and Competing Values

As cultures intermingle, globalization blossoms, and migration adapts, socio-religious conversions continue to shape the community makeup of values and peoples. Traditional customs, rituals, and regional histories persistently transform as influentially contributing factors to communal practices and social norms.

Art and Culture

Cultural ingenuity in dance, music, and the arts is promoted from an early age in children. This is reflected in the continent's rich compilation of oral history, proverbs, epic poetry, and song, held within the knowledge tapestry of community historians, griots, bards, priests, and kings. This is also reflected in the utilitarian and social arts, as seen in the production of beads, pottery, sculpture, painting, clothing, brassware, musical instruments, and body adornment. It is not merely the philosophies and theoretical ideologies of the continent that affect the religious practices of modern African peoples but also the practically applied arts, dance, storytelling, and ritual performances that help construct and interpret the sociopolitical, economic, and cultural realities that shape today's Africa for tomorrow's global citizen.

African and European Philosophical Differences in Worldview

Throughout the Enlightenment in Europe and North America, the Cartesian distinction promoting a duality between body and mind, material and spiritual, physical and invisible changed not only the way individuals encountered religion and the divine but also their relationship to the world at large. This promotion of a spirit-mind dichotomy did not hold sway in Africa.

While urbanization in Africa has steadily been on the rise since the early 1960s, and industrialization projects continue to expand across the continent yearly, 18th-, 19th-, and 20th-century European philosophical influences have either been theoretically recognized across Africa, but interpreted with local specificity, or disregarded entirely as an effective way of engaging modern African realities. Whereas European scientists of the Industrial Revolution discouraged relying on invisible forces or realities that could neither be measured nor analyzed within a controlled environment, many Africans from Christian, Muslim, and indigenous backgrounds have continued to use invisible realms, seen as an extension of the material world, to discern important decision-making processes. While American preachers have historically stressed spiritual purity separate from the guises and pitfalls of material riches, Africans have often seen material wealth as a visible sign of a spiritual world blessed with ancestral or divine assistance. Whereas early-19th-century European financial institutions and businesses began to promote urban living and factory production, leaving workers disconnected from both the land and its produce, Africans who were not enslaved, and remained on the continent, have until recently lived and worked in predominantly rural environments reliant on subsistence farming, community responsibility, and local production.

Competing Values and Philosophies

Africa in modernity is faced with interpreting globally competing values in both local and regional contexts. Conflicting ideologies and practices affect the day-to-day living standards and expected familial and communal social responsibilities. Discussions include debate around the merits of nuclear family units versus extended family compounds, individual capital investment versus community advancement, urban versus rural dwellings, traditional courts versus local and national justice enforcement, and marital polygyny versus expectations of monogamy. President Jacob Zuma of South Africa, for example, has been criticized in the international media for siring 20 children with five wives, marrying his last wife while in office after paying lobola (“bride price”), as is the traditional custom.

Generally, an increase in Western- or Islamic-style education is a corollary of religious conversion. As literary rites of passage challenge the familiar social makeup of community hierarchy, dissonance between youth and parents arises based on language usage and cultural difference. Schools often teach colonial languages, while elders may speak only local languages. When religious conversions imply not only spiritual connotations but also social and institutional promotions of an attitudinal change, citizens on individual and collective levels are faced with competing sectors of power relations. As an example, the most skilled and well-educated Africans often seek opportunities by emigrating to more economically developed countries, a phenomenon often referred to as brain drain. Tensions can run especially high when traditional expectations of economic support for communal advancement are met by Africans in the diaspora with competing models of economy, such as capitalism, that promote individual interests over community gain.

Armed with multiple messages and mediums for interpretation, issues such as the selling of family land, inheritance rights for women, the role of children as caregivers, the practice of sorcery, and the interpretation of socially stigmatizing issues such as AIDS (acquired immunodeficiency syndrome) and homosexuality often lead to competing national debates and conflicting policy interests. Western medicine and traditional healing methods using diviners, healers, and herbalists can also present incongruous prescriptions, though often, for the patient, these two practices work hand in hand. Environmental, educational, emigrational, medicinal, social, and political messages are all affected by global pressures and religio-cultural change. As religious values across Africa transform, so do its peoples.

AGING

The challenges of aging, from midlife to end of life, involve far more than just shifting demographics. In a socio-religious context, they involve the redefinition of individual and collective identity and self-worth. As many societies worldwide become increasingly older, the aging life cycle is emerging as a social imperative addressed, at least in part, by religious praxis. As people experience their inevitable progression from youthful exuberance to middle age, to aged frailty, their socially defined sense of belonging and perception of life's meaning change. Humans are confronted by mortality, and within their social systems, they are forced to process their conceptions of weakness, physical/mental deterioration, and death.

The issue of aging is different depending on the cultural and religious context. In areas of the world dominated by traditional Hindu, Buddhist, Islamic, and indigenous cultural traditions, old age is often accepted as a respected and honorable stage of life.

In many of these parts of the world, the average population age is quite young, and elderly people are accorded a respected role in life. In more urban areas of these parts of the world and in the modern urbanized West, aging can be a more painful social process. In both cases, however, religious belief and association can play a positive role. This entry will focus on the problems of the modern West, for which Christianity and Judaism are the primary religious cultural traditions.

There are several cultural, social, and systemic problems generated by the aging process. In many cultures—especially Western cultures—older people are segregated and rejected by societies that value youth, strength, outer beauty, and physical/mental prowess. Social rejection can lead to self-loathing and a sense that one is unwanted and clinging to a life without meaning. This feeling is exacerbated by the direct experience of physical human deterioration combined with the knowledge that all human life is moving toward a certain end. As one's limitations grow, life is progressively seen as more and more finite, and one's focus is on the triumphs—or in many cases shortcomings—of the past instead of hope for the future. Focusing on the past, acknowledging the loss of youth, and developing an increasingly real awareness of death can induce fear, guilt, shame, anxiety, and an overall loss of agency. A negative view of the self, one's vocation, and interpersonal relationships can cause older people to seek meaning in a transcendent reality.

Apart from the general effect aging has on Western society's conception of self-worth, other key familial and cultural factors contribute to the greater perception of the older self. Some cultures revere the elderly as wise and having worth, not as reminders of inevitable physical and mental decay deserving isolation and abandonment. Within the economically focused, capitalist Western cultures, however, the elderly are sometimes seen as liabilities due to their lack of productivity. Also, in these cultures, the family unit is changing. It is generally not as nuclear, predictable, stable, or geographically confined as it was in years past. Because of these conditions, care for the aged tends to veer toward what is convenient and local—managed senior care—as opposed to supporting the proliferation of multigenerational households. Increasing numbers of older people form new “families” within retirement communities to combat loneliness, isolation, and negative self-worth. In a dynamic, rapidly changing culture teeming with social upheaval and problematic social developments (crime, violence, general tumult, and war, to name a few), the pseudo-family can offer safety, refuge, acceptance, and peace.

Prior to attaining the socially defined and/or physically (visually) defined label elderly, many people in their 40s and 50s experience a “midlife crisis,” where they seek to recapture the vibrancy, self-assuredness, and social value they perceive as lost as their youth was lost. A midlife crisis can involve attempts to join a more appealing social circle; purchasing clothing, housing, or automobiles generally reserved for a younger crowd; and/or undergoing plastic surgery or making other attempts to slow, or even reverse, the physical aging process. The midlife crisis could also entail mental reordering, where people attempt to rewrite their personal history, creating a more interesting and exciting past in an effort to give themselves increased social value and possibly jump-start a better future. People usually seek solace when death seems close and increasingly real, and they often create alternate realities when the inevitability of dealing with their past, present, and ever-shortening future becomes overwhelming. They may seek to control and overcome the aging process, physical/mental/emotional uncertainty, a sense of legacy, and impending death. Humans often want to reverse the inevitability of time, which involves the loss of loved ones, the loss of socioeconomic roles/value, the loss of health and vitality, and the loss of an opportunity to leave a socially valued legacy. Aging can cause disillusionment, forcing the aged to engage in a coping mechanism. As social humans, most people need to feel a sense of agency over their surroundings and themselves.

An aging population achieves this agency in part through religion, which helps people make sense of the inevitabilities of life as time passes and aging becomes a glaring reality. As people realize that social values, goals, and means of achievement are all changing as their life cycle progresses, they often find solace in religious symbols, rituals, and myths. Transcendence is sought as the familiar withers away and is passed on to the next generation. A 78-year-old has a different sense of hope than an 18-year-old, and spirituality—which can involve meditation, liturgy, spiritual conversation/relationships, social action, or any other spiritual pursuit—leads the aged toward a transcendent reality that lies in contrast to social alienation, disenfranchisement, and living on the social margin/periphery. Religious systems can also assist greatly as one copes with actual or impending loss, as one makes sense of the human condition, the inevitability of the human life cycle, and mortality.

Religion can provide meaning as death nears, because it can give significance to legacy, forgiveness, suffering, triumph, love, and family within life’s journey. The afterlife, a popular tenet of many religious systems, offers a new type of hope and rejuvenation when the aging process vanquishes the socially defined normative (youthful) sense of hope. As earthly expectations are lowered and one’s physical being is expected to decline, turning inward toward religion can enable a reidentification and a reintegration of the self, with value added. Faith is a means to defeat negative feelings, loneliness, regret, diminished self-worth, and isolation. Life, death, and all happenings in between are given significance through religion within a naturally and divinely ordered existence. Good and evil are explained, life is given meaning, legacy is defined by faith and devotion to others, and structure includes an aging humanity with inherent value. In sum, religious systems help people process current pain/loss/anxiety, provide hope, and comfort those moving toward illness and death.

Generally speaking, within religious communities, fear is addressed, strength is bestowed on the faithful, and the aged are desired, useful, and seen as powerful sources of wisdom and enlightenment (Odin, Zeus, Abraham, Noah, indigenous ancestors, etc.) worthy of honor and respect. The wise sage with a mature, informed, and valued existence, emanating experiential and spiritual cognizance, is seen as having infinitely more value than what is typically valued by earthly culture/symbol systems: physical aesthetics, productivity, and/or social status. Religious systems usually hold that there is an intrinsic human value that transcends social definition, where unconditional love is available from a divine or transcendent source and tangible platonic love abounds within the religion’s community. Each individual is unique and is seen as significant by the divine, and there is an inherent integrity in experience and the sharing of stories. Religious communities are intended to be attached and relational, not detached and isolated. Within a virtual or tangible religious community of acceptance, change and progression happen for a reason, so fear of the future (and uncertainty, suffering, and death) may subside.

Religious systems offer images of reverence, celebration, growth, wisdom, and fulfillment in aging, which counter the images of isolation, decay, loss of physical and mental abilities, and inevitable loss abundant in secular societies. Since religions are generally not bound by time, aging and death can be viewed as the culmination of fulfilling a meaningful purpose on earth until the next (transcendent) chapter of the universal narrative begins, not as a tragic end to our vocation, responsibilities, or the sense of loving and being loved. There is a sense that time, which will progress no matter what humans do on earth, is not an enemy or a master over humans but an inevitability that brings one closer to the transcendent reality. Although aging with agency is difficult within many cultural/social contexts, it is the norm within religious value systems.

AHMADDIYA

Ahmaddiya is a new religious movement that originated as a sect of Islam. The Ahmaddiya movement was founded by the religious reformer Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (1835–1908) in the village of Qadian in the Punjab region of India. The movement became known as the Ahmaddiya movement after Prophet Muhammad's alternative name. The movement started at the end of the 19th century as a reaction against what he regarded as the ignorance and narrow-mindedness of Punjabi Muslims. Having accepted the Muslim veneration of the old prophets, Mirza Ghulam Ahmad considered Krishna and Buddha as local prophets; he was acclaimed as the reformer of Islam (Mujadid) and the long-awaited Messiah and Mahdi. As the reformer of Islam in the 14th century of the Hejira era, Mirza Ghulam Ahmad preached against the jihad of the sword and the expensive hajj to Mecca (Makkah), suggesting instead the jihad of the pen and pilgrimage to Srinagar in Kashmir to visit the tomb of the local saint Yuz Asaf, believed by local people to be the true burial place of Jesus Christ. The Ahmaddiya movement started as Jamaat-e-Ahmaddiya in 1889. It received support from educated Punjabi Muslims, but due to a lack of wide public recognition, it developed into an Islamic sect. The movement also became an active Islamic missionary society.

After the death of the founder, the society was controlled by Mirza's khalif, or successor, Maulana Hakeem Noor-ud-Din (1841–1914). On his death, the Ahmaddiya movement split over the question of succession as well as over the personality of its founder. The Lahore-based Lahore Ahmaddiya movement considered Mirza Ghulam Ahmad the reformer of Islam and decided to follow the collective opinion of the board of senior members of the society. Other Ahmaddiyas followed a lineage of leaders, known as khalifs—direct descendants of Mirza Ghulam Ahmad. This group considers Mirza Ghulam Ahmad to be the lesser prophet and believes in the revival of the institution of the khalifate. Both groups are active in missionary activity outside India, particularly in Europe, Africa, and America. Both groups are sometimes called Qadiani, after the headquarters of the founder of the movement, though many members of the Ahmaddiya movement consider it to be a derogatory term.

The 1947 division of India caused the division of territory of the Ahmaddiya's influence. The town of Qadian remained in India, while the city of Lahore became a provincial center of Pakistan. The fate of the communities in these two countries was different. In secularist India, the Ahmadis, or followers of Mirza Ghulam Ahmad, are considered Muslims. In Pakistan, the Ahmadis initially received protection but soon became victims of a widespread anti-Ahmadiyya movement called “Khatm-e-Nabuwat” (the “Last Prophecy” [of Prophet Muhammad]). In the 1980s, anti-Ahmadi laws technically prevented members of the Ahmaddiya community from calling themselves Muslims and praying in common mosques. Many Ahmadis were taken to prison for violation of this ban. Others emigrated to Great Britain and other countries. Other Muslim countries, including Indonesia, have enacted laws restricting the religious practices of Ahmaddiya followers. At present, the headquarters of the biggest Ahmaddiya group, known as Jamaat-e-Ahmaddiya, is situated in a London suburb called Islamabad. Branches of the movement are found in more than 180 countries.

AKBAR (1556–1605)

Akbar, one of India’s greatest Mughal emperors, was touted as one of the most open to diverse religious points of view. But he also used this position of tolerance as a way of consolidating his imperial control over vast regions of the Indian subcontinent. His policy of sulh-i-kul (“universal tolerance”) did not discriminate against persons on the ground of religion. At the same time, Akbar’s thirst for theological knowledge was proverbial, and he participated in lively discussions with religious scholars from a variety of traditions.

Abul Fazl Allami (1551–1602), his court historian, enumerated the emperor’s divine right theory of kingship. The emperor was regarded as being farri i-izdi (“a light emanating from God”). The mahzarnama (“doctrine of infallibility”) was drafted in 1579 to contain the influence of religious leaders. The emperor was Imam Adil (“a just ruler”) with the title of Mujtahid (“having infallible authority”).

Akbar started a new religious practice called Tauhid-i-Ilahi (“divine monotheism”) or Din-i-Ilahi (“Divine Religion”) in 1582. It was not only a reflection of his liberal outlook and faith in eclecticism but also an expression of the absolute power of the emperor. The followers of Din-i-Ilahi had to carry a miniature portrait of the emperor in their turbans and pledged to sacrifice life as well as honor for him. It was not a new religion, and Akbar made it clear that he had not abandoned his own religion, Islam. The interpretation by Jesuit missionaries and orthodox mullahs (theologians guarding Islamic custom) had generated much confusion regarding the nature of Din-i-Ilahi. It did not have any priesthood, prophet, god, revealed books, or rituals. It was a conglomeration of elements such as monotheism, nature worship, mysticism, and philosophical doctrines from different religions. As an ethical system, it stressed virtues such as kindness, prudence, and piety. Vices such as lust, arrogance, and slander were to be abjured. Akbar introduced the Ilahi era in 1584, a solar calendar prepared by the royal astrologer Amir Fatehullah Seraji (d. 1588). Raja Birbal (1528–1586), a minister in Akbar’s court, was the first to embrace Din-i-Ilahi. It had only 19 followers and died a natural death after Akbar.

The Mughal state under Akbar was not a theocratic one. The criteria for appointment to high offices in his regime were based on merit, irrespective of a person’s religion. The zimmis, or non-Muslims, did not have to pay the discriminatory tax called jizya. The Emperor participated in Hindu festivals, and he did not force his Rajput Hindu queens to embrace Islam. The liberal religious outlook of the emperor was not universally appreciated, especially within the orthodox elements of Islam. One of the responses to Akbar was the rise of a conservative Muslim revivalism. The religious milieu of the Indian subcontinent witnessed remarkable changes under Akbar. The interaction between Hinduism and Islam resulted in changes in both religions. On the one hand, there was the liberalism promoted by Akbar, and on the other, there was conservatism in both the religions, partly in response to the liberal attitudes of the court.

AL QAEDA

Al-Qa‘ida (al Qaeda) is a Sunni Islamist group that espouses a radical “jihadist Salafist” ideology and relies predominantly on terrorist tactics in its pursuit of a global Islamic supremacist agenda. The group is best known for its association with the highly destructive “suicide” terrorist attacks using hijacked passenger jetliners in New York City and Washington, D.C., on September, 11, 2001. Its history, organization, ideology, and operational objectives will be summarized below.

Historical Overview

Al-Qa‘ida’s origins can be traced to certain logistical organizations established in Peshawar, Pakistan, to recruit, transport, subsidize, house, and record the names of Arab and other Muslim volunteers who had flocked to Afghanistan during the 1980s to wage armed jihad against the “infidel” Soviet invaders—the so-called Afghan Arabs. The most important of these was the Maktab al-Khidamat li al-Mujahidin (MAK; Mujahidin Services Bureau), which had been established by the Palestinian ‘Abdallah ‘Azzam, the “imam of jihad,” and Usama bin Ladin, the scion of a wealthy Saudi family of Yemeni origin, whose father, Muhammad, had built one of the largest construction firms in Saudi Arabia. After the Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan, ‘Azzam and bin Ladin decided to establish a “solid base” (al-qa‘ida al-sulba), both territorial and organizational, and thereby transform the Afghan Arabs into a kind of transnational Islamist fire brigade, which could be quickly sent to defend Muslims in various regions who were being attacked, occupied, or oppressed by infidel or “apostate” regimes. That, at least, was ‘Azzam’s initial conception, but over time, bin Ladin, together with veteran Egyptian jihadists from the Tanzim al-Jihad al-Islami (“Islamic Jihad Organization”), above all Ayman al-Zawahiri, developed a more grandiose vision for this newly formed jihadist “base,” which would henceforth constitute the vanguard (tali‘a) of a projected global jihadist insurgent movement that would focus on attacking the “far enemy” (al-‘adu al-ba‘id)—that is, the United States and its Western allies—rather than focusing on the “near enemy” (al-‘adu al-qarib), the local non-Muslim or apostate Muslim regimes that were allegedly oppressing Muslims if not waging a war to destroy Islam. This dispute over the proper role for al-Qa‘ida eventually led to a growing schism between bin Ladin and ‘Azzam, followed by the November 1989 car bomb assassination of the latter.

Thenceforth, bin Ladin and al-Zawahiri became the uncontested leaders of al-Qa‘ida, by then renamed Qa‘idat al-Jihad (“The Base of the Jihad”). Incensed by the Saudi regime’s reliance on American troops to oust Saddam Husayn’s forces from Kuwait in 1990 to 1991, bin Ladin increasingly began to denounce it as an apostate regime, which in turn caused him to become persona non grata within the kingdom and ultimately to lose his Saudi citizenship. He therefore opted to move the core of his al-Qa‘ida organization to Sudan, where he established various business ventures and forged tangible links with other jihadist organizations, both Sunni and Shi‘i. However, the increase in al-Qa‘ida-sponsored terrorist attacks caused the American government to apply enormous pressure on the Sudanese regime to expel the group from Sudan, and as a result, bin Ladin felt compelled to leave that country in 1996 and to move the core of his organization back to Afghanistan, which was by then largely under the control of the puritanical Taliban. He then forged a close relationship with the Taliban leader Mullah ‘Umar, founded al-Jabha al-Islamiyya al-‘Alamiyya li Jihad al-Yahud wa al-Salabiyyin (the “World Islamic Front for Jihad Against Jews and Crusaders”) in 1998, established elaborate training camp complexes in Afghanistan where prospective mujahidin from all over the world could receive generalized or specialized instruction, and continued plotting and launching attacks against his “infidel” enemies abroad, such as the destructive August, 7, 1998, U.S. embassy bombings in Tanzania and Kenya. This phase culminated in the sponsoring, planning, and execution of the “planes operation” on “Blessed Tuesday,” that is, 9/11, which resulted in the collapse of the Twin Towers of the World Trade Center in New York City and damage to a wing of the Pentagon on September 11, 2001, along with the deaths of nearly 3,000 people.

This attack prompted the U.S. government to respond militarily by invading Afghanistan to overthrow the Taliban regime and hunt down and kill bin Ladin and his lieutenants. Although this invasion quickly led to the collapse of the Taliban regime and the killing of many Taliban and al-Qa‘ida fighters in the course of military operations, the failure of the United States and its Afghan allies to capture or kill bin Ladin until 2011, or to interdict the retreat of hundreds of foreign jihadists across the border into the tribal frontier zone of Pakistan, where they soon established new safe havens, meant that the threat posed by al-Qa‘ida was not soon eliminated. However, bin Ladin and al-Zawahiri were forced to restructure their group inside Pakistan by establishing a more diffused and dispersed network. Bin Ladin was finally killed in a U.S. military raid on his hideout in Abbottabad, Pakistan, on May 2, 2011.

Organizational Structure

Al-Qa‘ida proper is a relatively small organization that is divided into two basic levels. First, there are a few dozen members of the majlis al-shura (“consultative council”), which is internally subdivided into several functional committees and effectively constitutes the strategic directorate or officer corps of the group. Second, al-Qa‘ida consists of somewhere between several hundred and several thousand rank-and-file members who take their marching orders directly from leading figures in the majlis al-shura or their direct subordinates.

However, the terrorist threat posed by the group goes beyond the actual leaders and rank-and-file members of the al-Qa‘ida organization. First, al-Qa‘ida has established affiliations with a host of other Islamist terrorist organizations or factions, both within and outside the Middle East. These affiliated groups and factions have in part embraced al-Qa‘ida’s transnational jihadist agenda, including its emphasis on attacking the far enemy—that is, the United States. Second, after 2001, al-Qa‘ida also evolved from a hierarchically structured, relatively delimited organization with networked affiliates into the primary mouthpiece of an extremist ideological current that served to inspire hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people across the Muslim world. Although only a small segment of this radicalized population will likely ever resort to terrorism, the result was an increase in the threat posed by alleged “self-starter” cells inspired by bin Ladin’s ideology, which seem at first glance to have few if any tangible organizational, operational, or logistical connections to al-Qa‘ida. However, this theory of “homegrown” or “leaderless” jihad has been overstated, since most of the successful jihadist terrorist attacks and elaborate terrorist plots in the West have thus far been linked either to “al-Qa‘ida Central” or to its official or unofficial regional affiliates. Even so, to the extent that al-Qa‘ida Central’s operational capabilities have been degraded by U.S. military actions in the Afghanistan-Pakistan region, and by the 2011 killing of bin Ladin, both al-Qa‘ida’s key regional affiliates and these homegrown groups may become more of a security concern.

Basic Ideological Tenets and Goals

The ideology of al-Qa‘ida—jihadist Salafism—is the most radical variant of contemporary Salafism, a series of diverse but interrelated ideological currents that all purport to follow the ostensibly pure Islamic doctrines and supposedly exemplary behavior of al-salaf al-salih (the “pious forefathers” of the faith)—that is, the generation of Muhammad and his companions (sahaba) and the two successive generations of early Muslims. The globally oriented “jihadist Salafists” are actively pursuing an expansionist, imperialistic, and Islamic supremacist geopolitical agenda. Their primary goal, far from being rational, pragmatic, limited, and defensive, is utopian, quasi-apocalyptic, totalitarian, and bellicose: to unite all of the world’s Muslims into a single political community (umma), restore the glory and power of the medieval caliphate (or imamate), and wage “offensive jihad” against infidels until the entire non-Islamic world is brought under the control of an Islamic regime (al-dawla al-islamiyya) or Islamic order (al-nizam al-islami) governed by a strict, puritanical interpretation of the Shari‘a.

In his public statements, bin Ladin often sought to divert attention from or disguise al-Qa‘ida’s aggressive and expansionist underlying designs by emphasizing its relatively limited short-term objectives and seemingly legitimate grievances in an effort both to rally support from the Muslim masses and to foment divisions among the infidels. Yet even in their public propaganda statements, bin Ladin and al-Zawahiri regularly juxtaposed superficially rational rhetoric with theological imperatives that can only be said to “make sense” within an Islamic cultural and historical context that has long since been superseded. Indeed, even the most restrained and proximate demands of al-Qa‘ida and other global jihadist groups—the complete withdrawal of foreign military forces from “Muslim lands,” the abandonment of all Western support for apostate Muslim regimes and Israel, the elimination of all “corrupting” Western cultural influences from the dar al-islam (“Abode of Islam”), and the end of “infidel exploitation” of Muslim resources—are in large part nonnegotiable and therefore virtually impossible to achieve, whatever their moral merits or demerits might be.

Moreover, when one considers al-Qa‘ida’s long-term objectives, one has truly entered the realm of fantasy. The minimal objective of the global jihadists is to liberate all Muslim-majority territories that are currently occupied by hostile infidel military forces, including Palestine, Iraq, Afghanistan, Chechnya, Kashmir, southern Thailand, the southern Philippines, and “eastern Turkestan.” Their intermediate long-term objective is to recover all of the territory that was once under Muslim control but was then subsequently lost to infidel powers, including Spain, Sicily and parts of southern Italy, a substantial portion of the Balkans, huge swaths of territory in Turkic Central Asia, all of northern India, and large segments of northwestern China. Their maximal long-term goal is the very same one promoted by the “rightly guided” caliphs (rashidun) and several later Umayyad, ‘Abbasid, and Ottoman rulers—to spread the word of Allah to the unbelievers (kuffar), by force if necessary, and ultimately to Islamize every corner of the globe at the expense of both the ahl al-kitab (“people of the book”—i.e., Jews and Christians in this context) and the “polytheists,” which in practice would amount to completely overturning and transforming the existing world order.

Preferred Operational Methods

Given their Manichean ideological division of the world into “righteous believers” and “evil unbelievers” and their grandiose long-term objectives, it is hardly surprising that al-Qa‘ida and affiliated global jihadist groups have from the outset favored the systematic application of the most extreme, ruthless, and brutal methods of violence, in particular an emphasis on carrying out spectacular, psychologically traumatic, and highly destructive mass casualty attacks against the “enemies of Allah.” Indeed, over the years, al-Qa‘ida’s basic operational methods for carrying out attacks have become fairly standardized: The launching of simultaneous mass casualty bombings conducted by self-styled “martyrs” that are designed to kill and maim as many people as possible, cause extensive physical damage, psychologically traumatize designated enemies, and rally or inspire supporters. These types of actions, at times carefully planned and well executed, have long constituted al-Qa‘ida Central’s “operational signature,” although there will undoubtedly be periodic tactical modifications or innovations in the future, perhaps involving the use of chemical or radiological agents. One of the group’s primary strategic objectives is to establish a secure jihadist base somewhere in the heartland of the Arab world as a platform from which to launch further terrorist attacks and territorial conquests. Another is to provoke infidel overreactions and military invasions of Muslim territories, which they hope will further serve to radicalize the Muslim masses. Hence, al-Qa‘ida will likely continue to pose a significant asymmetric terrorist threat until its leaders and operational cadres have been destroyed or otherwise neutralized.

AL-AZHAR

Al-Azhar refers to a famous university and its associated mosque in Cairo, Egypt. The prestigious university is an important intellectual and religious center for the Arab Muslim world, and it is one of the world's oldest universities.

The mosque of Al-Azhar was built from 969 to 972 CE (358–361 AH), when the Shi'a Fātimids conquered Egypt and founded Cairo. Three years after the building of the mosque, it began to take on an academic nature, featuring seminars and readings on Islamic law. The university was officially founded in 998 CE. An explicitly Islamic establishment, most of its focus was on Qur'anic study and Islamic law and jurisprudence. Other areas of study were Arabic grammar, logic, Islamic philosophy, and Islamic astronomy. Although the university originally began in line with the Isma'ili Shi'a thinking of the Fātimids, it was changed to a Sunnī establishment in the 12th century, when the Fātimids were overthrown. Sultan Saladin, the founder of the Ayyubid Dynasty, changed Al-Azhar's studies to accord with Shafi'i Sunnī Islam.

During the Mamluk period (1250–1517 CE), Al-Azhar became a shelter for many Muslim expatriate scholars from Andalusia and Central Asia. In the 14th and 15th centuries, the university thrived through its development and advancement of scientific progress. It was also a strong center for the study of mathematics, geography, and history. The university remained well-known throughout Ottoman rule and became Egypt's principal religious institution.

This flourishing scholarship was temporarily halted during the Egyptian revolution against the French occupation in 1798. Al-Azhar was at the center of the revolution's beginnings, serving as a meeting place and a political community for opponents of the occupation. But when the revolution broke out, the Grand Imam and the ulema of Al-Azhar closed the mosque and university due to their inability to carry out academic programs under those conditions. Studies were resumed 3 years later, when the French evacuated Egypt.

In 1961, the university was restructured by the Egyptian president Gamal Abdul Nasser. New secular departments were added, including medicine and engineering. A female faculty was also added for the first time, although women speakers had visited in recent years before that.

Today, Al-Azhar is considered by many to be the most prestigious school of Sunnī Islamic law, and it is one of the most well-respected universities of the Arab world. It offers training for secular professions and houses scholars of secular fields, particularly the sciences. However, it remains a primarily Islamic institution where only Muslims may study. Among its stated objectives is the propagation of Islamic religion and culture, as well as the Arabic language. For these purposes, Al-Azhar publishes a monthly magazine dealing with Islamic literature, law, history, and current news. Additionally, it is the home of a printing press for Qur'an printing. The mosque and university are headed by a Grand Imam with the title Shaykh Al-Azhar, and a committee of ulema serve there to judge questions of Islamic law and religion. The university library is also well-known, considered second only to the Dar al-Kutub al-Misriyya ("Egyptian House of Books”) library in Egypt. Al-Azhar’s prestige has attracted scholars of many Arab countries and contributed to Egypt’s place as an important center in the Middle East.

ALBANIA

Long considered Europe’s most isolated country, located next to the former Yugoslavia on the Adriatic Sea, Albania after the end of the Cold War became open to diverse cultural influences and global religious trends. With an ethnically homogeneous population of more than 3.6 million, the general estimates of religious diversity purport the population to be 70% Muslim, 20% Albanian Orthodox, and 10% Roman Catholic. These statistics, based on a pre-1944 census of questionable merit, misleadingly characterize the diversity of religious identification and adherence in what was the world’s only officially atheist country. Most Albanians retain an indifference toward religion, though many acknowledge some religious affiliation, at least as an ethnic marker if not as a lived category, but its role in people’s lives is developing dynamically.

Christianity established itself as the dominant religion at the beginning of the second century. By the end of the fourth century, the territory had come under the political authority of Byzantium and the ecclesiastical authority of Rome. This dual authority became more boldly demarcated by the 1054 schism, when Christians living in the south came under Constantinople’s control and those in the north maintained connection to the papacy. In the 14th century, Albania fell under Ottoman rule. Although the millet system allowed non-Muslims to maintain their religious traditions, taxing differentials resulted in sizable pragmatic conversions to Islam. Despite this “acceptance” of Islam, while Albania was under Ottoman rule, some men would circumvent regulations by having two names: one Christian and another Muslim.

In 1912, Albania declared independence from the Ottoman Empire. As the Ottoman Empire came to an end and Atatürk’s reforms began to be implemented in Turkey, the leaders of the Bektashi Sufi Order (Shi’a) moved their headquarters to newly independent Albania. In 1944, however, communist partisans seized control of the country and initiated 46 years of xenophobic rule. In 1967, Enver Hoxha took draconian measures to emasculate groups that threatened his control base and banned religion. Under his rule, religion was suppressed more than anywhere else in the communist world.

Religious practice was allowed again in 1990, and in 1991, the country ended its self-imposed communist seclusion. Protestant missionaries rushed to “save” the atheist population, though their successes have been modest at best. Orthodoxy, Catholicism, Sunnī (Hanafi) Islam, and Bektashism remain the most locally identifiable religious groups, though the salience of these identities is quite elastic; some claim affiliation to affirm regional and political distinctions. Although many secular elites minimize religion’s importance, preferring to emphasize ethnic cohesion over religious affinity, regionalist agendas are taking on a religious identity, and religious indifference—colloquially characterized as tolerance—is being replaced by religio-political associations.

AL-BANNA, HASAN (1906–1949)

Hasan al-Banna is most famous for helping launch the global movement of resurgent Islam in the 20th century by founding the Society of Muslim Brothers (al-Ikhwān al-Muslimūn) in Egypt in 1928. The Muslim Brotherhood began as a community-based organization for Islamic revival. Initially composed of a few close friends and followers who devoted themselves to study and worship, the Brotherhood quickly became a powerful political, social, and religious force in many parts of the Muslim and Arab worlds.

Banna, who at first taught students at a primary school by day and instructed their parents in religious matters by night, appreciated the value of education, though he never sought to join the ranks of Egypt's religious scholars. From an early age, Banna, son of the local imam, was more concerned with developing a practical and populist movement that endorsed—and enjoined—religious standards. He refused to accept what he saw as immoral Western influences on Egyptian politics and culture and declared them to be in direct conflict with his ideal of an Islamic society and its values. As an activist, Banna sought out others in the community and soon united them into the Young Men's Muslim Association (YMMA). Established in 1927, the YMMA was a reformist community under the leadership of religious authorities that aspired to return society to “true” Islam, unify Muslims throughout the world, stop the onslaught of Western culture, and ultimately reestablish the caliphate abolished by Mustafa Kemal Atatürk. The YMMA worked toward these goals through the use of strategic methods and organizational structures that he would soon incorporate into the Muslim Brotherhood.

Due to Banna's skills in communication, his charismatic authority, and keen organizational skills, the Brotherhood soon spread throughout Egypt and to neighboring countries. With his influence growing, Banna became increasingly involved in politics in the 1930s and 1940s. This political engagement and conflict culminated in December 1948 with the assassination of the prime minister by a Muslim Brother. Allegedly, members of the secret police retaliated by killing Banna 2 months later.

Throughout his life, Banna held to a conservative ideology yet remained considerably progressive in his approach to social and religious problems. His underlying concern was a belief that Western domination (in politics, ideas, and values) came as the result of the Muslim's departure from “authentic” Islam. Yet in many respects, Banna attempted to adapt Islam to contemporary demands, to open the way for both legal flexibility and renewal, and to make the Brotherhood relevant in a rapidly modernizing society.

Banna, always more of a pragmatist and popular leader than a systematic thinker, saw his primary role in the Islamic revitalization movement as that of an organizer and activist rather than that of a formulator of intellectual theories. Envisioned as an all-encompassing religious community, the Brotherhood intentionally recruited not just from the elite but also from the populace as a whole. Previously, the urgent need to renew or revive Islam in Egypt and other Ottoman territories had been largely articulated by a rather small group of educated Muslims. It is thus with Banna that the shift toward “resurgent Islam” as a truly mass movement begins.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT (356–323 BCE)

The influence of Alexander the Great on the ancient world is undeniable, as seen in his initiation of Hellenization and contact between diverse populations through imperial expansion. During Alexander's childhood and adolescence, he was taught by multiple tutors, the most notable of whom was Aristotle. Aristotle helped develop a deep respect for Greek civilization in the Macedonian Alexander. And though Alexander's conquests were principally driven by imperial glory, Alexander's desire to spread Greek culture was a major motivation as well. But this may have been an unintended side effect of imperial conquest, and the deep Greek cultural influence throughout the conquered territories needed time and influence to develop, which Alexander was unable to give because of his death at the early age of 32. However, the empires that succeeded and divided Alexander's empire were able to provide that power and time. These empires continued to support the influence of Greek thought and culture, especially the use of the Greek language, throughout their existence. From this came the development of Hellenistic Judaism; the influence of neo-Platonism in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam; the preparation of the region for Roman conquest; the diffusion of Christianity through the common Greek tongue; and the later preservation of Greek philosophy by Muslim scholars. And this influence spread even further east. For example, around the time of Alexander's expansion to the Indus River, statues of the Buddha took on a significant resemblance to those of the Greek god Apollo.

During his conquest of Egypt, Alexander was greeted as "the son of god" by the priest of Amun at Siwa, Libya. Amun was associated with the Greek god Zeus, and Alexander welcomed or demanded worship of himself as a divinity from his own people as well as those he conquered from that point on. This type of leader worship, characteristic of the Egyptian religio-political structure of the time, was significantly different from existing Greek and Macedonian norms. Still, it continued with Alexander's successors, especially Ptolemy II, and this innovation was eventually taken up by the emperors of the Roman Empire along with so many other aspects of Greek culture and religion.

Finally, Alexander's imperial expansion eventually ruined the city-state system of the Greeks through the cosmopolitan incorporation of new religio-political practices as well as other cultural (especially Persian) elements into his dress and habits. Along with this, Alexander's expansion required that, when he did not completely annihilate a community, he leave religious practices in place along with the local rulers for the sake of expediency. And all the while, he brought in native warriors for his army and built new cities. Of these new cities, the various cities of Alexandria had the double function of spreading Greek culture and religion as well as being nodes of Greek military strength. The most important of these, Alexandria, Egypt, has been a religious, cultural, commercial, and intellectual center for thousands of years.

ALGERIA

Algeria, centrally located in North Africa and at the cultural crossroads of the Mediterranean, has been affected by Christianity and Islam over the course of the past 1,500 years. The area that now constitutes Algeria had been converted to Christianity during the second century CE. One of the most important and influential thinkers in the early Christian church, St. Augustine of Hippo, was born near modern-day Annaba (Hippo Regius) in 354 CE, and the ancient city of Carthage played an important role in the development of early Christianity. Over the course of the seventh to ninth centuries, the Berber population of Algeria converted/reverted to Islam. While Ibadi and Shi'a Islam were prevalent at various points during this early period of Islamization, eventually the population became largely Sunnī Mālikī Muslims.

While religion had a long history of significance in the identity and politics of the region that came to be known as Algeria, it played a particularly important role after the French colonization (1830) and in the emergence of an independent Algerian state (1962). The (re)birth of Algerian nationalism during World War I and in the interwar period was in part due to the efforts of the Union of the Ulema, which, along with other strands of nationalist agitation, emphasized religion as a key difference between European Colons settlers and the indigenous population. During the Algerian War of Independence (1954–1962), the line between socialist nationalism and religion was blurred, and members of the Armée de Libération Nationale (ALN; “National Liberation Army”) became known as mujahideen. The power of this moral basis of struggle against French colonial oppression was apparent even for secular Marxist Algerian nationalists. During this period, nationalists regularly referred to broader conceptions of jihad and historiographies of the Crusades, all of which created a combustible context for radicalization among Algerians.

More recently, Algeria suffered from a particularly brutal civil war, ostensibly fought between a largely secular state and Islamists who challenged the political status quo. The Algerian state had been subjected to Islamist challenges almost from the time of its establishment, in the form of Al Qiyam (1964, lit. “values”), which demanded a greater role for Islam in politics. During the 1980s, a militant Islamist challenge to the secular regime, in the shape of the Algerian Islamic Armed movement (led by a former ALN fighter), though small and not very popular, was a precursor to subsequent larger and popular challenges to the one party rule of the Partie de Front de Libération Nationale (PFLN; “Party of the National Liberation Front”). Political liberalization in the late 1980s to early 1990s saw a proliferation of Algerian political parties, with one of the most popular opposition groups coming from the Front Islamique du Salut (FIS; “Islamic Front for Salvation”). In the wake of the election success of FIS in 1991, the government, after army intervention, banned the party, and this led to the Algerian civil war, during which 200,000 Algerians were killed. The civil war mostly concluded in 1999 with a declaration of amnesty by President Abdelaziz Bouteflika. The role of Islam in politics remains a highly charged issue in contemporary Algeria.

AMSTERDAM

Amsterdam, the capital of The Netherlands from the beginning of the 19th century onward, is renowned for its religious diversity and tolerance, which date back as far as the Eighty Years’ War, the Dutch revolt against Spanish and Roman Catholic rule (1568–1648). The revolt was largely a reaction to the Counter-Reformation, the persecution of the Protestant sects that had firmly established themselves in the northern lowlands, including Amsterdam, during the Reformation. In 1588, these territories united to form the Dutch Republic and managed to liberate themselves from Spanish and Roman Catholic rule.

Although the population of the Dutch Republic was primarily Calvinist, the revolt spawned a deeply felt urge for religious tolerance. As a result, Amsterdam, in particular, soon became a safe haven for religious dissidents from all over Europe, including the French Huguenots and Sephardic Jews who had fled the Iberian Peninsula and were unwelcome virtually everywhere else in Europe. Before World War II, no less than 10% of the city’s population was Jewish, but only 20% of these survived the war.

In the 1960s, Amsterdam became the center of the Dutch counterculture, and the city has retained much of the latter’s secular permissiveness (as seen in its coffee shops, its red light district, its gay scene, and its openness to leftist political activism and alternative lifestyles). The cultural changes associated with the 1960s' counterculture contributed substantially to the decline of the mainline Christian churches, but they also sparked an interest in inner spirituality. Amsterdam has remained the major hub of the Dutch holistic milieu, hosting more New Age centers than any other Dutch city. Despite the bankruptcy in 2000 of Ronald-Jan Hein's center Oibibio, an icon of Amsterdam's shift from utopian idealism and social criticism to commercialized business spirituality, neither the milieu's size and vitality nor the interest in spirituality has declined since.

The period since the 1960s has also witnessed an influx of Muslim immigrants from Turkey and particularly Morocco, which has made Islam a major player in the city's religious landscape. Christian immigrants from Southeast Asia, Latin and South America (from the former colony of Surinam), and sub-Saharan Africa have meanwhile established a wide range of so-called immigrant churches in Amsterdam. Particularly thriving are the African churches in the southeastern part of the city (the "Bijlmer"), many of them of the evangelical or Pentecostal strain.

Although strikingly secular in many respects, Amsterdam hence also boasts an immense religious and spiritual diversity. Its traditional religious and multicultural tolerance has been severely put to the test since the rise of the late populist politician Pim Fortuyn in 2002. Declining secular tolerance vis-à-vis Islam, the increased salience of (sometimes orthodox) Islamic identities, and instances of anti-Semitism and gay bashing by Islamic youngsters have culminated in the assassination of the playwright Theo van Gogh by a young Islamic militant, Mohammed Bouyeri, in 2004. In this increasingly heated climate, the city's mayor Job Cohen, Jewish like many of his predecessors, is blamed by some and admired by others for his defense of the city's age-old tradition of multicultural and religious tolerance.

ANCESTORS

In multiple religious traditions, living relatives call on ancestors to provide aid, guidance, and intercession. Ancestors are generally beneficent, domesticated, and deceased relatives or prominent community figures. They may also be seen to punish those who do not act properly toward them or their guidance. And the living show reciprocity for ancestors by honoring them through memorials, caring for the resting place of the ancestor, making prayers for and to ancestors, offering goods to ancestors that are needed in the afterlife, and holding feasts for ancestors.

An important consideration in understanding ancestors in various religious traditions is in clearly making the differentiation between ancestors and the dead. While ancestors have passed beyond this life, they are ancestors because they are considered to have passed on to a new and pleasant existence rather than to have simply died. As such, ancestors can still aid the living through visions, prayers, intercessions, and examples of how to live. Furthermore, ancestors are an aid to the living by virtue of becoming ancestors and not just ghosts or unhappy dead. In this respect, the living help themselves by helping ancestors. For instance, in Hindu death rites, the living descendants of the dead care for the deceased, considered a preta (ghost) immediately after death.

If the rites are properly observed, then the preta becomes a pitr or “father” and reaches the “world of the fathers.” In so doing, the deceased becomes a proper ancestor. If these rites are not properly observed or if the dead person does not reach the householder age, which assumes a complete life and the means for proper ritual observance (i.e., for descendants), then the deceased remains a preta and will become a malicious, wild spirit in his or her displeasure with these circumstances.

Ancestors of communities act as “guiding lights” to the community, and some members may claim to see visions and hear the voices of those ancestors. Cosmogonic myths of certain traditions refer to an ancient king or first human being as a community ancestor. Meanwhile, civil religious traditions look to “city fathers” or “founders” as community ancestors. In these cases, the ancestors are the source of the establishment of the community, and from them, the present community derives its authority and purpose.

From even humanistic perspectives, ancestors influence the living. In such a view, ancestors are those by whom the still living are given into this world. This giving over, both of life and the world, from ancestors to the living, lays heavy responsibilities and expectations on the living. But it is through the examples of ancestors that the living find the means to both persevere and excel. In this view, as in religious views, ancestors are (at least) a portion of the ground of a community’s tradition that legitimizes its existence, guiding it and its members toward proper ways of being.

ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN RELIGIONS

One of the deepest roots of global culture lies in the ancient Near East, which has had as profound an influence on Western civilization as the later cultures of Greece and Rome. Momentous themes emerged from Near Eastern literature, such as lost innocence, undying love, leaders as good shepherds, sanctified justice, and sanctified war. Such themes continue to resonate in the Western imagination.

Part of the geographical region of West Asia, the ancient Near East extends from Mesopotamia (modern Iraq) in the east to the Mediterranean coasts of Anatolia (Turkey) and the Levant (Syria, Lebanon, Israel, and Gaza) in the west. Some historians include ancient Egypt, Iran, and Afghanistan. It is from this vast region that we get core notions and stories that, some 3,000 years ago, biblical and Greek authors made their own. The Mesopotamian kernels may be traced back four, even five, millennia. There is a great variety of literature preserved in Sumerian, Akkadian, Old Babylonian, Hittite, Ugaritic, Egyptian, and other languages. Since the 19th century, scholars have studied these literatures not only for their intrinsic merits but also for their influences on Western thinking.

Perhaps the most poignant Near Eastern theme to penetrate Western imagination is that of primal innocence. Adam and Eve were not the first to lose it. Nor was the Greek Epimetheus, who unwittingly welcomed Pandora and her box of ills. The tragic prototype is Enkidu, companion to King Gilgamesh in the Mesopotamian epic named after him. A hairy subhuman born in the steppes, nursed by gazelles and happy among animals, Enkidu is seduced by a prostitute, who awakens him to his humanity. She sends him to Gilgamesh, a godlike ruler whose arrogance knows no bounds and whom Enkidu was created to humble. Together, Enkidu and Gilgamesh find love and adventure. Eventually, Enkidu is stricken by the gods, realizes his imminent death, and curses the prostitute who tempted and initiated him. The Sun God scolds him for this curse because the joys that Enkidu has gained are profound. Enkidu reverses his curse to a blessing and then dies, leaving Gilgamesh in despair. As do the biblical and Greek stories, this epic ponders the virtues of ignorant bliss.

This depiction of wildness probably reverberates from a more ancient tale of the grain goddess Ashnan. A Sumerian hymn to her refers to a distant time before people knew clothing and the eating of bread. Instead, they grazed like sheep and drank water from ditches. Unlike the pessimistic biblical and Greek tales, Ashnan's story makes civilization, particularly agriculture, a blessing because it helps define human life and because grain is a gift for both gods and humans.

Undying love is another theme traded across written and bardic traditions. Not only Gilgamesh and Enkidu but also the Homeric Achilles and Patroklos, the Hittite Tudhaliya IV and Kurunta, and the biblical David and Jonathan profess a life-long commitment to each other. In all these pairs, one member is adopted as the other's brother, and the two pledge enduring loyalty, which is sealed by documents or by ritualized acts. All of these friendships but for the Hittite one are known to end in tragedy. An echo of this theme may be heard in the biblical story of Ruth and Naomi, wherein Ruth pledges undying love to her mother-in-law, Naomi, and risks everything to be with her: "Where you die, I will die." In Ruth's case, adversities are overcome, and the two live happily thereafter.

Erotic love was also extolled by ancient Near Eastern troubadours 3,000 to 4,000 years ago. Being "faint with love" is described at length in the biblical Song of Songs and Egyptian love poetry, while similar longings are attested in Mesopotamian poetry associated with sacred marriage rites. Fertility imagery and titles of brother and sister adopted by friends infuse these lyrical traditions. Whatever its historical motivations, the Song of Songs resonates today as expressing the love of God for Israel and of Christ for His Church.

In the sphere of domestic diplomacy, ancient Near Eastern rulers portrayed themselves as wise shepherds concerned with the welfare of widows and orphans. Ur-Nammu (24th century BCE, Mesopotamia) boasted that he did not abandon orphans to the wealthy, widows to the powerful, or the poor to the rich. By the power of the gods, he established freedom and justice for the Akkadians and foreigners in the lands of Sumer and Akkad. The Hittite king Hattusilis I (17th century BCE, Anatolia), guided by the gods, claims to have taken the enemy's slave girls from the mills and male slaves from the sickles and to have freed them from taxes and the corvée. His successor, Mursilis I, is instructed to give bread to the hungry, oil to the weary, and clothing to the naked. The biblical king David, in the Books of Chronicles, is said to have administered justice and equity to his people, and King Solomon asked God not for wealth but for wisdom, which he received: "He would speak of trees, from the cedar that is in the Lebanon to the hyssop that grows in the wall; he would speak of animals, and birds, and reptiles, and fish." His wisdom surpassed that "of all the people of the east, and all the wisdom in Egypt" (1 Kings 4).

Deities in the ancient Near East support royal piety and justice. While not all law codes claim religious sanction (the Hittite one does not), virtually all rulers claim it, and nearly all claim to administer justice on behalf of the gods. In accord with Sun God Utu, judge of heaven and earth, the Mesopotamian ruler Lipit-Ishtar (20th century BCE) made the lands of Sumer and Akkad hold fair judicial procedure. In accord with the utterance of God Enlil, he eradicated enmity and violence. Chosen as king by God Enlil, the Mesopotamian Hammurabi (18th century BCE) was instructed by God Marduk to establish justice and appropriate behavior for the people of the land. The Hittite king Hattusilis III (13th century BCE) claimed the favor of Goddess Ishtar from boyhood. She made him her chosen one and promised never to abandon him to an evil god or to an evil judgment. The biblical king David too enjoys a chosen status. He is the anointed king and a begotten son of God, who instructs kings to be wise and to serve the Lord with fear (Psalm 2). The queen of Sheba says of his son Solomon, "Because the Lord loved Israel forever, he has made you king to execute justice and righteousness" (1 Kings 10).

Conversely, because of their lack of righteousness and piety, unfaithful leaders are punished by gods, and so are their people. The error is conceived commonly as the betrayal of an oath. It invites an array of punishments—banishment and humiliation in the biblical prophetic books, starvation and cannibalism in Assyrian oaths, and familial annihilation and national hunger and discord and fever in Hittite treaties.

Divine interest in justice entails divine support in war. Just as biblical songs celebrate Yahweh's saving terror in battle (i.e., "the earth shook, the heavens poured, . . . the mountains quaked before the LORD" [Judges 5]), Hittite and Assyrian kings report divine inspiration, particularly when gods lead armies by "going in front." The Hittite king Mursilis reported that "the sun goddess of Arinna my lady, god Tessup the mighty, my lord, the goddess Mezzulas, and all the gods ran in front of me” when he conquered the district of Arzawa. The Assyrian king Esarhaddon reports that Goddess Ishtar flayed his foes and gave them to him: “I, Ishtar of Arbela, before thee, behind thee, I will go; fear not.” Ishtar of Arbela sent a dream to the armies of the Assyrian king Assurbanipal on his eighth campaign against Elam: “I will go before Assurbanipal, the king whom my hands have formed. My armies put their trust in that dream, and crossed the Idide in safety.” The biblical god goes in front: “The Lord your God who goes at your head will fight for you and he will do again what you saw him do for you in Egypt and in the wilderness” (Deuteronomy 1:30), as do many Homeric gods (i.e., Iliad 5:590–595, 14:384–387, 15:306–311). The notion of divine support in battle continues to resonate in religious rationalizations of conflict in the 20th and 21st centuries (see the entry “Cosmic War and Cosmic Conflict”).

In short, ancient Near Eastern civilizations have bequeathed to us many notions that continue to be felt in Western imagination. Any serious student of history can grasp the idea of lost innocence. We are still drawn to stories of undying love, which, although surely not invented in the ancient Near East, find some of their earliest literary expressions there. We are shocked when our leaders fail to behave as good shepherds, although we rarely reflect on the origins of the motif. While fewer of us today expect our gods literally to support the commitments of nation-states, the reflex is telltale in anthems and spirituals. Last, the notion of holy war is thriving in contemporary religious terrorism, although some would deny the notion’s authenticity. However universal these themes are, their earliest Western attestations are found in the literature of the ancient Near East.

ANDORRA

The Principality of Andorra, a small, landlocked country located in the Pyrenees Mountains between France and Spain, is first mentioned in the act of consecration of the Cathedral of Urgell, dated 839. With the rise of feudalism in western Europe, Andorra became a domain of the county of Urgell in 843. The proximity to the Archbishopric of Urgell, a center of Christianity from as early as 527, was key to this religion being officially implanted in Andorra by the end of the 9th century, although this process did not completely eliminate certain pre-Christian beliefs and attitudes. The Inquisition finally eliminated these practices, which originated from a non-Christian belief in the supranatural. In the 10th and 11th centuries, the bishops of Urgell progressively increased their control. Beginning in the 12th century, Andorra became a domain of the diocese. Between the 11th and 13th centuries, the count and the Church were the guarantors of public order and defense of the community. At the same time, the Church, the center of intellectual activity, ideologically justified the political power and the structure of Andorran medieval society. In the 13th century, the Pariatages established the indivisible shared domain between the Bishop of Urgell and the Count of Foix.

The “feudal tradition” was put into question in 1866 with the Nova Reforma. Between 1882 and 1887, three girls’ schools run by nuns of the Order of the Sacred Family were created in Andorra. Until that time, the Consells Comunalis were responsible for education, although in the majority of cases the vicars were entrusted with schools. In 1899, the Consell General issued a decree in which all parishes of the country were obliged to have a male and a female schoolteacher. Under this decree, the French co-princes attempted to increase the presence of French culture and language by opening five secular French schools between 1900 and 1913. This was an attempt to counter the increasing weight of the episcopal co-princes. In 1931 and 1935, two new Catholic schools opened in Andorra.

Beginning in the 1960s, Andorra underwent a modernization process. The constitution of 1993 includes the separation of church and state and freedom of religion and guarantees the Roman Catholic Church “the free and public practice of its activities and the continuation of its special collaboration with the State, in accord with Andorran tradition” (Constitució d’Andorra [“Constitution of Andorra”], Article 11:3). In 2008, the Vatican and the Andorran government signed an agreement that guarantees the ability of the Catholic Church to carry out its mission and establishes that cultural assets destined for worship are the charge of the state. It is also stated that nonreligious centers shall teach religion outside school hours and only to students who so desire. It also regulates the economic and tax regimen of nonlucrative activities and the acquisition of objects designed for worship. At present, there are two congregational centers in addition to the public schools in Andorra.

Today, Catholicism (followed by 80%–95% of the population of Andorra) has a great influence on the social and cultural life. September 8, feast of the Virgen of Meritxell, and December 25, Christmas, are official holidays. Other Christian groups include the Anglican Church, Jehovah’s Witnesses, the Reunification Church, the New Apostolic Church, and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. People of other faiths live in Andorra: Judaism (estimated at 100) and Hinduism and Islam (primarily made up of 2,000 North African immigrants). The authorities reportedly expressed concern that some methods used by religious organizations might affect public health, safety, morals, or order. In spite of negotiations for some years between the Muslim community and the government, no mosque has been built. The Islamic Cultural Center has provided approximately 50 students with Arabic lessons. The government and the Moroccan community have not yet agreed on a system to allow children to receive Arabic classes in school outside the regular school day. The government is willing to offer Arabic classes, but the Muslim community has not been able to find a suitable teacher.

ANGLICANS

This entry defines both Anglican and Anglicanism and continues with a brief account of the latter as a distinctive theology within Christianity. It then describes the nature and development of the Church of England, before turning to the worldwide Anglican Communion.

The word Anglican originates in the expression ecclesia anglicana, a medieval Latin phrase meaning “the English Church.” Anglicans are adherents of Anglicanism (a much later term), which refers to a distinctive tradition within the Christian church. The mother church of Anglicanism is the Church of England; worldwide, Anglicans are those in communion with the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Anglicanism, as expressed in the Church of England and the Anglican Communion, is both “catholic” and “reformed”—meaning that it combines continuity with the Catholic tradition (the creeds and a distinctive ecclesiological structure and aspects of liturgical practice) with Protestant understandings of theology and ministry. From the 18th century onward, three distinctive currents can be discerned both within the Church of England and elsewhere. These are (1) the evangelical tradition, which emphasizes the authority of Scripture and justification by faith and personal conversion; (2) the Catholic tradition, which stresses continuity with the medieval (Catholic) church and thus the apostolic succession; and (3) the liberal tradition, which underlines the importance of reason in theological exploration. These are currents that shift and adapt over time, combining in many different ways within both individuals and communities. More recently, a fourth influence has become important. The charismatic movement emphasizes the work of the Holy Spirit—its roots lie in evangelicalism, but it has undoubtedly influenced people and groups from different traditions (Anglican and other).

The beginnings of the English Church go back to the time of the Roman Empire, when elements of Christianity took root in the Roman province of Britain. A second step occurred at the end of the sixth century, when Saint Augustine—a Benedictine monk—was sent by Pope Gregory the Great to Britain with the aim of converting King Æthelberht to Christianity. The mission was successful: In 597, Augustine became the first Archbishop of Canterbury (Æthelberht's principal town) and established the See of Canterbury. For these reasons, Augustine is considered the "Apostle to the English" and the founder of the English Church. It is important to note, however, that these efforts combined both with the remnants of the old Roman and British church traditions and with a third component—a distinctive Celtic tradition, which came from the extremities of Britain and was associated with saints such as Aidan and Cuthbert. A second archbishopric was established in York in a church that, until the Reformation, was firmly part of the Western tradition and accepted the authority of the pope.

The changes that took place at the time of the Reformation are necessarily complex in the sense that the religious or theological developments that occurred at this time are inseparable from the political upheavals that were also taking place. All over Europe, both national and local leaders were looking for ways to assert their independence, taking advantage of the latest theological currents in order to reject supranational authority (whether secular or religious) and to legitimate new alignments. The notion of cuius regio, eius religio (meaning "whose realm, his religion") became paramount as the old order, in the form of a unified Christendom, began to fall apart.

In England, the catalyst is clear: Henry VIII asked the pope to annul his marriage to Catharine of Aragon in order that he might marry Anne Boleyn. The pope refused, leading Henry to "break with Rome," a gesture that became a defining moment in English history. This break not only repudiated the authority of the pope but also established the monarch as the effective head of the Church of England, which became exactly what its name implies. The pope retaliated, excommunicating Henry in 1538. That said, Henry himself displayed a preference for Catholic ways of doing things, meaning that distinctively Protestant changes did not occur until the reign of Edward VI. Under Edward, new patterns of worship were set out in the Book of Common Prayer (1549 and 1552). The new liturgies—the work of Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury—were definitive for the Church of England; they combined Protestant principles with older forms of worship.

The twists and turns of the subsequent decades are many. Under Mary Tudor, the Church of England once again submitted to papal authority. This was rejected once and for all when Elizabeth I came to the throne in 1558. It is at this point, moreover, that the distinctive identity of the Church of England begins to emerge in the form of a via media—that is, a church that steers a middle course between the Catholic tradition, on the one hand, and the more rigorous understandings of the Reformation, on the other. Its essence was captured in Richard Hooker's Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (1594–1597), which argued that reason and tradition are both important when interpreting the scriptures. Specifically, Hooker sought to defend the Church of England against its Puritan critics, who wanted to make the Church of England more like the reformed churches of Geneva or Scotland.

The Church of England continued to be buffeted by the wider currents of English history—notably the civil war (1642–1651), the Commonwealth (1649–1660), and the restoration of the monarchy (1660). In 1689, however, the Bill of Rights determined the constitutional position of the present church (i.e., its established status), and it was in this church that the various theological currents listed above were able to develop. Establishment as such gave to the Church of England a mixture of rights and responsibilities, which, by and large, remain today. Currently, it is an institution with considerable privilege but little power, obliged to take its place alongside communities of many different faiths and those with none. Like most churches in Europe, its position has been considerably eroded by the forces of secularization.

A reduced Church of England at home is, however, the mother church of an expanding Anglican Communion—that is, an international association of Anglican churches. The nature of this entity is important. Unlike its Catholic equivalent, there is no single “Anglican Church” with universal authority. Rather, each national or regional church has its own autonomy, but at the same time, it is in full communion with the Church of England. The notion of full communion implies that there is agreement on essential doctrines and that all Anglicans can participate fully in the sacramental life of each national church.

To achieve these goals, there are four “instruments of communion”: (1) the Archbishop of Canterbury himself, who functions as the spiritual head of the Communion; (2) the Lambeth Conferences (a forum for the bishops of the Communion that takes place every 10 years); (3) the Anglican Consultative Council (the only body to maintain a permanent secretariat); and (4) the Primates’ Meeting (the most recent manifestation of consultation and deliberation). With approximately 77 million members, the Anglican Communion is the third largest communion in the world, after the Catholic Church and the Orthodox churches. Unsurprisingly, its geographical structure mirrors the shape of the former British Empire; Anglican expansion (often in the form of mission work) developed alongside economic and military power—sometimes colluding with it and sometimes resisting its more destructive features.

The present situation is somewhat paradoxical. A Church of England that is somewhat diminished at home constitutes the hub of a Communion in which the church is growing rapidly. The situation can perhaps be described as follows: historic, financial, and theological power is still located in the Global North (in England and also in the United States). Demographic power, however, lies in the Global South. Expanding congregations, moreover, are able to challenge the older churches on issues of doctrine, discipline, worship, and ethics. A particularly intractable example can be found in the heated debates concerning the role of homosexuals, notably in the North American churches. These find expression in the blessing of same-sex unions and in the ordination and consecration of individuals in same-sex relationships. Many of the more conservative provinces of the Communion (particularly in Africa and Asia), however, object both to these practices and to the lack of consultation before they were allowed to happen. These differences of opinion remain largely unresolved. One reason for them lies in the nature of the Anglican Communion, in which provincial autonomy is institutionalized. Another can be found in the essence of Anglicanism as such, given the very different elements that are present in its theology (see above).

ANGOLA

The Republic of Angola is a country in south-central Africa bordered by the Democratic Republic of the Congo in the north, Namibia in the south, Zambia in the east, and the Atlantic Ocean in the west. As a Portuguese colony from the 16th century to 1975, Angola was a fruitful destination for Roman Catholic and Protestant missionaries and is today an overwhelmingly Christian country. However, at the same time when Angola received Western Christianity, it also sent its own religious influences across the Atlantic via the indigenous religions practiced by slaves and the African Christianity practiced by emigrants.

Christianity first took root in Angola with Portuguese Roman Catholic missionaries in the late 15th century. The first Protestant missionaries, Baptists from Britain, arrived much later, in 1878. All missionaries were subject to the authority of Portugal, so that in addition to proselytizing they also adhered to colonial priorities. The colonial-era Portuguese Empire also included Brazil, to which more than 3 million African slaves were exported from Angola to work on sugarcane plantations. Although Brazil is the largest Roman Catholic country in the world today, the influence of religions brought to Brazil by African slaves is still seen today in practices such as Candomblé and umbanda.

Today, although it is clear that Christianity is the dominant religious entity, due to a civil war that lasted from 1975 to 2002 and the ongoing instability since then, reliable statistics about the exact religious makeup of the country are difficult to obtain. The number of practicing Roman Catholics has been estimated at anywhere from 55% to 70% of the population, and Protestants are estimated to constitute 10% to 25% of the population. Many Protestant missionaries who came to Angola were very cognizant of adapting Christianity to the local culture. Thus, they translated the Bible into local Bantu languages, integrated Christianity into existing community structures and discourses, and provided medical care and other essential services to the community. Indigenous religious practices were greatly reduced, and today, exclusive practitioners of indigenous religion are mainly in the rural areas, although some estimates cast up to 47% of the population as having indigenous beliefs. However, there is heavy social pressure in the urban areas against many of the traditional practices, especially those involving animal sacrifice and witchcraft.

In addition to the missionary churches, home-grown African Christian churches are also a part of the religious landscape of the country. One of the largest religious movements in Angola is the Tokoist Church, founded in 1949 by Simão Gonçalves Toko. Some estimates place it just behind the Catholic Church in size, with more than 1 million members. Since the first overseas congregation in Portugal in 1992, the Angolan diaspora has continued to expand the church to join the growing presence of African Christianity in the major cities of Europe and North America.

In recent years, non-Christian religions have made inroads into Angola through immigration. Islam is practiced in the country by an estimated 80,000 to 90,000 adherents, mostly composed of West African and Lebanese migrants. Although small in number, the growing presence of Muslims in the country has caused some public concern about the importation of non-Angolan cultural values and the possibility of terrorism.

ANGUILLA

One of the smallest inhabited Caribbean islands, Anguilla's populace is heavily Christian, but the island is an important location for other traditions as well. The areas known as Big Springs and Fountain Cavern seem to have been large ceremonial spaces for the early Anguillans, though the exact nature of the ceremonies practiced remains unknown. A British overseas territory since 1980, its inhabitants are largely of mixed Welsh, Irish, and British descent, along with a large West African body descended mostly from victims of the slave trade. A 2001 survey reported Anguillans to be 40% Anglican, 33% Methodist, 7% Seventh-Day Adventist, 5% Baptist, and 3% Roman Catholic. The remaining 12% of the population represent religions such as Obeah, a syncretic religion based on West African religious practices with Catholic trappings, as well as Rastafarianism. Anguilla is the birthplace of Robert Athlyi Rogers, founder of the religion known as the Afro-Athlican Constructive Gaathly and author of the Holy Piby, an important text for the Rastafari movement.

The earliest evidence of a settlement on Anguilla has been dated as early as 1300 BCE—a tribe of Awaraks, whose society stretched to around 600 CE. The first English colonists arrived in 1650 from neighboring St. Kitts, looking to extend their tobacco and corn crop. The poor crop yields of Anguilla and famine in the 17th century did not halt attempts to create a plantation-style economy that included the importation of slaves mainly from West Africa in the 18th century. The failure of that economy, followed by the outlawing of slavery and the exodus of plantation owners back to England, resulted in the current demographics, and the religious institutions that played a role in the short history of colonization are still represented. In recent years, Christian denominations not linked to British colonization have been on the rise, especially Pentecostalism and the Church of God.

Religion and the state have developed a balanced relationship in Anguilla during the 21st century, but that balance has been contested in its development. The island's first Carnivale, celebrated in 1961, for instance, was opposed by the local churches, resulting in the banning of the Carnivale for several years following. Its reinstatement likewise was owed to the churches, especially the Anglican Church, which held its bazaar on Emancipation Day, the 1st Monday in August. In 1974, the Carnivale was attached to the bazaar with great success, and in subsequent years, it outgrew the Anglican reach, resulting in the church promptly protesting against its "heathenistic" character. The Carnivale's success was accompanied by its direction under the Anguilla Cultural and Social Society, and the first independent Carnivale outside the bounds of the Anglican Church brought the most people to the island ever. It has since become a celebrated part of Anguillan life, and today it enjoys support from all denominations on the island.

ANIMALS

Animals have historically played an important and enduring role in the world's religious traditions, from shamanism, through classical cultural expressions, up to the current debates on animal rights.

One of the earliest expressions of religiosity can be found in shamanic traditions. In many tribal cultures, a specific animal may become sacred to an individual or group. Known as totems, these animals will not be eaten and are said to generate the power of protection. The shaman, a traditional healer, often draws inspiration from animals, imitating special skills and powers associated with the coyote or the wolf or the bear. Shamanic rituals in some cases may involve the donning of animal skins and performing dances in imitation of animals. These practices can still be observed among the tribal peoples of Siberia and the Americas.

The Hebrew scriptures include extensive descriptions of how animals should be treated. The Book of Genesis states that God created fish and fowl on the fourth day and mammals on the fifth day, followed by humans on the sixth. Though God gave humans dominion over animals, animals must be treated with care and kindness. Noah preserved numerous species of animals during the Great Flood; the protection of humans and animals constituted God's first promise or covenant. The law books of Leviticus, Deuteronomy, and Numbers include many passages that deal with the treatment of animals, specifying that an animal threshing grain must not be muzzled, that only unblemished animals may be used as ritual offerings, and that animals must not be treated cruelly. These laws form the basis for kosher observances and remain important within contemporary Judaism.

For Christians, animals provide vivid imagery in the story of the birth of Jesus, in his parables, and also in the Book of Revelation. Jesus was laid in a manger surrounded by animals. He was compared with the sacrificial lamb and heralded as the great shepherd. The lion, ox, griffin, and eagle protect the throne of God in the last book of the Christian Bible. Many Christian religious orders, including the Camaldolese, the Cistercian Trappists, and the Carthusians, practice vegetarianism, as do some Protestant denominations, such as the Seventh-Day Adventists.

In Islam, animals stand in a special relationship with God. Many passages of the Qur'an extol the ability of animals to worship God. One of the favorite images to describe the glory of God can be found in praise of the honeybee, which creates great beauty and sweetness through its labors. Like the Jews, Muslims follow a strict code that governs the slaughter of animals, designed to minimize suffering and guarantee cleanliness. For the Sufi mystics, animals provide examples of how best to love God.

Animal Themes in Indic Religious Traditions

Animals are a major theme in Indic religious traditions. India has nurtured numerous religious traditions, including forms of Hinduism that include Vaishnavism, Shaivism, and Advaita Vedanta. India has also produced Buddhism, Jainism, locally flavored varieties of Islam, and Sikhism. Yoga postures, often in imitation of animals, emerged as a distinct expression of religious devotional practice in several of these traditions over a course of many hundreds of years in India. Early images from the Indus Valley cities of Mohenjadarro and Harappa (ca. 3000 BCE) depict humans surrounded by animals, both wild and domestic. Terracotta sculptures show humans imitating the countenance of animals, most notably the tiger. The earliest image of what might be deemed a proto-Yogi shows a cross-legged figure sitting on an animal skin, adorned with a headdress that includes horns from a buffalo or antelope.

Following the decline of the Indus Valley cities around 1500 BCE, a body of literature known as the Vedas was composed. The Vedas extol the cow in dozens of hymns, likening the beneficence of the cow to the dawn, to speech, to the rain clouds, and to creation itself. The Upanishads introduce the idea of reincarnation, stating that one can be reborn as a worm, a moth, a fish, a bird, a lion, a tiger, or a person.

In Hinduism, animals were not only past incarnations and beloved companions but also living deities, including the eagle Garuda, the monkey Hanuman, and the elephant-headed Ganesh. Each anthropomorphic deity has a well-known companion animal, including Ganesh's rat, Durga's lion, Sarasvati's peacock, and Siva's bull. In the Jaina tradition, each great teacher has an associated animal. Rsabha's companion is the bull; Ajita is marked by an elephant; Sambhava, a horse; Abhinanda, an ape; and Sumati, a partridge. The two historical Tirthankaras, Parsvanatha (ca. 800 BCE) and Mahavira (ca. 500 BCE), are signified by a snake and a lion, respectively.

The great religious teachers of classical India included animals in various ways in their narrations and iconic depictions. The Jina, also known as Mahavira (ca. 500 BCE), taught a doctrine of non-violence (ahimsa) toward animals as a central tenet of the Jaina faith. He was described in the Kalpa Sutra as containing animal-like qualities, resembling the armor of a tortoise, the solitary nature of a rhinoceros horn, the freedom of a bird, and the strength and energy of an elephant, a bull, and a lion. According to Jainism, animals have moral agency that determines their rebirth. The Jaina taxonomy of life-forms places them in a gradated order, starting with those beings that possess only the sense of touch. These include earth, water, fire, and air bodies, microorganisms, and plants. The next higher order introduces the sense of taste: worms, leeches, oysters, and snails occupy this domain. Third-order life-forms add the sense of smell, including most insects and spiders. Fourth-level beings, in addition to being able to touch, taste, and smell, also can see; these include butterflies, flies, and bees. The fifth level, which includes hearing, includes birds, reptiles, mammals, and humans.

The Buddha (ca. 500 BCE.) told many stories of his past births in a collection of narratives known as the Jataka Tales. These stories include references to more than 70 different types of animals. The Buddha took form as a monkey, an elephant, a jackal, a lion, a crow, a deer, a bird, and a fish. The Buddha, when he lived as a wealthy prince, had a close relationship with many animals, most notably his white stallion Kanthaka.

In the medieval period of Indic religious traditions, detailed Yoga manuals were composed that provide instruction on how to mimic the stance and mood of specific animals. Many postures (asana) carry the names of animals. The Hatha Yoga Pradipika, written by Svatmarama in the 15th century, lists several poses named for animals, including the Crow, the Cow's Head, the Tortoise, the Rooster, the Peacock, and the Lion. Later Yoga manuals such as the Gheranda Samhita include several additional poses named for animals, including the Serpent, the Rabbit, the Cobra, the Locust, the Eagle, the Frog, and the Scorpion.

Animal sacrifice, which was practiced extensively during the Vedic period, still persists in small pockets, particularly in Nepal and eastern India. Sanctified particularly in the ancient horse sacrifice, such rituals make magical correlations between the parts of the animal, the human body, and the cosmos. The Brhadaranyaka Upanishad correlates the body parts of the sacrificed horse to features of the cosmos, saying that the sun is his eye, the wind is his breath, the sky is his back, and so forth. Years ago, the horse sacrifice was replaced with the sacrifice of smaller animals, particularly goats, and in most places, such sacrifices are strictly forbidden in India.

Buddhists, from the onset, have decried and condemned the practice of animal sacrifice, along with the Jainas; this helped convince many Hindu rulers to abandon this practice. In fact, many Buddhists in China, Korea, and Japan participate in an alternate ceremony of releasing animals. However, rather like the stranded bunnies and newly hatched chicks that get abandoned after Easter, many of these "released" animals were bred specifically for this purpose and are often recaptured to be sold yet again to another client with pious intentions.

India maintains an extensive network of religious organizations that advocate animal welfare, including shelters for unwell and elderly cattle. Thousands of Jaina Pinjrapoles ("animal shelters") give shelter, food, and medical care to countless birds and animals each year. The most famous animal activism movement in India, the Bishnoi, was founded by Jambhesvara (1451–1536) in Rajasthan in 1485 for the protection of humans, animals, and plants. In modern times, Bishnoi has established the All India Jeev Raksha Bishnoi Sabha, a wildlife protection organization, and the Community for Wildlife and Rural Development Society.

Humans maintain a remarkable intimacy with animals on the Indian subcontinent. Cows, water buffalo, goats, camels, and elephants ply the same roadways with humans. They continue to provide labor that in the developed world has been replaced with machinery. In their honor, animal celebrations are held each year, such as Pongal, when animals are given a special day of rest and decorated with brightly colored dots and patterns. No place in the world can claim a more pervasive and diverse vegetarian cuisine.

Chinese religions include animals as objects of worship and as spirit mediums; as in India, here also animals have been sacrificed. The movements of Daoist meditation and Tai Chi Chuan include imitations of animals. Confucius advised humane treatment of animals. Both Buddhist and neo-Confucian texts echoed this concern.

Western Philosophy, Law, and Animals

Aristotle displayed a keen interest in understanding the differences between various animal species. His cataloging of animals (De Anima) provided the foundation for the study of zoology. René Descartes regarded animals to be no more than unfeeling machines. Charles Darwin's observations of animals resulted in the development of the theory of evolution. The contemporary ethicist Peter Singer articulated a new movement known as animal liberation that seeks to redefine human-animal relations and helped establish the Great Ape Project for the study and protection of those animals that most closely resemble humans.

The field of animal ethology has demonstrated that animals have a rich and varied mental and emotional life. Many animals are capable of empathy, and some have developed an extensive working vocabulary, including chimpanzees that use sign language and parrots that use words purposefully. Philosophers have helped craft laws to protect animals from undue cruelty, most notably Bernard Rollin, who coauthored U.S. federal legislation in 1985 on the welfare of laboratory animals. The U.S. Endangered Species Act of 1973 took the stand that animals threatened with extinction must be protected. This resulted in the prohibition of many harmful pesticides and brought the bald eagle back from the brink of disappearance. The biologist E. O. Wilson has used the term biophilia to indicate the need for humans to be more sensitive to the complexity of nature and animals, indicating that a spiritual connection between animals and humans has gained wide acceptance.

ANTI-AMERICANISM

Anti-Americanism is a set of opinions, attitudes, and behaviors expressing criticism or hostility toward the United States. It refers to American culture, values, society, economy, and politics and is expressed in various ways—from mild distrust to actual terrorist attacks. Anti-Americanism emerged at the outset of European settlement in America and has been present ever since, evolving from cultural criticism through the phase of fear of American economic and political hegemony to the global era, in which the previous objections coexist with those resulting from international value conflicts. Moreover, since globalization is often identified with Americanization, anti-American sentiment has gained strength and visibility with the rise of the antiglobalization movement. Therefore, it is an important and influential phenomenon in the contemporary world.

Anti-Americanism as a coherent collection of negative ideas and prejudices appeared in the 18th century. In this period, critical views were predominantly culturally oriented and based on the belief in American inferiority to Europe. Antipathy toward America was preserved and spread by European writers in a number of critical commentaries. America was accused of lack of taste and civility, and Americans were portrayed as backward and uncouth. In the late 18th century, the “degeneracy theory” was formed. It assumed that the American land was hostile to both humankind and animals. Defenders of this theory claimed that unfavorable climate, humidity, tornados, earthquakes, and other adverse natural phenomena unknown in Europe made people and animals physically weaker. As a consequence, they maintained, it was impossible to create an advanced civilization on the American continent. Several decades later, another cultural objection was raised. It aimed at American materialism and industrialism, which were seen as in opposition to European sensibilities and refinement.

In the 19th century, the natural environment was replaced by national character as the explanation for American inferiority. European intellectuals stated that the democratic experiment in America was a failure. According to them, renouncement of monarchy, aristocracy, an official religion, and a rigid class system led to the degradation of society and culture. The United States was considered to be a threat to Europe as it could serve as a bad example to European states. This fear was animated greatly by memories of the French Revolution and the terror brought by an attempt to create a state based on abstract principles.

The next stage of anti-Americanism was of a largely political nature. After the American Civil War, uneasiness about American influence on the rest of the world increased, especially after the American victory over Spain in 1898 and later after both world wars. The United States proved to be a global superpower. During the Cold War, anti-Americanism was propagated mainly in communist environments; nevertheless, events such as the Korean War and the Vietnam War spread concern about American imperial ambitions and the possibility of unjustified use of its power across the world. This concern grew after the collapse of the Soviet Union, as the United States became a hegemon in world politics, having no serious rival until a war between Western civilization and the Islamic world was declared after the September 11 terrorist attack. This event initiated a new phase of anti-Americanism that comprises a mixture of old arguments and new ones emerging on the wave of globalization and modernization.

Anti-Americanism takes a new shape in the era of globalization. Communicational mechanisms functioning in the contemporary world disseminate ideas instantly, which favors both American values and criticism toward them. Furthermore, globalization is frequently identified with Americanization; thus, the antiglobalization movement is largely anti-American at the same time. Both ideologies, antiglobalism and anti-Americanism, are very complex, and they embrace various dimensions—from cultural, to economical, to political. Cultural criticism is premised on a reluctance to accept the export of American culture to countries around the world and on fear of cultural invasion. The impression of invasion refers both to American popular culture (e.g., television, cinema, music, commercial brands such as Coca-Cola and McDonald's) and elements of American sociocultural reality (e.g., women's rights, sexual permissiveness, consumerism). Cultural anti-Americanism is tightly connected with international value conflict, which has escalated in recent decades. It is founded to a great extent on religious factors and integrates various antinomies, depending on the point of reference. European secular states feel uneasy about American religiosity, and, on the other hand, Islamic fundamentalists accuse Americans of godlessness and vulgarity. Also common is anxiety that modernization and Westernization processes, embodied by the United States, would alter the local cultures and identities of traditional populations.

Contemporary anti-Americanism is based on a number of economic charges. The United States is seen as the nucleus of the alleged ills of globalization, therefore the globalization backlash converges on that country. Americanization is associated with the expansion of capitalism, which causes economic inequalities, impoverishment of numerous sectors of the population, and their displacement from local habitats. Critics claim that American economic development comes at the expense of less affluent countries and that Americans use the International Monetary Fund and World Bank to advance their interests. Distrust of the American economy is aroused also by American multinational corporations located around the world, which influence local markets significantly and which to many people incarnate the negative aspects of capitalism.

Anti-Americanism is by and large focused on American foreign policy. The international community criticizes the United States for refusing to join the International Criminal Court and for lack of support for the Kyoto Protocol on climate change. A serious issue that continues to generate protest is the presence of American bases and nuclear weapons in most world regions, from western Europe to the Philippines, Japan, and South Korea. American political hegemony is resented or feared by various countries for the United States has influenced most regions of the world since the end of the World War II. In the case of China, dislike for the United States caused by its support for Taiwan superimposes on the memories of the period of Western imperialism and on apprehension of the global spread of democratic ideas. In Latin America, antipathy toward the United States dates back to the American-Mexican War between 1846 and 1848, which deprived Mexico of nearly half of its territory in favor of its northern neighbor. In the 20th century, American involvement in Latin American affairs (i.e., Guatemala, 1954; Cuba, 1961; Dominican Republic, 1965; Chile, 1973; and El Salvador, 1980–1992) and its support for local dictators (Augusto Pinochet, Alfredo Stroessner, Anastasio Somoza) strengthened the anti-American sentiment. Another backbone of anti-Americanism is the Islamic states. Even though Islamic anti-Americanism is considered to be initiated by the culturally and socially oriented critical writings of Sayyid Qutb in the middle of the past century, contemporary leaders in the Middle East lay mainly political charges on the United States. Osama bin Laden (d. 2011), the leader of the Jihadist organization al Qaeda, issued two fatwas against the United States (in 1996 and 1998). He condemned America for occupying Islamic holy places and for its alliance with the Jews in the Jewish-Islamic conflict. Islamic anti-Americanism led to the creation of anti-American terrorism, September 11 being its most dramatic expression. Hostility toward the United States among the Arabic population reached its climax in 2003, when the American president George W. Bush started a war with Iraq. Western countries also opposed this move, considering it to be unilateral, which increased indexes of anti-American feelings in opinion polls in Europe and other regions.

Politically grounded anti-Americanism has been consolidated by other acts of American foreign policy that were considered controversial (e.g., the role of the United States in the Balkan wars). Through global interconnectedness and means of mass communication in the contemporary world, local conflicts become international issues. Foreign actions are no longer aimed at one particular country but affect whole regions or groups of countries; thus, American involvement in one part of the world has an impact on global public opinion. Additionally, networks of interrelations bridge various planes of relations—political, economic, cultural, and religious; this means that an ideology such as anti-Americanism is concurrently nourished by many factors—cultural and religious differences as well as divergence of political and economic interests. What also has an important impact on the perception of the United States are media that have become exceedingly powerful and capable of manipulating messages and, consequently, creating images and attitudes. Hence, anti-Americanism in the era of globalization emerges as a complex phenomenon that is determined by several factors, created and modified by various subjects, and perceived from diverse angles. Notwithstanding, its capacity for influencing world opinion and international politics is irrefutable and is advancing with growing complexity.

ANTIGUA AND BARBUDA

Religious diversity in Antigua and Barbuda, an island nation located in the Leeward Islands of the northeastern Caribbean Sea, is the result of a long history of European colonization, the Atlantic slave trade, and subsequent Christian missions. Antigua is the largest island in the country, and about 98% of the population live there. Due to its status as a British colony from 1632 to 1981, most inhabitants of Antigua and Barbuda are Christian. According to the 2001 census, 74% are Christians; of the Christian population, 25.7% are Anglican, 12.3% Seventh-Day Adventist, 10.6% Pentecostal, 10.5% Moravian, 10.4% Roman Catholic, 7.9% Methodist, 4.9% Baptist, 4.5% Church of God, and 5.4% other Christians. Rastafarianism, Hinduism, Islam, Judaism, and Baha'i are also represented, mostly as a result of 20th-century emigration from South Asia, the Middle East, and other Caribbean islands.

British colonists and traders settled the islands in the 17th century. Slaves imported from West Africa to work the sugar plantations practiced ancestral religious traditions, the remaining traces of which include ecstatic worship and remnants of obeah, a folk religion of the diaspora that includes beliefs in spirits and charms. Anglicanism was the official religion until the 18th century, but Anglicans ministered only to the White population and outlawed obeah practices as a threat to the social order.

From 1756, Moravian missionaries sought to convert slaves and teach them literacy. More than half of the slave population became Moravian by 1834, the date of the end of slavery in the British West Indies. Methodist missionaries also reached slave populations in the 18th century. Both Moravian and Methodist churches advocated obedience to plantation owners in an effort to assuage fears that the slaves would rebel. In the mid-19th century, Catholics and Anglicans also began converting slaves and free Blacks. To replace slave labor, indentured workers from India arrived in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, bringing Hinduism and Islam with them.

Fundamentalist churches have shown rapid growth in the past 50 years, a result of conservative American churches missionizing in the Caribbean after World War II. Many of the Antiguan church leaders combine the more conservative theology with distinctively Caribbean traits, such as shouting, charismatic worship, and the ritual experience of the Holy Spirit. Many Caribbean churches have asserted their independence from denominational control, forming separate Caribbean faith organizations and their own distinctive worship styles. For example, Seventh-Day Adventist, Pentecostal, Baptist, and Church of God churches belong to the United Evangelical Association.

Rastafarianism has also grown since the 1960s, counting 1,000 to 1,500 islanders today. Since the government outlaws marijuana, which is used in Rastafarian rituals, some Rastafarians claim that the state oppresses their religion.

While Antigua and Barbuda is a secular nation, the government maintains close ties with the Antiguan Christian Council, which recruits ministers to the islands and observes four religious holidays as national holidays (Good Friday, Easter Monday, Whit Monday, and Christmas). In 2004, the prime minister took control of the Ministry of Ecclesiastical Affairs. However, clergy members cannot run for political office.

ANTI-SEMITISM

Anti-Semitism is the negative perception of Jews, manifestations of which range from verbally expressed antipathy to physical violence toward Jewish individuals, their properties, institutions, communities, and the state of Israel. Expressions of anti-Semitism date back to ancient times and have been evolving ever since, having gone through periods of appeasement and escalation. Prejudice toward Jews can be rooted in a religious, ethnic, cultural, economic, or political background, depending on particular historical situations and social contexts. In the contemporary world, not only do all of these factors remain valid but anti-Semitic sentiment also has been altered by the processes of globalization and the globalization backlash. Therefore, in the 21st century, anti-Semitism constitutes a highly complex phenomenon and continues to be an influential ideology and a challenging social issue.

Throughout most of its existence, anti-Semitism has been based primarily on religious grounds. In pre-Christian times, most Jews refused to accept the dominant pagan beliefs and kept to their monotheistic religion, which made them unpopular. They were frequently treated as scapegoats, blamed for real and imagined hardships. Aversion to Jews resulted in their expulsion from their traditional homeland of Jerusalem, which began a long history of Jewish diasporas. With the spread of Christianity, Jews remained out of favor as differences between them and Christians became more and more manifest. Hostility toward Jews was principally stirred by their being held responsible for the crucifixion of Christ. From the fourth century, when Christianity was established as the official religion of the Roman Empire, their legal position was disadvantageous, especially in places where laws regulating Christian-Jewish relations were passed. In the Middle Ages, the so-called Blood Libel was added to the allegations against Jews. (It claimed that followers of Judaism murdered Christian children to procure human blood for the preparation of matzo bread.) Prejudice against and fear of Jews led to numerous pogroms and slaughters (e.g., during the Crusades and the Black Death), obligatory Christianization, confiscation of Jewish properties, and even expulsion from several countries (England in 1290, France in 1306 and 1394, Spain in 1492, and Portugal in 1497). Jews were also frequently isolated in designated areas (ghettos), forced to wear distinctive clothes, or permitted only certain professions such as tax collection and lending money on usury, which consolidated their negative stereotype in the common consciousness.

The advent of modernity, with its emphasis on humanism and rationalism, failed to put an end to the lingering medieval convictions and discriminatory regulations. In the face of industrialization and secularization, religious arguments yielded to rational ones. Anti-Semitism changed shape in the 19th century, when economic and political aspects became vital motives for a negative attitude toward Jews. Jews were now deemed as unscrupulous competitors in economic life and pretenders to world rule. These conceptions were strengthened by modern ideologies. The birth of nationalism brought the ethnic dimension of anti-Semitism to the forefront. Its most severe expression occurred in Nazi Germany, where anti-Semitism became the core part of the Nazis' official ideology and resulted in the Holocaust. Distrust toward Jews was also an important element of communistic ideology, which pictured Jews as the exploitative class and as plotters against communist authorities.

In late-modern times, the idea of Zionism became essential to anti-Semitism. It was formulated at the end of the 19th century in response to the increasing numbers of anti-Semitic acts in many countries, where anti-Semitism was used as a tool to discredit opponents in political battles or to relieve social tensions (as in pogroms in the Russian Empire and eastern European countries). The main objective of Zionism, the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine, was eventually achieved on May 14, 1948. This date constitutes an important caesura in the history of anti-Semitism, as it marks the beginning of the Israeli-Arab conflict, which today plays the leading role in fueling contemporary anti-Semitism.

In present times, anti-Semitism has emerged as a new phenomenon integrating the old features (religious, cultural, racial, ethnic, economic, and political factors) and new ones stemming from the processes of globalization. Even though the importance of religious grounds has diminished, it has by no means disappeared. On the one hand, the Catholic Church changed its position dramatically in the second half of the 20th century, encompassing an ecumenical stance and promoting brotherhood with Jews in Christian countries; yet, on the other hand, the surge of Islamic fundamentalism has increased hostility toward “infidels” in the Muslim world. These religious antagonisms, coupled with cultural dissimilarities as well as racial and ethnic conflicts, contribute to the clash of civilizations theory, which is eagerly used to explain world antagonisms and which situates Israeli-Arab conflict within the framework of a global clash between Western and Islamic civilizations.

While acknowledging the importance of the religious and cultural aspects, the political factor appears to be the one nurturing global anti-Semitism the most in the past few decades. The establishment of the Israeli state not only generated outrage among Arab nations but also raised massive controversy worldwide. Since then, anti-Semitism has been stirred by the cyclical intensification of the Israeli-Arab conflict as well as by manipulative endeavors such as the propagation of the “Protocols of the Elders of Zion” in the Arab world. (The “Protocols” is a fraudulent text describing Jewish plans to gain global domination that was first published in the Russian Empire at the beginning of the 20th century.) Another serious source of political criticism are Jewish-American relations and the concept of Jews as allies of the United States in its alleged imperial ambitions. Jews constitute only around 1.5% of the population of the United States, but their economic prosperity ensures their visibility and weight. The notion of a powerful Jewish lobby influencing principal decision makers in American politics was consolidated in the era of neoconservative orientation on the American political scene. The Jewish lobby was alleged to have had a big impact on American Middle Eastern policy, particularly on decisions regarding the 2003 Iraq War.

Apart from new cultural and political circumstances, contemporary anti-Semitism has several characteristics that distinguish it from the older versions. First of all, while in earlier stages, anti-Semitism was placed in a local context, it is now oriented globally. Jews, as the object of fear or hatred, are commonly conceived of as a global community, not as harmful or unwelcome individuals. Anti-Semitism tends to be aimed mainly at Jews in Israel and the United States rather than at Jewish minorities in other countries. Second, the main source of anti-Semitism relocated. With the creation of the state of Israel, it moved from Europe to the Middle East and now returns via increasing Arab immigration to European countries. Furthermore, with the systematical addition of new concepts (Holocaust denial, new anti-Semitism), it tends to adopt the form of a postmodern phenomenon. In the globalized world, anti-Semitism does not refer to one concrete ideology anymore but to a range of convictions that serve individuals and groups as elements to construct their own personalized versions of discriminative ideology aimed at Jews.

The impact of globalization on contemporary ideologies lies also in the implosion of time and space induced by mass media, which precipitates the dissemination of concepts and beliefs and consequently gives vitality to ideological movements. In this way, contemporary anti-Semitism has been transmitted to numerous countries and communities where it traditionally was absent or unpopular. What is more, the message conveyed by modern mass media is highly appealing as it unites various types of charges and is enveloped in a catchy and often symbolic covering. Hence, the anti-Semitic message becomes an abstract idea, disconnected from traditional justification but easily distributed and adopted.

The forces of globalization not only accelerate the spread of ideologies but also favor their interference. Thus, globalized anti-Semitism is frequently identified with anti-Zionism (a politically oriented movement opposing a Jewish presence in the Middle East) and is also associated with anti-Americanism due to the negative perception of Jewish-American relations. Following this reasoning, since Americanization is universally equalized with globalization, the backlash against these phenomena affects anti-Semitism as well, transforming it into a component of an antiglobalization reaction. (The antiglobalization march at the 2003 World Social Forum in Porto Alegre, Brazil, when swastikas were displayed by some protesters, serves as an example.) The relationship between globalization and anti-Semitism therefore proves to be interdependent: Not only does globalization influence the condition and shape of anti-Semitism in the contemporary world, but anti-Semitism in return backfires against globalization by nurturing reactionary antiglobalization movements. This mutual dependence confirms the important role of anti-Semitism in contemporary globalized reality.

APOCALYPTICISM

The term apocalypticism, broadly defined, commonly refers to “an apocalyptic doctrine or belief, esp. one based on an expectation of the imminent end of the present world order” (Oxford English Dictionary). The original term, apocalypse, deriving from the Greek apokalypsis, has a more specific definition, meaning “revelation,” specifically referring to the events described in the Book of Revelation. The term apocalypse as it is used in contemporary discussions of culture has a wide variety of definitions; John J. Collins uses it to classify a genre of literature possessing certain characteristics. The term is also used to describe the cataclysmic events of the end of time. More recently, its theological use has been extended to refer more generally to disasters of global proportions (see “apocalypse” in the Oxford English Dictionary). Though the term apocalypse originally described texts, movements, or doctrines (or all three) associated with the Christian tradition, the term is now used to describe a wide variety of phenomena pertaining to the imminent arrival of the end of the world—and the notion of a utopian existence correlated with this end—across religious traditions and in more “secular” contexts.

This entry describes the key features of apocalypticism as a phenomenon of religion, and its manifestations in religious movements, and concludes with a description of some of apocalypticism’s recent cultural manifestations.

Scholars in the history of religions and biblical studies have attempted to delineate key features of apocalypticism. Generally, these scholars have noted the presence of some or all of the following characteristics:

1. The first is a dualistic, or polar view, of the world—a view of the world in which only good and evil exist.
2. A unity of history is constructed based on key mythic elements of the past, hidden until the present moment, when there is an uncovering of the significance of these past events in relation to the present. This uncovering may occur through a messianic figure, but does not have to.
3. The emphasis is on the importance of the present moment. This moment is often constructed as the culmination of all of history. It is during this time that history’s secrets can finally be disclosed to the true believers.
4. The unique qualities of this present moment correlate to the end of time being near or here already, inaugurating a new existence of humanity in which evil and suffering are already or will be forever expunged from existence.
5. Finally, as Mircea Eliade has noted, this end of time frequently mirrors the beginning of time, a time when evil is all but absent from the world.

We can trace many of these themes operating together in the genesis of several religious traditions: early Christianity, Mormonism, Islam, and the Baha’i religion, to name just a few examples. In the Islamic case, for instance, the earliest revelations (apokalypsis) to Muhammad disclosed a new conception of time pointing to the potentially imminent Day of Judgment. This yawm al-din was accompanied by detailed depictions of an afterworld: the garden where those favored by the divine would dwell and the fire for those not so fortunate. As Michael Sells and others have observed, in these early revelations, belief in the idea of individual judgment became synonymous with belief in the new religion itself. Indeed, the introduction of the Qur'an's revised moral code is fused to the results of the final judgment. Sura 107, for instance, makes clear that those who uphold the qualities enshrined by the new Islamic message—such as feeding the hungry, taking care of orphans, and performing the prayer—were to inhabit the garden; those who did not uphold these new precepts would find themselves in the fire. Apocalypticism often features prominently in the birth of new religious movements and religious renewals for a number of reasons. A new revelation offers a revised vision of both the meaning of the present existence and the afterlife. This vision is, in turn, “proven” by an uncovering of the significance of past events; these past events are structured to point to this present moment in time. Through this disclosure occurring at this unique moment in history, the apex of sacredness becomes reoriented: It now revolves around the people who uphold the precepts of this new revelation.

Apocalypticism's dualistic vision of the world aids in the construction and subsequent maintenance of a new societal creation. Those who do not participate in this new vision of the sacred are cast as unbelievers—those who will not be saved at the end of time. This dualism may even lead apocalyptically charged movements to separate themselves from other societies, and many of these movements may encourage the sharing of wealth and property.

Various strands of apocalypticism are apparent in countless religious and more “secular” social transformations throughout history. The Crusades, Christopher Columbus's “discovery” of the Americas, the American Revolution, the Shabbetai Tsevi movement, the 'Abbāsid revolution, communism, and even the rise of Barack Obama can all be seen as apocalyptic events, insofar as they frame a new utopian vision of existence in a unique moment of time, “proven” through specific events throughout history. While some scholars have observed that certain historical periods and places (e.g., 12th-century Europe and various Islamic lands, respectively) witness an upsurge of apocalyptic activity, there seems to be no consensus concerning the reasons why these movements may emerge at specific times. Work by Michael Barkun has suggested that the emergence of millenarian movements correlates to societal or natural upheaval, though disaster does not necessarily guarantee the emergence of apocalypticism.

The creation of a utopian kingdom may involve violence. In 1995, member of Aum Shinrikyō, a Japanese new religion, released sarin gas on multiple subway trains in Tokyo, injuring thousands and killing 12, in an attempt to bring about their leader's version of utopia. Mass suicides at Jonestown (1978) and violence directed toward federal agents by the Branch Davidians (1993) are other recent examples of apocalyptic groups committing violence to either preserve or carry out their millennial visions. Some of the reasons why these groups may turn violent are outlined by Wessinger and Juergensmeyer, among others.

Apocalyptic themes continue to permeate modern culture. The plot of the enormously successful Left Behind series revolves around the events of the rapture; the series has sold more than 11 million copies. Films such as I Am Legend (2007), starring Will Smith—based on a novel by Robert Neville in 1954 by the same name—envision a secularized version of the apocalypse in which the majority of the world's population is wiped out by a man-made virus and only the elect can save the few remaining members of society. Apocalyptic themes are often employed in politics. One form of this rhetoric may include the likening of candidates to messianic or antichrist figures, as occurred in the 2008 American presidential election. Another form of this rhetoric, as John Judis has observed, is the investing of a nation with a special, exclusive significance—that this nation's role on the world stage is, in part, predicated on bringing these exclusive, special qualities to other, less fortunate nations. (Cuba and the United States, among other nations, have at various points employed this rhetoric.) Each of these rhetorical structures is frequently paired with a sense of urgency, making the invocation of apocalyptic themes a particularly effective means of social mobilization.

While the origins of apocalypticism can be traced back more than 3,500 years, apocalyptic themes and symbols continue to help shape human history even today, providing potent symbolic currency for both the ordering of human existence and social transformations.

APOSTLE PAUL (CA. 2–67 CE)

Paul (Saul of Tarsus) was the early Christian leader who is often considered to be the person responsible for making Christianity a world religion rather than a small sect of Judaism. Paul was born between 2 and 10 CE in Tarsus, a city located near the Mediterranean coast in what is today the country of Turkey. His Hebrew name was Saul, but on his conversion to Christianity, he took on the Roman name Paul. During his day, Tarsus served as the capital of Asia Minor, and its territory was considered free; thus, Saul was born a free man. Paul had a Pharisaic family origin. The Pharisees' school of thought was characterized by rigid obedience to Mosaic Law (the law given to Moses by God and, more generally, the laws of the Old Testament). Saul took rabbinical studies in Jerusalem with the renowned teacher, Gamaliel, who personally tutored him.

Baptism

Saul witnessed the stoning of Stephen, who was later identified as the first Christian martyr. In 32 CE, Saul was given permission by the high priest to inspect the synagogues of Damascus for the emerging followers of Jesus and to bring those he found to Jerusalem for judicial investigation. According to the biblical account, on the road to Damascus, Saul had an encounter with a bright light appearing in front of him. The voice of Jesus asked him, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" (King James Version, Acts of the Apostles 9:4), and Saul was struck blind. After 3 days of blindness while he was in Damascus, Saul was healed by Ananias, a disciple sent by Jesus to heal him. After his sight was restored, Saul was baptized and received the Holy Spirit of God.

Activity

Between 33 and 36 CE, Saul (now Paul) stayed in Damascus to preach the gospel that promotes Jesus as the Messiah. This provoked some leaders of the Jewish community, and they plotted to assassinate him. Luckily Paul found out about this conspiracy and fled the city by night. He then went to Arabia and stayed there for 3 years, preaching the gospel of Jesus.

In 36 CE, Paul went back to Damascus and then to Jerusalem. He faced serious opposition and rejection from his fellow Christians there, a situation that continued until Barnabas took his side and he was finally accepted. The Jewish parties subjected him to yet another assassination attempt, and the Christian brotherhoods sent him to Caesarea and then back home to Tarsus. There he stayed until 40 CE.

The assumption that Paul was married is primarily based on the social norms observed by the Pharisees, which required members of the Sanhedrin to be married. That implies that if he was married, he might have been a widower at the time of his ministry and preaching.

By 40 CE, Paul's help was being sought by Barnabas, who was sent to spread the Gospel among the Syrian Greeks in Antioch. Barnabas traveled to Tarsus and asked for Paul's help in converting believers to the Church. Both of them stayed there and taught for a year.

Paul's Missionary Journeys

Agabus, an early follower of Christianity, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles as a prophet, prophesied a great famine between 41 and 44 CE. Christians were mobilized to plant crops and gather food in order to help their Jewish brethren. Paul and Barnabas delivered supplies and provided famine relief to Jerusalem and returned to their post in Antioch. In 46 or 47 CE, accompanied by John Mark, both of them set off on what was to be their first evangelical missionary journey.

First Evangelical Missionary Journey (Acts of the Apostles 13:1–15:35)

They traveled to Cyprus, Barnabas's native island (13:4–12), and Perga (13:13). At Perga, John Mark returned home for what Paul considered insufficient reason (15:37ff.), but Paul and Barnabas continued their route through Pisidian Antioch (13:14–52), Iconium (14:1–6), Lystra (14:6–20), and Derbe (14:20–21). After they reached Attalia, they sailed back to Antioch. They stayed and preached the Gospel in Antioch until 49 CE.

A dispute between Paul and Barnabas occurred, causing them to separate; Barnabas wanted to take John Mark on their next journey, but Paul refused. Paul took Silas (Silvanus), a representative of the Jerusalem church and a Roman citizen, on a journey of revisiting cities, while Barnabas took John Mark and went to Cyprus.

Second Missionary Journey—48 to 51 CE (Acts of the Apostles 15:36–18:22)

Paul and Silas traveled to Tarsus and then to Derbe and Lystra. This time, Paul met Timothy, who later became his frequent companion. The three of them traveled through Pisidian, Antioch, to Troas, a city in Asia Minor. It is there that Paul had a vision of a holy man in Macedonia, across the Aegean Sea, calling to him for help (16:9–10). Paul treated the vision as a sign from God and set sail to Neapolis, from where they traveled to Philippi. There they baptized a woman named Lydia, along with her entire family. In Philippi, Paul also performed an exorcism on a slave girl, which agitated her masters, who filed a complaint and started an uprising in the city against Paul and Silas. They were both arrested and imprisoned, but an earthquake made their escape possible.

From there they went to Thessalonica, and Paul preached the Gospel for three Sabbaths in a row, showing why Jesus is the savior mentioned in the Old Testament. There Jason, who was later accused and arrested by an angry Jewish mob that came looking for Paul and Silas but never found them, gave them refuge. Jason was later released, and Paul, Silas, and Timothy left for Beroea. Even there, he was hunted by the Jews from Thessalonica, which is why Paul left for Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy in Thessalonica. In Beroea (17:10–15), however, the Jewish group showed a far more open-minded approach to the study of the scriptures.

In Athens (17:16–34), Paul preached the Gospel, being greatly troubled by the number of false gods worshipped there. He sought help from Silas and Timothy, asking them to come to Athens while the Athenians were requesting that he elaborate on the Gospel. While there were several philosophical schools that believed in the immortality of the soul, the Greeks considered the idea of “bodily” resurrection as preposterous, and Athens generally proved to be a hard ground for the Gospel. Paul was invited to Mars Hill, where he used the existence of an altar with an inscription saying “To the Unknown God” to unveil the existence of a Creator God (17:22).

Following the completion of his second missionary journey around late 50 CE, and joined by Silas and Timothy, Paul set off for Corinth in the late summer of 50 CE. He received a vision from God saying that his preaching of the Gospel would bring results and merit. Paul stayed in Corinth and wrote his epistles, the First and Second Thessalonians. Between 50 and 51 CE, the Jewish community once again accused him before the Roman legal system, but charges were dropped when the governor refused to even hear the accusations. With Priscilla and Aquila, Paul set sail for Ephesus, a city that was serving as a bridge between the East and the West. There he preached in a synagogue, then went to Caesarea, finally ending up in Antioch by the end of 52 CE.

Between 52 and 53 CE, Paul preached in Antioch accompanied by Apostle Peter. They were gathered at a joint feast with the Gentiles and ate together, but when other Christians from Jerusalem arrived, Peter, Barnabas, and others stopped the feast. That act of hypocrisy provoked Paul, and he publicly corrected Peter, saying that he had moved away from the truth of God.

Third Missionary Journey
(Acts of the Apostles 18:23–21:16)

Paul's third missionary journey started in 53 CE (18:23). He traveled to Asia Minor to spread the Gospel and strengthen people's belief in it. Through Galatia and Phrygia, he came to Ephesus, where he stayed for approximately 3 years, after which he set out for Macedonia. During the brief 3 months that he stayed in Macedonia, he went to Corinth. He wrote the First Corinthians in the late winter of 56 CE, the Second Corinthians in the late summer of 57 CE, and the Book of Romans in the winter of 57 CE.

In 58 CE, Paul, together with his company, traveled through Macedonia to the city of Troas, where a feast sanctifying unleavened bread was being held. After that, his company sailed to Assos, while he got there on foot. From there, they went to Mitylene and finally to Miletus, from where Paul sought a visit from the elders in the Ephesian church. There, he warned them about an upcoming apostasy in the Church. Revelation 2:2 shows what notice the elders took of his warning.

Return to Jerusalem

Well into 58 CE, Paul traveled to Jerusalem, after visiting Coos, Rhodes, Patara, and Caesarea. He stayed in Caesarea for several days in the house of Phillip the Evangelist and then entered Jerusalem, even though he had been warned not to come. Taking with him four Jewish converts into the Temple area, he caused a riot. Roman troops rushed to his help, saving him from the crowds. They then sentenced him to scourging to find out what he had done to upset the crowd so much. However, he was freed from scourging by the chief captain after he learned that Paul was a Roman citizen. He was escorted from Rome by night to the city of Caesarea, and its governor, Felix, was supposed to decide on Paul's fate.

Paul was a Roman prisoner in Caesarea between 58 and 60 CE (Acts of the Apostles 24–26). Paul appealed to Caesar: In 2 years, he defended his case three times. In late 60 CE, along with other prisoners, Paul embarked on a boat to Rome (Acts of the Apostles 27). The boat was controlled by a centurion named Julius, who disregarded Paul's advice not to set sail for Rome through the Mediterranean at that tumultuous time of the year (September/October). The ship was wrecked on the journey from Crete to Rome at the island of Malta. After a 3-month stay, Paul set sail for Putioli, and from there walked to Rome.

Paul was a prisoner once again in Rome from 61 to 63 CE (Acts of the Apostles 28:30). In the 2 years when he was a prisoner in Rome, only one watchman guarded Paul. He was allowed to live by himself and to receive visitors, as well as to preach the Gospel. He wrote the Letter to the Hebrews in the spring of 61 CE; during 62 CE, he wrote the letters to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon, and the books of First Timothy and Titus in 63 to 64 CE. During the whole time, he worked on and finished the Book of Acts, which is mostly about him.

Paul was released from prison in 63 CE, and he then traveled to Crete and then to Nicopolis in Macedonia. From 64 to 67 CE, he managed to complete his goal and visit Spain and Britain. Before coming to his death, Paul was yet again imprisoned in Rome, where he wrote Second Timothy, a letter to Timothy. That is his last writing before he died a martyr's death in about 67 CE. He is traditionally believed to have been beheaded.

ARABIC

Arabic (al-'arabiyya, lisān al-'Arab—"the Arab tongue"; al-fuṣḥā, "purer Arabic") is one of the world's leading languages, with an estimated 221 million speakers, and its use as the canonical language of Islam is often credited with helping to give unity to global Muslim culture.

Among spoken languages, it ranks fifth after Mandarin Chinese, English, Spanish, and Hindi. It is the official language of 21 modern countries in North Africa (Algeria, Egypt, Chad, Libya, Mauritania, Morocco, Tunisia, and Sudan), the Arabian Peninsula (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and Yemen), the Levant (Jordan, Lebanon, Iraq, and Syria), and the Horn of Africa (Djibouti and Somalia). It is also spoken in Palestine and Israel, in the west Saharan territory, in Eritrea, in parts of southern Turkey, in the Khuzistan province of southwestern Iran (also known as Arabistan), and by small minorities in Uzbekistan, Afghanistan, and Cyprus. Arab immigrants carried their native tongue to Europe and the Americas, particularly in the latter half of the 20th century.

Some 1.5 billion Muslims around the world regard Arabic as their sacred language because it is the language of the Qur'an, the Islamic holy book. Many Jews and Christians in the Middle East also use the language in their religious and intellectual life, as well as in their daily affairs. This entry discusses its classification, dialects, morphology, and alphabet; its religio-historical importance; and modern developments in the status of the language.

Classification, Dialects, Morphology, and the Alphabet

Arabic is classified by linguists as a member of the Semitic branch of the Afro-Asiatic languages. It therefore has affinity with ancient languages such as Hebrew, Aramaic, Syriac, and the Akkadian language of Mesopotamia. It is also related to indigenous languages spoken today in Ethiopia and Eritrea (Ge'ez, Amharic, and Tigrinya). The Maltese language originated as an Arabic dialect, resulting from Arab cultural influence in Malta, Sicily, and southern Italy during the Middle Ages. Arabic is not philologically related to either Persian (classified as an Indo-European language) or the Turkic languages (classified as Altaic languages), although many Arabic loanwords have been assimilated by them. There are a number of subdivisions within the Arabic language itself, the most significant of which are formal literary Arabic and spoken (colloquial) Arabic. The former, known as "classical Arabic" or al-fuṣḥā, is the language of the Qur'an and an enormous body of written literature produced without significant interruption in Islamicate lands between the 7th and 19th centuries. For generations, scholars and intellectuals studied and codified it, and it evolved into the formal Arabic written and spoken today (known to students in the West as Modern Standard Arabic).

Formal Arabic coexists with various local and regional vernacular Arabic dialects, a phenomenon known as diglossia. While formal Arabic is used in most writings and official and ceremonial addresses, the dialects (lahjāt) are used mainly in everyday speech. They differ significantly from formal Arabic, which native speakers tend to consider the superior form of the language. Moreover, some Arabic dialects differ from each other to such an extent that they are mutually unintelligible. This is especially the case with dialects from the western and eastern edges of Arab lands. Colloquial Egyptian, on the other hand, is widely understood in Arab countries because of the leading role Egypt plays in education, politics, and the production of movies and programming for radio and television. Through the centuries, literary and colloquial Arabic have influenced each other—a reason for the language's ongoing vitality.

As a Semitic language, Arabic verbs, nouns, and adjectives are typically formed from tri-consonantal word roots. Different stress and vowel patterns, infixes, and the addition of prefixes and suffixes help provide the root with specific meanings. For example, the root r-f-q underlies words relating to kindness and friendship, such as rifq ("kindness"), rafiq ("male companion"), rafiqa

(“female companion”), mirfaq (“convenience”), and murāfaqa (“accompaniment”), as well as verbal forms such as rafaqa (“he was kind”) and taraffaqa (“he showed kindness”).

The Arabic alphabet consists of 28 letters, written cursively from right to left. The shape of most of these letters is affected by their position in a word—initial, medial, or final. All of them are consonants, but three of them (ā, ī, and ū) are also used as long vowels. Short vowels are either not written or are represented by optional markings known as diacritics, placed above or below the consonants. In general, a person literate in Arabic is expected to know the correct vocalizations for each word even when they are not present. Indeed, most Arabic texts lack diacritics, with the exception of the Qur’an, Hadith collections, and pedagogical literature. The Arabic alphabet evolved from ancient Semitic scripts in northern Arabia and Syria but only gained widespread use with the appearance of Islam and the establishment of an Islamic empire. During the Medieval Period, Arabic calligraphy became a highly valued art form, often functioning in the place of figural art, which was condemned by the ulema. Indeed, the Arabic alphabet became so dominant and prestigious that it was also adapted by non-Arabs for writing their own languages, such as Persian, Turkish, Berber, Hebrew, and Mozarabic in medieval Spain and, later, Sudanese in Africa, Javanese and Malay in Southeast Asia, and Urdu in South Asia. In such instances, slight modifications were made in the script to allow the inclusion of sounds not found in formal literary Arabic (such as ch as in “chair,” g as in “game,” and p as in “people”).

Religio-Historical Importance

Arabic has been used continuously as a living, written, and spoken language for more than 1,400 years, originating in the Arabian Peninsula centuries before the rise of Islam (seventh century CE). Although it was spoken and used by Arabs in their oral poetry and for written contracts, treaties, and letters in the early stages, it only became a major language for written literature after the promulgation of the revelations of the Qur’an by Muhammad ibn ‘Abd Allah (ca. 570–632 CE), the Prophet of Islam, in the region of western Arabia. It is a central tenet of the Islamic religion that the Arabic of the Qur’an is God’s word, revealed “in plain Arabic speech” (Qur’an 26:192–196). Scholars disagree over exactly which dialect it reflects, but whatever the case, the Qur’an became a canonical text under the authority of the early caliphs less than three decades after Muhammad’s death. Moreover, in Islam’s first centuries, Muslim scholars developed the doctrines of the Qur’an’s “uncreatedness” and miraculous inimitability (i’jāz), thus solidifying its sacred status among the faithful and ensuring that the Arabic text would not be imitated, corrupted, or replaced by foreign translations. As a consequence, Muslims everywhere, regardless of their native language, are required to learn the Qur’an in the original Arabic and recite it in performance of their ritual duties, particularly the daily prayer (ṣalāt).

With the establishment of the Islamic Empire in the 7th and 8th centuries, Arabic became the dominant trans-regional language used by Arabs and their subjects from North Africa to the Indian Ocean basin. The Umayyad caliph ‘Abd al-Malik bin Marwan (r. 685–705) made it the official language in fiscal affairs, replacing Greek and Persian. Arabic grammarians in the cities of Basra and Kufa (both in Iraq), the foremost of whom was the Persian scholar Sibawayhi (d. ca. 798), systematized and codified the language, thereby establishing a firm basis for literary expression. It thereafter became the language used in the creation and transmission of a great number of works on religion, history, biography, philosophy, and the sciences. The dominance of Arabic scholarship and letters was further enhanced by the introduction of paper-making technology from China in the middle of the 8th century. This made it possible to produce books in large quantities, which fostered the growth of libraries and literacy in the cities of Islamic lands from Spain to India and Central Asia. Starting in the 11th century, Arabic grammar (naḥw) and rhetoric (‘ilm al-balāgha) became compulsory subjects in the Islamic religious colleges (madrasas), and the study of Islamic law (fiqh) was emphasized.

The blossoming of Arabic literary production after the 9th century also benefited from the translation of texts from other traditions of learning. The most important were Greek philosophical, medical, and scientific texts, as well as Persian historical texts and manuals of political advice to rulers. Concomitantly, languages spoken by the native populations in lands incorporated into the Islamicate oikoumene gradually became isolated minority languages, such as Coptic in Egypt and Aramaic in Mesopotamia (Iraq), or, like Persian, they were changed by the introduction of Arabic script, together with a significant number of Arabic loanwords and expressions. Turkish, Hindi, and Urdu also have a large number of Arabic loanwords as a result of the spread of Islamic religion and civilization. Arabic words gradually found their way into European languages, especially Spanish, which has as many as 4,000 words of Arabic origin (e.g., algodón, arroz, azul, azúcar, alcalde, café, fulano, mandil, noria, ojalá, rincón, taza, and zalama) as a result of the presence of Arab and Berber Muslims between the 8th and 17th centuries. Several dozen Arabic loanwords have also entered English, such as admiral, adobe, cotton, lute, magazine, rice, safari, sherbet, sugar, and even coffee.

Modern Developments

The status of Arabic has been significantly transformed by modernity. The onset of European colonialism in Ottoman-Arab lands in the 19th and 20th centuries was accompanied by the introduction of Western forms of knowledge and the communication of this knowledge through the medium of French and English and through its translation into Arabic. These processes, which undermined classical Arabic's supremacy, were made possible by the establishment of modern schools with Western curricula, the expansion of literacy to a new class of educated elites, and the rise of the print media, especially in Egypt, Tunisia, and Lebanon. Western agents and institutions played a significant role in the transformation of traditional systems of knowledge, but change was also carried forth in the Arabic language by a diverse group of reform-minded elites in these countries. These included members of the Muhammad 'Ali Dynasty, which ruled in Egypt from 1805 to 1953; Al-Azhar shaykhs like Rifa'a al-Tahtawi (1801–1873) and Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905); Ahmad Bey Husayn (r. 1837–1855) and Khayr al-Din of Tunis (d. 1889); and Lebanese Christians such as Butrus al-Bustani (1819–1883) and Jurji Zaydan (1861–1914).

As the classical formations of Arabic knowledge became more fragmented, new ones emerged that were promoted through modern national education systems, newspapers, magazines, and printed books. Certainly, traditional Arabic learning and language study were still available in madrasas and in printed editions of classical Arabic texts, but even these were affected by the forces of change and reform. Instruction in classical Arabic was a required part of the curriculum in the Deobandi schools in South Asia, Saudi religious schools, and Iranian primary schools, especially after the Islamic Revolution of 1978 to 1979. Concomitantly, secular Arab nationalist movements and newly created Arab nation-states made preservation of the Arabic language and its adaptation to modernity essential tenets of their ideologies and policies, eventually leading to the establishment of Arabic language academies in a number of Arab capitals, starting with Damascus in 1919 and followed by Cairo in 1932. Despite efforts to preserve its linguistic purity and authenticity, classical Arabic evolved into Modern Standard Arabic (or Middle Arabic), which reflected infusions of French and English language style, syntax, and diction. Even religious writings by Muslim authors mirror this linguistic shift, as exemplified by the work of Arab intellectuals such as 'Ali 'Abd al-Raziq (1888–1966), Taha Husayn (1889–1973), Muhammad Khalaf Allah (1916–1997), Sadiq al-'Azm (b. 1936), Muhammad Shahrur (b. 1938), and Muhammad 'Imāra, as well as books and religious tracts written by Islamists like Sayyid Qutb (1906–1966), Muhammad al-Ghazali (1917–1996), Yusuf al-Qaradawi (b. 1926), Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr (1935–1980), and Rashid Ghannouchi (b. 1941).

In the area of Arabic adab, or belles lettres, Western influence is evident in the rise of the Arabic novel, short story writing, and modern poetry. An outstanding author in this regard is Naguib Mahfouz (1911–2006), who received the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1988 for his moving portrayals of Egyptians contending with the moral ambiguities and forces of irreversible change in the 20th century. Additionally, modern education and feminist movements in Arab countries and the West have created unprecedented opportunities for women writing in Arabic, such as Ulfat Idilbi (1912–2007), Layla Ba'lbaki, Nawal al-Sa'dawi (b. 1931), Colette al-Khuri (b. 1931), Sahar Khalifa (b. 1942), and Hanan al-Shaykh (b. 1945).

A number of modern Arabic works have achieved global renown through translation into European languages, as well as through scholarly publications. Moreover, more and more writings from the classical Arabic textual tradition are being published in modern editions and translations, thus expanding their readership and opening up new avenues for inter- and intracultural understanding, disputation, and interpretation. However, the Moroccan intellectual Abdelfattah Kilito is one of those who have objected that bilingualism and translation into Western languages may be forms of continued colonial domination and cultural violation. Indeed, the growth in Arabic language study in European American colleges and universities since the 1960s is not only motivated by intellectual curiosity and objective research projects. It has received much of its funding as a consequence of geopolitical concerns in the West stemming from its history of hegemonic involvement in Arab lands, the Cold War, the dependence on Arab petroleum resources, and, especially after September 11, 2001, the global “war on terror.”

Although Arabic no longer has the singular status it held in the premodern Middle East as a lingua franca and is an unrivalled vehicle for the transmission of knowledge, it has nonetheless been adapted by its speakers to the new audiovisual electronic media. Audio cassette tapes quickly became a popular means for circulating Qur’anic recitation, sermons, religious songs, and popular music in the 1980s and 1990s, followed by videotapes and CD-ROM diskettes. Local television programming has been available since the 1950s, but trans-regional Arabic-language satellite broadcasting is now available in all Arab countries, as evidenced by the creation of the Al-Jazeera and Al Arabiya television news channels in 1996 and 2003, respectively. Alongside religious and news programming, satellite stations also offer a variety of educational and entertainment programs in Arabic. Moreover, globalization of the Arabic language has been greatly enabled by the Internet, which carries an ever-expanding number of websites that post Islamic texts and offer different perspectives on religion, politics, society, and the world.

ARGENTINA

Argentina is a Latin American country with a population of 40 million inhabitants distributed throughout a large territory, about 90% of whom live in cities. Most of the people are Catholic. Catholicism in Argentina is a wide social fact, not confined to the religious sphere. In the 16th century, the Spanish Conquest imposed a model of “Christianity” on the Argentinean territory. Catholicism became the monopolistic culture, not only subordinating those of Native Americans and African slaves but also excluding them from the public sphere altogether. Catholic culture established deep roots in Argentina, persisting postindependence, through liberal times, and well into the mid-20th century. However, modern Argentinean Catholicism is not the result of a parish civilization. It has been historically marked by the significance of urban structures and the persistent lack of priests. The discrepancy between the widespread (Catholic) belief and the low sacramental and parochial participation is one of the main characteristics of Argentina’s religious panorama.

In contemporary, global times, Argentina is a believing society; 91% of the population believes in God. The religious identification shows a progressive pluralization; the percentage of Catholics in the country came down from 90% of the population in 1960 to 76.5% in 2008. The decline of the sense of belonging to Catholicism describes a fracture of the historical monopolistic cult, due to two main tendencies: (1) the growth of Pentecostal Protestantism and (2) an increase in religious indifference. Indeed, religiously indifferent people (agnostics, atheists, etc.) make up 11% of the population, and evangelical believers make up 9% of the population. In Argentina, there are other religious communities as well, such as Jehovah's Witnesses, Mormons, Jews, Muslims, Afro-Brazilians, and Buddhists. Jews in Argentina—approximately 300,000 persons, are the first Jewish community in Latin America. Argentina also became a place for the spread of religious movements. On the one hand, Pentecostal megachurches, such as the Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus (IURD; “Universal Church of the Kingdom of God”) and the Igreja Pentecostal Deus es amor (IPDA; “God Is Love Pentecostal Church”); indigenous beliefs; New Age manifestations; and Afro-Brazilian cults have consolidated their position assuming local features; on the other hand, Catholic and Pentecostal Protestant communities were born in the late 20th century and nowadays expand locally and globally.

Three main streams can be identified in the Argentinean religious landscape. First, the increasing quantity of people that define themselves as religiously indifferent confirms that people feel free to construct their identities beyond religious beliefs. Second, there is a new social space for beliefs other than Catholicism, such as the Pentecostal traditions, Native American religious traditions, Afro-Brazilian religions, and the multiple New Age manifestations, many of which express different subjectivities through corporal practices. Third, a deep process of de-institutionalization is in progress. We can perceive the inability of religious institutions to exert control over their parishioners. Most Argentineans relate to God in their own way, and only 2 out of 10 Argentineans attend a religious ceremony on a weekly basis.

We could say, as a form of conclusion, that the religious field in Argentina is a wide space with blurred boundaries that overlaps other social fields. This transformation during the past decades has resulted in a diversified social and religious landscape that is both innovative and vital.

ARMENIA

The formation of the Armenian nation in southeastern Europe started in the second millennium BCE and was completed by the end of the ninth century BCE, on creation of Urartu, the first united Armenian kingdom. Armenians were the first nation to declare Christianity a state religion in 301 CE by abandoning paganism. The Armenian Apostolic Church (AAC), one of the six ancient autocephalous Eastern churches, has emerged as the main religious organization in the country.

Christianity has traditionally played an important role in shaping the Armenian identity: Despite the secularization of the society during the Soviet Union, adherence to AAC continued to be one of the symbols of belonging to the Armenian nation.

Throughout history when Armenia was divided between different regional powers (e.g., the Ottoman, Persian, and Russian empires), the AAC adopted a political role and ensured the preservation of Armenian culture and language among the Armenians living under the rule of different empires. It has often been suggested that the Armenian Church played more of a secular role than a religious one by guiding Armenians through liberation movements and political negotiations.

According to official sources, 77% of the population (98% ethnic Armenian) are followers of the AAC; however, there are no reliable data on the religious affiliation of citizens, and nonofficial estimates of different religious congregations vary significantly from the official data. Nine percent of the population belong to minority religious groups, which include Roman Catholics, Armenian Uniate (Mekhitarist) Catholics, Orthodox Christians, Armenian Evangelical Christians, Molokans, Pentecostals, Seventh-Day Adventists, Baptists, various groups of charismatic Christians, Jehovah's Witnesses, members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons), Yezidis (non-Muslim Kurds who practice Yezidism), Jews, Sunnī Muslim Kurds, Shi'a Muslims, and Baha'is. About 14% of the population are atheists or nonreligious agnostics, although this is not reflected in the official statistics.

Based on the data provided by the Department for Ethnic Minorities and Religious Affairs of the Government of Armenia, the palette of the religious organizations registered in Armenia are as follows:

- Four traditional Christian churches: AAC, Roman Catholic Church, Russian Orthodox, and Eastern Nestorian
- Four Protestant churches: Evangelical, Baptist, Adventist, and Pentecostal

The Armenian constitution, adopted in 1995 and amended in 2005, provides for freedom of religion and the rights to practice, choose, or change religious belief. Nevertheless, Article 8.1 of the Constitution recognizes “the exclusive mission of the Armenian Church as a national church in the spiritual life, development of the national culture, and preservation of the national identity of the people of Armenia.” Thus, although the Constitution and the Law on Freedom of Conscience and Religious Organizations establish the separation of church and state, they grant the Armenian Church official status as the national church. The April 2007 Law on the Relations of the Republic of Armenia and the Armenian Church regulates the special relations between the state and the Armenian Church and grants certain privileges to the Armenian Church that are not available to other religious groups.

In 2009, amendments to the Law on Freedom of Conscience and Religious Organizations passed the first reading in the parliament, which defines the term proselytizing to effectively ban any activity directed at preaching to and influencing citizens with different religious views without their consent or request.

ART

In both historical and contemporary contexts, global religion is intimately connected to art, or the material production of images and symbols. Traditionally, scholarship within academic fields such as religious studies has relied heavily on textual sources. Art and other material objects are often seen as accessory to the findings related to these sources. Such objects might include icons, or images, that represent figures sacred to some religious traditions; paintings that depict the occurrence of sacred events; art used in religious rituals; and architecture connected to sacred space. When found within the context of religion, art objects are often described as representational, as opposed to the foundational religious experience or its aspects. Yet, as becomes clear both from the historical developments of religions throughout the world and from the art objects themselves as they exist today, people also use art as a material means of expressing, developing, and empowering their religions, not just for the purpose of representing religious figures or symbols. This entry opens with a discussion of the early symbiosis of art and religion; then examines architecture and sacred space, art as religious representation, religious experience, and artistic practice; and, finally, explains the clash between art and religion.

Early Symbiosis of Art and Religion

Right from the beginnings of art history, religion is present in the way humans perceived and represented their experiences in the world. Evidence from some of the earliest forms of art, as found in European cave paintings that date back to the Late Stone Age or the Upper Paleolithic Age (50,000–10,000 BCE), indicates that art and religious activity were bound to one another in a powerful way from early in the history of humankind. These paintings, which are devoted especially to the naturalistic depiction of animals, are found deep within several cave complexes located in southern France and northern Spain, the most famous of which is known as Lascaux, in Dordogne, France. The remote location of the paintings within the caves and the realistic quality of the animals depicted, combined with the fact that the painted scenes all relate to hunting, suggest that the space of the cave was magical or ritualistic in nature. Researchers have speculated that artist-hunters used the paintings in a sacred, ritualistic way, envisioning the painted animal as a powerful symbol of the real, hunted animal as it existed in the natural world.

Architecture and Sacred Space

Throughout history and in many cultures around the world, art and architecture have provided the means through which different social groups have constructed sacred spaces for their religious practices. In ancient Egypt, for example, the Egyptians used imperishable stone to construct the massive pyramids and statues that would define the sacred spaces devoted to their immortal gods. This building activity peaked during the time of Egypt's Old Kingdom in the third millennium BCE, at which point Egyptian civilization was at one of its highest points of achievement. It was during this period that famous structures such as the three pyramids of Gizeh were built, providing an immortalized sacred space in which the bodies and spirits of the Egyptian god-kings could be preserved. Equally impressive is the Great Sphinx, a massive figure with the head of a human and body of a lion, carved from rock to act as guardian to the Pyramid of Khafre.

Many other sacred spaces in which art and religion coalesce are found throughout the world today. While some such as those in Egypt are primarily of historical import, others are crucial to the contemporary functioning of today's religions. In Mecca (Makkah), Saudi Arabia, the Kaabah ("cube" in Arabic) is an ancient cube-shaped building that represents the most sacred site of Islam. Found within the courtyard of the Grand Mosque of Mecca, the Kaabah is the symbolic center of the Islamic religion and the shrine to which Muslims around the world must turn each day during their prayer. All Muslims must make the pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in their lifetime, where they partake in rituals surrounding the Kaabah. In addition to its architecture, artistic details of the Kaabah, such as the gold embroidery of verses from the Qur'an on its kiswah (the "robe" covering the shrine) are artistic manifestations of the sacred in Islam.

Art as Religious Representation

Religious groups have also used art as a way of representing the histories of their sacred events. We see these representations in all forms of artistic media, including paintings, statues, reliefs, engravings, and drawings. During the Italian Renaissance (14th–17th century CE), artists frequently used fresco paintings to depict biblical scenes sacred to the Christian religion. This manner of painting (fresco is Italian for "fresh"), which involves the application of pigments on fresh plaster, had become popular in various artistic circles of the Mediterranean world since the time of the Minoans

(ca. 1650 BCE). In Italy, famous Renaissance frescoes include those of Giotto di Bondone (1266–1377 CE), which are found on the walls of the Arena Chapel in Florence, and those of Michelangelo Buonarroti (1475–1564 CE), found on the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel in Rome and commissioned by Pope Julius II (1443–1513 CE). These paintings represent important events from the Bible and are located within the sacred space of the Christian church.

In similar fashion, the art of Hindu temples found in India and elsewhere in South Asia commonly depicts events described within the rich histories of Hinduism's mythological tradition. Primarily represented in the form of painting, sculpture, and relief carvings, this art acts on one level to illustrate and narrate important episodes from the epic stories of the Hindu gods. Yet for the Hindu worshipper, art also functions as a sacred means through which divine and semidivine beings may take on a visible, physical form. Icons found both in temples and in the worshipper's home, for example, act as objects that connect the human world to the cosmological realm of the gods.

Religious Experience and Artistic Practice

Religious experience and artistic practice are in some cultures often woven together. One finds this occurrence in some of the fascinating developments that have taken place in the material culture of Daoism, a religion indigenous to China. As part of their religious practices, Daoists engage in activities that focus on cultivation of the human body such that it accords with nature and the cosmos. To aid them, Daoists have developed a visual tool to represent both the internal processes of human bodies as well as the relationship of these bodies and processes to the external world. This visual tool is a map or chart (tu) of the body. Such representations offered their viewers the visualization of a system of microcosmic and macrocosmic correspondences perceived to be at work between the body and world. In these map images, or body charts, Daoists depict the human body as a microcosm containing inner landscapes of both natural and cosmic dimensions. As such, they represent human bodies as regulated by complex systems of internal processes that also resonate with the natural world. These body charts, some of which are used in Daoism today, are alchemical representations whose origins possibly correlate with the rise of internal alchemy (neidan) during China's Song period (960–1279 CE). In this context, it has been through artistic means that Daoists have been able to visualize their religious experiences.

In some traditions, there is no clear divide between the sacred and the secular or between artistic practice and religious practice. Such is the case for Native Americans, for whom art and the material world are sacred. From the architectural features of their homes to the designs on their clothing, pottery, carvings, and other objects, art is the creative process through which many objects become meaningful. A unique art form central to Native American ritual practice is the sandpainting tradition of the Navajo culture. Using sand that has been colored using pigments found in the natural mineral materials of the earth, Navajos create elaborate and beautiful paintings on the floors of their homes (hogans). The paintings are used specifically as part of a healing ceremony, their images representing stories of heroes and heroines who have suffered and been cured of illness. During the ceremony, the person to be treated enters the painting and sits on it, after which point a medicine man ritualistically treats the person, smearing his or her body with sand particles taken from the afflicted figures represented in the sandpainting. Importantly, the sandpainting is destroyed after it has been used for its ritualistic purposes.

Within the context of contemporary art, a strong influence of religion is often present. Anselm Kiefer, a German artist, is an important representative of the New German School of artists—a group that came together in the 1980s and that is often seen as a counterpart to the 1950s North American art movement, abstract expressionism. Art historians view both movements as interrelated developments that occurred in the wake of World War II. Using a variety of artistic media to create his works, Kiefer has claimed that he is interested in connecting to the past via the reconstruction of symbols. In particular, the artist is attracted to the symbolic aspects of Judaism, especially to the symbols found within the mysticism of the Kabbalah. His work Merkaba (1996), for example, is related to the ancient symbol of the chariot described in Kabbalah as operating between earth and seven heavenly palaces. Kiefer also describes a richness in the mythologies of Judaism and Gnosticism that does not exist in Christianity, which in limiting its imagery to that of the Trinity also made rigid the knowledge attached to its tradition. Both the history of the Holocaust and the state of Germany after World War II have clearly had the most profound effects on Kiefer's art, and the artist uses his art form to demonstrate how Judaism is an intimate part of German culture.

The Clash of Art and Religion

Throughout history, the art and religion of many cultures have developed a symbiotic relationship free of discord. Moments of conflict between art and religion, however, also mark the history of global religion. In the context of Christianity, the most famous of these is the treatment of art as it stemmed from the 16th-century ideology of the Protestant Reformation and the subsequent Catholic Counter-Reformation. Martin Luther (1483–1546), the German priest and professor of theology who led the initial movements of the Reformation, warned his followers that religious imagery had the capacity to come in the way of or corrupt a Christian believer's relationship with God. Idolatry, or the worship of an image instead of God, was the primary concern of Luther and other Protestant leaders. When they developed the Protestant Ten Commandments, which differ slightly from those of the Catholic Church, they devised their Second Commandment such that it acted as a proscription against the veneration of religious imagery. Following in the wake of the Reformation's ideological developments, waves of iconoclasm, or the destruction of religious icons, swept across areas of Europe during the middle of the 16th century. This especially occurred in Switzerland, Germany, The Netherlands, and northern France, where fanatic Protestant Calvinists entered Catholic churches and destroyed statues, paintings, stained glass windows, and other art objects. In building their churches, Protestants strived to make their places of worship austere and minus the elaborate artworks that had become essential to the making of a Catholic church.

Many other examples of the interaction between art and religion exist in cultures found throughout the world, providing evidence that throughout human history art and representation have often been just as influential to religious developments and experiences as have been texts and rituals. The symbiosis between nonmaterial religious activities, such as prayer and visualization, and the material output of art is often pivotal, as opposed to being an accessory to the religions of different groups of people. An understanding of how art and material culture relate to religion contributes to how we acknowledge religious experiences as bound to human interaction with the material world.

ARUBA

Located 20 miles off the Venezuelan coast, Aruba is the most southwestern island of the Caribbean archipelago. Aruba has an area of 70 square miles and an official population of more than 95,000. More than 90% of Arubans are Christians. According to the 2006 CIA Factbook, Roman Catholics constitute more than 81% of the population, Protestants are 9%, and Hindus, Muslims, Buddhists, and Jews make up 6%; those professing "none or other" make up 4%. There are 743 Jehovah's Witnesses and 460 Seventh-Day Adventists on the island. Prominent religious buildings include the following: Beth Israel Synagogue, Bible-Way Baptist Church, Church of Christ, a Mormon church, Evangelical Church of San Nicolas, Community Church, Iglesia Evangelica Pentecostal, Holy Cross Anglican Church, a Methodist church, New Apostolic Church, Pentecostal Apostolic Assembly, Faith Revival Center, and a Baha'i center.

As noted, Roman Catholicism has long been the dominant religion on the island. Aruba has eight parishes. The first Catholic chapel—Alta Vista—was built in 1750 and affords sweeping views of the surrounding sea from its perch on the northeastern tip of the island. Closer to downtown Oranjestad, the Santa Ana Church was built in 1776 and is noted for its hand-carved neo-Gothic altar.

Protestantism—the religion of 19th-century Dutch elites—currently represents the religious affiliation of less than 3% of the population. The first Protestant Church of Aruba was founded in 1822 by members of the Lutheran and Dutch Reformed churches. The Reformed tradition continues as the United Protestant Church of Aruba. Presently, there are three Reformed churches on the island.

Twentieth-century migration led to the appearance of other groups such as Jehovah's Witnesses, Methodists, and evangelical sects from Suriname and the United States as well as Anglicans, Adventists, Buddhists, Muslims, and Jews. The Muslim community migrated from Curaçao. The Jewish community also migrated to Aruba from Curaçao. Aruban Jews dedicated a new synagogue in 1962. As previously noted, 2% to 3% of Arubans claim to be atheists and/or state that they have no religion at all. The number of individuals participating in African-derived religions (e.g., Santería and Winti) is increasing, as is participation in evangelical and Pentecostal groups. Religious pluralism, while present, is not as common in Aruba as on other Caribbean islands. Some Arubans compartmentalize religion. Saturdays are devoted to calypso, while Sundays are given over to religious observances.

A number of seemingly secular rituals have religious origins; for example, Dera Gai, or Saint John's Day (June 24), is celebrated with bonfires and a ceremony known as “burying the rooster.” A rooster is buried with its head hidden under a calabash above the ground. Blindfolded dancers try to hit the calabash with a stick while a band plays the traditional songs associated with Saint John. In recent years, Dera Gai is observed with calabashes and sticks—but without the rooster. In the 20th century, the Carnivale was introduced to the island by Caribbean migrants and has become a preeminent festival. Of special importance are celebrations surrounding an individual's 15th, 50th, and 75th birthdays.

Aruban opinions on death and the afterlife vary but are mostly influenced by Roman Catholicism. Traditional wakes—called Ocho Dias (“8 days”)—reflect the duration of the customary mourning period. On the final night, the altar is disassembled, and chairs are turned upside down. House windows are opened to enable the spirit of the deceased to leave.

Traditional Aruban ideas concerning relations with the supernatural are known collectively as brua. The term brua may have had its origins in the Spanish word bruja (“witch”) but differs from European notions of witchcraft. Brua encompasses magic, fortune-telling, healing, and beliefs about both good and evil. Magic is performed by a hacido di brua (“practitioner of brua”) and—according to custom—can be used for both good and evil.

Along with Curaçao and Bonaire, Aruba is considered a part of the Dutch Leeward or ABC islands. The island possesses a mixed Caribbean/Latin American culture. Aruba was claimed by Spain in 1499 but was never colonized. Serious settlement was first undertaken by the Dutch in 1816. Aruba's economy (and population) did not grow substantially until the 1920s, with the arrival of the oil industry. After the Aruba oil industry declined in the 1950s, tourism became the island's economic mainstay. Much of the recent population growth is attributed to immigration from South America and other Caribbean islands. An estimated 5,000 illegal immigrants brings the total island population to more than 100,000. The proportion of foreign-born Arubans increased from 18.5% of the population in 1981 to more than 28% in 1994. This trend has continued and has had a profound impact on religion in Aruba.

ARYANS

In a general sense, Aryan is the term used for the people and culture of the ancient Indo-European civilization that spanned the continents thousands of years before the time of Christ. As it has been used in the past century in the English language, the term Aryan can be distinguished from its etymological roots and usage in Hindi in the same period. Of the two languages, the Hindi usage is longer and has a more complex history than its English-language usage. Located within the Indo-European family of languages, the term has mutually exclusive meanings depending on whether it is used in the Indo-Persian or the modern English language. In the Indo-Persian language context, its meaning has religious and moral elements, while in English it is virtually synonymous with racism. The divergent racist meaning in English has resulted from historical events in 20th-century Europe. The more ancient Indo-Persian usage is more sophisticated and continues to be used in literature and discussions without reference to genetics or racism. In modern Indian Hindi linguistic usage, for instance, there is a distinction between Ary and Arya, which is obscured when the terms are transliterated and rendered in English as “Aryan.”

In the Indo-Persian linguistic script and usage, Ary without the a is a self-referential term used to distinguish between the local community and the others without reference to genetics. The antonym Anaryan or Unaryan is used to refer to the “others,” or those who are not members of the reference group. An Aryan in this sense is one with membership in the local geographical and sociological group with social responsibilities. In this geographical sense, Aryan has been in continuous use since about 3000 BCE.

Additionally in Hindi, Ary without the a has a moral or class significance. It is a masculine adjective meaning respectable, from a good family, noble, or honorable; that is, an Aryan is a morally honorable person or someone of noble family. The honorific Aryaputr used by a wife addressing her husband means literally a “son” (putr) of a noble (ary) or “Honorable One.” The feminine noun Arya refers either to the goddess Parvati or to one’s mother-in-law or grandmother, and an Aryan is a devotee of Parvati or a female relative. Also, Aryavarth in Hindi is a masculine noun referring to the geographic region in northern India between the Himalayas and the Vindhya mountains.

An example of current usage in Hindi and its rendering into English script may be seen in the organization known as the Arya Samaj. Founded in 1875 in Mumbai, India, by Maharishi Dayanand Saraswati, before and unrelated to the Nazi party, the Samaj uses Arya in English, while in Hindi it does not include the a ending. The descriptive Ary aspect of the name may be noted in the members’ principles, which draw on teachings of the Vedas to make the world inclusive of all races noble. This requires spiritual, moral, and ethical inclusionary conduct seeking the good of all. As there are religious features to the Vedas, being Aryan in this context has religious significance, which is contrary to racism.

In modern English, the usage of “Aryan” by itself, as distinct from Ary or Arya, gained prominence when it was appropriated with other symbols and used by Adolf Hitler after 1920 in the Nazi agenda of “racial hygiene” and eugenics. The trauma from this has been profound, and the experience includes the Holocaust, which conditions the meaning of the word. Consequently, in English, racism and Aryan are now inseparable.

However, circumstances do change. The emerging global profile of persons accustomed to ancient Indo-Persian religious traditions and organizations such as the Arya Samaj may help contextualize the Nazi racist usage as aberrant and a distortion contrived for purposes antithetical to the good of humanity.

ASAHARA, SHÔKÔ (B. 1955)

Shôkô Asahara is the founder of the Japanese movement Aum Shinrikyô, responsible for the use of chemical weapons on the Tokyo subway in 1995. He is significant also as an example of a prophetic millennial religious leader whose visions gave rise to apocalyptic teachings and to mass violence committed by his disciples.

Partially blind at birth, Asahara was sent to a boarding school for the blind while young, an alienating experience that influenced his later estrangement from his family. After his applications to university were rejected (possibly due to his blindness), he turned to alternative medicine. In 1977, he moved to Tokyo, married, raised six children, and engaged in alternative healing practices. He was arraigned in 1982 for selling fake remedies. He later joined the new religion Agonshû, engaging in austerities (ascetic practices), before, in 1984, forming a yoga and meditation group, which later became Aum Shinrikyô. In 1986, Asahara underwent austerities in India and claimed that he achieved enlightenment there. Emphasizing asceticism as the key to enlightenment, he proclaimed himself the supreme spiritual teacher of the age with a mission to save the world from apocalypse, renew it spiritually, and inaugurate a new postmillennial civilization. In Asahara's view, the world was polarized between good and evil, with Aum fighting a cosmic war for truth.

According to his disciples, Asahara was a skillful and compassionate but demanding teacher, who forced them, sometimes violently, to perform austerities in order to save themselves. He attracted opposition from dissident ex-disciples, the families of converts, and neighbors of Aum's communes, whom he often treated with disdain and who portrayed him as a manipulative megalomaniac. Such opposition, coupled with the failure of Asahara's grandiose plans to spread his movement globally, caused his visions of world salvation to turn into visions of world destruction. Claiming that enemies were conspiring to destroy Aum and to stop him from saving the world, his paranoia grew when the political party he established to promote Aum failed catastrophically in the 1990 Japanese parliamentary elections, causing the media to publicly ridicule him. By now, Asahara's insistence on enforced austerities had led to violence against disciples who demurred, the accidental death of a disciple, and the spread of violence within and subsequently outside the movement. Asahara's increasing obsession with apocalypse and conspiracies against Aum further promoted such violence as he argued that Aum had to fight and kill its enemies in order to achieve its sacred mission. Ultimately, Asahara ordered his disciples to make sarin nerve gas and use it on March 20, 1995, in Tokyo—a deed that brought about Asahara's arrest, along with senior disciples, on murder and conspiracy charges. He was found guilty and sentenced to death in 2004.

ASCETICISM

Asceticism, from the Greek word askeo (“to exercise”), involves disciplining the body for spiritual purposes. Most global religions include a variety of ascetic practices, such as fasting, chastity, social isolation or withdrawal, sleep deprivation, and other forms of bodily control or even torture. In some religions such as Buddhism, Hinduism, and non-Protestant Christianity, distinct categories of people known as ascetics have frequently played prominent roles. In other religious traditions such as Judaism their roles have been more circumscribed. Influential ascetic groups are usually given titles specific to their tradition, including monks (in Christianity); sufis or fakirs (in Islam); sadhus, ṣaṇyāsins, or babas (in Hinduism); and bhikṣus (in Buddhism). However, even when ascetic groups do not figure prominently in a religion, ascetic practices are often a part of the common spiritual practices of the individual—for example, fasting on Yom Kippur in Judaism or self-flagellation during the Shi’a Muslim festival of Ashura. As a field of academic inquiry, cross-cultural asceticism has often suffered from a sort of ex post facto intellectual history—ascetic examples were corralled into an “ism” before asceticism itself was subjected to scrutiny. The result has been a long, sometimes frustrating, attempt to develop a framework that adequately defines asceticism generally while also accounting for the culturally specific contexts of global religions.

During the century following the 1880s, when the academic reflection on asceticism began, asceticism was seen as a deliberate rejection or repulsion of “natural” desires for food, sex, and social intercourse, and thus a morbid denial of life. Most of these Protestant-influenced theologians and historians looked on ascetics of all traditions with suspicion, if not contempt, as misguided Christians, exoticized easterners, or superstitious savages, who were all willfully alien from “true” religion.

For psychologists of this early period, asceticism was seen as a pathological neurosis, a sign of an unhealthy and masochistic mind. In 1938, Karl Menninger argued that asceticism is nothing more than a form of slow suicide. Not all psychologists saw asceticism as inherently destructive, however. Sigmund Freud and his daughter Anna identified an ascetic phase through which all humans pass, in which they deny themselves as a way to internalize paternal and cultural norms. This view of asceticism as a universal and necessary stage in individual development eventually led to Geoffrey Harpham’s more recent 1987 argument that asceticism acts as a sort of underlying operating system through which different cultural programs and norms are inscribed on individuals. Thus, some believe that asceticism plays a positive and indeed critical constructive function in the formation of every cultural system across time and place.

Philosophers such as Arthur Schopenhauer and Frederick Nietzsche also recognized a value of asceticism, which they saw as a natural (if weak) response to a candid assessment of a world marked by misery and suffering. However, they believed that the triumph of humanity required the rejection or at least restriction of asceticism.

The theoretical focus on the negating aspect of asceticism dominated speculation on asceticism until the work of Margaret Miles and Michel Foucault in the early 1980s. While coming from vastly different perspectives, these two authors dramatically shifted the discussion of asceticism away from its negating principles by highlighting the positive construction of a new “self” through asceticism. This “subjectivity” platform emphasized the transformative process of asceticism—the way in which the negation of the existent self was matched by a simultaneous positive movement that constructed a new higher self in its place. For example, the monk is not just rejecting his prior self but actively seeking to become a saint. Thus understood, asceticism was not solely a negative process of self-denial but a largely positive vehicle of self-transformation.

This new paradigm led to fresh questions that scholars addressed throughout the 1990s. What are the political and power dimensions of these transformations historically? Who gains when certain ascetic groups ascend in social or political status? Why do ascetics arise when they do and where they do? How does this ascetic transformation occur psychologically in the individual? Can asceticism be seen as a social-psychological model of compensations in which ascetics give up certain things (status, pleasure, livelihood, etc.) to gain other things (salvation, freedom, powers, etc.)? Furthermore, this subjectivity schema provided a tradition-neutral tool for analyzing asceticism cross-culturally.

The first—and to date only—book on comparative ascetics across religious traditions is Oscar Hardman's 1924 monograph, The Ideals of Asceticism: An Essay in the Comparative Study of Religion. Hardman organized ascetic traditions by their overall motivation. He identified three categories: (1) the mystical ideal, in which ascetic acts are seen as vehicles for fellowship with the divine; (2) the disciplinary ideal, in which the aim is to obtain righteousness before God; and (3) the sacrificial ideal, in which the ascetic seeks atonement for wrong action. Hardman's legacy lies in his attempt to discern global patterns between the ascetic's internal motivation and external action.

The scholarly approach of aligning motivations and behaviors is not without problems, because the same external behavior may be motivated by different intentions. Fasting, for example, may be motivated by a desire to punish the body, heal the body, or gain control over bodily passions. Also, when scholars have focused on presumed internal motivation, they have discovered different external behaviors that have been employed, even within the same tradition. Rejection of social customs, for example, may be achieved by shaving one's head, growing one's hair long, or a variety of other behaviors having nothing to do with hair. Accepted behavioral signs depend highly on culture. Scholars inevitably have tended to privilege either external behavior or internal motivation, leading to definitions that are either so expansive as to encompass any behavior related to a goal or so restrictive as to limit asceticism to a list of particular, largely Western, behaviors.

The subjectivity platform provides new fertile ground for the development of a truly cross-cultural platform for the study of asceticism. In the first contemporary study to take into account the subjectivity platform in a global field, Richard Valantasis identified five patterns or types of ascetic transformations:

1. The combative model, in which the ascetic approaches the destruction of the former self in terms of continual warfare
2. The integrative model, in which the ascetic emphasizes a deepening and maturing of the dominant cultural ideal rather than a rejection of it
3. The educative model, in which the ascetic submits to a master so as to absorb his wisdom, powers, and abilities
4. The pilgrim model, in which the new subjectivity is engendered through the acquisition of numerous experiences in multiple encounters with holy people and places
5. The revelatory model, in which ascetic activity "prepares" the subject for some form of revelation or enlightenment

Each of these five examples represents a model for a type of "ascetic" change that can be seen across global religions.

As a growing body of scholars recognize, new approaches must take into account the radically social character of ascetic transformations. Asceticism is by nature a contextual phenomenon that is determined only in relationship to the norms of culture and thus cannot be understood apart from social context. Behavior that is ascetic in one time and place is not necessarily ascetic in a different context. Walking without shoes may be normal on a Tahitian island; the same behavior in a Tibetan winter would be ascetic. Recognizing an activity as "ascetic" depends not on the activity itself but on its relationship to cultural and contextual norms. This is particularly evident in the ascetic act par excellence—withdrawal from the world. While many have seen withdrawal as the quintessential individual act, one easily forgets that it gains its meaning only from being in relationship to a group. Without the community from which the ascetic removes himself or herself, the act of withdrawal is incoherent.

Furthermore, identifying something or someone as ascetic is a designation made by others within defined social and power structures. There are no “natural” ascetics. The ascetic label arises through the same social mechanisms as other social categories in society, such as a widow or the insane: They are defined by others due to a single attribute, in this case the transformation of the self through the use and abuse of the body relative to the norms of society. Asceticism is thus inherently externalizing and performative. Poverty, emaciation, flagellation, and chastity can always be seen and witnessed, unlike other spiritual elements such as mystical union or spiritual enlightenment. Ascetic acts may be hidden but can never be “de-corporalized,” regardless of the purpose. The relationship to others plays a critical role in the cross-cultural analysis of asceticism.

As ever-present elements of human existence, the physical body and the spiritual life inevitably intertwine. The task of the religious studies scholar is to understand this complex relationship across religious traditions. As religious practitioners have often argued, however, academics may debate the purpose and forms of asceticism, but, in the midst of an extended fast, ascetics rarely do.

ASHKANAZ

Ashkanaz, or Ashkenazi Jews, are a segment of the Jewish people descended from central and eastern Europe. As an ethnic group, they constitute the largest segment of the Jewish population in the world today, with estimates varying between 8 and 11 million people, or about 80% of the global Jewish population. Now living throughout the Jewish Diaspora as well as in Israel, they developed into a distinct group in western Germany and northeastern France, near the banks of the Rhine River, in the eighth and ninth centuries. Literally meaning “German Jews,” the term Ashkanaz comes from the old Hebrew word for Germany.

Together with Sephardic and Mizrahi Jews (who are usually grouped together demographically), Ashkenazi Jews make up nearly the entire population of Jews in the world. There are many cultural differences between the two subgroups—the result of centuries of geographical separation due to the different regions the Jewish Diaspora settled in. For centuries after Roman exile, Sephardic Jews lived primarily on the Iberian Peninsula and migrated to North Africa and the Ottoman Empire. Ashkenazi Jews, on the other hand, lived throughout central and eastern Europe after many moved on from Germany and France, settling in modern-day countries such as Poland, Lithuania, Hungary, The Netherlands, Ukraine, Latvia, Romania, and Russia. One key difference between the Ashkenazi and Sephardic Jews that led to their divergent cultures is that the Ashkenazi lived primarily under a Christian majority, while the Sephardic lived under Muslim rulers.

Early in its history, beginning in the ninth century, Ashkenazi Judaism was centered along the Rhineland and northeastern France. These Jews benefited from strong trading connections with the Mediterranean, and many worked as artisans and craftsmen. In towns and cities such as Worms and Mainz in Germany, and Troyes and Sens in France, they generally lived independently from the Christian majority, organizing themselves under an elected board. They also had their own judicial courts, which they based on the Halakha, or Jewish religious law. Focusing heavily on biblical and Talmudic studies, they built many centers of religious scholarship in their towns. Jews in Europe at this time also adhered more closely to the teachings of the rabbis encoded in the Talmud, rather than directly to biblical law. One major scholarly figure who emerged out of this early Ashkenazic period was Rashi (Rabbi Shlomo Itzhaqi, 1040–1105), born in Troyes. His commentary on the Bible and the Talmud is considered an integral part of Yeshiva study to this day.

In the 15th century, many Ashkenazi Jews began to migrate out of the Rhineland after being expelled from France in 1182 (and then again in 1394) and facing anti-Semitism in Germany. They began settling in other parts of Europe, with most moving eastward into parts of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Lithuania, and as far as Russia. They carried with them the same Jewish traditions that they had developed throughout their time in the Rhineland, and they continued to focus their studies on the Torah. Many of these Jews in eastern Europe lived in shtetles, the Yiddish word for a small town where a majority of the population consisted of Jews. Prohibited from working in certain professions, a large number of them worked as financiers and moneylenders to the majority Christian population, as Christians were not allowed to charge interest on loans among themselves. The Jewish community in Poland grew to become the largest Jewish population in the world, beginning in the 16th century, and would remain so until the Holocaust in the 1930s and 1940s. Prominent Jewish scholars from eastern Europe around this time included Rema (Rabbi Moshe Isserlis, 1520–1572), born in Cracow, Poland, and known for his fundamental work of Halakha titled HaMapa, and Baal Shem Tov (Rabbi Israel Ben Eliezer, 1698–1760), born in Okopy, Poland, and the founder of Hasidic Judaism. Outside the realm of religious study, the composer Felix Mendelssohn (1809–1847), the writer Franz Kafka (1883–1924), the psychologist Sigmund Freud (1856–1939), and the physicist Albert Einstein (1879–1955) were all Ashkenazi Jews who contributed greatly to the advancement of society.

The distinctive Ashkenazi culture has always been a point of discrepancy between Ashkenazi Jews and their Christian neighbors, and even Sephardic Jews. Yiddish was, for centuries, the language spoken almost exclusively among the Jews of Europe. Literally meaning “Jewish” in its own language, Yiddish is basically a combination of German and Hebrew with some Slavic influences. It was first spoken among the Ashkenazi when they lived in the Rhineland, and it followed them as they moved eastward and eventually around the world. It took a major hit in total number of speakers, however, with the destruction of European Jewry during the Holocaust.

Some distinctive Ashkenazi foods that originated from Europe include cold borsht, gefilte fish, and kneidlach (“matzo ball”) soup. Additionally, klezmer music, a genre that relies heavily on violins, accordions, and clarinets, and contains mostly Yiddish lyrics, is closely identified with the Ashkenazi Jews of eastern Europe. There are also practical religious differences between Ashkenazi Jews and Jews of other ethnicities, most notably Sephardic Jews. The two groups have differing melodies for most prayer songs sung in synagogues and also pronounce many liturgical words differently. This does not present a problem, however, since, throughout the world, the two groups usually pray in their own synagogues. Another practical difference is that during Ashkenazi prayer services, the Torah scroll is laid flat when read, while in Sephardic synagogues, the scroll is tilted. Yet another difference that exists today is that during the Passover, when Jews are forbidden to eat bread and grains, Sephardic Jews eat rice, while Ashkenazi Jews do not.

Although eastern Europe contained the highest number of Ashkenazi Jews until the Holocaust and World War II, many had already begun to move to other parts of the world as early as the 17th century. The Chmielnicki massacres in Poland in 1648 forced many Jews to move back westward to England, France, and The Netherlands. Many Ashkenazi Jews had already crossed the Atlantic and moved to the American colonies by 1750, where they made up the majority of the 2,500 Jews living there. Ashkenazi Jews were also moving to Australia, South Africa, and other parts of North America, largely as a result of persecution in Russia. By the end of the 19th century, Ashkenazi Jews outnumbered Sephardic Jews everywhere in the world except Italy, the Muslim countries, and some other parts of Asia. Nevertheless, although they had moved to all corners of the world, the stronghold of the Ashkenazi Jewry would continue to be in Europe until the Holocaust.

Ashkenazi Jews today make up approximately 10 million of the 13 million Jews worldwide. They had made up about 92% of world Jewry in 1931, but their figures sharply declined due to the Holocaust, which cost the lives of 6 million Jews in Europe, or about two thirds of their population. They are the largest group of Jews in the United States at 85% of 7 million, and they make up about half the population of Jews in Israel today. They were among the first Jews to resettle Palestine as part of the Zionist movement at the beginning of the 20th century, and they have dominated the politics of Israel since the establishment of the state in 1948. A major development in Ashkenazi Jewry has been the migration of Jews from Russia and the former Soviet Union. In 1989, the Jewish population in Russia (made up almost entirely of Ashkenazi Jews) was about 1.45 million. The 1990s saw mass migration of Jews from Russia to other countries, with more than half moving to Israel; today, they constitute the largest foreign-born population of Jews in Israel. The United States, Germany, and Canada have also seen a large number of Russian Jews immigrating to their respective countries.

Recently, Ashkenazi Jews have been the subject of genetic and DNA research as a result of their high degree of genetic homogeneity. Researchers have discovered that nearly all of the Ashkenazi Jews in the world are descendants of a relatively small group of people living in Europe more than 1,000 years ago. This is a prime example of a phenomenon known as the founder effect, whereby a population's genes can be traced back to a few "founders" whose genes have been passed down through generations of very limited reproduction with other communities. New evidence from mitochondrial DNA, however, has found that as few as four women who lived in the Middle East between 2,000 and 3,000 years ago could be the ancestors of 40% of Ashkenazi Jews in the world today. This maternal linkage corroborates the existing belief that the Ashkenazi Jews came from the Middle East to the Rhineland through modern-day Italy after the destruction of the Second Temple by the Roman Empire in the year 70 CE. A negative effect of this genetic homogeneity has been the prevalence of certain genetic disorders among Ashkenazi Jews. Tay-Sachs disease, Canavan disease, familial dysautonomia, and Gaucher disease are just a few of the hereditary disorders that affect Ashkenazi Jews between 20 and 100 times more frequently than other segments of the world population, including even Sephardic Jews. Tay-Sachs disease, in particular, has been identified since its discovery in the late 1800s as a genetic disease linked to Ashkenazi Jews. It has been traced back to a small group of Jews living in eastern Europe during the 17th century.

ASOKA (R. 273–226 BCE)

Asoka was a great emperor of ancient India who had both Hindu and Buddhist sensibilities and left an indelible imprint on ancient world civilization. His policy of dharma (Sanskrit) or dhamma (Prakrit) was not religion in its traditional sense. It connoted a righteous path and piety. The son of the Mauryan emperor Bindusara (r. 298–273 BCE) and Queen Subhadrangi, Asoka embraced Buddhism after the famous Kalinga War of 261 BCE. A transformation took place, and he became Dharmasoka (“Righteous Asoka”) from Chandasoka (“Cruel Asoka”). The wanton destruction and casualties of the war moved the Emperor. He eschewed digvijaya (“victory by war”) for dhamma vijaya (“moral conquest”). His path of self-righteousness based on moral and ethical principles was in conformity with Indian religions. Albeit inspired by Buddhism to a considerable extent, it charted a new direction of lofty idealism.

As a patron of Buddhism, Asoka changed the course of history not only in the Indian subcontinent but also in the Far East and in Southeast Asia. Buddhist missionaries were dispatched all over to propagate the ideals of dhamma. Two of them, Sona and Uttara, were sent to Burma (Myanmar). The brother and sister team of Mahinda and Samghamitta went to Ceylon (Sri Lanka). In his domain, the Emperor granted religious endowments, built viharas (“monasteries”), constructed 84,000 stupas (“reliquary mounds”), and erected commemorative pillars for the propagation of Buddhism. Asoka as a patron of Buddhism constructed some of the finest Buddhist monuments in the subcontinent. The monolithic stone columns were architectural wonders. The Sanchi Stupa of Bhopal has remained a place of tourist attraction. The Rock Edict of Asoka, found in India, Pakistan, and Afghanistan, was another vehicle for circulating Asoka’s dhamma. The dhammahammattas (“officers of righteousness”) were appointed to propagate the dhamma. The Third Buddhist Council was convened in 251 BCE to prevent schism within Buddhism. It was decided to compile the Saddhammasamgaha (“true Buddhist doctrine”).

Asoka was concerned with the material and moral welfare of his subjects. He also set a high ideal for himself. Here was an emperor who proclaimed, “All men are my children.” Donning the title of Devanampiya Piyadasi (“Beloved of Gods, one looking to please”), Asoka preached ethical principles governing the individual in society. He emphasized respect toward parents, preceptors, Brahmans, monks, friends, the poor, and so on. Honesty, truthfulness, liberalism, compassion, and so on were the cardinal principles governing the life of a person. An individual was advised to give up cruelty, anger, pride, and jealousy. Asoka advocated ahimsa (nonviolence), stressing the sanctity of life.

Although a Buddhist, the Emperor was very liberal in outlook. He did not oppose orthodox Brahmanism. Religious tolerance was his motto. He initiated the policy of dhamma with the precise motive of unifying political units and people professing different faiths. The position of Asoka was consolidated, and his dhamma became a cementing force for the centralized empire. But these motives did not take away the credit due to the Emperor, who was very much interested in the moral uplifting of people and the general good of the society.

ASSIMILATION

In the context of globalization—the global movement of religious systems, organizations, and people—assimilation refers to a mode of religious settlement in which the “arriving” group becomes over time indistinguishable from the “receiving” or “host” community or society. “They” become sufficiently like “us” so that “we” no longer sense that “they” are alien, different, strange, or otherwise “other.” They change enough for us to accept them as “one of us.” It is also assumed that the assimilation process will leave the “host” society intact and unchanged. “We” have no need to change and in fact do not. Assimilation has been and still is the declared immigration policy of some nations and is proclaimed as the desirable settlement outcome by some in many nations. This entry first presents three case studies and then discusses religious settlement and other challenges to assimilation.

Case Studies

Three case studies drawn from Australia, one of the world’s most religiously diverse and self-consciously multicultural societies, will help draw out the issues raised in considering the concept of assimilation.

The first case involves Dutch and German migrants to Australia, who are said to be models of assimilation. They arrived in substantial numbers immediately following World War II. They came, shed most of their European ways, learned English, worked hard, bought homes in ethnically mixed suburbs, and for all intents and purposes “disappeared” into the larger society. Schmidt and Smit became Smith as many anglicized their names. The fact that a few shops, such as the Hollandse Winkel, catered to the peculiar tastes of these migrants was seen as part of fitting in alongside those that sold English and Scottish goods. While some found it necessary to establish a different form of Christianity than was previously available in Australia—the Reformed Churches of Australia and the German Evangelical Lutheran Church are examples—most joined the already existing churches. Dutch Reformed became Presbyterians, staying within a Calvinist theological frame but shifting to a British variety of it. While the arriving Catholics largely went to Australian Catholic parishes, there were complaints that the Catholic Church was too Irish. The children of these migrants entered the larger mate selection pool and had comparatively low rates of in-marriage. The Dutch and Germans assimilated within one generation, sufficiently enough to become essentially invisible by the end of the 1960s. During this time, Australia and Australians did little to accommodate these migrants, being neither much affected by them nor adopting much from them.

Not so for the Italians and Greeks who followed the Dutch and Germans in the migrations of the 1960s and 1970s. The cultural differences were greater. There were differences in language, dress, cuisine, physical appearance, and religion. There were also significantly more of these groups than of the Germans and the Dutch. Rather than refugees from war-torn Europe, these groups became the leading edge of migration brought to Australia to supply unskilled factory labor and tended to be of working-class and agrarian origins. They painted their houses different colors, planted different gardens, insisted on good coffee, and provided a very different cuisine. They stood out on the streets and in the school yards and established increasing numbers of shopping areas catering to their tastes and religious requirements. They also opened large numbers of restaurants that not only served their tastes but radically transformed Australia’s dining-out expectations. The Italians substantially swelled the ranks of the Catholic Church over time along with other migrant groups, making it more numerous than the previously dominant Anglican Church. Greeks greatly expanded the numbers of Orthodox Christians in Australia and made Melbourne the third largest Greek city in the world. While still being distinctive, Australians of Greek and Italian origin are no longer seen as foreign, and life in Australia is inconceivable without their flavors in the mix of things Australian. But have they (been) assimilated? Neither they nor the “host” society have been unchanged in the process. With 24% of Australians born overseas and 50% having at least one parent born overseas and coming from hundreds of countries, Australia now sees itself as having many cultures within the one society and has little occupational, residential, or other clumping of migrant groups. The Italians and Greeks had the leading edge in those changes that transformed Australia from a British Protestant society to one that is both multicultural and religiously diverse.

Arriving later in the 1960s and 1970s were migrants from Turkey and Lebanon. These Turks and Lebanese formed the core of a growing range of Muslim communities in Australia drawn from more than 65 different countries. They too “stood out.” While both of these groups were “Mediterranean” and in many ways similar to the Greeks and Italians, their religious differences were greater. Like other migrants they, over time, have built community centers, mosques, and schools suited to their needs, along with shopping centers and restaurants offering halal food. The Turks and Lebanese were well on their way to full acceptance in Australia before the events of September 11, 2001. Indeed, the greater migration concern in the 1990s related to the question of whether “Asians” could be integrated into Australian society following the reception of the Vietnamese “Boat People,” Chinese students following Tiananmen Square, and rising migration from other parts of Asia. Since 9/11 an anti-Islamic and anti-Muslim discourse emerged that has set back the integration of Muslims. While cultural acceptance is not as complete as for Greeks and Italians, the economic dependence on Muslims and other groups, along with the steady movement into all aspects of Australian society of persons from Muslim backgrounds, makes the stridency of the claims that Australia cannot cope with Muslims an ideological concern rather than a practical one. Australia has shifted to accommodate Muslim migrants. Islamic schools take their place alongside other faith-based schools—Jewish, Anglican, Presbyterian, “Christian,” and many others—all funded by government grants. Muslims may bury their dead according to their religious requirements. Muslims sit with others representing the diversity of religions in Australia on boards of reference and policy groups advising governments at all levels. Many employers make provision for prayer times and dress codes. On the other hand, Australian Muslims lead the global discourse on how to be a Muslim in a Muslim-minority society. Both the “host” society and those arriving change in the process of religious settlement.

Religious Settlement

These cases can be described as examples of religious settlement, the process by which a religion moves from one place to another and becomes a part of the new place. The movement of religions may take the form of the migration of people who take with them their religion, or it can be the result of the expansion of empires that carried a religion with them or the result of missionary work. Until a few decades ago, most Buddhists in Australia were converts attracted to Buddhism by itinerant monks and others. Recent migration from Southeast Asia has swelled the ranks of Buddhists to nearly 3% of the population of Australia and they are now predominantly foreign-born or of parents born overseas. There seems to be no undue concern among Australians regarding the assimilation of Buddhists. Missionary work has also brought Scientology, Brahma Kumaris, Sūkyō Mahikari, and a host of other new religious movements. The assimilation of these groups has concerned some societies more than others.

In the processes of religious settlement, both the religious group and the host society change. The religious group learns how to operate and meet its needs in the new society. In doing so, it may adopt new forms of organization to relate to the larger society, which may expect different styles of organization than are prevalent in the countries of origin. As they settle, religious groups pick up local color and orientations, relate to local issues, and help their people settle. At the very least, the receiving society changes its perception to being self-aware of including a wider diversity than before. Often the changes in the host society are greater, including a wider diversity of cuisine, of color in celebrations, and of languages heard in the street and seen on signs, and greater attention paid to cultural and linguistic issues in service provision. Germany claims to want to assimilate Turkish Muslim migrants, but most fast-food outlets in Germany now are kebab shops and mosques are increasingly purpose-built buildings of architectural note. Both the cuisine and the visual landscape have changed.

Challenges to Assimilation

These case studies make clear that there are dimensions and degrees of difference that present various challenges to assimilation. Not all difference is unassimilable, nor are all differences equally easy to assimilate. Essentially, the issue boils down to what is made of a particular difference in a particular society or group. A difference not noticed and not treated as important is neither assimilated nor unassimilated; for all intents and purposes, it does not exist. For example, while much has been made of skin color, little is made of hair or eye color, or height. The complexities associated with several dimensions of difference will be considered—religion, color, and dress.

At this time, much is being made about the difficulties of assimilating or incorporating Muslims. One does not hear questions about other groups, such as Buddhists. What makes a religion more or less assimilable? The answer lies in the nature of the reaction of the host society to the “new” religion. What shapes such reactions? What differences can be made the subject of a “reaction” by those who would seek to benefit from the marginalization or exclusion of a religion? Acts of terrorism associated with a religion can certainly lead to negative discourse about that religion. However, somehow the Hindus have kept the violence perpetrated by Hindu nationalists from poisoning their global image, as have Buddhists, who have been largely untainted by the violence committed by Buddhist nationalists in Sri Lanka and the Buddhist military regime in Myanmar.

The example of the anti-Muslim discourse is instructive in examining the role of religious beliefs in determining the assimilability of a group. Some policy makers and researchers make much of the degree of values similarity in assimilation or integration processes. However, as noted above, there is little values disparity between social groups. They all want the same things—education, health, employment and dignity. However, some religious groups are thought to hold beliefs that would be difficult or impossible to assimilate. If I believe you intend to take over my society and change it in ways I do not like, I may be more resistant to your presence than if I believed that you simply wanted to make your way alongside others. However, in this case, the issue is less what the group in fact believes and how they seek to realize their beliefs than the host community’s beliefs about the beliefs of the group in question. It is not so much what Muslims believe but what I believe they believe. In these ways, religious beliefs—the beliefs actually held by a religious group or, more important, those imputed to it—may shape the degree to which it is assimilable.

Groups that are visibly distinct pose a greater challenge to assimilation. Skin color is hard not to notice and has been made much of in different ways in most parts of the world. Greeks and Italians were “olive skinned” as well as not being of the dominant British Protestant brands of Christianity. The management of color shaped many policies in the British Empire. For example, Australia at its foundation as a single nation in 1901 passed legislation establishing the “White Australia Policy,” which declared that only Whites were acceptable as migrants. This was done in the face of the history of open migration the gold rushes had brought in the mid-19th century. After 50 years of strict enforcement, the policy was undone through a series of executive decisions regarding the acceptability of first Italians, then Greeks, and then Turks and Egyptians. By the 1970s, it had become an embarrassment and was officially rescinded.

Distinctive clothing also is hard not to notice. Some clothing is worn out of adherence to religious norms and expectations. Such clothing has the secondary effect of declaring one’s religious identity. Except for the special clothes of religious professionals—clerical collars, turbans, and other insignia—such clothing is not primarily worn to display identity. The hijab is primarily worn to cover, for the sake of modesty. The kipa is worn out of respect for the One above all. Reactions to distinctive clothing can indicate a negative appreciation of religious difference, or they can be a response to the degree of commitment to religion the person is showing; either or both may violate norms of the host society about difference or about acceptable levels of piety.

Arriving religious groups may also bring with them dietary norms—halal, kosher, vegetarian, no beef—as well as a different set of holy days and marital and funeral practices. Accommodating these religious and cultural needs of migrants has occasioned both highly creative responses and strong resistance. Part of the resistance arises from those who feel the dominance of their group passing as others are given space and resource within their once (supposedly) monocultural society.

In each of these examples of difference, it becomes clear that the operative element in assimilating or integrating new groups is not found in the difference itself but in what the host society makes of the difference. The arriving group is virtually passive. Rather, some features are highlighted and defined as problematic by elements of the receiving society.

These cases also point up the great fallacy of the ambitions of assimilationist policies—the assumption that the receiving society will not change. Settler societies that have received a high rate of migration are changing to see themselves as multicultural and religiously diverse rather than as monocultural colonial outposts of some empire. Some of the antipathy to migrants is a displaced hostility to social changes that are happening, changes that in themselves may have nothing to do with migration or migrants. Societies are living entities that are constantly changing and developing. The incorporation of groups with different backgrounds and cultures feeds into this process, but it proceeds in different ways in each society. Take sport for an example; does the fact that foreign students in the quadrangle outside my office are playing cricket mean that they have assimilated to Australia? Probably not. They are from India, Pakistan, and other parts of the former British Empire where cricket is even more popular than here. They might even play a critical role in keeping cricket alive in Australia. The fact that soccer is slowly displacing Australian rules football—our very own version of the sport—and giving rugby a run for its money does suggest that migrants who are more likely to play and promote soccer are changing Australian society. Cricket, like its cultural cousin British Protestantism, is on the wane, not because of migration but due to the decline of the empire with which they are both associated.

While some see assimilation as essential to social cohesion, it is not at all clear that social cohesion is best produced by cultural singularity. Disparaging the cultures and ways of minority groups produces discontent, division, and anger. The incorporation of differences—accepting people as they are and providing access to education, social services, and health—produces high levels of commitment to the welcoming country. Again, assimilation is seen to be not so much a well-thought-out and evidence-based social policy as the product of a monocultural ideology.

The sociocultural context makes a great difference in the perceptions and ambitions of those who promote assimilation as a social policy to promote social cohesion. For example, assimilation means very different things in settler versus nonsettler societies. Settler societies, such as

Australia, have high proportions of people who were born elsewhere (more than 25% in Australia) or who have at least one parent born elsewhere (more than 50%). What does it mean to assimilate into a multicultural society? European societies have much lower proportions of foreign-born people and can sustain the myth of a long-standing cultural integrity that if not unchanged is at least associated with people in a particular place for centuries.

While the numbers migrating to a society is a critical factor in the assimilability of a group, it being easier to assimilate or at least ignore small groups, the official policies of governments make a considerable difference to “assimilation.” For example, Muslims make up the same proportion of the populations of Australia and Germany. While Germany has insisted on assimilation, and was largely unwelcoming of Muslim migrants, Australia offered full citizenship, social security, and health benefits, as well as full participation from the start, and its policies of inclusion have produced a very different context for intergroup relations. Pro-migration policies coupled with strong leadership at all levels of a society, but particularly from the top, facilitate the integration of migrant groups. As has been seen in parts of Europe, strong negative leadership at the top can undo pro-migration policies and programs.

Assimilation represents less a workable policy program than an ideological reaction to social and cultural change. It is an impossible dream in an age of the global movement of people, cultures, and capital.

ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST

The Holy Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East is a Christian communion that is a religious minority presence found worldwide. Originally located primarily in what is modern-day Iraq, Iran, Jordan, Syria, and Lebanon, the Assyrian Church currently has ecclesiastical jurisdictions throughout the world, with an estimated 400,000 adherents. Its own distinct identity dates to 424 CE, when Persian bishops decided in council to reject the theological and disciplinary authority of the Byzantine bishops. Although the Assyrian Church is often referred to as the "Nestorian Church," this is due to the mistaken notion that it arose as a result of the Council of Ephesus in 431, which condemned the Christology of Nestorius, the archbishop of Constantinople. The "Persian Church," as it is sometimes called, did give refuge to Nestorius and highly regards the theology of his mentor, Theodore of Mopsuestia. However, the use of the term Nestorian for the Assyrian Church is considered inaccurate and pejorative, as it has been historically used to marginalize the Assyrian Church as heretical.

Like the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches, the Assyrian Church of the East is an ancient Christian church that traces its origins to the earliest days of Christianity, to Jesus and his apostles. It adheres to the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed; practices liturgical worship; follows a developed ecclesiastical calendar; is governed by bishops, priests, and deacons; and holds a high view of sacraments. Distinctive characteristics of the Assyrian Church include its use of the Syriac language and the Liturgy of Saints Mari and Addai. The Assyrian Church also practices active ecumenical dialogue with Eastern Orthodox Christians and Roman Catholics. It issued a joint Christological statement with Pope John Paul II in 1994, and Isaac of Nineveh, an Assyrian bishop of the seventh century, is venerated as a saint by the Eastern Orthodox Church as a result of his profound impact on Orthodox monasticism.

The Assyrian Church of the East has engaged in significant missionary activity during its history, reaching India, China, Mongolia, Korea, and Japan. The Assyrian Church is likely the earliest Christian presence in China, as demonstrated by the "Nestorian stele," a stone monument in the Xi'an province that dates to 781 and confirms that the church was officially recognized by the Tang Dynasty in 635. Its recent spread throughout the globe, however, is largely the result of 20th-century emigration from the Middle East to Europe, North America, and Australia. As a result of persecution in Iraq, the Assyrian Church moved its headquarters to the United States and is currently based in Chicago. In 1964, the church suffered a schism, which led to the formation of the rival "Ancient Church of the East."

ASTRONOMY

The modern science of astronomy has its roots in the earliest civilizations of Mesopotamia, Egypt, Greece, China, India, and Mesoamerica, where it interacted with religious traditions. Ancient astronomy was concerned primarily with the positions and motions of visible celestial bodies, whereas modern astronomy studies all bodies and matter in the universe, including also their compositions, histories, and destinies. In ancient societies, astronomical calculations were fundamental to the development of both calendars and astrology—the science and art of finding in the movements of heavenly bodies either predictions of, or causes for, human behavior and natural events on earth. However, the distinction of astronomy as a science and astrology as a divinatory practice is a modern one, as it is predicated on modern ideas of what constitutes scientific thought. In Christianity and Judaism, advances in modern astronomy, alongside those in geology and biology, have created new hermeneutical stresses on the interpretation of the creation stories and motifs found in the Hebrew and Christian Bibles. These stresses have been most keenly felt in post-Reformation Protestantism, with its focus on the Bible as the sole authority for salvation.

Astronomers in the medieval Islamic world improved on the Greek astronomer Ptolemy's geocentric model of the universe by incorporating additional learning from Persia, India, and China. Muslim astronomers developed a robust tradition of observational astronomy aided by applied trigonometry and detailed astronomical tables. This tradition was transmitted to Europe during the Middle Ages.

The age of modern astronomy begins in the 16th century with Nicolaus Copernicus, who, drawing on the work of Ibn al-Shāṭir, proposed a heliocentric solar system. In the 17th century, Galileo Galilei demonstrated the utility of the telescope in astronomical observation and in so doing provided significant evidence for Copernicus's theory, and Johannes Kepler refined the Copernican system by developing the laws of planetary motion. Kepler's laws were soon corroborated and generalized by Isaac Newton's laws of motion and universal gravitation. In the early 20th century, Edwin Hubble provided convincing empirical evidence that the universe is expanding; by the 1960s, the age of the universe was calculated to be approximately 14 billion years, having emerged suddenly from an extremely hot and dense singularity in an event known as the Big Bang.

Ethnoastronomy is the study of how celestial phenomena are perceived, understood, and used by contemporary peoples not subscribing to modern astronomical paradigms. This field combines knowledge of modern astronomy with ethnographic fieldwork. Archaeoastronomy is the study of past peoples' astronomies, and as such, it combines astronomical knowledge with archaeological and historical methods. Both disciplines emerged in the 1970s and have tended to concentrate on the astronomies of the indigenous peoples of the Americas, for whom astronomical beliefs play an important role in their rich and diverse mythologies and ritual practices.

ATHEISM

Atheism is literally the belief in no God and in general refers to the rejection of religion. The great psychologist of religion, William James (1897/1956), described religion as “faith in the existence of an unseen order of some kind in which the riddles of the natural order may be found explained” (p. 51). Atheists (derived from the Greek atheos, or “godless”) are those who do not believe that such an unseen order exists and assume that this world (with its natural order) is the only one. Each religion offers a unique description of the spirit world and how we should negotiate with it. While the majority of humanity is made up of believers, from conflicting religious traditions, atheists do not believe in any religion or god. They reject all forms of supernaturalism, including deism and other professions of belief in a “higher power.” This is in contrast to agnostics (from the Greek agnostos, or “unknowable”), who refrain from decisive judgments on such claims but clearly do not share the believers’ certainty and commitment. Despite their differences, atheists and agnostics are often grouped together as “nonbelievers.” This entry first discusses the history of atheism, the number of atheists worldwide, and global secularization; then it presents a case study of the United States; and, last, it examines attitudes toward atheists and the atheist label and touches on atheism and intellectualism.

History

Rituals related to spirits and deities were deeply embedded in every known culture of the ancient world. In the West, the concept of atheism arose in Greece in the second half of the 5th century. But even then, according to J. M. Bremmer, the term atheist was generally used as an accusation rather than as a self-description. The first prominent philosopher to be labeled an atheist, Protagoras of Abdera (ca. 490–420 BCE), was by his own words an agnostic. Socrates (ca. 470–399 BCE) was charged with refusing to acknowledge the gods of Athens, yet he was not clearly an atheist. Epicurus (341–270 BCE) came close to atheism in his atomistic materialism, which influenced later thinkers such as the German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900). Epicurus held that nothing should be believed except that which was tested through direct observation and logical deduction. As noted by Bremmer, Epicurus held that to attain pleasure in moderation was the highest good, that the soul does not survive beyond death, and that the gods have no influence on humanity.

Atheism reemerged in Western thought during the Enlightenment, the 18th-century European intellectual movement that put reason above faith. The Scottish philosopher David Hume (1711–1776) developed a naturalist philosophy that verged on atheism, although Hume professed to believe in God. More openly atheistic was Hume’s French contemporary Denis Diderot (1713–1784), general editor of the Encyclopédie. Scientific discoveries such as Charles Darwin’s theory of evolution strengthened the case for atheism in the 19th century. Karl Marx described religion as the opium of the people, while Nietzsche built his entire oeuvre on his conviction that God is dead.

By the 20th century, atheism had become dominant in many intellectual circles, as well as a founding principle of the communist regimes of the Soviet Union and China. In the West, Bertrand Russell (1872–1970), mathematician and philosopher, helped set the course of thought with his 1927 pamphlet Why I Am Not a Christian. But contrary to the expectations of secularization theorists, religious belief hardly withered away as the 20th century wore on. At the start of the 21st century, a new school of militant atheists renewed the attack on religion.

Estimating the Number of Atheists Worldwide

How many atheists are there in the world? It depends on how one asks the question. The most straightforward approach uses surveys that ask people directly about their religious identification. Yet there are other ways to count nonbelievers. Different definitions will yield different population counts of atheists or nonbelievers. Phil Zuckerman (2007) draws on a variety of sources and different survey methodologies for his estimate in the Cambridge Companion to Atheism that there are between 500 million and 750 million worldwide “who currently do not believe in God” (p. 26). He provides country-by-country estimates of the top 50 countries containing the highest percentage of people who identify as “atheist, agnostic or nonbeliever in a ‘personal’ God” (pp.15–17). This definition obviously encompasses many people who would not describe themselves as atheists.

Zuckerman finds that Sweden, Vietnam, Denmark, Norway, Japan, the Czech Republic, Finland, France, South Korea, and Estonia are the top 10 countries when ranked by the proportion of the population who identify as atheist, agnostic, or nonbeliever in a personal God.

In Sweden, the percentage ranges from 46% to 85%, depending on which survey is to be believed. It is 81% in Vietnam and 64% to 65% in Japan according to Phil Zuckerman. Although China is officially atheist, researchers believe that only about 10% of its population is atheist. (About 80% of Chinese do not affiliate with any religion according to the Pew Global Attitudes Project in 2006.) If we expand the list to include all nations with at least 10% nonbelievers, which gives us 40, they can be divided into several blocs: Europe and the English-speaking nations, communist and former communist nations, and East Asian nations. Vietnam and China combine communist regimes and East Asian culture.

The United States is an anomaly in the Western world in that it ranks near the bottom in irreligion, with just 3% to 9% of the population identifying as atheist, agnostic, or nonbeliever in a personal God, according to Zuckerman. According to the American Religious Identification Survey in 2008 (ARIS; Kosmin, Keysar, Cragun, & Navarro-Rivera, 2009), 0.7% of the overall adult population described their religious identification as atheist and 0.9% as agnostic.

General labels such as “atheist” and “believer” mask a wide range of individual beliefs. In the United States, the General Social Survey question regarding belief in God gets at some of this variety. It is often repeated in various international surveys. The first option, “I don’t believe in God,” would apply to atheists, as they firmly believe that there is no such entity as God; those who choose the second option, “I don’t know whether there is a God, and I don’t believe there is any way to find out,” can be called agnostics because they do not completely reject the possibility of God’s existence; the third option, “I don’t believe in a personal God, but I do believe in a Higher Power of some kind,” captures a deistic or spiritual stance; those who choose the final option, “While I have doubts, I feel that I do believe in God,” are the believers.

“Hard Core atheists,” as classified by Wolfgang Jagodzinski and Andrew Greeley, based on the International Social Survey Program’s study of religion from 1991, which administered the above question on belief in God, also include those who “firmly reject the possibility of life after death.” The authors note that “the proportion of Hard Core atheists is relatively small in all countries except east Germany (42.7%).”

Unlike the findings reported by Zuckerman, which lumps together atheists, agnostics, and nonbelievers, a 2006 Financial Times/Harris Poll makes finer distinctions based on self-labeling. In France, 32% of adults identified themselves as atheists, as did 20% of Germans, 17% of British, 11% of Spanish, 7% of Italians, and 4% of Americans. One quarter to one third of adults in European countries identified themselves as agnostics (35% in Great Britain; 32% in France; 30% in Spain; 25% in Germany; and 20% in Italy).

Global Secularization

Secularization is the historical process through which both society and individuals move away from the dominance of religious institutions and religious ideation. Looking at global history over the past three centuries, there can be no doubt that the importance of religion in the life of humanity has declined over time. In modern, technologically advanced societies, the institution of religion (in the sociological sense) and the religious institutions within society are kept separate from the other institutions of society: politics, the economy, domestic life, art, and entertainment.

Secularization means both the relegation of religion to the private sphere and the decline in observance at a personal level. The two generally, but not always, go together. At the state level, the relegation of religion to the private sphere may take the form of the separation of religion and state and the abolition of religious laws and prohibitions. Thus, the Italians (1974), the Argentineans (1990), and the Irish (1995) have ended the prohibition on divorce, connected to the historical dominance of the Roman Catholic Church, and adopted civil law in marital questions. Away from Europe, one can point to the secular constitutions of the republics of Mexico, Turkey, and India.

At the same time, there has been a decline in religious observance—the second form of secularization. Trend data indicate a broad increase in the share of nonbelievers in the general population worldwide, which most likely indicates a rise in the share of atheists as well. Atheism is rarely a majority option; when people fall away from faith, it is generally into agnosticism rather than atheism.

A series of Gallup surveys as well as the World Values Survey/European Values Survey show that belief in God declined in many developed countries between 1947 and 2001. The proportion of the public expressing belief in God declined drastically in that period from 80% to 46% in Sweden, from 95% to 75% in Australia, and from 66% to 56% in France according to Pippa Norris and Ronald Inglehart. There are other economically advanced countries where belief in God has undergone little change over time. Japan is an example of very low and stable belief rates—38% of Japanese expressed belief in God in 1975 and 35% did in 2001. The United States follows a similar pattern yet on another extreme, a sustained high belief in God—94% expressed belief in God in 1947 and likewise 94% did in 2001.

Outside the communist countries, where atheism is a state doctrine, it is highly correlated with economic development. Among the Group of Eight (leading economic powers in the world), consisting of Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Russia, and the United States, only the United States has a population that is well under 10% atheist. Looking more broadly at a list of 25 developed economies consisting of Australia, Austria, Belgium, Britain, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Mexico, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, and the United States, most have a significant atheist presence. The six exceptions are Greece, Ireland, Mexico, Portugal, Turkey, and the United States.

If we look at the ratings in the Human Development Report, published annually by the United Nations, which ranks nations in terms of life expectancy at birth, adult literacy rate, per capita income, and educational attainment, we discover that the top-ranking countries have a significant atheist presence. They include the usual candidates, namely, Norway, Sweden, Canada, Australia, and The Netherlands. As Phil Zuckerman pointed out, the bottom 50 nations on this list lack any significant atheist presence.

William Sims Bainbridge links high rates of atheism with low fertility rates. He argues that atheism correlates with a lack of interpersonal social obligations, which in turn is associated with a collapse of fertility. He cites European countries and Australia as examples of countries with below-replacement fertility levels and high percentages of atheists, as compared with, for example, the United States and Mexico.

Case Study: The United States

The United States is used here as a case study because of the reliability of findings about atheists in the United States. The following analysis draws on the ARIS 2008, perhaps the only national survey that is large enough to provide a reliable socio-demographic portrait of minority groups as small as those of atheists and agnostics.

With its sample of 54,461 adult respondents, ARIS 2008 used an open-ended survey question, “What is your religion, if any?”—which yielded three distinct groups: (1) self-identified atheists, (2) self-identified agnostics, and (3) those who answered “none.” The first two groups were quite small, together amounting to less than 2% of the U.S. adult population. The third group, termed the “no-religion group,” was about 13% of the population. Together, the three groups increased from about 14 million in 1990 to more than 34 million in 2008 according to Barry Kosmin and Ariela Keysar.

In the United States, atheists are predominantly male. In the U.S. population as a whole in 2008, males accounted for 75% of atheists, 65% of agnostics, and 60% of the no-religion group. This may reflect women’s well-known higher religiosity, according to Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi and Michael Argyle, and possibly men’s greater tendency to disbelieve and reject authority. Opinion polls on belief in Great Britain in 2007 also show major gender gaps among atheists: While 22% of men opted for an atheist option, “I am an atheist. The whole notion of supernatural God is nonsense,” only 10% of British women chose likewise. Males (11%) in Great Britain were also more likely than females (7%) to describe themselves as agnostics: “I am an agnostic. I don't think it is possible to know if there is God or not."

Atheists are also predominantly young. Fully 48% of American atheists in 2008 were under 35 years of age, and only 22% were 50 and over, versus 40% of all Americans, according to ARIS 2008. In Great Britain, the estimates for "convinced atheist" in 1999 were only 2% among people aged 60 and over but 9% among those between 18 and 29 years, according to the European Values Survey.

Agnostics clearly have the highest educational attainment, with 44% being college graduates or having postgraduate education, compared with 36% of atheists. The relatively low educational level of atheists may be simply a result of younger age. Some atheists may not yet be old enough to have earned a college or postgraduate degree.

Agnostics in the United States were concentrated in the West. More than one third (39%) of agnostics resided in the West in 2008 compared with 23% of the total U.S. adult population. In contrast, the South was home to just 25% of agnostics and 32% of atheists but 37% of all Americans. At the same time, atheists have become more common in the Northeast (25%) according to ARIS 2008.

The U.S. population is distributed among Democrats, Republicans, and independents. However, in 2008, 40% of atheists and agnostics were politically independent. Atheists were far less likely than the general public to be Republicans (8% compared with 24% in the general population). The percentage of atheists who were Democrats was slightly higher (35%) than that of the total U.S. population (33%) yet lower than the percentage of agnostics (42%). Not only are atheists indifferent to supernaturalist ideas but they are also the most likely to be alienated from the two main political parties.

Attitudes Toward Atheists and the Atheist Label

In Saudi Arabia, it is illegal to espouse atheism publicly, while at the opposite extreme, in China, atheism remains part of the official state dogma. Western nations range closer to the center of the spectrum. Nevertheless, worldwide, almost in every country, there are more people who say that they do not believe in God than people who identify themselves as atheists or agnostics. The different levels of antagonism toward atheism, as will be shown here, are associated with its local prevalence. Namely, atheists tend to be distrusted in societies where they are a marginal and uncommon part of society. In contrast, in countries with a relatively longer historical prevalence of nonbelievers, such as France, atheism is less stigmatized.

In European countries, politicians represent the full spectrum of religiosity, as well as no religion, and they can also be self-declared atheists. In the British Cabinet in 2007, of 22 members, 8 claimed to be believers, while 2 declared atheism. The remaining 12 embraced various shades of agnosticism. In 2004, the French politician Bernard Kouchner mocked "talks about good and God" saying, "The days of [religious] hallucinations are over" (Sancton, 2004, p. 52).

In contrast, in the United States, we find a long history of unflattering opinions about atheists tracked in public opinion polls. The Pew Research Center's poll on "religion and public life" in 2003 asked people about their attitudes toward a variety of groups, including atheists. According to the Pew 2003 poll, 8% of Americans would refuse to vote for a Catholic for president, 10% for someone Jewish, 38% for a Muslim, and 50% for an atheist.

Penny Edgell, Joseph Gerteis, and Douglas Hartmann found that for the U.S. public, atheists represented a general lack of morality, sometimes associated with criminality and danger to public order. This is hardly a new idea: In his Letter Concerning Toleration (1685), the English philosopher John Locke wrote, "Promises, covenants, and oaths, which are the bonds of human society, can have no hold upon an atheist." In the 19th-century reaction to the Enlightenment, there arose the notion of a moral collapse without religion. Ivan Karamazov, a character in Dostoevsky's The Brothers Karamazov (1880), says that if God does not exist, everything is permitted.

Today, the problem of the atheist is perceived to be a problem of self-interest, an excessive individualism that undermines trust. This perception of atheists as being beyond the pale, morally and socially, is far more prevalent in the United States than in other advanced economies around the globe. Many nonbelieving societies such as the Scandinavian nations are marked by high levels of solidarity and low rates of social pathology such as violence and corruption. The prisons are not overcrowded in such nations. It has been noted long ago that atheists are underrepresented among criminals.

Atheism and Intellectualism

According to Benjamin Beit-Hallahmi, academia and the world of science have been called “the atheist bastions.” While it is clear that not all atheists are intellectuals, it has been consistently found that among academics and scientists, atheists are often a majority, depending on academic discipline and individual achievement. Early studies have shown that academics are likely to be much less religious than the general population, that those working in the human sciences are less religious than those in the natural sciences, and that the more eminent scientists are the least likely to be believers.

Surveys of U.S. academics and scientists that replicated the early-20th-century work by Leuba found a remarkable degree of consistency among rank-and-file scientists, with 60% of them being nonbelievers according to Edward J. Larson and Larry Witham. A survey among members of the U.S. National Academy of Sciences showed that 93% were nonbelievers, with about 80% being atheists. A 2008 survey of Indian scientists conducted by Ariela Keysar and Barry Kosmin showed that one fourth of them embrace an atheistic or agnostic position and only one fourth are firm religious believers.

Summary

The inclusion of an entry on atheism in the Encyclopedia of Global Religion reflects global reality in the 21st century. Atheism is not a religion, but it is part of the religious landscape, as a growing number of individuals worldwide reject religion in any form. Atheism has not swept the field, as proponents such as Marx and Nietzsche might once have expected or hoped. But it is an important force nonetheless. Theologically, atheism matters because it is a frontal challenge to religious orthodoxy. Socially and politically, it matters because it is the belief system of a large portion of the scientific and intellectual elite worldwide as well as a meaningful share of the public at large in the developed world and the communist or postcommunist nations.

ATTA, MOHAMMAD (1968–2001)

Photos of a stone-faced Mohammad Atta are now emblematic of the 9/11 terrorist attacks on the Pentagon and the Twin Towers of the U.S. World Trade Center. As the eldest (age 33) and most educated (MA, 1999) of the 19 suicide bombers, Atta is credited with coordinating the attacks, which were conceived by Ramzi Binalshibh and Khalid Sheikh Muhammad on behalf of al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden (d. 2011). At 8:46 a.m., Atta flew the hijacked American Airlines Flight 11 into the North Tower of the World Trade Center, thereby awakening Americans to the specter of Islamic terrorism. The three other attacks followed within minutes. Thousands died.

Mohammad el-Amir Atta was born into comfortable circumstances. His father was an Egyptian lawyer committed to a superior education for his two daughters and one son. The daughters earned advanced degrees in the sciences from Cairo University, and Mohammad el-Amir earned a degree in architecture. When Atta was rejected for graduate study in Cairo, his father insisted he study for a doctorate in Germany, partly to distance Atta from his mother. His father arranged for him to stay with a German host family, who eventually asked Atta to leave because of his mounting discomfort with European social and religious liberalism.

Atta studied architecture at the Technical University of Harburg-Hamburg sporadically from 1992 to 1999 and also became immersed in jihadist ideology at al Quds mosque. Attractive to foreign students and Turkish immigrants, al-Quds sponsored taped sermons by, among others, the London-based Abu Qatada, who propagated The Neglected Duty of Abd al-Salam Faraj. Executed in 1982 for the assassination of the Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, Faraj had espoused the establishment of an Islamic caliphate in predominantly Muslim countries and eventually over the whole world. The insular group at al Quds, which produced three of the 9/11 pilots, argued together about jihadist ideals, some espousing a spiritual view—a duty to strive against personal obstacles to one’s faith—and others embracing a war against a perceived Zionist-American coalition of Islam’s enemies. Although Islam forbids suicide, the group debated circumstances that might permit it, namely, against fitna (“confusion,” “oppression”) and in defense of Islam. Traditional war songs and tales of glamorous fighting in Bosnia and Chechnya permeated the culture of al-Quds mosque.

During this period, Osama bin Laden’s letters declaring war against “Americans in the holy lands” (1996) and “Jews and Crusaders” (1998) were circulated. Atta was late to commit to Osama bin Laden’s war, but in December 1999 in Kandahar, Atta and others from the Hamburg group pledged loyalty to the man. Bin Laden is said to have chosen Atta personally to lead the group on a mission that required them to fly commercial airplanes into U.S. landmarks. From May 2000 until September 2001, Atta and accomplices trained in the United States to do just that, resulting in the terrorist acts of 9/11.

Along with Abdul Aziz al-Omari, Atta has been suggested as a possible author of the suicide bombers' Final Instructions, which envisions the terrorist attacks as exalted replicas of the formative battles in early Islam.

AUGUSTINE (354–430)

Along with Paul and Thomas Aquinas, Augustine is one of the most groundbreaking and influential figures in the history of Christianity and in Western philosophy and politics. His works intertwined Christianity and Platonism and offered original, creative insights into the relations of reason and faith and of works and grace as well as the doctrine of original sin. He also presents a compelling figure of a converted sinner who struggles with temptations as he comes to live an exemplary Christian life. Augustine's importance is so paramount that the early-modern theological battles waged during the Protestant Reformation and Catholic Counter-Reformation can be viewed as (in part) a battle over whose would be the definitive interpretation of Augustine's thought.

Aurelius Augustinus lived from 354 to 430, almost entirely in northern Africa (in present-day Algeria). His mother, Monica, was a devout and pious Christian, but her young son did not follow in her footsteps. Augustine spent his youth mired in sin, leading a life of pleasure that included fathering a son, Adeodatus, out of wedlock. He also joined the Manichees, a sect that preached a dualistic worldview, according to which evil emerged from a cosmic clash between Light and Dark, or ideal and material realities. Manicheism combined with Augustine's education in classical rhetoric (especially Cicero) to form his intellectual foundation, to which he added Neoplatonic influences such as Plotinus and Porphyry. In 384, Augustine met Ambrose, a Christian bishop, who began to turn Augustine toward Christianity. This intellectual turn was followed by a spiritual turn, a "conversion of the heart," in 386, culminating in a mystical experience in 387.

These experiences Augustine narrates in his Confessions, which charts his personal journey from sin through spiritual struggle to conversion. He offers a written version of the Christian ritual of (the then public) confession, in the form of an extended prayer addressed to God. In doing so, he writes what is often regarded as the first Western autobiography and shapes notions of the self and the will that still exert influence. Along with his extended self-examination, his Confessions includes creative meditations on the nature of God and of evil as well as original theories of memory and of time. It concludes with an inventive interpretation of the opening chapters of the Genesis.

Augustine wrote his Confessions just after being appointed bishop of Hippo in 396. He continued to produce influential texts such as On Christian Doctrine and The Trinity in addition to sermons and commentaries on biblical texts. His impressive corpus concludes with The City of God, a massive tome written between 413 and 426 as a critique of Roman moral and religious traditions and as a defense of a Platonic-Christian social vision of just living that concludes with accounts of apocalypse, judgment, and eternity.

AUM SHINRIKYÔ

Aum Shinrikyô is a millennial Japanese new religion that attained notoriety through its March 1995 nerve gas attack on the Tokyo subway. It is significant because it manufactured and used chemical and biological weapons against civilian populations and because its violence was redolent with religious meanings and underpinned by doctrines and apocalyptic visions that made it view violence and killing as legitimate. Thus, it is a striking example of apocalyptic millennialism and a prominent case study in the examination of the relationship between religion and violence.

Aum, Millennialism, and Mission

Founded in the 1980s by Asahara Shôkô (b. 1955), a blind prophet and guru (as his disciples called him), Aum Shinrikyô (“Aum Supreme Truth”) was legally registered as a religious organization in 1989, and it grew to around 10,000 members in Japan (of whom around 1,100 lived in its communes) by 1995. It taught that the world was entering an apocalyptic age in which a final conflict between the forces of good (led by itself) and evil (epitomized by the forces of materialism) would occur and through which the world would either be destroyed or a new spiritual age would emerge. Aum saw itself as charged to bring about this transformation, although initially members were more focused on practices such as yoga and meditation, designed to bring about their own enlightenment. It was highly syncretic, drawing on Buddhism, Hinduism, contemporary mysticism, and Christianity, from which it appropriated the term Armageddon to signify its end-time visions. Asahara publicized the movement by claiming spiritual powers, including the ability to levitate, and that he was the supreme spiritual master of the age with a mission to save humanity. An accomplished yoga and meditation teacher, he claimed to have attained enlightenment in India in 1986 and incorporated veneration of the Hindu deity Shiva into his movement.

Aum’s millennialism was grounded in numerous texts—from the Book of Revelation to the prophecies of Nostradamus, to the Buddhist Kalachakra Tantra—that posited apocalyptic scenarios and end-time battles between good and evil. It viewed the phenomenal world as evil and obsessed with materialism. The consequence of living in such a realm was the accumulation of bad karma, which would drag the spirit into the Buddhist hells at death; the only way to avoid this was to follow Asahara, reject the world, and undertake austerities (ascetic practices) in Aum. Initially, the movement believed that the world could be transformed spiritually and that a new age in which materialism and evil would be destroyed could be achieved by spreading Aum’s message globally and recruiting an army of spiritual warriors to overcome the world’s negative karma. To this end, Aum built communes known as “Lotus villages” as a basis for its envisioned utopian order, to which disciples retreated, after having broken all links with their families and pledged absolute devotion to Asahara, to immerse themselves in austerities.

The Turn to Violence

Aum’s relationship with the world rapidly became confrontational as its visions of world salvation were replaced by beliefs that only the select few who accepted Aum’s truths and Asahara as guru were worthy of salvation and that violence was needed to change the world. This transformation was rooted in Asahara’s increasing paranoia coupled with the experiences of the movement, which became embroiled in disputes with the families of disciples, with neighbors of its communes, and with various civil authorities whose rules it flouted. Moreover, although Asahara claimed he could save the world by training thousands of sacred warriors, the numbers who renounced the world were inadequate to fulfill his mission. The sense of failure this engendered coupled with external opposition gave rise to increasingly paranoid attitudes inside Aum; Asahara interpreted such things as signs that the world was so corrupt that it could not be saved and that all who lived in it deserved to be punished. He began to claim that a world conspiracy existed to prevent Aum from accomplishing its mission, with any setback being seen in this light until Aum’s self-induced persecution complex embraced the entire world, apart from the Aum faithful, who were the only beings worthy of salvation. The rest of humanity, in contrast, had rejected the truth and thus merited destruction in the cosmic war that Asahara prophesied would occur by the end of the 20th century.

Internal problems exacerbated this transformation. Asahara stated that austerities were essential for disciples to save themselves and become enlightened; those who were reluctant were coerced, with Asahara deeming it legitimate to force them to perform austerities for their own good. However, this led to the accidental death of a follower in the autumn of 1988—an event Aum covered up to protect the movement's name. However, when in early 1989 a disciple, Taguchi Shuji, threatened to blow the whistle on this incident, he was killed on Asahara's orders; Asahara legitimated the killing by arguing that if Taguchi had gone ahead, he would have destroyed Aum's mission—an act that would bring immense bad karma and consign him to hell. By killing Taguchi, Aum was thus "saving" him—a doctrinal stance subsequently known in Aum as poa (which in effect meant killing someone to "save" them). This event was seminal in Aum's turn to violence, providing it with a means of legitimating violence while also creating a dark secret that Aum's leaders had to conceal at any cost.

In the spring of 1990, Aum's sense of rejection reached its apex after Asahara formed a political party (Shinritô, or "Party of Truth") to fight the Japanese general election. The party lost disastrously, and the media was highly critical of Asahara and his followers. The debacle further convinced Asahara that the world needed to be punished for its rejection of the "truth" and that a final, actual war, in which Aum had to confront its enemies, was inevitable.

In this increasingly fraught context, Asahara argued that it was the spiritual duty of Aum's sacred warriors to kill the "enemies of the truth" in order to defend their mission. By doing so, they would (under the doctrine of poa) also "save" such unbelievers from accumulating bad karma and falling into hell. Thus, killing became elevated into a spiritually meritorious act of salvation—a vision that, wedded to Aum's belief in the inevitability of a final war, was instrumental in Aum's endeavors, from 1990 on, to develop biological, chemical, and other weapons with which to fight this war and punish all who rejected Aum.

This program of weapons development, conducted clandestinely by an inner circle, was accompanied by attacks on individual opponents and on members who tried to defect. By spring 1995, Aum was widely suspected of numerous attacks, including using the nerve gas sarin in the town of Matsumoto in June 1994 (aimed, it later transpired, against three judges trying a case involving Aum). Aware that the police were about to raid its premises, Asahara ordered his disciples to attack the Tokyo subway using sarin. It is unclear whether this was a diversionary tactic designed to forestall police raids or a dramatic gesture by a leader determined to ensure that Aum made a global impact before he was arrested. Besides killing 12 and injuring thousands, the attack—on a subway station at the heart of Japan's government office district—was symbolically a blow against the Japanese state. Shortly afterward, the police raided Aum's premises throughout Japan, arrested hundreds of devotees, and charged Asahara and several others with crimes including murder. Asahara and several others have been sentenced to death, although no executions (as of March 2008) have been carried out.

Aum After the Attacks

The Japanese government considered proscribing Aum but decided that this was not constitutionally possible. However, it revoked Aum's status as a registered religious organization in 1995, although members can still meet and pursue collective worship. Their numbers have been greatly reduced; as knowledge of their leaders' deeds emerged, many left Aum, while the loss of its leadership and the stigma of their leader's crimes left the movement highly vulnerable. Its assets were sequestered to compensate its victims, and its centers were closed. Yet (according to government statistics) around 1,000 people continue to remain faithful to a movement that has now officially apologized for its acts and has dropped its teachings related to poa and the legitimation of violence. In 1999, seeking to amend its image, Aum changed its name to Aleph; however, the Japanese public remains highly suspicious of it, and Aum members continue to face hostility from local communities.

The remaining members still perform austerities and believe that an apocalyptic end-time is imminent. The movement has, however, split over Asahara. Although he officially stepped down as leader in 1996 and has no contact with members, his influence still pervades the movement and its public image. Some devotees believe that he is still their guru and that his actions were part of an inspired plan whose truth will become known eventually. They assume that he will be executed but view this as evidence of the evil nature of the human world they reject. However, others believe that the movement has no future unless it can break free from Asahara's image, and secessionist groups based on Aum's teachings while distancing themselves from its founder have emerged. This has further fragmented the movement, making its future increasingly uncertain.

AUROVILLE

Auroville, "the city of dawn," is a religiously based community in South India with a utopian, global vision. Founded on Wednesday, February 28, 1968, in Villipuram District in the state of Tamil Nadu, 10 kilometers north of Pondicherry in South India, its mission statement states that it aims to be "a universal town where men and women of all countries are able to live in peace and progressive harmony above all creeds, all politics, and all nationalities." The purpose of Auroville is to realize human unity. These are the words of its founder, Mirra Alfassa (1878–1973), more widely known as "The Mother."

Mirra was born in Paris to a Turkish father and an Egyptian mother. In 1906, she founded L'Idée, a small group dedicated to spiritual experimentation. In 1909, she married Paul Richard. The following year, he traveled to Pondicherry in French India, where he met Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950). Mirra joined him and on meeting Aurobindo claimed to have immediately recognized him as the figure in her visions whom she had identified as Krishna. After a year with Aurobindo, she left India and spent some time in Japan. In 1920, she returned to Pondicherry and stayed in India until her death 53 years later.

Aurobindo's "integral yoga" and philosophy, which informed all Mirra's work, claimed a knowledge of reality from "supramental" planes of consciousness above the normal human level. Central to his thinking is the evolution of reality away from the material and the release of the conscious mind. Central to this process is a cosmic energy (Shakti), which he identified as a goddess—"the Mother." The point is that he identified Mirra herself in terms of the descent of the divine to the earthly plane. Hence, as "the Mother," Mirra was at the heart of Aurobindo's mission. In 1926, she took over the leadership of the ashram.

Mirra was concerned that there should be a place where people could live in harmony and focus on the development of the inner life. She also felt that the ashram was not providing this and began to develop the idea of an experimental community, a spiritual laboratory—Auroville. In 1960, she established the Sri Aurobindo Society in Pondicherry, which acquired legal status through its registration in Calcutta (now Kolkata) under the 1961 Bengal Societies Registration Act. As such, it became the organization legally responsible for Auroville and, in 1968, the overseer of its finances and the official channel of funds from UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) and the Indian government.

In 1962, at the age of 84, she withdrew from close physical contact with the ashram but continued to work on the Auroville project. In 1966, Auroville received an endorsement from the Indian government, and the General Assembly of UNESCO "approved" the plan for the township.

Auroville's inauguration in 1968 was attended by delegates from 124 nations. Its perceived potential was evident in UNESCO's third resolution (1970), which stated that steps should be taken within the budgetary provisions to promote the development of Auroville as a significant international cultural program.

An impressive architectural feature of Auroville, which has its origins in a vision of the Mother in 1970, is the Matrimandir ("Temple of the Mother"), a large, golden metallic sphere. This is "the soul of the city," its spiritual heart.

Since the death of the Mother in 1973, difficulties emerged, largely because the Mother identified no successor. Hence, the Sri Aurobindo Society assumed the role. Aurovillians, however, refused to recognize the authority of the society, citing the Mother's teaching regarding "divine anarchy": There should be no rules. Authority is located within each individual. However, the society was able to make policy and financial decisions because it received the funding and, through the "General Fund," managed Auroville's economy. Indeed, although no Aurovillians were represented in the society, they were nevertheless expected to give their personal possessions to the fund. In 1976, the society even terminated funding to Auroville, accusing it of moral laxity and of being a conduit for the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency) to interfere in Indian affairs. In June 1976, representatives of Aurobindo centers in nine European countries issued a declaration to the Indian government stating that they no longer had confidence in the society and that they were withdrawing their support, financial and otherwise. Finally, in September 1988, after a series of legal battles, the Auroville Foundation Act was passed. All the property and assets of Auroville were transferred to the Indian government. Auroville is now separate from the society, with a "Governing Board" established by the government. Although many Aurovillians understood this intervention as the continued action of the Mother, others view this forced centralization of authority as a long way from the Mother's vision of a society guided by "divine anarchy."

AUSTRALIA

Australia, a large island nation in the southwest Pacific Ocean, is a multicultural society. It contains numerous religions and spiritualities developing under their own impulses as well as through the impact of the media, immigration, and links with overseas authorities or movements. This variety is mostly quite recent, though, and a majority of Australians still identify with Christian denominations introduced from Great Britain and Ireland. Many now reject formal religion, and religious sentiment is usually unobtrusive, but it can sometimes be very public and controversial. Indigenous Australians include Aborigines on the continent and Tasmanian and Melanesian Torres Strait Islanders; the latter are mostly Anglicans.

Aboriginal Australians

For at least 45,000 years, continental Australia was inhabited by hunter-gatherers, speaking more than 200 languages and forming perhaps 500 cultural groups by 1788. Attempts to reconstruct Aboriginal religion are frustrated by the disruption, adaptation, and cultural extinction wrought by colonization, but a key feature was the linkage between tribal groups and their places of origin. A concept now called the Dreaming (less accurately, the Dreamtime) was, or became, almost universal. In the Dreaming, more linked to place than to time, both social mores and the natural environment were formed by powerful ancestral beings. These left traces of themselves in the features and forces of the heavens and the landscape as well as in its people and other inhabitants. The Dreaming—and the cosmos itself—was perpetuated through retelling myths, performing rituals, and adhering to ancestral mores. Knowledge of traditional beliefs and practices was commonly restricted by age and gender, with an individual's passage to adulthood typically marked by initiation in a sacred place.

Disease, massacres, and land seizure drastically reduced the Aboriginal population. Early efforts to promote “civilization” (settled agriculture and Christianity) were usually underresourced and undermined by cultural and linguistic incomprehension. Some successes were achieved where viable settlements were established and missionaries learned the local language. Interaction with Europeans led to reworkings of traditional myth and practice incorporating elements of Christianity or to maintaining both religions simultaneously without reconciliation. More recently, many Aborigines have integrated traditional art and dance and respect for Mother Earth into evangelical Christianity, and the proportion of Christians is comparable with the national average.

European Settlers

Britain established a penal colony at Sydney Cove in 1788, and similar settlements followed until transportation ended in 1889. From the First Fleet, there were also free settlers, whose arrival accelerated from the 1830s. Until World War II, immigrants overwhelmingly came from Great Britain and Ireland, though in numbers that created a unique mix of religious affiliations. In proportions varying from place to place, English Anglicans mingled with Scottish Presbyterians and Irish Catholics (and other combinations) as well as with increasing numbers of Methodists (augmented by revivals), not to mention Baptists, Congregationalists, and Quakers. Most British Protestants shared an evangelical ethos, as did Lutherans, who, dissenting from the newly established Prussian state church, were unusual both as Continentals and as religious refugees. Missionaries representing new American churches and sects, such as Seventh-Day Adventists, also had a marked impact. Reacting principally against Chinese immigration, Australian governments developed a “White Australia” policy—largely endorsed by the churches—that limited immigrant diversity before the 1970s. More varied nationalities began to arrive in the interwar and postwar years, however, such as Italian and other Catholics, Greek and other Orthodox Christians, Ashkenazi and Sephardic Jews, and Dutch settlers both Catholic and Reformed.

Occasionally, local conditions (notably the sparsely populated “outback”) necessitated innovations such as the Bush Brotherhoods, composed of itinerant Anglo-Catholic clergymen. The Flying Doctor service was initiated by the Australian Inland Mission, founded by the Presbyterian John Flynn (1880–1951). Lacking long-standing endowments and a tradition of deference, the Anglican Church had to become more democratic than at home.

Church and Society

The first chaplains in the Australian penal colonies were effectively state employees, more valued for maintaining discipline than for offering pastoral care. Beginning in 1836, Church Acts subsidizing other denominations' buildings and stipends thwarted Anglican aspirations toward establishment status. By the time the Commonwealth of Australia was formed from the six colonies in 1901, such aid had long been phased out. The preface to the new constitution acknowledged reliance on “the blessing of Almighty God,” but Section 116 (influenced by the U.S. Constitution) prohibited the federal government from establishing any religion, obliging religious observance, forbidding the free exercise of religion, or imposing a religious test for public office. Prayers at the opening of Parliament and aid to religious schools (resumed in 1963) are not deemed unconstitutional: Populist pragmatism has trumped legalistic consistency. Most state governments have legislated against religious discrimination.

While the prevailing ethos holds religion to be a private matter, churches and religiously motivated individuals have influenced politics, and before the 1960s, the Catholic-Protestant tension, sharpened by Irish nationalism, was a significant force. Most churchmen applauded Australia's contribution to the Great War, but Melbourne's Archbishop Daniel Mannix (1864–1963) was widely vilified for campaigning against conscription. Catholics long influenced the Australian Labor Party, but their anticommunist campaign caused a split in it in 1954.

Historically, the churches have provided welfare and promoted public morality, replicating North American institutions such as the Women's Christian Temperance Union and the Young Men's Christian Association. Protestants long sought to constrain the sale of alcohol, prevent the secularization of the Sunday "Sabbath," and inculcate faith through Sunday schools. Catholics prioritized schools staffed by the religious—including the Josephite sisters, founded by Saint Mary MacKillop (1842–1909). Nowadays, religious people—of any affiliation—regularly express opposing views on moral issues, including the rights of indigenous peoples, refugees, women, and homosexuals, and on the morality of abortion, reproductive technology, war, and euthanasia. The Uniting Church (created by Congregationalists, Methodists, and Presbyterians in 1977) has consistently promoted Aboriginal land rights but has suffered defections over the issue of homosexual clergy. Conservative Christian lobbyists were linked to John Howard's Liberal-National Coalition Government (1996–2007), while Prime Minister Kevin Rudd (2007–) advocates Christian Social Democracy.

Current Trends

Recent religious developments reflect international trends, including the popularity of eclectic spiritualities (often incorporating indigenous, ecological, and New Age themes), clerical sexual-abuse scandals, theological polarization within churches but rapprochement among the like-minded across denominations, and the growth of fundamentalism and Pentecostalism, including megachurches that promote conservative moral agendas. The most notable is the Sydney-based Hillsong, which has established congregations in Europe and screens services worldwide. While the status of women has been enhanced in most Protestant churches, for some time Sydney's conservative Evangelical Anglican diocese did not ordain women and blocked their ordination elsewhere.

In the 2006 census, 63.9% of the total population (approaching 20 million) declared themselves Christians—a decline from 96.9% in 1921. (Fewer than 10% attend church weekly and fewer than 25% monthly.) Meanwhile, the growing numbers of nonreligious people (including Humanists), reached 18.7%, and 11.2% did not report a religious affiliation. If some are immigrants (e.g., from China), most are unchurched Australians. The Anglican Church, comprising 43.7% of the population in 1921, dropped to 18.7% by 2006 and is declining relatively and absolutely as membership ages rapidly. Both the Uniting Church (5.7%) and the Presbyterian and Reformed churches (combined at 3.0%) have similar profiles. Catholics, maintaining greater intergenerational loyalty through their schools, overtook Anglicans as the largest denomination in 1986 and peaked at 27.3% of Australians in 1991. They had fallen back to 25.8% by 2006, but their actual numbers were still growing thanks in large part to recent immigration (including from the Philippines). Recently, many "new" varieties of Christianity have also become firmly established, such as the Coptic Orthodox.

Chinese Buddhists and "Afghan" Muslims have been represented in Australia since the 1850s and 1860s, but only since the 1970s have large numbers of non-Europeans arrived. In 2006, Buddhists (many Vietnamese or Chinese) made up 2.1% of the population, Muslims 1.7%, and Hindus 0.7%. The most ethnically diverse and (especially in the case of Lebanese migrants) the most difficult to accommodate have been Muslims, inevitably associated with events such as 9/11, the 2002 Bali bombings (killing 88 Australians and 114 others), and Australia's participation in the 2003 invasion of Iraq. The 2005 Cronulla riots revealed ethnic as much as religious tensions, while Sheikh Taj al-Din al-Hilali's 2006 remarks blaming immodest women for rape and adultery highlighted contrasting values—to the embarrassment of other Muslims.

Megachurches and Orthodox cathedrals, along with mosques and temples, frequented by both immigrants and converts, signal profound changes in the Australian religious landscape. With almost a quarter of resident Australians born overseas, a new era of religious diversity is well under way.

AUSTRIA

The history of the eastern European country of Austria is linked to that of the Catholic Habsburg Dynasty. While providing most of the emperors to the Holy Roman Empire (962–1806), Austria presided for more than six centuries (1273–1918) over the destiny of the Austrian monarchy as well as over a number of states and kingdoms, constituting a multinational and multiconfessional empire, before giving up its dreams of European hegemony at the end of World War I. Austria then became a small federal Danubian republic of homogeneous religious confession, representing approximately the limits of the hereditary countries of “the House of Austria” (around 8 million inhabitants in 2001). This dynasty never developed a national consciousness; however, its identity was built in its will to assert the unity of the Catholic faith and in the religious contests/fights against heretics (Protestants) in the frame of the Counter-Reformation or against the unfaithful (Muslims) when it was the rampart of Christendom against the Ottoman Empire (with the Vienna sieges in 1529 and 1683 and its victory in 1697). However, the dynasty had to deal with pluralism: namely, the Toleranzpatent (“Edict of Toleration”) of Joseph II, granting to Protestants the right to private practice of their religion in 1781; the Protestantpatent (“Protestant Patent”) of 1861, conferring to them parity with Catholics and the status of a public law corporation; and recognition granted to the Islamic Hanefite rite in 1912.

In terms of religion, the basis of the Austrian judicial and legal order rests on various sources, reflecting many layers and milestones in the country’s constitutional history. Religious freedom is guaranteed individually and collectively on the basis of Articles 14 and 15 of the Staatsgrundgesetz (StGG) of 1867—incorporated since 1920 in Article 149 of the Austrian constitution (Bundesverfassungsgesetz, BV-G); in Article 63 Section 2 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain (1919), granting the right to practice cult worship publicly, even when the cult is not officially recognized; as well as in Article 9 of the European Convention on Human Rights, all of which are relevant to the legal status of religious freedom. As in Germany, due to the rejection of the state church and the neutrality of the state, state and church are separate, even though a certain number of domains are managed jointly (res mixtae): for example, religious instruction in schools, theology faculties, and army chaplaincy. One went from a state church marked with the Josephist stamp (the enlightened absolutism of Joseph II in the 18th century) to a coordination and partnership principle imposed around 1960 (the recognition and development in 1957 of the concordat of 1933/1934). The main coordination organ is the Kulutramt institution (culture office) under the cultural federal minister, which has branches in the nine federal states (Bundesländer) that constitute the Austrian Republic. Previously in charge of supervising the state church system, it is today a facilitating office for religious groups and provides protection to minority religious communities. Since the adoption in 1998 of the federal law on the Legal Personality of Registered Religious (RRBG, BGBl, I Nr. 19/1998), there are three categories of religious societies: (1) those recognized by the state (14 in 2010)—for example, the Catholic Church (73.66% of the inhabitants in 2001), the traditional Protestant churches (4.68%), the Orthodox churches (2.7%), Judaism (0.1%), and Islam (4.3%)—having the status of public law corporations, with certain para-public privileges (religious instruction in schools, help from the state in the collection of church contributions [Kirchenbeitrag]); (2) those registered by the state (10) and thus having legal status under private law; and (3) those that can only lay claim to the status of an association.

The Catholic Church was for a long time part of a strong support system, structuring the public and private spaces of Austrian society, but its influence on the latter has lessened since the 1950s. It went through various crises (e.g., the scandal surrounding the Archbishop of Vienna, Mgr. Groer, in 1995). Since the 1970s, religious confession/faith has played a diminishing role in electoral decisions. The Sozialdemokratische Partei Österreichs (SPÖ; “Social Christians”) reconciled with the Catholic Church thanks to the efforts of both Bruno Kreisky (1911–1990) and Mgr. König (1903–2004) in the 1970s. The Catholic Church condemned the xenophobic ideas of the Freiheitlichen Partei Österreichs (FPÖ; “Freedom Party of Austria”). Christian values are gradually losing their place in society, as evidenced, for example, by the controversy in 2009 regarding hanging a crucifix in nursery school and kindergarten classrooms and the experimental introduction of a course of ethics as an alternative to religious instruction in 1997. The absence of religious affiliation increased (from 0.1% in 1910 to nearly 12% in 2001) and affects close to 50% of the population in Vienna, to the point that Catholic religious instruction has little demand and will be abolished in some schools. Islam is relatively well integrated, as evidenced by the introduction of Islamic religious instruction in Austrian public schools in 1983 and the founding of a pedagogical academy for Islamic religious instruction in 1988.

AUTHORITY

The concept of authority varies among religious, political, and cultural traditions and may be perceived and encountered according to the order and arrangement of each society. In a dynamic world, the perception of the locus and operation of authority in society varies similarly. Since authority is closely related to power and legitimacy, where and how it is encountered affects everyone who is involved in the exercise of authority. From their roots in Latin, the terms author (Latin auctor) and authority (Latin auctoritas) have associated meanings. A significant distinction is that an author can operate in isolation but authority requires a social context. Consequently, authority unlike authorship cannot exist or operate without more than one party. These parties minimally involve those who claim authority and those who refer to that authority with acceptance, implying the possibility of rejection. The experience of authority in human communities can have all the complexity of human interactions, involving perceptions, differences in power, and roles or positions in societies. It is possible to view ultimate authority in temporality not only in communities but also in nature, as well as other than in temporality.

Perceptions

Recognition of authority arises when power is exercised to issue and enforce laws or norms. Authority then operates to bring order into a society. At the same time, since authority is not unique to an individual or otherwise singular but plural, both in its location and in its operation, in any societal context, there are multiple immediate or mediated authorities that arrange themselves dynamically. For instance, there can be a plurality of religious authorities as well as civil authorities all contemporaneously operating in a single societal context. Where a society has competing authorities, the exercise of authority could be perceived as a crisis that some people, following Jürgen Habermas, might refer to as a deficit of legitimacy.

The perception of authority is of course conditioned by the cultural experience—the location and power of the observer in particular contexts. A powerful person who is vested with authority would reasonably have a different experience of that authority and other authorities than a weaker person in the same context regardless of culture. Additionally, views of what constitutes order can be culturally different. For example, in some cultural contexts, order and coexistence and hence authority exist and are maintained by a sense of duty rather than as individual or human rights, as may be found in other societies.

With a multiplicity of authorities in a given society, according to some scholars, in particular Asian contexts, coexistence in society may be established through a social valuation of harmony rather than through concepts of pluralism, as in some Western societies. The concept of harmony itself may be a cultural value.

The Exercise of Authority

Authority can operate systemically, as in the act of naming. In such a process, to name involves selecting descriptors and applying classifications or names. The act of naming itself being an exercise of power, to name that which is named is a capacity to make a selection; it provides a foundation for the exercise of authority by all parties.

Although authority can be distinguished from responsibility, the two cannot be separated. The one with authority retains responsibility for the exercise of that authority whether it is delegated to an agent or not. In this concept, as long as the agent operates within the scope of the delegated authority, responsibility for actions attach to the delegator. For instance, at work, where the employee does what the boss instructs, the responsibility for the consequences remains with the boss. Of course, the employee can and sometimes does decide to exercise independence from the boss and acts differently than instructed. Where there is a difference, the employee asserts a separate authority and could then be held responsible for the consequences.

The exercise of authority may be either beneficial or damaging and not unusually results in both. For instance, the interest of authorities in preserving or establishing social order has been cited as the motivation for the interventions of advocates of democracy as well as for the resistance to it. The issue may in fact be which social order is relevant to a particular authority. Additionally, differing concepts of democracy applied by authorities may also be pertinent. So in France, allegedly democratic authority is exercised to prohibit wearing articles of clothing prescribed by nonstate authorities in the interests of social order. In China, state authority resists the democracy advocated by the French as allegedly being contrary to social order. In the Chinese order, specified religious practices are also prohibited. Thus, in all exercises of authority by humans in the interests of order in society, choices are made and boundaries established with consequences. In a more complex discussion, biological determinants as well as social determinants operate to authoritatively affect each person in varying ways. In some contexts, there is a further distinction between religious and secular authorities. Religious authorities may be human or otherwise.

Nature

Where humans have been prompted to act out of a sense of authority and dominance, those who believe in an untrammelled obligation to “subdue the earth” may also be reasonably susceptible to the consequences. It is in this sense that some would hold humans responsible for actions and treatment of nature. In response, some understand the experience of nature when encountered in an overwhelming manner to also be an authority. Nature in this sense includes the biological and the social and is often viewed from the perspective of a human being. Nature from the human perspective may be individualized and genetically influenced at the subcellular level or at scales larger than the social human community, such as the biospheric, the geospheric, or the cosmic.

In this classification of nature, astrological authorities may be recognized by some as incorporating elements of nature in a unique configuration. Accepting the authority of nature is seen in cancer researchers, who investigate the genetic and proteomic authorship of human experience. Similarly, some ecologists postulate that the earth or the cosmos as a whole is the authority, which, even if impersonal, still operates to order and enforce its own rules. Accepting the authority of nature may also result in evaluating people in relation to nature as authority.

Differences

Different authorities may establish different agendas and operate differently in similar circumstances. In the previous example, both the French and the Chinese authorities opposed selected practices mandated by the practitioner's religious authorities. In other words, both the French and the Chinese authorities elected to be in conflict with particular nonstate or alternate authorities, albeit different authorities, when those alternate authorities are perceived to be a threat to their security. In this sense, authorities have the capacity to determine choices and act if and when an alternate authority interacts with their own. This interaction is a feature of coexisting heritages as well as authority in crisis.

A gender-based analysis can provide an example of an authority in crisis. In such an approach, authority is described or characterized as patriarchal, with attendant consequences for the exercise of that authority. An alternative preference could be a matriarchal authority, which may be different from one consistent with feminist principles.

Received Authority

Received authority is that which one has experienced by tradition and is distinct from authority that one elects to accept and also distinct from competing authority that is imposed contrary to the preferred authority. Received authority includes some characteristics of imposed and elected authorities but is distinguishable from them. In particular, received authority serves as an introductory experience of authority against which subsequent elections or impositions may occur. In practice, one could elect to continue with received authority either as elected authority or as imposed authority. Thus, a child encounters the authority of parents as received authority, which can be discarded for elected authority or continued either as elected or as imposed authority. A prisoner would presumptively be under imposed authority; but where a prisoner prefers the familiarity of life under prison authorities to the unaccustomed orders of life outside, prison authority would be a choice rather than an imposed authority.

Where there is an assertion of authority, challenges to it are a constant feature. Typically, it is not a question of whether or not there are competing authorities but rather the identity, circumstances, and trajectories of those interacting authorities. Coexistence of authorities is possible but not permanent. While crises of authorities have always been present in human societies everywhere, they may be differentiated by their circumstances. Some scholars distinguish a "modern" crisis of authority, which is marked by the experience of a problematic relationship with the past. In the modern frame, one must choose between preferred and alternative versions of heritage. From a past in which there have been traditional certainties with cosmology and community reflecting each other, modernity distinguishes and discontinues the association between cosmology and history.

Competition Between Authorities

Competition between religious and state authorities is not universal. Where these authorities are dominant and contemporaneous, their operations are modified by the larger societies in which they are to be found. For instance, in the tradition of the British, the dominant authority in society is alleged to be the "rule of law." The British monarchy is therefore described as a constitutional monarchy subject to the authority of the law. The same monarch is the ruler of 23 kingdoms, each with a configuration distinct from the others. For example, the Queen of England is also the Queen of Canada and Australia. However, these jurisdictions have constitutions that are neither the same as the English one nor the same as each other. Additionally, the same Queen is also the head of the religious organization known as the Church of England. Any description of the authority of the Queen of England or other such authorities may therefore be considerably complex.

Determinants of social distinctions between heritage authorities results in unevenness. For instance, not all societies distinguish between religion and the secular, as is common in modern dominant regimes principally associated with the United States and Europe. Where such modern distinctions have interacted with some of the more enduring heritage authorities, they are not uniform across cultures. India, for example, claims to be a secular state, apparently in conformance with modernity, but does acknowledge the validity and enforceability of Hindu and Muslim religious laws in particular circumstances. In North America, by comparison, a substantial portion of allegedly modern secular state legal regimes may be indistinguishable from the heritage of some Christian denominations.

Modernity

At the nexus of intersecting authorities, whether heritage or modern, complex dynamics operate. Within the realm of modern secular authority, ecclesiastical or religious authorities can be recognized in various places. For instance, in modern secular India, social authorities can derive from traditions that may or may not include enumerations such as the Laws of Manu. Additionally, the modern concept of religion is not in the Hindu traditions—there is no word in Hindi that directly translates the English word religion. Religious authority in this context does not have the same profile as it would in England. The implication is that contests between religious and secular authorities could have widely divergent meanings in England and in India.

The interaction of modern authorities with the heritages of aboriginal peoples in various parts of the world has operated in an imperial manner, which may have been clearly at variance with their own traditional authorities. Whether these traditional authorities are termed religious or not, they are usually distinct from the other contemporaneous authorities. Authority may therefore operate regardless of whether a society is more regular and crystalline or diffuse and amorphous.

Modern scientific authorities have developed and operated differently than other heritage authorities to play a dominant role in contemporary societies. Authority in this context is achieved and validated through rigorous compliance with the scientific method. The same scientific authority can also recognize the authority and laws of nature. A distinction between authority such as DNA and the social contextual authority is sometimes referred to as a distinction between nature and nurture.

Community

In the arena of social interaction, community authority may be expressed through democratic or other processes and embodied in the state. State authority then may represent community interests in one form or another. In some configurations, such as a federation, state authority may be distributed across various offices, including a federal authority. Conceptually, in the context of federated states such as Canada and the United States, constitutional authority is located in the state and delegated either federally or locally to municipalities. In this sense, it is appropriate to distinguish between original and delegated authorities. The original authority includes the capability of unilaterally withdrawing the delegated authority. Similar concepts arise under the concept of agency and its regulatory regimes. In some circumstances, delegated authority can also include fiduciary obligations. For example, when one is authorized to use the resources of another, it could be found to be a matter of trust that bears its own accountability and responsibilities. An executor of a will or someone named as power of attorney or a trustee has fiduciary obligations.

Etymologically, fiduciary, from the Latin fides, is also related to the term trust, which is an aspect of “faith.” In the interests of the community, authority is public, in that the community expects it to include a sense of trust and faith between the parties involved. This trust is not exclusive to forms of authority but may present differing characteristics in varying contexts. For some, faith in God and the authority of God is an originating principle from which to consider reality. For others, it is the perceived betrayal of the exercise of fiduciary authority that leads to a rejection of that authority, whether human, divine, or otherwise. For the authority invested with fiduciary characteristics, there are consequences enforced by the community.

Systemic Temporality

From a systemic perspective, it is the arrangement of power gradients that remains an essential consideration. Power gradients in authority can also operate through impersonal expressions, which can distinguish dogma from opinion or classification of a language as distinct from a dialect. Authority competing in a more dramatic expression can be seen in contexts of terrorism, torture, and invasive forms of interrogation. The exercise of imperial authority may be associated with modern and religious enterprises. Not all religious authorities operate in an imperial mode. Proselytizing activities that are integral responsibilities of some religious traditions can be constructive and involve competition with existing authorities regardless of their origins. Such authorities may also present socially in charismatic forms.

Paradoxically, authority can be rejected and revered at the same time, as may be encountered more usually in heritage authority relationships such as family and religious communities. Whether heritage or modern, authority preserves and validates the views of those who subscribe to the orthodox views or dispute the same views. Evolving or, perhaps more correctly, changing circumstances are not unusual, and the experience of transitions between authorities may be a normal condition of life. In this sense, authority is encountered as a temporal matter. However, the location of ultimate authority, whether religious or not, is not always described as being within temporality.

AUTOCHTHONOUS CHRISTIANS IN LATIN AMERICA

In Latin America, the term autochthonous Christians does not refer to the totality of Latin Americans who profess a Christian faith; rather, it refers specifically to the Native Americans—that is, the indigenous population evangelized by the Catholic Church within the framework of Spanish colonization. The demographic estimate of this population is problematic due to the permeability of the borders between the indigenous world and the mestizo society. Thus, their respective delineation depends on ethnic, cultural, and social criteria, which are constantly debated in the social sciences. Indigenous cultures are principally located in Mesoamerica (Guatemala and Mexico) and in the central Andes (Bolivia, Peru, and Ecuador), with majority populations in Bolivia and Guatemala and minority populations in all other countries of the region.

Beyond the demographic aspect, the indigenous inheritance is notable for its importance in the Latin American collective imagination while simultaneously carrying social stigma and being a factor for discrimination. Syncretism characterizes indigenous religiosity; the combination of Catholic elements with native cultural traits distinguishes it from traditional Catholicism. Historically, there are notable exceptions to the Catholic hegemony over indigenous religiosity, such as the conversion of the Misquitos of the Nicaraguan and Honduran Caribbean to the Moravian Church in the 19th century.

Currently, indigenous religiosity is mobilized in movements related to the affirmation of indigenous cultural identity. Their demands have often been promoted by the Catholic Church in places such as Chiapas, Mexico, where, in 1960, the San Cristobal de las Casas diocese, led by Bishop Samuel Ruiz, initiated a project to build an “autochthonous church.” This project attempted to respond to the shortage of Catholic clergy in the area with the training of indigenous deacons. Furthermore, the autochthonous church project was aligned with Liberation Theology, intending to link the political commitment to social change with the defense of the indigenous people’s collective rights. The “conscientization” work of the pastoral agents of the diocese in indigenous communities showed its impact with the Zapatista Army for National Liberation uprising in 1994. At other times, the same demands escaped the Catholic Church's control, as in the Bolivian attempt, promoted by the government of Evo Morales with the objective of decolonizing indigenous beliefs, to reconstruct the Andean religion, which is still marked by the Catholic influence.

Although historically linked to Catholicism, the syncretism (the combination of different forms of belief) of indigenous religiosity is also implicated in the current erosion of the Catholic faith throughout Latin America and the growth of new religious denominations, mainly the evangelical and Pentecostal churches. This process, which is particularly acute in territories with a strong indigenous presence, is a testament to the dynamism of the indigenous world and to the breaches with their traditional customs in a regional context of sociopolitical change. Pluralism within the indigenous world has exceeded the limits of Catholicism as well as the ideological framework of political demands for a substantive indigenous identity, thereby paradoxically affirming itself in an apparently alien religious universe.

AXIAL AGE

The Axial Age was a significant moment in the development of ancient religious cultures. In 1949, the German philosopher Karl Jaspers (1883–1969) suggested the term Axial Age, or Axial Turn, for the period around the fifth century BCE, a time when, throughout much of the world, a new kind of thinking gained force. It questioned wisdom based on tribe, tradition, or shamanic mysticism, offering instead new answers, grounded at least in part in intellectual analysis, concerning the gods, the nature of the universe, and the meaning of human life, and emphasizing individual freedom and moral responsibility. Jaspers also stressed that while in pre-Axial societies the spiritual world tended to be close to earth and a model of the earthly world, now the divine was far more transcendent, and salvation was a matter of individually bridging that divide.

These were the years of Confucius and Lao Ze in China, the Buddha and the Upanishads in India, perhaps Zarathustra in Persia, the earliest Greek philosophers, and the greatest Hebrew prophets. Some religious studies scholars have expanded the Axial Age to include the emergence of the major global religions, including Christianity and Islam, or at least have recognized the significance of the Axial Age in their prehistorical development. The later evolution of Judaism and the spread of Hellenism in the wake of Alexander the Great, with their subsequent immense influence on religion and culture, are no less products of the Axial Age.

The Axial Age, and the appearance of individual religious prophets and founders, was undoubtedly a result of the earlier invention of writing, which led to recorded awareness of history and individual experience and made scriptures possible. After the fifth century BCE, the major literate religions can be viewed in terms of three principles that, while they certainly had earlier antecedents, were especially well honed by the Axial Age kind of consciousness. These principles are as follows: (1) an awareness that human life is lived in the context of historical time, within which new revelations can be received or teachings uttered and which itself can have spiritual meaning as the arena of spiritual warfare and (even if ultimately cyclical) is bounded by creation and consummation; (2) the realization that individual humans can be the agents of these revelations and can achieve spiritual eminence in historical time, as did Confucius, the Buddha, Jesus, and Muhammad; and (3) recognition to a radical degree that the spiritual destiny of the individual is based on his or her own choices, whether expressed in the language of karma and reincarnation or of sin, faith, and forgiveness.

The Axial Age wrought a vast and potentially global change in human consciousness, though of course it took many centuries for its impact to permeate the globe.

AYAHUASCA RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS

Ayahuasca, or yagé, is an entheogenic (psychoactive substance used in a religious context) brew ritually used by at least 70 tribes in the greater Amazon rainforest since prehistoric times. The word ayahuasca in Quechua means “vine of the soul,” connoting its spiritual usage. It is made by boiling a jungle vine (Banisteriopsis caapi) with various admixture plants in a unique synergistic combination that renders it strongly psychoactive. Since the 20th century, ritual use of the brew has spread from indigenous groups to mestizo healers and to organized syncretic churches (those formed from the combination of different beliefs) that have attracted members throughout the industrialized world.

Each of the native tribes has distinct traditions, but most use ayahuasca in small ceremonies at night accompanied by chanting and a rattle or drum. Along with mythological significance, it is believed that ayahuasca provides the possibility of a connection between the human world and that of the spirits, ancestors. Ayahuasca is also associated with the origins of language and humankind.

In frontier communities, mestizo healers called vegetalistas use yagé’s purgative effects to treat parasites, and its visionary power is used by a trained vegetalista to determine the cause of disease and produce a spiritual cure for the patient. Since interest in psychedelics arose in the United States and Europe in the 1960s, there have been a growing number of vegetalistas who have toured in these countries offering yagé rituals.

In the 20th century, the brew spawned new religious movements in Brazil that have become global in scope. The União do Vegetal (UDV) Church and the Santo Daime Church have each established centers in many other countries in the Americas, Europe, Africa, Japan, and Australia. Santo Daime ceremonies are characterized by group singing of hymns, periods of silent concentration, and mediumship sessions when mediums channel the spirits of caboclos (“Brazilian Indians”) and other guides for the healing of other participants. The União do Vegetal is a more rationalized tradition; its meetings consist of silence or recorded music followed by sermons and discussion, with no mediumship. Both of these traditions represent a religious innovation that brought the ritual use of ayahuasca out of its indigenous context in the forest and combined it with elements of folk Catholicism, Afro-Brazilian religions, and a neo-esoteric doctrine.

In addition to the organized churches, use of the brew has also spawned a number of smaller neo-ayahuasca religious groups that combine the entheogen with pagan, New Age, or text-based shamanic practices. The draw of the religious ayahuasca experience has also created a flourishing tourism industry, bringing foreigners to retreat centers in the Amazon. With the inevitable addition of more such groups, ayahuasca religion will likely continue to grow as a global phenomenon.

AYODHYA MOSQUE ATTACK

Ayodhya is a town in northern India that has been the location of a contested sacred site revered by both Muslims and Hindus. The conflict—and the dramatic destruction of the site’s mosque—has had national and even global political implications. The 1992 confrontation at the site is regarded as a benchmark in the global rise of religious activism against the secular state.

The town of Ayodhya is the capital of the old princely state of Awadh, and archaeological evidence indicates that it was also the location of an ancient Hindu temple. According to many Hindus, the ancient temple site is significant indeed; they claim that it is in fact the location of the birthplace of the god Ram. It was on this site that the Moghul emperor Babar constructed a mosque in 1528, perhaps demolishing the earlier temple to do so.

In the 1980s, with the rise of a new Hindu nationalism led by the right-wing political movement the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP), Ayodhya became the center of a political battle. The Babri Mosque became the symbol of the Indian government’s secular stance—a position that protected all religious sites equally, including Muslim sites located on contested lands. The VHP wanted to make the point that the secularism of the government was in fact a pro-Muslim and anti-Hindu attitude. The rising anger of the Hindu activists was aimed as much at the secular state as at the Muslim community in India, which revered the mosque.

In 1992, the VHP sponsored a rally in Ayodhya to protest the Indian government’s continued protection of the Babri Mosque. Though the town had less than 50,000 inhabitants, a crowd three times that size appeared at the location, demanding access to the site. The small police force guarding the mosque was quickly overwhelmed, and the crowd swarmed over the building, using sticks and broken fences to beat down the ancient edifice into pieces.

The destruction of the mosque led to tensions between Hindu and Muslim groups throughout the country. Although leaders of the new religious party, the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), distanced themselves from the actions of the mob, the rising sense of Hindu political power that the Ayodhya event symbolized helped bolster the strength of the party. A series of electoral successes ensued, and from 1998 to 2004, the BJP led India as the ruling party of a coalition government.

The site of the demolished mosque remained vacant after the 1992 destruction, protected by government security forces. In 2010, the Lucknow bench of the Allahabad High Court proclaimed its long-awaited verdict on which religious groups should have rights to the disputed land. In a Solomon-like decision, the court awarded stewardship of the site to both Hindu and Muslim organizations, but the decision was subsequently stayed by the Supreme Court on appeal and uncertainty about its fate continued for some time after.

AZERBAIJAN

The Azerbaijani nation in southeast Europe was formed as a result of the invasion of Turkic-speaking nomadic tribes into the South Caucasus in the 11th century, followed by a complex process of consolidation of Turkic and local Iranian groups.

After the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, Azerbaijan became an independent republic. Azerbaijan was secularized during the Soviet era. This feature of the Soviet Azerbaijan has been formally endorsed in the constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan; however, a slight trend of religious revival in Azerbaijan has emerged since the country's independence.

According to the official statistics, 97% of Azerbaijan's population is Muslim. Russian Orthodox Christians (also Armenian Orthodox before the breakup of the Soviet Union) and Jews are the largest religious minority groups; also, small congregations of Roman Catholics, Protestant denominations, Seventh-Day Adventists, Molokans (Russian Orthodox Old Believers), and Baha'is have been present in Azerbaijan for more than a century. New religious groups have emerged in the country during the past 15 years, including Wahhabi Muslims, Pentecostal and evangelical Christians, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Hare Krishnas.

According to the State Committee on Work With Religious Associations of Azerbaijan, the Muslim denomination ratio is 65% Shi'a and 35% Sunnī. However, religious observance among the followers of both denominations is not high, with intergroup differences weakly defined. Also, Muslim identity is based more on ethnicity and culture than on religion. A Gallup poll on Religion in the World conducted in 2009 demonstrated that only 14% of the Azerbaijani respondents pray every day, 30% admit that they do so "less often," and 25% of the Azeri's say that they never bow in the direction of Mecca (Makkah). The depth of Azerbaijan's secularity has both Soviet and pre-Soviet history. The country's own version of Islam, one that has been heavily influenced by Sufi mystics over the centuries, has contributed to the undogmatic interpretation of religious decrees that is characteristic of secular nations such as Azerbaijan.

According to the provisions of the constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, persons of all faiths may choose and practice their religion without restriction by joining or establishing the religious group of their choice. The Law on Religious Freedom prohibits the government from interfering in the religious activities of any individual or group. The law, however, allows the state to interfere if the activities of a religious group threaten public order and stability and prohibits foreigners from proselytizing. The law also requires all religious organizations, including congregations of denominations, to pass through a seven-step application process in order to be registered by the government registration. Unregistered organizations are not considered legal entities and are vulnerable to attacks and closures by the authorities. Some human right groups characterize similar requirements as restrictive and enable the government to regulate the religious realm.

AZTECS

Aztecs are a people and culture of ancient Central America. What is often referred to as "Aztec" should properly be understood with the much more limited referent, Tenochca. Aztec is a term constructed in the 19th century to refer to the culture of an empire ruled by an alliance of three cities in the Basin of Mexico. The Tenochca lineage, a subgroup of the Mexica, held the lead position in the Aztec Triple Alliance. Much of what we recognize today as Aztec religion, therefore, should properly be considered the religion of one ethnicity—that of the Tenochca—inflated to constitute a state religion. This entry reviews some Aztec and Tenochca religions as well as some of their ideological descendants.

Origins

During the postclassic period (900–1500 CE), the dominant lineages within the Basin of Mexico placed their origin in the mythical location of Chicomoztoc (“Seven Caves Place”). Seven distinct tribes left these caves in primordial times to populate the Basin of Mexico. One tribe, however, traced its origin to the city of Aztlan (“Place of Herons”). It is unclear whether Aztlan was a place within Chicomoztoc or whether it was a separate place entirely. Regardless, this tribe left Aztlan, following its leader Mexi to become known as the Mexica.

Mexi led his people following a teotl known as Huitzilopochtli (“Hummingbird of the South”). The term teotl is often translated as “god,” “deity,” or “a personification of some force of nature.” None of these is entirely accurate, but each hints at the roles of teteo (plural of teotl) in important ways. Although abstract, one should think of teteo as complex entities of power that interact with each other and with humans in multiple ways. Huitzilopochtli’s mythic birth sheds light on his character as the primary teotl of the Mexica. The story begins with his mother, Coatlicue (“Serpent Skirt”), sweeping the steps of her home. A ball of feathers stirred up by her sweeping lands in her bosom and magically impregnates her. Her pregnancy causes controversy among Coatlicue’s grown children, who are led by the eldest, Coyolxauhqui (“Bells on Her Face”). Coyolxauhqui plots with her brothers to kill her mother before the baby is born, but the child within, Huitzilopochtli, discovers the plan and consoles his mother. He is then born in full battle regalia and immediately attacks and disposes of his sister, Coyolxauhqui, along with their 400 brothers. Having defeated his adversaries, Huitzilopochtli becomes a teotl of war with a solar affiliation.

In historic times, Huitzilopochtli communicated with the Mexica priests through their dreams along an epic journey from Aztlan. The tribe traveled as chichimeca (“nomadic people”), killing rabbits for food and engaging cities in battle. They soon established a reputation as warriors and were from time to time brought into alliances with established cities as mercenaries.

Along their journey, the Mexica fractured into opposing lineages. The lineage that would continue on, the Tenochca, remained dedicated to Huitzilopochtli and the quest for their promised land: Tenochtitlán (“Place of Stone and Cactus”). When they finally arrived at the site of a cactus so tall that an eagle kept its nest at the top, in the early 14th century, they found the land to be virtually inhospitable. They worked tirelessly, adapting the agricultural practices of their neighbors to transform Tenochtitlán into an island city, which almost 200 years later the Spaniard Bernal Díaz del Castillo described as “rising from the water, all made of stone, seem[ing] like an enchanted vision from the tale of [Atlantis]. Indeed, some of our soldiers asked whether it was not all a dream” (1984, p. 16).

Using their military prowess, the Tenochca became powerful among the cities controlling the Basin of Mexico. During the mid-15th century, they entered an alliance with the cities of Texcoco and Tlacopan, which went on to conquer much of Mesoamerica. In the process, the tribal religion of the Tenochca was transformed into a religion of the imperial government. Much of the specific adaptation was brought about under the counsel of Tlacaélel, advisor to the fifth tlatoani (“one who speaks,” “ruler”), Motecuhzoma Ilhuicamina (namesake of the ninth tlatoani, who would meet Hernán Cortés).

Imperial Religion

The city of Tenochtitlán itself was built to reflect a conflation of the tribe specific with the regionally universal. The dominant physical structure at the center of the city—now mostly underneath Mexico City—is known as the Templo Mayor. The Templo Mayor’s large pyramidal base resembled most other temples throughout Mesoamerica, but it bucked tradition with two small temples at its top rather than one. Each of these temples was dedicated to a different deity: one to Huitzilopochtli as a teotl of war and fire and the other to Tlaloc, the regional (and quite ancient) storm teotl. Thus, “fire” and “water” sat at the top of the primary temple at Tenochtitlán. In central Mexican codices, the glyph of “burning water” represented “war”; thus, the Tenochca made it clear that their civilization was founded on and maintained by war.

Along with Tlaloc, the imperial Aztec religion honored Quetzalcoatl with a temple across the central plaza from the Templo Mayor. The concept of “quetzalcoatl” is a strong example of a teotl, used for a primordial “god,” a historic figure, and the highest order of the Aztec priesthood. The name itself is also provocative, constituted by a bird (quetzal) and a reptile (coatl, for “serpent”). This combination of creatures would have had access to all three levels of the Aztec cosmos (the upper as that above the trees, including the stars; the middle as that on the surface of the earth; and the lower as that below the surface of the earth). The human Quetzalcoatl lived at the historical place of origin for all city-dwelling members of the Basin of Mexico: Tollan (the archaeological site of Tula). Here, Quetzalcoatl reigned as a peaceful lord of the Toltecs but banished himself after he was tricked by his nemesis. Legend has it that he went east, where he boarded a raft of snakes and sailed across the ocean to become Venus, the morning star.

In ordering the empire, the Tenochca followed the practice of all of Mesoamerica in tracking time according to two primary calendric elements: the tonalpohualli and the xiuhpohualli. The tonalpohualli comprised 13 numbers and 20 day signs to produce a 260-day round. The day signs carried oracular meanings, which were often tied to specific teteo, so a child’s birth date carried with it something of the fate of the child. The xiuhpohualli functioned more like a solar year, made up of 18 months of 20 days each and 1 month of 5 days. The government sponsored great celebrations at the inauguration of each month, consuming much of the tribute gathered from throughout the empire.

Many of the elements of the calendric system are captured in what today is known as the Aztec calendar stone. More properly considered a cosmogram, the stone sculpture depicts the order of the universe under Aztec rule. The central face is that of the Fifth Sun; the Aztecs recognized four previous “suns” or eras, each ending in disaster. The Fifth Sun, beginning on the Day 4 ollin (meaning “movement”) in the tonalpohualli was predicted to end with earthquakes. The inaugural dates for the previous suns are all contained within the inner cartouche of the calendar stone, which is in turn contained within a ring of the 20 day signs. Various other calendric elements make up the rest of the stone, and stellar constellations were carved around the border.

In considering Aztec religion, much is often made of the role of human sacrifice. Sixteenth-century chroniclers provide records of tremendous sacrificial spectacles said to propitiate “the gods.” This issue leads to the central issue in describing Aztec religion: The sources are exceedingly difficult to interpret. The eyewitness accounts (of which there are only two) were recorded in documents intended to justify their own acts of unprovoked war against the Aztecs. All of the other accounts are based on retrospective hearsay or come from Western interpretations of native books (codices) recording mythological or possibly metaphoric information. This is not to suggest that human sacrifice was not practiced in Aztec society; but it is more productive to consider it as a technology of the state, just as it functioned in many ancient societies, rather than as a fundamental religious tenet.

Religious Descendants

One might be tempted to claim that the Aztec religion ended with the conquest of the Aztec Empire, but that would be to buy into the fiction of the term itself. On the other hand, to identify “Aztec” with the constellation of beliefs, rituals, and traditions common within the empire is to open up the recognition of several descendants or at least relatives of Aztec religion. For one, Spanish missionary “conversions” most often resulted in the integration of Christianity with indigenous religions. These have propagated into contemporary times and can be witnessed in rural Mexico and Central America in Catholic churches through conflation of Jesus with the Sun and through the use of copal as incense and tortillas as “the bread of Christ.” The origin of the Virgen de Guadalupe in the indigenous Tonantzin (“Our Dear Mother”) is another well-known example.

Not all indigenous communities welcomed conversion, though, and many of these maintained indigenous religious traditions resonant with those of the Aztec. Some of these traditions persisted through the colonial period and coalesced during the early 20th century around a ritual dance known as danza Azteca or danza de los concheros.

The Chicano movement in California, the Southwest, and the northern Midwest then brought Danza Azteca into the United States via the 1960s civil rights movement. Chicana and Chicano activists, artists, and scholars drew and continue to draw from Danza and various sources of Aztec religion in their cultural production. It is important to recognize that, again, these are not properly “Aztec” either; modern manifestations are agglutinizations of various religious sources, brought together by survival tactics or, more recently, by economic convenience generated through globalization.

BAB, SAYYID ‘ALI MUHAMMAD (1819–1850)

Sayyid ‘Ali Muhammad Shirazi (the Bab), a merchant from Shiraz in southern Iran and direct descendant of the prophet Muhammad, was the founder of the Babi movement, the precursor of the Baha’i Faith. Despite the fact that he had had no formal training in Arabic or the religious sciences, the Bab began in 1844 to write Arabic books that he claimed were from God. At first, his claim appeared to be that he was the Bab (lit. “Gate”), the intermediary between the people and the Shi’a messianic figure, Imam Mahdi. He dispersed his first group of 18 disciples (the “Letters of the Living”) to spread the news of his claim, but these were rejected by the senior Shi’a religious leaders, albeit many of his followers were junior members of the religious establishment. Following a pilgrimage to Mecca, he was placed under house arrest in Shiraz.

In 1846, he went to Isfahan, where he was protected by the governor Manuchihr Khan. When the latter died, however, Prime Minister Haji Mirza Aqasi sent the Bab as prisoner successively to two remote fortresses in northwest Iran. In 1848, at a court in Tabriz, presided over by the heir apparent, the Bab announced that he was in fact the expected Imam Mahdi. At the same time, he issued a book containing laws that he said abrogated the Islamic laws and ended the Islamic dispensation. He was executed in Tabriz in 1850. His body was recovered and later transported to and buried in a mausoleum on Mt. Carmel, then in the Ottoman province of Syria and now in the state of Israel. This mausoleum is now a site of pilgrimage for Baha’is.

The context of the teachings of the Bab is the world of Shi’a Islam and Iran, but he looked beyond this also. He called on all the peoples of the world to accept his claim, he looked favorably on Europeans, and he aimed to move Iran toward acceptance of the inventions and concepts of the modern world (this at a time when almost all Iranian clerics were vehemently anti-European and antimodernity). In many ways, moreover, he laid the foundations for the globalization seen in later Baha’i teachings. For example, the Bab sacralized the whole earth by teaching that everything is a manifestation of the Divine names and attributes and that the Divine grace flows to all regardless of whether they are grateful for it or not, so human beings should also show grace and bounty to all regardless of whether it is reciprocated or not—thus paving the way for the Baha’i teaching that human beings should not see one another as strangers but that they are all one family without division between the saved and not saved or between the pure and the impure.

BABI

The Babi movement arose in Iran in the 19th century out of Shi'a Islam. It caused a major upheaval in the country and was eventually suppressed. Out of it arose the Baha'i Faith. In 1844, the Bab put forward a religious claim. This claim was received enthusiastically, especially by members of the Shaykhi school of Shi'a Islam, whose founders had prepared their followers for just such an announcement. The Babi movement spread rapidly soon, attracting possibly as many as 100,000 people across Iran and Iraq. The Bab's teaching encountered great opposition, however, from Islamic religious leaders, who perceived it to be heretical and considered the Bab's anticlerical stance a challenge to their authority and wealth. During a turbulent period from 1848 to 1850, there were three major upheavals in which the Babis were greatly outnumbered and crushed by government troops. After a failed attempt on the life of the shah by a small number of Babis in 1852, orders were sent for a general massacre of Babis. The heroism of the Babis made a great impression among 19th-century European intellectuals such as Ernest Renan and Matthew Arnold and later E. G. Browne of Cambridge University and Leo Tolstoy, while the female disciple of the Bab, Tahirih Qurrat al-'Ayn (killed in 1852) continues to be a feminist icon in Iran.

In the Bab's writings, he had frequently mentioned a messianic figure that was to follow him, "He whom God shall make manifest" (mentioned more than 80 times in the Bab's major work, the Persian Bayan; for examples in English translation, see Selections From the Writings of the Báb, pp. 80, 83, 85, 86, 93, 95, 97, 98). In 1863 privately and in 1868 publically, Baha'u'llah (q.v.) claimed to be this figure, and the vast majority (probably 95%) of the Babis accepted this claim and became Baha'is. Among those who rejected this claim, most followed Mirza Yahya Azal and are called Azali Babis. While the Baha'is moved in the direction of obedience to the government and creating an alternative society within their community, some of the Azalis played an important role in the Iranian reform movement and the Constitutional Revolution of 1906 to 1909. There are still a few thousand Azalis, almost exclusively in Iran (where they conceal their faith) and among ex-patriot Iranians.

The Babi movement was a native Iranian movement that some say could have brought Iran into the modern world by providing a non-European model of modernization. The pattern of suppression established in respect of the Babis was later applied to the Baha'i religion also, thus setting up more than a century of persecution, which had its own negative effects on Iranian society.

BAHA'I

The Baha'i Faith is a religion that originated in the Middle East in the mid-19th century but can now be said to be global in its spread and to have the concept and goal of globalization at the heart of its teachings.

History

The Baha'i Faith arose out of the Babi religion. Baha'u'llah (1817–1892, q.v.), the founder of the religion, was exiled from his native Iran successively to Baghdad, Istanbul, Edirne, and finally to Akka (Acco) in what was then the Ottoman province of Syria and now is in the state of Israel. The spiritual center of the Baha'i Faith is the shrine of Baha'u'llah near Akka, while the world administrative center is on Mt. Carmel in Haifa. Under the successive leaders of the Baha'i Faith, 'Abdu'l-Baha (1844–1921), who led the religion from 1892 to 1921, and Shoghi Effendi (1897–1957), who led it from 1921 to 1957, the religion moved away from its Islamic origins and spread throughout the world.

The religion is now established, according to its own 2006 statistics, in 191 countries, with some 5 million adherents among 2,112 indigenous tribes, races, and ethnic groups. Independent sources broadly agree with these figures and reckon it to be the second most widespread religion after Christianity. A framework of local and national elected councils (called Local and National Spiritual Assemblies) has been established in 179 countries, and these form the basis for the election of the Universal House of Justice, the present head of the religion. There is essentially a single united Baha'i community; sectarian groups and dissident factions are insignificant in numbers and influence.

Global Teachings

The vision of a single united world can be said to be at the heart of Baha'u'llah's teachings. In the late 19th century, when the process of globalization was underway in the world but was swamped by a much stronger nationalist movement, Baha'u'llah stated that love of one's country should be superseded by a vision of the whole earth as one united and peaceful country under democratic rule.

Baha'u'llah's successor, 'Abdu'l-Baha, went on to detail those factors that were obstacles to a united world. He spoke during his public addresses in North America and Europe of the need, for example, to eliminate extremes of poverty and wealth, to achieve universal education, to advance the social role of women, to bring science and religion into harmony, and to educate humanity away from all types of prejudice (e.g., racial, religious, class, gender). Thus, for example, the lack of gender equality perpetrates an injustice and promotes in men harmful attitudes and habits that are carried from the family to the workplace, to political life, and ultimately to international relations.

Global Structures

In the writings of the central figures of the Baha'i Faith, there are a number of specific suggestions oriented toward global unity. For example, in the 1870s, Baha'u'llah called for an international conference of the world's kings and rulers to resolve all outstanding issues between nations and to agree on collective security based on binding treaties, following which nations should agree to reduce their armaments to a level that would preserve internal order and to use the savings from this for social development. Expanding on these ideas, his successors wrote of the need for measures such as an international parliament, a world executive, a world tribunal with powers to enforce its judgments, a constitution for a global system of governance, a world currency, an international language to be learned by all in addition to their mother tongue, and an international system of weights and measures. They outlined how a united world should operate at the communal and global levels. For example, at the global level, the culture of conflict that has characterized most international relations is to be replaced with a more cooperative system of governance, evolving away from the model of relations between states that is driven by hegemony, excessive national sovereignty, and power and toward a system of collective security, collaborative problem solving, and formulation of and adherence to a single code of international law. Thus, the same changes are envisaged as occurring in this process of world unification as happened when, for example, the different states came together to form the United States of America.

Similarly, within societies, structures and processes that have largely been based on competitiveness, conflict, power, and social control are to be replaced by ones based on cooperation and a striving for excellence. The new model is designed to reverse the extreme competitiveness of business that results in environmental damage and to eliminate the personal damage done to individuals as they strive to compete within such flawed systems. To protect the individual, there is also a call for human rights to be legally established and the right of appeal by the individual to the highest international level.

Indeed, the Baha'i leaders structured the Baha'i community to be a model for the radical social changes that the Baha'i Faith is trying to bring into being. Therefore, among the features of Baha'i community structure are the following: that authority is not given to individuals but to elected institutions, the removal of the competitive and campaigning nature of the election process, consultative decision making, processes designed to ensure that minority groups and oppressed segments of society are able to have an input into these consultative processes, and subsidiarity and the decentralization of power. The Universal House of Justice is currently engaged in a program designed to empower individual Baha'is to take a more active part in community life and social affairs, to create mechanisms that will allow local learning to be generated from cycles of action-reflection-learning-planning, which will act as a basis on which Baha'i communities can become involved in solving local social problems and thus enable them to take a more active and informed role in human discourse.

Spiritual Basis of Globalization

The above descriptions may give the impression that the Baha'i Faith is a social or political movement, and so it is important to be clear that at the base of these social teachings and community structures are spiritual principles and beliefs. Underlying the belief in the oneness of humanity, for example, is a belief in the nobility of each human being as the repository of all the names and attributes of God. This spiritual reality is more important than a human being's physical body, and the goal of an individual should be perfecting these spiritual attributes.

Another Baha'i concept that is important for the move toward a united world is the underlying unity of religion: that religious truth is not absolute but relative, that the revelation of religious truth by the founders of the world religions is a continuous and progressive process, that all the great religions of the world are divine in origin, that their basic spiritual principles are in harmony, that their aims and purposes are one and the same, that their functions are complementary, that they differ only in the nonessential aspects of their doctrines, and that their missions represent successive stages in the spiritual evolution of human society. In view of these teachings, the Universal House of Justice has called on the world's religious leaders to put aside their differences and work together in harmony for the general good while upholding the individual's freedom of religion and belief.

It is a basic Baha'i premise that the desired social and global goals described above cannot be achieved unless there is a concomitant spiritual change in individual human beings; a change to be brought about by prayer, fasting, the study of scripture, meditation, and a commitment to service. Humanity needs to become less materialistic and more spiritually oriented. This does not mean that people should be content with poverty but that the excessive advertising-driven consumerism of the present is not the right framework for happiness and contentment in human life. Humanity needs to develop communities where all individuals are given the chance to develop their potential, where work is done in the spirit of service and not merely to obtain money, where all are enabled to earn their living by their calling, where those engaged in the arts, sciences, crafts, technology, and the professions are all appreciated for their contribution to society.

Globalization is seen in the Baha'i writings as an inevitable process, the next step in humanity's progress. All the above-described elements—the changes to the international order, the social changes needed, and the spiritualization of the individual—are important and interdependent. According to Baha'i teachings, it is fruitless to try to pursue one at the expense of the others; a successful globalization of the world can only be achieved in this holistic manner.

BAHAMAS

The nation of the Bahamas consists of more than 700 low-lying islands, keys, and rocks extending 500 miles (1 mile = 1.61 kilometers) southeast off the coast of Florida. The Bahamas was the site of Columbus's 1492 landfall in the New World. It was a British colony from 1783 to 1973. Now independent, it remains a member of the British Commonwealth.

The 37 inhabited islands have a population of about 300,000. About two thirds of the population reside on New Providence Island (the location of town of Nassau). More than 85% of the population have descended from African slaves—the majority of whom were of Yoruba ancestry. The slaves were imported directly from Africa or brought by slave-owning British loyalists following the American Revolution. In addition, there are mixed Black/Amerindians (the Black Seminoles of Andros Island). The U.S. State Department's Country Reports on Human Rights Practices estimates are that there are between 20,000 and 40,000 illegal Haitians who are residing in the Bahamas. Fifteen percent of the population are of European origin. A majority are descendants of early British settlers and North Americans from New York, the Carolinas, and Virginia. Also included in this 15% is a community of Greek Orthodox—whose descendants worked as sponge fishermen—and a long-standing Jewish community.

The prominence of religion on the islands can be traced to the Puritans of Eleuthera, who escaped to the Bahamas to flee what they saw as religious oppression in England. Christianity was and is the dominant religion in the Bahamas. Christian rites such as baptisms and confirmations constitute the major rites of passage in Bahamian society. Festivals and quasi-religious celebrations also play an important part in the culture with the Fox Hill Festival and Junkanoo. Junkanoo—much like the Carnival elsewhere in the Caribbean—is characterized by parades, costumes, dance, and food. The tradition grew out of a break granted to slaves each year during the Christmas season. While Jamaicans claim to have the greatest number of churches per square kilometer, Bahamians say that they have the largest number of churches per capita in the world.

Religious affiliations vary from island to island. The overwhelming majority of Bahamians (more than 76%) are conservative Protestants (fundamentalists and/or evangelicals). Baptists constitute the single largest denomination and account for more than 35% of the population. Roman Catholics and Anglicans represent 13% and 15% of the population, respectively. Eight percent of Bahamians are Pentecostal; 4% are Methodists; and 5% are Church of God. The 2006 CIA Factbook reports 13,844 Seventh-Day Adventists; 1,607 Jehovah's Witnesses, and 200 Jews.

Bahamians are religious pluralists and attend their own churches and services at other churches as well. Denominations represented on the islands are Anglican, Assembly of God, Ba'hai Faith, Baptist, Brethren, Christian and Missionary Alliance, Christian Science, Church of God of Prophecy, Greek Orthodox, Jehovah's Witnesses, Jewish, Latter-Day Saints (Mormon), Lutheran, Methodist, Presbyterian, Roman Catholic, and Seventh-Day Adventist. Adventists are the fourth largest religious denomination in the Bahamas, consisting of 40 churches scattered throughout the islands. Less than 2% of Bahamians self-report as "nonreligious." Pentecostal groups are the fastest growing. Social scientist Dean Collinwood—himself a Mormon—has charted a growing Mormon community. On most islands, Obeah practices have been noted.

Obeah is a complex of African-based spiritual beliefs addressing the spirit world, the interpretation of dreams, and dealing with problems of good and evil. Its origins are mainly Yoruban. Obeah practitioners use a complex of bush medicines (aloe vera, crab bush, fig leaf, sailors' flowers, and white sage) and magical objects; for example, pieces of glass or other objects hung from trees protect against evil spirits. When encountering a spirit, if one says "Ten, Ten the Bible Ten," it is believed that one will be protected. The Black Seminoles of Andros preserve select aspects of the traditional Seminole religion, such as the Green Corn Dance.

BAHA'U'LLAH (1817–1892)

Mirza Husayn 'Ali Nuri, known as Baha'u'llah, was the founder of the Baha'i Faith. He placed the concept of globalization and the need to progress to a united, peaceful world at the heart of his social teachings.

Baha'u'llah was born in Tehran, Iran, the son of a minister in the court of the Shah. In 1844, he espoused the cause of the Bab (q.v.) and as a result lost all of his wealth and privileges, being thrown into an underground prison in 1852. While in prison, he experienced a vision that he considered to confer on him a Divine mission. He delayed announcing this mission until 1863, however. After release from prison, he was exiled to Baghdad (1853–1863), which was then part of the Ottoman Empire. During this period, Baha'u'llah universalized much that was specifically Shi'a in the Babi writings. Subsequently, the Ottoman government, at the request of the Iranian government, exiled him further to Istanbul (1863), Edirne (1863–1968), and finally Akka (1868–1892). In the Akka period, Baha'u'llah wrote a book of laws, Kitab Aqdas, and expounded his social teachings. Throughout his ministry, he was subjected to harassment, imprisonment, and constraint, and his followers in Iran were persecuted and killed at the instigation of the Islamic religious leaders. He died in a mansion outside Akka and is buried in a shrine there, which has become the spiritual focus of the Baha'i Faith and a place of pilgrimage for Baha'is. To continue his work, he appointed as leader of the Baha'i community his son, 'Abbas Effendi, who took the title 'Abdu'l-Baha (1844–1921).

Baha'u'llah claimed to be the messianic figure promised in each of the religions of the world, sent to bring to the world God's message for the present time. Baha'u'llah's message was centered on a call to humanity to move toward world peace and to develop a global vision. E. G. Browne of Cambridge University, who visited him in 1890, reported Baha'u'llah as saying that he desired only the good of the world and prophesying that strife and warfare would pass away and the "Most Great Peace" would come. In his writings, Baha'u'llah calls for the transcending of parochial loyalties in favor of a global vision and a love of all humanity. His vision was that of the earth as one country and humankind as its citizens. He also directed his call for unity to the individual, saying that all human beings are like the members of one family; in other words, each individual should deal with others with friendliness and love and not regard them as strangers or enemies. In this manner, Baha'u'llah broke through the taboos and laws of impurity and heresy that had caused so much conflict in human history.

One of the wealthiest of the Arab Gulf states, Bahrain harbors a majority Muslim population, half of whom were not born in country. Its name stemming from the Arabic word for sea, Bahr, Bahrain is an archipelago made of 30 small islands in addition to the largest eponymous island. While estimates vary, approximately 75% of the populace is Shi'a Muslim, making Bahrain one of the few Shi'a-majority countries, while another 15% are reported as practicing Sunnī Islam. The remaining 15%, composed mostly of non-natives, are a mix of Christian, Jewish, Hindu, Buddhist, and Sikh followers. Religious affiliation is one of the primary markers of identity for Bahrainians, and tensions between the majority Shi'ite and minority Sunnī population persist. Bahrain's government is a traditional monarchy with hereditary transmission of power, and the king is responsible for appointing the prime minister, who is in charge of the government, as well as the shura, the governing council.

Originally inhabited by the Sumerians, Bahrain was for many years an important trading post, located between Sumeri and the Indus Valley. Muslims took control of Bahrain during the Umayyad dynasty in the 7th century and retained authority until the Portuguese colonized the country in the 16th century. Their rule lasted less than a century, and in 1602, Iran gained control of the archipelago, instituting Shi'ite Islam as the official religion. The Bahrainian ruler Ahmad Ibn al-Khalifah took power from the Iranians in the late 18th century, and Bahrainian rule continued through the beginning of the 21st century. Great Britain began imposing on Bahrain in the 1830s, when it offered protection to Bahrain from the Turks, who were threatening Bahrain for gaining access to the Persian Gulf; Great Britain later used its position to influence the governing of the country in the years to come. Oil was discovered and began to be extracted in the 1930s, and following World War II, anti-British sentiment was on the rise, culminating in riots against British rule as well as the Jewish population, who had gained standing in the burgeoning oil industry. The British were ousted from Bahrain in 1971, at which point Bahrain joined the United Nations (UN) and assisted the UN in monitoring Iraq in the late 20th century—a country with which Bahrain had unstable relations. Owing a great deal to the oil reserves in Bahrain and the opportunities provided thereby, Bahrain's foreign population rose exponentially in the last part of the 20th century into the 21st century.

While Shi'a Islam is the official religion of Bahrain, the tensions with the minority Sunnī population are based on the perceived favored status of the latter. There are reports that naturalization and citizenship proceedings favor Sunnī applicants; Shi'i are more represented in the lower economic classes. The legal system was formed from a blend of the Ja'afari and Mālikī systems, which come from the Shi'a and Sunnī Muslim heritage, respectively. The monarchy does not allow for political parties, and the majority of political opposition stems from Shi'a and Islamic fundamentalist groups; in 1996, 44 Islamists were arrested on suspicion of plotting a coup to overthrow the Bahrainian government and establish an Islamic democracy. They were released in 2001, along with all other prisoners of a political nature, under the more liberal regime of Sheikh Hamad Isa al-Khalifa. His liberal attitude was tested by a massive uprising that began on February 14, 2011, as a part of the wave of democratic movements in the Middle East known as the "Arab Spring." Although the government at times was conciliatory and promised a dialogue with the protest leaders, it ultimately crushed the protests with military support from Saudi Arabia and the UAE, and leaders of the uprising were sentenced to life imprisonment.

BALTIC COUNTRIES

Northern Europe's three Baltic countries—Estonia (1.34 million), Latvia (2.2 million), and Lithuania (3.33 million)—have historically exhibited a high degree of religious diversity, playing host to substantial Catholic, Lutheran, Orthodox, and Jewish populations as well as smaller communities of Muslims, Moravians, Old Believers, and others. For half of the 20th century, the tiny Baltic countries were captive to the Soviet Union, an officially atheistic superpower whose rulers viewed any manifestations of religiosity with suspicion. Independent since 1991, the Baltics, like many formerly communist nations in eastern Europe, have witnessed a modest revival of the region's traditional churches while at the same time exhibiting considerable tolerance for nontraditional religions. Yet as has been the case in western Europe for the past century or more, there is also evidence of widespread indifference to spiritual affairs in Estonia and Latvia, which, while traditionally Lutheran, are countries where relatively few people are active church members. Lithuania is exceptional among the Baltic countries in that Catholicism, a faith that has been closely tied up with Lithuanian national identity since the 19th century, is the religious confession of the majority and the Church continues to exert substantial influence on Lithuanian society. This entry discusses religions in the settings of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania and current religious issues and challenges as found here.

Religions in the Baltic Countries

Estonia

Although Orthodox missionaries had appeared in eastern Estonia as early as the 11th century, their influence was negligible. It was the Northern Crusade of the 13th century, with the twin goals of territorial conquest and the conversion of Europe's last pagans, that brought Roman Catholicism to the Estonian lands. While German knights conquered the northeastern tribes (Ests, Livs, Letts, Cours, Prussians, etc.), German priests baptized them and administered the faith during the later Middle Ages. In the 16th century, however, the region's rulers broke with the Church and embraced Lutheranism, which became the principal religious confession of both the German minority and the Estonian majority. While the Germans who dominated the region left Estonia (and Latvia) during World War II, Russians, who began arriving in large numbers in the 19th century, supplanted them as Estonia's principal minority and brought the Orthodox faith with them.

Today, nearly 70% of the country's population consists of ethnic Estonians, whose main confession is the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (EELC). Although this is not a state church and the Estonian constitution provides for full freedom of religion, the EELC instantly became the most numerous and influential religious association in Estonia after the country obtained its independence from the former USSR. Today, the EELC claims an estimated 180,000 members—less than 13% of the total population of Estonia, where only about 30% of the population confesses to any religious faith at all. Many of the country's ethnic Russians, constituting about a quarter of the population, are members of the Estonian Orthodox Church (which is subordinate to the Moscow Patriarchate); some, however, identify with the Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church (which is independent of the Moscow Patriarchate). In addition to the dominant confessions, there is a small Jewish community of about 2,500 people, residing mostly in Tallinn, as well as communities of Old Believers (an Orthodox splinter whose adherents fled to Estonia to escape tsarist persecution), Catholics, Baptists, Methodists, and other religious associations. American evangelical religious influence is felt in Estonia in the form of its small communities of Pentecostals and Jehovah's Witnesses.

Latvia

The forces that brought Catholicism and Lutheranism to Latvia are much the same as those in neighboring Estonia. However, the Polish influence played a much greater role in Latvia's religious history; as a result, much of eastern Latvia (Latgale) today is Roman Catholic. Indeed, with an estimated 22% of the population belonging to the Catholic Church, the status of the once dominant Evangelical Lutheran Church of Latvia (ELCL) has dramatically diminished over the past century: Its percentage of the population today is about 20, down from the 55% who professed Lutheranism in the 1930s. The next largest religious confession in Latvia is Orthodoxy, the principal faith of the country's nearly 800,000 Russian speakers. Since most Russian speakers are concentrated in the cities, this makes Orthodoxy the main religion of Latvia's urban population, while Catholicism is the principal faith of the rural populations of the east. Jews once constituted the fourth major religious group in Latvia (there were 93,479 Jews residing in Latvia according to the 1935 census); however, most were killed in the Holocaust of the 1940s, and only a few hundred Jews remain in the country today. More dynamic are the small populations of Baptists and Seventh-Day Adventists; indeed, the growing Mormon population soon threatens to surpass the Jewish population.

Despite the surge of interest in religion in the early 1990s, in both Latvia and Estonia, church attendance quickly plummeted, signaling an overall decline in interest in organized religion. In neither country has the Lutheran Church been an essential component of national identity; thus, the Church's political influence has been minimal. While leading politicians exhibit a positive personal attitude toward the Lutheran Church and occasionally pay homage to Christian values, overt demonstrations of religiosity are not necessary for political success in these highly secular countries.

Lithuania

Catholicism has been the faith of ethnic Lithuanians since the Grand Prince Jogaila, who established a nominal union between Lithuania and Poland in 1386, accepted Christianity as the price for obtaining the Polish crown. Unlike the case in Latvia and Estonia, where Germans played a leading role in Christianizing the natives, in Lithuania it was the Polish clergy who baptized the peasantry and administered the faith. That Lithuanian national identity has become so closely tied to Catholicism has much to do with the leading role played by nationally conscious Lithuanian clerics in resisting Russian imperial rule in the late 19th century. Moreover, during the era of Soviet rule, the Catholic Church identified with and articulated Lithuania's national interests more zealously than did the more compliant Lutheran churches in Latvia and Estonia. It is partly for this reason that Catholicism weathered the antireligious policies of communism better than the Protestant churches of Latvia and Estonia and emerged from Soviet rule with its prestige largely intact. Today, around 80% of the population of Lithuania are formally members of the Catholic Church—even if as few as 15% of Lithuanians are active, churchgoing Catholics.

Today, Lithuania, the northernmost predominantly Roman Catholic country in the world, is the most ethnically and religiously homogeneous of the Baltic states, but this was not always the case. Before World War II, Lithuania had a substantial Russian (and Orthodox) minority as well as a vibrant Jewish community of 153,332 (1923), a figure that does not take into account Vilnius, a largely Jewish city at the time that was under Polish administration. With Lithuania's Jews, called Litvaks, massacred during the war, only 4,000 or so Jews remained in Lithuania in 2005. This community—once Lithuania's third largest—is now dwarfed by the country's larger minorities of Orthodox (the country's second largest religious group, constituting about 4% of the population), Old Believers, and Lutherans (strong in the Klaipėda area). These, along with Greek Rite Catholics (Uniates) and Muslims, whose small community dates to the Middle Ages, are considered the traditional religious communities of Lithuania. An even smaller population of Karaites—Jews who reject the Rabbinic decrees of the Talmud and believe that all religious authority resides in the Old Testament—are concentrated entirely in Vilnius and nearby Trakai. While the Lithuanian state guarantees the religious freedom of all believers, including the fewer than 5% of the population who belong to “nontraditional” religious communities (including Pentecostals, Jehovah's Witnesses, Baptists, Seventh-Day Adventists, and Mormons), under Lithuanian law, some confessions enjoy benefits not available to others—such as government funding, the right to teach religion in public schools, and the right to register marriages.

Among the three Baltic states, it is only in Lithuania that religion has had any substantive influence in politics in recent decades. The Lithuanian Christian Democratic Party, closely linked with the Catholic Church from its inception and the country's dominant party in the 1920s, has carried on Lithuania's tradition of religion-based politics and formed a coalition with the Homeland Union in 1996; the two merged in 2008 and became Lithuania's leading party.

Current Issues and Challenges

For half a century, religious life in the Baltic states was suppressed by the Soviet regime, whose arrival in 1940 to 1941 resulted in the arrest, exile, or outright murder of thousands of people, including hundreds of priests and pastors, whom the new authorities regarded with suspicion and hostility. Such brutality continued during the nearly 4 years of Nazi occupation that followed. With Soviet forces returning to the area in 1944, many priests left the Baltic states to continue their religious mission abroad; in Latvia alone, more than half the pastors fled the country at the end of the war. Stalin's terror, which ended with the dictator's death in 1953, obliterated the priesthood (although many surviving clerics returned from eastern exile in the mid-1950s); yet his successor Nikita Khrushchev continued the dictator's antireligious policies by closing down churches and suppressing external manifestations of religiosity. Even during the more relaxed—but by no means liberal—1970s, religious practice was confined within the walls of the remaining churches. Partly as a result of the Soviet regime's harsh policies, church membership declined in all three Baltic states. While Catholic Lithuania was able to train young men for the priesthood and perpetuate the country's religious traditions, it was difficult for clerics in any of the Soviet republics to avoid collaboration with the KGB (Komitet Gosudarstvennoy Bezopasnosti or "Committee for State Security"). With the Soviet regime aiming to turn churches into loyal servants, many Baltic priests and pastors were compromised.

Thus, when the Baltic states reclaimed their independence in 1991, their churches were understandably euphoric, but at the same time, they were in a state of flux and confusion. A surge in church attendance in the early 1990s was followed by a decline in popular interest in organized religion. Moreover, in some cases, the churches themselves were split into factions. For example, in Estonia, the Orthodox Church is divided into two main factions. Leaders of the autocephalous Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church (EAOC), which was canonically subordinate to the Patriarchate of Constantinople, fled Estonia in 1944 and settled in Sweden, while Orthodoxy in occupied Estonia came under the control of the Moscow Patriarchate. With the restoration of Estonian independence in 1991, a struggle between the EAOC and the Diocese of the Moscow Patriarchate immediately ensued, with each claiming to be the legal successor to the pre-war Estonian Orthodox Church (the government recognized it as such) and thus the legal inheritor of its property. It was only in 2002 that the Moscow-based church surrendered its claim to legal succession to the EAOC. Now registered as the Estonian Orthodox Church of the Moscow Patriarchate (EOCMP), it was awarded several buildings that had legally belonged to the EAOC. Still, there can be little doubt that the Russian-language Orthodox congregations (which are mostly members of the EOCMP) are stronger and more influential than the mainly Estonian congregations of the EAOC.

The Soviet occupation and its aftermath also split the Latvian Lutheran Church, which after World War II was established in various locations in exile. Leaders of its largest branch, the Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (LELCA), made it clear that at a time when the main Lutheran Church was restricted and compromised, it was the exiles who represented occupied Latvia's oppressed and persecuted Lutherans. With a number of outstanding theological differences of opinion between them, it is hard to imagine a unification of the ELCL and the Latvian Evangelical Lutheran Church Abroad taking place in the near future. Meanwhile, the fragmentation of Latvia's Lutheran community continues with the emergence of a variety of separate congregations, including eight congregations of the Augsburg Confession, whose members criticize the ELCL for what they claim is the latter's equivocal attitude toward the Holy Scripture.

Regardless of the divisions and factions that have developed within some of the churches, each has in common the desire to reestablish its traditional societal role. In this regard, the Lutheran, Catholic, and Orthodox churches of the Baltic states have achieved a lot since the establishment of independence—especially those that could rely on help from sister churches abroad. The leading churches of the Baltic states have set up new seminaries for training priests and pastors, renewed their educational activities (establishing Sunday schools and self-funded denominational schools at the primary and secondary levels), and reinvigorated their publishing activities—in some cases even establishing their own publishing houses. In all three Baltic states, the churches are engaged in charitable activities such as distributing food and clothing to the needy and establishing programs to aid vulnerable social groups such as the elderly, children, and single mothers. The social work undertaken by the churches was especially invaluable during the 1990s, when the Baltic societies were experiencing the often traumatic repercussions of rapid economic and social change.

The postcommunist situation proved to be complex for the churches in other ways as well, especially when it came to dealing with the individualization of society that had been taking place in the West at a time when the Baltic churches were repressed and isolated from the outside world and consequently had become, some might say, inward looking. With the end of communism, it became possible to resume communication between sister churches in the East and West; soon it became clear that believers had developed different views and mentalities during the preceding decades. Some Baltic pastors have been outspoken about their fears about religious influences coming from the West. Others are concerned with protecting their parishioners—and their societies—from Western values and social mores. Yet with communism gone and the churches aspiring to resume their traditional societal roles, controversial issues such as pornography and homosexuality, rarely discussed during Soviet times, could no longer be avoided. When it comes to homosexual relations, the Baltic churches—Lutheran, Catholic, and Orthodox—form a unified front: All believe, with varying degrees of intensity, that homosexual desires are sinful and that same-sex unions cannot be tolerated in their churches. Another controversial issue, at least for the Lutheran churches, is women's ordination. Although it was under the Soviet regime (which made homosexuality a crime and thus may have influenced the homophobia that permeates church culture) that women were ordained into the priesthood, this became controversial in the Baltic states after independence. The Lutheran churches of Latvia and Lithuania have rejected female priesthood—a stance that places them at odds with the more liberal exile churches.

While the Lutheran churches have enjoyed relatively little success in shaping debates on public morality, the same cannot be said of the Catholic Church in Lithuania. Opposing both the death penalty and abortion, political activists in the Catholic Church have helped energize the public debate on the latter; as a result of these efforts, in 2008 the Lithuanian parliament reviewed a bill that would have Lithuania join Malta, Ireland, and Poland as the only countries in the European Union (EU) to outlaw abortion. The Catholic hierarchy's outspoken support in 2003 for Lithuania's admission to the EU was also remarkable and may have been the decisive factor behind the positive referendum result. Yet on this issue, the Catholic Church in Lithuania was very much in the mainstream of the main Baltic churches, each of which supported accession to the EU.

Despite efforts by the Baltic churches to resume the influential societal roles they had enjoyed before the Soviet era, the current climate, even if it promises religious freedom to all confessions, appears to be unpromising. The dominant trend in all three countries is toward secularization and diminishing church membership. The fact that the Baltic churches have taken conservative stances on leading social issues has also served to distance them from sister churches in the West.

BANARAS

Banaras, Varanasi, Kashi: These are names used in India to refer to the pilgrimage city that is arguably the heart of Hindu South Asia. Located in the middle Ganga Valley between the Varana and Asi rivers in India's eastern Uttar Pradesh, it is one of the world's oldest continually inhabited cities. Kashi ("luminous") is its oldest moniker, first associated with the kingdom of the same name 3,000 years ago. Varanasi is another designation, found in the Buddhist Jataka tales and in the Hindu epic Mahabharata, and indeed today, Varanasi is the city's revived, postindependence designation, which combines the names of the two rivers on either side of it. The city was identified in the Pali language as Baranasi, from which emerged the corrupt form of the name, "Banaras," by which the city is still widely known. According to the 2001 census, the human population of Banaras is 1.5 million.

Kashi is a tirtha, a Sanskrit word meaning "ford." In earlier times, this was a crossing where the great Northern Road met the Ganga River. More significantly for adherents, however, Varanasi is a crossing between the worlds of gods and humans. Kashi is not alone as such a tirtha on the Indian subcontinent, but it is arguably the most "supercharged." Activities performed in this place are weightier in their significance and more efficacious in their fruits.

As such, Varanasi has long been a destination for pilgrims where liberation or enlightenment is especially achieved. As the Sanskrit proverb famously proclaims, Kashyam marnam mukti—"Death in Kashi is liberation." Kashi is the god Shiva's chosen city. Other city monikers attest to Shiva's bond: Kashi is Avimukta ("never forsaken"), even at the time of the cosmic dissolution. One Hindi saying speaks of Shiva saturating the land: Kashi ke kan-kara Shiva Shankara—"Even the stones of Kashi are Shiva." Today, there are literally thousands of Kashi temples and lingams ("aniconic phallic stones") attesting to his patronage.

The area situated between the Varana River in the north and the Asi River in the south is Kashi's locus. There are some 84 ghats ("stone stairways") lining the western banks of the Ganga, aligned south to north like buttons on the placket of a dress shirt. This river is unique here in that it is the only place that flows south to north. The three-mile journey from the southernmost ghat (Assi) to the northernmost (Adi Keshava) takes about an hour to travel by boat. From the safe lookout of the boat, one can see bathers taking a "holy dip" in the river, making offering to the goddess Ganga, and greeting Surya, the sun god, in the cool morning with a bowl of marigolds, rose petals, candles, and prayers. One can also see the two burning ghats known as Harishchandra and Manikarnika, where thousands of Hindus come from around the world for cremation.

As a spiritual crossing, we may understand Banaras as a series of five concentric circles, spanning outward like ripples on a pond from the center at the Jnanavapi, the "well of wisdom," near the Visvesvara ("Lord of All") Temple on the Ganga, to a point known as Delhi Vinayaka 17.6 kilometers west. All pilgrims begin and end their various journeys here at the well, believed to be the site of the first primordial water on earth. Each of these five circles corresponds to the five gross elements, five parts of the human body, five divine attributes, and five chakras.

It would be highly misleading to represent Banaras as merely a Hindu pilgrimage city, for to do so would obscure its other historical and socio-cultural aspects that were in times past, and still are today, significant in constructing this city. Moreover, Banaras remains a charged environment not merely for Hindus but for adherents of many different religious traditions: Buddhist, Jain, and Islamic. For many inhabitants dwelling farther away from the famed river, Varanasi is a city like any other. As in days of old, Banaras remains a tirtha on the horizontal plane of history.

That history becomes less gauzy in the ninth century BCE, when archaeological excavations begin to confirm scriptural references that point backward in time toward an earlier age. By the beginning of the first millennium BCE, Banaras had become a center for Sanskrit learning, banking, commercial trade, and asceticism. It is no coincidence that Siddhartha Gautama chose nearby Sarnath to give his first teaching as the Buddha in the fifth century BCE. During this period, the Kingdom of Kashi was one of 16 kingdoms to emerge from the ascendant Aryan tribes. Over the next millennium, the city would experience the challenge of being sandwiched between stronger kingdoms, often the prized pawn of larger regional powers. Where once local non-Aryan peoples had propitiated local tutelary deities at the foot of trees or in tiny shrines, in this later period, we see the ascendance of the translocal deities who now dominate the Hindu pantheon and the Banaras landscape, their abodes delineated by stone and plaster: Shiva, Vishnu, the Goddess, Hanuman, Ram, and Krishna. In this time, luminaries like Mahavira, the Buddha, Śaṅkarācārya, and Ramanuja resided on the banks of the Ganga, as would the devotional saints and devotees like Tulsi, Kabir, Ravidas, and, for a time, Mirabai in the second millennium of the Common Era.

Islam first came to Banaras in the 11th century with the central Asian invaders. Further growth occurred under the Mughals in the 17th and 18th centuries, a period of waning but mostly waxing religious intolerance, when most of the city's temples were destroyed. This was the period of Varanasi's "mughalization," when an enduring cultural imprint was made in architecture, in the establishment of muhallas or neighborhoods that exist to this day, in the presence of Sufi shrines dotting the landscape, and in the creation of a singular syncretic culture that thwarted the desires of even the most chauvinistic Mughal emperor. Perhaps, it was during this period that strong ties were forged between the Mughal powers and the city's low-caste ansaris (weavers), who would eventually convert to Islam. Today, Islam accounts for more than one third of Varanasi city's population. There are as many Muslims here as there are Brahmans, the majority of whom are weavers. The relationship between the Muslims who weave Banaras's famous saris and the Hindus who sell them explains in part why historically there has been less communal tension here than in other cities throughout South Asia.

With the recession of Mughal power in the 18th century, new sociopolitical alignments emerged. Varanasi's power structure was marked by the interplay between the Raja of Banaras, the city's merchant bankers, and Gosains, ascetic-soldier mercenaries who linked the city through their pilgrimage networks for the purpose of trade. By the 1780s, this power structure had made Banaras the subcontinent's inland commercial center. With the subsequent rise of the British, Varanasi came to take its present shape. The city was further developed to the south and west, masonry bridges were built over the Varan and Asi rivers, streets were broadened, and the first census was taken in 1827 to 1828. Significantly, due to interaction and exchange between Indian and Western culture in the colonial period, new Hindu traditions emerged. Banaras played center stage in the development of what is often called "neo-Hinduism." In 1949, the district of Varanasi assumed its current form when the Raja of Banaras ceded his semi-independent Banaras State to the new Indian nation-state. Varanasi became the new district headquarters less than 2 years after India's independence from the British.

The long-standing representation of Varanasi as the preeminent Hindu city, the oft-purported "center of Hindu civilization," has made it a target not just for pilgrims and Western seekers but also for Islamist terrorists. On March 7, 2006, bombs were detonated at the Sankat Mochan Temple and the Varanasi Cantonment Railway Station, killing more than 20 and injuring more than 100 people. The well-selected locations suggest an attempt to kill both Hindus and foreign nationals. A group known as Lashkar-e Kahar/Qahab claimed responsibility for the attacks, but it is suspected that this is a front organization for the notorious Lashkar-e-Taiba ("Army of the Righteous/Pure"), currently based in Punjab, Pakistan, and responsible for attacks in Mumbai and elsewhere throughout South Asia. The expressed purpose of this illegal organization is to free the disputed land of Kashmir from Indian control and to establish an Islamic state throughout South Asia.

Banaras is thus more than one thing. It is indeed a Hindu pilgrimage city, but it is also a Muslim city anchored by thousands of Islamic holy sites and institutions centuries in the making. And Varanasi is one of many modern Indian cities struggling at once with overpopulation, government corruption, and limited resources at a time of economic liberalization; Kashi is full of both abject want and garish surplus. Less than half a kilometer from Shivala Ghat rises a new consumer mall in concrete, rebar, and glass. The Ganga is likewise more than one thing. She is a river flowing from Shiva's matted hair, she is a goddess, and she is an environmental catastrophe flowing through Kashi and a consequent opportunity for activism. For those with the eyes of faith, she is a great liberator, while for others, she may be a source of waterborne diseases. For many inhabitants and pilgrims, she is both these things at once, for in the contemporary period credulity and doubt often dwell together.

democracy located in South Asia. Originally called East Pakistan, it was created during the partition of India in 1947 as the eastern wing of the country of Pakistan. Its name was later changed to East Bengal and then to Bangladesh after its union with West Pakistan was broken following a bloody war of secession in 1971. It is bordered to the south by the Bay of Bengal and by India on all sides but the southeast, where it is bordered by Burma. It straddles the Ganges-Brahmaputra delta and is one of the most densely populated regions in the world, with a population of approximately 153.5 million people, 98% of whom are ethnic Bengalis and speak Bengali (also known as Bangla). Muslims constitute 83% of Bangladesh's population, making it one of the largest Muslim countries, and one of the few Muslim democracies, in the world. It is also home to Hindus, who constitute approximately 16% of the total population.

The region of what is now Bangladesh underwent processes of religious conversion to Islam (from the local Hindu tradition) beginning in the 13th century with the arrival of Sufis in rural farming areas following the Turkish invasion. The area was absorbed into the Mughal Empire in the 16th century and later by the British Empire. Today, the majority of Muslims in Bangladesh are Sunnī, though there are small numbers of Shi'a Muslims, mostly in urban areas. Sufi shrines are found throughout Bangladesh, and local pirs (Sufi mystics and saints) are important as figures of religious veneration as well as political leadership in contemporary politics.

Bangladesh's national politics has increasingly involved a struggle over the role of Islam in the state and society, as Islamist leaders and parties such as the Jamaat-e Islami Bangladesh, the former counterpart of Pakistan's Jamaat-e Islami, founded by Maulana Mawdudi, gain increasing support. In 1977, Bangladesh's founding principle of secularism was omitted from the constitution, and in 1988, Islam was declared the state religion of Bangladesh by a constitutional amendment. This saw an increase in the government's role in defining the form and place of Islam within the Bangladeshi state and society. In 2007, a military-backed regime declared a state of emergency, promising new democratic elections by the end of 2008.

BANGLADESH

Bangladesh (formally the People's Republic of Bangladesh) is a Muslim-majority parliamentary

In recent decades, Bangladesh has seen a significant rise in Islamic revivalism. Through increased international travel and labor migration, particularly to Gulf countries, many Bangladeshis gain exposure to global movements of Islamism while abroad, thus compelling increasing support for Islamist movements at home. The Tablighi Jama'at, a transnational Islamic reform movement originating in South Asia, is also active in Bangladesh. With the continual rise in Islamism in recent years, Bangladesh's Hindu minority has decreased in size as some have migrated to India, and the state's commitment to the protection of religious minorities has come into question as attacks on Hindus and Ahmaddiyas by Muslim extremists in the country have risen.

BARBADOS

The nation of Barbados is the easternmost country of the Caribbean islands. It is the only Caribbean colony to have been governed only by one European nation, Great Britain. The island became independent in 1966, but it remains a member of the British Commonwealth. With a population of more than 281,968 occupying 443 square miles (1 square mile = 2.59 square kilometers), Barbados is one of the world's most densely populated nations with more than 1,570 inhabitants per square mile. Historically, there has been more out-migration from Barbados than from other countries to Barbados. This has had a profound impact on religious organizations.

More than 90% of the Barbadian population are descendants of slaves, representing a mix of African tribal groups predominantly Igbo, Akan, and Yoruba. European Whites constitute about 4% of the population. Whites are mainly from Britain, Scotland, Ireland, and North America. Other ethnic groups (about 6%) are from Asia, the Middle East, and Latin America. A number of Chinese (including some Buddhists) migrated from Hong Kong in the 1940s. Muslim Syrians and Lebanese Christians have become economically important, as have recent migrants from Venezuela, Colombia, Panama, and Brazil (many of whom are Roman Catholic). More than 2,000 East Indians migrated from Guyana in the 20th century. Some East Indians are Hindu, but the majority are Christian. Nevertheless, the 2007 CIA World Factbook reports that Hinduism is one of the fastest growing religions in Barbados. There are also a number of Rastafarians and a Jewish community of about 100, who worship in a synagogue built in the 17th century by Sephardic Jews from Brazil. Although small in number, the Jewish community has taken steps to preserve its heritage and maintain an active synagogue.

Religion is at the center of Barbados's life and culture. Even a seemingly secular activity such as "Cropover" traces its origin to religion. Cropover—the largest festival in Barbados—was once a religious rite celebrating the success of the sugarcane harvest. In addition to Cropover, Barbados Christians celebrate their heritage at an annual gathering known as "Gospelfest." A majority of Bajans classify themselves as "very religious." Families gather once a week for prayer, religious holidays and rites of passage are observed, and most businesses close on Sundays, which is a day set aside for rest and prayer.

The overwhelming majority (67%) of the Bajan population classify themselves as Protestants. When the first English settlers arrived in Barbados in 1627, they began building substantial churches. Every parish in Barbados has an Anglican church, and Anglicanism constitutes the single largest denomination on the island (representing more than 30% of the population). As noted by Robert Stewart in 1999, the Anglican Church in Barbados was not disestablished as on other British West Indian islands, and Barbados's Anglican churches are among the island's most elaborate religious buildings.

Barbados claims to have as many denominations as there are days of the year. It is home to hundreds of religious groups, including Anglicans, Apostolics, Baha'is, Baptists, Christian Scientists, Evangelicals, Hindus, Jehovah's Witnesses, Jews, Methodists, Moravians, Mormons, Muslims, Pentecostals, Quakers, Rastafarians, Roman Catholics, the Salvation Army, Seventh-Day Adventists, Spiritual Baptists, and many more.

After the Anglican Church, the next largest denomination in Barbados is the Seventh-Day Adventists. They number about 16,000. The first Adventist missionaries arrived in 1891, and the denomination has grown steadily since its incorporation in 1933. The Roman Catholic Church has had a strong presence on the island since 1839. There are about 11,000 Roman Catholics (representing about 4% of the population). In the early and mid-20th century, membership of the Catholic Church increased due to immigration from Guyana, Dominica, St. Lucia, and Trinidad. Pentecostal groups number about 7,000. Pentecostal membership is growing. Methodists number about 5,000. Methodist affiliation has declined slightly over the past 10 years. There are approximately 2,300 Jehovah's Witnesses. As noted, Baptists, Moravians, and members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons) are also present. The percentage of non-Christians and nonbelievers (atheists) is very small. There are an estimated 2,700 Muslims. The first mosque in Barbados was constructed in 1950. Currently, Barbados has three mosques and an Islamic Center.

The Spiritual Baptist Church began in the eastern Caribbean. Spiritual Baptists in Barbados trace their roots to 1957, when Trinidad Archbishop Granville Williams returned to his native Barbados and founded the first congregation, Sons of God Apostolic Spiritual Baptist Church. In 2008, Barbados's Spiritual Baptist membership exceeded 10,000. Bajan Spiritual Baptists are also known as "tie-heads"—a reference to the brightly colored cloth they wear tied around their heads. New members are baptized three times (in the names of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit) by total immersion. The Spiritual Baptist Church's biggest breakthrough to becoming a respected religion was in 1981, when it became part of the official program at the opening of the Caribbean Festival of Arts (CARIFESTA). The Spiritual Baptist Church has had strong African influences. Services entail much dancing, singing, and possession by the Holy Spirit. In the 17th century, African slaves brought their own religions with them to Barbados and continued to practice them—even though their masters attempted to convert them to Protestant Christianity. Jerome S. Handler and Kenneth Bilby note that African-derived beliefs and practices still play an important part in Bajan religious life, as seen in the continuing practice of Obeah.

While Bajans consider themselves religious pluralists, they are more "exclusivist" and do not participate in different religious groups simultaneously as often as do Jamaicans, Bahamians, and Trinidadians. This makes for intense competition between religious groups. Factionalism has also been a major factor in Barbados's religious organizations. Continued secessions from a common parent body have resulted in a large number of sectarian groups, such as Wesleyan Holiness, African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, Ebenezer Revival Center, Berean Bible Baptist Church, and Unity of Barbados. These sectarian groups are often very similar to one another in their rituals and doctrines. They differ from one another in name only.

BARKER, EILEEN (B. 1938)

Eileen Barker, a longtime professor at London School of Economics and Political Science (LSE), is perhaps the best known sociologist of religion in the area of new religious movements (NRMs). She has produced a prodigious amount of scholarship in the area, as well as establishing in 1988 the now well-recognized INFORM at LSE. INFORM, which stands for Information Network Focus on New Religious Movements, has been an important and reliable information source on new religions for the general public, scholars, governments, and the media worldwide for many years. This very influential entity has been described in some of Professor Barker's publications, and it has been a model for the development of other such entities around the world.

Professor Barker, after having completed a career in drama and raising a family, earned her degrees from LSE, including a First Class Honors in sociology in 1970 and a PhD in 1988, after which she was designated professor of sociology with a special reference to the study of religion at LSE. She served LSE in many capacities during her tenure there, including convener of the sociology department, dean of undergraduate studies, academic governor, and vice dean. She also educated generations of students in the sociology of religion during her 30-plus-year academic career. Professor Barker has given nearly 600 presentations in more than 70 countries in her career, including at more than 200 universities around the world. Her publications number more than 250, and they have been published in at least 27 different languages.

Eileen Barker has had a special interest in the formerly Soviet-dominated nations of central and eastern Europe and has made many visits to that part of the world. She was a founding member of ISORECEA (International Study of Religion in Eastern and Central Europe Association), a thriving new scholarly organization in that part of the world, and has been a major figure in nations in that region in promoting scholarship about religion and also developing public policy toward religion.

Eileen Barker's scholarship has been recognized by many awards. The book that grew out of her doctoral dissertation, The Making of a Moonie: Choice or Brainwashing, won the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion Distinguished Book award in 1985. She was also awarded the Martin Marty Award for Service in the Public Understanding of Religion by the American Academy of Religion in 2000. She was the first non-American to be elected president of the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion, serving from 1991 to 1993, and she was also elected president of the Association for the Sociology of Religion in 2001. Her book New Religious Movements: A Practical Introduction, published first in 1989 by Her Majesty's Stationary Office, has been reissued five times and has been translated into at least a dozen languages. This book has become perhaps the most widely circulated publication ever in the area of NRMs and has served to help educate untold numbers of students, scholars, public officials, and journalists about NRMs. She was elected a fellow of the British Academy in 1998, and in 2000, the queen of England appointed her as an Officer of the British Empire, a rare honor indeed for a scholar and academic.

Professor Barker's reputation earned her not one but two festschriften (books honoring her) when she retired in 2003 from LSE. One involved mainly scholars from North America and western Europe, including a number of major figures in the sociology of religion. The other was developed by scholars in eastern and central Europe with whom she had worked so closely over the years.

BASE COMMUNITIES IN LATIN AMERICA

Base communities or base ecclesial communities, also known as CEB (abbreviation for comunidades eclesiais de base in Portuguese or comunidades eclesiales de base in Spanish), are groups of lay Catholics, mostly from low-income strata, who get together to celebrate Sunday liturgies, to reflect on the Bible, and to carry out social and political activities. They were named “community” because of their supposed sharing experience, “ecclesial” for being part of the Catholic Church, and “base” as they were formed by those who live at the bottom of the social pyramid: the poor and the oppressed.

CEBs appeared in Catholic discourse after the 1968 Episcopal Conference of Latin America (CELAM) in Medellín. Inspired by the Vatican II Council and also by liberation theology, Latin American bishops affirmed then their “option for the poor” and proposed the reorganization of the Catholic Church into small lay communities. CEBs grew mainly in dioceses whose bishops sympathize with liberation theology. During the following decades, these communities have become internationally known for teaching the Latin American poor about their social and political rights through the Christian faith. Considered by liberation theologians as bearers of the “prophetic mission” of transforming the Catholic Church and also society as a whole, the CEBs became linked to the popular resistance movements of the 1970s and 1980s dictatorships, especially in Brazil, Chile, and Central America. The Sandinista Revolution victory in Nicaragua contributed to overestimation of the CEBs’ degree of politicization and creation of the myth of revolutionary CEBs.

Despite not being revolutionary as some thought them to be, the political role of CEBs should not be underestimated. In Brazil, for example, in addition to being supporters of Worker’s Party, which elected the ex-factory worker President Lula, CEBs also created important political leaders such as the environmentalist Chico Mendes, the Minister of the Environment of the Lula government Marina Silva (2002–2006, 2007–), and also leaders of more radical movements such as the landless workers movement, the MST (Movimento dos Sem Terra), among others.

From the 1990s onward, CEBs became less visible and less politically active. Several historical events may explain this political demobilization: the fall of the Latin American military regimes, the crisis of the socialist utopia, and John Paul II’s criticism of liberation theology. However, the CEBs are still active in the Catholic Church. Many female CEB leaders perform important roles in everyday church activities. Inter-CEB meetings are held periodically in Brazil, with a growing number of participants. Continent-wide meetings of CEBs were held in 2001 in Argentina and in 2004 in Mexico.

BATAILLE, GEORGES (1897–1962)

The French philosopher Georges Bataille briefly converted to Catholicism as a teenager and later trained as a medievalist, but he went on to engage with the transgressive writings of Marx, the Surrealists, Freud, Nietzsche, the Marquis de Sade, and the anthropology of archaic and primitive societies. He was a member of the Surrealists but did not get along with André Breton. In the 1920s and 1930s, he contributed articles to the anti-Stalinist Marxist journal La critique sociale and cofounded two review journals: the Surrealist Documents and the Nietzschean-inspired antimainstream Acéphale (Headless), with inquiries into archaic sacrificial cultures, Gnosticism, mythology, Christian mystics, madmen, Dionysius, sexuality, and death. He was a founding member of the influential Collège de Sociologie (1937–1939), an organization dedicated to retrieving “the sacred” for modern society. The biweekly lectures at the Collège were attended by ex-Surrealists, anthropologists, and sociologists, including Claude Lévi-Strauss, Walter Benjamin, Marcel Mauss, Michel Leiris, Jean-Paul Sartre, Alexandre Kojève, and Pierre Klossowski. Bataille’s own writings have inspired a later generation of French theorists: Michel Foucault, Gilles Deleuze, Felix Guattari, Jacques Derrida, and Jean Baudrillard.

Central to Bataille’s passionate critique of modernity was his notion of ritual expenditure as a key form of nonproductive consumption, which has all but disappeared in our utilitarian and future-oriented modern life. These expenditures include religious festivals, massive rituals and sacrifices, competitive spectacles, lavish court luxuries and ceremonies, large nonproductive monastic communities, and giant monuments such as the pyramids and medieval cathedrals, which moderns consider wasteful. The prototype for these expenditures was the potlatch of Native Americans of the northwest coast, community feasts where wealth and property were willfully destroyed or squandered in exaggerated generosity, as described by Marcel Mauss. These expenditures allowed people to maintain a deep connection with the sacred realm of the gods and ancestors. Just as orgasmic sexual states of pleasure cannot be reduced to the teleology of reproduction, so also ritual expenditures do not merely fulfill the instrumental functions of providing food and shelter but also satisfy a human desire for profligate loss and destruction. They have also prevented these societies from transforming people into instruments or things, as found more commonly in modern secular societies, whether capitalist or communist, where workers spend much of their lives fulfilling capitalist or state production targets. Bataille’s experience of the horrors of war as a soldier in the trenches of World War I informs his theory of the decline of ritual expenditures and the modern obsession with industrial productivity and military expenditures in his The Accursed Share (1989a). In closing off the joie de vivre of ritual profligacy, modernity condemns us to a single outlet for our destructive desires: the catastrophic destruction of modern warfare.

The Theory of Religion is a grand narrative of human religious history. Bataille begins with a fabulous account of the state of animality (the consciousness of a cow) or intimacy as one of immediacy, immanence, lack of identity or time, and nondifferentiation between the self and the world. What breaks up this originary monistic world is not language, as the Chinese Daoists would have it, but tool-use. Tool-use introduces an objectification process that differentiates the subject and object and the categories of the sacred (supreme beings) and the profane (tools and their products). Increasingly in human history, distinctions are drawn between humans and animals and between humans and supreme beings, whereas before there was a sense of continuity between humans and both animals and gods. With progressive tool-use, not only do animals become things for the use of humans, but humans themselves become objectified as things. The longing for a return to intimacy is then partially satisfied through effervescent religious rituals and festivals that refocus people on the present and indulge in an excess of material waste and loss. Whereas in archaic societies, production was subordinated to nonproductive destruction, the rise of institutionalized religions introduced the categories of morality and evil, where morality is rationally grounded in the real order of things and ostentatious destruction of wealth is condemned. However, it is the Protestant ethic that Bataille regards as the beginning of modernity’s complete reduction to the reign of things. In Protestantism is found a religious rationalization for the marshaling of productive forces.

In The Accursed Share (1993b), Bataille introduces his notion of sovereignty, which he regards as life beyond utility. Whereas Marx focused on material production and distribution by and for the proletariat, Bataille subverts Marx in conceiving of alienation as the process whereby one is made into a mere instrument for production. In Bataille’s notion of alienation, one loses one’s sovereignty or the basic freedom of attaining moments of transcendence from the chains of earthly profane life. Rituals and religious consumption allow ordinary people to attain sovereign moments that used to be reserved for monarchs and aristocracies leading lives of luxury. These sovereign moments, attained in trance, prayer, meditation, or spirit possession; in states of eroticism, sobbing, or laughter; in poetry or artistic inspiration; or after drinking wine, are moments when we experience a fundamental state of freedom.

BATTLE OF BADR

The Battle of Badr is a turning point in Islamic history. It is the first military operation led by the Prophet of Islam, Muhammad, in the month of Ramadan 2 AH (March 624 CE). The Holy Qur'an twice celebrates the victory at Badr and calls it Yaum al-Furqān, which means the day of distinction between evil forces and good forces. The value of this stunning victory to Prophet Muhammad is difficult to overestimate. It crystallized him and his followers as a recognized effective power.

The battle occurred after Prophet Muhammad learned that a very large business caravan of rich Meccans was on its way southward from the Levant (Bilād al-Shām) to Mecca (Makkah). It was headed by Abu Sufyān, who rushed ahead of the caravan to see whether it was safe to proceed to Mecca by the nearest route, which is by Badr, situated some 10 miles (1 mile = 1.61 kilometers) south of Medina and 240 miles north of Mecca.

The Prophet summoned the Muslims of Medina and directed them to attack the caravan. Quraysh, the predominant Arab tribe, which had opposed Islam from the beginning, heard of the intended attack and mobilized their own forces to rescue the caravan, which had already altered its route. This led to the first major confrontation between the Muslims and their opponents at Mecca.

The Muslim forces led by the Prophet were composed of an aggregation of believers of different tribal origins united by faith. Some of them were migrants (muhajjirūn) from Mecca, who fought their own relatives in this battle. Thus, faith prevailed over ties of blood and tribe. It was a fight between two unequal forces, where the Muslim power was outnumbered by the Meccans. However, the Muslim fighters won the battle with minimum casualties in comparison with the Meccans. It is to be noted that some Meccans who were captured as prisoners acquired their freedom by teaching the Muslims reading and writing.

The primary cause for victory at Badr is that the Muslims were motivated by faith. They hoped for abundant reward from Allah (God), and many of them wished for martyrdom, knowing that a martyr is to be rewarded by admission into paradise. Therefore, they fought with courage and determination. Other key factors that made this victory possible were fighting under one command, consultation before making decisions, a well-thought-out plan and excellent sense of timing, and discipline and steadfastness of purpose.

It was also a victory for the basic human rights of the freedom of thought, conscience, and religion and the freedom to manifest one's religion or belief in teaching and practice. After much repression by the Quraysh tribe for more than a decade, the Muslims rightfully gained a boost of confidence that would enhance their position in Medina and among the tribes of the Arabian Peninsula and strengthen their sense of hope for a better future and for the message of Islam.

BATUQUE DE PORTO ALEGRE

The Batuque is an Afro-Brazilian religion practiced in the state of Rio Grande do Sul and is similar to other Afro-Brazilian rituals such as Xangô in Recife (Pernambouc State) or Candomblé from Bahia. Originally, terreiro (the name of Batuque's temple) was found in the south 150 to 160 years ago by an emancipated woman slave who came from northeast Brazil, but precise data on Batuque's origins in Porto Alegre are not known. Batuque is characterized by its strong syncretism with the Catholic religion, with each orixá (gods in the Batuque; there are 12 main orixás) having at least one corresponding Catholic saint. Everyone in Batuque claims Catholic identity (through baptism), being Afro-Brazilian and Catholic at the same time. Although it was traditionally a Black religion, it is nowadays practiced by White people too and has expanded beyond Brazilian frontiers into the United States and Europe (Spain, Italy, Portugal, France) and Latin America (Venezuela, Paraguay), especially Argentina and Uruguay. Batuque is associated with Umbanda and Quimbanda, other Afro-Brazilian religions commonly practiced together in the same terreiros in Porto Alegre and abroad. Social scientists talk about a religious continuum to qualify this phenomenon.

Batuque is based on three main rituals: (1) possession by gods (orixás), (2) animal sacrifices, and (3) divination (by cowries). Wealth, love, and money, that is, intramundane interests, are the more frequent motivations to go to a terreiro. There are several degrees of commitment with Batuque practice. You can enter the terreiro as a simple customer by consulting individually the terreiro priest (problems are identified through divination, then they are solved doing a trabalho—an offering and/or a healing ritual), come to public and collective ceremonies where “spectators” consult gods embodied in initiates, or become initiated. By starting an initiating process, you become a member of the god family. Priests are called pai-de-santo (“godfather”) or mãe-de-santo (“godmother”) and have their godchildren (filhos e filhas-de-santo), sisters and brothers, between them.

Batuque, an initiatic and particular religion, became transnational for several reasons. Without centralized organization, Batuque crosses frontiers by creating strong interpersonal links, giving birth to local communitarian identities. On the other hand, it is a fulfilling corporal practice where everyone is protected by a personal god (each initiate has his or her own orixá). Each orixá is represented by specific symbols (colors, objects) and determinate fields of power related to natural elements (fire, storm, wind, etc.), the human body (blood, hearing, speaking, motherhood, etc.), and human activities (justice, work, etc.). Closed to contemporary ecological spirituality, Batuque also allows (compared with Catholicism) a more direct and personal relationship with the divine, not mediated by religious authority.

BEIJING

Beijing, also known as Peking, is the capital and the political, cultural, and educational center of the People's Republic of China. Together with Shanghai, Tianjin, and Chongqing, Beijing is one of the four municipalities under direct administration of the central government, which are equivalent to provinces in China's administrative structure. Many historic sites are among the UNESCO's (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) World Heritage List, such as the Temple of Heaven, Zhoukoudian Peking Man Ruins, the Great Wall, the Forbidden City, and the Summer Palace.

Beijing is China's third largest city after Chongqing and Shanghai, with an area of about 16,807 square kilometers (6,487 square miles), divided into 16 urban and suburban districts and two rural counties, and a population of about 17.5 million (in the year 2009). All the 56 ethnic groups of China can be found in Beijing, among which the Han Chinese are the majority and make up nearly 96% of the city's population. Other big ethnic minorities include the Manchu, Hui, and Mongol, with percentages of 1.84, 1.74, and 0.28, respectively, according to the census of 2000.

Brief History of Beijing

Beijing has one of the longest histories of any city in the world. It was one of the four great ancient capitals of China. As early as 700,000 to 230,000 years ago, Beijing had been the habitation of the so-called Peking Man (Homo erectus pekinensis), found in the caves of Dragon Bone Hill near the village of Zhoukoudian in Fangshan District in 1927. The Paleolithic Homo sapiens (Upper Cave Man, first found in 1930) also lived there about 34,000 to 27,000 years ago.

The first recorded name of Beijing in the documents is Ji, the capital of the state of Yan in the Spring-Autumn and Warring States Period (770–221 BCE). In the Liao Dynasty (907–1125), Beijing was established as a secondary capital, called Yanjing ("Capital of Yan"). The Jin Dynasty (1115–1234, found by Jurchen People, or Nǚ zhēnrén in Chinese pinyin) made Beijing its capital and called it Zhongdu, meaning the "Central Capital." In the Mongol Yuan Dynasty (1271–1368), Beijing again was the capital and was called Dadu, meaning the "Great Capital." In the following Ming (1368–1662) and Qing (1636–1911) dynasties, Beijing remained China's capital, called Jingshi or, generally, Beijing. So from the Jin to the Qing dynasties, Beijing, for more than 700 years, had been the capital and the political center in China's history.

The Xinhai Revolution of 1911 put an end to the dynasty reign in China. The capital of the new Republic of China (1911–1949) remained at Beijing during the early period (1912–1927). When the People's Republic of China was established in 1949, Beijing once again became the capital.

Religions in Beijing

All the five religions officially recognized by the Chinese central government, Buddhism, Daoism, Islam, and Catholic and Protestant Christianity, have their believers in Beijing. According to the 1988 official statistics (there is no updated official statistics), the total believers of the five religions are about 50,000, of which 30,000 are Catholics and 12,000 are Muslims. But the present figure must be much bigger, as the so-called Protestant "underground churches" or "house churches" have been developing very fast these years, though the numbers of Catholics and Muslims may remain relatively definite (the number of Muslims is almost equivalent to the population of the Hui ethnic group).

According to recent statistics (2009), there are a total of 696 religious personnel in Beijing. Among them there are 340, 70, 141, 50, and 95 for Buddhism, Daoism, Islam, Catholic Christianity, and Protestant Christianity, respectively. The number of officially registered sites for religious activities is 134, of which 18 are for Buddhism, 8 for Daoism, 70 for Islam, 21 for Catholic, and 17 for Protestant (the Protestant house churches are not recognized by the government). Some of the religious sites are very famous and of historic importance:

Fayuan Temple, built during the Tang Dynasty, is not only the oldest Buddhist temple in Beijing but also the location for the China Buddhism Institution and China Buddhism Library and Relic Centre. Yonghegong ("The Lama Temple"), built during the early Qing Dynasty, is the biggest Lamasery in Beijing and the most well known outside Tibet.

Baiyun Guan (The White Cloud Temple), built during the Tang Dynasty with a history of more than 1,200 years, known as “The First Temple Under Heaven,” is one of China’s oldest and largest Daoist temples and the biggest Daoist temple in Beijing. The Taoist Association of China is located there.

Niujie Mosque is the oldest and largest mosque in Beijing. It was first built during the Liao Dynasty (996 CE). Xuanwumen Catholic Church, also known as the South Church, is currently the diocesan cathedral. It is the oldest Catholic church in Beijing. Beijing Chongwenmen Christian Church, built in 1870, is the largest existing Protestant church in Beijing.

Apart from the five government-sanctioned religions, Beijing also played an important role in the practice of China’s traditional religion or Chinese Folk Religion in history. The most significant is the worship of Heaven. The Temple of Heaven, situated in southeastern urban Beijing, built in 1420 during the Ming Dynasty, was the sacred site to offer sacrifice to Heaven for the emperors of the Ming and Qing dynasties. The temple was last used for this purpose on December 23, 1914, by the president of the Republic of China, Yuan Shih-kai. Other prominent temples of folk religion include Temple of Sun in the east of urban Beijing, Temple of Earth in the north, and Temple of Moon in the west.

The Administration of Religions

As the political center of China, Beijing is also the center for the administration of religions in China. The highest administrative organization of religion, The State Administration for Religious Affairs, under the State Council, is in Beijing. Beijing also houses the five government-sanctioned religions’ national societies: the Buddhist Association of China, the Islamic Association of China, the Taoist Association of China, the Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association, and the National Committee of the Three-Self Patriotic movement of the Protestant Churches in China.

At the municipal level, the administration of religions in Beijing is the responsibility of the Beijing Municipal Bureau of Religious Affairs. The Department of Religious Affairs under the Bureau is divided into three sections. Section 1 is in charge of Catholic and Protestant affairs, Section 2 is for Buddhism and Daoism affairs, and Section 3 is for the affairs of Islam. Each of the five religions also has its own association at the municipal level.

The Study of Religion in Beijing

Beijing is also the cultural and educational center of China. With regard to the study of religion, the Institute of World Religion under the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, established in 1964, is the most important institute for religious studies. The institute’s website, <http://iwr.cass.cn>, is a good resource for students of the field. Departments of Religious Studies and research centers are also found in some of the most famous universities of China, such as Peking University, Renmin University of China, Minzu University of China, Beijing Normal University, and so on. The website <http://www.pacilution.com>, established by a scholar in Beijing, is also an important reference resource for religious studies in China.

BELARUS

The Republic of Belarus in northern Europe gained independence after the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. Situated between Russia and Poland, Belarus has historically been a cultural borderland. Baptized into Orthodoxy in the 10th century (the Polatsk eparchy was established in 992), the country later became part of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and partly adopted Roman Catholicism, especially after the Union of Lublin (1569; with the Kingdom of Poland). After the Brest Church Union (1596), the Uniate Church (subordinated to the Pope but with Orthodox ceremonies) was established. Other religions were represented by Jewish (since the 14th century), Muslim (since the 14th century), Old Believers (since mid-17th century), and Protestant (Calvinist, Lutheran, and Anti-Trinitarian; in mid-16th century) communities. In 1795, Belarus was annexed to the Russian Empire, and the population was by force converted to Russian Orthodoxy (the Uniate Church was prohibited in 1840). In 1922, following the 1917 October Revolution, the church was separated from the state and the church lands withdrawn. During the Soviet period, Belarus was declared atheistic, and religious practices were severely prosecuted. In 1941 to 1945, much of the Jewish population perished. During the "Khrushchev thaw" of 1953 to 1964, religious activities temporarily revived. Perestroika (1985) allowed the people to declare their beliefs freely.

The Declaration of Independence (1991) coincided with the massive religious revival: The Christian church was restored as an important social institution; many new communities arose, including Protestant ones; and new temples were built. As a result, in the 1990s, the proportion of believers in Belarus rose significantly and now constitutes about 50%, which is comparable with that of Russia or Ukraine.

During the post-Soviet period, the state-church relationship was reestablished. In 1992, the Belarusian parliament adopted a law "On the freedom of religion and religious organizations" and guaranteed freedom of consciousness. The new edition of this law (2002) affirmed that the Orthodox Church played a dominant role in the formation of the national state, cultural, and spiritual traditions. In 2003, a special agreement on cooperation between this church and the state was signed. Additionally, an important social role for the Roman Catholic Church was confirmed by the same law, as was the recognition of the statuses of Lutheran Church, Muslim, and Jewish religious organizations. Other religions can also be recognized after state registration.

Current religious tendencies include the rise of interest in religion among the population, widespread eclectic "Christian" beliefs, relatively low regular attendance of religious services, moderate rise of Baptism and Pentecostalism (Christians of evangelical faith), and homogenization of the religious field.

As of January 1, 2009, 25 religious confessions (3,062 religious organizations) were registered, the most popular among them being the following:

- Orthodox Church (1,473 parishes, 1,274 churches)
- Roman Catholic Church (467 communities, 451 churches)
- Protestant churches (14 denominations and 992 communities, among them 557 Pentecostals, 269 Baptist, 27 Lutherans)
- Uniate Church (14 communities)
- Church of Old Believers (32 communities)
- Islam (27 communities)
- Judaism (46 communities)

Among almost a hundred new religious movements, the Krishnaites, Baha'is, Mormons, New Apostolic Church, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Johannites are registered. Many other smaller groups are registered as public and other organizations as well

BELGIUM

Traditionally, Belgium, a northern European country located between France and The Netherlands, has been a Catholic country. It also includes other Christian denominations—the Anglican Church, the Orthodox Church, and the Protestant Church—and Judaism has also been recognized by the state, along with Buddhism since 2008 and Islam since 1974. Muslims in Belgium are the result of immigration. In a period of booming economy, in the first half of the 1960s, the Belgian government made an appeal to Moroccan and Turkish workers. This was the start of massive immigration from these Islamic countries and to a lesser extent from other Islamic countries such as Algeria and Tunisia. The immigration still goes on, and in the course of time, many have acquired Belgian nationality. Although we may not equate ethnicity and religion, we can safely say that at present there are about 500,000–600,000 Muslims living in Belgium, including a small number of autochthones who converted to Islam. Half of them are concentrated in the Brussels region and about one quarter in the more industrial regions of Flanders and Wallonia. Consequently, Islam has become the second largest religion in Belgium, and due to the concentration of Muslims in specific localities, it has a very visible presence. According an international index of global communication, in 2008, Belgium was the most globalized of the 120 countries studied. Consequently, Belgians are well informed about global issues, including Islamic terrorism and new religious movements (NRMs); both Islam and NRMs have had political consequences in Belgium.

A Flemish political party that has a large following has been condemned for anti-Islamic racism and had to change its original name from Vlaams Blok to Vlaams Belang. It is strongly opposed to multiculturalism. It emerged in Antwerp, where there is a large concentration of Muslims, and some of its slogans are “Adapt or leave” and “Own people first.” Recently, a new song was heard: “Oh dear, oh dear, another mosque again.”

As far as NRMs are concerned, in 1996, parliament established a parliamentary commission to prepare a policy to identify the illegal practices of sects and the dangers they represent for society and for individuals, particularly minors. The conclusions of the commission were reported to the Chamber of Representatives on April 28, 1997. One of the most important outcomes of the report was the creation by law (June 22, 1998) of the Information and Advisory Centre on Harmful Sectarian Organizations. Its task, defined by law (Article 5, Section 1), include the study of the phenomenon in Belgium and the international ties of such organizations, establishment of a documentation center, giving information to the public and individual persons about their obligations and rights and how they can assert their rights, and advising on policy measures to combat such organizations.

BELGRADE

Belgrade is one of the oldest continually settled cities in Europe. It is also the capital of the Republic of Serbia and its largest city. In ancient times, Belgrade was known as Singidunum, and it was an important political, economic, and religious center of the northeastern part of the Roman Empire. A religious relic that remains from the Roman period is Mithra's holy shrine.

Around 630, the Serbian (Slavic) settlers came to this area. After this, there are no records about this town for more than two and a half centuries. The town was mentioned again only in the ninth century, under the Slavic name Beograd ("White Town"—probably because of the walls made of white limestone).

In 1403, Belgrade obtained the status of capital. This event is marked by Ascension Day—Spasovdan—as its Saint's Day (slava), in honor of the restoration and progress of the city. This ancient slava symbolizes the rising up, or ascension, of the city from the ashes and its irrepressible hope and faith in the future. Ascension Day is a movable feast and always falls on a Thursday, 40 days after Easter and 10 days before Whitsun. This event is the biggest religious and political holy day in Belgrade.

Belgrade was a significant hub of anti-Ottoman opposition in early-modern times. After its conquest by the Turks in 1521, it became the center of one of the provinces (sanjak) of the Ottoman Empire. During this period, the city underwent substantial development, and it became the second biggest city (after Istanbul) in the European part of the Ottoman Empire. The growth/expansion of the city brought also demographic changes, and Belgrade became a multicultural and multireligious city. There were more than 250 mosques and masjids, dozens of Christian churches (Orthodox as well as Catholic), and also Askenazic and Sephardic synagogues in Belgrade during that period. There was an important Jewish yeshiva in the city as well.

The 19th century saw the liberation of Belgrade from Turkish rule and its establishment as the capital of the Kingdom of Serbia (1878). A number of important institutions of Orthodox Christianity were set up during that time, and Belgrade became a center of the Serbian Orthodox Church and the seat of its Patriarch. In this period were built the biggest churches in the city, for example, the Cathedral Church (1840).

In the present day, the majority of Belgrade citizens are of Orthodox faith (91%). Other important religious groups are Muslims (1.3%), Catholics (1%), and Protestants (0.2%). A formerly sizable Jewish community was destroyed during World War II, and the contemporary Jewish community has only 400 members. There is a very small group of nonbelievers in Belgrade (about 3%) compared with other capitals of the former Communist Bloc. All of Serbia, including Belgrade, was integrated into the globalized world after the fall of the Slobodan Milosevic regime in 1999. This influenced the growth of religious pluralism, resulting in Belgrade becoming the center of nontraditional religious groups (e.g., Buddhism) and many new religious movements.

BELIZE

Belize, south of Mexico, has been shaped by the currents of global religion in the 20th century. In 1958, the Mennonite movement brought missionaries to this small Central American country, which was, at the time, still a British colony. It was not until 1964 that this country, British Honduras, received the right to internal self-government. In 1973, the name of the country was formally changed to Belize, and finally on September 21, 1981, this former British colony became independent. At present, with an area of 22,965 square kilometers and around 300,000 inhabitants, Belize is one of the smallest and least populated countries in Central America. The country has a multiethnic population consisting of Mestizos, Creoles, Garinagu, Maya's, Taiwanese, Chinese, and East Indians, among others. A relatively large portion of the population—approximately 4% of Belize's inhabitants (12,000 people)—belong to the Mennonite movement.

The Belizean Mennonites have their common descent from western Europe, especially from The Netherlands and Germany. Their religious identity, however, is based on the religious teachings about peace and use Christian belief to fulfill their lives. This implies that native Belizeans can also be part of the Mennonite church.

Despite the fact that most Mennonites live more or less in the margins of society, building on their Christian beliefs, agricultural skills, and a strong working ethos, they have been able to establish a strong and stable economic position within Belize. Ever since their arrival in 1958, all 11 Mennonite settlements in Belize are found in an isolated position with regard to the wider society, including school systems, health care, language (they speak a language called "low German" among themselves), and cultural systems. Nevertheless, more than 45 years after their arrival in Belize, most Mennonite settlements are economically rather successful. They are well known for their agricultural entrepreneurship.

The name Mennonite derives from Menno Simon (1496–1561). In 1536, this Catholic priest from the village of Witmarsum in the western part of Friesland in The Netherlands converted to the Anabaptist movement, as the Mennonites were originally called. Through his writings, Menno Simons became one of the most important leaders of the Anabaptist movement. The Anabaptist movement originated in Switzerland during a time of important social and religious conflicts in Europe. The name Anabaptist derives from a schism within the Reformation movement in Europe during the 16th century. Apart from the Mennonites, other Anabaptist movements involve the Amish, the Brethren, and the Hutterites. After their break-away from the Reformation movement, the Anabaptists, including the Mennonites, spread rapidly across Europe (Germany, France, Austria, and The Netherlands). Today, there are more than 1 million Mennonites scattered throughout the world.

Most Mennonites are not organized in churches but in congregations or communities. Among them the concept of community (Gemeinde) has been and still is very important. The Mennonite community provides the context for individuals and their families to interact together in a way that their values and norms can be fulfilled. Besides these basic religious principles, the community also shapes the environment for its members' economic and social activities.

BELLAH, ROBERT (B. 1927)

In seeking to make sense of modernity in the classical tradition of sociology as a field, the body of the American sociologist Robert Bellah's work spans the social sciences and comparative cultural fields. It embraces the global diversity and coherence of religion as the key to culture across civilizations and epochs within the framework of human evolution. Formally trained as a student of tribal cultures, East Asian civilization, and Islam, Bellah engages the West, and America in particular, as problematic cases that can only be understood in the broadest comparative perspective on human cultural development. This global perspective informs Bellah's conceptions of religious evolution in general and civil religion in particular. This entry first examines Bellah's understanding of the role of religion in human evolution and then discusses his concepts of civil religion and public theology from a global perspective. Born in Oklahoma and raised in Los Angeles, California, Bellah received his PhD from Harvard, where he studied with Talcott Parsons, and he later taught at Harvard and, for most of his career, at the University of California, Berkeley.

Religion in Human Evolution

Bellah's account of "Religious Evolution" draws on biblical sacred history, mediated by Hegelian historicism threaded through Durkheim, Weber, and Marx. It shows how religion is enacted in cultural, social, personal, and bodily forms that unfold in history and cannot be grasped outside it. Cultural symbols and beliefs, social practices and institutions, personal habits and attitudes, and embodied disciplines and expression all interpenetrate in constituting religion. Each exercises a degree of autonomy in their interaction that makes it irreducible to any one of the others. They mutually constitute each other through history, and religion is historically constituted through all the dimensions of human action.

Religious rejection of the world emerges in the first millennium BCE in Israel, Greece, India, and China at the core of every historic salvation religion, defining the Weberian axis of religious evolution in Bellah's original formulation. Renouncing the world represented within the framework of cosmological dualism crystallizes an otherworldly true self, or Buddhist nonself, deeper than the flux of everyday experience, facing a reality over and against itself. It holds up an overarching ethical aim and stance, unified into a whole way of life, to answer the question of what we must do to be saved. Conversely, the collapse of cosmological dualism and world rejection marks modern modes of religious symbolization, action, and organization within complex societies shaped by institutional differentiation and cultural pluralism. Modern world acceptance features a multiplex monist worldview centered on a multidimensional self. Each person is responsible for critically self-conscious and conscientious participation in the process of religious symbolization itself, shared among a modern priesthood of all believers no longer bound by the obligations of doctrinal orthodoxy imposed by the tutelary authority of the state-established religion.

But since religion is centrally the narrative self-interpretation and ritual enactment of all human cultures, Bellah argues, the whole of the history of religion is our own. We remain deeply embedded in it, from tribal peoples to the present. This holds true even when—and especially when—we think of religion in peculiarly modern Western terms as primarily private beliefs held by individuals and voluntary associations made up of like-minded believers or spiritual seekers. Religion reflects the whole of life in premodern societies, shifting in shape as social and cultural complexity evolve together. World-rejecting religious symbols, rites, and congregational communities break through the cosmological and moral unity of archaic and tribal societies in tandem with their political and economic structures. But we need to understand tribal and then archaic religions and societies in their own terms to grasp how such salvific breakthroughs carry the whole of human cultural and religious history into modern world acceptance. This includes the early modern Protestant patterning of American modernity, grounded in convictions of individual free conscience, conversion, providence, and covenant permuted into ideals of individual free choice, revolution, progress, and constitution.

The central insight that stages of religious evolution coexist and interact with one another is crucial in interpreting the global demographic facts that the world has never numbered more non-so-modern members of the historic salvation religions than it does today, including the fact that one third of the world's population is now Christian and one third of those Christians live in former colonies. The insight that the earlier stages of religious evolution continue to coexist with and within the later ones also reveals the peculiarly modern antimodern nature of many contemporary “traditional” or “fundamentalist” movements, including the early-modern rationalist faith in Newtonian laws and Baconian experiments that biblical literalists marshal to defend “absolute values” against the “relativism” of late-modern historicism and culturalism.

“Nothing is ever lost” in the whole of religious evolution, as Bellah has deepened its conception over the course of his work, culminating in Religion in Human Evolution. It incorporates developmental and evolutionary psychology to chart the evolution of human consciousness through the mimetic, mythic, and theoretic stages of its development, beginning with our biological history as a species that gives rise to culture and then coevolves with it. For most of a million years before members of the genus Homo began speaking in sentences, they communicated and expressed themselves through their bodies. Through mimetic movement, gesture, and example, they learned to make meaning as well as tools. Through sharing the rhythmic action of “keeping together in time” at the root of ritual, they composed the harmonies of moral community as well as the survival strategies of social solidarity, as Durkheim observed. Endless interaction rituals continue to orchestrate everyday life today, from greetings to goodbyes, and formal rites of passage continue to mark the movement of generations from birth to death.

For most of the tens of thousands of years since humans became fully linguistic, religiously inspired and morally charged narrative in the form of myth ruled human consciousness without conceptual challenge, as Bellah stresses, and the most encompassing forms of cultural self-understanding today continue to unfold as mythic narrative. They tell the story of uniquely individual selves in culturally common genres. We get to know ourselves and each other by sharing our stories. We grasp the multiple meanings of modern social membership by learning the stories that define our families, communities, and nations. Literacy turns practical theoretic consciousness toward a more critical questioning of myth in both logical and lexical terms of second-order “thinking about thinking” at the heart of the axial breakthroughs. But theories do not replace stories as the source and substance of the spheres of ethics, politics, or religion, and none of these spheres has been reborn within the bounds of reason alone. Narrative is the way we understand our lives, criticized and clarified by rational argument, to be sure, but also revealing in its own rational way that “reason” itself has a long history with multiple meanings and practical differences.

Thus, Religion in Human Evolution combines biological, social, and cultural evolution into the deep history of religion at the center of the human story, which runs all the way back and all the way through to the present. It shows religion shaping the social order and being reshaped as society becomes more complex. Relatively egalitarian forager tribes give way to more hierarchical chiefdoms and archaic kingships, which call for new forms of symbolization and moral enactment to make sense of their growing division of labor, wealth, and power. Theoretic culture emerges to question mythic narratives, at once rejecting and reorganizing them to create new rites and myths and challenging their particular authority in the name of spiritual and ethical universalism.

Religion in Human Evolution ends with the axial age, but it situates modernity within the history of the human species. It reframes the story of how theoretic culture becomes partially disembedded from mimetic and mythic meaning to give rise to the achievements and predicaments of modernity. By asking what our deep past can tell us about the kind of life human beings have imagined was worth living, Bellah illuminates the often implicit worldviews we hold and contest in the modern world. He points toward the critical reappropriation of their underlying mimetic and mythic dimensions in an ongoing dialectic with our theoretical understanding to find common ground on questions of our common good, including the future of the environment, the justice of the economy, and the possibilities for peace in the world we share.

Civil Religion and Public Theology in Global Perspective

The dialectical coherence of civil religion in the moral argument of public life in modern societies runs through the development of its formulation by Robert Bellah over the course of his work. This begins with “Civil Religion in America,” defined in Durkheimian terms as a collection of beliefs, symbols, and ritual with respect to sacred things and institutionalized in a collectivity. In “Religion and the Legitimation of the American Republic,” Bellah elaborates the critical interplay of civil religion and public theology in the free exercise of religion in America, institutionalized in ways that mediate but never resolve the tension between civic republicanism and constitutional liberalism in its ambiguous political identity.

Seen as a cultural dimension of depth, civil religion frames modes of moral discourse and imagination to enable coherent cultural conflict in successive times of trial, which give rise to contrasting public theologies that contest the meaning of civil religion and reshape it in turn. This dialectical logic extends to the model of cultural conversation and argument across multiple moral traditions seen as continuities of conflict in Habits of the Heart and Bellah’s later work, in contrast to construing civil religion as a unitary moral foundation once fundamentally fixed and then fragmented by culture wars.

An increasingly international kind of social life, gradually developing through the global expansion of the division of labor in the world’s economy and its political-legal regulation, would universalize forms of religious belief, judged Émile Durkheim a century ago. If a genuinely transnational sovereignty emerged with the attainment of some kind of coherent world order, Robert Bellah likewise concluded a generation ago, it would precipitate new symbolic forms of civil religion, whether they were to grow from the flickering flame of the United Nations or from the latter-day light spread by thousands of multiplying nongovernmental organizations, such as those in the human rights and environmentalist movements.

Bellah’s account with Phillip Hammond of the Varieties of Civil Religion in comparative context probes the unique character of American civil religion and the special conditions that bring it about, in contrast to Italy and Japan, for example. But in the early-modern and modern stages of religious evolution, Bellah holds, there emerges in every society the possibility that a distinct set of religious symbols and practices may arise that address issues of political legitimacy and political ethics but that are not fused with either church or state. Nation-states remain the most important centers of power in the late 20th century, Bellah acknowledges, but none of them alone can resolve the military, economic, and environmental problems that demand new forms of global concord for the very survival of humankind. There is at last for many purposes a world civitas, Bellah judges, but its lack of civility and justice point toward the need for moral dimensions of a world civil religion that can nurture greater openness, tolerance, and ethical commitment in global civil society. The diverse forms of popular nationalism with religious roots evident among multiple modernities emerging around the world today tie into the dialectical interplay of civil religion and public theologies, as Bellah has conceived it over the course of his work on faith in public. It develops a central conception of ongoing moral argument, civic debate, and social reform in representative polities ordered in common by diverse constituencies thinking and acting within cultures conceived of as dramatic conversations. These moral dramas are made up of many voices contesting the construal of multiple traditions and remaking them together by the inspiring force of enacting good examples as well as the persuasive force of giving good reasons. This contrasts with state-centered views of civil religion celebrating an ostensibly universal moral consensus in support of the state’s compulsory legal authority.

“Can We Imagine a Global Civil Religion?” asks Bellah in a paper published in 2010 that defines the direction of his ongoing inquiry into the modern project in light of human evolution. He answers the question of its title by distinguishing between the impossibility of a global civil religion and the necessity of strengthening global civil society to create a world order coherent enough to engage the grave problems of global warming, military-political strife, and economic inequality that interdependent nations now face. Any actual civil society will have a religious dimension, Bellah observes, not only a legal and ethical framework but some notion that it fits the nature of ultimate reality. In fact, the religion-like values carried by an emerging global market culture may worsen international problems and place greater weight on the actual beginnings of world governance evident in world law and economic regulation today. The nation-state itself and the principled independence of the market from the state have arisen as cultural forms and institutional arrangements transmitted around the world over the past few centuries. So have popular sovereignty and the public sphere of civil society, even where ideals of universal human rights, democratic elections, and the formation of public opinion freed from the state and the market are honored in principle but not in practice. Nationalism itself has always been an international phenomenon inspired by the right of every people to self-government and by the responsibility they share for their common fate.

Today, global market ideologies and practices threaten the capacity of nations to carry out the responsibilities inherent in their ideals of common membership, Bellah argues by reference to Jürgen Habermas, including responsibility for their least advantaged citizens through sustaining fair wages and taxes as well as public provision. What are the moral and religious resources we need to think about for membership in a global civil society that are profound enough to balance the autonomy of nation-states and check the power of global markets? The religious roots of the global ethics of human rights lead Bellah to ask if the world's religions can mobilize their deepest commitments to universal neighbor love and mutual recognition to give genuine institutional force to human rights regimes. Can they help turn the ideals of world citizenship into a practical willingness to share responsibility for the world of which we are citizens instead of trying to transform the world into the naturalized image of our own nation? Religious motivation is needed to turn the beginnings of world law and the growth of global ethics into effective forms of global solidarity and governance. Religious insight is needed for us to recognize the primacy of the world instead of trying to force the world to recognize our primacy as a nation.

The nationalist aspirations and religious convictions of other peoples who want to govern themselves and worship as they please, and as they must, require our respect. They also require our recognition of the social and cultural diversity of these peoples. For such recognition is essential to justify our respect by grounding it in our common vision of the dignity and equality of all human beings and their right to self-government. Such recognition is no less essential to guide our aim to realize these rights in a just and peaceful world of independent, equal, and self-governing states. That world still struggling to be born embodies ideals at the center of distinctive yet overlapping forms of civil religion emerging around the globe, and it marks the contested core of an ongoing argument among diverse public theologies and philosophies seeking to shape the world to come.

BENEDICT XVI (B. 1927)

Benedict XVI is the 265th Pontiff of the Roman Catholic Church; he was elected on April 19, 2005, and celebrated his Papal Inauguration Mass on April 24. Born Joseph Alois Ratzinger, he succeeded the 27-year reign of Pope John Paul II, a longtime friend since the two met as young bishops during the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965). Under John Paul II, Ratzinger worked as the prefect for the Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith (CDF), which also made him the president of the International Theological Commission and the Pontifical Biblical Commission. Before his appointment to the CDF in 1981, Ratzinger divided his time between clerical and academic responsibilities in Germany, particularly distinguishing himself as an internationally renowned scholar. Even secular institutions have recognized his intellectual contributions—for example, the prestigious Académie Française, to which he was appointed an associate member in the section for moral and political sciences in 1992. As a result of his distinguished academic career, Benedict has been recognized as one of the intellectual popes of the Church.

Born on April 16, 1927, in the village of Marktl am Inn, Bavaria, Germany, Joseph Ratzinger was the youngest child of Joseph Ratzinger Sr. and Maria (Peintner) Ratzinger, a pious Roman Catholic family. He had an older brother, Georg, and a sister, Maria. Interested in becoming a priest since the age of 5, Ratzinger entered a seminary in Traunstein in 1939. Two years later, at 14 years of age, he was coerced to join the Hitler Youth (by German law), but he refused to attend the meetings. The Ratzinger family expressed anti-Nazi sentiments, which resulted in frequent demotions and transfers for Joseph Sr., who served in the Bavarian State Police and the German national Regular Police.

Ratzinger reentered the seminary at Freising and continued his studies at the Herzogliches Georgianum of the Ludwig-Maximilian University in Munich. After his ordination in 1951, he pursued a doctorate in theology. Intellectually and spiritually, Ratzinger was highly influenced by his favorite Church Father, St. Augustine, on whom he wrote his doctoral thesis. Throughout his career as a professor, he has held positions at numerous German institutions, including Freising College, University of Bonn, University of Munster, University of Tübingen, and University of Regensburg in Bavaria, where he was also appointed dean and eventually vice president. He served at Vatican II as the chief theological advisor to Cardinal Josef Frings of Cologne, being present at all four sessions of the council. In 1977, Ratzinger was elected Archbishop of Munich and Freising. Four years later, he moved to Rome for his appointment at the CDF. In 2002, Ratzinger was appointed as the dean of the College of Cardinals by John Paul II, who Ratzinger would succeed as pope in 3 more years. After his election to the papacy in 2005, Ratzinger chose the name Benedict in honor of two role models: Pope Benedict XV, who reigned as pontiff during World War I, attempting to pursue peace among the warring nations, and the medieval saint Benedict of Nursia, the founder of Western monasticism.

Benedict has expressed a complex diversity of theological and sociopolitical views, which transcend standard liberal-conservative dichotomies. On Catholic doctrines of faith and on social issues such as abortion, euthanasia, bioethics, marriage, sexual ethics, and homosexuality, Benedict has upheld the Church's traditionalist views while enunciating a more liberal approach to economic, environmental, and military issues, being a proponent of fair labor, workers rights, ecological reform, and nuclear disarmament for the cause of international peace. Most of Benedict's views fit into the category of a consistent pro-life ethic based on a natural law philosophy. His teachings on social justice have been published in his 2009 encyclical, Caritas in Veritate (Charity in Truth).

BENIN

Benin, the Francophone former West African colony of Dahomey, achieved independence in 1960, when it ceded from France; 13 other French African colonies became independent nations that same year. The Republic of Benin is neighbored by Togo to the west, Nigeria to the east, and Niger and Burkina Faso to the north. The political system in Benin is a multiparty republic. Thomas Yayi Boni was elected president in 2006 and has worked to combat problems with the national cotton industry and the electrical grid structure as well as using more than $300 million in funds from the 2006 Millennium Challenge Account. With a quickly expanding population of more than 9 million people residing on a landmass slightly smaller than Pennsylvania, Benin is a nation striving to improve agricultural technologies and tourist development, as well as health, longevity, and access to clean resources.

Benin is recognized internationally for its music; production of arts, including textiles, beads, and sculpture; and its rich bronze royal artwork dating back to the days when it was the Kingdom of Dahomey. The region has historically experienced migratory and war relationships between several ancient African kingdoms and empires (Oyo, Ouidah, and Dahomey); trading partnerships with the Portuguese beginning in the late 15th century; and ships transporting slaves en masse from West and Central Africa, and later palm oil, for three tumultuous centuries. At the height of the slave trade until 1840, the area of Dahomey was referred to by Europeans as the Slave Coast. Today, French is the official national language, though West African dialects are often spoken in homes and in trade, with citizens from a variety of ethnolinguistic backgrounds, including Ewe, Fon, Adja, Yoruba, Ottamari, Peulh, and Bariba.

Benin's population is divided by religion into three categories, with the 2002 census records showing 42.8% of adherents as Christian (27% Catholic), 24.4% Muslim, and 32.8% Vodou or other, though many place the total number of Vodou practitioners as high as 70%. With an annual Benin Vodou festival publicly commemorating powerful local divinities and historical practices, Benin is recognized across West Africa as having a large community openly practicing African traditions and indigenous beliefs. While many African converts to Christianity and Islam often eschew or denounce former religious practices and ceremonies, many Beninese proudly honor the spirit world and its inhabitants through ritual, invocation, sacrifice, and service. Religious leaders include priests, priestesses, diviners, healers, mediums, and herbalists. West African Vodou is often considered to have originated in Ile-Ife in Nigeria and has spread west through migration to Benin, Togo, Ghana, and Burkina Faso as well as to New World nations such as Haiti, Cuba, Brazil, the Dominican Republic, and the United States, which were populated by enslaved West Africans via the transatlantic slave trade.

BERGER, PETER (B. 1929)

Peter L. Berger is an American sociologist best known for his work in the fields of sociology of knowledge and sociology of religion. He is one of the most prolific and widely read contemporary sociologists, whose publications include Invitation to Sociology (1963), The Social Construction of Reality (with Thomas Luckmann, 1966), and The Sacred Canopy (1967), his main work on the sociology of religion. Born in Vienna, Austria, Berger moved to the United States in 1946 and after completing his PhD in sociology at the New School of Social Research in 1952 has held positions at several American universities. Since 1981, Berger has been University Professor of Sociology and Theology at Boston University and since 1985, the director of the Institute for Culture, Religion, and World Affairs (formerly Institute for the Study of Economic Culture) at Boston University.

Berger is perhaps best known for his introductory sociology books and the theory introduced in

The Social Construction of Reality, but his main substantive work has been in the sociology of religion. The Sacred Canopy combines Berger's theoretical work on the sociology of knowledge with ideas from phenomenology of religion (e.g., Rudolph Otto), creating a characteristically "Bergerian" theory of religion that has provided the sociology of religion with important concepts such as (his reformulation of) "theodicy" and "plausibility structure."

Berger's most influential contribution to the field, however, has been his theory of secularization. While mostly following Max Weber's ideas on the impact of capitalism and bureaucracy on religion, Berger's original thesis is that pluralization begets secularization by undermining certainty in consciousness. Using the Protestant Reformation as an example, Berger shows how the challenge to religious monopolies not only changes the institutional status of religions in society but also erodes individual belief.

While Berger's secularization thesis has been very influential, especially in interpreting religious change in Europe, it has also been criticized on the basis of the apparently opposite development in the United States, where plurality of religious choices seems to have created a thriving religious culture. Although considered by some the main proponent of the "old paradigm"—those supporting the secularization thesis—in the sociology of religion, Berger has more recently become a vocal critic of his own views and is now best known for abandoning his earlier theses and advocating the idea of the desecularization of the world.

In addition to sociology, Berger has written explicitly theological texts. He has, however, always been keen to point out that as a sociologist he cannot say anything about the reality of the transcendent.

BERMUDA

Bermuda consists of 140 islands and islets located in the North Atlantic Ocean east of North Carolina and north of Puerto Rico. These islands, named after Juan de Bermúdez, the Spanish navigator who discovered them in 1505, remained uninhabited for most of the 1500s and early 1600s. All this changed in 1612, when the English officially claimed the islands. As the first residents, the English were to have a significant impact on shaping all aspects of life within these islands. The religious life of the islands was primarily Protestant Christianity—consisting initially of the Church of England, then the Church of Scotland, and much later the Puritans who were fleeing persecution in England.

Two additional features that also played a significant role in shaping life in the islands were land and emigration. Due to the limited land area, the islands were constantly grappling with the issue of overpopulation. This resulted in the need for a continuous stream of emigrants to maintain a manageable population. How did this play out in terms of religion? It produced a context in which conformity to the views of the majority superseded the toleration of a diversity of opinions. Thus, following the Bermudian civil war in 1649, when the majority of the colonists had a strong devotion to the English crown, those among them who would not swear such allegiance, specifically the Puritans, were forcibly exiled to the Bahamas.

In the years that followed, the religious life of the islands was oriented around the practices and beliefs of both the Church of England and the Church of Scotland. However, in many ways, the faith practiced by the colonists was lax—that is, not garnering any significant amount of attention in their daily lives. With the implementation of slavery, a debate ensued regarding the religious instruction of the slaves. For some planters, such information would produce restlessness among the slaves; for others, it was necessary. These lessons did not begin until 1800 with the work of the Methodist missionary George Stephenson, who was imprisoned for 6 months for engaging in such activity. It was only after this that the Church of England began to engage in teaching the slaves about religion.

During the rest of the 19th century, the religious landscape of the islands began to diversify due to the introduction of Roman Catholicism and the African Methodist Episcopal denomination. The growth of Roman Catholicism received further support through the importation of indentured Portuguese laborers beginning in 1839 and continuing until the 1920s.

In the second half of the 20th century, as some Bermudians began to challenge many of the ways in which the African Caribbean population was discriminated against within society, there was also the call to address the manner in which religion had fostered, and continued to foster, such practices. In seeking an answer, many Black Bermudians turned to Rastafarianism, a religion they saw as providing them with a symbol for revolutionary political engagement and cultural solidarity. This process of social, political, and religious change continues with the infusion of West Indians from Jamaica and other islands.

with other people. Etymologically, it is derived from a Sanskrit root bhaj, meaning to “share,” and it refers to emotional “participation” with one’s deity and human beings as a core value. Indeed, bhakti is a mode of religious faith, and its expression is characterized by affective service of, participation in, or bonding with the transcendent (or God), understood as personal and as personally related to oneself. In Indian literature, we encounter a bipolar character of bhakti: On the one hand, it refers to an “emotionally restrained elite bhakti,” expressed in Sanskrit literature such as the Bhagavad Gita and the Svetasvatara Upanishad, and on the other, it points to an “emotionally expressive bhakti,” as articulated in vernacular literature. At the popular level, however, a fervent outpouring of bhakti arose as an outcome of a set of religious ideas and structures first seen in South India in the 7th century and slowly sweeping up to North India by the 15th century. The protagonists of this movement employed vernaculars as literary languages, in contrast to the classical Sanskrit of the ancient Hindu tradition. They opened the doors of spiritual liberation to all persons, including women and members of most nonprivileged classes (varanas), such as Shudras and outcastes. Thus, they offered a challenge to the earlier classical Hindu tradition based on the Vedas and Dharmashastras that had become the exclusive province of a small Brahman elite who had “unilaterally barred the rest of the population from any direct eligibility for salvation, or even from hearing Vedic texts on which the Brahman’s religious authority depended” (Lorenzen, 1995, p. 15).

To some extent, it is misleading to speak of a single organic or monolithic bhakti movement throughout India. Different groups employed the various regional languages in their poetry; directed their devotion to different deities such as Rama, Krishna, Shiva, or the goddess Kali; and assumed distinct theological positions in their discourses. In particular, some devotees (bhaktas) were inward-looking solitary spiritual seekers, while others adopted a more outward, socially critical orientation to the world around them. Metaphorically, bhakti has been personified in literature as a beautiful woman, born in South India, who grew to maturity in the Deccan. In the Tamil Nadu region, for instance, we encounter the popular devotional movements of (a) Vaishnava Alvar saint-poets (Nammalvar, Andal) and the more elite Sri Vaishnava tradition of Ramanuja, (b) Shaiva Nayannar saint-poets (Manikavachakar, Lady of Karaikal), and (c) the more elite Shaiva Sadhanta tradition (Meykanta, Arulnanti) and Tantric Siddhas. The saint-poets of Vishnu and Shiva began traveling from temple to temple, singing the praises of their chosen deity in their own mother tongue. In particular, these Tamil devotees considered the Alvars' poems the equivalent of the Sanskrit Vedas and recited them daily, in temples and at home. In 12th-century Karnataka, a group of devotees called Vira Shaivas coalesced around the Kalachari minister Basavanna, showing their adoration to a stylized manifestation of Shiva in the shape of a small linga ("phallus"), which was carried by every devotee. From the late 13th through the 17th century, the Maharashtrian pilgrimage center Pandharpur became the focus of Marathi devotionism toward the god Vithoba, a form of Krishna, motivating the Vaishnava Warkari saint-poets (Jnanadev, Namdev, Chokhamela, Eknath, Tukaram, and Ramdas). According to the same literary metaphor, the woman finally reached her finest flourishing in the north, stimulating bhakti movements in the Hindi region (Rajasthan, Gujarat, Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, etc.) from the 14th century onward. Interestingly, these movements encountered the Islamic presence in the north, where a Muslim sultanate was already established since the early 1200s. A synergistic relationship between Hindus and Muslims in North India led to the construction of new themes and emphases in vernacular poetry, reflecting the Sufi influence on bhakti traditions.

Since the classical period of North Indian bhakti in the 15th and 16th centuries, two major streams of thought have emerged in the form of nirguna ("without attributes") and saguna ("with attributes") discourses, primarily on the basis of a theological difference in the way of conceptualizing the nature of the divine being that is the object of devotion. The persons who follow the nirguna school of thought prefer to worship a divine being who remains mostly nonanthropomorphic. These devotees are commonly referred to as nirguna bhaktas/bhagats or simply sants. They were a group of mystical poets who preferred to worship God without attributes or "without form" (nirankar). They had a tendency to be critical of anyone who approached God through icon and legend, as most Hindus did then or do even today. They believed in the basic equality of human beings and, thus, rejected all social distinctions based on the caste system. They shunned the outward symbols of religious life, including images, formal religious exercises, pilgrimages, and ritual bathing associated with the ideas of pollution and purity. They challenged the authority of the scriptures, the priests, and sacred languages and expressed their ideas not in the traditional Sanskrit but in the vernacular, which allowed the common people access to and equal participation in religious discourse. By rejecting the doctrine of avatar ("incarnation of a deity," usually Vishnu) they diverged radically from the Vaishnava bhakti. Their emphasis was on a strictly inward meditation on the divine name as the sole means of deliverance from the cycle of transmigration. Kabir (ca. 1398–1448), Ravidas (ca. 1450–1520), and Guru Nanak (1469–1539) belonged to this nirguna religiosity, a school of thought that is now known in academic circles as the Sant tradition of North India.

The devotees who follow God with attributes (saguna) affirm that God has indeed entered history and taken form—even the form of an image in a temple. They worship anthropomorphic manifestations of the divine being. They are also called Vaishnavas because they tend to be worshippers of one of the two major expressions of the high god Vishnu: his avatars Krishna and Rama. Since these followers constitute the majority, their movement has generally been equated with the "main bhakti tradition." In the Hindi region, Surdas (ca. 1478–1585), Mirabai (b. 1504), and Tulsidas (b. 1543) were the celebrated protagonists of saguna persuasion. In Bengal, Vaishnava poets such as Jayadeva, Vidyapati, Chandi Das, and the ecstatic devotee Krishna-Chaitanya (regarded as an avatar of both Krishna and Radha) flourished between the 12th and 16th centuries. According to the 16th-century devotional theologian Rupa Goswami, it is possible to enjoy various relationships with God based on analogies with the following human relationships: One may relate to God as an insignificant human relates to the supreme deity, as a respectful servant relates to his lord and master (das bhakti), as a mother relates to her child (vatsalya bhakti), as a friend relates to a friend (sakha bhakti), as a lover relates to her beloved (prema bhakti), like cowherd girls (gopis) experiencing “honeyed emotions” (madhurya bhakti), like devotees experiencing tortured feelings of separation and longing (viraha bhakti) for their divine Beloved, and so on. Notably, the erotic is regarded as the highest form of association in the bhakti poetry, exploring the passionate love between the cowherd women of Vraja, who represent all human souls, and the enchanting young Krishna.

Most instructively, the discourse of saguna bhakti has been dominant in the Hindu tradition for more than 1,000 years. Not surprisingly, except in the Punjab, nirguna bhakti has remained a subordinate, minority tradition subject to the “hegemony” of the saguna tradition. In this context, David Lorenzen (1995) observes, “Indeed, it is precisely the distinction between hegemonic and subordinate or subaltern ideological discourse that underlies the distinction between the nirguni and saguni devotional movements” (p. 3). He further notes, “Theological differences are not simply the product of historical accident; they are symptomatic and expressive of differences in social identities” (p. 2). In other words, theological differences in beliefs and practices provide the foundation for different identities and ideologies of different groups. For Gaudiya Vaishnavas (named after the geographical region of Gauda, which is central to modern Bengal in northeastern India), for instance, chanting of Krishna’s name as a mantra makes Krishna himself actually present. These followers of Krishna-Chaitanya (1486–1533) institutionalized chanting combined with ecstatic dancing as a collective practice, similar to the musical sessions (sama) of the Sufis. At times, these public displays of congregational revelry could provoke suspicion and suppression by civil authorities. Under such circumstances, the resistant powers of inner bhakti against outward social pressure could become the source of political action.

In conclusion, the bhakti songs in Hindi, Punjabi, Bengali, Marathi, Tamil, and other vernacular languages exhibit not only their religious intensity but also their transforming power in the central devotional practice of kirtan (“devotional singing”), unifying the consciousness of performers and listeners alike. These poetic utterances remain very much alive in contemporary India, including the South Asian diaspora, where they are replicated in their original melodies in musical performances in rituals, liturgy, and temple worship. Through them, the voices of Kabir, Ravidas, Surdas, Mirabai, and other poet-devotees come alive to reveal a spiritual path of merging with an indescribable divine Beloved. Thus, the loyalty to the memory of bhakti poets remains fiercely ardent, and respect for their teachings continues undiminished.

BHARATA NATYAM

Bharata Natyam is a classical dance form of India and is said to be based on the dance (natya) treatise composed by the sage Bharata (100–200 CE). Considered to be one of the fastest growing dance forms in the world, it is also the most visible form of Indian culture outside the subcontinent.

Although there has been an evolution of several dance forms in the subcontinent, the most popular in South India had been one called dasiattam (dance of the servants [of God]). Performed in salons and courts, at domestic and public rituals, and in temples by women, some of whom were courtesans, it was transformed into a “national” art in the 1930s by several artists, including Rukmini Devi Arundale (1904–1986). T. Balasaraswati (1918–1984), the legendary dancer, was one of the first to perform this dance form on a secular stage. Bharata Natyam includes sensual and spiritual love in many forms, including romantic and devotional. Some lineages have emphasized the devotional aspects; yet others argued that the refined erotic elements should not be expunged in the name of “purifying” the dance.

Bharata Natyam involves coordination of eye, head, neck, arm, hand, body, leg, and foot movements, and although not restricted by gender or religion, most dancers today are women and Hindu. Dances involve facial and bodily expressions (abhinaya), pure dance movements with rhythmic foot work (nrtta), and a combination of both (nrtya). The musicians for the dance are proficient in classical Carnatic music, and the ensemble includes a nattuvanar (a person who conducts the dance performance, holding the cymbals and periodically calling out the rhythmic syllables for the dance steps) and a vocal singer. Instruments such as a violin and the mridanga (a percussion instrument) are also very important. The costume for Bharata Natyam dancers is frequently a rich silk sari with gold borders and design, stitched to allow freedom of movement. The dancer also wears flowers in the hair; heavy, gold jewelry; stage makeup; and painted designs on the palms and feet. Dancers go through years of training, culminating in a major ritual of “reverence for the anklets” and a dance debut (arangetram) that is said to mark one’s competence and proficiency in the art.

From temple sculptures in Southeast Asia, it seems probable that Hindu narratives and traditions were disseminated through classical dances. In the contemporary world, among diaspora communities, dance classes become popular venues of socialization for young girls, where they meet other children of Indian origin and connect directly with Hindu religious culture. Through Bharata Natyam, students learn stories about Hindu gods and goddesses, both Pan-Hindu deities such as Rama or Krishna and more local ones, who are known only in particular places in South India. They learn stories of the deities one’s ancestors worshiped, the Hinduism that they grew up with in India, Trinidad, or South Africa. Students also learn the body language and the affective ethos encountered in the subcontinent and the emotions that are intricately tied into the depiction of the human-divine relationship. Through the lessons, one learns the received traditions of power structures and social relations in the Hindu culture; the relationships between kings and ministers, teachers and students; or how to depict love, especially romantic love.

While Bharata Natyam classes are held in private homes and studios in India, in other parts of the world, dancers teach in Hindu temples as well as in studios. The dances are featured in almost all ritual celebrations, sacred and secular, from temple consecrations to Indian student groups celebrating festivals in college campuses.

BHARATIYA JANATA PARTY

The Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP; Indian People’s Party) is a political party that promotes Hindu nationalism. BJP members increased their political influence and gained international attention in the 1990s, when they worked with their partner organizations the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) in implementing mass-scale rituals and politicized processions over the building of a Ram temple in Ayodhya. These activities fostered popular support for the BJP in various regions of India. The processions also provoked violence between Hindus and Muslims. Currently, the party strives to promote a more moderate image by stressing economic reform and national security.

The BJP was established in 1980 as the successor of the Bharatiya Jana Sangh (BJS). The BJP promulgates two political ideologies: integral humanism and Hindutva. Considered the guiding philosophy of the BJP, integral humanism advocates the formation of a harmonious society through an “integrated” vision of life guided by the ancient culture of India. Hindutva is a nationalist ideology that promotes governing based on Hindu culture and values. The BJP is critical of the secular policies of the Congress Party.

In 1991, the BJP became the largest opposition party by doubling its seats in Parliament. These gains were attributed to religious agitations over the construction of a Ram temple in Ayodhya. Party leaders promulgated the belief that the Babri Masjid (“mosque”) was built over the birthplace of Ram, a Hindu deity. In conglomeration with the VHP and RSS, the BJP conducted a series of rath yatras, which were well-orchestrated religious processions. The BJP leader L. K. Advani posed as Ram while riding in a vehicle modeled after the god’s chariot. The processions marched through various politically strategic locations and often provoked riots between Hindus and Muslims. BJP members were also involved in a rally that culminated in the destruction of the Babri Masjid in 1992.

Striving to expand its base, the BJP began to distance itself from the VHP and RSS and even shunned the militant propaganda that propelled the party to power in 1991. The BJP won the most seats in Parliament in 1996 (161 of 545) but fell short of the majority and failed to form a coalition government. Gaining additional seats in 1998 and 1999, the party successfully formed a government with Atal Bihari Vajpayee as prime minister. The BJP advanced policies of economic reform, promoted globalization and foreign investment, and sought to stabilize relations with neighboring Pakistan. In 2002, BJP members were accused of complicity in the communal violence that erupted in Gujarat. The BJP lost the 2004 elections to the Congress Party.

BHUTAN

Bhutan (formally the Kingdom of Bhutan) is a small, landlocked Buddhist constitutional monarchy in the eastern Himalayas, located between China’s Tibetan autonomous region and India. Its terrain is largely mountainous, and its economy is based on agriculture and forestry. Bhutan’s official national language is Dzongkha, and its multiethnic population, reported in the 2005 government census to be approximately 691,000, is 75% Buddhist and 25% Hindu.

Tantric Buddhism took root in Bhutan in the eighth century, superseding the indigenous Bon religion, which nevertheless subsists today in local practices. Ngawang Namgyel, a leader of the Drukpa Kagyupa (“Thunder Dragon”) sect of Tibetan Buddhism, unified the territory of Bhutan in the 17th century, establishing Bhutan as a sovereign state and endowing it with its Drukpa character. In the early 20th century, Bhutan became a hereditary monarchy, and in 2008, it transitioned to a constitutional monarchy when its fifth king, Jigme Khesar Namgyel Wangchuck, ratified the country’s first constitution.

Bhutan’s participation in globalization has been largely through its own rapid internal modernization. Bhutan has walked a fine line between preserving its cultural and religious heritage while embracing elements of globalization that yield the greatest perceived benefits to its population. In this process, religion has played a profound role in shaping Bhutan’s responses to the challenges and opportunities that modernization has presented. A prime example of this can be seen in Bhutan’s official program, established in 2008, of promoting and measuring the quality of life of its citizens through a “Gross National Happiness” index, which it quantifies in census reports and includes as part of the country’s GDP (gross domestic product). The concept is based on Buddhist principles of a well-balanced life.

In the last decades of the 20th century, Bhutan made dramatic strides in modernization through effective development programs in the areas of agriculture, education, health, and overall infrastructure. Emerging from centuries of isolation, in the 1960s, the government pursued policies that would balance the gains of modernization with cultural and religious preservation of the country's majority Drukpa Buddhist heritage. Through royal patronage, select cultural traditions such as the Tshechu dance festival have been preserved and afforded new vitality. The country's strictly controlled tourism industry also benefits from the vitality of these cultural traditions, and sometimes tourists further support them in return.

The Bhutanese government has pursued policies and programs that have preserved the country's natural environment from the degradation witnessed in other Himalayan countries resulting from industry, development, and tourism. These policies, which are informed by a Buddhist orientation to the phenomenal world wherein the land is the abode of various local forms of the sacred, have ensured the preservation of vast natural resources.

In the 1980s, governmental concerns with Drukpa cultural preservation took the form of ethnonationalist policies that sought to exclude Hindu Lhotshampas (Bhutanese of Nepali descent) from definitions of Bhutanese identity. This led to the eventual expulsion of more than 100,000 Lhotshampas, most of whom are housed in UNHRC (United Nations Human Rights Commission) camps over the Nepal border. Such concerns also led to the implementation of an array of policies—including new Druk sartorial codes—intended to strengthen Bhutan's Drukpa identity.

BIBLE

different forms and revered as sacred texts by Christians and Jews. These writings are usually collected and bound in a single volume titled “The Bible” or “Holy Bible” and as such are usually considered authoritative in some sense and used in religious ritual and practices in Christianity and Judaism. The word Bible is most commonly used to characterize a collection of 66 books, the first 39 of which (in the Christian numbering) are also the full extent of the Jewish scriptural canon, that is, the Hebrew Bible (HB) or Old Testament (OT), and the latter 27 of which constitute uniquely Christian writings, that is, the New Testament (NT). Thus, the term Bible has a decidedly Christian undertone, though some Jews refer to their own canon simply as “The Bible” as well. Although Christian and Jewish traditions overlap in content between their shared books, the order of the books is arranged differently between the Christian and Jewish Bibles, with the most prominent difference being the inclusion of (at least) 27 additional books (the NT) in the Christian canon. Furthermore, some Christian traditions, for example, Roman Catholic, Greek Orthodox, and Russian Orthodox, consider several additional books as canonical, further complicating any exact definition in terms of content for the term Bible.

The process by which the Bible came to be written and collected together as a single book and considered as a complete “canon” (Greek kanon, “measuring reed, rule”; by extension, an authoritative collection of books) is complex and historically obscure. There is currently no consensus about the circumstances under which the HB came to be canonized, but it seems that by at least the mid-second century BCE certain portions of the HB were understood as authoritative (see, e.g., the reference to Jeremiah in Daniel 9:2 and the Prologue to Ecclesiasticus, where the threefold mention of “the Law and the Prophet and the others” seems to refer to some established set of books with traditional labels). Since Jewish communities (with the exception of the Karaites) traditionally see their Bible not in isolation as freestanding scripture but rather as part of a larger body of literature that includes, minimally, the Mishnah, Talmud, various rabbinic commentators, and oral tradition, Jews placed less emphasis on formal declarations of canonicity for any given book vis-à-vis

Christian communities, though the Mishnah (Yadayim 3:5) and Talmud (Menahot 45a, Baba Bathra 14b–15a) do record debate surrounding the inclusion of several books. The HB/OT is written primarily in ancient Hebrew, although several short portions are in Aramaic. The earliest manuscripts of the HB are found among the so-called Dead Sea Scrolls, dating as early as ca. 250 BCE and as late as the first century CE. No original manuscript of either the OT or the NT has ever been discovered, and there is currently no consensus regarding the issue of when the earliest texts of the Bible were written; many have assumed that some parts of the Hebrew Bible date back to the 12th to the 10th century BCE, while it seems more certain that the entire corpus of the NT was written in the first and second centuries CE.

In the Jewish Bible, the order of the books is as follows. Torah (Law): Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy; Nevi'im (Prophets): Joshua, Judges, First Samuel, Second Samuel, First Kings, Second Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi; Kethuvim (writings): Psalms, Proverbs, Job, The Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, First Chronicles, Second Chronicles.

The Christian Bible contains the same 39 books in the OT, but after the first five books, the order is often different: Joshua, Judges, Ruth, First Samuel, Second Samuel, First Kings, Second Kings, First Chronicles, Second Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi. At certain points, the differences between the arrangement of these books in the Jewish and Christian canons reflects serious religious differences between the two groups. For example, the Christian placement of Daniel after Ezekiel (and thus among the other named “prophetic” books) reflects the heavy Christian reliance on Daniel in eschatological matters (e.g., as indicated in the NT Book of Revelation), whereas Jewish interpreters have traditionally rejected readings of Daniel that privilege its apocalyptic dimensions. The Jewish canon ends in Chronicles, with the decree of Cyrus for Jews to return to Jerusalem after exile and rebuild the Temple, thus emphasizing the important nature of the Temple in ongoing Jewish religion (at least pre-70 CE), whereas the Christian arrangement ending in Malachi concludes with a promise of the coming Elijah figure, providing a bridge to the preaching of John the Baptist in the NT and the coming of Jesus.

Roman Catholic and Orthodox Bibles include as canonical several books that are sometimes labeled as Apocrypha (“hidden”), though others prefer the term Deuterocanonical. These books include Tobit, Judith, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus (Sirach/Sirah), Baruch, Letter of Jeremiah, First Maccabees, Second Maccabees. Certain books, such as Esther and Daniel, also contain additional chapters or sections (in Greek) that are accepted by those who accept the Apocryphal literature as canonical. Additionally, several texts appear in Greek and Slavonic Bibles that are not in the Roman Catholic canon, including First and Second Esdras, Prayer of Manasseh, Psalm 151, and Third Maccabees. Protestant Christians since the Reformation have followed Luther in rejecting the canonical status of the Deuterocanonical literature, though these books were not fully removed from Protestant Bibles until well after the 16th century CE.

The Christian NT contains 27 books: The four Gospels—Matthew, Mark, Luke, John—Acts; several “epistles,” that is, letters addressed to specific communities—Romans, First Corinthians, Second Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, First Thessalonians, Second Thessalonians, First Timothy, Second Timothy, Titus, Philemon, Hebrews, James, First Peter, Second Peter, First John, Second John, Third John, Jude—and one apocalyptic work—Revelation. The oldest manuscripts of the NT (all written in Greek) began to appear in the second century CE, and quotations of various NT books by the early Church Fathers by this time period and onward seem to indicate that a corpus of writings—including, but not limited to, many of the books that later would become canonical as the NT—was considered authoritative in some sense by at least the end of the fourth century CE. The oldest manuscript of the (Christian) Bible is known as Codex Sinaiticus and was written in Greek on parchment in the fourth century CE; the document is fragmentary but contains about half of the HB, all of the NT, and two other early Christian writings not included in modern Bibles. Other early (but still incomplete) codices include Codex Vaticanus (fourth century) and Codex Alexandrinus (fifth century). The oldest (though not entirely complete) form of the full Hebrew Bible collected in a single document is the 10th century CE Aleppo Codex, while the first full manuscripts of the Christian Bible begin to appear by at least the 11th century (Johann Gutenberg produced the earliest complete printed Christian Bible in the 1450s).

One of the most prominent storylines in Western religious history involves the various attempts to translate the Bible into any one of a number of vernacular languages. The history of Bible translation dates back to at least the third to the second century BCE, when the books of the HB were translated into Greek; these translations, commonly referred to generically as the Septuagint, were widely circulated in Israel/Palestine by the first century CE, and various lines of evidence suggest that the authors of the Greek NT used the Septuagint translations as their authoritative text when quoting the HB (in Greek). Other translations of the Hebrew of the HB circulated during the first century CE in the form of Targums, that is, Aramaic translations of parts of the HB.

By 405 CE, the Christian scholar Jerome had produced the Vulgate, a Latin translation of both the OT and the NT; the Vulgate served as the official translation of the Bible for the Catholic Church through the medieval period and was affirmed as the authoritative version at the Council of Trent in 1546. As early as 1382, John Wycliffe made an English translation of the Bible, and William Tyndale printed the first complete English edition of the Bible in 1537; concurrently with Tyndale, Martin Luther produced a German translation, and the Catholic Church responded with its own English text in 1582 (the Douay Version). The production of the King James translation under the auspices of the Church of England in 1611 was a culmination of sorts in this period of the translation and dissemination of the Bible to wider audiences. Modern chapter and verse markings did not appear in the earliest manuscripts of the Bible; Stephen Langton added chapters in ca. 1227 and Robert Stephanus first inserted verses in 1551. Currently, the Bible has been translated into more than 2,200 languages, and, as is often noted, the Bible has been the number one selling book in many countries for as long as sales records have been kept, making it the world's most widely known and disseminated book.

BLACK MUSLIMS

Black Muslims are members of an American religious movement called the Nation of Islam. From 1930 until 1975, the Nation of Islam accepted only Blacks as members. They also considered Whites as “devils” and supported the separation of Black and White races. The Nation was a “proto-Islamic” movement, using some of the trappings of Islam mixed with an ideology of Black nationalism. Although the name “Black Muslims,” coined by C. Eric Lincoln, is often used for members of this movement, the members themselves reject this name.

The Nation of Islam was founded in Paradise Valley, Detroit, on July 4, 1930, by Master Wallace

D. Fard (or Wali Farad), a mysterious peddler of silks from the East, who taught his followers about their “true religion,” not Christianity but the “religion of the Black Man” of Asia and Africa. Fard stressed that “knowledge of self” was a prerequisite for attaining Black liberation. Temple of Islam No. 1 was established in Detroit.

When Fard mysteriously disappeared in 1934, his chief lieutenant, Elijah Muhammad (formerly Poole), took over and established the headquarters of the movement at Temple No. 2 on the South Side of Chicago in 1936. Muhammad was responsible for Master Fard’s deification as “Allah in person” (a Black man as God), and he claimed to be Allah’s messenger or prophet. Using the honorific title “the Honorable,” Elijah Muhammad perpetuated Fard’s teachings, which stressed three factors: (1) the need to establish a separate Black nation, (2) the need to recover an acceptable Black identity, and (3) the need for economic independence.

Muhammad found his most important evangelist in the charismatic figure of Minister Malcolm X. Converted to the Nation while he was in prison in Massachusetts in 1948, Malcolm Little followed the practice of the Nation by replacing his “slave” surname with an X, which signified “ex-Christian, ex-Negro, ex-slave”; X also meant identity undetermined. The years from 1952 until 1965, which covered Malcolm’s release from prison until his assassination, marked the period of the greatest growth and influence of the Nation of Islam. However, due to an internal dispute, Malcolm left the Nation in 1964 and converted to Sunnī Islam. He was assassinated on February 21, 1965, at the Audubon Ballroom in Harlem.

On his father’s death in February 1975, Wallace Delaney Muhammad, Elijah Muhammad’s fifth son, was chosen as the next supreme leader. He changed his name to Warith Deen Mohammed and rid the movement of its Black nationalist characteristics, leading his followers to orthodox Sunnī Islam. Since 1976, the movement has undergone several name changes, from the Nation of Islam to a decentralized structure of independent masjids (“places of prayer”) as part of his Mosque Cares Ministry. Their newspaper is called the Muslim Journal.

In 1977, Minister Louis Farrakhan led a schismatic group of discontented followers in resurrecting the Nation of Islam. They have continued the separatist and Black nationalist teachings of the Honorable Elijah Muhammad, supplemented by new interpretations from Minister Farrakhan. His movement’s newspaper is The Final Call. Farrakhan’s Nation of Islam was able to mobilize more than 1 million Black people twice to attend major rallies in Washington, D.C.—the Million Man March in 1995 and the Millions More movement in 2005. In 2006, due to health complications, Farrakhan stepped aside and handed over the leadership of the Nation of Islam to an executive council.

BLAVATSKY, HELENA P. (1831–1891)

Helena Petrovna Blavatsky was a traveler, cofounder of the Theosophical Society, and a major writer of occult philosophy. Her worldwide journeys and writings drawing from several spiritual traditions lay behind the global influence of modern Theosophy.

Blavatsky was born in aristocratic circumstances in Russia as Helena de Hahn. Of rebellious temperament, she married Nikifor Blavatsky in 1849 but quickly left him to wander the world, by her own account in search of esoteric teachings and their practitioners. Much of the next 24 years of her life is undocumented. But in 1873, she arrived in New York, drawn to the homeland of Spiritualism.

There she soon met Henry Steel Olcott, lawyer, journalist, and likewise student of Spiritualism. He, Blavatsky, and others founded the Theosophical Society in 1875, initially dedicated to the study of esotericism both Eastern and Western. In 1877, Blavatsky's first book, Isis Unveiled, appeared, based on her occult study and experience. As with all her major work, its underlying object was to uncover an ancient wisdom at the source of all traditional religions and philosophies but now too often obscured by dogmatic religion and narrow-minded science.

In 1878, Blavatsky and Olcott left for India, where they believed the ancient wisdom to be still alive. She remained in India until 1885; during this time, the Theosophical Society grew rapidly, drawing particularly native Indian followers. Many were the reports of remarkable psychic phenomena associated with Blavatsky. However, in 1885, a critical evaluation of her, published by the Society for Psychical Research, stirred up much controversy. Returning to Europe that same year, she settled in London in 1887.

Despite declining health, Blavatsky published several more books. The Secret Doctrine (1888) is a comprehensive expression of her worldview as it traces the spiritual evolution of the universe, the solar system, life, and humanity as an immense undertaking of the interaction of spirit and matter; the book surveys the path of the "Pilgrim" or individual "monad" through space and time as it proceeds back to its eternal source. The Key to Theosophy and the Voice of the Silence, both published in 1889, present, respectively, a question-and-answer summary of her teaching and a devotional guide for "the few" called to altruistic mysticism.

Blavatsky's achievement was to create a synthesis of science and religion responding in the language of both Eastern and Western esotericism to the modern spiritual crises engendered by Darwinian evolution, religious doubt, and no less the incipient globalization of religious awareness. By all accounts, a colorful and unforgettable personality, Helena Blavatsky left her mark on the West's discovery of the spiritual East and the East's encounter with the West.

BODH GAYA

Located in the eastern Indian state of Bihar about 96 kilometers from Patna, the town of Bodh Gaya is known as the place where Gautama Buddha, Prince Siddhartha, attained enlightenment. The second-century poet Aśvaghōṣa in his Buddhacarita names this site the “Navel of the Earth” (Sanskrit pṛthivīnābhi), as it is the center of the Buddhist universe. Scriptures of various Buddhist traditions agree that all Buddhas—past, present, and future—attain enlightenment on this spot. It is believed that when the universe is finally destroyed, this will be the last place to disappear and the first place to emerge when the universe begins to form again.

The history of Bodh Gaya as the locus of Buddhist pilgrimage has been documented by epigraphic and literary sources from India, Sri Lanka, China, Tibet, and Burma for more than 2,200 years. The Mahābodhi Temple in Bodh Gaya (Figure 1), which enshrines Buddha’s Seat of Enlightenment (Vajrāsana), was named by UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) as a World Heritage Site in 2002.

Buddha’s Enlightenment

Prince Siddhartha grew up in luxury, but at the age of 30, he became deeply moved by the sickness, old age, and death he witnessed in his kingdom. Inspired by his first sight of a renunciate, he left behind the prince’s life and set off on a quest to find the solution to suffering as a wandering mendicant. For 6 years, he practiced restraining his body and mind near the village of Uruvilvā (or Uruvelā) on the banks of the Nairāñjanā River but realized that asceticism alone cannot put an end to suffering. He accepted rice milk offered to him by a village girl, Sujātā, regained his strength, and sat under the Bodhi tree (Ficus religiosa) in meditation, resolved not to rise until he attained enlightenment. The last obstacle to his goal appeared in the form of Māra, the Evil-doer, who attempted to expose Siddhartha’s lust and fear and deny him the right to meditate on that spot. The bodhisattva called on the earth to give witness to his innumerable lifetimes of virtue, finally leading him to sit and meditate under the Bodhi tree. He touched the ground with his right hand, and the earth shook in response. He thus defeated Māra, gained decisive insight into the nature of reality called “truly complete enlightenment” (samuyaksambodhi), and became transformed into an awakened being or Buddha.

Following his enlightenment, Buddha remained in the vicinity of the Bodhi tree, meditating and enjoying his experience. Although traditional Buddhist sources, such as Mahāvagga (in Pāli) and Lalitavistara and Mahāvastu (in Sanskrit), slightly differ about the order and duration of the later episodes, they mostly concur about the actual events. In each of the succeeding weeks, Buddha was absorbed in one specific action: He meditated under the Bodhi tree, out of gratitude stood and observed the tree, engaged in walking meditation, reflected on dependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda) and the cessation of suffering, meditated under the Ajapāla (“banyan”) tree, meditated during a great tempest protected by the snake king Mucilinda, accepted rice cake and honey offered by two itinerant merchants Trapuṣa and Bhallika, and was urged by Brahma to teach and share his experience. Each of these events was commemorated by later generations of pilgrims, and shrines were built at their locations, which are still venerated today. At the end of this period, Buddha set out for Sārnāth, resolved to teach his former companions in austerity, whom he deemed the most ready to understand the Dharma.

Following Buddha's enlightenment, this area began to take on a number of new names, including Sambodhi ("Complete Enlightenment"), Mahābodhi ("Great Enlightenment"), Vajrāsana ("Indestructible Seat"), and Bodhimaṇḍa ("Circle of Enlightenment"). It seems that the name Bodh Gaya or Buddha Gaya began to be used only in the more recent centuries.

Mahābodhi Temple and Monastery

The first written record of pilgrimage to Bodh Gaya is found on the Eighth Rock Edict issued around 260 BCE by Asoka, the emperor of India. There is compelling archaeological and textual evidence that Asoka also built a two-storied shrine around the Bodhi tree and gifted the King of Sri Lanka with a branch from the tree, which was planted at the Mahāvihāra monastery near the town Anurādhapura. Around the second or first century BCE, several local queens erected an intricately carved stone railing around the temple and the Bodhi tree and left inscriptional records.

According to the archaeological evidence examined by Sir Alexander Cunningham during excavations in 1871, the present Mahābodhi Temple was built in the first half of the second century CE. The temple was built over the remains of Asoka's previous structure and was repaired and renovated many times in the succeeding centuries. Hsüan-tsang, a renowned Chinese monk visited Bodh Gaya around 637 CE and left a detailed description of stupas, shrines, and monasteries, including the Mahābodhi Temple, which closely corresponds to the building as seen today.

In the fourth century CE, the Sri Lankan king Meghavana built Mahābodhi vihāra, a magnificent monastery to the north of the temple as a shelter for pilgrims and a seat of academic studies. Its 9-foot-thick walls housed more than 1,000 monks at the time, and it continued to be used at least until 1234, when the Tibetan monk Dharmasvāmin documented his stay there. A trail of inscriptions on the monuments and temples of Bodh Gaya, together with classical textual sources in India, Sri Lanka, China, Tibet, and Burma, shows that the flow of monastic and lay pilgrims, Buddhist scholars and yogis, and male and female devotees, was unabated for centuries.

In the second half of the 12th century, Turkish invaders repeatedly raided the area, burnt and plundered the great Buddhist monasteries, and slaughtered the Buddhist monastic population. Although many of the remaining monks fled to Nepal and Tibet, inscriptions witnessing the presence of Sri Lankan monks, Tibetan pilgrims, Indian royal donors, and Burmese royal delegations carrying out repairs continued up to the end of the 13th century. After that period, Bodh Gaya was gradually abandoned, and its monasteries, shrines, and temples fell into disrepair. The remnants of Bodh Gaya became less and less accessible to the pilgrims and were mostly forgotten by the rest of the Buddhist world.

Toward the end of the 16th century, the followers of Shiva with their leader Mahant (hereditary title) settled in Bodh Gaya and began to arrogate Buddhist monuments, using the images, stones, and bricks as building materials. In the first half of the 19th century, the Buddha statue in the central shrine was removed and replaced with a Shivalinga.

Modern Period

In 1880, the temple and monastery were excavated and restored, based on an ancient discovered model and the existing remains, by the British archaeologists Alexander Cunningham and Joseph Daviditch Beglar. The previously removed Buddha statue, in the "earth-touching posture" (bhūmisparśa mudrā) made of gilded black stone, was restored to its place in the temple by Cunningham and Beglar. When the old Bodhi tree fell during a storm in 1867, Cunningham replanted it from a sapling of the Sri Lankan Bodhi tree, itself an offspring of the original tree. In 1956, the Indian government, as part of Buddha's 2,500th anniversary celebration, made some repairs to the temple, enlarged the area around it, and constructed circumambulation paths.

Restoration of the Mahābodhi Temple was not, however, followed by the restitution of Buddhists' rights to freely manage and practice in it. The successive mahants actively promoted the Hindu identity of the temple, claimed it as their property, and opposed the presence of Buddhist monks and images in the shrine. In the 1890s, Anagarika Dharmapāla, a devoted Sri Lankan Buddhist, commenced a legal, political, and religious battle for Buddhist rights to control the Mahābodhi Temple as the place of central importance for their tradition. After 60 years of Buddhist struggle for recognition, the Legislative Assembly of Bihar passed the Bodh Gaya Temple Act in 1949. It entrusted the management of the temple to an appointed committee with a designated minority of Buddhist representatives. Since 1956, more than 3 million members of the scheduled castes (former untouchables) following their leader Dr. Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar have converted to Buddhism, adding their voice to the continual campaign for Buddhist control over the Mahābodhi Temple.

Contemporary Bodh Gaya is again the hub of the Buddhist world. Many new temples and monasteries have been built in the area. Teachings and courses given by renowned Buddhist teachers, most notably by His Highness the XIV Dalai Lama attract large international assemblies. Today, as it has been done for many centuries, pilgrims and tourists circumambulate the Mahābodhi Temple, meditate or perform prostrations, and make offerings of incense, flowers, butter lamps, and prayers. International gatherings and festivals occur several times each year when prayers and aspirations for world peace, environmental well-being, and enlightenment of all sentient beings are chanted in a variety of different languages and styles.

stems from deep historical engagement with concerns beyond its boundaries grounded in local devotions. Its landscape, regarded as sacred by many of the inhabitants, contains some of the highest peaks of the Andes, a broad and densely populated high plateau, valleys, and the broad lowlands.

Well before the Spanish conquest, Bolivia's territory held Guarani and other lowland indigenous societies as well as the great Tiwanaku civilization, followed by the Kolla Confederations and the Inca Empire. Its shrines, such as the very holy Copacabana Peninsula with its offshore islands, known as Island of the Sun and of the Moon, figured strongly in Inca myths of origin and legitimation and continue to be important into the present, not just in Bolivia but also in Latin America, the United States, and Europe. Transformed by human effort, the peninsula became perhaps the largest man-made monument in the ancient world.

With the Spanish conquest, Bolivia became Catholic and has since participated in the changes of that institution. Today, a majority of Bolivians claim to be Catholic; estimates vary from 52% to 78%. Bolivian Catholicism ranges from devotions to figures grounded in the local landscape, such as the famous Virgin of Copacabana, the Virgin of Urkupiña, or the Virgin of Cotoca, with their confraternities, shrines, and pilgrimages that still mobilize the ritual calendar and much of social life, to various contemporary forms of Catholic devotion, such as the Opus Dei, catequists, and other lay movements. All of the above involve a combination of local social and religious concerns with transnational religious organization.

Some 20%–30% of Bolivians belong to religious groups that have more recently arrived in the country. This includes denominational Protestantism, nondenominational Evangelicals and Pentecostals, Mormons, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Seventh-Day Adventists, as well as Bahai's, Muslims, Buddhists, Hindus, Jews, and various Metaphysical and Mystery movements. Other Bolivians claim no religion.

Bolivia's religious field is also being redefined as forms of native religion develop in the interaction of multilateral agencies' emphasis on indigenous peoples' rights with Bolivian social movements. In Bolivia, this new indigenous religion generally emphasizes devotion to the Earth Mother, called

BOLIVIA

Bolivia is a country in the heart of the northern part of South America whose religious diversity

Pachamama. Other aspects of indigenous practice, once belonging to ritual, such as the music, dance, and feasts connected with the Saints Calendar, are redefined as secular culture and folklore. Their popularity is growing strongly. The Bolivian state instituted a new constitution in 2009, which breaks the official connection between the state and Catholicism and declares the state as a lay entity. Nevertheless, indigenous symbols and rituals, including devotions to Pachamama, are increasingly important to legitimate and anchor Bolivia's social-political order, whether they are defined as religious or cultural. Bolivia's indigenous culture, whether considered religious or not, is developing followers in other countries and is influencing other indigenous people's movements.

BORDERLANDS

The story of contemporary religion for Latina/os across the United States/Latin American borders, the borderlands, begins with Spanish colonialism. In 1421, the Mexica or Aztec Mesoamerican imperial capital, Tenochtitlán, fell to an army headed by invading Iberian Christians; in 1533, the Inca Empire of South America lost its imperial capital, Cuzco, to the same fate. These victories heralded a new colonial order throughout what is now Latin America, from the Tijuana border, to the southern tip of Argentina, to the former Spanish colonial islands of Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Dominican Republic. In the 19th century, Latin American colonies liberated themselves from Spanish rule and became hybrid republics, torn between their indigenous, European, and African underpinnings. For the most part, Latin American statecraft came to manage the resulting inevitable process of cultural blending and synthesis by recognizing and celebrating its creative potential and effects.

In one sense, "the borderlands" names the place and result of this history—a hybrid social and geographical space, the result of imperial Christian impulses and Indian resistances, emergent in a repertoire of performances that continue to morph. This evolutionary phenomenon is in no way unique to Latina/os; indeed, it happens in many human societies. Yet the historical and geographical contexts and the places and facts of cultural contact are in fact dissimilar and contribute to a particular regional matrix of variations, local culture, and borderlands culture. And indeed, traditions develop that possess the aura of always having existed so that multitudes invest great meaning in them—they become important enough to ground personal and national master identities.

Still Nepantla

For the ancient Mexican Nahuatl speakers, the place of tradition was known as nepantla: the space in-between worlds. Colonial Christians were bewildered by the wonders they encountered in 15th-century Mesoamerica. When one Indian wise man was asked why he continued practicing his religious traditions after having formally received Christian confirmation, his answer was prophetic. He asserted that they were still nepantla, the place of in-between, occupying the porous borders at once connecting and separating Maya from Aztec, Taino from African, indigenous from Spanish, Christian from Pagan, and, ultimately, Latin America from the United States.

Even after colonization, the colonized peoples across the American borderlands never entirely surrendered control of their bodies, memories, and sacred places; it is believed that their control remained partially in the realm of the spiritual. Religions are shaped and reshaped in the struggle for political power. The classical social theorist Émile Durkheim once correctly noted that human nature does not explain religious phenomena; instead, one must look to their social contexts for explanations.

Borderland Religions

Embedded in the trajectory of Chicano history, the borderlands thesis suggests that for many Mexican Americans cultural production occurs betwixt and between Mexico and the United States and is thus characterized by liminality, or the processual state of in-between-ness, of becoming. The organizing principle of the borderlands thesis focuses on how the international boundary between Mexico and the United States, as well as adjacent regions, creates a distinctive cultural space that paradoxically links yet divides people on either side of the border. The borderlands is not only a physical place but also a poetic device for describing perennially emergent and multiplex individual, social, and cultural formations.

The grand symbol of the border looms large in the Mexican imaginary, and the reality of its daily transgression by people who may be otherwise religious and law-abiding is a cause for deep reflection. Mexicans who come to the United States put their faith in the “cross,” the act itself that becomes a symbol. Metaphorically, a border-crossing consciousness means living daily with the impulse to surpass institutional, religious, legal, spatial, and symbolic barriers that keep the colonized, those on the margins, away from centers of power. Borders of all kinds are central and formative places in the production of religion, but they also serve as peripheries that must be surpassed to arrive at a place with greater promise—a meaningful and better orientation for cultural and religious migrants.

The incessant illegal crossing of Mexicans into the United States should give us pause. Each year, millions of Mexicans are arrested for crossing the border. Others attempting to cross the border suffer a worse fate: Each year, hundreds of bodies are found in the desert between Mexico and the United States. The ocean separating the Caribbean Islands from Florida functions as a watery burial ground for thousands of people each year who attempt to cross over from Cuba, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic. Various forms of religion can provide hope and strength for these often destitute border crossers, pilgrims in a sense, on their faith journeys to the promised land.

Religious Expression

Contemporary religious expression among people of Latin American origin, Latinas and Latinos on both sides of the United States/Latin America border, is a product of many historical collisions and social collusions. The myths and realities of Spanish colonialism interfaced and merged tensely with the indigenous Americas. In the Caribbean and on the eastern coast of South America, this religious matrix combined with the myths and realities of indigenous African traditions that were brought to Latin American shores by slavery to produce the radically innovative hybrid religions existing today. Borderland religion owes its origins to at least three main sources of religious tradition and innovation: (1) the indigenous Americans (chiefly Maya, Inca, and Aztec), (2) a primitive form of Spanish Catholicism that ironically resembled the beliefs and expressions it sought to eradicate, and (3) West African Yoruba rites and practices.

Still, however, indigenous traditions survived in processes of subterfuge, dissimulation, and outright defiance. The phrase “idols behind altars” has been used to capture the ways in which the indigenous peoples of Latin America rejected the singularity of Christianity even well after formal indoctrination was imposed. In Cuba and throughout the Caribbean, African slaves were imported en masse to fill the labor void left by the largely decimated indigenous Taino populations; many Indian survivors fled to the mountainous island interiors, which soon attracted escaping African slaves and thus became productive venues of religious experimentation—producing fresh indigenous/Catholic African hybrids, Santería being the chief among them.

In the African diaspora, religious formations such as the “crossroads” mark the meeting place of the living and the dead, wherein spirits cross the border between life and death. Crossings symbolize action, movement, transformation: The “cross” is a verb. Pilgrims carry and enact the cross from South to North America, from the Third World to the First, from certain poverty to uncertain poverty, from the old to the new, refiguring multiple covenants of grace and hope. The cross bears several meanings but becomes most significant in Latina/o religious practice as both noun and verb. Migrants intersecting the northern border reenact a drama of religious transformation that is centuries old, at least: a life translation. Conversion, a new life, transformation, and a renewal of spirit are realized in the intersections created by the cross.

Latina/o immigrants typically follow the seasonal patterns of crops and other labor rhythms (e.g., the demand for construction workers is greater during the nonrainy months). And inasmuch as migrants touch and inform the lives of permanent residents in the spaces they inhabit, entire communities are affected by cycles of return: Various communities and social collectives experience ebb and swell as a function of migration. For a community delimited by border crossing, fluidity, and movement, religion is experienced as flux and flow; the greatest religious movements occur at times of crisis.

When people come to the United States, they bring their religious traditions with them; when they come as temporary workers, they return to Mexico with the commodities and cultural influences they accumulated while in exile—both are disseminated in their homelands. Thus, the cultural rhythms of the United States pulsate in Mexican religious systems, and vice versa, in various means of transnational exchanges. Both nations are influenced by the transnational movement of peoples—bodies and souls—a cycle that takes place again and again.

The borderlands is a crossroads, functioning at once as symbol and reality for millions of Latinas/os who cross boundaries of many kinds when forging plausible and effective realities for themselves and their posterity. The cross as metaphor can be effectively used to connote Latina/o religious practice insofar as borders isolating traditions from one another are diminished while practitioners draw from many spiritual resources in their struggle to survive the oppressive legacy of colonialism.

BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA

Bosnia and Herzegovina was one of the Balkan regions that was part of the Yugoslavian confederation

during the Soviet era. As a nation holding a distinct ethnic, linguistic, and cultural identity, the population of Bosnia has embraced three main religious traditions through the centuries: Orthodoxy, Catholicism, and Islam. They are the pre-Slavic indigenous Balkan people, and Paleo-Illyrian, later (in the seventh and sixth centuries BCE) mixed with Slavonic tribes. Bosnia is a region in which religion has historically played a discreet role, restricted largely to the private domain. The fact that the neighboring countries have promoted religion as the key factor of their national identities is perhaps crucial to their earlier respective national awakenings. For several centuries Bosnia was known as refugium hereticorum (“the refuge for heretics”).

The expansion of the Ottoman Empire and the arrival of Islam did not result in any major changes among those who embraced it, especially when taking into account that Islam did not influence the ethnic identity. Rather than contributing to the national homogenization of people, the conversion to Islam delayed it, which explains why the issue of nationality was marginal for the Muslim population of Bosnia. Instead, the role of Islam has been reduced to regulating their secular duties toward the state. Being a Bosnian simply had no social significance, nor was it developed into a political program, thus remaining without sacral, spiritual, ecclesiastical, or secular grounds.

This specific, if not unique, feature of the religious history of Bosnia owes much to the presence of Bogomils. Also known as Krstjani by Ragusan (Dubrovnik) sources and Patareni, or simply “heretics,” by Venetian sources, the Bogomils called themselves “Dobri Bošnjani.” Their active adherents were most numerous in the period between the 11th century and the early 14th century. A long list of Bans (the feudal head of the Bosnian state) and kings of Bosnia publicly acknowledged their acceptance of the Bogomil teaching. By 1340, the Franciscan Mission was founded in Bosnia—in the very heart of the Bogomil region (Fojnica and Kraljeva Sutjeska). The last ruler of Bosnia who was publicly a Bogomil was King Ostoja. In a more clandestine manner, important figures in Bosnian history such as Hrvoje Vukčić, Sandalj Hranić, Pavle Klesić, and Stefan Vukčić (all of whom were Bosnian rulers with different ranks, ruling as late as 1450) adhered to the Bogomil teachings. Isolated cases of Bogomil villages and settlements were registered by the Ottoman census until the mid-16th century. Strong pressure on and systematic persecution of the Bogomils have marked the history of Bosnia prior to the Ottoman arrival. Catholic Venice and Hungary as well as Orthodox Byzantium and Serbia played a great part in this.

The stećaks are unique remains from the time of the Bogomils. They are gravestones with drawings and texts that attract the attention of historians, anthropologists, poets, and the like worldwide. The total number of counted stećaks in Bosnia is more than 60,000. The stećaks have not been found in any other part of the region, including even Bulgaria, from which supposedly this creed originated. Likewise, they were not found in Serbia, Macedonia, or Montenegro, known as locations where the Bogomils also used to settle and live for certain periods of time. Known for their religious tolerance, the Ottomans gave full rights to Orthodox Christian believers as well as to Catholics. The world seat of the Orthodox Church remained in Istanbul (formerly Constantinople) throughout the existence of the Ottoman Empire. It remains there until the present time. All religions and their temples in Bosnia were under the direct protection of the Sultan.

According to some sources, in 2002 Islam was the religion of 58% of the population of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Bosniaks, who make up almost the total Muslim population of present-day Bosnia, are represented by Sunnī Muslims. Throughout history, the Sufi (dervish) orders have also been a significant part of the Islamic cultural influence in Bosnia. Serbs, almost exclusively adhering to Orthodox Christianity, represent about 30% of the population of Bosnia, while Croats, predominantly Roman Catholic, make up the remaining 10% to 12% of the population of the country (United Nations Development Program: Human Development Report, 2002).

In addition, the Jewish community in Bosnia was founded after their expulsion from Spain in 1492. They remained an important part of the social and cultural milieu until the German Nazi Holocaust action in 1943. Today, this community numbers approximately 1,200. The state constitution provides for freedom of religion. Religious education is decentralized, and the school system is based on secular principles.

BOTSWANA

Botswana is located in central-southern Africa, adjacent to South Africa, Namibia, Zimbabwe, Zambia, and Angola. With a landlocked population of just more than 2 million (July 2010 estimate) and a landmass slightly smaller than Texas, the country, formerly known as the Bechuanaland Protectorate under the British, became an independent nation in 1966. Botswana's mineral resources have helped the country hold influence in global exchange, as it is rich in diamonds, copper, and nickel and has fostered export and trading partnerships as well as tourist relations to increase the nation's wealth and global standing. Cattle raising and subsistence farming are practiced by many residents, though with the Kalahari Desert covering much of Botswana's topography, less than 1% of the land is arable.

English is the official national language, though according to the 2001 census, only 2.1% of Batswana identify English as their primary language. Instead, 78.2% speak Setswana, 7.9% speak Kalanga, and 11.8% speak other languages. Botswana's ethnic groups include the majority Tswana as well as the Shona (Kalanga), Basarwa, Kgalagadi, European Africans, and Indians. Zimbabweans have also increasingly migrated to Botswana for protection or financial gain, as increasing wealth through luxury exports has made Botswana's annual GDP (gross domestic product) one of the highest in Africa. Nomadic hunter-gatherers have had trouble being recognized in Botswana; many Basarwa have lost indigenous rights to the use of public land.

Religiously, nearly two thirds of Batswana are members of Protestant denominations, including Anglican, Methodist, Pentecostal, Baptist, Seventh-Day Adventist, Lutheran, and the United Congregational Church of Southern Africa. While missionary societies and explorers like David Livingstone exposed southern Africans to Christianity from 1845 onward, many Batswana today have adopted the independently run African Initiated Churches (AICs) as their primary preference for worship. Though the percentages of actual practitioners are most likely much higher, 6% of Batswana in the 2001 census self-identified as Badimo adherents. Badimo honors the ancestral living-dead as a part of daily life and includes cultural practices encompassing rituals, celebrations, and symbols that are nationally recognized. About 5% of Batswana identify as Catholic, and there are also small pockets of Hindu and Muslim immigrants.

Botswana in recent years has struggled with a high prevalence of HIV/AIDS and has been working hard to treat the illness while combating the further spread of outbreaks through preventive education and medicine disbursement. Several communities have faced the death of nearly one fourth of all adult citizens due to AIDS-related illness, which has affected levels of productivity and unemployment. Nevertheless, Botswana has had relative success for more than four decades with a parliamentary republic multiparty system. The current president, Seretse Khama Ian Khama, was elected in 2008 for a 5-year term.

Botswana is a member of the African Union and African Development Bank, the Commonwealth, the Southern African Development Community, the World Trade Organization, and the International Criminal Court, established in 2002.

BRAHMANICAL HINDUISM

Brahmanical Hinduism represents the elite, lettered, and Pan-Indian religious culture of the Sanskrit language that bases its religious authority on the Vedas (“knowledge”)—a body of revealed Sanskrit scripture—as well as the authority of those who preserve such scripture—the Brahman priesthood. Nevertheless, the term Brahmanical Hinduism is a scholarly construct and is/was not the label of a self-described group of religious practitioners either now or in India’s ancient past. Rather, the term is a convenient scholarly label for a collection of religious ideas, extrapolated by scholars, from a body of Indian religious and socio-normative texts.

Vedas

One can begin by understanding the Vedas, the foundational element of Brahmanical Hinduism, as consisting of four main traditions, the Rig, Sama, Yajur, and Atharva Vedas, which are then each divided into four genres—the Samhitas, Brahmanas, Aranyakas, and Upanishads. The Samhitas constitute the first and essentially earliest layer of Vedic literature; indeed, the Rigveda Samhita is the oldest piece of literature in the entire Indo-European tradition, its earliest compositions dating from around 1200 BCE.

Though there are major religious shifts that take place within the expansive Vedic corpus, the entire religion of the Veda revolves, in one way or another, around the fire sacrifice. Early on in the tradition, such a sacrifice entailed various gods being invited to partake of gifts offered into the fire and listen to hymns of praise in exchange for granting certain desires of the sacrificer (usually this-worldly: health, wealth, progeny, etc.).

Later Vedic literature includes the Brahmanas, Aranyakas, and Upanishads, which proceed roughly chronologically from the Samhitas but still overlap over a period from about 800 to 200 BCE. The Brahmanas elaborate on such rituals, including their performance and meaning, until performance of the sacrifice is accorded a cosmic, regulative function. However, in the Upanishads, a shift takes place whereby experiential knowledge (dhyana) of the subtle meaning of the sacrifice, leading to eternal liberation from the worldly life (samsara), becomes more important than the external ritual action (karma) of its actual physical performance as described in the Samhitas and Brahmanas.

The religious authority of Vedic scripture rests on the fact that it is believed to be the auditory dimension of the fundamental nature of reality. Ancient “seers” (rishis) are believed to have directly “heard” (sruti) or cognized these scriptures and passed them on through meticulous oral transmission down to the present day. These texts are therefore authorless and eternal “records” of ultimate reality, the keys to the deepest secrets of the universe.

Shruti and Smriti

The above representation of the Veda, consisting of four major textual genres (Samhitas, Brahmanas, Aranyakas, and Upanishads) is, however, just one of several ways in which the term Veda can be understood. For instance, one often hears of the four Vedas as referring only to the four Samhitas of the Rig, Sama, Yajur, and Atharva Vedas. Even later material, such as the epic Mahabharata, is sometimes referred to as the “fifth Veda” despite the fact that tradition refers to a specific author producing it. This elasticity of the category “Veda” is one of the key features of Brahmanical Hinduism. “Veda” can act as an open category, whereby other textual or oral traditions are able to weave themselves into its preeminent authority.

This elastic character of the Veda can best be understood through the categories of shruti and smriti. Shruti is literally “that which is heard” by the ancient rishis as part of their direct cognition of the fundamental nature of the universe and compiled in the literature of the Veda as described above—consisting of the four traditions and the related genres. The term smriti, literally meaning “that which is remembered,” connotes a different understanding of scripture, one that is not necessarily a direct auditory reflection of reality but that involves the “remembered” wisdom of sages. Nevertheless, such remembered wisdom can legitimately be interpreted as stemming from a Vedic source, presumably lost to memory. Smriti literature is therefore often seen as an attempt to “recover” or “remember” lost or obscured shruti material.

This type of thinking is also at least partially linked to Indian cosmological notions of a gradual decline over a series of four ages or yugas. During the first cosmic era, a “golden age,” Vedic revelation is pure, faithfully followed, and therefore transmitted in its entirety. As the eras progress, however, such knowledge of the Vedas becomes more obscure, and alternative linkages between Vedic knowledge and humanity are necessarily pursued. As a related matter, there is also a need to make the Vedas more understandable to a human race no longer able to comprehend its abstruse teachings. The fact that the Mahabharata is often called the “fifth Veda” signals such a move toward rendering Vedic knowledge in more approachable terms through human drama and divine intervention.

The transition from shruti to smriti is also associated with the expansion of the circumscribed ritual context centered on a closed ritual sphere of order into the larger social sphere of order (dharma). Some of the most important literature of the smriti genre, such as the Mahabharata and Ramayana epics and prescriptive socrionormative texts called Dharmashastras, deal explicitly with this move to dharma and its concern for understanding and regulating the duties associated with a huge variety of human situations. This broad concern for dharma, regulated by Brahmins, is one of the primary concerns of smriti literature and Brahmanical Hinduism more generally.

Brahmanical Synthesis

Such an understanding of scripture, involving two alternative yet still intertwined views on authority, has allowed Brahmanical Hinduism to be incredibly dynamic and creative in how it deals with challenges—both within and outside itself. As mentioned above, the early religious ethos of the Samhitas and Brahmanas clashed with that of the Upanishads. The earlier tradition emphasized a life centered on this-worldly concerns such as wealth, propagating one’s line, and the general cosmic and social good generated through sacrifices. Upanishadic thought, however, embraced a world-denying, ascetic ethos, renouncing socio-religious obligations and ties to retreat to the forest and seek individual salvation. Such a clash was a cause for anxiety within Vedic traditions, and there was a felt need to mitigate this friction. A creative response ensued whereby the ascetic lifestyle and its claims of liberating knowledge in this lifetime was woven into a theoretical social framework that allowed one to pursue liberation through a series of life stages (ashramas) while still meeting the social duties (dharma) of one’s social class (varna). This system, known as *varnashramadharm*a, emphasized conformity to one’s prescribed social role while at the same time allowing progression through life stages in the pursuit of liberation. It was open to three of the four varnas (Vaishya, the economic class; Kshatriya, the ruling class; and Brahman, the priestly class; the lowest varna, the Shudras, was excluded) and included four stages, that of (1) the student (brahmacharin), who studies the Vedas; (2) the married householder (grihastha), who practices Vedic sacrifices; (3) the forest hermit or retired householder (vanaprastha), who retreats to the forest but still remains connected to Vedic practices; and (4) the renouncer (sanyasin), who gives up all social ties and responsibilities to pursue liberation. This system therefore allowed one to pursue the ascetic lifestyle while still remaining deeply connected to sociocultural and religious norms, regulated by Brahmans, for the vast majority of one's life.

The varnashramadharma system is, however, merely one of many such instances of accommodation and change. Brahmanical Hinduism has demonstrated a profoundly dynamic character in how it deals with competing religious systems throughout its history. Its ability to weave together diverse ideas and carry them up into itself through the Pan-Indian language of Sanskrit has allowed ideas that originate, for example, in the deep south of India to profoundly affect the socio-religious destiny of millions in the far north. Such was the case with the devotionalism (bhakti) embodied in the Bhagavat Purana, a piece of post-Vedic (smriti) literature detailing the exploits of the young child-god Krishna. In this case, a regional feature of the Tamil-speaking areas of South India was picked up by Brahmanical Hinduism, reworked, and rendered into Sanskrit, and thus entering the elite, lettered tradition, it was able to traverse nearly the entire subcontinent as a profoundly important source of religious meaning for people all across India. Similar examples abound throughout Indian history. Indeed, this ability to pick up and transport religious ideas across a great distance and through language barriers is perhaps what gives Brahmanical Hinduism its global character.

BRANCH DAVIDIANS

The Branch Davidians, a religious sect in the United States based on Christianity, were led by a charismatic prophet known by his assumed name, David Koresh. In the wake of the 1978 mass murder-suicide in Jonestown, the general public of the United States and beyond remained skeptical of the structure and tactics of new religious movements. Such skepticism was given warrant just over a decade later, in 1993, when most of the Branch Davidian sect of Waco, Texas, were killed in a raging inferno after a standoff with U.S. law enforcement agencies. The 1990s were, in fact, marked by a number of violent confrontations and dramatic dénouements, including the 1995 Aum Shinrikyô sarin-gas attack on the Tokyo subway, the 1997 Heaven's Gate mass suicide, and the Order of the Solar Temple multiple murder-suicides of 1994, 1995, and 1997. As incidents such as these became more pronounced within a global context, the deadly confrontation in Waco reaffirmed the growing presence of religious violence around the world.

The Branch Davidians began as a splinter sect of the Davidian Seventh-Day Adventists in 1955. The term Branch refers to the "new name" of Jesus Christ and Davidian refers to the Davidic kingdom. The founder of this sect, Benjamin L. Roden, settled just outside Waco, Texas. In 1984, 7 years after Roden's death, a young Vernon Wayne Howell split the movement once again, forming the Davidian Branch Davidian Seventh-Day Adventists, commonly known simply as the Branch Davidians.

After a brief period of excommunication, Howell returned to the Waco site in 1990 and changed his name to David Koresh—a name that was believed to evoke references to the kings David and Cyrus of the Bible. In addition to his focus on the Book of Revelation, Koresh began to preach about the "Seven Seals" and his role as the "Lamb" that would open them. Garnering a considerable following, Koresh began to barricade his group within a compound known as Mt. Carmel to await the Apocalypse, which would begin with what Koresh believed to be a confrontation with the U.S. government.

In what would seem to be a fulfilled prophecy by Koresh, the Branch Davidians underwent a violent encounter in 1993 with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (BATF) and Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). On February 28, 1993, BATF raided the Mt. Carmel compound, which led to a 5-week standoff between the Branch Davidians and the combined forces of the BATF and the FBI. The standoff ended in a blazing inferno on April 19, 1993, which was allegedly initiated by federal agents firing a tear gas projectile into the compound—a controversial theory that is disputed by the U.S. government. In the end, a total of 82 members of the Branch Davidians and four BATF agents were killed in the fighting.

Brazil, the largest country in South America and the only one in which Portuguese is the main language, is host to a variety of religions. To understand this religious diversity, it is necessary to take into account the meeting of many different cultures since colonial times. First there was the encounter of Catholicism, the dominant religion brought by the Portuguese, with the religions of the Amerindians. Then came the African element, and contacts with the African religions later produced the Afro-Brazilian religions. Some Jews and Protestants were also part of this initial scenario. Since the end of the 19th century, Kardecist Spiritism is part of this broad spectrum of religions. More recently, Protestantism had a considerable impact. The numbers of people who declare not to have any religion is also impressive, but the presence of followers of Eastern religions and religions linked to local Amerindian traditions shows that all options are available to Brazilians. Social tolerance toward syncretism is a notable aspect of religion in Brazil, and multiple affiliations of a person to more than one religion is thus not uncommon.

Catholicism

Missionaries from religious orders such as Franciscans and Jesuits came with the Portuguese colonizers in the 16th century and made Catholicism an integral part of the colonizing process. From that time on, this religion has established itself as no other on Brazilian soil. Until the 19th century, Catholicism faced no major challenges. The arrival of Protestantism in the 19th century and the impetus of secularization, among other forces, resulted in a gradual pattern of decrease in the number of Catholics since 1872, when the first data were recorded. In the 1990s, the decrease accelerated, and the number of Catholics reduced from 83.3% to 73%, and then increased to 89% in 2000, for reasons having to do with the economic crisis and the appeal of neo-Pentecostalism. Following the redemocratization of Brazil, there was a decrease in liberation theology practices in the 1990s. Since then, Charismatic Renewal efforts and the “singing priests” have been attracting media exposure and exercising more force within the Catholic field. Data from 2003 show a pattern of stabilization for the first time since 1872.

Protestantism

The arrival of the King of Portugal and his court in 1808, fleeing the troops of Napoleon and following commercial treaties with England, which also opened the door to Anglicanism and other denominations after 1811, heralded the presence of Protestantism in Brazil. European immigrants brought Lutheranism in 1824, and those from North America brought the Baptist and Methodist churches. Later in the century came the Adventists, the Presbyterians, and the Congregational Church. In 1910, Pentecostalism arrived in Brazil with the Christian Congregation of Brazil and the Assemblies of God. From 1950 onward, there is a consistent growth in the numbers of followers of Pentecostal churches, mainly due to the churches of the Foursquare Gospel, Brazil for Christ, and God Is Love. The 1970s saw the booming of Neo-Pentecostalism, mostly imported from the United States. This movement can more properly be called Post-Pentecostalism, since it misses the emphasis on traditional elements from Pentecostalism such as the central focus on Christ and on the Bible. These elements are bypassed in favor of an emphasis on prosperity theology. Post-Pentecostal churches operate with internal structures of organization similar to those of a business, with ministers being assigned targets for money collection. They also abandon the Pentecostal adherence to external signs of sanctity and simplicity, incorporating images more linked to the consumerist practices of postindustrial societies at the end of the 20th century. As a strategy for gaining followers, they tend to demonize Afro-Brazilian religions and Spiritism. The most important are the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, Reborn in Christ, the International Church of God's Grace, and The Heal Our Land Community. Jehovah's Witnesses and Latter-Day Saints also entered as Protestants in the 2000 census. As an umbrella term, Protestantism ranks second in numbers of followers in Brazil.

Spiritism

Brazil has huge numbers of people drawn to Spiritism, which has beliefs in reincarnation and mediums—approximately 3 million followers out of a total of 10 million in the world. Spiritism started in France with Allan Kardec in the 19th century, and it found in Brazil a fertile soil for its roots to feed on nutrients from the Catholic Church and from Afro-Brazilian religions. In 1853, there was already in Rio de Janeiro a group of Spiritists. The adhesion of Dr. Adolfo Bezerra de Menezes Cavalcante in 1888 gave a new impetus to the movement, which flourished and divided into various groups, which were reunited at a conference in Rio (in 1949). Spiritism in Brazil developed the characteristics of a religion, in contrast to the characteristics of a philosophical system as found in European Spiritism. This is evident in the life and works of Chico Xavier, who died in 2002 after having written extensively about the ideology of the movement.

Afro-Brazilian Religions

These religions were created by African slaves and their descendants, and depending on the region of the country, Afro-Brazilian religions may appear in various forms such as Umbanda, Candomblé, Macumba, Tambor de Mina, Tambor de Nagô, Pajelança, Terêco, or Batuque. They all have different characteristics, and transit between them is not to be taken for granted. Because the Portuguese colonizers prohibited the slaves from practicing their own religions, it was necessary for slaves to resort to syncretism as a strategy for the survival of their beliefs. The result in many cases was a blending of Catholicism and African religions. Umbanda, born in the 1920s, was later persecuted during President Vargas's time. Umbandists then tried to de-Africanize the religion and to present themselves as linked to Kardecist Spiritism. Candomblé, brought from Africa and re-created in Bahia, spread during the 1960s, and its practitioners, many from the White middle classes, tend to re-Africanize it. Even today, many Afro-Brazilians who practice these religions do not come out openly and say so.

Judaism

Some of the early settlers who came from Portugal in the 1500s were Jews converted to Christianity. In 1624, the Dutch forces established dominion over part of northeastern Brazil for three decades, and in 1636, a synagogue was opened in Recife, to be closed by the Portuguese in 1655. In 1773, discrimination against Jews was brought to an end by the King of Portugal, and they started to return. After independence from Portugal in 1822, a few communities of Sephardic Jews from Africa were established in the north of Brazil. At the end of the 19th century, Jews from Europe started to come, mainly to the São Paulo area. According to 2000 data, they constituted 0.06% of the population. Anti-Semitism may be found only in isolated incidents in Brazil.

Islam

Islam found its way to Brazil at the end of the 18th century, with slaves from Africa called Malês. Their revolt in 1835 is said to have helped the cause for the abolishing of the slave trade (in 1851). Later, Syrian Lebanese immigrants founded the first communities at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th centuries. They resorted to the creation of Benefit Societies to aggregate the Muslim immigrants. Leaving aside its ethnic identity, Islam is now another option for the Brazilian who is looking for a religion, as the presence of Brazilian converts to Islam can attest. According to 2000 data, they constitute 0.016% of the population.

Other Religious Groups

Buddhists account for 0.15% of the population; Seicho-No-Iê, Perfect Liberty, Sinto, Baha'i Faith, and Messiânica for 0.11%; esoterics for 0.04%; Hindus for 0.001%; and União Vegetal, Santo Daime, and Barquinha for 0.01% (2000 data). There was a decrease in the number of those who declared having no religious affiliation (7.4% in 2000 and 5.1% in 2003).

Religious Groups in Electronic Media and Legislative Bodies

Mainly among Catholics and Post-Pentecostal churches, there is intense competition for capturing TV and radio audiences. A TV network acquired in 1989 by the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God already ranks second in numbers of viewers. Exposure to electronic media is important in elections, and an impressive number of Protestant and Post-Pentecostal candidates have been elected, although their internal factionalism does not allow them to operate as a united front.

BRICOLAGE

As religious beliefs and practices intermingle within a global context, a variety of unanticipated phenomena emerge—phenomena not necessarily representative of their original form or intended use. The term bricolage is used within a variety of social sciences as a descriptive term to characterize the process of improvisation in production. Derived from the French verb bricoler, bricolage refers to the process of creating something by one's own means through the use of available materials.

The French anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss used the term bricolage to describe improvised patterns of mythological thinking. In his seminal study based on ideas of structuralism titled The Savage Mind, Lévi-Strauss found imagination, and by extension experience, to be a source of mythological thought—attributing the production of this thinking to bricolage.

Examples of bricolage were observed among the Cargo Cults of the Oceania regions during the late 19th and early 20th centuries. These Cargo Cults were made up of local natives who were, for the first time, interacting with material culture, or cargo, from the Western world. During World War II, the Japanese military transported cargo through this region, which made for some of the first encounters with modern technologies. Members of these cults were thought to have believed that the cargo was created by their deities or ancestors and needed to be repossessed from these foreigners. In what appeared to be an attempt to reclaim these goods, members of the Cargo Cults reportedly crafted material goods that resembled the foreigners' possessions and to some extent imitated their behaviors. An instance of this activity was demonstrated by the building of makeshift landing strips for airplanes and headsets carved from local materials to reproduce what the cults had witnessed in the presence of these foreign peoples. The Cargo Cults could be said to have engaged in bricolage by creating a mythology of sorts from the available goods and experiences they encountered.

Particularly germane to theoretical perspectives such as the Sacred Canopy and Spiritual Marketplace, bricolage may also be used metaphorically to describe the type of religious shopping that takes place in the global sphere of available religious beliefs and practices. New religious movements such as the International Raëlian movement—which borrows from a host of ideas found within Judaism, Christianity, and the UFO (unidentified flying object) cults—and the Church of Scientology—which appropriates fragments of proto-scientific gadgets and self-help reasoning—are both examples of global religions that have used bricolage as a form of mythological thinking.

BRUNEI DARUSSALAM

Brunei Darussalam is a Southeast Asian nation whose name means “Brunei, Abode of Peace.” It is located on the north coast of the island of Borneo in the South China Sea and comprises two noncontiguous regions separated from one another by a portion of Malaysia’s Sarawak state. Brunei encompasses a total land area of only about 5,300 square kilometers (slightly smaller than the state of Delaware). The capital is Bandar Seri Begawan.

Brunei is a constitutional Islamic monarchy (commonly referred to as a sultanate). It is a Muslim-majority nation and one of the few Islamic sultanates in the world that has survived into the 21st century. Brunei has a population of 382,000, and its GDP (gross domestic product) per capita is one of the highest in Asia. Petroleum and natural gas exports account for more than half of its GDP.

During the seventh and eighth centuries CE, the mouth of the Brunei River was controlled by a kingdom that Chinese records called Po-ni. Archaeological evidence suggests that it had been influenced by Javanese Hinduism and engaged extensively in trade. It was briefly incorporated into the Majapahit Empire and was a part of the territory called Nusantara.

The present ruling Muslim dynasty was founded in the 15th century. Like the nearby Muslim kingdom of Malacca, Brunei’s power and growth were largely dependent on trade. During that time, the Sultanate of Brunei encompassed all of Borneo and parts of the Philippines. Brunei attained a high degree of prosperity and stability during the 15th through 17th centuries, most notably during the reign of Bolkiah, the fifth sultan, and Hassan, the ninth sultan. During this period, there was a great deal of interaction and conflict with European colonial powers: Portugal eventually conquered Malacca, and repeated naval conflict with Spain weakened Brunei’s control over its territories in the Philippines.

In 1841, an English trader named James Brooke and his ship’s crew assisted the Sultan of Brunei in quelling a rebellion. In appreciation, the Sultan subsequently appointed Brooke as the Rajah of Sarawak. Brooke’s government grew, consolidating power over the region. Brooke even considered seizing control of Brunei but was dissuaded from doing so by Britain’s official disapproval. Brooke and his successors were collectively known as the White Rajahs, and by expanding the Sarawak territory under their administration, they effectively reduced Brunei to its current geopolitical borders.

In 1888, Brunei became a British protectorate, and British involvement in Brunei persisted until World War II, when Japan invaded and occupied Brunei. In 1959, Brunei adopted a constitution defining itself as an independent state under the protection of the British, and it became fully independent in 1984 under the rule of the 29th, and current, sultan, Haasanal Bolkiah.

Ethnically, the majority of Bruneians are Malay (67%) and Chinese (11.2%). Brunei's official religion is Sunnī Islam (67%); other sizable religious groups include Buddhists (13%) and Christians (10%). All other faiths (including followers of indigenous beliefs) are represented by fewer than 10% of Bruneians.

BUDDHIST COMPASSION RELIEF TZU CHI FOUNDATION

The Tzu Chi (Ciji) Foundation is a large and multifaceted Buddhist organization based in Taiwan, best known for its charitable activities and altruistic ethos. Tzu Chi represents the fastest growing humanistic or this-worldly lay Buddhist movement in the Chinese cultural sphere in the 21st century, and it is one of the world's largest non-profit relief and charity organizations. Worldwide, this lay Buddhist organization claims more than 5 million followers, with branches in 39 countries; it has implemented rescue and relief work in more than 61 countries, including Afghanistan, Iran, El Salvador, and South Africa.

Its extraordinary growth is among the notable features of the Taiwanese Buddhist revival of the late 20th century. It is also intertwined with the social and political changes that marked Taiwan's transition to democracy and the growth of an urbanized middle class. Although it is still headquartered in Taiwan—where it is one of the largest, richest, and most powerful religious groups—over the years, Tzu Chi has grown into a complex organization with vast resources and an impressive global footprint. In terms of its membership, it is primarily a lay organization; however, at the top, it has a monastic leadership, personified by Cheng Yen (Zhengyan, b. 1937), a charismatic nun who founded the organization and still remains its undisputed leader.

The organization was founded in 1966 by Venerable Master Cheng Yen and 30 female followers. She was born into a prosperous Taiwanese family and became interested in Buddhism as a young woman. Although lacking formal education, she officially joined a nun's order under the auspices of Yinshun (1905–2005), arguably the most respected scholar-monk in Taiwan. When Cheng Yen founded Tzu Chi in 1966, its original mission was to help the poor and educate the rich. The next year, she established a convent, the Abode of Still Thoughts, which to this day remains the spiritual nucleus of Tzu Chi. She instituted a self-sustaining lifestyle for her monastic disciples, although the majority of her followers were (and still are) pious laywomen. Although she was not known for her sophisticated understanding of Buddhist doctrines, Cheng Yen has emerged as a prominent advocate of humanistic Buddhism, whose this-worldly vision and teachings are important elements of modern Chinese Buddhism.

From early on, Tzu Chi's charitable activities involved the wide-ranging involvement of the laity, who made generous donations and volunteered their time and expertise. Over the past four decades, Tzu Chi has experienced extensive growth in its membership and notable expansion of its activities, first throughout Taiwan and then increasingly around the world. Currently, its 5 million members come from 45 countries. Tzu Chi's success in mobilizing legions of volunteers and allocating large resources, dedicated to an array of welfare projects and charitable undertakings, is largely based on its effective organizational structure, which is set up hierarchically. The organization oversees many local branches, located across Taiwan and other parts of Asia as well as in the Americas, Europe, Africa, and Australia.

Tzu Chi's public outreach and charitable work—ostensibly undertaken in the spirit of universal compassion—involve helping the poverty-stricken, delivering disaster relief, and providing free medical care. Its leaders and volunteers are also involved in educational activities and environmental protection. Tzu Chi opened its first free clinic in 1972. That was followed by the establishment of a hospital (in 1986), the creation of a bone marrow donor registry (in 1994), and the opening of nursing and medical schools (in 1989 and 1994, respectively). Tzu Chi also runs schools, a university, a television station, and publishing ventures that produce a variety of magazines and books. Its volunteers also organize youth camps and public lectures.

Tzu Chi's mission is focused on charity, medicine, education, and culture. As such, Tzu Chi is intimately involved in providing social, educational, charitable, and medical relief to the underprivileged and underserved throughout and beyond Taiwan, reaching the United States and other parts of Asia, including mainland China. Tzu Chi has been especially proficient at providing disaster relief after typhoons, floods, and earthquakes. The provision of international relief started in 1991, when the American branch of Tzu Chi in Los Angeles helped victims of a cyclone in Bangladesh. After the severe earthquake in Taiwan on September 21, 1999, Tzu Chi relief workers did most of the early rescue work as government officials dallied over who had jurisdiction. In addition, Tzu Chi has continuously provided medical and charitable relief to areas in Southeast Asia following the December 26, 2004, tsunami and earthquake. Tzu Chi USA became a national player in relief work following the terrorist attack of 9/11 in New York City and in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, which shattered the Gulf Coast. In the United States alone, there are a total of 49 Tzu Chi branches, including three free clinics.

In 1994, Tzu Chi created the first bone marrow registry in Asia. The organization encouraged volunteers and members to organize blood drives in their neighborhoods throughout Taiwan. Within 2 years, Tzu Chi's bone marrow bank became one of the major registries in East Asia. Today, the Tzu Chi Bone Marrow Bank is connected to those of other countries, making it more efficient and, thus, crossing national as well as potential ethnic and racial boundaries.

Tzu Chi's transnational structure grows larger and more intricate day by day, and its global mission of environmentalism, health care, education, cultural pluralism, and disaster relief extends worldwide. Tzu Chi's organizational structure is transnational in scale, but its mission is global in ambition. Tzu Chi has transplanted its "just-do-it" socially engaged Chinese-Buddhist relief work onto the global religious landscape. Compassion coupled with upaya ("expedient means"), two central teachings of Mahayana Buddhism, guide its relief efforts to serve clients without regard to age, sex, race, ethnicity, class, or religious affiliation. Although a religious institution, its primary goal is not evangelical; rather, it encourages followers to emulate or to become living bodhisattvas who actualize compassion to assist others in need. As such, Tzu Chi is an important player in the development of global civil society.

BUDDHIST LAW

Buddhist law is a multifaceted term that may be used in reference to a number of areas, including (a) the Buddha's doctrine (Dharma), (b) monastic codes of behavior and discipline (vinaya), and (c) legalistic characteristics in societies that have been influenced by Buddhist concepts of jurisprudence. Therefore, when discussing Buddhist law, a distinction can be made between purely legalistic forms and nonlegalistic forms. Although convenient, the dichotomy between legalistic and nonlegalistic understandings of law in Buddhism is highly artificial. Such a distinction presupposes an understanding of law and a legal culture predominantly of Western orientation, where legalistic matters are rigidly defined and are distinct from nonlegalistic matters.

The Sanskrit term dharma, for example, is often translated as “law.” However, such a connotation does not necessarily refer to a type of legal system. In Buddhism, Dharma may refer to the natural universal and moral law that must be followed and deeply understood if an individual is to attain enlightenment. Thus, in this context, law has a cosmic soteriological connotation instead of a legal connotation.

Other foundational Buddhist doctrines—such as the principle of action and causal effect (karma), compassion (karuṇā), and interdependent origination (pratītyasamutpāda)—are also constitutive of Buddhist legal reasoning and tightly intertwined with legal systems and institutions. In the 13th century, Pagan (present-day Bagan) King Klacwa’s edict on theft promulgated in 1249 illustrated a clear correlation between legal punishment and karmic retribution. Additionally, the 14th Dalai Lama, speaking at the University at Buffalo Law School in 2006, remarked that law exists for the protection of the people and the reason for such protection arises from compassion. Thus, the Dalai Lama suggests that the foundations and workings of legal law should be intertwined and guided by Buddhist understandings of compassion.

The vinaya illustrates another type of Buddhist law. More specifically, the vinaya characterizes a type of Buddhist ecclesiastical law since the prescriptions contained in the vinaya aid in maintaining the order of the Buddhist monastic institution. The vinaya contains regulations governing a staggering array of aspects relating to monastic life, including regulations on acceptable eating times; what kind of robes can be worn; what kind of bowls, seats, beddings, and lodgings are acceptable; how to study properly; and how to properly interact with monks, nuns, and the laity. Not only does the vinaya contain regulatory guidelines, but it also details the consequences of transgressions. The most fundamental are the four cases for expulsion from the monastic order (nuns have an additional four): sexual intercourse, theft, killing another human being, and making fraudulent claims regarding one’s superhuman attainments.

However, the guidelines in the vinaya are not always restricted within the parameters of the monastic community since their influence often spills over into secular settings. In the early development of Sri Lanka’s judicial administration, monks were often recruited to work in the royal courts because of the experience they possessed in their own ecclesiastical system of governance. Even today, Sri Lankan monks are sought after as advisors to politicians and military officials.

The compilation of the vinaya, according to tradition, came about shortly after the death of the Buddha (ca. fifth century BCE), when 500 enlightened monks gathered to take part in a communal recitation of the Buddha’s Dharma in the city of Rājagrha. The Dharma was divided into two sections: (1) the discourses of the Buddha (sūtras) and (2) the vinaya (some Buddhist traditions cite three sections). The former was recited by the monk Ānanda, and the latter was recited by the monk Upāli. Many Buddhist narratives attest to the high regard placed on vinaya during this first gathering. In the Saṅgītyavaṃsa, a Pāli text written in Thailand in 1789 by Vimaladhamma, the assembled monks are asked which should be recited first, the sūtras or the vinaya. The monks quickly reply that the vinaya should be recited first since it is the life of the Buddha’s teachings (sāsana) and the sāsana exist only when the vinaya exists.

Several versions of the vinaya exist, and no single version of the vinaya maintains authority across all the various Buddhist traditions. Thus, Tibetan Buddhism adheres to the Mūlasarvāstivādin-vinaya, Theravada Buddhism adheres to the Theravādin-vinaya, and the majority of Buddhists in China, Korea, Japan, and Vietnam adhere to the Dharmaguptaka-vinaya. From the very earliest stages of Buddhism, disagreement has arisen within monastic circles over the vinaya regarding concerns such as the period of composition, length, and lawfulness of certain behaviors and actions. Although still a matter of debate, some scholars maintain that such disputes concerning the vinaya, in contrast to disagreements over doctrinal points, provided the primary stimulus for the early fragmentation of the monastic community.

The Buddhist community, the Buddhist Dharma, and originally the Buddha himself, have all influenced the political elite and other influential members of high society in various ways during various historical periods. As a result, the ways in which a region's law were created, altered, and enforced have at times been directly or indirectly affected by Buddhism's presence. The Mauryan emperor Asoka (r. ca. 268–232 BCE) became a Buddhist lay devotee (upāsaka) after the conquest of Kāliṅga (ca. 260 BCE). He also became an active patron of Buddhism and other religious groups of the time. Among other activities, his inscriptions reveal how he renovated the reliquary shrine (stupa) of the Buddha Konākamuni and promoted and enforced a dharma throughout his realm that, while not exclusively Buddhist, was not contradictory to Buddhist teachings. Asoka also took an active interest in maintaining unity and resolving conflict within the Buddhist monastic community, as seen in his edict of Kauśāmbī promulgated toward the end of his reign. Based on his own inscriptions, however, it would be a mistake to claim that Asoka created a “Buddhist state” (a foreign concept during his milieu) or that Buddhism was the “state religion” of his empire (he supported many other religious groups). Nevertheless, Asoka was influenced by Buddhist thought, and his proclamations—many related to the spreading and maintenance of the law (dharma)—helped establish a cultural environment that allowed Buddhism to rapidly expand.

Buddhist traditions—such as the Theravada traditions of Sri Lanka and many parts of Southeast Asia—later exalted Asoka as the ideal Buddhist, wheel-turning emperor (cakravartin). This, in turn, led other rulers in other regions and times to emulate his example and establish Buddhist societies—countries in which Buddhism was, or is, both religiously and sociopolitically dominant. Sri Lanka, Thailand, and Myanmar are current examples of Buddhist societies. Such countries have all been influenced by concepts of Buddhist jurisprudence throughout their histories. The collection of Buddhist legal literature that emerged around the 13th century CE in Southeast Asia, known as the dharmathats, illustrates well Buddhism's influence in the sphere of law.

While Buddhism has played an important role in influencing and shaping the legal systems of many countries, other important factors have also contributed to the development of the legal cultures that came into contact with Buddhism. First, most countries to which Buddhism spread had preexisting indigenous systems for adjudicating disputes and maintaining order. Often through a process of appropriation, indigenous legal culture was repackaged in a way that better conformed to a Buddhist worldview, but this process could not always cover every cultural nuance. There is nothing inherently Buddhist in Burmese laws of inheritance.

Second, other systems of legal thought that preceded Buddhism's entry into an area, whether indigenous to a region or imported, remained highly influential and rooted regardless of the level of success that Buddhism enjoyed in the area. Brahmanical legal culture imported to regions of Southeast Asia from the Indian subcontinent continued to be highly influential despite Buddhism's eventual success in the area. Confucian and Daoist thought originating in China, and later deeply influencing Korea and Japan, were also never completely superseded even during Buddhism's most triumphal periods in Central and East Asia. These antecedents do not lessen or deprecate Buddhism's impact in the sphere of law. Instead, they merely indicate that the foundation for some Buddhist law was obtained via appropriation and reconfiguration of systems not strictly Buddhist in origin and, above all, highlight the multifaceted and multilayered nature of Buddhist law.

BULGARIA

Bulgaria is an eastern European country that was dominated by the philosophy of secular Marxism during the Cold War but has enjoyed a religious revival in the post-Cold War period. The largest denomination in Bulgaria is the Bulgarian Orthodox Church (BOC), regarded as the “traditional” church of the Bulgarian nation. Under communism, the BOC was marginalized in society; at the same time, the authorities used it as a tool for foreign policy ends. It was thus heavily politicized as an institution, while its inner life and social witness were both disabled.

Since the end of communism, the BOC has been able to restore religious education, but it is still weak in resources and hampered by the legacy of a compromised leadership. From 1992, mainly as a result of political interference, it has suffered from a debilitating schism. A new law on religion in 2002 granted the BOC official status and automatic legal personality; all other denominations have to go through a process of registration. There is always a tendency for “Orthodox” identity to be claimed in the name of nationalism. Meanwhile, like “traditional” religions in all postcommunist countries, the BOC has been faced with the novel challenge of political, cultural, and religious pluralism.

Around 83% of Bulgarians self-identify as Orthodox. Around 12% are Muslims, who are divided among ethnic Turks, Roma, and ethnic Bulgarians (Pomaks), the latter probably constituting about 3% of the population. Communist policies toward the Muslim minorities saw considerable variation. Muslims seem to have maintained a higher level of religious activity than the nominally Orthodox. Since the end of communism, Muslims have boosted their profile in the society, with religious and cultural revitalization and political mobilization. A big issue now is the perceived threat of “fundamentalist” ideas penetrating the traditional Muslim communities from abroad.

Other Christians probably constitute about 1% of the population (half of them Catholics and half, various types of Protestants). They were all repressed under communism. As in other postcommunist countries, from the early 1990s, there was an influx of Protestant missionaries as well as representatives of new religious movements. This caused alarm in the BOC, which feared for its canonical territory and its own legitimate flock, and indeed more widely in society, as fears spread about “destructive cults” and “dangerous sects” as a threat to national identity and family life. This influx had ebbed away by the late 1990s, however.

Bulgarian society is one of the most secular in Europe, and the religious market there seems to have stabilized. People tend to know little about their own religious traditions, let alone about those of others. Historically, relations among the so-called traditional religions have been marked by passive tolerance and coexistence, and this continues, but there is the risk of the reinforcement of the fortress mentality inherited from communist times.

BURKA

The burka (also transliterated as burqa or burkha) is a particular form of Islamic clothing worn by some Muslim women, usually consisting of a long piece of fabric attached to a cap or draped over the head and loosely cascading down to cover the entire body, allowing only for slits or a screened portion of the fabric for the eyes. This form of dress may also be made up of multiple fabrics, such as one covering the head (hijab), a veil for the face, and a loose coat covering the rest of the body. The burka is usually worn outdoors over regular clothing and is meant to completely conceal the body in public. It is usually made of blue or black material. The word is a derivative of the Arabic verb meaning “to sew” or “patch.”

The burka is the most widespread form of modest dress worn by Muslim women and can be found in regions of Afghanistan, Pakistan, and India, although it is not limited to these countries. There are a variety of reasons why Muslim women choose to wear the burka. Modest dress, or hijab, is an important aspect of Islam and is proscribed within the Qur’an for both men and women, although it is unclear what modest clothing should entail. Women who choose to wear the burka believe that it is a marker of piety and modesty. Some argue that the burka has allowed women a greater degree of mobility within overtly patriarchal societies, allowing them to enter into the public sphere for work, education, and social engagement without the fear of punishment or social stigma. Some argue that the burka removes the stress women often face regarding their appearance and keeps unwanted sexual advances at bay. Some enjoy the privacy and anonymity the burka provides. These are only some of the reasons given for Muslim women’s preference to wear this type of modest clothing.

The burka is also one of the most controversial and least prevalent forms of modest dress among the varieties of Islamic veiling. It is often associated with the Taliban, who mandated this form of dress in public when they took control of Afghanistan in 1996, and thus, it has received much criticism from those opposed to the Taliban regime and the group’s treatment of women. The use of the burka has been restricted or banned in some countries based on its controversial status as a symbol of oppressive patriarchal rule, for fear of security breaches, and in light of Western feminist positions.

BURKINA FASO

Islam, Christianity, and traditional ancestral religion make up the religious landscape of Burkina Faso, a small country on the Atlantic coast of North Africa. Muslims represent some 50% of the population, with the majority belonging to the Sunnī branch. Many Sunnī Muslims adhere to the Tijaniyah Sufi or Salafi traditions. A smaller number of Muslims identify with the Shi’a branch. Christians constitute about 20% of the population, with 15% Catholics and 5% Protestants. About 30% Burkinabe openly practice the traditional ancestral religion.

Small neighborhoods in the cities build small mosques as their daily worship places. However, worshippers in such places join larger mosques on Friday for the Big Prayer. Many people combine traditionalist funerary rites and Catholic ones, though often secretly. Because traditionalist practices are mostly perceived as “outmoded,” educated and urbanite members of families leave that practice to senior villagers, who perform it independently in lineage shrine sanctuaries simultaneously with the performance of mass service at Church.

Interfaith relations in Burkina Faso are remarkably peaceful. In addition to interfaith marriage in which each spouse maintains his or her faith, major religious holidays are opportunities for Burkinabe to evidence closeness with friends of parallel religious practices through visits and meal sharing. It is also now common for most households in the cities to cook a special dish on religious holidays of the other faiths. National media also gloss over the Archbishop of Ouagadougou, the country’s capital city, frequently participating in the Muslim’s public prayer on the day of the Aïd el-Kebir, one of the most important Muslim holidays.

Though state and religion are clearly separate in today’s Burkina Faso, the Catholic Church still enjoys a privileged representation and influence in the nation's politics. Muslims, however, control substantial sectors of the economy, such as transportation and commerce. Meanwhile, the government straddles to give all religious confessions equitable visibility and has improved its relationships with the country's major religious confessions in the past two decades. These relations took a negative twist in the 1980s, when the Sankara socialist regime viewed religion as an antiprogressive instrument.

Finally, many people who declare their affiliation to be one of the "imported" religions still integrate traditional religious practices, mostly during occasions of birth, marriage, or death. In fact, though many people secretly resort to their ancestral religion to solve personal and practical concerns, they tend to view these practices in a low light in public spaces. This is certainly one consequence of the denigration of ancestral religion during Christianization of the region, when it was depicted as a "satanic" path that guarantees no salvation. Many urbanites conceal their ancestral religious faith, maybe as a way to distance themselves from what sounds more like a religious practice of the non évolué, the rural. In some areas of Burkina Faso, many young people and women now convert to Catholicism or Protestantism for practical purposes. Other than aiming to look "modern" and mainstream, they do so as a stratagem to escape the economic exploitation that elders exercise through traditional religious practice.

BURUNDI

Burundi is a small central African nation located south of Rwanda, west of Tanzania, and east of Lake Tanganyika and the Rift Valley. Politically recognized as a crisis nation-state experiencing civil war, strife, and genocide in recent history, notably due to infighting between the Hutu and Tutsi ethnopolitical factions, Burundi is struggling to find its place as a competitive survivor within the global market.

Today, Burundi is ethnically composed of 85% Hutu, 14% Tutsi, and 1% Twa. Nearly two thirds of Burundians self-identify as Christian; there are 62% Roman Catholic, 5% Protestant, 10% Muslim, and 23% indigenous practitioners. Like many African nations, practices of honoring familial ancestors are common among nearly all religious practitioners, and long-held oral traditions, ceremonies, and festivals worshipping a local divine creator (called Imana in Kurundi, Burundi's national language) are often still acknowledged.

Though Hutus are traditionally agriculturalists and Tutsis are cattle herdsman, cultural differences between the two groups are minimal. Rivalries were exacerbated and preyed on throughout colonial rule, including by ethnic divisions promoted within the Catholic Church. In 1959, conflict flared between the majority Hutus and minority Tutsis in Rwanda and Burundi. Belgian administrative response at the time involved removing Tutsis from political office and appointing in their place the Catholic Church-supported Hutus, as well as forcing all colonial subjects to carry identity cards distinguishing the person's "race" as Hutu, Tutsi, Twa, or other.

Between 1894 and 1898, after the European "Scramble for Africa" meetings, Burundi and Rwanda became protectorates within German East Africa, and the Catholic White Fathers established two permanent mission stations. The region came under Belgian power in 1916 and became independent from Belgium in 1962, with Rwanda under Hutu rule and Burundi established as a Tutsi monarchy. The Hutu-Tutsi rivalry most likely originated from the Tutsi royal, Rwabugiri, who between 1860 and 1895 instituted uburetwa, a feudal system that redistributed lands and required poorer Hutu families to farm Tutsi lands for several days per week.

In 1965, tensions over Hutus not receiving political appointments incited an attempted coup and riots; 1966, 1976, and 1988 saw three more military coups. Thousands of Hutus were killed by Tutsis, along with forced migrations of the surviving refugees to Rwanda, following the military coup of Pierre Buyoya in 1988. The first Hutu president was elected in 1993 and was assassinated barely months later. The loss of life in 1994 was estimated at more than 200,000 persons, following the mysterious plane crash and deaths of Burundi and Rwanda's presidents. The Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF), led by former Tutsi refugees, took power following the massacre and ended the most horrific ethnic cleansing in history since World War II. Nevertheless, in 1996, another coup occurred, and a decimating 6-year civil war began. With more than 300,000 killed, Burundi's civil war ended in 2002, when the Hutus reentered government. Presently, the Hutu-majority government, led by second-term President Pierre Nkurunziza, struggles to maintain order and a semblance of peace. In 2010's contested election, only the incumbent was listed on the electoral ballot following severe intimidation of political adversaries, scattered bombings, and purported voter fraud.

CAMBODIA

The religious culture of the Southeast Asian nation of Cambodia and the expanding Cambodian diaspora draws from a rich and dynamic Buddhist and Hindu heritage that is multifaceted, resilient, and unique. Living at the crossroads of Southeast Asia for centuries, the Khmer people of Cambodia both received from and contributed to many world cultures and continue to do so both in their homeland and in the many parts of the world where they have settled. The grand temples of Angkor Wat, Bayon, Preah Vihear, Koh Ker, and several others incorporate ideas from Indian traditions and share the architectural idiom of other monuments in Southeast Asia but in the end are uniquely and distinctively Khmer. Khmer dances showcasing stories from the epic Ramayana and other compositions include narratives known in India as well as others that are unknown there. Since the 20th century, there has been a distinctly transnational trend, as communities of the Cambodian diaspora, which now flourishes in America and in parts of Europe, regularly invite dancers and religious personnel from the home country and also celebrate festivals to showcase their culture.

Cambodia is about 95% Theravada Buddhist; Muslims and Christians form most of the religious minority population. The early recorded history of Cambodia as found in Chinese sources speaks about the Funan kingdom (third to fifth centuries CE) and the Zhenla kingdom—which may have been a collective of smaller states—in the sixth and seventh centuries CE. Extensive contact with many parts of the world is seen even at this early stage. Early inscriptions dating possibly back to the late fifth or early sixth centuries tell us about rulers with Indian/Hindu names with sectarian Vaishnavite and Shaivite affiliations. While Mahayana Buddhism was prevalent, most kings seem to have been, at least nominally, followers of the Hindu god Shiva. The Angkorean age began around 802 CE with the rule of Jayavarman II and is noted for its accelerated pace in the building of large, prestigious temples. There is general agreement that Hindu traditions declined after the 15th century CE, but the memory of the many deities and the stories of the Hindu epics have lingered, and the performing arts have been rediscovered, adapted, and reinvented through the centuries.

Cambodia and other countries of Southeast Asia had a reciprocal relationship of trade and culture with many parts of the world since the beginning of the first century CE. There were, of course, extensive connections with India, probably both by land and sea routes. The boundaries of these kingdoms in Southeast Asia have fluctuated through the centuries, and at the height of its power, the Khmer empire consisted of vast tracts of Southeast Asia, including parts of present-day

Myanmar, Vietnam, Thailand, Laos, and the Malay peninsula; the grand Shiva temples in Wat Phu (Laos) and Phnom Rung (near Korat, Thailand) are examples of the major temples built at the height of Khmer rule. After Thai invasions in 1431, the capital was moved south, toward Phnom Penh. After centuries of turbulent relationships with the neighboring countries, Cambodia became a French protectorate in 1863, and there has been considerable sharing of cultures between these countries. During the violent Khmer Rouge regime (1975–1979), religious activities were prohibited. In the large diaspora and resettlement that followed, political refugees took their diverse traditions with them to Europe, Canada, and the United States.

Origin stories in Southeast Asia distinctly talk about a coming together of global cultures; inscriptions speak of a prince or a sage coming from India and marrying a local Naga princess. The term naga in Indian (Buddhist, Hindu, and Jain) narratives refers to a semidivine group of people associated with serpents. Variations of the story appear in inscriptions in the Mi Son temple complex in Vietnam as well as in Cambodia. Nagas are also prominent in Khmer architecture; they form long balustrades along temple walls, and mythical serpents that morph into human beings are found in popular visual and expressive arts and folklore.

Temple architecture and iconography tell us about the spread of Hindu culture in the Khmer empire, at least among elite circles, in the latter part of the first millennium. Temple plans and architectural styles also offer clues about areas in India with which the Cambodian population had contact; specifically, the eastern seaboard in India, including Kanchipuram and Kalinga, is likely to have been in conversation with the Angkor. Angkor Wat (built ca. 1135 by Suryavarman), a temple dedicated to Vishnu, was west facing, such as the many Vishnu temples in the Kanchipuram region and three storied, such as the Vaikuntha Perumal temple in that city. Although some scholars have called the process by which Hindu and Buddhist cultural influence was received in Cambodia as Indianization, this term is questioned, and if used, it is with abundant caution. Indian culture was not imposed from outside on a passive land; rather, local rulers in Southeast Asia probably invited Indian Brahmans to serve them and selected what they wanted of Indian culture. The idiom in the architecture here is distinctive to Southeast Asia, and the local kings seem to have had control over what elements of Indian culture they wanted to adopt, magnify, or discard. The most pervasive areas of influence seem to have been in the dissemination of epic narratives such as the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, architecture, performing arts, and rituals. Words of Sanskrit origin such as naga (“serpent”) and apsara (“celestial dancer”) are part of everyday life in Cambodia.

Although Mahayana Buddhism was strong in the first millennium CE, Cambodia has been a Theravada Buddhist nation since around the 15th century CE. Many young men even now spend several months as monks (this is not a lifetime commitment); monks, Buddhist temples, and Wats are ubiquitous. Many festivals celebrated in Cambodia have a global dimension and share a common religious or calendrical heritage with South and Southeast Asia. Dates for festivals of Indian origin are based on a lunar calendar that is adjusted periodically to the solar calendar—hence the shared dates. Examples of these are the Cambodian New Year, the birthday of the Buddha, and the festival of ancestors in the fall. The most important festival is the Cambodian New Year (Chaul Chnam Thmey), which is celebrated in April at the same time when many calendars in India begin the new year. Vesak or Visaka Bochea (Sanskrit vaisakha puja) is a Pan-Buddhist holy day that commemorates the birth, enlightenment, and death of the Buddha and is celebrated most often on a full moon day in May. In recent years, it has been marked with grand cultural festivals at the Bayon or other monuments and includes Buddhists from many countries. The Ancestor or Pchum Ben Day, on the new moon day in late September/early October coincides with the day that ends the “fortnight of ancestors” (pitṛ paksha or mahalya amavasya) in India, and as is common in ancestral rites in South Asia, the dead are offered balls of rice in Cambodia. Perhaps one of the most popular festivals is the Water Festival (Bon Om Thook), which marks the end of the monsoon season with elaborate boat racing.

Khmer populations in the diaspora have worked hard to preserve their culture while in the process of adapting to the local milieu. Language and dance classes, and transmission of local arts are all encouraged. Local communities are engaged in transmission of culture across generations and across nations; teachers are brought in from Cambodia, and Cambodian Americans visit the country of their ancestors for enrichment courses. Khmer arts festivals in many cities in the United States are becoming highly visible. Speaking of the many forums where Cambodian Americans reconnect with their culture, renowned Cambodian scholar Khatharya Um notes that Cambodian religious culture is as visible in Lowell, Massachusetts, or in the suburbs of Los Angeles and Washington, D.C., as it is in Siem Reap or Phnom Penh.

CAMEROON

Cameroon, a West African country colonized by Germany in the 1880s and ceded to France and Britain following World War I, became independent from France in 1960 and from Britain in 1961. It is the only West African country with two official languages: French and English. It is located in west-central Africa, along the Atlantic coast, bordering Nigeria on the east. The surface area is 475,440 square kilometers, and the total population is estimated at around 18 million inhabitants as of July 2007. The majority of its people are of Bantu and Sudanic origins. A culturally diverse nation, Cameroon is home to more than 200 ethnic groups.

Cameroon experienced two types of colonization: first, by the Muslim Fulani, who entered the territory from the western Lake Chad region as early as the 17th century, and, second, essentially by Christian Europeans, who came in from the Atlantic Ocean through the Gulf of Guinea during the 19th century. Both colonizations employed both violent and peaceful means to occupy positions of influence and structure and consolidate their presence. Islam benefited from the work of brotherhoods (Tijaniyya, Qadiriyya, and Mahdiyya) and the impact of trade to expand and create an African Islamic culture among the converts. The Muslim strategy consisted of occupying urban areas and converting acting rulers—sometimes through matrimonial transactions—before heading to rural areas and to the masses. The expansion of Christianity remained stronger along the coastal areas but retarded in the hinterlands due to rivalry between religious orders. To reinforce their respective congregations, Christian churches primarily targeted the rural populations surrounding urban areas with a well-elaborated, gradual three-point strategy focused on building health centers, schools, and churches before moving to towns and cities. By setting up a health center and a school in the locality of their choice, the Christian congregations engendered dependence from the host societies; this was instrumental in obtaining land for construction of their churches. The traditionalism that is indigenous to Cameroon is still active in rural areas even though it is threatened by the allure of Western culture and technology and the continued appeal of both Islam and Christianity.

Christians, who constitute about 45% of the population, are concentrated mainly in the southern regions, while Muslims (30%) are dominant in the north, and traditionalists, who constitute 25% of the population, are represented in all 10 administrative regions.

There is no established religion in Cameroon, but Catholic and Presbyterian forms of Christianity, along with Islam, compete to influence both private and public life.

The drive toward the construction of mosques, temples, and churches in urban areas as well as in rural regions is indicative of the appropriation strategy carried out by each religion to progressively privatize public space while erecting affiliated niches and branches. The same competition is recorded in the political and social sectors. Most of the public holidays are religious holidays. Cabinet members are appointed according to their religious background, so as to proportionally reflect religious representation. This social balance, framed along religious and geographical lines, has repercussions on lower administrative structures and is regarded as an important component for maintaining social peace in Cameroon.

The confessional private sector of education serves the majority of pupils. Over the last decade and in terms of quality education provided and admission rate into state universities, Christian private institutions have performed far better than Islamic schools, which have recurrently recorded poor performance owing to historical factors such as resistance to the colonial system of education. Both sectors of education receive consistent annual subventions from the state. The literacy rate is more than 70% nationwide.

CAMPBELL, JOSEPH (1904–1987)

Joseph Campbell was the most prominent North American mythologist of the 20th century. A prolific writer, editor, and speaker, Campbell was a pioneer in the emerging field of comparative mythology and introduced the study of mythology to much of the American public. As a professor of literature at Sarah Lawrence College for 38 years, Campbell authored some 12 books, including Myths to Live By (1972), The Mythic Image (1974), and the four-volume survey of world mythology, The Masks of God (1959–1968); among other volumes, he edited the posthumous papers of Indologist Heinrich Zimmer (beginning with Myths and Symbols in Indian Art and Civilization), The Portable Jung, and six volumes of Jung's Papers From the Eranos Yearbooks.

Campbell's international renown was established in 1949 with The Hero With a Thousand Faces, which won the National Institute of Arts and Letters Award for Contributions to Creative Literature in that same year. In The Hero, Campbell identifies a monomyth (a term he retrieves from James Joyce) or common plot to all hero myths and outlines the basic stages of the mythic cycle, from separation to initiation and return. Campbell suggests that the hero—an operative metaphor for the individual and culture—confers deep truths about self-discovery and transcendence. The Hero has been highly influential for creative artists internationally.

Campbell's influences were highly diverse—James Joyce, Thomas Mann, Sri Ramakrishna, and Arthur Schopenhauer—and his books cite and quote widely different texts, but the influence of Heinrich Zimmer and Carl Jung probably typify the two dominant themes of Campbell's work—a psychological or quasi-spiritual interpretation of mythology. From Jung's work, Campbell absorbed a theory of archetypes that allowed him to connect the patterns of world mythology to a universal structure of mind (it also allowed him to analyze dreams as effluxes of the same mythological organ); from Zimmer, he adopted a dynamic concept of myth that was not simply an explanation of a reality but rather a story about how the individual subject can have a different experience of the world. This synthesis created a highly elastic field for the study of comparative mythology.

Mythology for Campbell was an unquantifiable collection of stories that draw from the fund of archetypes to communicate something essential about the life experience. Myths were symbolic expressions (often originating in the collective unconscious) that act as guides toward spiritual transformation. Campbell held that all myths originate from the same basic psychic pattern and that they are all different masks for the same (fundamental, transcendent) Truth; and since the Truth, as Campbell understood it, exists beyond conceptual knowledge (beyond language), it is the work of mythology to evoke that which cannot be evoked, and it does this through metaphor. Myths are metaphors about the Truth. In the preface to The Hero, Campbell quotes the Rig Vedas: “Truth is one, the sages speak of it by many names.”

“I like to think that a good life is one hero journey after another,” Campbell explained once during a lecture; “over and over again, you are called to the realm of adventure, you are called to new horizons. Each time, there is the same problem: do I dare? And then if you do dare, the dangers are there; . . . there’s always the possibility of a fiasco. But there’s also the possibility of bliss” (Campbell, 2004, pp. 132–133).

An accomplished speaker, the many different recordings and lectures Campbell left show that he wanted, more than anything else, to make the mythological predicament viable again. He wanted the reader or audience to feel that unique and particular feeling—joy and insight—that comes when an old story is understood for the first time to have always been about you.

CANADA

Although the North American country of Canada can still today be considered as a predominantly Christian nation, it has become highly secularized and, since 1971, has chosen an official policy of multiculturalism that accentuates the value of religious toleration. However, the different Christian churches and sects have played a key role in the historical development of the nation, and the study of Canadian religious history helps understand many facets of its political culture, including the innovative multicultural model of integration, much vaunted for contributing to the successful integration of ethnic and religious minorities.

The 2001 census report by Statistics Canada revealed a predominantly Christian nation: 77% of the population defined themselves as adhering to some form of Christianity, this breaking down into 43% Catholic, 29% Protestant, and 5% for other Christian affiliations. The great majority of the self-proclaimed Protestants belong to a mainline church, which represents a major distinction with regard to the Congregationalist tradition found in the United States. Non-Christian religious affiliation in Canada represented in 2001 only 6% of the population, although the numbers are rising. This group included Muslims, accounting for 2% of the population; Jews, Hindus, Sikhs, and Buddhists, each group making up about 1% of the total population; all other religious affiliations together represented less than 0.5%. In fact, a much larger group (16% and rising) declared themselves to have “no religion,” and certainly the country’s high level of secularization is one of the key elements in the contemporary study of religion in Canada. The 2001 official Census Report published by Statistics Canada reported that only about one third of Canadians engage in regular religious activities, with “regular” being relatively loosely defined as attending services “once a month or more.” The General Social Survey conducted also by Statistics Canada in 2001 found that only 20% of the population 15 years old and above attended religious services on a weekly basis.

Historical Background

This has not always been the case. In fact, Canada’s history has been greatly influenced by the churches, which have been present since the very beginning of the colonial period. Notwithstanding a settlement established and later abandoned by the Vikings in Newfoundland in the 11th century, the English laid claim to the northern half of North America when John Cabot reached Newfoundland and then Cape Breton Island in 1497. However, in an atmosphere of European colonial competition, it was the French who first established permanent settlements with the founding of Quebec City in 1608 by Samuel Champlain. The Catholic Church played a prominent role in these early settlements. It was granted control of large tracts of lands for which it found settlers who farmed under the seigneurial system; it set up monasteries and actively supported missionary outposts for the conversion of indigenous peoples.

After the defeat of the French forces by the British in 1759 in Quebec and the signing of the Paris Treaty in 1763, which gave control of French colonies in Quebec to the British, the Catholic Church became the central instrument for maintaining the French presence in North America. During the colonial period, the Catholic clergy maintained a close relationship with the British colonial administration, and the latter made major concessions to the former to gain their loyalty, concessions that included notably the freedom to practice their religion and to administrate Catholic schools (Quebec Act, 1774). This conciliatory policy was undoubtedly related to demographic realities, with the French Catholic settlers outnumbering the English, and to the need to ensure the loyalty of the French-speaking Catholics toward Great Britain in the face of unrest in the American colonies to the south. The British would later develop an official policy advocating the assimilation of the French Catholics (Durham Report, 1839). However, the Quebec Act can be seen as the beginning of a tradition of religious toleration between Catholics and Protestants, and the efforts to find a modus operandi between the two groups led to the creation of the Dominion of Canada in 1867.

Religion in Present-Day Canada

Catholicism is still today the reported religion for the vast majority of the almost 7 million French-speaking Canadians. However, in contemporary Canada, there are just as many Catholics with a mother tongue other than French, and more than half the country's Catholics (54%) live outside the province of Quebec. (It should be noted that the classifications by province and by mother tongue are not synonymous. While the province of Quebec has a French-speaking majority [83%], it is also home to 1 million people having either English or another language as mother tongue; about 1 million people with French as mother tongue live outside Quebec.)

It should also be noted that recent demographic trends, due largely to changes in the ethnic origins of new immigrants, have increased the relative weight of the Catholic Church among Christians in Canada. New immigrants to Canada are less likely to be members of a Protestant church, but countries with a Catholic tradition continue to provide immigrants (eastern Europe, Latin America, and the Philippines). This has allowed the Catholic Church to more or less maintain its relative weight in terms of the total population and to increase its share of the Christian population. The second trend will likely continue: Members of a Protestant denomination tend to be older than their Catholic counterparts, and the traditionally predominant mainline Protestant churches have not been successful in renewing their ageing membership.

While it is clear that the mainline Protestant denominations are in decline due largely to secularization but also, as seen above, due to new trends in immigration and to a much lesser extent to the growth of independent Protestant churches, their historic importance should not be underestimated.

The two most important Protestant denominations in Canada are the Anglican Church and the United Church of Canada. The former is directly linked to English colonial history and was granted the status of official state church in the English-speaking colonies of Upper Canada (later to become the province of Ontario), Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island. This title gave the Anglican Church control over large tracts of land, and its members were found in positions of political authority. A powerful Anglican oligarchy, referred to as the Family Compact, controlled positions of political and economic importance in Canada in the 19th century. However, at the time of the Confederation in 1867, the Anglican Church had been disestablished in all the colonies, and it thus has never enjoyed the status of official state church in Canada. Anglicanism is the reported religion for 7% of the total population (23% of the Protestants), but these figures represent a 7% decline in its membership since 1991.

The United Church of Canada constitutes one of the particularities in Canadian religious history. Created in 1921 by the amalgamation of the Methodists, most of the Presbyterians, and a large number of the Congregationalist churches, it can best be described as an attempt to create a national church for Canada. Greatly influenced at the time of its founding by the social gospel, the church's doctrine continues today to insist on the collective nature of society and the social mission of the church, taking its distance from the more individualistic evangelical sects, which tend to concentrate on saving the soul of individual Christians. The United Church grew in size in the mid-20th century and became the largest Protestant denomination; it was the most influential Canadian church during the postwar period. Today, the United Church is in decline; its membership declined by 8% between 1991 and 2001. Like their Anglican counterparts, they suffer from the same trend of secularization, and their membership is aging. What is more, as a home-grown Canadian church, it has no hope of reinforcing its numbers with immigration. Today, the United Church is still the largest Protestant denomination in the country and represents almost 10% of the total population (33% of the Protestants).

As a corollary to the strength of mainline Protestant churches in Canada, there has traditionally been a relative weakness of independent Protestant churches. Some recent studies suggest that independent churches with an evangelical outlook are gaining influence in Canada. There is certainly anecdotal evidence of evangelical churches with high growth rates: The Evangelical Missionary Church, for example, a small church in relative terms with only 60,000 members, increased its membership by almost 50% in only 10 years. Some recent field research has also pointed to a rise in the number of practicing Christians espousing evangelical doctrinal positions. These early trends may well be a sign of future transformations of religion in Canada, but it is too early to affirm that a major change is taking place.

The strength of Catholicism, and of the mainline Protestant churches, which, as seen above, also make a claim to having a role to play in the management of temporal questions in collaboration with state authorities, is one of the key differences between Canada and its neighbor to the south. These churches have influenced political attitudes in Canada, and their presence helps explain differences in political culture between Americans and Canadians—Canadians being less individualistic and more inclined to show confidence in government to find collective solutions. Among these recent government-led initiatives can be found the official policy of multiculturalism, which accentuates the value of religious tolerance. This law can be seen as a natural development in a country whose history had required it to develop a tradition of religious toleration between Catholics and Protestants, which had become highly secularized, and which continued to pursue an active immigration policy at a time when candidates for immigration were to be found mainly in non-Christian countries.

CANDOMBLÉ

Candomblé is a Brazilian version of West African religions as they were remembered and reconstructed under the new conditions of a 19th-century Catholic slave colony. It is one of a family of religions now sometimes classified under a global rubric as “Religions of the African Diaspora,” alongside Cuban Santería, Haitian Vodou, and others. Originally a consequence of the transatlantic slave trade to Brazil, in recent years, it has expanded into Uruguay, Argentina, and the United States as well. Thus, it shows the trajectory of how an African indigenous religion became a global religion, from the early modern trauma of forced migration to, in the present day, voluntary affiliations and even web-based communities. Following a brief history, this entry introduces key concepts of the religion: axé, or the nature of power; orixá, or the nature of deities; and the “mother (or father)-of-saints” (iyalorixá) and the nature of religious authority.

History

African religious practices have existed in Brazil since the 16th century and historically were divided into “nations”—ethnic and religious affiliations in which Yoruba, Angolan, Dahomean, or other ethnic affiliations and languages predominated. Through practices that were severely repressed by Portuguese and then Brazilian authorities, enslaved Africans maintained collective memories and social structures against all odds. Such practices were unified as an independent “religion” known as Candomblé by the first decades of the 1800s. The religion took shape especially around the frame provided by Yoruba philosophy and ritual practice. The Yoruba of southwest Nigeria were the primary targets of the slave trade to Brazil from 1780 to 1850, and with their powerful concentration in cities such as Salvador da Bahia and their fresh memories of Africa, the Yoruba religious system became a watershed for Brazilian religious practice in general. Whereas Candomblé began as the reconstructed African religion of African Brazilians, it has during the last century become a national Brazilian religion with a strong foothold even among urban groups without African ancestry.

Axé: Transforming Power

Candomblé involves a relation of exchange with a group of superhuman entities called orixás, that mediate between Olorun (lit. “King of orun, the otherworld”), a distant high god, and human beings. In the religious world of Candomblé, everything and everyone “eats,” not only people but also musical instruments, such as drums; natural phenomena, such as rivers, trees, and stones; and significant places, such as terreiros or temples. The world must be fed to replenish the force of movement and transformation, called axé. This is especially true of the orixás, the divine but humanlike agents who mediate and redistribute the power (axé) that animates nature but that also helps human supplicants with everyday needs of health, prosperity, and fecundity. Candomblé involves an elaborate set of religious practices that work to preserve life with its abstract problems of meaning, but above all, in all its pragmatic needs, it works against the forces of anomie, death, and consumption. Initiates seek to expand their axé through the ritual work of maintaining proper reciprocal relations with the orixás, the personified forces of nature, culture, and history.

Axé refers not only to transforming power but also to ancestry or lineage. Axé is not only a transforming force that can change one's personal life, it is also a lineage one may enter and engage in. To undergo an initiation in a specific terreiro is to enter that house's axé, its "nation" and lineage. Terreiros usually possess axé that is descended from one of the original houses of Candomblé, in Bahia, founded in the 19th century, and often even from a specific African source.

Offering sacrifices to the orixás, and incorporating them in spirit possession, expresses the memory of Africa and its traditions. They are also the ritual modes through which axé—both as transforming power and as enduring memory and lineage—is made and maintained.

Orixás: Mediators Between Nature, God, and Man

Terreiros today remember, incorporate, and "feed" between 12 and 20 orixás during ritual events spread throughout the year, usually coinciding with the day devoted to the Catholic saint who served as the orixá's public face during slavery. One of the most important is Oxalá (or Obbatalá), the orixá of sky, creation, and purity. Oxalá is regarded as patient, just, aged, and venerable. Oxalá is said to walk slowly but always arrive at his destination, and in ritual, the drum rhythm that calls him is calm and dignified.

Another orixá, Oxum, is a female orixá of freshwaters. Known in Nigeria for the river that bears her name and for her powers of aiding pregnancy, in Brazil she has additionally acquired qualities of a coquette, revered for her beauty, vanity, and love of wealth and refinement. Drum rhythms are played to honor and call Oxum with the bare hands rather than with sticks and thus sound gentle and "cool," unlike, for example, the rhythms of her husband Xangô, which in their volume, speed, and texture are unmistakably "hot." Iansâ (or Oya), another wife of Xangô, dances with the force of a windy tempest, and those who claim her as the master of their head are considered to be energetic, charismatic, and immensely capable.

Oxôssi is the orixá of the hunt and the forest, a companion there to Ogum, lord of ironwork and the opening of paths. Oxôssi's symbols include a bow and arrow, and when he appears in the bodies of his human initiates, he is often draped in green and bears a quill in the band of his cap. Initiates to Oxôssi are blessed with agile feet, quick wits, and winsome personalities; especially when compared with Ogum, who, while courageous and strong, is heavy limbed and obstinate. Oxôssi is also remembered as the king of the Yoruba city-state of Ketu and therefore the founding orixá of the important Ketu "nation" of Candomblé in Brazil.

Nana Buruku is a female orixá associated with the primordial depths of the cool mud at the bottom of the sea and underground. She is among the very oldest, said to have been present during creation itself, in some myths, as a consort of Obbatalá. Because of her great age she is also linked with death and plays an important part in dispatching the dead to orun, the otherworld of the ancestors. In ritual performance, her appearance is rare and fortuitous, and the body of the "horse" bends over almost to the ground with the weight of her years. Nana originally appears in myths of the West African Fon, neighbor and rival to Yoruba city-states, where she was the mother of the sacred twins Mawu and Lissa, who appear in the pantheon of Haitian Vodou. Her appearance in the Brazilian Candomblé of the Ketu and Jeje "nations" carries a reminder of the historical exchanges between Yoruba and Fon city-states in West Africa. The orixá pantheon thus carries historical and geographic markers, and its ritual enactment is a form of embodied history making.

The orixás are more than just agents to be bargained with. They are also a grammar, a cognitive system, and a map of relations by which practitioners are located and embedded in the world. Everything can be schematized through the lens of the orixá complex, and thereby contemplated, understood, and "worked." New computer technologies fall within Ogum's domain, since he is the orixá of iron technological innovation. Struggles with infertility fall in the purview of Yemanjá, goddess of the sea and motherhood, and are viewed and ritually remedied through the prism of her stories, characteristics, and needs. Apartment-building security problems often fall to Exú, the orixá of doors, roads, and access. Ossaim, master herbalist, has the introspective qualities needed by a scholar or research scientist.

Yet since many orixás were forgotten or rendered insignificant through the forced migration to Brazil and the new life conditions enforced there, while others were assimilated into Candomblé's pantheon, what seems as important as the specific entities are the structuring principles of the pantheon. Some orixás govern “hot,” sudden, and dramatic forms of transforming power, while others are “cool.” There are orixás of air, earth, plants, and sea and of cultural change, political power, and history. The principle guiding Candomblé is the achievement and maintenance of balance between modes and kinds of power experienced in practical life, rather than a strictly defined notion of the good or pure that is anchored in canonical texts or centralized orthodoxy.

Religious Authority: The Mother (or Father) of Saints

Without such centralized measures of orthodoxy, every priestess (iyalorixá) is master over her own house and her initiated “children.” A priest’s or priestess’s work in Candomblé is to choreograph the production of axé and its transmission to those in her initiatory family. Production is the most fitting word: At an evening fiesta (a “party” in honor of an orixá), when the drums call the orixás to possess the dancing bodies of initiates consecrated to that task, this magnificent display can only arrive after days of ritual labor. Before the fiesta, the terreiro is a place of intensive manual work—grinding corn or beans, gathering leaves, fetching water, cutting and hanging decorations, and endless other tasks to transform the terreiro into a place conducive to the qualities and tastes of the god who is awaited.

A priest’s or priestess’s authority depends on his or her ability to render the deities and their axé manifest and accessible. She can fall from repute through disparaging gossip, a decline in charisma, lack of economic resources, or competition from rivals. If in its aesthetic materiality Candomblé is a religion of the hand, directly linked to the animals, costumery, and herbs that must be acquired to make the orixás manifest, it is also a religion of the marketplace, subject to competition from rival groups, like Pentecostal Christians or Kardecist Spiritists, who offer similar potential sources of pragmatic healing and economic well-being through the idiom of spirit possession.

Given this menu of religious options in Brazil, who comes to Candomblé? First, many initiates describe having been “ill” (passando mal) prior to initiation. This may often denote symptoms such as anxiety, agitation, or depression or simply a relentless sense of “bad luck” in the areas of love, work, or family life. These symptoms are interpreted as a summons obliging the person to become the orixá’s vehicle.

A second common paradigm is that of participants who hold Candomblé as their traditional or familial religion. Candomblé initiation especially appeals to those who strongly identify themselves with an African heritage. Thus, it remains very much an African Brazilian religion, both culturally and in its constituency, in spite of the large number of Candomblé initiates not of African biological descent.

A third but less important scenario of initiation is that those who ally themselves with a social avant-garde have sought out Candomblé as an alternative religious expression. Particularly in Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo, for example, the male gay community has over decades developed a strong association with Candomblé—long enough that it too has become nearly “traditional.”

CANTERBURY

Canterbury is a relatively small city (approximately 44,000 inhabitants) in the southeast of England. Canterbury Cathedral—officially the Cathedral and Metropolitan Church of Christ at Canterbury—is the cathedral of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who is leader of the Church of England and symbolic leader of the worldwide Anglican Communion. This entry addresses each of these topics in turn: the city, the cathedral, and the role of the archbishop.

The City

The geographic area of Canterbury has been inhabited since prehistoric times. In the first century CE, the Romans captured the existing settlement and named it Durovernum Cantiacorum; they rebuilt the city on Roman lines. The Romans left Britain in 410, after which the city languished for nearly two centuries. In 597 CE, however, Pope Gregory the Great sent Augustine—a Benedictine monk—to convert King Æthelberht of Kent to Christianity. This mission was successful, and Canterbury became the center for an episcopal see in Kent with Augustine as the first archbishop. The town flourished once again. In 673, the Synod of Hertford gave to the See of Canterbury authority over the entire English Church, at which point the city gained national as well as regional significance.

Events of huge significance have occurred in Canterbury, including in 1170 the murder in the cathedral of Archbishop Thomas à Becket by knights of King Henry II. It is clear that the king had had frequent conflicts with the strong-minded archbishop and is said to have exclaimed, “Who will rid me of this turbulent priest?” Four knights enacted this wish literally. Some 3 years later, Becket was canonized by Pope Alexander III. As a result, Canterbury became one of the most visited towns in Europe, as pilgrims from all parts of Christendom came to visit Becket’s shrine. The pilgrimage was immortalized in The Canterbury Tales—a 14th-century collection of stories written by Geoffrey Chaucer and a Middle English text of literary as well as historical significance. The shrine as such was demolished during the Dissolution of the Monasteries under Henry VIII (see below), bringing an end to the pilgrimage. In 1982, however, Pope John Paul II—the first pope to visit the United Kingdom—knelt alongside the then Archbishop of Canterbury at the site of the martyrdom of Thomas à Becket. This deeply symbolic gesture signified the growing friendship between the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches.

The Cathedral

Canterbury Cathedral is one of the oldest and most well-known Christian buildings in England and has been designated a world heritage site. A worshipping community has existed in this place since the time of Augustine. Traces of the original structure lie beneath the floor of the present nave. The building was extensively rebuilt and enlarged by the Saxons before being completely reconstructed by the Normans in 1070 following a fire. In 1077, the Norman church, the work of Archbishop Lanfranc, was described as “nearly perfect.” There have been many additions to the building over the past 900 years, but significant elements of the present structure and some of the windows (including the stained glass) date from the 12th century.

Until the 10th century, the cathedral community lived as the household of the archbishop. Thereafter, it became a community of Benedictine monks, which continued until the monastery was dissolved by Henry VIII in 1540. The dissolution or suppression of the monasteries denotes the administrative and legal processes between 1536 and 1541, by which time Henry VIII disbanded monasteries, nunneries, and friaries in England, Wales, and Ireland, appropriating their income and disposing of their assets. Once the monastery had been suppressed, responsibility for the services and upkeep was given to a group of clergy known as the Dean and Chapter. Today, the cathedral is still governed by the Dean and four canons, with the addition more recently of four lay people and the Archdeacon of Maidstone.

Significant damage was done to the cathedral by the Puritans during the English civil war of the 17th century, and extensive renovation took place in the 19th century. During World War II, the precincts of the cathedral were heavily bombed and the library destroyed, but the cathedral itself was not seriously damaged. Currently, almost 2,000 services are held in the building each year. Quite apart from its liturgical function, the cathedral is a major tourist attraction, receiving 1 million visitors per annum.

The Archbishop

The Archbishop of Canterbury has a variety of titles and four main roles:

1. He is the diocesan bishop of the Diocese of Canterbury, which was founded in 597, the oldest diocese in the English church. Given the archbishop's frequent absences, the diocese is effectively managed by the Bishop of Dover.

2. He is the metropolitan archbishop of the Province of Canterbury, which covers the southern two thirds of England. The remainder of the country constitutes the Province of York, under the authority of the Archbishop of York.

3. He is Primate of All England, meaning that he is the leader of the Church of England, bearing in mind that the British sovereign remains the Supreme Governor of the church. In this role, the Archbishop of Canterbury plays a central part in national life, officiating at ceremonies, including coronations.

4. As spiritual leader of the Anglican Communion, the archbishop is recognized by convention as primus inter pares among the Anglican primates worldwide. In his person, he acts as "an instrument of communion." Since 1867, the archbishop has convened the more or less decennial meetings of worldwide Anglican bishops, which are known as the Lambeth Conferences. The name comes from the archbishop's principal residence, which is not in Canterbury but at Lambeth Palace, in the London Borough of Lambeth. In addition, as holder of one of the "five great sees" of England, the Archbishop of Canterbury is ex officio one of the Lords Spiritual of the House of Lords as this is currently (2009) constituted. In terms of official precedence, he is one of the highest ranking persons in England.

Since the time of Henry VIII (i.e., since the Church of England established its independence from Rome), the Archbishop of Canterbury has been selected by the monarch. Nowadays, the choice is effectively made in the name of the king or queen by the prime minister, who chooses from a short list of two established by the Crown Nominations Commission (until 2003, the Crown Appointments Commission). The current holder of the office is the Most Reverend and Right Honorable Rowan Williams, who was enthroned in 2003 as the 104th Archbishop of Canterbury.

Among his predecessors, two outstanding archbishops are worth noting. The first, Archbishop Thomas Cranmer, held office during the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI—a pivotal moment in the history of England. Under Henry, Cranmer supported the king in his struggles with the pope, endorsing the principle of Royal Supremacy (in which the king was considered sovereign over the Church within his realm). The doctrinal and liturgical structures of the nascent Church of England began to emerge. Under Edward, Cranmer was able to promote more radical reforms. Specifically, he authored two definitive Anglican documents: the Book of Common Prayer, a complete liturgy for the English Church (a book admired as much for the cadence of its language as for its statements of doctrine), and the Thirty-Nine Articles, an Anglican declaration of faith. Cranmer was tried for treason and heresy when Mary I (a Catholic) came to the throne. He was imprisoned for 2 years and at times vacillated in his faith. He died, however, as a Protestant martyr.

William Temple was Archbishop of Canterbury for a short but once again very critical time in the nation's history (1942–1944). In the year when he became archbishop, he published Christianity and Social Order, which set out not only an Anglican social theology but a vision for a just postwar society. At the height of the war, he was also instrumental (together with the then Chief Rabbi) in establishing the Council of Christians and Jews—a voluntary organization in which members of both faiths came together to combat anti-Semitism. Prior to becoming archbishop, Temple was known primarily for his support for the working-class movement and his advocacy of economic and social reforms. He was the first president of the Workers' Educational Association and a member of the Labour Party. He was also a supporter of the ecumenical movement, involved in both the Lausanne Conference (1927) and the World Conference of Churches in Edinburgh (1937). His death in 1944, after only 3 years in office, was greatly mourned.

CAO DAI

Caodaism, or the “third great way of salvation,” is an indigenous religion of Vietnam that reflects a singular sociocultural and historical environment—Cochin China of the 1920s and the French colonial presence. Inspired by Chinese spirit mediumship and divination and also by Western spiritualism and Theosophy, a group of Vietnamese civil servants entered into communication with local, Chinese, and European spirits. The first oracles quickly constituted a canon, rituals, and a strong hierarchy inspired by Catholicism, from which Caodaism intended to differentiate itself, becoming its main competitor on Vietnamese soil.

Theologically, the “Master [residing in] the high tower” (thay Cao Dai)—an avatar of the Chinese Jade Emperor—augured a renovation of Buddhism and, more broadly, a codified unification of the Sino-Vietnamese Three Teachings (Buddhism, Confucianism, and Daoism). Moreover, this global pantheon incorporates Jesus and spiritualist figures (e.g., Victor Hugo and Joan of Arc), who are absorbed into the Sino-Vietnamese syncretistic system.

The oracles, greatly imbued with Vietnamese patriotism and seeking the independence of this religion, which claims to be “national,” were soon cutting a wide swath through the peasant population and the networks of business people and landowners. The number of followers exceeded 500,000 beginning in the 1930s and has continued to grow despite the heavy crackdown on Caodaists during the Catholic regime of Ngo Dinh Diem.

Engaged in the country’s decolonization, the Cao Dai and communist movements enjoyed a competitive relationship from the 1930s onward. After 1975 and the country’s independence, the Socialist Republic of Vietnam sought to reconcile its ideology with a more market-based economy and a certain social and religious peace. There was a gradual shift from the initial violent totalitarian repression toward a consensual management of its relations with the Caodaists, transforming the “Holy See” of Tay Ninh into a tourist site and, for example, granting Caodaism “religion” status in 1995 in exchange for transparency in all its religious propaganda activities.

The community today (between 1 and 4 million followers) is constituted of a network of holy sees, propaganda publications, and meditation centers formed during the 20th century in accordance with the political or theological rivalries, which play different roles at the regional, national, and transnational levels (the politically engaged international branch of Tay Ninh; the local, meditative branch of Chieu Minh, etc.).

Finally, 15,000–30,000 Caodaists live outside Vietnam, mainly in the United States and Australia, as a result of the dramatic exodus of the boat people. They perform a revitalizing role in Caodaism by dynamizing Caodaist relationships around the world, as can be seen, for example, from the multifarious international networking activities of the Cao Dai Overseas Missionary (scouting, editing, websites, sponsoring of pilgrimages).

CAPE VERDE

Named for the Cap Vert peninsula in West Africa, adjacent to the nation of Guinea-Bissau, the archipelago that makes up the nation of Cape Verde houses a majority Roman Catholic populace. Nine of the 10 islands under the nation's banner are inhabited, mostly by a mixed creole population, and the Portuguese legacy of the first inhabitants of the islands remains in the official language of the country. Between 85% and 95% of the population is at least nominally Catholic, although many are nonpracticing and many others engage in syncretic practices within the church. The largest Protestant Christian denomination is the Church of the Nazarene, and other groups active in Cape Verde include the Seventh-Day Adventists, the Church of Latter-Day Saints, the Assemblies of God, and smaller evangelical churches. There are also a small Baha'i community and a small but growing Muslim community, but no reliable statistics on membership existed at the time of this entry. There are also some who practice traditional African religions exclusively, especially on the island of São Tiago.

The islands of the country were uninhabited when the Portuguese landed in 1460, and the region soon became important as a slave trade post between the African continent and the New World. Some of the slaves were kept on the island plantations (known as latifundas), but nearly the entire area was deserted after the French assaulted the islands in 1712. Settlers would reinhabit the archipelago soon after, but the land lost much of its economic value with the decline of the slave trade only to regain some wealth in the 19th century as a stop on the global trade routes. Cape Verde became an overseas territory of Portugal in 1961 and became fully independent after Guinea-Bissau's war for freedom in 1975. Some pushed for incorporation with Guinea-Bissau following independence, and the Catholic Church originally stood in opposition to the ruling Party for the Independence of Cape Verde (PAICV). Due in part to conflict within the Movement for Democracy Party, which originally enjoyed the support of the Church, many Catholics have now begun to back the PAICV.

Identity in Cape Verde is determined largely by geographic location. An individual's identity is linked to his or her island of origin, and speaking generally, the northern islands (barlavento) are influenced more by their Portuguese heritage while the southern islands (sotavento) identify with Africa. There is also a large diasporic population, and it is estimated that the population of Cape Verdeans in the United States rivals the total number of people in the islands themselves. The number of people claiming adherence to Catholicism notwithstanding, church weddings are rare in Cape Verde, and traditional systems of life still dominate. There is a de jure separation between church and state, but the Catholic Church enjoys a preferential standing with the government that stops short of claiming it as a state church. Religious organizations must register with the country's Ministry of Justice before engaging in any activities, and legal penalties exist for any violations of a Cape Verdean's free exercise of religion. Admitted to the United Nations the year of its independence, the small nation now has membership in the G-77 and the World Trade Organization.

CARGO CULTS

Cargo cults are millenarian and messianic movements that have emerged in the island nations of Melanesia, though with local variations, as a result of cultural contact. They sprang from the 19th-century arrival of Westerners with their ships loaded with what must have appeared as mind-boggling, out-of-this-world cargos on islands whose inhabitants had hitherto lived in cultural isolation. The doctrines and rituals of the cults derive from traditional beliefs and rituals blended with the moral and apocalyptic teachings of Christian missionaries. They led to nationalistic rebellions, fueled by konors or prophets, against the colonization imposed by Europeans and Australians.

In 1857, the Mansren movement prophesized the coming of a saving god. In 1871, the catalyst around whom the cargo cults would develop, Nikolai Miklouho-Maclay, a Russian scientist, landed on the northeastern coast of New Guinea. He began to be viewed as an avatar of deities—as Moon-Man, a messiah. The Papuans fell under the spell of his lack of fear and the sign of his supernatural power that produced superior objects—the cargos.

The cargo cults can only be understood within the social organization of the islands, the koula; material goods are handed out by deities and must be permanently exchanged according to specific codes. Since he knew how to give, Miklouho-Maclay attained the status of a god. Bound to their ancestors in a life-death continuum, the Melanesians imagined cargos had been fabricated by the departed to help their descendents but had been diverted by the Whites.

In 1883, a konor predicted that a steamer would unload cargo to restore the koula and the golden age. The Papuans killed a captain and attacked Dutch settlements. In Fiji, the Touka cult, under Ndougoumoï, evolved to fit the new conditions. Their god twins Kilibob and Manoup became known as Jehovah and Jesus. Their return would restore koula; the shops would be full of new cargos—fabrics and canned salmon.

The cults continued well into the 20th century. In the 1920s, the Vailala Madness spread over New Guinea. Through the symbolic appropriation of their power, they aimed at forcing the Whites to disappear and give back their cargo. In 1932, the Solomon Islands plunged into the Bouka revival under Pako, a leader who announced the arrival of food, tobacco, automobiles, and firearms. The departed souls would arrive on steamers. Churches had to be attended to benefit from the power of the Whites' gods. Pako became identified with Jesus. In the 1940s, the Mekeo Madness sought to address the fear of famine. The souls of the dead would return by plane to drop food and weapons to expel the Whites.

John Frum, the most famous cargo figure, is said to have appeared in the 1940s on Tanna Island (south of the New Hebrides). He was seen as a White God, one of those Americans who were viewed positively as they had not partaken in colonization. It was believed that in typical apocalyptic style, he would distribute money, order the mountains to collapse and the valleys to be fruitful, and create a bridge that would link the island to its neighbors. His soldiers would throw the invaders into the sea. More John Frum-like figures appeared. One, Neloig, called himself King of America and of Tanna. He recruited an army and labor to build an airfield to allow for the landing of the American Liberator planes that would bring the awaited cargo sent by John Frum's father. When the planes failed to appear, the adepts placed a model plane on the tracks as decoy. In the 1990s, his cult was still being celebrated.

CARIBBEAN

Because of strong European colonial and missionary influence, the predominant form of religion in the islands of the Caribbean Ocean is Christianity. During the period of slavery, the British imparted their Protestant culture and the French and Spanish, their Catholic forms of worship to the enslaved Africans who had been brought to the islands. Over time, Christianity was combined with the Amerindian and African elements through a process known as syncretism. Although there is debate about whether such syncretism produced new forms of religious creations or simply a grafting of European elements onto African practices, it is evident that all three world cultural complexes are present: Amerindian, African, and European. Both views have merit; historically, religion played a revolutionary role in combating slavery and helping the former colonies resist the cultural dominance of Europe. And yet, since each nation was essentially cut off from Africa, over time, people formed uniquely indigenous forms of spirituality that incorporate European ideas.

The best known of these Caribbean syncretist movements are Rastafarianism (Jamaica), Santería (Cuba and Dominican Republic), and Vodou (Haiti and Dominican Republic). Each of these has a history of tenuous relationship with the state and native elites. Each is frequently misunderstood by outsiders but increasingly appealing to a multicultural world, and each borrows heavily from Christianity.

In the Rastafarian religion, Christianity is reinterpreted to support a pro-Black ideology. During the mid-18th century, Baptist and Methodist missionaries brought Christian messianic beliefs to Jamaica, and later, Marcus Garvey brought his Pan-Africanist philosophy to the island. These worldviews melded to form a common identity of Blackness and resistance among an oppressed people. Thus, the ferment was laid for the Rastafarian movement among Black workers in the 1930s. Its goal of the liberation of the oppressed meant cultural opposition to those European beliefs, shared by Whites and middle-class Jamaicans, that vilified Blackness. Hence, the adoption of dreadlocks and beards, the smoking of marijuana during ritual circle celebrations known as “reasonings” or binghi, the distinctive style of Rasta drumming, and the symbolic red, green, and gold colors of the Rastafarian flag—all done out of an aesthetic defiance and with a prophetic sense of destiny. Today, the influence of Rastafarianism has declined sharply as its symbols and rituals have become trendy and adopted by the multiculturally minded all over the world. Still, the faith enjoys significant influence at home and has the distinction of having helped elite Jamaicans rediscover their African heritage.

Beginning in Cuba in the late 16th century, Santería was started by slaves to disguise their forbidden worship of African gods. Slaves baptized by Spanish imperialists were disallowed the practice of the ancestral religion; in response, slaves appropriated the names of Catholic saints for each of their African gods. This subterfuge allowed them to safely worship by speaking in the “code” of Santería or “the way of the saints.”

Santería has been influenced mostly by slaves from the Yoruba region of Nigeria, who worship up to 500 different intercessory spirits called orishas. In Cuba, however, only 16 such orishas are recognized, together known as the Lucumí. The religion holds that every person is born under a different orisha's protection and guidance, and in return, the orisha must be worshipped throughout one's life. To communicate with an orisha requires the practice of divination, in which priests or priestesses tell the inquirer who their orisha is and what it demands. Ceremonies (bembes) are often held to invoke the orishas who then possess their host and participate in the celebration, leaving the host with no memory of the possession.

Because of recent migration to the United States, primarily to southern Florida and New York, Santería is increasingly practiced outside Cuba. There is an interesting dark side to Santería in the United States, though; some immigrants have begun to use its divination to promote criminal activities. Such activities are far from the norm within the U.S. Cuban community, however, and are apparently symptomatic of the struggle of a small minority to reconcile old beliefs with the material demands of their new world.

Vodou is an indigenous religion founded in the Haitian melting pot of slavery. Since slaves from many different regions of Africa were deliberately commingled to prevent any unified resistance, Vodou arose as an amalgam of various African deities and practices and with a longing for a mythical ancestral past in the land of Nan Guinee, or Africa. Usually practiced in secret, it was a Vodou ceremony in 1791 that began the world's second successful colonial rebellion—the Haitian Revolution.

As in Santería, Vodouists primarily worship intercessory spirits, called lwa, or loa, and clergy consist of priests (houngans, male, and mambos, female) and apprentices (hounsi). Each houngan and mambo oversees his or her particular houngfor or “house.” Since there is no doctrinal central authority, there is variety regionally and among houses.

Contrary to sensationalized, inaccurate Western notions, Vodou plays an indisputably positive, socially binding role in Haitian life, and its followers share the same values as those of other faiths—namely, peace, love, charity, and moral virtue.

Beyond these three, and apart from adherence to mainline Protestantism (about 25%) and Roman Catholicism (60%), many other faiths have smaller, but stable and/or growing, groups of adherents. In Trinidad and Tobago, about one quarter of the population practices Hinduism, which claims about 2% adherents regionally. Judaism and Islam (each with less than 1%) is now practiced throughout the Caribbean, in nearly every country, and Buddhism is now growing, along with Chinese folk religion. Notably, each faith has edifices in the major cities.

Not to be discounted, several smaller Christian denominations have taken root since the missionary efforts of the early 20th century. Assemblies of God, Seventh-Day Adventists, Church of God, Jehovah’s Witnesses, and Church of Latter-Day Saints are all clearly present throughout the Caribbean, though each likely has no more than 5% of any given population as members. Most interesting is the rise, in terms of numbers and influence, of Pentecostalism/evangelicalism. Tapping into their exasperation with the status quo, Pentecostal churches give the poor charity and hope for a better life through moral discipline, prayer, confession, and tithing (donation). This provides adherents with an almost countercultural sense of identity. These churches tend to position themselves as alternatives to both the secular state and the dominant forms of Christianity, generating imitations of its charismatic worship style in other churches’ services.

CATHOLIC CHARISMATIC RENEWAL

Catholic Charismatic Renewal has been characterized not so much as a movement but rather as a stream of spirituality running through the believers’ universe. It has found expression in spiritual growth groups who are given to prayer and meditation about the Scriptures. They invoke the Holy Spirit to experience its power and its “gifts of growth and hope.” In this aim, Charismatic Renewal intends to recover the primordial apostolic community’s spirituality, according to which the descent of the Holy Spirit was a source of knowledge and spiritual renewal. Just as it used to happen within primordial communities, renewal moments of prayer are characterized by events such as “speaking in tongues,” prophecies, and healings.

Catholic Charismatic Renewal represents a Catholic version of the wider religious awakening that developed within Protestantism in the context of traditional Pentecostalism and neo-Pentecostalism. Traditional Pentecostalism originated within the North American Methodist Church in the early 20th century and then began to influence other Christian denominations during the first half of the century. Since the 1950s, the primordial Pentecostalism spirit has been reflected in different Protestant churches; its main characteristic is the award of the “gift of the Holy Spirit,” which is meant as a second and definitive conversion after the first (baptism).

Born inside American universities at the time of Vatican Council II, Charismatic Catholic Renewal develops the idea of a religious life based on a strong restoration of the spiritual dimension that is built around communitarian prayer, a direct confrontation with the Bible, and the constant invocation of the Holy Spirit. From this perspective, it manifests an implicit critique of the superficiality of the behaviors of Catholics and the formalism of the Catholic institutions.

Charismatic Catholic Renewal, also defined as “Groups of the Renewal,” is characterized by the strong autonomy of each renewal community, but at the same time, it develops many ways of organization and communication among communities. The “Renewal in the Holy Spirit” is an example of this tentative organization recognized as a private association of believers; it embraces most “Groups of the Renewal.”

In 1975, on the occasion of the Third International Council, leaders of the Charismatic Catholic Renewal were given an audience with Pope Paul VI, which was interpreted by the movement’s followers as showing its allegiance to the Holy See and its loyalty to the ecclesiastic hierarchy, from which it has sought guidance and advice. Therefore, Charismatic Catholic Renewal takes on the shape of an interior revitalization inside Catholic churches. Through the “Baptism in the Spirit,” it can realize the objective of a renewed religious enthusiasm, in contrast to secularized society. In this way, it becomes functional to the process of pastoral reform and spiritual rebirth that was begun in the Catholic world by Vatican Council II.

CATHOLIC CHARITIES

A century-old faith-based organization founded in the United States of America, Catholic Charities provides social services to vulnerable and marginalized people.

Until the 20th century, Catholic charitable efforts had been undertaken exclusively at the local level through parish-based, person-to-person initiatives performed by volunteers. With the advent of nationalization and professionalization of social services in the United States, many Catholics feared that Catholic charitable work would be stripped of its spiritual significance, no longer undertaken out of love of neighbor, as commanded by Jesus. Critics feared that a National Conference of Catholic Charities (NCCC) would lead people to view charity as a remunerated task undertaken only by professionals, thus relieving the nonprofessional of the obligation to help those in need.

This more traditional view of charity did not hold. Catholics followed the trend of other Americans at the dawn of the 20th century who were concentrating their efforts on the scientific study of society and the professional treatment of social problems. Pioneers in the Catholic Church, such as the priest-scholar William J. Kerby (1870–1936), the first American Catholic sociologist, advocated a nationally centralized charitable organization that would make it possible to coordinate the disparate and at times redundant local services. In 1910, Bishop Thomas J. Shahan (1857–1932), then rector of The Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., and Kerby hosted an organizational meeting at which the NCCC came into existence. In addition to the clergy, a large contingent of lay people was present at the founding of the NCCC, most notably the Society of St. Vincent de Paul represented by their leader Thomas M. Mulry (1855–1916). Coordination of and cooperation between local charitable efforts among Catholics was under way.

In 1986, the NCCC became Catholic Charities USA. The organization continues to provide leadership for a national network of local Catholic Charities initiatives. In addition to assisting local initiatives to respond to immediate human needs, Catholic Charities USA has become increasingly involved in advocacy at the national level, seeking to create structural change in society. At times, this pursuit of the common good has required the organization to downplay, albeit controversially, its Catholic identity in order to promote a more just society for all.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

The Central African Republic (CAR) is a landlocked country in the heart of Africa bordered by Cameroon, Chad, Sudan, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and the Republic of the Congo. It is one of the poorest countries in Africa and in the world, and also has one of the lowest population densities in the world. There are more than 80 different ethnic groups represented, with no overwhelming majority. As elsewhere in Africa, religious elements are of central importance in social life, and nearly everyone practices and adheres to a religion. Roughly half of the inhabitants are Christian, evenly split between Catholics and Protestants; 15% are Muslim, and 35% follow African traditional religion primarily. Jehovah's Witnesses, Baha'is, Mormons, and Seventh-Day Adventists have a small presence as well.

There is archaeological evidence of settlements in the central region of Africa as early as the seventh century BCE. The area was beyond the reach of the initial spread of Islam in North Africa, and its inhabitants were highly isolated from surrounding civilizations until the arrival of Muslim-Arab traders in the mid-1800s and the arrival of the French in the 1880s. Between 1860 and 1910, much of the population of eastern CAR was exported by slave traders from West Africa. By 1910, the French established the colony of Oubangui-Chari in the region. Since achieving independence in 1960, the country's history has been marked by economic instability and a series of dictatorships, although in the early 1990s, some steps were taken toward multiparty democracy.

French Catholic and Swedish Baptist missionaries arrived in the region by the end of the 19th century. Converts were won slowly, mostly through the missionaries' offerings of education, literacy, and medical care. In the 20th century, two locally initiated prophetic movements, the Mission to Africa (MTA) and the church of Simon Kimbangu, attracted huge numbers to their distinctly Africanized form of Christianity and greatly contributed to the spread of that religion across central and western Africa. Both of these groups claim many adherents in the CAR today and are characterized by faith healing, prophecy, divinely inspired prayer, and long, ecstatic worship services.

Traditional religious beliefs and practices are still strong among the various ethnic groups of the CAR. Although there is no uniform traditional religion in the region, some commonalities across groups can be found in their belief in a supreme god, veneration for ancestors and for the elderly, emphasis on divination and prophecy, and belief in witchcraft. Although only 35% of the population practices traditional religion exclusively, Christians and Muslim groups are also heavily influenced by the traditional worldview. Interactions between religious groups are generally peaceful, and there is a high level of tolerance from the government and religious freedom.

CHAD

The Republic of Chad is located in the north-central region of Africa, sharing borders with Sudan, the Central African Republic, Libya, Cameroon, Nigeria, and Niger. Most of its population is rural and concentrated in the southern region, and urban life is restricted to the capital, N'Djamena. It is one of the poorest countries in the world, and its principal source of income is its natural oil reserves. In all, 54% of the population are Muslim, while the rest are Catholic (20%), Protestant (14%), followers of traditional African religion (10%), and adherents to various other religious sects (3%).

Due to its position on the Sahelian strip, a belt of semiarid tropical savanna just south of the Saharan desert, the area that is now Chad has a long history of human settlement and cultivation. From the seventh century BCE, a series of states arose to control trade routes along this strip, leaving behind some of Africa's most well-preserved archaeological sites. The more recent of these kingdoms were Islamic and contributed to the establishment of Islam as the common religion among the region's inhabitants. The area was fully colonized by the French by 1920, though they made little effort to unify or develop the territory. The nation achieved independence in 1960, and since then, it has gone through two major civil wars and a series of military dictatorships.

Islam arrived early in the region, spreading gradually and becoming widespread by the 14th century. Christianity arrived much later, beginning with French Catholics at the turn of the century. Protestant missionaries from America arrived in the 1920s, often coming from the region just south of Chad, which is now the Central African Republic. As in other parts of the region, Christian missions have attracted converts through their investment in educational and medical centers, though they have seen less success in Chad than in surrounding areas to the south and west due to the early spread of Islam. In the northern desert region, the Sahelian strip, and the capital, Muslims are the strong majority, while those who practice Christianity and traditional religion are concentrated in the south among the Sara people.

Among both Christians and Muslims in Chad, there is a strong tendency to maintain elements of indigenous religion and the traditional worldview.

The belief in the influence of ancestral spirits on the lives of human beings is particularly strong, as is the belief in witchcraft and the practice of coming-of-age rites. Ritual specialists and herbalists, as they are often called, continue to play an important role in Chadian communities for determining the sources of disorder in the community. Despite ongoing civil conflict, religious groups enjoy a high degree of freedom from the government and generally coexist peacefully.

CHARISMA

Charisma is a trait found among individuals who possess a seemingly natural talent to lead or inspire a large following. The word is derived from the Greek word for "gift" or "divine favor," which emphasizes its popular view of being a god-given quality or ability. It is a popularly debated subject in psychology and has important implications in politics and religion. Indeed, most religious leaders throughout history are thought to have had a great deal of charisma, which many feel explains their success in attracting followers.

A person who has charisma is thought of as a natural-born leader. Researchers find it challenging to give charisma an exact definition; rather, most people find it easier to identify a person who has it. He or she may possess some or all of the following traits: confidence, charm, persuasiveness, attractiveness, eloquence, assertiveness, enthusiasm, and expressiveness. It is characterized by a certain magnetic appeal that a person has that attracts others to his or her cause. Having the ability to speak to large crowds effectively is also a skill associated with charisma. Although it is thought by most to be an inborn trait, some researchers believe that charisma can be taught or imitated. Other than in politicians and religious figures, a high degree of charisma can be found among actors, musicians, and chief executives of corporations.

Not surprisingly, charisma is a trait often associated with religious figures throughout history. In the religious context, charisma may be taken a step further than being defined as simply a character trait; it is important to note that it is thought of as a “divine favor.” A leader may claim to have been “touched by God” and thus have exclusive knowledge or special powers that were bestowed on him or her by a supernatural being (i.e., God). As a result of this charismatic authority and its supposedly divine nature, such leaders command a degree of obedience that would not normally be established and are thus seen as possessing higher authority than anyone else in their followers’ eyes. Of course, to gain this type of power, these leaders must not only claim to have divine contact, but they must also be able to convince their followers that they have indeed had contact with God. It is not beyond anyone to claim that God has spoken to him or her, but it is much harder to convince people of it.

The relationship between charismatic religious leaders and their followers is highly emotional in nature. Since there are no existing human standards by which to measure the validity of the leader’s claim of divine contact and no legal basis that justifies the leader’s authority, followers must rely heavily on the person’s words and actions. In a typical scenario, a traditional set of laws and norms is already in place when religious leaders start to take control, but since their authority is derived from a “higher power,” their leadership commands a higher degree of obedience than that granted to a “normal” person—for example, an elected official. If the emotional bond between the leader and his or her followers should break, their obedience will quickly fade. This subjective leadership based on charisma is thus typically unstable and sometimes volatile.

The most important figure in the study of charisma and charismatic authority was the German sociologist and political economist Max Weber (1864–1920), who defined charisma as a certain quality of an individual personality by virtue of which she or he is set apart from ordinary people and treated as endowed with supernatural, superhuman, or at least specifically exceptional powers or qualities. In his book, The Three Types of Legitimate Rule, Weber introduced a tripartite system of domination based on three different types of authority: charismatic, traditional, and legal. Traditional authority, as defined by him, is authority granted to an individual by way of convention or custom, such as the rule of a king, while legal authority arises out of rational or legitimate means, as in the case of an elected president. According to Weber, authority based on charisma rests on devotion to the exceptional sanctity, heroism, or exemplary character of an individual and of the “normative patterns or order” revealed or ordained by him.

To Weber, charismatic authority is a sort of hero worship that goes beyond normal standards of submission to a leader. The charismatic leader is set apart from his or her followers in every sense, and to maintain influence over his or her people, he or she must constantly prove that he or she does indeed possess some type of supernatural ability. Proving this may require him or her to perform miracles, win battles, or bring some type of benefit to his or her followers in general. Again, more important than actually passing these tests of charisma is convincing the population of successful completion of these tests. Jesus, Muhammad, and Moses are three religious leaders who succeeded greatly in achieving and maintaining a high level of charismatic authority over their followers. They are just three examples of the many prophets, oracles, heroic warriors, visionaries, cult leaders, evangelists, and gurus that fit Weber’s criteria of charismatic leaders. A more contemporary list would include Joseph Smith (1805–1844), founder of the Church of Latter-Day Saints; the founder of Scientology, L. Ron Hubbard (1911–1986); the Hare Krishna founder, A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada (1896–1977); and the evangelist Billy Graham, born in 1918. It is not necessary to have only one figure at the head of the movement. Other coleaders are frequently chosen by the leader based on their charisma as well. The power to choose these “assistants” is one granted to the charismatic leader as part of his or her divinely given gift, and the chosen ones accept it as a call from a higher power. Jesus had Peter, Joseph Smith had Brigham Young, and in the political sphere, V. I. Lenin had Joseph Stalin.

An important aspect of charisma in religion that was also introduced by Weber is the idea of the institutionalization, or routinization, of charismatic authority. At first, the charismatic leadership is anything but routine as it has broken away from the normal standards of governing; in fact, it is revolutionary. Indeed, a charismatic leader introduces new and sometimes radical systems of obedience while he or she is alive. While the leader is still living and as he or she continues to gain more followers, these methods of worship become habitual. Eventually, however, the leader must die, and these observances become custom, tradition, and ultimately, religion. Christianity is a perfect example of this phenomenon. While still alive, Jesus attracted a following of disciples who adhered to his teachings and worshipped him. After his death, following Jesus had become so routine that it became the new standard of worship. Eventually, the routine would grow to become the religion that it is today. This explains, according to Weber, how many of the world's religions came into existence, with Islam and Buddhism following similar paths.

Leadership based on charisma is not always positive, with examples throughout history in both politics and religion. In the political realm, the authoritarian regimes of Adolf Hitler, Joseph Stalin, and Saddam Hussein all arose out of the high levels of charisma the leaders displayed. For the most part, they built a strong relationship with their followers, which allowed them to gain unprecedented power in their respective governments. Their authority had negative consequences, however, as all three eventually caused harm and destruction to their followers. On the religious front, the negative side of charisma can be found in religious cults, particularly ones that have ended in the death of its followers. People's Temple, led by the charismatic James Warren "Jim" Jones (1931–1978), is an example of the instability of charismatic leadership in religion. Jones encountered a number of challenges to his leadership over the People's Temple in the 1970s. On moving his sect to a settlement that he named Jonestown, in Guyana, he led more than 900 of his followers to commit mass suicide after convincing them that it was the right thing to do according to him. Jones, through his charisma, had built up such a strong following among his congregants that they had faith in him even as he led them to suicide, which was actually the culmination of a number of defensive responses he went through as a result of threats to his leadership. Similar circumstances led to the mass suicides of members of the Order of the Solar Temple in 1994, led by Joseph Di Mambro and Luc Jouret, and to the death of a majority of the Branch Davidians, led by David Koresh, in 1993.

CHECHNYA

The Chechen Republic is part of the Russian Federation, located in the northern Caucasus Mountains. Islam is the dominant religion of Chechnya, claiming more than 94% of the 1.2 million population. Chechens are Sunnī Muslims following the traditions of the Khanaphi and Shaphii Mazkhab schools of thought. At the same time, Chechen religious practices are also influenced by Sufism, the mystical branch of Islam. The Sufi Tarikats ("orders") of Kadiria and Nakshbandia have the most influence in the country. These Tarikats are further divided into some 30 religious groups or Virds (brotherhoods, communities). Besides Muslims, there are some small groups of Christians in Chechnya affiliated with the Russian Orthodox Church and evangelical Protestant Baptists.

Before the arrival of Islam, Chechens observed paganism. The early spread of Islam in the area was linked to the Arab seizure of the northern Caucasus in the 8th to 10th centuries. Arab missionaries propagated Islam among domestic ethnic groups.

In the 9th to 10th centuries, Christianity arrived in Chechnya, coming from Georgia and other areas of the northern Caucasus. The process of Christianization of Chechens and other Caucasus peoples, however, was terminated by the war of Mongols with Georgia in the 13th century.

The most important period for Islam in Chechnya was in the 13th and 14th centuries, when Chechen elites accepted Islam under the influence of Zolotaya Orda (“the Golden Horde”). From this time on, Islam became the predominant religion among the Chechens.

In the 18th century, Islam and its clergy began to play a political role in Chechen society. The leaders of national freedom movements—Sheikh Mansur (in the 18th century) and Shamil (in the 19th century)—played an important role in Chechen history.

Sufi Islam began to become popular in Chechnya beginning in the mid-19th century. The most significant figure in the Chechen Sufi tradition was Sheikh Kunta-Khadji Kishiyev, who was a follower of Kadiriya’s Tarikat and was the founder of an independent Vird.

During the Soviet era (1917–1991), Islam was strictly controlled by communist authorities. During World War II, ethnic groups such as Chechens, Ingushes, and others were deported to Central Asia, and the practice of Islam was prohibited.

The revival of Islam began at the end of the Soviet era in 1989. Islamic traditions were restored, mosques were built, sacred places were reopened to visitors, and Islamic institutions were opened in Grozny and Nazran (Ingushetia). In the 1990s, many Muslim Chechens went on the hajj pilgrimage to Mecca (Makkah). Many students went to Arab and other Islamic countries to study. An independent institution of spiritual administration for Muslims was founded in 1991. The Wahhabi form of Islam has been spreading in Chechnya since 1992.

Islam has thrived in post-Soviet Chechnya. Within 20 years of the end of Soviet rule, there were 465 mosques and 31 madrasas (religious schools) in the country. A mosque described as “The Heart of Chechnya,” accommodating 10,000 worshippers, was built in Grozny in 2008. An Islamic university named after Kunta-Khadji Kishiyev was founded along with a Center of Islamic Medicine based in Grozny, which is the largest institution of its kind in Europe.

In 2009, more than 3,000 Chechens went on hajj to Saudi Arabia. Islamic traditions and ceremonies appear to be an important part of the everyday life of Chechnya as well as part of its regional identity.

CHILE

Chile, a Spanish-speaking country winding down the Pacific Coast of South America, is a multiethnic society. More than half of its population of 17 million are people of European origin, and most of the rest are mestizos (people of mixed ancestry), with a small percentage (less than 5%) primarily of indigenous Indian ethnicity. In Chile, the church and the state are officially separate. The constitution allows for religious freedom. In 1999, a law was passed that forbade religious discrimination and granted other religions the same rights that the Catholic Church has.

About 70% of Chileans are Catholic, which is the religious tradition of the early Spanish colonial settlers. Protestants arrived in Chile in the 19th century with American missionary David Trumbull; currently, about 15% of the population of Chile is Protestant. The Chilean Jewish community in the country has approximately 30,000 members and accounts for less than 1% of the population.

Chile also has religious representation from Islam and Baha’i. There are 3,196 Muslims and 6,000 Baha'is in Chile. The first Islamic institution, The Society of Muslim Union in Chile, was founded on September 25, 1926. In 2002, the Baha'i community constructed a temple in Chile, the first Baha'i temple to be built in South America.

Other religious denominations in Chile include the following: 3.3% Mormons, 1% Jehovah's Witnesses, and 4.4% "other"; 8.3% are atheists.

Approximately 65% of the indigenous population in Chile identify themselves as Catholic. Another 29% are evangelical Protestant Christians, many of whom are Pentecostals, and 6% are in the category of "other."

Before the Spanish arrived in the 16th century in search of gold, Chile was ruled by the Incas. Under Inca rule, the Mapuche inhabited central and southern Chile. In 1520, the explorer Ferdinand Magellan discovered a navigable sea route at the southern tip of the South American continent, subsequently named the Strait of Magellan in his honor. The colonial period of Spanish control in Chile began with the conquistadors led by Diego de Almagro. Catholicism was introduced to Chile by the Spanish. On February 12, 1818, Chile declared its independence from Spain.

The role of religion as a vehicle of state power and of protest emerged during the Pinochet period. In 1973, a military coup overthrew the regime of president Salvador Allende, installing General Augusto Pinochet Ugarte into power. His government ruled with an iron hand, and thousands were killed, imprisoned, and tortured. In 1980, a new constitution was approved by referendum and General Pinochet became president of Chile for an 8-year term. In the late 1980s, Chile moved toward a free-market economy, and the government gradually allowed greater freedom of expression and assembly. On October 5, 1988, President Pinochet was denied a second term as president. On December 14, 1989, Chileans elected a new president as well as a new majority in parliament. Since then, Chile has flourished as a democratic society and as a developing economic power.

Chile is a founding member of the United Nations and the Union of South American Nations. In the 21st century, it is regarded as one of the most stable Latin American countries—one that has made considerable advances in the areas of human development, globalization, and economic freedom.

CHINA

The People's Republic of China, established in 1949, commonly known as China, is the largest country in the world (in terms of population) with more than 1.3 billion people, which is approximately one fifth of the world's population. In terms of the total land area, which is 9.6 million square kilometers, it ranks third in the world. As one of the world's largest economies and a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council, China plays an increasingly important role in the world today. China is also a multireligious country. This entry is mainly about religions in mainland China, a term that usually excludes Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Macao.

General Knowledge About China

Outline of History

Ancient Chinese civilization, which flourished in the fertile basins of the Yellow River and the Yangtze River, is one of the world's earliest civilizations. The first dynasty of ancient China was the Xia, and dates back to 4,000 years before the present. The Qin Dynasty, the first united central government of China, was founded in 221 BCE. The last dynasty, the Qing Dynasty, ended in 1912 with the founding of the Republic of China. With the end of the civil war, the People's Republic of China was established in 1949.

Administrative Divisions

Geographically, China is divided into seven areas—namely, northeast, northwest, southwest, north China, east China, central China, and south

China. Administratively, there are 23 provinces; five autonomous regions, each with a designated minority group; four municipalities (Beijing, Shanghai, Tianjin, and Chongqing); and two special administrative regions (Hong Kong and Macao). The capital of China is Beijing.

Nationalities

There are 56 distinct nationalities in China, the largest one being the Han Chinese, who constitute/account for about 91.9% of the total population. The other 55 are usually called ethnic minorities. They mainly live in the northeast, northwest, and southwest of China.

Religions in China

China is a country of great religious diversity. But the religions recognized by the government currently are five—namely, Buddhism, Daoism, Islam, Catholicism, and Protestantism. Chinese folk religion is usually consigned to the category of folk customs or folkloric beliefs. Confucianism is mainly taken as a system of thought rather than a kind of religion, albeit there was once a movement of Confucianism in the early 20th century in an effort to promote Confucianism as a religion, and there is still debate today in academia as to whether Confucianism should be established as China's national religion.

Buddhism

Buddhism is the largest organized religion in China. It was introduced to China during the Han Dynasty in the first century CE, and it became quite popular during the periods of the Southern and Northern dynasties, Sui Dynasty, Tang Dynasty, Song Dynasty, and their successors. With centuries of development, Buddhism is so deeply embedded in the Chinese culture that it has been viewed as one of the traditional religions of China.

Buddhism in China has three branches: Chinese Buddhism (Chinese versions of Mahayana Buddhism), Tibetan Buddhism or Lamaism, and Theravada Buddhism. The large majority of Chinese Buddhists are Han Chinese. The believers of Tibetan Buddhism mainly live in the areas of Tibet, Qinghai Province, and Inner Mongolia, while Theravada followers are found among the ethnic minorities, such as Dai, Blang, and Deang, who live in southwestern areas such as the Yunnan Province and the Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region.

Daoism

Daoism is China's indigenous religion. It was established in the East Han Dynasty (25–220 CE) around the second century CE, but its philosophical concepts can be traced back to a great sage, Lao Ze (604–531 BCE), a contemporary of Confucius.

Dao means “path” or “way.” The ultimate aim of Daoism is to seek the way to a long life or become a celestial being. Dao De Jing or Tao Te Ching, written by Lao Ze, is the most important Daoist text. Zhuangzi, Daozang (“Treasury of Tao”) and Taiping Jing (“Scripture on Great Peace”) are other important scriptures. Daoism puts emphasis on the concept of Wu Wei (nonaction or doing nothing) and the harmony and balance of opposites (yin and yang). The symbols of Daoism are Taijitu (yin and yang) and the Bagua (“eight trigrams”).

Daoism is a multitheistic religion. The Daoists worship many deities, including the Three Pure Ones (among whom Lao Ze is the most important one, Daode Tianzun), Yu Huang, Guan Shengdi, Eight Immortals, and the Yellow Emperor and Jade Emperor, among others. Daoism is divided into two sects—Quanzhen Dao (or “Inner Alchemy”) in the north and Zhenyi Dao (or “Talisman”) in the south.

The majority of Daoists are Han Chinese. Daoism also has adherents among some other ethnic minorities, such as Mulao, Maonan, and Yao. Along with Confucianism and Buddhism, Daoism is one of the three most important components of Chinese traditional culture. It has had a significant impact on Chinese ways of thinking, their philosophy of life, traditional Chinese medicine, the martial arts, feng shui, many styles of qigong, and Chinese literature and the arts.

Islam

Islam was introduced to China in the mid-seventh century across maritime and Silk Road routes through trade and diplomatic exchanges. During the Yuan and Ming dynasties, and especially in the Yuan Dynasty, Muslims were very influential in the central government. Today, 10 ethnic minorities of China's total of 55 are predominantly Muslim—namely, the Hui, Uygur, Kazak, Kirgiz, Tatar, Uzbek, Tajik, Dongxiang, Salar, and Bonan. The majority of Muslims live in the northwest and southwest areas of China, such as in the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region, Ningxia Hui Autonomous Region, and Qinghai, Gansu, and Yunnan provinces.

Christianity

Christians in China consist of Catholics, Protestants, and a small number of Russian Orthodox Christians (who first entered China in 1715). But only Catholics and Protestants are officially recognized by the government.

The Christian mission in China can be divided into four periods, of which the first three were ancient missions; the fourth is modern and contemporary.

Christianity first entered into China in the form of Nestorianism from Persia in the year 635 in Chang'an, capital of the Tang Dynasty (today's Xi'an, capital city of Shaanxi Province). It was called Jingjiao or Luminous Religion. With the support of the emperor, Nestorianism flourished for a while during the Tang Dynasty.

Christianity came again to China during the Yuan Dynasty, brought by Catholic Franciscans commissioned by the pope. But with the disappearance of Mongolian control of China, both Nestorianism and Catholicism faded away.

During the Late Ming and Early Qing dynasties, Jesuit missionaries headed by Matteo Ricci, an Italian mathematician, arrived in China. To secure their success, the Jesuits followed a very tactful policy of "complement to Confucianism and exclusion of Buddhism" and accepted the traditional Chinese practice of ancestor worship to show their accommodation to the Chinese culture.

This pragmatic approach produced a positive result. Not only did the emperor, for example, Kangxi, show great interest in Christianity, but many Chinese intellectuals and high-ranking officials in the imperial court even converted to the religion. But the Jesuits' reconciliation with Confucianism was condemned by the pope and led to the far-reaching Chinese Rites Controversy, which eventually destroyed the peaceful Christian mission in China.

Christianity was reintroduced to China during the modern era after the "Opium Wars" (1839–1860) with Britain. This time it was under the protection of Western warships and unequal treaties. Given the background of imperialist aggression and colonial expansion in modern China, Christianity was generally taken as the agent of Western imperialism by the Chinese, although Christians in China did establish the first modern clinics and hospitals, provide the first modern training for nurses, bring modern educational institutions to China, and so on. The anti-Christian movement and other New Culture movements among Chinese intellectuals and the Boxer Rebellion among the common grassroots Chinese were, thus, essentially forms of anticolonial expression.

Chinese Folk Religion

Chinese folk religion, a collective label given to various folkloric beliefs, is an important part of Chinese culture. But how to distinguish folk religions from folk customs is still debated among scholars in China. Some scholars suggest that religiosity and custom are two attributes of folk religion.

In contrast to the institutional religions such as Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam, folk religion is not organized, involves no authority, and is mainly practiced by the common people. There are various forms of practices and hundreds of gods and goddess, including immortals, demigods, historical figures, animals, and natural deities, such as heaven, earth, and mountain. Guan Yu (the red-faced, bearded hero), Caishen (god of fortune), Shouxing (god of longevity), Cheng Huang (god of city), Zaoshen (god of the kitchen), Tudi Gong (god of the earth), and Mazu are only a few folk deities.

Other Religions

Historically, along with the five major religions and the various Chinese folk religions, some other religions existed in China, including the following.

Manichaeism

Manichaeism entered China between the sixth and seventh centuries CE. It was first introduced to the Xinjiang area and then spread to the inner territories of China. Manichaean temples were established in Chang'an, Luoyang, and Taiyuan as well as in several other cities in northern and central China. After the Yuan and Ming dynasties, the religion gradually died out.

Zoroastrianism

Zoroastrianism was introduced to China in the sixth century CE. During the reign of the Sui and Tang dynasties, the Zoroastrian fire temples were established in Luoyang and Chang'an, capitals of the two dynasties. But the adherents were mainly foreigners. Then, during the reign of the Song Dynasty, temples were also established in Kaifeng, capital of Song, and Zhenjiang, a city near Nanjing in today's Jiangsu Province. It gradually faded out after the Song Dynasty.

Judaism

Judaism entered China perhaps as early as the reign of the Eastern Han Dynasty. There was a Jewish community in Kaifeng during the reign of the Song Dynasty. But the Jews of Kaifeng gradually lost their identities over the course of the Qing Dynasty through intermarriage and were absorbed into the general populace.

With the advent of the Nazi regime in Germany and World War II, many European Jews took refuge in Hong Kong, Shanghai, and Harbin (now capital of Heilongjiang Province). Shanghai, in particular, became home to more than 20,000 Jewish refugees.

Policy Toward Religion

China is a country with freedom of religious belief, though the government of the People's Republic of China is officially atheistic, viewing folk religion as backward superstition and Christianity as a tool of Western colonialism. The State Bureau of Religious Affairs is responsible for the administration of religions. To assist the government in its implementation of the policy of religious freedom, each of five government-sanctioned religions has organized its own associations: the Buddhist Association of China, founded in 1953, for Buddhism; the Islamic Association of China, founded in 1953, for Islam; the Daoist Association of China, founded in 1957, for Daoism; the Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association, founded in 1957, for Chinese Catholicism; the National Committee of the Three-Self Patriotic Movement of the Protestant Churches in China (founded in 1954, otherwise known as the Three-Self Patriotic Movement); and The China Christian Council (founded in 1980), for Chinese Protestantism.

These associations and their provincial or county and city branches take charge of all regular religious activities, training of religious personnel, and publication and distribution of holy books.

With regard to the relation between church/religion and state, there was no integration of the church/religion and the state but no clear separation of church/religion and state, either, in China's history. The principle of the People's Republic of China's policy toward religions is "Cherish the Motherland, Cherish the Church," wherein the Motherland comes first and then the church. Hence, religion in modern and contemporary China always bears a political attribute. The word patriotic in the names of the Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association and the Three-Self Patriotic Movement (Three-Self means self-governance, self-support, and self-propagation, with a connotation of removing foreign influences from the Chinese churches) best embodies this principle. Under this policy, the religious activities of those Christians who do not want to register in these state-sanctioned associations and remain loyal to the Vatican are banned, and this has led to the growth of "house churches" or "underground churches."

Statistics

According to China's central government estimate, China currently has about 300,000 religious personnel, more than 3,000 religious associations, and more than 100,000 sites for religious activities. There are more than 4,600 Catholic and more than 12,000 Protestant churches as well as more than 30,000 other types of Christian places of worship; Buddhist temples number more than 13,000; mosques more than 30,000; and Daoist temples more than 1,500. The total number of followers of various faiths is more than 100 million.

These figures are only rough estimates, although the numbers of mosques, churches, and Buddhist and Daoist temples may be relatively accurate. However, it is difficult to estimate the total number of believers in religion as such accurately.

Among the five main religions, only the number of Muslims is relatively definite. The number of people in the 10 groups totally, which are predominantly Muslim, is about 21 million, so the official figures of about 20 million Muslims is reasonably accurate.

According to the statistics supplied by the Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association and the Chinese Catholic Bishops Conference, the number of Chinese Catholics is about 5.5 million. This figure includes the Catholics of the underground churches. Considering that the growth of Catholicism in China is rather stable, this figure is also a reasonable one.

The number of Chinese Protestants given by the Three-Self Patriotic Movement and the China Christian Council is 16 million. But this figure does not include the members of house churches, as these churches are not officially registered. Over the past three decades, the house churches have witnessed rapid growth. So 16 million is a much underestimated figure. But the number of 60–80 million suggested by some surveys is clearly overestimated. Relatively acceptable estimates should be about 40–50 million.

It is even more impossible to estimate accurately the numbers of Buddhists and Daoists and those who practice Chinese folk religions because they do not have congregational memberships, and the majority of them do not participate in public ceremonies.

A more recent survey by a group of academics in Shanghai shows that China's religious population is about 300 million. This research was viewed by officials as the country's first major survey on religious beliefs. But the accuracy of the result is also questioned. To most Chinese people, the concept of "religion" is very ambiguous. Those who practice folk religion, such as worshipping the God of Fortune, burning incense in a temple, or having an ancestor shrine at home may not think themselves as religious. This particular difficulty in trying to count the number of religious people in China limits the reliability of any statistics.

New Religious Trends in China

The rapid economic growth and fundamental social transition since the "Reform and Opening-Up" policy instituted following the death of Mao Zedong have brought about new religious trends in China.

One of the most prominent changes is in the structure of religious followers. Directly after the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), during which a policy of elimination of religions was adopted, believers were characterized as the "five majorities" because of the following pattern seen for demographic characteristics: the majority were older people, women, less educated, from rural areas, and ethnic minorities and from less developed areas.

However, 30 years after the 1980s, the profile of believers has become more balanced. A recent survey shows that 62% of the believers are 16–39 years old, including middle school and university students, intellectuals, and wealthy entrepreneurs.

Significant change can also be found in the structure of religions. The five state-recognized religions are in a state of uneven development. Buddhism, Daoism, and Christianity (mainly unregistered Protestant house churches) have grown very fast, while Islam and Catholicism have remained relatively steady. Folk religion is experiencing its most prosperous period. At the same time, some "new" religions such as Mormonism, Baha'i, and Hinduism have entered China.

Due to the market economy and the nationwide population migration, the regional distribution of China's main religions is gradually changing, highlighted by Tibetan Buddhism going eastward, Christianity moving westward, and Islam migrating to the east and south.

There are positive changes with respect to state policy toward religion as well. After the Cultural Revolution, freedom of religion was guaranteed by the constitution, and the government adopted a more positive stance toward religion, especially traditional religions such as Chinese Buddhism, Daoism, and folk religion. Religion is now viewed by the government as an important ingredient of a "Harmonious Society." The immediate result of this moderate tolerance policy is a religious resurgence in China.

CHINESE POPULAR RELIGION

Chinese popular religion continues to fascinate both scholars and the general public in the 21st century. It does not refer to a single religious tradition but to a multitude of religious practices among Chinese, including ancestor veneration, fortune telling, and exorcism. The plural forms and contents of popular religion are not necessarily all found in China in this age of globalization. Most popular religious practices were suppressed in the People's Republic of China between the late 1950s and the 1980s due to the communist revolution and the Chinese state's iconoclastic ideology against religion. Chinese popular religion is thriving, however, in Taiwan, Hong Kong, North America, and other places where Chinese diasporic communities are found, and since the early 1990s, many of these traditional forms of religious practices have returned to the mainland via the routes of economic globalization. This entry provides an overview of the studies of Chinese popular religion and its traditional forms and also demonstrates the complexities of new popular religious developments resulting from economic globalization.

Overview of Chinese Popular Religion

The predominant portion of scholarly literature on Chinese popular religion prior to the early 1990s focuses on Chinese religious practices in Taiwan and Hong Kong due to the inaccessibility of communist China for researchers, where religious expressions were suppressed. Unlike 19th-century Western missionaries who boldly declared that the Chinese had no religions, Western scholars writing in the 20th century uniformly acknowledged that religious sentiments and practices permeated all aspects of Chinese societies except the socialist society of the People's Republic of China due to adherence to communist ideology. This body of scholarly literature primarily aims to explicate the origins of popular forms of Chinese religion and how they are practiced. Conceptually, many scholars who do historical and textual studies of Chinese religion discern that popular religion is synonymous with folk religion, which refers to the religious practices among common people. From this perspective, they mark the boundary between popular and institutional religions. Institutional religion pertains to more structured religious forms, such as monastic versions of Buddhism, or to religious practices sanctioned by the state, such as Confucianism. Popular religion thus appears in some sense to be the opposite of institutional religion. It is largely not organized and yet is commonplace in the daily life of common folks.

Based on their ethnographic observations, however, many anthropologists of Chinese religion argue that popular religion is not necessarily fully divorced from institutional religion. It, in fact, has the function of mediating relations between the state and society. In the history of Chinese dynasties, when a religion was sanctioned by the state, it was often disseminated to society at large through both administrative and scholarly conduits; thus, its values and practices were absorbed by common people. The state and society in Chinese historical context reflected the dichotomy between the elite and popular. However, on the cultural level, both were not necessarily sharply divided. The interplay between the state and society via popular religion, in many ways, reinforced the stability of the state and the orderliness of society when folk customs and state values overlapped. For instance, in 17th-century imperial China, the "morality book" (shanshu) was commonly used among common Chinese to record merits and demerits resulting from one's good and bad deeds. This type of morality book syncretically combined Confucian doctrines on moral commonwealth and the Buddhist idea of retribution for one's actions. Both state-sanctioned religious systems were well disseminated among common Chinese in a popular form of religion.

Chinese popular religion is an assortment of various religious practices. In most cases, different practices are syncretized, such as the 17th-century morality book. In this sense, Chinese popular religion can also be understood as a cultural system or a way of being. This cultural system is a result of the syncretic forces that remold different religious practices according to the needs of people in particular localities and at different times. This type of syncretism has largely to do with peoples' effort to sacralize the pragmatic aspect of their lives and to make the uncertain certain and the future present. Religion in this regard is tantamount to culture pervading the lives of its members. This is particularly pertinent in the context of traditional China where life is integrally connected with mythical narratives of different deities and the traditional calendar marking festivals invoking the presence of the deities. The syncretic manifestations of Chinese popular religion are thus inherently a part of traditional Chinese culture.

Examples of Syncretized Popular Deities

The Jade Emperor (yühuangdadi) is popularly known and revered in various Daoist-inspired popular religions in China. He is venerated as the king of all gods and goddesses. It is said that, as the embodiment of Dao with a magnificent appearance, he governs the entire universe and brings knowledge to humankind. His jurisdiction covers the Three Domains (the heavens, the earth, and the in-between) and the six Realms (containing celestials, humans, animals, ghosts, hell, and hungry beings). His subjects include four types of life—namely, the embryo born, the egg born, the water born, and the reincarnated. His residency is in the heavens; however, he descends to Earth on the 25th day of the twelfth month of the lunar calendar, inspecting the state of human affairs and bringing fair judgments to both malevolent and benevolent deeds. The 9th day of the first month of the lunar calendar is the Jade Emperor's birthday and is popularly known as "the Festival of the Jade Emperor" (yühuanghui). In Fujian and Taiwan, the Jade Emperor is better known as the Heavenly Lord (tiangong). On his birthday, people show their reverence by prostrating to his image. Many people may fast and bathe before offering incense to and entertaining him with local operas. In northern China, the format of celebrating the Jade Emperor's birth starts with a sacrificial ritual. The height of the celebration is a lengthy procession with the Jade Emperor's portrait.

In the popular religious realm of the Chinese people, while the Jade Emperor is revered as the omniscient Heavenly Lord and the ultimate judge of one's deeds, the Earth God (tudigong) is commonly venerated as a deity who reigns over the earthly affairs of people. There are two folk tales concerning the origins of the Earth God. Some say that the Jade Emperor sent him to the earth, while others say that he was a commoner whose name was Zhang Fude. When he was 36 years old, he was appointed as a tax collector by the Imperial Court. He never excessively collected tax from common folks; instead, he was always considerate of the poor and the wretched. It is said that because of his kind deeds, he lived 102 years. Three days after his passing away, his facial expression still looked like that of a live person. One poor family built a shrine for him with four large boulders. Shortly after this reverent act, this family became wealthy. People believed that Zhang Fude, the tax collector, was a god and, therefore, built temples to honor him as the Earth God. In rural China, farmers had a saying: "Wealth comes from land." Thus, the Earth God has been worshipped as the guardian of people's land and their crops. Most farming families honor the Earth God in their polytheistic shrines. In fact, the Earth God is venerated more frequently than the Jade Emperor. In most instances, on the 2nd and 15th day of every lunar month, farmers set up a large table with incense and candles and offer items as a public display of their devotion to the Earth God. The best known public worshipping is on the second day of the second lunar month when every farming family in a village would make rice cakes. The shape of these cakes is round but the size varies. They symbolize prosperity and are called "the Earth God cakes." The communal consumption of the Earth God cakes is coupled with sacrificial pork, family-brewed wine, and other food items. The festive mood is intended as collective prayer for the coming year's harvest and wealth in the forms of healthy crops and prosperous family businesses.

The universal theme of Chinese popular religion is often concerned with the earthly prosperity of its adherents. The Wealth God (caishen) is another popular deity among the Chinese, serving the worldly purpose of one's miraculous or accumulative prosperity. The Wealth God is one of the most popular Daoist deities. In Chinese folklore, he was an actual historical figure of the Song Dynasty named Zhao Gongming. He lived in Mt. Zhongnanshan, in the current Shanxi Province, practicing Daoist alchemy. Because of his eventual attainment of Daoist enlightenment, the Jade Emperor appointed Zhao Gongming as a marshal overseeing the affairs of common folks' health, commerce, lawsuits, and other daily businesses. Eventually, he became popularly known as the god of wealth. His image is widespread in the forms of statues and posters. Restaurants and stores often display statues of the Wealth God in the center.

The Wealth God has been woven into the Chinese calendar of festivals, particularly the Lunar New Year. Welcoming the Wealth God is a critical part of the celebration of the Lunar New Year. In northern China, the whole family makes jiaozi or dumplings on New Year's Eve. The shape of the dumplings is identical to that of ancient Chinese silver and gold bullion. Thus, the festive consumption of dumplings becomes the family's symbolic act welcoming the Wealth God. Street peddlers take the opportunity to peddle posters of the Wealth God door to door. One family could end up buying 10 posters or more as nobody wants to turn away the Wealth God. The fifth day of the New Year marks the culmination of paying tributes to the Wealth God. Many families stay up on the night of the fourth day until the early morning of the fifth day as an expression of their devotion. Business owners start the fifth day with firecrackers invoking the Wealth God's blessings for the coming year.

These popular religious practices signify the religiosity inherent in traditional Chinese life as its expressions are found in nearly all aspects of traditional households. Different deities have different functions, maintaining daily orderliness and bringing prosperity to the household. Many scholars have reached the conclusion that the pantheon of Chinese popular deities mirrors its worldly counterparts, such as judges, doctors, and business owners. The division of labor among deities is integrally connected with both the physical and human dimensions of the household. All gods are in charge of specific parts the household, such as the kitchen, doors, and the familial land. The order of things among the deities is likened to that among its human counterparts. The hierarchy of the pantheon reflects the patriarchal hierarchy of the family. For example, the Jade Emperor is the ultimate ruler of heaven and earth, and the father of the household holds the most power to determine the course of the family. The practice of popular religion in traditional Chinese culture ensures sustained communication between humans and a polytheistic divinity. This communication is materialized in the forms of daily offerings to the deities and festive celebrations associated with the key divine figures determining the prosperity of the household. When worldly authorities hinder the household's wishes, divine authorities are invoked and offered sacrificial meat, grains, and fruit so that the family can override worldly hindrances. Thus, the sacred is frequently invited into the worldly affairs of common Chinese.

Globalization and Revivals of Popular Religion on the Mainland

The iconoclastic destruction that occurred during the Chinese communist revolution between the 1950s and the late 1970s exterminated most religious practices. Some traditional forms and practices of Chinese popular religion dissipated. Since the late 1980s, however, many traditional forms of Chinese popular religion have been revived. The process of religious revivals in China is inextricably linked with China's effort to build a market economy as a part of the global economic network. It should be noted that the Chinese state did not deliberately revive once-suppressed religions via its market economy. Instead, inadvertently, the globally linked market in China also became an alternative social space facilitating the revivals of various religious traditions. Coastal provinces, such as Fujian, Guangdong, and Zhejiang, were among the primary locations where the resurgence of popular religions took place due to their traditional ties with Taiwan, Hong Kong, and North America, where Chinese popular religious forms have been preserved. Often, overseas Chinese businessmen from these regions played a pivotal role in reintroducing and giving financial support to popular religious revivals. Folk religious forms in Fujian and Zhejiang provinces are particularly identical to those in Taiwan and in Chinese communities in North America.

Economic globalization, on the one hand, has reintroduced many traditional forms of religion. On the other hand, it also generates new social and political circumstances under which new syncretic popular religious forms emerge. The case in point is Falun Gong, a popular religious movement in contemporary China, which has attracted people in particular who are socioeconomically marginalized. Privatization and marketization processes in China have created a large segment of the population that is unemployed or retired without adequate retirement pensions and health care benefits. Falun Gong is a prominent example of new syncretic religious forms in this social context. Li Hongzhi, its founder, successfully created this new popular religion by incorporating the doctrines of Buddhism and Daoism into his Qigong practice. His syncretic style has drawn several millions of adherents as he is able to convince his followers that the practice of Falun Gong revitalizes one's spiritual and physical wholesomeness. His self-healing techniques encourage his adherents not to visit doctors when sick. This aspect of Falun Gong means much to those who cannot afford costly medical attention from conventional hospitals. In this background, Falun Gong could be seen as a product of China's economic and social conditions. Although it is currently suppressed by the Chinese state, this large-scale religious movement highlights and responds to the economic insecurity and psychological pressures among common Chinese in the midst of China's fast-growing economy in this age of globalization.

In this regard, the forms of popular religion in 21st-century China continue to be syncretic, and in the meantime, intimately connected with China's economic development. Its social settings are not limited to rural regions traditionally defined as the basis of common Chinese culture. The Internet, as an integral part of the infrastructure of China's market economy, has become a critical means for popular religious adherents to connect with each other. The virtual aspect of contemporary popular religion permits popular religion to become translocal, reaching populations beyond its initial cultural location. The atemporal and aspatial nature of cyberspace makes these traditions ever more accessible to the general public of China. Thus, sizable urban populations in China also take part in the revival of popular religion.

Especially popular among today's Chinese are Guangong and the Wealth God. Guangong (162–220 CE), a prominent warrior in the era of the Three Kingdoms, became a deified figure among both China's elite and the common people. Symbolizing the spirit of justice and loyalty, he, like the Wealth God, is revered for guarding the financial safety of a household or a business. The emphasis of these two popular deities in contemporary China similarly reflects the current issues of systemic corruption in the Chinese political system and economic insecurity among the majority of Chinese citizens.

Both the name and the religious significance of the Wealth God are inextricably woven into the economic sphere of the Chinese populace. In cyberspace, different rituals concerning the Wealth God are shared among Internet users, and virtual discourses on money making interlace the supernatural with the economic reality of China. Hundreds of financial search engines and forums are named after the Wealth God. This pattern of connecting the sacred with the worldly in contemporary China is identical to the traditional characteristics of popular religion in the presocialist era. In this context, the Wealth God is also being pluralized, not limited to its singular historical origin but inclusive of any other deities that could potentially bring wealth. For instance, the mantras and recitation rituals associated with wealth gods in Tibetan Buddhism are readily available online. Apparently, wealth gods of Tibetan Buddhism are being syncretized into contemporary Chinese popular religion. The syncretizing process, conspicuously utilitarian in nature, concerns itself with invoking and maneuvering supernatural prowess in support of personal needs and desires in the modern, global context of Chinese society.

CHRISTIAN DEMOCRATIC PARTIES

Christian Democracy is a political ideology that found expression in Christian Democratic parties, which became prominent in postwar Europe.

Christian Democracy emerged as an ideology at the end of the 19th century, largely as a result of Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891), subtitled “Rights and Duties of Capital and Labor.” This rejected both communism and unrestricted capitalism but affirmed the right to private property. It also supported the rights of working people to form unions. Of primary importance was the need to improve the lot of the working class, reflecting a concern for the poor that was embedded in Catholic social teaching. The Catholic origins of Christian Democracy remain important, although the movement has developed variously in different parts of the world.

Following World War II, Christian Democracy was welcomed as an alternative to the discredited doctrines of fascism and became the creed of moderate conservatives in many parts of Europe. In several countries (e.g., in Germany, Austria, Italy, and Belgium), Christian Democratic parties formed the major conservative grouping, constituted in opposition to both socialism and communism, on the one hand, and to the excesses of the market, on the other—essentially, “conservatives of the heart.” Specifically, there is an emphasis on human rights and individual initiative, keeping in mind the duties of the individual toward the community. Community in turn is related to solidarity, expressed in a welfare state. The notion of the market is accepted but requires regulation. Secularism is firmly rejected.

Such parties played a major role in the development not only of the nation-states of Europe but of the European Community itself. It is no coincidence that the architects of the postwar European settlement—Robert Schuman in France, Konrad Adenauer in Germany, and Alcide de Gasperi in Italy—were all Christian Democrats. Here were the leaders of national elites whose cross-border communication and coordinated policies built a Europe in their own image. It was, for example, the Schuman Declaration that called for the placing of the coal and steel industries of France and West Germany under supranational control, from which arose the European Coal and Steel Community, the forerunner of what eventually became the European Union.

In the Protestant countries of Europe, small Christian Democratic parties (e.g., in The Netherlands or the Nordic countries) were founded by conservative Protestants in reaction to growing liberal tendencies both inside and outside the churches. Elsewhere, the emphasis on conservatism is less marked. In the very different economic and political environment of Latin America, for example, caring for the poor finds a new resonance resulting in Christian Democratic parties that lean more to the left than to the right.

CHRISTIAN IDENTITY

The Christian Identity movement, which is made up of small separatist organizations whose leaders preach intolerance and hate through religion, exists on the far religious fringes of the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, South Africa, Australia, and various western European countries. It is arguably an ideological movement first and a religious movement second; nevertheless, religious themes are central to its teachings and motivations.

Adherents of the Christian Identity movement admire Nazism and display hostility toward non-Whites, gay men and lesbians, and members of faiths outside Christianity. They embrace an extreme form of the doctrine of British-Israelism, asserting that the true inheritors of biblical Israel are in Britain and that God's chosen people were not the present-day people known as Jews but an imagined race of Israelis consisting of those of Anglo-Saxon, Celtic, Germanic, and Scandinavian heritage. They believe that people known as Jews and persons of color lack souls and are thus somehow less than human. Jews, in particular, are perceived as mortal enemies of White people and are said to harbor elaborate plans to take over the world. Christian Identity leaders preach that the end times are imminent and will involve a large-scale race war. As such, Christian Identity adherents arm themselves heavily in preparation for Armageddon, living together in remote compounds, spinning conspiracy theories, and often resisting taxation by government.

Organizations, congregations, and even loose clusters of individuals affiliated with the Christian Identity movement in the United States are commonly thought of as hate groups and are thus tracked closely by the Southern Poverty Law Center, whose mission is to encourage tolerance and combat discrimination in all forms. The best known American Christian Identity organizations are the Ku Klux Klan, which was revitalized in the 20th century by a Christian minister, William Simmons, and Aryan Nations, also founded by a Christian minister, Wesley Swift, in the mid-20th century. Swift in particular was known for interweaving anti-Semitism and pushing the limits of British-Israelism in his California congregation, the Church of Jesus Christ Christian, and on his daily radio program. By the 1970s, Swift's combination of Christianity and hate had gained influence not only in the Ku Klux Klan but also in traditionally secular right-wing hate groups, including neo-Nazis and racist skinheads. The Christian Identity movement also has links to militia movements and other manifestations of right-wing antigovernment activism in the United States and abroad.

Despite having relatively few affiliates (most estimates place its size at no more than 50,000 people), the Christian Identity movement in the United States has attracted publicity due to some of the more violent actions taken by its followers. The 1992 standoff at Ruby Ridge, Idaho, between the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Christian Identity follower Randy Weaver made headlines across the world. Convicted Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh—who specifically mentioned the Ruby Ridge incident as a prime motivation for his 1995 crime—had links to Christian Identity, as did Eric Robert Rudolph, who pled guilty to bombing abortion clinics, a lesbian bar, and a public gathering at the 1996 Summer Olympics in Atlanta. In 1999, another adherent of the Christian Identity movement, Benjamin Smith, went on a shooting spree in Illinois and Indiana, wounding several Orthodox Jews and Asian Americans and killing two people, including Northwestern University's men's basketball coach Ricky Byrdsong, who was African American.

CHRISTIAN MILITIA

The phrase Christian militia (“Soldiers of Christ”) can be traced back many centuries. Until around the fourth century CE, however, given the Church’s original condemnation of warfare, it had no connection to the bearing of arms. Instead, it referred to monks struggling alone against bodily temptation. Not until the 11th century did the Church explicitly declare that Christian soldiers dying in war would go directly to heaven. De Laude Novae Militae (A Celebration of the New Militia), a recruitment pamphlet written for the Knights Templar (ca. 1120), promises that those serving as God’s ministers can slay heathens and apostates with impunity, for in doing so, they commit not homicide, but malecide: the killing of evil. “To die for Christ and to kill his enemies, there is no crime in that, only glory.”

The first bona fide soldiers of Christ were never granted priestly powers. However, their ministry was sanctified through a rite tacitly recognized by church officials as an “eighth sacrament.” It involved confession of sins, a purifying bath, and the donning of white linen, followed by an “armed vigil,” wherein the initiate’s sword was placed on an altar and blessed. After this came a homily on the code of chivalry, a Mass, and the formal girding on of the initiate’s hauberk and helmet. The final step was a sharp blow to the cheek, the so-called dubbing. This was to be the last blow he could take and not return.

The Hussite Revolt (1420–1434), named after the Anabaptist Jon Hus, engaged Roman Catholic Crusaders in southeastern Europe over disputes about the proper age of baptism and how best to distribute communion, evidence of the power of religion to generate militant and violent action. Later Martin Luther (1483–1546) rejected the notion of holy war as an oxymoron and along with it, the idea of Christian militia. State violence, he argued, should deal only with matters of this world; the Church should concern itself only with the spiritual needs of believers in the next. Thus, there must be two separate domains: the natural realm of politics and war versus the supernatural realm of the “new law,” overseen by Christ’s commandment to love and forgive one’s enemies.

This pronouncement had momentous consequences. First, it freed the Church of corrupting political-military entanglements; second, it liberated the state to pursue its own power interests without the Church’s moral supervision. Third, and most important, it drove the impulse toward Christian warfare underground. Henceforth, soldiers of Christ would enact their desire to erect a New Jerusalem from the margins of society.

A closer approximation to what has since become familiar in the modern era was Thomas Müntzer’s League of Elect, a 16th-century German peasant force that fought under a rainbow-colored flag for a New Jerusalem “purified of all un-cleanliness” (Cohn, 1970, pp. 247–248). Certain that their righteousness would grant them immunity from harm, they stormed into battle only to be exterminated; this time by a new breed of army: secular and iron disciplined.

Modern Christian Militias

Christian militias have arisen repeatedly during the modern era. In the 20th century alone, each European nation has had its own variations, many of which have had fascist (anticommunist, xenophobic, and jingoist) overtones. Some, furthermore, have received the enthusiastic endorsement of Catholic laity, if not of the Church itself (e.g., Franco’s Falange Española, the Croatian Ustashe, and the Hungarian Arrow Cross). Others have been tied to the Eastern Orthodox Church, such as the Romanian Iron Guard. A notorious recent case in the Middle East concerns the military arm of the Kataeb Party of Lebanon, which draws support from the Maronite Christian community. During the Lebanese civil war (1975–1982), it was implicated in the murder of up to 3,500 Palestinians entrapped by Israeli soldiers in the Sabra-Shatila refugee camps of Beirut.

Because historically the great majority of the U.S. population has been Protestant, most American Christian militias have been Protestant inspired. In the 1890s, they called themselves the American Protection Association and in the 1920s, the Ku Klux Klan. Two more recent examples are the neo-Calvinist Christian Reconstructionists and the evangelical Christian Dominionists. These two movements disagree about many theological issues. However, they concur in the belief that Christian warriors must “occupy” secular institutions until the Second Coming, enforcing Old Testament law on the nation, with the exception of Jewish ceremonial prescriptions. Among other things, this would involve establishing local theocratic rule, compulsory Sabbath, and American citizenship restricted to believers. In addition it would require death by stoning of adulterers, homosexuals, witches, abortionists, juvenile delinquents, blasphemers, and idol worshippers and, according to some proponents, the reintroduction of slavery and concubinage. In the New American Jerusalem, there must be neither public education, nor welfare, nor minimum wages; there should also be no progressive taxes, “frivolous lawsuits,” “fiat (paper) money,” or industrial pollution laws. In other words, unless it is explicitly abrogated by Jesus or the apostles, it must be permitted.

The reconstructionist agenda rarely gets beyond debates among the minuscule memberships of groups such as the Chalcedon Foundation, for example, or Wallbuilders, Inc. However, a number of believers have tired of apocalyptic fantasies and have turned to action. This includes members of various Christian Identity congregations such as the Aryan Nations Church; the Covenant, the Sword and the Arm of the Lord; and the Army of God. Since 1980, these and related groups (e.g., the Bruders Schweigen, the Order Strike Force II, and the Bob Mathews Brigade) have been prosecuted for armored car heists, arsons, bank robberies, counterfeiting, assaults on minorities, and murder.

Identity Christianity is so titled for the conviction shared by believers that they alone are the true Israelites, that the Bible was written for them, and that as Israel’s “lost sheep,” Christ came to redeem only them. The “them” are blue-eyed, blond, White-skinned European Americans. Jews are held to be imposters, if not Satanists; Blacks are considered soulless, subhuman “mud people,” whose filth is evidenced by their skin color.

The Sociology of Christian Militias

There exists a vast underground media of pamphlets, short-wave radio broadcasts, cable TV shows, and Internet webpages that propagate the romance of the Christian militia, heroically fighting against the reputed “sons of darkness.” Yet research demonstrates that people do not ordinarily become God’s battle axe and weapons of war by means of mass communications. Nor are members of contemporary Christian militias any less educated than their peers, more neurotic, or socially estranged. On the contrary, they appear to be recruited by the very same ways in which psychologically normal, relatively intelligent, community-involved people become peace activists or vegetarians—namely, through personal contacts with others already in the movement. That is, people do not join a Christian militia because they have come to believe in the cause; they first “join with” an activist, and then begin altering their beliefs to nourish that relationship. For many, the recruiters in question are fathers, husbands, older brothers, or uncles.

In America, since 1800, Christian militias have arisen approximately every 30 years. These uprisings have less to do with economic booms and busts than with generational cycles. The names of the respective foes of these militia uprisings, of course, differ: the Illuminatism, Free Masonry, Mormonism, “Papism,” Jewry, Communism, the Bilderburgers, secular liberalism, and so forth. But the world view of the protagonists has remained remarkably stable since 1800:

1. Manichaeism: There is a cosmic struggle between God’s agents and those of Satan.
2. Conspiratorialism: God’s foes are allied in a secret conspiracy to establish a reign of death over the globe.
3. Signs: All discomfiting recent events are markers of this conspiracy. Today, these signs include everything from public education and labor unions to minority voting rights and illegal immigration and from pornography and divorce to “drugs” and Darwinism.
4. Last days: The Final Battle (and Christ’s predicted victory over Satan and his minions) is imminent.
5. What to do: “God, guns, and guts!” Stand with God, gird up your loins, and (to quote Müntzer), “Go at them. . . . Don’t be moved to pity. . . . At them, . . . while the fire is hot!” (Cohn, 1970, pp. 247–248)

The terrorist attack of Anders Breivik in Norway on July 22, 2011, indicates that these characteristics are part of European Christian militia as well as American groups. Breivik claimed to be part of a new Knights Templar militia reviving the spirit of the medieval Crusades and intent on ridding Europe of Muslims, whom he regarded as alien intruders.

The life span of the typical American Christian militia has usually been short, with the end following the exposure of its own leaders' sexual improprieties, financial shenanigans, and the militias' involvement in terrorism, leading to public disgrace, police crackdowns, and legal prosecution. As mentioned earlier, this is precisely how the Bruders Schweigen and its derivative came to an end (Flynn & Gerhardt, 1989); the same is true of the the Ku Klux Klan of the 1920s—in the latter case, amid rumors of rape, embezzlement, and homicide.

CHRISTIAN RECONSTRUCTIONISM

Christian Reconstructionism is a Christian movement based in the United States that advocates the reconstruction of society in terms of biblical law. Rousas John Rushdoony, founder of the movement, established one of its more influential organizations, the Chalcedon Foundation, in 1960. Small in number, the Reconstructionists provided some of the early intellectual foundation for the American Religious Right. Through their work in Christian schools and home schooling, they were an important force in the early mobilization and organization of the movement.

Christian Reconstructionist theology is rooted in two ideas: postmillennialism and presuppositionalism. Reconstructionists believe that Satan was defeated in Christ's resurrection and that we are currently living in the 1,000-year reign of the Kingdom of God. Postmillennialist Reconstructionists believe that creation was redeemed with the resurrection and that the Kingdom of God is increasingly apparent as history progresses and as Christians, exercising dominion, labor to build it. Postmillennialism was prevalent in America in the 19th century, but it is a rather obscurely held view today; presuppositionalism is a technical theological/philosophical position unfamiliar to most conservative Christians. Presuppositionalists hold that all knowledge is derived from presuppositions that cannot be proved or disproved. They hold that godly presuppositions and worldly (humanistic) presuppositions are mutually exclusive. The corollary to Reconstructionist presuppositional epistemology is Theonomy (meaning "God's law"), which asserts that there can be no neutral, objective way to determine ethics and law. Humans must live under God's law or substitute some humanistic value system; the only alternatives are an objective absolute (the Bible) or abject moral relativism resulting in chaos. While there are few explicitly Reconstructionist churches, postmillennialism and presuppositionalism are widely influential in American conservative Protestant culture in their respective popularized forms: dominion theology and the critique of secular humanism.

Some of the most important Reconstructionist books have been Rushdoony's two-volume commentary on the Ten Commandments, Institutes of Biblical Law; Greg Bahnsen's defense of theonomy, By This Standard; and David Chilton's postmillennial works, Paradise Restored and Days of Vengeance. In addition to these relatively technical theological, exegetical works, Reconstructionist authors have also produced an extensive list of books designed to help everyday Christians apply the theology in their own lives: in their families, their churches, and in civil society as a whole. Key figures in this dimension of the movement include author and publisher Gary North. He published the multi-volume Biblical Blueprint Series, which, in a widely accessible style, addresses economics, government, and family issues. Both the more technical theological works and the more popular strategic works have been used as Bible study materials and sold in church bookstores in fundamentalist Christian churches.

A key strategy for Reconstructionists' efforts to transform society is to "raise up a generation of leaders" imbued with a "biblical worldview" and trained to "exercise dominion." To this end, they have promoted Christian schools and advocated that Christian families home school their children, producing and distributing instruction and curricular materials. While this is primarily a North American movement, there also exist small Reconstructionist groups in Europe, notably in Switzerland and in Denmark.

CHRISTIANITY

Christianity is one of the world's most global religious traditions and is also the largest. Although it is associated with the culture of Europe and America, the numerical balance tipped in the late 20th century with the growth of the Christian population in other parts of the world. In the 21st century, the majority of the world's Christians are in Latin America, Asia, and Africa.

With such a diverse population in continuous existence for more than 2,000 years, general descriptions can only have limited value. The obvious central and essential element in Christianity is Jesus Christ, the leading figure of the tradition. The particular forms, features, and role of Christ vary considerably; where there is some agreement, the membership has aggregated into denominations. Disagreements as to the necessary features of Christianity between self-professed Christians can constitute issues on the actual scope of Christianity. Divisions have developed over matters of perception, culture, and doctrine as well as practice. Where there are issues of peer acceptance, self-definition may be a wholly inadequate basis to objectively determine who is a practicing Christian.

In the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, Christians see the replication and the realization of all the salvific events in Jewish history. For Christians, Jesus' death and resurrection take salvation beyond the chosen community of Israel to the Christian community, which is charged with proclaiming a universal salvation. If the history from Abraham to Jesus is the history and preservation of divine promises to humans, with Jesus we have the history of fulfillment of the divine promises.

According to Christian scriptures, the followers of Jesus were first referred to as "Christians" in first century CE Antioch (see Acts of the Apostles 11:26). Etymologically, the term Christian is derived from the Greek term Christos meaning "the anointed one." As such, Christ and Christian initially refer to the anointed, and in this context, it includes Jesus and his followers. Jesus and his immediate disciples, who knew him during his lifetime, were Jews and familiar with Judaic teachings and traditions. In that tradition, anointing is conferred on one who is appointed priest, prophet, or ruler. In the person of Jesus, it is the belief of Christians that he is anointed as all three, and he is proclaimed to be the promised Messiah or in Hebrew, Mashiach ("the Anointed One").

This entry outlines briefly the 2,000-year history of Christianity from its beginnings to the present day and concludes with a discussion of its place in the contemporary world.

Pax Romana

The Roman Empire provides the larger immediate historical context for the life and times of Jesus and has profoundly affected the history of Christianity. It was the context and actions of Roman rule that were essential to the death of Jesus, became the foundation for the spread of Christianity, and resulted in the preeminence of Rome as the touchstone in Christian history. Of particular interest is the Roman authorities' reliance on order and law as the infrastructure that permitted the operation of cultural and philosophical plurality in its realm. A related Roman gift was the establishment of routes, which were necessary to exercise power, ensure communications, and maintain peace in the empire.

In the context of the Roman Empire, Jerusalem was a tiny outpost. Enforcement measures to maintain the peace included a deterrent component and were designed for social effect as much as individual penalty. Scourging and crucifixion were used with some regularity and would not have been particularly remarkable events at the time. Enforcement with a firm hand complemented the availability of Roman military might and supported the need to maintain order in a large empire. Latin was used for legal proceedings and legislative purposes. Education and commerce were more usually conducted in Greek, and the small local Jewish community where Jesus lived would have spoken Aramaic, which is a dialect of Hebrew, while studies of Judaism and biblical works would be conducted in classical Hebrew.

Our knowledge of the circumstances obtaining there in the first century CE are based on archaeological analyses and the writings of persons such as the Jewish historian Josephus and fragments of texts, including the Dead Sea Scrolls. Just as no information concerning Moses and the Exodus has been uncovered in Egyptian archives, to date, no mention of Jesus of Nazareth has been found in Roman records of the first century CE.

Among the earliest written Christian accounts are the letters of the disciple Saul (Hebrew) or Poulos (Greek) or Paulus (Latin) or Paul (English). He appears to have been educated in Greek and Latin; as a rabbinical student, he would have known Hebrew and also spoken Aramaic. Multilingual capabilities would permit Paul to communicate his thoughts in relevant languages. However, even when the translator is perfectly competent, translation risks inaccuracy from untranslatable terms and the absence of equivalent meaning for words. Consequently, our understanding of the writings of first century CE works involving multiple translations across various languages and cultures requires complex analyses and inquiry. An awareness of this complexity is relevant to reading the Christian writings across 2,000 years and several cultures.

Following the death and resurrection of Jesus, the disciples initially accepted the task of conveying the message of their teacher to a Jewish audience who were familiar with Aramaic and Hebrew. However, very early, the disciples found a more receptive audience among those who were not Jews and those less familiar with Hebraic traditions. To a Hellenized audience, linguistic and cultural translation from Jesus' Hebraic concepts into the Greek language and philosophical categories was unavoidable. It appears that considerable effort was expended to distill and maintain the integrity of the message that was to be conveyed across histories and cultures.

Historical events beyond the early Christian communities contributed to the spread of Christianity. Shortly after the death and resurrection of Jesus as described in the Gospels, some of the Jewish community attempted a revolt against Roman rule. The Roman legions responded by destroying the Temple and dispersing the Jewish community of Jerusalem.

The earliest Christian writings include the correspondence of Paul, who was converted to Christianity after the death of Jesus and was not taught by him personally. As the disciples who were Jesus' companions before his death aged, it became apparent that some form of transmission was necessary if the message was to continue beyond that generation. These writings sought to express the essential message of the death and resurrection of Jesus to divergent audiences. There were several such Gospels ascribed to different authors. Of these, four were included in the canonical scriptures and are known as the Gospels according to Mark, Matthew, Luke, and John.

One of the 12 apostles—Peter—was accepted as the leader, and the disciples who were with Jesus before his death were given special stature. “The Twelve”—as they came to be known—exercised a supervisory role and were consulted on matters pertaining to the teaching of Jesus. Paul and eventually others were accorded the title of apostle even though they were not known to the others before Jesus' death. Lines of succession in office traced back to the 12 apostles became the marks of authority.

In the first century CE, the group of disciples grew in number and distribution following the routes established by the Romans. In the process, the group evolved from a Jewish sect to becoming a religion that was initially the target of enforcement agencies that sought to eradicate the problem. As with other oppressed groups, vocalizing expressions of faith could lead to unintended consequences. Additionally, some of the early disciples may have been illiterate. In such circumstances, it would be reasonable to expect the disciples to rely on symbols to convey their faith. The earliest such graphic symbol appears to be a simple line drawing of a fish. For the more verbally adept person, the Greek term for fish, ichthus or ichthys, may have also served as an anagram to stand for Iesus Christus Theos or Thyus, which would translate to “Jesus Christ is God.” The cross or the crucifix was apparently not the earliest symbol of Christianity.

As described in the Christian scriptures, the nascent group of followers had several discussions as they tried to discern the content and meaning of the message for emergent contexts. A disagreement between the disciples regarding the requirements to be made of non-Jews who sought membership highlights some of the issues. For the Jews, circumcision signified a man’s participation in the covenant with the God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses (see, e.g., Genesis 17:13–19). For Greek sensibilities, the same procedure was repugnant as it constituted a mutilation of the body, damaging God’s creation. Some, including the leader Peter, thought it necessary for non-Jews to become Jews before they were eligible to become Christians and made them undergo circumcision. Paul opposed this interpretation and advocated the acceptance of non-Jews directly to Christian membership without requiring circumcision. In what has come to be known as the Council of Jerusalem and as described in the letter of Paul to the Galatians (Galatians 2) and the Acts of the Apostles (Acts 15), Paul’s view prevailed and Peter agreed that to be a Christian, it was not necessary to become a Jew or be circumcised.

The articulation of Christian beliefs and the continuing efforts at clarifying the understanding to maintain the integrity of the message can be traced from accounts in Christian scriptures and other sources. Much of the ongoing discussions were summarized at meetings such as the Council of Jerusalem, which are eventually reported either in canonical scriptures or other conciliar documents. As with the Council of Jerusalem, until the Second Vatican Council in 1965 CE, the agenda for the Councils was determined by the major disagreements of the day. Proceedings of the Councils resulted in the development of doctrinal statements known as symbols of faith or creeds. Two of the better known such creeds in current use are the Apostle’s Creed and the Nicene Creed. Symbols of faith were also crafted by individual authorities in different parts of the empire.

Councils and movements have used the term ecumenism from the Greek Oikumene (Οικουμένη)—literally “all the people of the world”—when they intend or wish to be seen as inclusive. An ecumenical council, then, is ostensibly one in which all the people of the world participate. Which councils and movements are accepted as ecumenical vary according to individual Christian communities and within a single tradition. For instance, the Council of Ephesus in 449 CE was termed the Latrocinium (Latin) or Robber Council, and its decisions were subsequently overturned by the Council of Chalcedon in 451 CE.

For various reasons, in the first few centuries CE, the Christians as a minority and frequently oppressed community had been a relatively select group who established standards to be met before someone could obtain membership. For instance, a soldier or diplomat of the Roman Empire could not be accepted into the Christian community. The oath of office required these persons to pledge allegiance to the Emperor as God, which was understood to be in direct conflict with an allegiance to the Christian understanding of God.

From about 300 CE, circumstances for Christians began to change. Armenia was among the first to adopt Christianity as the state religion, and when the Roman Emperor Constantine accepted Christianity personally and adopted it as the official Roman religion, it became established and grew in popularity. The ascension of Constantine as Emperor of Rome and his conversion to Christianity mark a major change for Christianity. For instance, being a soldier and a diplomat was no longer an impediment to membership in the Christian community. Standards for admission to the community generally changed sufficiently to make a marked difference from the ascetic lifestyle. Ascetics and their followers or associates with more particular lifestyles and foci eventually developed into monastic communities. Communities who had particular social or functional directions also formed. These subsequently came to be known as religious communities.

Along with the development of the community, liturgical practices and organizational structures also evolved and adapted to various cultural and national circumstances. Some features include a more developed annual cycle of liturgical celebrations, with Easter assuming dominance in the annual calendar. Linkages to existing patriarchates and the 12 apostles have remained common to all.

Constantine's move to the city of Byzantium in 330 CE and its renaming as Constantinople accorded it the status of capital of the eastern empire. With Rome continuing as the capital of the western empire, the Christian communities were not immune from conventional social tensions and perceptions. By the middle of the fifth century, Christians had established bases in Jerusalem, Antioch (now in Syria), Alexandria in Egypt, and Constantinople (now known as Istanbul, in Turkey), and Rome. The leader in each of these five centers was recognized as of greater organizational significance and given the title of Patriarch. The Patriarch of the Church in Rome is the pope.

Christian communities were also established in regions beyond the Roman Empire. For instance, according to some traditions, the disciple known as Thomas traveled as far as India. In South India, there exists a community of Christians known as the Mar Thomites, who trace formal connections with the church in Antioch. At least two liturgical rites in South India, the Syro-Malabar Rite and the Syro-Malankara Rite, trace their origins to one of the 12 apostles named Thomas and are associated organizationally with the church in Antioch in Syria.

Reliance on differing philosophical and cultural bases appears to have contributed to some of the doctrinal and disciplinary disputes in the communities. Councils did not always result in amicable solutions and on occasion heightened tensions. Some tensions persisted for hundreds of years. For instance, a tension between understandings and practices in Christian communities in Constantinople and Rome evolved until a major division occurred in 1054 CE when the then successor to the office of Peter the apostle, Pope Leo IX, and the Patriarch Michael Cerularius of Constantinople mutually declared the other to be excluded or excommunicated from the community of the true followers of Jesus Christ. The Great Schism or division resulted in the emergence of the Orthodox Christian community, who were not in communion with the church in Rome. This division was eventually reversed officially in December 1965 CE when Pope Paul VI and Patriarch Athenagoras of the Orthodox Church based in Istanbul (formerly Constantinople) mutually nullified the excommunications of 1054 CE. Official positions of course do not describe the complete reality, and tensions between Christian communities continue to be evident. Also, schisms and healing of divisions have occurred at various times and over varying periods for a variety of reasons.

The spread of the Christian message through Europe and the West followed political and social realities such as the prevalence of Roman order. Initially, Christianity in the West meant Roman Catholicism, which subdivided into other denominations following the period of the Reformation. Several Christian monarchs found a common cause when faced with the expansion of the Turkish and other empires where the dominant religion was not Christianity. Subsequently, denominational affiliations and social and political realities affected each other. The association of Jerusalem with Abraham continues to provide fertile occasions for conflict between empires with different religious affiliations. An example of the close link between western European empires and the form and distribution of Christianity was seen in conflicts over Jerusalem. In the East, Christian communities that had been more closely integrated with local cultures acquired correspondingly different organizational and operative features. The consequence of various cultural and social features distinguishing the East from the West European Christian communities was that many of these communities were not participants in the same conflicts.

Eastern Christians who maintained their association with Rome are historically known as Eastern Catholics, as distinguished from the Eastern Orthodox Christians. The term Catholic has come to be associated with Christian communities linked to the Patriarch of Rome. Accordingly, there have been Orthodox and Catholic Patriarchs in the same geographical location. The process of reconciliation between the Orthodox and Catholic communities, officially marked in 1965 CE, has not yet resolved such terminological and organizational issues. Arguably, the reconciliation may mean there is no longer any substantive significance to a distinction between Orthodox and Catholic Christians. The determination of the Patriarchate in a unified community has yet to be resolved.

In Europe, the centralized organizational structure of the Roman church was susceptible to local practices in a manner that did not arise in the Eastern Christian communities. When abuses of power were not effectively addressed in the hierarchical organization operating in Europe, the authorities faced greater criticism. Unauthorized practices sometimes placed unacceptable burdens on local Christians. Additionally, continuing threats from external forces occupied the attention of authorities. Where there were concerns for survival and the ability to practice the faith, distinctions between matters of faith and more social matters became blurred. The availability of new information as well as the emerging technology changed the intellectual landscape and provided new communication channels and a wider voice for calls to reform the church.

The development of mass-produced movable metal type for use in a printing press process revolutionized duplication of printed materials. Johannes Gutenberg's first major production runs (about 1440 CE) were ecclesiastical indulgences. Indulgences at that time were certificates issued by the Church authorities that people voluntarily purchased. The certificate entitled the person who purchased it to a remission of a specified amount of time—for example, 365 days of penance due for sins committed in this life. Penance is understood as restitution for offenses committed. The concept survives in Roman Catholicism without the issuance of certificates and with the financial component replaced by a performance of specified actions such as prayer. For example, one can now gain a plenary indulgence if one celebrates the sacraments of penance and the Eucharist. After the printing of indulgences, Gutenberg's first major production was about 200 copies of the Bible in about 1455 with subsequent improvements. The mechanization of the printing process marks a social change in western Europe, which led to consequences that are still operating.

The sale of indulgences and the purchase of jobs working for the church authorities—also known as the sin of simony—are two examples of practices that earned supporters and critics. For some, the raising of funds was seen as pragmatic and necessary for the work to be done, while for critics, the same fund-raising activities were impediments to participation in the community. The practicalities of the situation can also be seen in the example of the Bishop of Worcester in England who at one point was an Italian who lived and worked in Rome, Italy, but was paid by the community in Worcester whom he had never seen. In the king's view, the bishop was providing a service as the ecclesiastical diplomatic agent of the King of England to the pope in Rome and so was entitled to be paid from England. Critics could equally object to the arrangement as an abuse in requiring a payment by local people who did not obtain personal services in return. This was not the only example of the exercise of the king's power and its effect on papal authority and access to resources.

By 1496 CE, the call for reform was the principal topic of daily conversation. By 1500 CE, if the need for reformation of the Western church was generally accepted, there was little agreement as to the solution. The discussions were fed by the availability of information, ideas, and solutions propagated by deployment of printing presses and a plurality of voices. In these discussions, the general presumption was the continuation of the Roman Church, which was thought to be eternal. Reformation meant the elimination of abuses, the suppression of those minority groups who deviated from the established community, and the restoration of the authority of the church. It was then and still is the expectation that the clergy are to be the conscience of the community and to be held responsible for reforms to curb the competing powers, including those of the king. It was in this task that the church appeared to have failed.

Western European Christian Denominations: The Reformation and Its Aftermath

Erasmus was the preeminent humanist of his time. His teachings and actions in making paraphrased versions of the Bible easily available helped set up a contrast between what the ideal called for and the reality. In doing so, he laid a foundation for later reformers, which he later regretted. The better known person who followed was Martin Luther (1483–1546 CE), a Roman Catholic Augustinian monk and biblical scholar who also sought to raise the standard of practice in the Church. He eventually became known for a list of 95 theses against indulgences, which he nailed to the door of the local church. It was not his intention to separate from the Roman church, but his efforts at protesting the failure to stem abusive practices and calls for reform by about 1517 CE provided the focus for an unintended revolution.

Luther's denunciation of the indulgences got the attention of the people, which attracted a response from the church authorities. Through discussions with his opponents, his focus on the indulgence was redirected and escalated into a challenge to papal authority. His position was then alleged to be the same as that of John Hus, who had previously been denounced at the Council of Chalcedon and who, when he refused to recant, was excommunicated.

Luther's treatment by his superiors propelled him into the position of leader of a revolution in Germany supported mostly by peasants. His initial support among the more powerful authorities was diminished when the revolution became a direct challenge to papal position and a threat to unity in the Church. However, with the majority of the people preferring to sever connections with Rome, at a meeting in Speyer in 1529, several princes delivered a protest against the proceedings of the emperor of Germany and the Catholic princes. The name "Protestant" is derived from this protest. Germany was divided, and a league of Protestant nations formed, changing the political landscape by introducing a third political power alongside Rome and the Catholic princes. The Turks also presented a threat. The interaction between these four prominent political powers influenced the emergence and continuity of the Protestant Christian denominations.

While Luther's triggering issue was with Roman Catholic practice, subsequent discussions and disagreements were between reformers. So, although the Roman Church also reformed, the period of the Reformation provided a variety of denominations that sought to distinguish themselves from each other. Philip Melancthon, for instance, provided alternative views, and his followers came to be known as Philippists. Less well-known reformers include Flavius Illyricus, Bucer, and Oecolampadius.

A central point of contention between Luther, Ulrich Zwingli, John Calvin, and other reformers was the differing meanings ascribed to the expression "This is my body," attributed to Jesus, who offered bread to his disciples at his last supper with them before he died. On this issue, for instance, Luther accepted the Roman Church's teaching that in the liturgy, the bread did really become the body of Christ—the "real presence" view. Calvin and others rejected that view. Further distinction developed when some preferred to explain the expression to mean that the body of Christ was communicated "with" the bread rather than "in" the bread. Besides differing views over the real presence issue, denominational distinctions also involved varying views on a belief in saints, the relationship between church and state, the views of what constituted simplifying, what was essential, whether or not the Bible could be read in the vernacular, how much weight was to be given to the writings in the Bible, and what if any extra-biblical sources were acceptable as authorities in faith.

The distribution of different western Christian denominations originally part of the Roman Church in Europe was largely determined by the location of its leader and the ruler's choice. Additionally, an emerging sense of nationality and political interests operated alongside religious interests in different ways across Europe. While Lutherans were to be found mostly in northern Germany, the south continued to be in association with the Church in Rome. In Denmark and Sweden, the political interests were more significant than the religious. In England, under King Henry VIII, the Reformation was political, with the King resisting ecclesiastical reform, though the legendary account focuses on the refusal of the pope to grant Henry VIII a divorce, thus precipitating the break with Rome. According to some views, the English position appeared to be the same as that of the Roman Church, with the king replacing the pope as supreme ecclesiastical authority and preferring but not requiring clerical celibacy. Official positions sometimes arguably did not represent practice. For instance, even where some denominations rejected the elevation of some Christians to be martyrs and saints, they did consider their leaders and those of their own denomination who were brutally executed to be exemplary persons. Similarly, where some would only accept the biblical writings as the authority (Latin sola scriptura), they still had to contend with the views of translators and the absence of a single version of the writings.

Within a year of Luther's death, German Lutherans were almost destroyed by the Emperor Charles V who was free to attend to domestic matters as a result of a temporary lull in the wars with the Turks and the French. Following the battle of Muhlberg in 1547 CE, under the Augsburg Interim settlement, he permitted marriage for the clergy and the administration of communion under both species of bread and wine in Eucharistic celebrations. The effect of the settlement was to divide the Lutherans, and when war with the Turks erupted again, they managed to gain the help of the French and achieved the Peace of Augsburg in 1555 CE. Principally providing physical safety to Protestant states, the agreement also included the principle later known by the Latin phrase cujus regio ejus religio, which meant that the people were to follow the religion of their ruler. Alternatively, they could either keep the peace or leave the kingdom. Later social realities effectively inverted the operation of the principle, as in England, with the ruler required to follow the religion of the people or abdicate. Until the Edict of Nantes in 1598 CE, the principle of one religion in one kingdom (in French, un roi, une loi, une foi) prevailed everywhere in Europe.

Following the Edict of Nantes, which permitted subjects in France to follow a different religion from that of the ruler, the trend continued with the growing sense of nationalism. For instance, the Dutch Reformers obtained the support of Catholics in opposing the Spanish rule in Holland. Subsequently, and to varying degrees and at various times, nations developed predominant rather than exclusive Christian denominations. Other major western European Christian denominations include the Huguenots in France, followers of Zwingli and the Calvinists centered in Berne and Geneva in Switzerland, Roman Catholics in France and Spain, the Reformed Church in Holland, and Presbyterians in Scotland. Even where a separation between church and state was alleged, in practice, rules still sought and obtained control over the kingdom through control of the Christian churches.

The Roman Church held the Council of Trent, which took place in various stages and in different places between 1545 and 1563 and addressed issues raised by the reformers. While the Roman Church insisted on the use of the Latin translation of the Bible—the Vulgate—in its liturgies, in practice, Catholics were involved in translating the scriptures into other languages. The availability of the Codex Vaticanus in the Vatican Library contributed to the task of translation. The decrees of the Council of Trent were determinative of the life and structure of the Roman Church and its ecclesiastical interaction with the traditions of western reform Christianity up to the last Vatican Ecumenical Council II.

The European Renaissance and the Age of Reason (about 1650 CE to 1800 CE) that followed provide the more recent backdrop to current realities for Christianity in the West. Philosophers such as René Descartes (1596–1650) advocating reason as the normative value encouraged scientific investigation and a secular society in competition to the Christian denominations. Some of these ideas gained acceptability within Christian denominations. For example, Gregor Mendel (1822–1884), an Augustinian monk, made a systematic study of plant breeding in the monastery garden and developed a mathematical formula that has led to his recognition as the father of the science of genetics.

European groups and ideas translocated to the New World and imposed themselves on the Aboriginal peoples. The European doctrine of terra nullius as applied to the land they encountered across the Atlantic provided a justification to continue European forms of Christianity, initially by the authority of European monarchs and subsequently independently of them.

In Canada and Australia, for instance, the head of state has been Queen Elizabeth II, who is a constitutional monarch of the United Kingdom and also head of the Church of England—known as the Anglican Church in Canada and the Episcopal Church in the United States. French Catholics also established control in parts of Canada and the United States; the southern territory of the United States was dominated by Spanish Catholics in the West and Portuguese Catholics in the East. European Catholic and Protestant denominations initially settled in different parts of the continent and subsequently moved to other parts. Quakers initially settled in Pennsylvania, Catholics in Maryland, and the Dutch Reformed Church in New Amsterdam, now known as New York. Minority Christian denominations in European lands found new opportunity in the New World. Lutherans from Sweden, Huguenots from France, Baptists from England, and Presbyterians from Scotland moved across the Atlantic.

The dominance of the Age of Reason (ca. 1648–1800) explicitly or implicitly shifted the starting point of belief for consideration and acceptance of Jesus as Lord to that which is materially verifiable. With the attitude that all prior history unless it was demonstrably reasoned, was inferior, ambivalence in religious matters and an interest in social order became more prevalent. For instance, people such as Benjamin Franklin in the United States stated that he was agnostic about the divinity of Jesus because he had not studied it. However, he did not see harm in believing that Jesus is God if the consequence is the implementation of Jesus' teachings.

The impetus of the Reformation encouraged an interest in returning to a genuine faith in Christ, which continued through the 20th century. The success of George Whitefield's revival sermons after his arrival from England in 1739 and that of others may be noted among the new movements. Jonathan Edwards was another who sought to motivate his hearers to seek salvation by detailing the consequences for those who do not have personal faith in Christ. Whitefield (1714–1770) was a personal friend of John Wesley (1703–1791), also a revivalist preacher who differed with him on the doctrine of predestination. The group founded by Wesley eventually became the Methodists.

An additional development was the reliance on science, which for some meant an alternative to reliance on Christ and a religious skepticism. The coexistence of skeptic and true believer along with traditional church communities required toleration for each other at least in some sense. The 20th-century World Wars, the Nazi regime, the Holocaust, the Pax Americana, and the establishment of the state of Israel transformed the political landscape. A formerly dualistic competition between the Christian-dominated nations of Europe and the Islamic-dominated nations to the east became an unprecedented competition for Jerusalem between political powers aligned with the three Abrahamic religions.

The Ecumenical Movement and Other Recent Developments

One of the most significant developments in the 20th century in the experience of Christian churches has been the rise of an ecumenical movement (Greek Oikumene), in which churches seek reconciliation, reunion, and restoration of oneness; the hope is to reverse centuries of history marked by separation and withdrawal of churches from one another—a sad history of confronting, competing, and criticizing each other in a bitter rivalry that descended to name-calling, insult, and even to internecine warfare. The ecumenical movement sought to change the goals and methods for churches to relate with each other and to seek an appropriate form of unity that would enable both an immediate common Christian work and an eschatological hope for the restoration of the broken unity of Christian believers, “that they may all be one” (John 17:21).

The ecumenical movement acquired a diverse complexion. This concern for dialogue between differing religious traditions involved a Jewish-Christian dialogue, which was complemented by a three-way process with the addition of the Islamic traditions. Even within the Christian context, ecumenism meant dialogue between Christian traditions. In the North American context, ecumenism may be seen in the formation of the Canadian Council of Churches in 1944 and the World Council of Churches in 1948.

But this search for ecumenism carried with it a profound dilemma. From the outset, the defining goal of ecumenical discussions was the creation of more unified churches. From the formal founding of the World Council of Churches, many leaders of the movement used the phrase “full structural unity” to define its aim. Idealists even dreamed of restoring full world communion. Yet, paradoxically, this hope emerged at just the same time as profound challenges in 20th-century culture shook traditional foundations and assumptions, including the core tenets of religion itself. In this situation, churches were prompted to reevaluate and re-enunciate their own special traditions—their roots of certitude in the faith. In this way, key differences in tradition between churches were sharpened just at the time when the Christian movement entered into a serious effort to achieve ecumenical unity. “Full structural unity” came to be seen as remote wishful thinking or even as a detrimental threat to tradition. This was fully acknowledged by the World Council in the Toronto Statement of 1950, which stated explicitly that ecumenism was not a search for a “super-church.” The ecumenical atmosphere remained at best cautious—for various reasons, the Roman Catholic Church has never joined the World Council as a full member—and at worst, argumentative and even antagonistic.

The common interest in the Bible, the work of producing more current vernacular translations of biblical texts, and the study of the texts using modern analytical methods brought scholars of various traditions together. At the same time, interpretive and editorial attempts to improve earlier renderings that have been a continuing issue from the earliest times, as can be seen in the Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus, have not abated. The variations have not been helpful for those who seek to obtain a uniform interpretive result and to reduce strains between various Christian communities.

For the Roman Church traditions, the calling of the Second Vatican Council by Pope John XXIII (1965) with the agenda of aggiornamento or updating provided an occasion to restate central doctrines and revive ancient practices. The process involved a wide consultative process, including scholars from within the Roman church and beyond, which helped forge new channels of communications and appreciation of common themes. The dialogical processes that formed at that council complemented the ecumenical discussions within the Christian communities and with the other Abrahamic religions. While the focus remained on issues arising out of the European and American histories, there was an incipient recognition of other traditions within and beyond the Abrahamic religions.

With continuing change at the end of the 20th century, the predominance of capitalism, and an awareness of global issues, such as environmental concerns, new discourses emerged. Otherwise secular institutions such as the World Economic Forum based in Davos, Switzerland, describe a perceived crisis of values. Calls have been heard for an emerging reintegration of economy and religion and a reconstitution of society that includes environmental considerations. While the configuration of Christianity with its interpretive and structural diversity has evolved, in many essential respects, its adherents have retained continuity in their reliance on the founding image of Jesus, known as the Christ.

CHRISTMAS

Authorized by narratives in two of the Gospel books of the Christian Bible, Matthew and Luke, and providing a prequel to New Testament Christology, Christmas celebrates the coming of God to earth through the birth of Jesus Christ. It is Christianity's second greatest festival, after Easter, and during this season the Church becomes a theater of incarnation. The apostle Paul claimed that Christ born in Bethlehem can still be located on earth: The Church as the body of Christ is the continuing extension of the incarnation.

A full account of Christmas requires a theological ear for what is irreducibly religious but also a sociological imagination for its holy day/holiday presence in lived Christianity, where the categories of sacred and profane are continuously scrambled, and an anthropological appreciation for the formation of a distinctive Christian material culture inside the Church and its exuberant and uncontrollable migrations beyond it. Already in its early centuries, the Church set Christmas amid the winter solstice, a time long given to Roman celebrations, raising the question whether Christianity would indelibly mark material culture or whether the long history of the pagan festival would undermine Christian intent.

Christmas displays the risk of incarnation. As festival spins God into every matter, Christianity becomes complicit in forces it cannot control. Religious props soon enough are embraced and embellished on every worldly stage. Celebrations of Christmas migrate from great cathedrals to their public squares and markets and, later, to homes and villages—a multivalent incarnational extravagance.

Religious traditions always reflect a tension between original intention and contemporary realization. While sacred texts authorize religious festivals, they do not control their evolution. Embedding Christmas in a Christian liturgical year, preceded by the four-week preparatory season of Advent, was meant to situate it in sacred time and space. But narratives, characters, motives, and their ritualizations do not stay put as enthusiastic crowds carry them, along with the Christ child, to ever new sites. Hence, many Christians over the years have questioned whether Christmas should be staged at all, arguing that sensuous delight more likely distracts from rather than carries spiritual presence. Many have questioned whether the avalanche of material culture (presents, wrapping, toys, feasting, Santa Claus, family, kitsch and carols, and trees and lights) has buried the original significance.

Christian theologians assert that a festival of incarnation reaffirms that God's creation is good, that Christmas balances the emphasis on the death of Christ, that it carries the good news that God wants to be present on earth, in the midst of the human condition. But many, inside and outside Christianity, lament as inevitable the commodification of culture and religion and now claim that Christmas has reached its apogee as a sacrament of consumer culture, with global capitalism rather than Christianity as the host. But to dismiss

Christmas as the triumph of consumer capitalism over religion as its rival worldview misses too many of the meanings of Christmas and seems to accept the values of the market as the final stage of human evolution.

CHURCH WORLD SERVICE

The Church World Service (CWS) is a cooperative ministry founded in 1946 and is composed of 35 Protestant, Orthodox, and Anglican denominations and communions. As a Christian nongovernmental organization and in line with the best practices of Christian values, CWS provides services to individuals and communities in crisis around the world. Its mission is to connect Christians with partners to create intercultural and interreligious coalitions aimed at eradicating poverty, hunger, and other social injustices as well as promoting peace in a global context.

CWS offers programs globally that support sustainable grassroots development, disaster relief, and refugee assistance. This organization gives focus to education and advocacy in efforts to raise awareness about hunger-related issues and lend voice to the concerns of its partners and constituents. CWS seeks to nurture growth and development globally through education and innovation and empowering its partners to take an active role in the progress of their communities. It confronts the root causes of hunger and works toward food security through the protection of land rights, nutrition education, and food diversification. CROP (Communities Responding to Overcoming Poverty) Hunger Walks have become a major fundraising effort by CWS in the fight against hunger as well as for international relief and development.

Providing potable water and establishing an ecosystem-based management that allows for the purification and sustainability of water is also part of CWS's mission. In addition, this organization aims to raise awareness about poverty, the AIDS epidemic, human rights issues, and peace building. The efforts of CWS located within the United States also have an international focus and work toward promoting fair national and international policies.

CWS responds to emergencies worldwide and primarily focuses its efforts on individuals and communities who are vulnerable in the aftermath of disaster. The organization partners with communities to identify their needs and access resources for survival and long-term recovery in addition to providing physical assistance during crises. Through its Immigrant and Refugee Program, CWS is proactive in meeting the needs of immigrants, refugees, and asylum seekers and assists with resettlement efforts along with other legal, professional, and chaplaincy services. In addition, immigration reform and political advocacy have become an important focus for this organization.

Some have claimed that CWS has made use of its efforts and the advantage of globalization to proselytize. However, CWS maintains that its humanitarian work has been grounded in service rather than evangelism and provides assistance to those in need regardless of religious background.

CHURCHES

The English word church comes from the Greek word ekklesia (ecclesia), a term that literally means “the people of the Lord,” and from the third century has signified the community of Christian believers. Today the term church is applied primarily to fellowships of followers of Christ, yet the term has also been applied more broadly to refer to the gathering of the faithful in Buddhist and other religious communities.

Some scholars argue that prior to the emergence of Christianity in the Mediterranean region, the Greco-Roman populace of antiquity used the term ecclesia to refer to an association of free male Roman citizens, thus establishing boundaries on gender and citizenship. According to Yale New Testament professor Abraham Malherbe, the early Christian church was an “alternative community” that nevertheless had commonalities with other Greco-Roman societies, such as offering a home to socially uprooted, alienated individuals seeking a substitute to the dominant culture. What distinguished the early church communities from other volunteer societies of the Greco-Roman world was the makeup of its members and the center around which the community found its identity and unity together. The social makeup of early churches was strikingly egalitarian compared with similar volunteer associations of the Greco-Roman world. Starting as house fellowships, where followers of Christ would gather to pray and read letters from the disciples of Christ and early church leaders, thus gaining comfort and guidance in a context of subjugation, such household gatherings were characterized by a relativization of social statuses within the household of faith. In the words of the biblical writers, “For there is no difference between Jew and Gentile—the same Lord is Lord of all and richly blesses all who call on him” (Romans 10:12) and “There is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus” (Galatians 3:28). In the biblical vision of the church—the gathering of the followers of Jesus Christ—social statuses are relativized under the banner of God’s new covenantal relationship with human beings, broadening the notion of God’s elect to include all people, male or female, slave or free.

Whereas the first distinct mark of the early Christian church is its social composition, a second distinguishing quality of the church is its theological content—its central affirmation that Jesus Christ is Lord and the concomitant commitment to be a community of believers guided by the example given by the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The message itself was quite radical given the cultural and religious constraints of the time—for a Jewish sect to open the covenantal promises of that tradition and widen the interpretation of Jesus’ message as one that was not just for Jews but also for all peoples (e.g., Gentiles as well), regardless of ethnicity or gender. Though the Christian church started in the first-century Greco-Roman world, in a matter of a few 100 years its center of gravity had moved to the eastern Mediterranean (e.g., Constantinople), then to northern Europe (e.g., Ireland), then throughout the Americas, Africa, Asia, and the Pacific. Since the 1980s, there has been a massive shift in the demographic spread of Christianity worldwide, with more Christians in the Global South than in the Global North. This enormous southward shift, which has made Africa, Asia, and Latin America the global centers of church expansion, has given rise to a proliferation of kinds of churches, at once reflecting the specific struggles and opportunities presented by each social, cultural, and religious environment out of which the church has emerged as well as generating greater global connections through denominational and intradenominational conferences and ecumenically oriented missions and ministries.

Comparatively—and an issue of great importance today—members of churches in the North Atlantic region are decreasing in numbers. This is especially true in the mainline Protestant churches, which have been decreasing in membership for decades, whereas growth is occurring in Pentecostal, charismatic, and more conservative independent churches. When understanding the church worldwide, it is crucial to recognize the immense influence that the surrounding social, cultural, political, religious, and economic context plays in the self-understanding of the church and its actions in any given community. In fact, the context of churches in part makes each church so apparently distinct that many have commented that there are many Christianities located throughout the world.

A third distinguishing mark of the Christian church universally, thus all local Christian churches, is its ontological identity. Christian churches are called the “body of Christ,” since it is believed that Jesus Christ dwells in the midst of the gathering of his followers. As such, the church is the body of Christ in the world and, at its best, functions as Christ did, by being an agent of reconciliation with God, an advocate of justice, and a channel of healing, service, and compassion to all people engaged in these activities, even to the point of suffering persecution for being a witness to the presence of the Kingdom of God. The existential nature of the church as the body of Christ illuminates its mission in the world—to be active an agent of reconciliation in the world by being at once a sign and instrument of the presence of God (i.e., the kingdom of God). In addition, churches are responsible for mission, worldwide. At the 1939 ecumenical meeting at Tambaram, India, church leaders reported that world evangelism was the church’s obligation.

Historically, Christian churches have been divided broadly into three main categories: Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox with a subset of Oriental Orthodox, and Protestant. Yet this overly simplistic tripartite division of the church universal fails to capture fully the immense range of churches worldwide. To understand Christian churches globally, it is helpful to recognize that there are not only Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant churches but also numerous independent churches (e.g., African Initiated Churches) that reflect more directly and intensely the cultural, spiritual, psychological, and social makeup of local believers rather than that of the historic churches that have advanced through the Christian missionary movement. Several of these independent churches, which can be Pentecostal-charismatic in their orientation, replete with spiritual deliverance, physical healings, and all-night prayer meetings, have emerged as massive movements following a traditional spiritual, prophet-leader (e.g., Simon Kimbangu, Isaiah Shembe) whose combination of charismatic healing and prophecy attracts millions of adherents. If the growth of the churches continues along the trajectory established in the first decade of the 21st century, Africa will be the continent with the world’s largest numbers of Christians. Scholars note that of all Christian churches, it is the Pentecostal-charismatic-oriented churches that are growing the fastest worldwide, with leaders of such Pentecostal fellowships in the Global South making their way to the Global North, where they are engaging in healing and spiritual deliverance in churches located in modern, urban centers.

There are numerous ways to understand types of churches, ranging from their ethnic or racial makeup (e.g., Black church, Asian church), regional affiliation (e.g., Church of England, Roman Catholic), theological commitment (e.g., Wesleyan, Calvinist), liturgical rite (e.g., Roman Rite, Divine Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom), and even worship style (e.g., Pentecostal, Reformed, contemporary). Notwithstanding the various ways to understand the vastly broad movement of churches, the global connections created by Christian churches, whereby church leaders and parishioners share fellowship, mission strategies, and worship, have made churches among the most influential social institutions worldwide, yielding at times enormous political weight in part because of the sheer numbers in their congregations and denominations. Among immigrant communities, churches are often the only social institution that enables the ongoing relational identities and the production of new social and spiritual persons required to successfully engage global and social realities of the late-modern period. The global linkage of the churches has enabled them to communicate to one another via the Internet, mobile phones, and other current technologies that have given many a sense of living in a smaller world, marked by a hitherto unparalleled access to distant locations at any time of the day or night. Beyond their social realities, churches help mediate the human-divine relationship, since it is believed that God speaks to the worshipping community through the sacraments, shared fellowship, and proclamation of the good news (i.e., kerygma) that through Jesus' death and resurrection, there is reconciliation with God.

CINEMA

“God is box office,” a remark attributed to Cecil B. DeMille, has remained pertinent as religious films retain their global popularity more than 100 years after the advent of cinema. As a major icon of modernity, cinema might have been expected to ignore religion; instead, it has played an important role in disseminating religious belief and practice, with film showing a natural affinity for depicting the religious because of its aesthetic qualities; its narratives, spectacle, music, and performance; and the sense of wonder it conveys even today. Cinema is part of the continuing history of the mediated nature of religion itself and adds a new layer to centuries of images, plays, songs, storytelling, and other forms.

Religion is present in cinema not only in terms of theology, stories of religious figures, or the depiction of divine intervention in the lives of humans but also through cinema's ability to create new mythologies, in the powerful stories that give meaning to life, and in its central concerns with spirituality and morality, showing the way the world is and what it should be. Religion may also be present as part of wider culture because so many European and American films show Christian beliefs and festivals, just as Indian cinema is dominated by Hindu ways of life.

Religious cinema has flourished even though films are usually produced under censorship codes that pay particular attention to specific religious forms—whether it is the Christian, particularly Roman Catholic, influence on the U.S. Motion Picture Production (Hays) Code of 1930 or the Islamic codes of postrevolutionary Iran.

Biblical and Christian Films

Hollywood's early films included biblical epics—that is, films that took their stories from the Old and New Testaments. For many people, these films shaped their knowledge of the texts and created images of the prophets and others that became standard, while their use of spectacle in miracles was astounding. God himself rarely appeared in Old Testament films—and then, as nothing more than a voice—although the image of Jesus was portrayed. These films shared generic features with the great historical epics—major stars, exotic locations and costumes, and casts of thousands, such as in The Ten Commandments (directed by Cecil B. DeMille, 1923 and 1956) and the later epic Ben Hur, directed by William Wyler in 1956, whose subtitle is A Tale of the Christ, where the Christian message is more subdued.

European cinema also made many religious films, with the Italian neorealists creating powerful images of Jesus, in the Gospel According to Saint Matthew (directed by Pier Paolo Pasolini, 1967), and of saints, notably Francis of Assisi, and popularized as well in melodramas such as The Song of Bernadette (directed by Henry King, 1943) to the very British satire on Anglicanism, Monty Python's Life of Brian (directed by Terry Jones, 1979).

At the beginning of the 21st century, it seemed that films in the West were focusing on new forms of religion and angels and individual spirituality rather than traditional theological topics. However, the success of Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ (2004), with its overtly Roman Catholic view of the crucifixion, suggests that there remains a huge and enduring market for narratives based on traditional theological forms and approaches.

New forms of religion that are emerging in different parts of the world and new concerns of changing societies are reflected in cinema. It is striking that many of these films favor a melodramatic mode, in which tensions are negotiated and modernity and enlightenment rationality are critiqued, while “family values” and traditional codes of morality are upheld.

Films rooted in Pentecostal Christianity have become enormously popular in West Africa since the relatively inexpensive technologies of videotapes and now digital discs have allowed a proliferation of low-budget feature films to be disseminated. These films do not show holy figures but are about religious practices. The Ghanaian Pentecostal films emphasize urban modernity and consumerism, competing to address their devotees as consumers and clients, creating a Pentecostal public culture.

The more famous Nigerian cinema, Nollywood, dating from the 1960s, grew with digital camera and televising of theater productions on rapidly growing television stations. These are made in southern Nigeria, mostly in English, and are very popular in Nigeria and the rest of Africa and among its diaspora, where they now seriously rival the products of Hollywood. Such films depict a Pentecostalist view of traditional African religion as witchcraft based on possession and magic in what has been called a “cinema of outrage” as it aims to shock with its social themes combining melodrama with the horror genre.

Hinduism

India has two genres that depict Hindu theology—namely, the mythological and the devotional. The former is defined largely in terms of its narratives, which draw on Hindu myths and legends, the oldest versions of which are found in ancient Sanskrit texts such as the Puranas. However, cinema has drawn more heavily on India's two great epics, the Mahabharata and the Ramayana. The mythological was largely pushed into the B-movie circuit in the 1950s, where it has continued to flourish, with a brief resurgence in the 1970s when it famously spread the cult of a previously minor goddess, Santoshi Maa. In the late 1980s, the government relaxed its restrictions on the depiction of religion on television, where the mythological enjoyed phenomenal success in the new form of religious soap operas, especially serialized versions of the Hindu epics.

The second religious genre comprises films about devotees, drawing on India's rich premodern bhakti (“loving devotion”) traditions, narrating the often miraculous lives of India's many medieval singer-saints, who are associated with the traditions of bhakti, where the devotee's deeply personal and emotional relation to the deity is often expressed in song. This genre was particularly closely associated with Gandhian politics in the 1930s.

Many religious references can be found in ostensibly nonreligious Indian films, which are largely seen as a nongeneric category, most grouped into the “social” or “masala” film category. These contain many depictions of religion—religious communities, festivals, ceremonies, or divine intervention—and also raise and address issues that are central to religion such as virtue, suffering, and redemption.

Cinema and Islamic Cultures

While Islam prohibits the depiction of the divine or its prophets in human form, many films focus on Islam as part of culture and society. Arab cinema more often deals with religion in terms of political issues such as the Arab-Israeli conflict, while Indonesian cinema looks at Islam as part of a broader national culture. Many cinemas worldwide deal with the Islamic resurgence, whether made in Pakistan (Khuda ke liye, directed by Shoaib Mansoor, 2007) or the United States, though with expectedly very different treatments. India, which has one of the world's largest Muslim populations, though they form a religious minority, has a number of "Islamicate" genres, including the Muslim social and nostalgic subgenres, such as the courtesan film, while historical films raise issues concerning the position of Muslims in contemporary India.

Islamic states have varied in their treatment of cinema. The Taliban forbade all cinema in Afghanistan, whereas Iranian cinema has flourished since the revolution in the Islamic Republic, producing major art films that have won international acclaim, with filmmakers such as Abbas Kiarostami and Mohsen Makhmalbaf. These films are produced under strict censorship and largely avoid criticism of religion, although there is social criticism. There is also a popular Iranian cinema that promotes Islamic values in more melodramatic modes.

Buddhism and Other East Asian Religions

Religion in east Asia often appears as part of national cultural history. Japanese films display Shinto and Buddhist elements, and although they often say little directly about religion, they incorporate themes, whether in Yasujiro Ozu's transcendental Zen style or anime's use of mythology and ritual as part of a wider Japanese culture of combining religion and entertainment. Korean films use Buddhism to address contemporary issues—for example, Spring, Summer, Autumn, Winter . . . and Spring (directed by Ki-duk Kim, 2003). China's many religions, which are controlled by a central communist ideology, appear in the form of culture in life rituals and ancestor worship, while Hong Kong's supernatural films and ghost stories, such as A Chinese Ghost Story (directed by Siu-Tung Ching, 1987), are banned in China along with science fiction and horror films.

Films are among the most global of all media, circulating beyond the areas where they were made and the communities of believers who were the initially intended audiences. These films may even come to represent those people and their religious beliefs. For example, Hindi films circulate among Muslim communities overseas who may have a very different view of religious issues from Indian Muslims. Many people consume several types of film and media even in a single day, and the audience's experience of religion in the film cannot be ignored.

CIVIL RELIGION

Civil religion became a popular topic of discussion in the sociology of religion during the late 1960s with the publication of Robert Bellah's essay "Civil Religion in America." The definition of civil religion has been a major point of contention throughout the debate, but Bellah initially writes of it as the religious dimension of civil life marked off by rituals, discourse, myths, beliefs, and symbols that unify the national community and point the nation toward proper domestic and international action. And even though previous researchers had written about similar topics in similar terms, Bellah's article struck a chord in the academy and was picked up by social commentators in the following years. But the origins of the term are found much earlier.

Jean-Jacques Rousseau and Civil Religion

While many writers have traced civil religion back to ancient Greece and the Roman Empire, Jean-Jacques Rousseau was the first to use the term civil religion in his work, The Social Contract. Rousseau claimed that religion, and specifically Christianity, was antithetical to the cohesion of a political community. He believed that Christianity divided the allegiance of citizens between this world and the world of the afterlife. But Rousseau recognized that religion afforded legitimacy and authority to all known civil systems and that such a means to legitimacy and authority was necessary for good citizens and a properly functioning state. To implement his social contract without the entanglements of otherworldly religion while retaining that authority, Rousseau posited a civil religion that the state would recognize and maintain. This civil religion would consist of basic religious principles that all members of the society could agree upon without reference to a particular religion and its particular otherworldly concerns. This civil religion would consist of six simple, unembellished doctrines: (1) the existence of a benevolent deity; (2) the next life, where (3) the good are happy and (4) the wicked are punished; and (5) the sacred nature of the laws and the contract. These are the five positive doctrines. The sole negative doctrine is the rejection of intolerance, which is yet another reason for the exclusion of particular religious traditions from civil religious consideration.

From this viewpoint, civil religion is state controlled. According to Rousseau, the state sets the doctrines and enforces them on pain of banishment or death. And while such a civil religion may not have ever existed, at least not for any significant period of time, Rousseau's influence on the subject remains.

Émile Durkheim and Civil Religion

While Émile Durkheim never used the term civil religion, he saw himself developing a science of morality derived from and reinforcing social solidarity throughout his work. France was in turmoil after facing defeat in war with Germany in 1870, and the nation had been through seven governments and 14 constitutions since 1789. The rise of the Third Republic was an attempt to give new life to French Revolutionary principles. A morality grounded in society would find its legitimacy in that grounding and would be a force for stability in this republican form of government, which needed, as all republics do, a strong moral basis. Like so many other thinkers in tumultuous eras, Durkheim strove to develop an orderly system for a time of disorder and instability. Bellah attempts to do the same in The Broken Covenant and "Religion and the Legitimation of the American Republic." Like Durkheim's concern with military defeat and political unrest, Bellah's concern in these works is that the experiences of Vietnam and Watergate undercut authority and trust in leadership, and this requires a rearticulation of the meaning of the republic and the civil religious covenant. Bellah's work in the 1980s goes on to deal with individualism as a reaction to the overtly self-interested use of authority in society. In much of Bellah's work, he attempts to show that this abuse was harmful in itself and in the reaction that it produced in Americans.

The beginning of civil religion in Durkheim is found in his concepts of solidarity—mechanical and organic—which arise from social contract theory. Mechanical solidarity requires the mass of members to conform to its principles, with punishment of various levels meted out to those violating that conformity, and this is found in systems such as law and religion. Meanwhile, the basic component of organic solidarity is justice. All contracts and all social solidarity are based on this principle, which transcends social circumstances. In this recognition of justice as the principal social ideal, Durkheim recognizes the "metaphysical" backing of society and the social contract. Furthermore, this sets social ideals off from state and church control, yet grounds them in the reality of social order. This separation of justice as a social ideal can be seen as the beginning of civil religious ideals, and their separation from state and church authority in the separation from mechanical solidarity indicates true civil religion's own transcendence while remaining grounded in the reality of society to which state and church also speak.

Another important civil religious concept for Durkheim is that the basis of modern society is the individual properly understood. Society must provide for the dignity of the individual, and this is accomplished first through justice, which implies equality under the law. This understanding of the individual's importance keeps society from assuming complete control over the individual and allows for internalization of the civil religion. While the civil religion provides an external contract or covenant with society or God, the internal control is necessary for both Durkheim and Bellah, in that only through this internalization will society and its constituent individuals remain faithful to the contract and reap the long-term rewards of social cohesion.

Durkheim takes pains to show that a national civil religion ought to avoid exceptionalism by focusing national ideals on human ideals. He is concerned with establishing an international civil religion or a “religion of humanity,” which cares for the human being in whatever condition without regard to nationality. Both Durkheim and Bellah see this as a possibility; indeed, both see it as the proper end of a national civil religion.

Robert Bellah and Civil Religion

While some scholars argue that the religious institutions of America teach “the American way of life,” Robert Bellah sets civil religion in America beside these institutions and claims that it must be investigated as any other religion (or religious dimension) would be. In his 1967 article “Civil Religion in America,” Bellah explains civil religion through its usage in one of the most important political ceremonies in the United States and, therefore, one of the most significant for civil religion—presidential inaugural addresses. In considering the three times John F. Kennedy mentions God during his inaugural speech, Bellah recognizes many of the features of American civil religion.

First, it is clear that American political discourse deals in and values religious concepts. Rather than a simple, empty ritual of American politics, Bellah sees the rituals and symbols invoked on such occasions as marking off fundamental values that may not present themselves in day-to-day life and discourse. And rather than being void of content, Bellah affirms the substance and specificity of civil religion as it concerns American myths and narratives, but he acknowledges its generality as necessary if the entire nation is to come to an understanding of itself.

Second, though American civil religion has traditionally been Protestant, civil religion and Christianity are distinct, but the two share symbols with each other. According to Bellah, the God of the civil religion is “Unitarian” and “austere,” in that God is related to order, law, and right. The reference in the Declaration of Independence to “the laws of Nature and of Nature’s God” points to a higher law that is not specific to a religion. But the God conceived in this process is not deistic since this God is active in history and has taken a particular interest in the United States as is seen most vividly in the rhetoric of America as the “New Israel,” which was invoked at the founding of the colonies and continues today.

Third, civil religion serves to constantly remind Americans of the divine foundation of their rights and to point them toward an end that transcends, yet is found through, the political process. This end, which has been a major civil religious theme since the Mayflower Compact, is the fulfillment of the will of God on earth, and it is obligatory for America and every American to measure up to this end. This concept was established at a crucial moment in the establishment of the civil religion, and it was restated in natural law terms in the Declaration of Independence.

The myths of America that connect it with Israel and “chosen-ness” were a product of the first crisis that the civil religion encountered, which was the struggle and eventual war for independence. This early period of the civil religion is connected to Hebraic/“Old Testament” stories of flood, oppression, and release, but the second crisis of civil war and slavery brought about a “New Testament” shift to American civil religion. Through the Civil War, Abraham Lincoln’s development of civil religious theology, and Lincoln’s death, the concept of sacrifice became a major theme in civil religious rhetoric along with Christian symbols of death and second birth.

After delineating the main aspects of the civil religion, Bellah contends with American civil religion’s third time of crisis, which deals with responsible global action. Bellah claims that navigation of this third time of trial requires a sustainable world order that would incorporate new international symbols into the American civil religion. If such a situation were obtained, American civil religion would be a part of a world civil religion, and we see that, as in the Durkheimian model, the fulfillment of American civil religion is international cooperation and synthesis, which would precipitate the world order needed for responsible global action.

In all this, Bellah brings the debate back around to the national needs that civil religion fills to make America what America should be. The civil religion is a means to guide America toward internal uprightness, which ought to make America a righteous example to the nations.

The Civil Religion Debate in America

After the publication of "Civil Religion in America," a lively and wide-ranging discussion began among various thinkers, especially in the area of church and state issues. A broad acceptance of the concept of civil religion was found in the sociology of religion, while historians of American religion were more broadly skeptical. Although it was by no means a universal feeling, sociologists of religion saw civil religion as at least a useful conceptual category for phenomena encountered in their work. And very soon after Bellah's article appeared, sociologists began to test for empirical verification of the thesis. This endeavor produced mixed results, the explanation for which was often the lack of a clear definition of civil religion. Indeed, Bellah restated his position on multiple occasions in response to what he believed were widely varying interpretations of his meaning.

These restatements often served to drive the debate even further, especially as Bellah claimed in 1975 that civil religion was "an empty and broken shell." Bellah claimed this in the context of the breaking of the national covenant with God through the enslavement of Africans and the violent removal of Native Americans. This critique of the historical construction and the contemporary, academic reconstruction of civil religion came from multiple thinkers and undercut the civil religious goals of broad national identity and unity as well as international incorporation.

Beyond the troubling issues of mixed empirical evidence and the exclusion of large segments of the population, historians leveled three critiques. First, the contention was made that the civil religion debate concerned a phenomenon whose time had passed, as is usual in historical investigation. Second, some claimed that the phenomena that sociologists meant to examine with the aid of this concept of civil religion were already accounted for in other concepts such as civic piety, public religion, and public theology. Finally, the episodic nature of civil religion's importance was attributed to its revitalizing nature; rather than being a constant expression of national identity, civil religion was said to be invoked only in times of crisis. This last critique applied to the historical record of civil religion as well as the contemporary construction of a civil religious reality that the academic debate brought with it.

Civil Religion Since the 1970s

The civil religion debate cooled off considerably in the mid-1980s after the torrent of texts previously produced. However, the concept has remained in use and has experienced a moderate "revival" in the first decade of the 21st century. Moving away from a Durkheimian model, which implies a single civil religion for a single society, American pluralism and the rise of the Religious Right in America brought about the greater use of an earlier (Weberian) view of civil religious types. For example, the division of traditionalist from progressive civil religions allows the use of civil religion as an analytical concept but avoids some of the problems of exclusion and verification. But this division into types of civil religion undercuts the civil religious goal of unity while providing for a more inclusive discourse on civil religion.

Though the concept of national myth has a long history in American scholarship, recent work on civil religion has used myth far more frequently. Although Bellah and other early thinkers dropped the concept of civil religion from their work in the face of the difficulties posed by the aforementioned critiques, national myth remains a popular concept in the analysis of national identity. As narrative constructions of historical reality, myths offer both continuity and flexibility, which earlier civil religious dialogue lacked.

Scholarly work on myth continues to carry the civil religious dialogue forward even though (or especially because) it is not necessarily a topic of civil religion. Most recently, scholars of American national myth have juxtaposed the binding intention of national myths to the divisive historical realities they describe. For example, Richard Hughes has critiqued the dominant culture's development and use of American myths through the lenses of African American and Native American experience. Hughes and others contend that national myths are marshaled to legitimize and lend authority to public and foreign policy decisions. But when reified, they can lead to an ossification of narrative meaning that turns the richness of myth into literal, absolute interpretations.

Civil Religion Around the Globe

On the global level, the proper eschatological goal of American civil religion is the attainment of or incorporation into an international civil religion—or that was the goal as Bellah assessed the third time of trial in America. In relation to other parts of the world, a Durkheimian understanding of civil religion assumes some level of functioning civil religious and ethnic symbols that is widely accepted. But some have argued that in comparison with other countries' civil religious situations, the American version works better because of American pluralism's softening of a particular religion's normally rigid symbol system to fit the need for broader acceptance among diverse peoples. However, comparative work on civil religion outside the United States further demonstrates the various forms that civil religion as an analytic concept may take for scholars. And most notable at the moment for the internationalization of civil religion is the question of the emergence of a global civil society. Certain scholars argue that the two concepts are mutually dependent on each other since civil society requires cultural glue, which civil religion supplies, and civil religion requires a cohesive, civil structure, which civil society supplies. The most promising prospect for such a situation may be in the rhetoric of international human rights. Still, the two concepts run into much the same issues, such as whether or not such a situation is definable and attainable or even desirable.

CIVIL SOCIETY

The notion of “civil society” has had a long history in Western political thought, but it has been revived in modern discourse because it is seen to be the panacea for many problems in contemporary society, such as the growth of individualism, anomie, and the fragmentation of society. In the past, the idea of civil society was seen to be a key aspect of any successful nation-state with a democratic polity, but in contemporary debates, the idea has been extended to analyze the possible development of transnational communities and the emergence of a world civil society. Having been once the preferred solution for the problems of the nation-state, civil society is now promoted as the answer to the extensive and negative issues facing the global order. This entry proposes that we call the early development of the concept—namely, the emergence of civil society and the nation state from the late 18th century onward—Stage 1. We can then refer to civil society in relation to the process of globalization, the emergence of transnational capitalism, and the development of the Internet and network society from the second half of the 20th century as Stage 2.

Religion has played an important part in both Stage 1 and Stage 2. To some extent, as we shall see, the notion of civil society is the product of the Enlightenment and its secular legacies—Marxism, positivism, and liberalism. Perhaps Immanuel Kant's essay that appeared in the Berlinische Monatsschrift in 1784 on the ideas of "a universal civil society" and of world peace is the first manifestation of the idea that democratic societies are unlikely to engage in mutually destructive warfare, and hence, the spread of Enlightenment ideas might also result in world peace. Kant argued that when people unite in a nation-state, they still have obligations to the rest of humanity. There would therefore be a two-tiered system of law relating to the nation-state and to the world or a "law of world citizenship" (ius cosmopolitanum) binding people into a commonwealth of nations. This union would not be simply a peace treaty but a league of peace (foedus pacificum). Kant's moral philosophy no longer required any transcendental justification from an almighty God but rested on a moral imperative to treat neighbors as we treat ourselves. It was therefore a secular theory of peace. This secular framework of the early theory of civil society suggests that religion would not play a large part in its subsequent history. But this was not the case. As we shall see, it was Jean-Jacques Rousseau who developed the idea that a civil religion would be fundamental to a successful society, and in subsequent debates, the Christian denominations came to be regarded as essential components of such a society. Finally, in contemporary philosophy, the idea of a postsecular society in the work of Jürgen Habermas has brought religion back into focus in both the national and the transnational contexts.

The present entry outlines this historical development and considers several theories that have argued that religion is a vital ingredient of any robust and effective set of civil society institutions. For various reasons, however, it is questionable whether this optimistic view of civil society as an institutional panacea of globalization and its problems can be sustained. The entry concludes by examining the limitations of the notion of civil society as a political solution to questions of identity, membership, and commitment. Global civil society is fragile and unstable, and there are powerful forces that will constrain its development. Any normative view of civil society, whether national or global, will have to address the empirical limitations of all actually existing forms of civil society.

The History of a Concept

In Western political theory, the concept of civil society was initially a product of the Scottish Enlightenment. Adam Ferguson in An Essay on the History of Civil Society in 1767 analyzed the historical shift from aristocratic to mercantile society and the decline of military society in favor of bourgeois society and its economic theory of international trade. Edinburgh was seen to be the ideal urban representative of the new civil society in contrast to the uncivilized tribal or warrior society of the Scottish Highlands. Civil society emerged with the collapse of feudalism and the creation of an urban space within which bourgeois life could develop. In Western political thought, a cluster of concepts—civil society, civility, civilization and citizenship—was associated with the social world of the bourgeois class. The rise of the theory of civil society was a product of the social crisis of the 18th century, which was created by massive economic changes under the impact of capitalist agriculture, early industrialization, and imperial expansion. There are of course many variations on this theory, but at their analytical core is the idea of a separation of spheres—in particular, the division between the political (the state), the economic (the market), and the social (civil society).

Civil society theory was rapidly developed in a critical line that connects G. W. F. Hegel, Karl Marx, Antonio Gramsci, and Jürgen Habermas. For Hegel, the emergence of civil society was one aspect of universal history that clearly distinguished the static societies of the Orient and the development of a universal consciousness in the Occident. In his The Philosophy of Right of 1821, he employed the notion of bürgerliche Gesellschaft to describe this emerging sphere of ethical life existing between the family or household (oikos) and the state. Marx adopted (and distorted) much of this Hegelian legacy, analyzing civil society in capitalism not as an ethical sphere but as an arena in which social classes with conflicting economic interests would struggle for power. He was skeptical of the civil liberties that were attached to modern society. In his Economic and Philosophical Manuscripts of 1844 and in the famous "Jewish Question," Marx complained that the political freedom of the individual was artificial, given the economic inequalities that constrained the working class. The political and the economic had to be recombined to overcome alienation. The development of the 20th-century theory of civil society begins with the Italian Marxist Antonio Gramsci. Recognizing the hold that the Roman Catholic Church had over the working class, Gramsci argued in the Prison Notebooks that any radical political party would have to struggle to secure moral authority in Italian society—that is, to achieve hegemonic control over class relations in civil society. Gramsci thereby provided the classical definition of civil society as an arena of freedom lodged between the dull compulsion of the market and the coercive power of the state. This theme was taken up by Habermas, who famously argued in The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere that the foundational institutions of bourgeois society—a free press, independent political parties, effective educational institutions, debating societies, and the cafe as the meeting place of intellectuals—had been eroded with the development of capitalism in which free communication is compromised, for example, by media monopolies.

There is an alternative liberal tradition of democratic theory in which the concept of civil society played a critical role. Its principal spokesman is the French aristocrat Alexis de Tocqueville. In his 1835 and 1840 two-volume Democracy in America, Tocqueville identified voluntary associations as a critical element in American democracy in a context where the frontier and the struggle against British colonial power had placed an emphasis on individualism, self-help, and local autonomy. Voluntary associations were not only fundamental to the actual survival of local communities, but they were also an antidote to the excessive emphasis on social equality. Without a robust network of such associations, the individual would be exposed to the force of mass opinion. Tocqueville's ideas were taken up in England by J. S. Mill who also feared that the force of mass opinion in a society of limited educational resources would overwhelm individual opinion. Democratic civil societies required a delicate balance between individual liberty, community, and government.

These facets of colonial America have survived within the liberal democratic tradition—fear of central government, an emphasis on local activism, the autonomy of religious congregations, and charitable investment in education. Another aspect of Tocqueville's vision of America was the idea that the "habits of the heart" were an important ingredient of democratic society. This theme was taken up by Robert Bellah and his colleagues in a survey of attitudes toward politics, in which they found that, while "politics" was often regarded with suspicion, there was a lively involvement of individuals in local community activity. The Tocquevillean tradition survives in populist political movements with their distrust of the Washington bureaucracy and the party machine.

This liberal legacy has been obviously subject to considerable critical evaluation. The role of voluntary associations in democracy has produced an extensive debate about "associative democracy" in contemporary political theory. Within this paradigm, a robust democracy requires (1) an expanding middle class with a commitment to liberal tolerance, (2) a viable press and responsible journalism to support open debate, (3) a universal notion of citizenship that will counteract the particularistic force of personal and communal ties, and (4) a large space of voluntary associations that will bind individuals to society and create effective patterns of social integration. Although the traditional literature on civil society presents a positive interpretation of voluntary associations and other intermediary groups, the role of voluntary or secondary associations is in fact far more problematic than this summary statement would suggest. Secondary associations can also have a negative impact on democratic processes precisely because they articulate sectional, specific, and particular interests. For example, lobby groups can often represent sectional interests and the attitude of so-called NIMBYism ("Not in my back yard"). This general problem of sectional interest is often referred to—following its discussion by James Madison in "Federalist No. 10"—as "The Mischief of Faction," in which a "minority faction" can determine the condition of the majority. As Max Beloff notes, Madison feared the negative consequences to the commonwealth of a "multiplicity of interests" and a "multiplicity of sects." An associative democracy can only work if there is considerable decentralization and devolution of powers and responsibilities, but given the threat of the mischief of faction, regulative devices and mechanisms are also needed to guarantee, for example, minimal and egalitarian standards of public services. In short, there must be a framework of state regulation if the free play of associations is to have any benefit for civil society.

There is now considerable doubt about the level of involvement in voluntary associations in contemporary America. In his famous account, Bowling Alone, Robert Putnam argued that, with for example the development of television, people were less involved in community activities. Americans were more likely to do things alone—such as bowling as a leisure time activity—than they were to participate in collective sociable activities. The traditions of activism and participation were declining, and the result was a damaging decline in “social capital”—the social investments that individuals make in society through membership in clubs, churches, and other voluntary associations. A more optimistic vision of American civil society has been developed by Jeffrey Alexander in The Civil Sphere. He argues that one can identify many social movements—feminism or the Black civil rights movement—that have been successful in achieving what he calls “social repair.”

Two fundamental problems confront civil society in Stage 1 theories. The first was in fact illustrated in Putnam’s analysis of social capital, where he had to make a distinction between social binding and social bridging. For example, a radical Protestant sect might create a significant level of internal social solidarity as members commit themselves to congregational activities; this constitutes social binding. However, they may have very weak connections with the outside world, because their members find that their social investments are made exclusively within the congregation or the sect. They have very weak forms of social bridging because they are not only separated from but hostile to the outside secular world. It is difficult to see how social groups that are high on binding but low on bridging can contribute significantly to the general integration of civil society. The second problem is more damaging. In some societies, criminal gangs and deviant groups may be high on social capital but will have damaging consequences for civil society. One extreme example is the role of the mafia in southern Italy, where the state has historically been weak, providing few social services to citizens. Criminal gangs offer their members security and welfare services, but they are damaging to the overall social structure. One can think of less extreme but equally problematic voluntary associations. Does the National Rifle Association make the same contribution to American civil society as the Mothers Union? Does a radical group such as Jamaat-e-Islami have equivalent social functions in terms of social capital theory as the Boy Scout movement? The major weakness of civil society theory has been to assume implicitly a distinction between deviant and nondeviant social groups, with the result that civil society is occupied by lawful associations, whose members are upright, law-abiding citizens who are members of mainstream denominations. As Simone Chambers and Jeffrey Kopstein point out, the role of criminal organizations, youth gangs, and radical political groups is quietly ignored, and as a result, there is no genuine understanding of “bad” civil society.

Civil Religion and Civil Society

So far this entry has argued that the theory of civil society was an aspect of secular political philosophy from Fergusson to Habermas. However, this view ignores the debate about religious conflict and tolerance in the emergence of the theory of civil society. One leading exposition was provided by Samuel Pufendorf in his Of the Nature and Qualification of Religion in Reference to Civil Society of 1687, which offered a theory of religious tolerance in the framework of natural law. In the context of bitter religious conflict, Pufendorf argued that the state is not founded for the protection of religion, which is part of natural human freedom. The objective of civil society is to provide security for its citizens, leaving religion to the individual; hence, the sovereign must respect religious freedom. On the basis of a contract theory of the state, Pufendorf condemned any attempt to extend secular rule over religion as had taken place with the Edict of Nantes. Any ruler who persecutes individuals because of their religion is acting tyrannically. Such transgressions can be resisted by citizens, by violent means if necessary. Tolerance can be regarded as simply one means of managing religious dissent. However, Pufendorf took a sanguine view of such measures. He believed that while a reunion of Calvinists and Lutherans was possible, no such outcome was likely between Catholics and Protestants. Churches were in this theory rather like private societies; they should be governed internally by the consent of congregations, but they did not alter the responsibilities of the citizen in the public domain. Pufendorf provided, therefore, the classical statement of the division between the private and the public realm.

Although the 17th-century theorists paid close attention to religion, 20th-century sociology embraced the idea that modernization would inevitably result in secularization. Urbanization would contribute to the decline of the communal basis of religion; the growth of scientific worldviews would bring into question the foundations of theology; the welfare services of the church would be replaced by those of the state; the status and the authority of the clergy would decline; and finally, according to the sociologist Max Weber, there would be a general “disenchantment of reality.” The theory of secularization has in recent years been challenged by the eruption of so-called public religions into modern politics, such as the Iranian Revolution, the Polish Solidarity movement, Catholic Liberation Theology in South America, the rise of the so-called Moral Majority in the United States, the spread of radical Islam, and the general development globally of fundamentalism. There has been a more open evaluation of the importance of religion in modern societies resulting in a debate associated with a postsecular society, in which Habermas, following John Rawls, argues that in a modern society there must be an open, tolerant, and constructive debate between both secular and religious citizens. To a large extent, the problem of liberal tolerance has been created by the need of Western liberal states to come to terms with the creation of diasporic Muslim communities as a result of postwar labor migration. In this respect, we can say that the current problems of Stage 2 concern the management of religions in a liberal but post-Pufendorfian environment—that is, what policies should be adopted with respect to the presence of Muslim institutions in civil society?

One solution is to argue that religions in the plural could be accommodated in society but under the broad umbrella of a “civil religion.” Separate and different religious traditions must be tolerated in a liberal environment in the hope that these separate social groups might somehow merge within or contribute to a more general civil religion. This notion had its origin in Rousseau, whose relationship to religion in general and to Christianity in particular remains ambiguous. In the Social Contract, he argued that the Christian belief in a supernatural world was inimical to social life on this earth. In “The creed of a priest of Savoy” in Émile, Rousseau rejected the Christian view of the sinful nature of humankind but insisted that all humans need religion as a bulwark against despair. It was a deism that gave full recognition to the emotions and the social role of religion in sustaining civil society.

This theme regarding the social role of religion was taken up by Émile Durkheim (2001) in The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, in which he claimed that religion functions to sustain society through common rituals and beliefs, thereby creating what he called a “moral community.” However, with the growing complexity of society through social differentiation, the hold of traditional religions was jeopardized, and he anticipated the rise of new religious beliefs and practices that could cement society together in an era of individualism. For Durkheim, no religions are false; all contribute to the creation of social solidarity. His own version of civil society was eventually developed in Professional Ethics and Civic Morals. His views on secularization, religion, and civil society were also dependent on August Comte’s idea of “a religion of humanity.” In the original evolutionary scheme, Comte had proposed that the historical sequence was from theology to metaphysics and finally to positivism, but by the late 1840s, Comte had concluded that the positive conclusion to this series was not occurring and that the modern age was more rather than less religious. He struggled therefore to provide a formulation of the theory of humanity, love, and altruism as the ideology of the new society.

In many respects, contemporary philosophical reflection on religion and modernity appears, if anything, to repeat the conclusions of Rousseau, Comte, and Durkheim that religion is essential to society but only when stripped of its metaphysical assumptions. Such appears to be the message of contemporary philosophers, who argue that in a postmetaphysical society we must abandon all grand narratives and accept the conclusion that there are no facts—only interpretations. Critical of the doctrinal absolutism of the Roman Catholic Church, Rorty and Vattimo claim that Catholicism is unable to respond to many pressing social issues such as patriarchy and gender equality. However, once shorn of its metaphysics of truth, Christianity with its fundamental doctrine of solidarity, charity, and irony can serve vital functions in modernity. In short, a vibrant civil society requires a civil religion to overcome its internal social and cultural divisions, uniting its otherwise divided citizens behind a common worldview. The “elementary forms of religion” in modern civil society must therefore assume the character of a civil religion.

Globalization and Transnational Communities

These theories of civil society at Stage 1 pre-date the development of globalization. They refer essentially to the rise of civil society within the nation-state from the late 18th century onward. As it turns out, contemporary theories of civil society simply transfer these nation-state conceptions of civil society onto a global screen. What are these key features of globalization that allegedly create a global civil order? To simplify this discussion, let us consider three fundamental aspects of globalization: the Internet, migration, and human rights.

It is claimed that we live in a “network society” that has been created by the growth of the Internet. This theory is associated with Manuel Castells, who explored how the business, military, and intellectual elite have struggled for control of global communications through the technology of the Internet in his The Rise of Network Society. As a neo-Marxist sociologist, Castells adopted a critical view of such networks, arguing that they created new divisions of skill in the labor market, produced obsolescent workers, and continued the economic alienation of workers. Most commentators on the rise of the Internet have taken a decidedly more positive and optimistic view of its global development. Electronic communication is treated as yet another panacea for societies that are fragmented by individualism and consumerism, where many public utilities have been privatized during the decades of neoliberal deregulation. Daniel Drache, in Defiant Publics, claims that the Internet has provided new opportunities for citizens to organize and criticize governments for their many failings. Whereas traditional routes to criticism have been silenced with the monopolization of the multimedia industries and the decline of print news, Internet and related technologies open up a worldwide space for the exchange of ideas, opinion, and knowledge. While traditional communities may be disappearing, a new global community is evolving as a network society.

The interconnectivity of the postnational world is also assumed to be an effect of global labor migrations starting with massive Chinese migration in the 19th century and the 20th-century migration to the United States. Migration has produced many profound changes. The majority of modern societies are multifaith and multiethnic societies, and consequently, they are deeply multicultural. The cultural coherence of the nation-state is fractured by migration, both legal and illegal. The majority of modern societies play host to a wide range of diasporic communities with transnational connections, giving rise to remittance economies, the transnational marriage, and a global bureaucracy regulating visas, green cards, birth certificates, work permits, and the paraphernalia of what Biao Xiang calls “global body shopping.” It is estimated that a third of all Muslims now live as minorities in predominantly secular host societies. The presence of migrant minorities has slowly transformed the traditional liberal solution for tolerance based on the separation of church and state, thereby recognizing what José Casanova (1994) has called the “depersonalization” of religion.

Economic globalization required the globalization of certain crucial legal arrangements to protect transnational investment and exchange starting with the law of the sea. Laws relating to the construction of transnational corporations were equally important, and as a result of the financial crisis of 2008 to 2009, we can expect to see a new raft of laws relating to the security of banking and financial transactions. We might also see the emergence of the International Labour Organization and international labor law as further examples of legal globalization. However, the critical examples of juridical globalism have been the evolution of the Declaration of Human Rights, the creation of internal courts of justice, and myriad internal nongovernmental agencies dealing with the rights of women and children, aboriginals, stateless people, and refugees.

These institutions are associated also with the rise of new forms of global consciousness that might well be labeled cosmopolitanism. Various commentators such as Anthony Appiah have recently argued that a global world needs cosmopolitanism to create the framework for a conversation with strangers. Cosmopolitan virtues—care and respect for others—can be defined as the obligations side of human rights. Cosmopolitanism is occasionally criticized as an elite mentality, but this is to ignore the equally important examples of vernacular cosmopolitanism. The other criticism might be that cosmopolitanism is not only elitist but secular. It emerges out of the world of the Stoics, and it is associated in the modern world with frequent-flyer corporate executives. But this may also be an exaggeration because, as Humeira Iqtidar points out, it neglects the possibility of, for example, Islamic cosmopolitanism.

How does religion fit into this evolving global society? In the first place, one might argue that the evangel versions of the Abrahamic religions were committed to changing the world and, therefore, had a cosmopolitan and global vision. Furthermore, the modern development of human rights values has an important religious dimension. For example, the truth and reconciliation committees that started in the peace process in South Africa have become a widely used instrument of reconciliation. There is a close connection between secular human rights and the idea of reconciliation as it was developed by Archbishop Desmond Tutu. At a deeper level, as Thomas Brudholm and Thomas Cushman have noted, there are theological connections between genocide and the horror of atrocity.

These considerations support the view that we are moving toward a postnational environment in which new technologies are creating opportunities for the emergence of transnational communities. Global migration has produced large transnational minorities that are held together through the development of global networks. Alongside this complex and ever-changing global civil society, there is an emerging global consciousness of ethical cosmopolitanism that can function as the civil-religious consciousness of a world society, thereby to some extent realizing Kant's dream of a universal civil society.

Conclusion: Can Global Civil Society Succeed?

There are incontrovertible signs of an emerging global order. These include major international organizations such as the Red Cross and UNESCO and the rapid development of NGOs and related associations. Human rights declarations have been almost universally endorsed by national governments. There are many sporting and cultural events such as the Olympic Games that demonstrate these commitments to internationalism. There are many forms of popular globalization in fashion, film, and music. Religious globalization in fundamentalism and spirituality has also been widely recognized.

The arguments against such a world civil society are, however, equally powerful. The arguments against civil society in Stage 1 also apply to Stage 2. There is, for example, now a world Islamic society or umma that is periodically revived by holy pilgrimage and activated by the Internet. Obviously this religious umma is very high in social-binding capital but relatively low on social-bridging features. The trend toward personal piety in world religions tends to create internal solidarity but may be unhelpful in terms of creating broader social networks. A pessimistic view of social capital suggests that modern societies are becoming “enclave societies” rather than highly integrated social systems. Second, there is the possibility of a criminal world society. Current theories of globalization are often overly optimistic, neglecting the development of modern slavery, people trafficking, and global drug cartels. A balanced view of the idea of a global civil society would have to take a skeptical view of the prospects of a Durkheimian outcome to global trends in the emergence of a moral society. Criticisms of globalization are just as likely to espouse an antiglobalization perspective, rejecting the prospects of standardization that appear to accompany contemporary economic globalization. An integrated global civil society will somehow have to incorporate new centers of power (China and India); also, the declining fortunes of the Third World are now confronted by rising commodity prices and declining investment. Cosmopolitanism offers us a powerful moral vision of a cooperative and coherent world, but there are many threats to a peaceful world society for which we appear to have few plausible answers.

CLASH OF CIVILIZATIONS THESIS

The essay outlining the thesis about whether global politics was entering a stage characterized by a “clash of civilizations” (originally posed with a question mark at the end of the title phrase) was first published in 1993 in the journal Foreign Affairs and later expanded into a book titled The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order, which has since been translated into 39 languages. The controversial thesis was the contribution of Harvard University political scientist Samuel P. Huntington (1927–2008), whom Fareed Zakaria, the editor of Newsweek magazine, eulogized as “the greatest political scientist of the last half-century” (Newsweek, January 3, 2009). Many scholars have suggested that the clash of civilizations thesis (although seen as polemical and ferociously criticized) has a significant influence on how American and Western policy makers have viewed the post-Cold War world.

Huntington’s seemingly prescient hypothesis stated that the forces of globalization and modernization notwithstanding, future violent conflict—clashes—in the “new world” would come from cultural, primarily religious, differences between “civilizations”—that is, the “great divisions among humankind” (Huntington, 1993, p. 22). “The fault lines between civilizations will be the battle lines of the future” (p. 25). The primary conflict would be between Islamic civilizations and the West, fueled by a conservative Islamic resurgence and the demographic explosion in Islamic nations, coupled with opposition to Western universalism and Western economic power. Many civilizations would seek to reify their religious and cultural characteristics in opposition to Western values. “Kin countries” that shared civilizational characteristics or shared interests would “rally” to each other’s aid, to oppose the West—the primary example being the creation of a Sino-Islamic axis counter to the Judeo-Christian West.

This intercivilizational conflict would manifest itself in two forms: fault line conflicts (local conflicts between neighboring states) and core state conflicts (between major states of different civilizations).

Huntington described seven “civilizations”: Western, Latin American, Confucian, Japanese, Islamic, Hindu, and Slavic-Orthodox. They are differentiated from each other by history, language, culture, tradition, and religion and determine fundamental relationships, including the following:

The relations between God and man, the individual and the group, the citizen and the state, parents and children, husband and wife, as well as differing views of the relative importance of rights and responsibilities, liberty and authority, equality and hierarchy. (Huntington, 1993, p. 27)

The focus on religion as a source of conflict triggered active debate about relations between the Western and Islamic worlds, in the wake of the September 11, 2001, attack on the United States. The clash of civilizations thesis has been broadly criticized by scholars all over the world for being too simplistic, for not defining the concept of a civilization clearly, for not sufficiently distinguishing between religion as a distinct factor as opposed to civilization more broadly, and for ignoring indigenous civilizations completely.

CLOTHING

Religious clothing refers to any type of clothing that holds religious meaning or significance for devotees of a particular tradition. Religious clothing is multifarious, represented in a variety of articles, styles, variations, and meanings. Religious vesture can serve as a symbol of tradition, culture, political affiliation, or level of office. Such clothing can also function on a personal or practical level for religious individuals. Religious garb can be a contentious issue in civil society but can also induce greater religious commitment and understanding. Religious clothing becomes one of the most visual representations of a tradition within the current era of globalization.

For some, particular forms of head coverings are of significance, such as the Islamic veil, the Jewish kippah, the Sikh turban, or the Roman Catholic habit worn by nuns. Religious garb can also include various forms of coats, shirts, pants, and smaller articles or parts of clothing such as jewelry, belts, shoes, a particular shirt collar or sleeves of a shirt, and so forth. Religious vesture can even include distinct undergarments such as the Sikh kachera or the temple garments worn by members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons).

Religious clothing also varies in color, material, construction, the manner in which it is worn, and the level of extravagance or simplicity it seeks. Variation in style and composition usually holds symbolic significance. For example, white clothing often denotes purity, mourning, equality, or unity. The white kittel, or robe, worn by male Jews during holidays and as a burial shroud in death, signifies the equality of believers, humility before God, and purity of heart. The dhoti, a piece of cloth wrapped around the lower half of the body, is worn by a number of Hindu, Buddhist, and Jain groups and varies in style, color, and the manner in which it is wrapped and folded around the body based on those it adorns and the occasion that prompts its use. Members of the Hare Krishna sect typically wear white or saffron dhotis. Jains usually wear white dhotis since they represent purity and simplicity and are made of unstitched cloth. Thus, variation can indicate membership in a distinct denomination, sect, or movement. The adornment or lack of adornment can also hold considerable meaning. Plain, modest clothing is important for many Amish Mennonite groups as a submission of the self in reverence to God and a statement of equality among believers. Roman Catholic monastic clothing varies widely, often becoming more extravagant the higher the office, with papacy regalia being the most intricate and ornate among them. While lack of adornment in Amish communities suggests a lack of hierarchy within the religious community, the vesture of Roman Catholic clergy suggests a distinct hierarchy between the believers and God, mediated through the Roman Catholic Church. Variation can also signify political leanings. For instance, a larger yarmulke or kippah (Jewish skullcap) usually suggests more conservative political affiliation, while smaller kippot denote more liberal orientation. Variation of religious clothing can also serve as a fashion statement, as is the case with the rise of “hijab chic,” where young Muslim women cover their heads with brightly colored and patterned scarves, some even donning high-end designer scarves, in observance of Islamic modesty.

There are a variety of reasons why religious observers choose to wear particular forms of clothing. Many forms of clothing are required by religious tradition, either for everyday use or for the performance of particular practices, such as during prayer or meditation; while attending a religious service, ritual, or festival; or while in a certain location. Modest clothing is often required while in temples, churches, or mosques. Clothing can also signify leadership and a level of religious responsibility. Christian clergy members are required to wear distinctive clothing in public—for example, priests wear the characteristic white collar—to be easily recognizable by their religious community. It is customary in some communities to give religious clothing as gifts during holidays, festivals, or rituals. The Jewish yarmulke is sometimes given as a present during a bar mitzvah or at a wedding celebration. A Sikh custom of the exchange of turbans creates lifetime friendship ties between those who exchange their head coverings and also between their respective families. When given during a particular religious ceremony, religious clothing can act as a reminder of oaths made or rites performed for the adherent. After young men have undergone the Upanayana ceremony, a Hindu rite-of-passage ritual, they wear the Yajñopavītam (“sacred thread”) usually draped over the left shoulder to signify an advanced stage of education and entry into a higher level of responsibility and maturity in everyday life. The Yajñopavītam continues to be worn, presumably over the lifetime of the ritual participant, to remind him of his everyday obligations and is repeatedly added to and replenished through ritual ceremonies over the course of his life. Some religious clothing is worn for protection. The red string (or roite bindele) is a bracelet worn by followers of Jewish mysticism (Kabbalah) and is used as a talisman, protecting the wearer from the misfortune and negative energy induced by the evil eye. Various forms of Islamic head coverings worn by female Muslims are said to protect women from unwanted male attention or sexual advances. Religious clothing is also worn in adherence to tradition, as a marker of culture, and as an indication of the level of piety or orthodoxy one subscribes to. Religious clothing can suggest a new or renewed commitment to a tradition. Religious clothing is often linked to modesty, piety, honor, self-respect, and spiritualism and can be used as a tool of body comportment to create and ingrain these religious dispositions in the religious adherent. Thus, religious clothing should not only be viewed as a symbolic representation of particular religious sentiments but also as indicative of an active engagement in developing and sustaining those internal constitutions.

In the current era of globalization, religious clothing takes on even greater significance as a visible representation of growing religious diversity within national borders. Devotees donning religious garb become the visible symbol of their religion, especially within secular-liberal societies such as the United States and European nations, where everyday clothing rarely represents a religious disposition. Within these societies, religious clothing becomes a vehicle of communication, conveying a particular ideology of a religious tradition. However, stigmatization and discrimination can accompany this heightened visibility of religious affiliation. Islam has faced great opposition within these countries, perhaps because terrorism and overt patriarchal control have been closely linked to the religion within Western media and scholarship. Some European countries have restricted or banned the use of hijab or modest Islamic dress that usually requires women to cover their heads. These bans focus on types of head covering that include the concealment of the face, such as the burka or niqab, arguing that these forms of religious garb pose a threat to national security, subjugate women, and interfere with the social integration of Muslim communities into secular societies. Opponents argue that such a ban represents an erosion of human rights and blatant racism against Muslim immigrants living within European borders. Muslims face discrimination within the United States, a country pushing for religious pluralism, broadly defined as a project for the coexistence and inclusion of and mutual respect for all religions within its national borders. Many veiled Muslim women experience some type of opposition and are often faced with the task of defending their religious practices and dispelling misconceptions. Sikh men and women have also faced physical and verbal abuse in the United States and Europe, often being mistaken for Muslims.

Muslims are not the only religious community to face scrutiny within the shifting religious landscapes of the world, based on their outward appearance and the ideology propounded through that appearance. Religious clothing has led to increased surveillance, imprisonment, and punishment and erosion of civil rights for many groups. Religious clothing not only leads to conflict between government and religious communities but also internally within communities, visibly dividing groups over issues of modesty, piety, spirituality, and approaches to the body. However, as a vehicle of communication, such vesture can also present an opportunity toward greater understanding and inclusion of religion in society. The public role created by such a visual expression allows for religious adherents to actively define and shape the social atmosphere in which they find themselves as well as maintain their religious commitment and community in a world increasingly defined by diversity.

COLOMBIA

With a population of approximately 43,500,000 people, the South American country of Colombia is home to a broad range of languages, religions, and cultural traditions. Colombian society is the result of complex historical processes that have combined native cultures with cultures from Europe, Africa, and Asia.

As a former Spanish colony, Colombia is preeminently a Catholic country. Most of its native traditions were destroyed by Christians through evangelization, carried out as a Westernization process. Spanish Christianity suppressed indigenous languages and religions in such a way that by the beginning of the 18th century, most of them had already disappeared. Some native groups survived; now, they represent just a little more than 3% of the population.

The tragedy of the rapid and massive destruction of the native population, forced to work under hard conditions, led the Spaniards to introduce African people to work as slaves in gold mines and on sugarcane plantations. African religions mixed with Christianity, generating syncretic practices that were condemned and persecuted by the Inquisition of the Roman Catholic Church. In modern times, Blacks represent 10% of the population; most of them are Christian. They are located mainly in the Pacific and Caribbean regions.

During colonial times, some Jews arrived as newly converted Christians, but they were the object of cultural assimilation. At the end of the 19th century, some Sephardic Jews migrated to the Caribbean coast, forming the basis of the Jewish colony there. During the first decades of the 20th century, many European Sephardic and Ashkenazic Jews settled in Barranquilla, Bogotá, Medellín, and Cali. In 1939, the Colombian government introduced a law to halt the migration of Jewish people from Germany. Today, the Jewish population of Colombia is perhaps fewer than 6,000, of whom only some participate in religious practices.

As a result of Arabic migration at the end of the 19th century and the arrival of the people who left the Middle East in the second half of the 20th century, the Muslim population is important in the Caribbean region, especially in the city of Maicao, where the mosque of Omar Ibn Al-Jattab was built in 1997. Even as the size of the Jewish community is reducing, the Muslim presence is increasing daily in Colombia. Estimates of the number of Muslims in the country vary; some reports indicate that the population of Muslims is 10,000, whereas others indicate a larger population.

Nowadays, Catholics represent 80% of the Colombian population, even though many do not practice their faith. Other Christian churches represent just 10%; their members are actively involved in religious practices. This phenomenon is explained by the recognition of Catholicism as the national religion in the constitution of 1886, which also oriented public education according to the Catholic tradition. The 1991 constitution guaranteed freedom of religion, recognizing the importance of Protestant, evangelical, and Pentecostal churches. A small minority in Colombia adhere to other traditions: Mormons, Jehovah's Witnesses, Hindus, Buddhists, and Daoists, among others.

COMMUNIONE E LIBERAZIONE

Comunione e Liberazione (CL; "Communion and Liberation") is one of the new religious movements that appeared within Italian Catholicism during the second half of the 20th century. Like most movements born in the same period, CL does not follow a particular Italian Church strategy and has developed at the margins of the ecclesiastical system.

The origins of the movement may be traced to the work of Luigi Giussani, a priest born in the province of Milan in 1922. His education was particularly influenced by the spirit of pastoral Catholicism, which was an active force in Brianza during the 1930s, and the tradition of spiritual renewal that came from social Catholicism and from the moderate modernist tradition that developed in the early 20th century.

During the 1950s, Don Giussani was professor of religion in the lycées of Milan. He was also in charge of the ministry to youth within the diocese. The main issue he faced concerned the confrontation with secularized lay culture. According to Don Giussani and his assertion about the reasonableness of believing, the whole religious dimension of life is rooted in one's experience and offers a definitive view of reality. For that reason, it does not have to do only with one's inner life but involves the wholeness of being and of all its social expressions. Thus, Catholics can not only introduce themselves as being religious when approaching the dialectic debate with lay culture, but they can also qualify themselves as religious in every sphere of social and institutional life.

A movement developed in the lycées and the Catholic University that aimed to assert an operative and visible presence of Catholics outside parishes and inside civil society. Because of the importance its founder gave to educational commitment, the movement is characterized not only for its aid and work activities but also, and perhaps chiefly, for a remarkable presence within scholastic structures. From the 1970s to the 1990s, CL introduced itself in several fields of the cultural, political, and economic life of Italy. Don Giussani also gave birth to a real structure of ecclesiastic life, which was recognized in 1982 by the Pontifical Council for Lays: the Communion and Liberation Fraternity. This association aims to activate a real “education to faith” through the network of “schools of community,” spiritual retreats, and the realization of deeply spiritual moments on the occasion of the most important festivals of the liturgical year.

During John Paul II’s pontificate, the CL movement began to spread to other Catholic countries. The constant connection between initiatives concerning the active presence in civil and institutional life and the strong activity of spiritual animation has made the CL movement one of the most important presences of Catholic spirituality within Italian civil society as well as an untiring producer of associative commitment and communitarian sharing.

COMMUNISM

Communism is the sociopolitical ideal that aims to create a society based on common ownership of goods and property. Throughout human history, from the influence of religious mysteries in Plato’s conception of society to the early modern vision of a utopia in Thomas Moore’s Christian conception, the ideal of a society without social and economic divisions has been a powerful political idea. During the 20th century, Marxist communism was the most global and ambitious sociopolitical project that attempted to implement a real egalitarian society.

Across the globe, Marxist communist parties were highly disciplined and committed to the cause of creating an earthly brotherhood. Communist followers created saints and sacred texts. Karl Marx, the ideological founder, did not propound a religious doctrine, but he believed in remarkable forces that operate in human history as engines of change and revolution. Those forces were related with the nature of human beings as transformers of nature.

In their work, Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels assert that with the rise of capitalism, the sacred has changed irremediably as a consequence of a society that reduces everything to commodities. For Marx and Engels, the ideas of the ruling class are the dominant ideas of a given period of time; religion, law, and morality are only the superstructure of a society whose role is the maintenance of the status quo. For them, religion is the ideological tool of the dominant class. They thought that religion would be obsolete in the communist stage of society, since the need for an ideological justification of social injustice would be superfluous. Despite these conclusions, Engels did perceive the revolutionary power of some moral-religious concepts such as equality.

The notion of equality was not the mere product of economic considerations or the social interest of the ruling class. Nevertheless, neither Marx nor Engels was able to explain the nature of equality or their trust in the final emancipation of humanity in the communist stage from the bondage of traditional religion and capitalism. This was a hope and a religious narrative that had its roots in the early intellectual formation of Marxist communism.

Marx wanted to create a scientific framework to explain the past and predict the future of human societies. But he also wanted to criticize their current social conditions. He had to sustain an ethical vision to explain the existence of an unjust world. Marx did not need the existence of a transcendental god to defend his moral vision. He created a new form of theodicy in which God was a mere reflection of human longings. Marx wanted to liberate human beings from their superfluous mythologies, along with their reified divinities.

COMOROS

The Union of the Comoros consists of a series of islands in the Comoro archipelago in the Indian Ocean; it lies off the coast of eastern Africa, north of Madagascar. With less than 1 million inhabitants, Comoros is one of the smallest nations in Africa, though it has one of the densest populations. Although most of the residents of the islands are Swahili-speaking settlers from Africa, the islands have been under Arab influence since the seventh century, when it and the island of Zanzibar north of the Comoros were populated by Arab traders and then came within the orbit of the Sultan of Oman.

The Portuguese were the first Europeans to explore and control the islands, arriving in 1505. In the 17th century, Malagasy pirates harbored in the islands and controlled some of the territory. In 1841, the Portuguese ceded control to the French, and the Comoros remained under French control until 1973, when the French agreed to give the islands independence if they requested it. Most did, and they formed an independent country in 1975. One island, Mayotte, preferred to remain under French control, and it continues to be a part of overseas French territory.

Almost all the residents of Comoros are Sunnī Muslims. The remaining 2% are Christian—primarily Roman Catholic because of the French colonial influence. There are also a small number of Indian immigrants, many of whom are Ismaeli, which is a branch of Shi'a Islam. Though the Comoros language is related to Swahili, Arabic is widely spoken as a second language, and there are strong cultural ties to the Arabian peninsula.

Religion has played a role in the mercurial political life of the Comoros since it has become independent. In the decades since it was liberated from French control in 1975, the country has experienced more than 20 attempted coups, many of them successful. For a time, from 1978 to 1989, the country was under Islamist political influence. President Ahmed Abdallah proclaimed the country to be under Muslim law, and the name was changed to the Federal Islamic Republic of Comoros. After Abdallah was assassinated in 1989, political turmoil ensued until the French military intervened to restore order. Later, a new political system was instituted that gave semiautonomy to each of the islands in the chain, and the name of the country was changed to the Union of the Comoros.

Islam continues to be a factor in the politics of the country. A Sunnī Muslim cleric, Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed Sambi, was elected president in the 2006 elections. Because he had studied Islam in Iran, Sambi was nicknamed “the Ayatullah.” There have been reports of Wahhabi and extremist Islamist views propagated in the country, and an alleged member of al Qaeda, Fazul Abdullah Mohammad, was born in Comoros. Though he lives in Kenya, he continues to maintain Comorian citizenship.

COMPOSTELA

The walking pilgrimage to Santiago de Compostela in Galicia, Spain, is an ancient Catholic practice whose origins go back to the ninth century CE, the Spanish struggle against the Moors, and the political need for a national building project. According to legend, the destination is believed to be the final resting place of the Apostle James.

For this long journey, the bodily and emotional experience is central. The Spanish road El Camino Francés is presently the most frequented itinerary, lasting about 800 km and undergoing a noteworthy revival since the late 1980s. Four much longer pilgrimage roads also cross Europe, going to Compostela.

The participants certified by the Oficina de Sociología de Santiago de Compostela, the official statistical source, were about 100 in 1984; since then the number has grown considerably, and 114,026 pilgrims walked the road in 2007. Moreover, the Camino had particular success during recent holy years. For the jubilee of 1993, there were 99,436 pilgrims. In 1999, for the end of the millennium, there were 154,613 pilgrims, and in 2004, they surpassed 181,036. A relevant trait of this revival is the internationalization of this traditional European pilgrimage. Spain remains the principal country furnishing pilgrims—around 60% of the participants, and this increased significantly during holy years. European countries such as France, Italy, Germany, Belgium, and Portugal furnish a very significant number of walkers. However, since the second millennium, the Spanish presence has tended to decrease because of the presence of pilgrims coming from outside Europe and setting out on this journey from all over the world. Every year somewhere between 4,500 and 6,000 North or South Americans as well as Africans, Asians, and Oceanians walk the Camino.

The attraction of the road to Santiago bears witness to the successful encounter between a renewed effort of pastoralization, the interests of religious tourism agents, and the demand by an international and intergenerational public. Altogether, an astonishing growth in the number of elderly participants has been observed, especially of retired persons. In recent decades, young adults were the largest group. This kind of participation suggests a reason for the contemporary global success of the pilgrimage to Compostela: This road, which especially attracts individuals who are in a suspended professional period—either not yet employed or else retired—represents a concrete metaphor of “going forth” in life. The desire for religious experience and the quest for identity are elements of the motivation for setting out on this journey. The Way of St. James as a voluntary, adaptable, individual ritual fits well in the spiritual demand of a large number of seekers, who were brought up as Catholics or Protestants but who have distanced themselves from the church’s institutional position. The same ritual walk embraces different kinds of religious participation. While some define themselves as Catholics, longing to embrace the Apostle James in the cathedral, others claim to be pilgrims according to their own way, looking for a spiritual experience based on the shift from external regulation of truths and rites to subjective emotions and beliefs.

CONFUCIANISM

Confucianism is commonly viewed as a major religion of China, although its religious nature is still being debated by scholars in both China and the West. Through a chronological narrative that traces the development of Confucianism from the time of Confucius to contemporary China and east Asia, this entry focuses on the following aspects of Confucianism: the origin of Confucianism and the Confucian canon, the influence of Confucianism in imperial China, the treatment of Confucianism by the Chinese socialist state in the 20th century, the contemporary revival of Confucian ritual practices, and the global nature of Confucianism.

Clarification of Terms

To understand the complex history and diverse meanings of Confucianism, we need to first clarify the different usages of the term Confucianism. Although the word Confucius, the Latinized name of Kong Fuzi, was first used by Jesuit missionaries in China in the late 16th century, the English word Confucianism did not come into existence until 1862, according to the Oxford English Dictionary. The real use of the word as referring to a religion was in James Legge's pamphlet Confucianism in Relation to Christianity, published in Shanghai in 1877. Today Confucianism in English refers to both the philosophical teaching of Confucius (551–479 BCE) and the religion associated with Confucius.

In Chinese, however, it is difficult to find the exact equivalent of the English word Confucianism. Today, scholars use the following convention to distinguish several related yet different concepts: rujia (the school of Confucian thought) and ruxue (Confucian learning) usually refer to Confucianism as a philosophy or school of thought, whereas rujiao (the Confucian religion) refers to Confucianism as a religion.

“The Master Said”: Confucius and His Disciples

According to the archaeologist Lothar von Falkenhausen, the “Age of Confucius” started 500 years before Confucius's birth and lasted till the end of China's great Late Bronze Age (ca. 1000–250 BCE). This coincided with the existence of the Zhou Dynasty (ca. 1046–256 BCE), the longest reigning dynasty in Chinese history. The lifetime of Confucius (ca. 551–479 BCE) was a tumultuous period of constant warfare between patrimonial states; Confucius and his followers always looked back to the founders of the Zhou, the Sage Kings, as moral and political exemplars, particularly as the dynasty was reaching its final stage of disorder, eventually to be replaced by the Qin Dynasty when the First Emperor united China in 221 BCE.

Von Falkenhausen states that it was during this Age of Confucius that the foundation of what we today call Confucianism was established: The five classics were written during this period (the Odes, the Documents, the Rites, the Changes, and the Spring and Autumn Annals), which later became part of the Confucian canon, and the traditional rituals of China were instituted, which included the worship of ancestral spirits.

Confucius was born around 551 BCE in the state of Lu and was orphaned at a young age. D. C. Lau notes that little is known of Confucius's youth except that he was poor and fond of learning: “At fifteen I set my heart on learning” (Analects, 2.4). Confucius became known for his erudite mind, and at the age of 50 years, he was appointed to be the Minister of Crime of Lu. However, his advice was not followed, and he decided to leave the state of Lu in 497 BCE with some of his disciples. Confucius did not return to Lu for 13 years; during his exile he visited different states and offered advice to feudal rulers who cared to listen. He returned to Lu when he was 68 years old and devoted the remaining years of his life to teaching before dying at 72 years. According to the first century BCE text Records of the Grand Historian, Confucius had 3,000 disciples during his lifetime. Among the disciples, 12 are mentioned frequently in the Analects, which is a collection of sayings of Confucius as well as anecdotes about Confucius and some of his disciples, edited by his disciples and their students.

Confucius famously said that he was “a transmitter, not a creator” (Lau, 1979, 7.1). Von Falkenhausen points out that Confucius gave philosophical expressions to changes in society that had been ongoing for nearly a century, emphasizing living community rather than divine ancestors in ritual practices, stressing honest reverence rather than sanctimonious display, and most important, valuing virtue (which can be obtained through self-cultivation) over noble lineage. Indeed, for Confucius, a junzi (originally meaning “a prince”) was no longer a birthright but achieved nobility; because of Confucius's teaching, junzi came to mean a virtuous person, regardless of one's birth or social status.

Although Confucius clearly stated that he preferred not to address matters related to gods and spirits (Lau, 1979, 7.21), there were many discussions about the proper performance of rituals in the Analects, and the importance of ritual practice to Confucius cannot be underestimated. Confucius spoke of tian (lit. “the sky” or “the heaven above”) frequently in the Analects (51 times); according to P. J. Ivanhoe, Confucius believed that Heaven had a concrete plan for human beings and that he had been chosen to play a special role in the realization of this plan for a peaceful, just, and harmonious society. The proper way to achieve this ideal world is the Dao (the way).

Ivanhoe also points out that Confucius has a dynamic view of worship, especially sacrifice and prayer. For Confucius, what is important is the reverence on the part of the ones participating in the worship; he expressed little interest in prayers for supplication, and he believed that he had been praying throughout his life by following the Dao (Lau, 1979, 7.35).

The so-called Cult of Confucius did not start until the Han Dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE). The first mention of a cult of Confucius was in the late Han Dynasty, when an emperor sent a surrogate to venerate the spirit of Confucius at Confucius’s grave. Several Han emperors followed by offering sacrifices at Confucius’s family ancestral temple in Qufu. Throughout imperial China, this ritual practice was carried out by emperors of different dynasties, and temples devoted to the veneration of Confucius also flourished in major cities and prosperous towns. In the imperial pantheon of gods and spirits that dominated Chinese temple life, the temples devoted to the veneration of Confucius occupied a notable place in the hierarchy, and it has been an important part of Chinese religious life.

The Confucian Canon and the Civil Service Examination System

The centrality of Confucianism in the social, cultural, and political life of China is closely related to the centrality of the civil examination system (ke jiu) in imperial China. Although the origin of the examinations can be traced back to the Han Dynasty, it was Emperor Yang of the Sui Dynasty (581–618) who established the first civil service examinations in 605, using tests of literary subjects to select officials for the court. Throughout the rule of the Tang and Song dynasties (650–1250), the examinations were expanded, standardized, and methodically institutionalized; exams were held every 3 years nationally, and there were local-level as well as court-level exams overseen by the emperor.

According to Benjamin Elman, the civil service examination system in imperial China was the institutional link that connected three important aspects of Chinese political, social, and cultural life: (1) the imperial dynasties used the rigorous civil service examinations to select officials to fill the most important positions within the dynastic government; (2) the gentry-literati elites (selected members of the gentry who maintained their elite social and cultural status through classical scholarship as well as knowledge of lineage rituals) used the examinations to gain political positions and economic assets; and (3) classical studies, which formed the core content of the examinations, flourished because of the examinations, yet this category was also reconstructed through the complex interactions between the imperial bureaucracy and the elite gentry-literati.

Classical studies in China had traditionally been studies of the Confucian canon, yet the canon never stayed exactly the same. The classical Confucian curriculum was constantly adjusted and reinterpreted, especially in the late imperial period—namely, during the rule of the Ming (1368–1644) and Qing (1644–1911) dynasties. Elman argues that late imperial examinations made “Dao Learning,” which is translated as neo-Confucian learning, the orthodoxy in official life as well as in literati culture.

The Four Books: The Legitimation of the Neo-Confucian Orthodoxy

Beginning in the Han Dynasty and throughout the early years of the Song Dynasty, the Confucian canon consisted of 13 texts (the Thirteen Classics), including the Five Classics as well as later texts such as the Analects, the works of Mencius (Meng Zi), and the Classics of Filial Piety. Even as the canon was expanding, the Five Classics remained the essential texts about how to achieve an ideal society as well as how to become a virtuous person, and they were used as the foundation of the civil service examinations until they were replaced by the Four Books in the 14th century.

The shift of emphasis in the classical curriculum marked an important moment in the development of Confucianism in China: A new school of Confucian thought and practice that started during the rule of the Song Dynasty (960–1279), which is what we now call Neo-Confucianism, was responsible for the transformation of the Confucian canon. It was Zhu Xi (1130–1200), a leading neo-Confucian philosopher, who started advancing the idea of the “Four Books,” which included the Analects, the Mencius, the Great Learning, and the Doctrine of the Mean (the latter two are chapters from the Rites, one of the Five Classics), which he viewed as the most significant parts of Confucian texts. Through the Four Books, Zhu Xi advocated the idea of self-cultivation through both philosophical and spiritual exercises, such as contemplation and reading, and de-emphasized the complex historical lessons put forth by the Five Classics.

As Daniel Gardner points out, this move away from the Five Classics points to an “inward” shift toward morality that is governed not by conventions, social norms, or rituals but by inner sources of personal morality. The civil examinations in effect instituted the Song moral philosophy as the orthodox version of Confucian thought in the 14th century, and as a result, the neo-Confucian interpretation of Confucianism became the orthodoxy throughout late imperial China, until the end of the Qing Dynasty in 1911.

Confucian Ritual Practices in Imperial China

According to Wilson, the regular worship of Confucius through rituals performed by the emperor or the emperor’s surrogates can be dated to the late sixth or seventh century. During the time of the Tang Dynasty (618–907), a liturgy for the worship of Confucius in temples was constructed based on canonical texts on rituals, and these codes for sacrifices were used throughout imperial China, with modifications along the way. Wilson notes that the Tang codes required that the first offering be presented by the crown prince and the second and the third by the two top officials of the Directorate of Education; during the rule of the Ming Dynasty (1368–1644), the ritual sacrifices were supervised by senior officials from the Court of Imperial Sacrifices, the Directorate of Education, and the Ministry of Rites.

Besides such public or state performances of rituals, another important component of Confucian ritual practices was the personal worship of ancestral spirits. Although ancestor worship existed in China long before the rise of Confucianism, it has been appropriated by the disciples of Confucius as an essential ritual. When the Jesuit missionaries in China were forced to deal with the issue of Chinese rites in the 17th century, which became the so-called Chinese Rites and Term Controversy, the crux of the matter was that the Franciscan and Dominican missionaries (and later the Vatican) objected to the Chinese converts’ participation in Confucian ritual ceremonies as well as their practice of keeping ancestral shrines at home (with tablets inscribed with their ancestors’ names).

The “Confucianity Movement” in the Republic of China

Not long before the Chinese republican revolution in 1911, during which the last imperial dynasty was overthrown, many intellectuals felt that China needed a national religion to strengthen its cultural and political identity. In 1895, Kang You-wei, the most influential public intellectual at the time, campaigned for the establishment of kongjiao (kong being the surname of Confucius), meaning the “Confucian religion” or “Confucianity,” which was modeled after Christianity. A reform-minded thinker, Kang wanted to invent a national religion for China to facilitate its transition to modernity, and kongjiao hui, the “Association of Confucian Religion,” was set up by Kang and his supporters in 1912, right after the founding of the Republic of China.

However, their efforts proved to be unsuccessful, at least politically, and in the late 1920s, the government ordered the association to change its name to kongxue hui, the “Association of Confucian Learning.” This change of a single word is indeed a crucial one; jiao denotes “religion” in modern Chinese, whereas xue denotes “learning” or “education.” Although the movement of reinventing Confucianism as a religion faded quickly after that, some of the followers of Kang did continue to advance his ideas. For example, a Confucian Academy was established in Hong Kong in 1929 by Chen Huanzhang, who had been active in the Confucian religion movement, and there were also attempts to make Confucianism a national religion in Taiwan in the 1920s and 1930s when Taiwan was under Japanese rule. But such efforts had little impact on what was about to happen in mainland China, when the People's Republic of China was founded in 1949.

The Ambivalent "Harmonious Society": Confucianism in Socialist China

In an article published in 1892 titled "Development of Statistics of Religion," M. Fournier De Flaix and Alice R. Jackson stated that the worship of ancestors is the true religion of China, and it is also the official religion; with at least 256,000,000 followers (roughly the estimated population of China), Confucianism and the worship of ancestors is in fact the second largest religion in the world, after Christianity. Indeed, since the turn of the 20th century, Confucianism is often portrayed as the official or national religion of China, both in academic studies and in introductory texts on world religions.

It might come as a surprise that Confucianism is in fact not included in the Chinese official classification of religions today. The "Five Major Religions" classification was established in the 1950s and includes Catholicism, Protestantism, Buddhism, Daoism, and Islam, but not Confucianism.

The notion of the five major religions was advanced because of concerns for national security and social stability in the newly formed socialist government; they needed to find an institutional structure to deal with China's religious population. The religious organizations, especially the Catholic Church and the Protestant churches, were large enough to pose potential threats to the socialist state. To gain control of these organizations, the State Administration for Religious Affairs was established solely for the management of such groups. In 1953, four religious associations were founded under the titles of "Patriotic Associations" of Chinese Catholics, Protestants, Muslims, and Buddhists. The Patriotic Association of Daoists did not come into existence until 1957, when a communist general intervened to make it an official religion.

Apparently no one spoke out for the Confucians. But who were the Confucians? It seems plausible that Confucianism was left out of the official classification because there was no Confucian population perceived to be posing political threats. And it was also because there was no self-identified Confucian population to speak of in the first place. Many Chinese intellectuals might consider themselves living a way of life based on the Confucian virtues of self-cultivation, yet none of them, at least in the mid-20th century, would call themselves "a believer of the Confucian religion." Without a recognizable or identifiable base of believers and organizations, Confucianism as a religion has primarily been a matter of academic and political concern in socialist China.

During the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), there were several waves of political condemnations of Confucian thought as a result of ideological conflicts within the Party, and Confucius was demonized as a backward, feudal, and reactionary thinker in the process. The Cultural Revolution also engendered widespread oppression of any religious practice in China, and many rituals related to Confucianism disappeared from everyday life during this time.

Beginning in the 1980s, there has been an ongoing debate over the religious nature of Confucianism, the so-called rujiao shijiao zhizheng, which started as an intellectual discussion with potential political implications. The controversy reached its height in 2001 to 2004, with several dozens of people publishing books, articles, and web postings, arguing whether Confucianism has been a religion in China through philosophical or historical analysis.

Starting in 2004, some intellectuals ceased to take part in the academic debate; instead, they started engaging in a variety of activities with the goal of making Confucianism a religion. The "Reading of the Classics" movement has been mobilized by scholars endorsing Confucianism as a religion; it started in the 1990s as a grassroots movement that taught children Confucian classics through reading and memorization. The scholars Jiang Qing and Kang Xiaoguang and their associates have become the leading voices in the so-called Mainland-China New Confucianism (to be differentiated from New Confucianism, an intellectual movement aiming at a reinterpretation of Confucian thought that is the most influential in Hong Kong and Taiwan, originated by scholars such as Xiong Shili and Mou Zongsan).

The Contemporary Revival of Confucian Ritual Practice

In the first decade of the 21st century, there has been a noticeable revival of rituals traditionally associated with Confucianism in China. The revival has taken both a personal form (the worship of ancestral spirits as well as the personal worship of Confucius in Confucius temples) and an official form (state-sponsored ritual performances in Confucius temples).

Based on a recent survey (Horizon, 2007), there has been a great increase in the number of people making annual trips to their ancestral hometowns to perform rituals at the graveside of their deceased family members. The rituals are sometimes called saomu (“tomb sweeping”), since the main rituals involve the cleaning of graves and the displaying of sacrifices (e.g., food, drinks, or paper goods that are made to resemble luxury products such as cars or houses). It is believed that the ancestors’ blessings could guarantee good fortune in one’s personal affairs. This annual trip usually takes place in early April, on the day of the Qing Ming Festival; it has become so pervasive that the Chinese government declared the Qing Ming Festival to be an official national holiday in 2008, so that people can officially take the day off from work for the sake of observing the rituals.

The revival of ritual practices of worshipping the spirit of Confucius in Confucius temples has to do with a general deregulation of religious life in China since the 1980s. The state has taken the position of treating religions as possible sources of morality and social stability as long as there is no political dimension to them. Unlike in the cases of what the state terms “evil cults,” the practices associated with Confucianism seem benign and even beneficial to the state’s goal of maintaining social order.

Most people who worship in Confucius temples these days are young men and women about to take an important examination, such as the annual national college entrance exam or a graduate school entrance exam; they burn incense in the temples and pray to Confucius for blessings. Although there are also people who pray for blessings for success in job interviews or promotions, the general purpose of worshipping in Confucius temples is for blessings in one’s educational life.

The increasingly elaborate public veneration of Confucius in the Confucius temple in Qufu, often organized by government agencies, also point to a new phase in the changing status of Confucianism in China. The state has been tolerant, even supportive, of many activities that promote the religious aspects of Confucianism, since its endorsement of Confucianism and Confucian traditions is in line with its current political goal of maintaining a “harmonious society” through promoting traditional—one might even say Confucian—culture and values. Indeed, the state has been emphasizing the importance of trustworthiness in public life and private conduct, cultivation of civic virtues, and the fulfillment of filial piety, all of which can be traced back to Confucian teachings. But it remains to be seen whether the state would go as far as to elevate Confucianism to the status of one of the major religions in China.

The Global Nature of Confucianism

Social scientists have long been interested in the role of Confucianism in the development of modern Asia. Following the publication of Weber’s Religion of China: Confucianism and Taoism, especially its English translation in 1951, many have connected Confucian values with the so-called modernization process in Asian countries, such as China, Taiwan, Japan, South Korea, and Singapore. For instance, Tu Weiming edited a volume titled Confucian Traditions in East Asian Modernity: Moral Education and Economic Culture in Japan and the Four Mini- Dragons, which addresses the very issue of the connection between modern economic development in east Asia and its Confucian legacy; in Modernization, Globalization, and Confucianism in Chinese Societies, the sociologists Joseph B. Tamney and Linda Hsueh-Ling Chiang examine the impact of modernization and globalization on Confucianism in mainland China, Taiwan, and Singapore.

Indeed, Confucianism has been flourishing for hundreds of years outside mainland China, especially in Korea, Japan, Taiwan, and Vietnam. Benjamin Elman, John Duncan, and Herman Ooms speak of Confucianism as a repertoire of common techniques (rushu) that link different social groups together: the literati elites in China, the warriors and merchants in Japan, the yangban aristocrats in Korea, and the rural literati in Vietnam. The Confucian techniques include civil service bureaucracy, Confucian academies, and rituals as a balance to the legal system; these techniques are always modified or transformed by the local histories, rituals, and customs, which leads to very different manifestations of Confucian life in these countries.

It is often acknowledged that ritual practices associated with Confucianism are better preserved in Korea than in mainland China. The National Confucian Shrine in Seoul was founded in 1397, and ritual worship of Confucius has been conducted twice a year there. Hongkyung Kim speaks of Korean Confucian ritual practice as having three components: formal institutionalized practices (including rituals for Confucius), practices within the household (including rites for worshipping the ancestors), and practices to inform one's personal conduct (following the 16th-century text "Behavioral Rules of the National Confucian Academy").

Scholars who are interested in the so-called Asian Values versus Human Rights debate of the 1990s or the political and social issues in contemporary China in general, including issues dealing with democracy, human rights, family, and gender, often treat Confucianism more as a social and political philosophy than religion. The Asian Values versus Human Rights debate has been an international event; politicians and heads of states made declarations, with many academics joining in the discussion. One of the key scholars in the debate is Daniel A. Bell, who views Confucianism largely as a communitarian philosophy of self, family, community, and the state; in his book China's New Confucianism: Politics and Everyday Life in a Changing Society, he argues that China is promoting Confucianism as an alternative to Western liberalism.

Tu Weiming, Robert Neville, and John Berthrong represent what is called the "Boston Confucianism" in the West. They have been very influential in advocating the relevance of Confucianism to Western philosophy as well as Western spiritual practice, and they are the ones who have made the valuable contribution to the ongoing Confucian-Christian dialogue. As Neville puts it, from the beginning, the central question facing the Boston Confucians has been the following: Is it possible for one to be a Confucian if one is not from China, Japan, or Korea—the so-called Confucian east Asia? Tu Weiming, Neville, and Berthrong have all argued that the answer is a resounding "Yes." They believe that one can be a Confucian in any part of our global society, and one can draw from different religious and spiritual traditions to form multiple religious identities.

The position held by the Boston Confucians is distinctly different from popular views such as "the clash of civilizations," the idea that different religions and civilizations are bound to be in conflict with one another in our contemporary world. Instead, the Boston Confucians have been supporting an ongoing dialogue between Confucians and Christians. For instance, Neville believes that it is possible to live an active spiritual life through two or more spiritual traditions. The Boston Confucians have made Confucianism relevant to Christians or anyone from different cultural or religious traditions; their efforts have resulted in an open, creative, and forward-looking conversation about Confucianism and Christianity—and the possibility of being Confucian and Christian at the same time—in the multicultural and global world that we are all part of.

CONSPIRACY THEORIES

Conspiracy theories are a form of intricate reasoning characterized by elaborate conclusions about secret plots, cover-ups, and schemes often believed to be designed and crafted by public entities such as governments, economic growth and management agencies, multinational corporations, and religious organizations. In recent years, conspiracy theories have become more pronounced within global pop culture, largely due to the proliferation of popular literature and film with foci on secrecy. At least one function of this form of reasoning serves to provide a discourse for the extraordinary and ultimately gives rise to an antithesis of reenchantment in the face of what may appear to be secularizing society.

The term conspiracy originates from the Latin term conspirare, referring to something agreed on or united in plot. The literal translation is “to breathe together,” derived from the prefix com (“together”) and the suffix spirare (“to breathe”). Although common law would define conspiracy as an agreement between two or more individuals to break the law, its more popular reference connotes an exploration of trivial events, the individuals that are allegedly involved, the perceived covert agreements and activities that conceal truths, and the perceived suppression of inquiry into such truths.

With the onset of the information age, the reach of conspiracy theories has grown beyond national, cultural, and social boundaries, becoming yet another global phenomenon. The content of at least seven general conspiracy theories has extended onto a transnational scale, including the extraterrestrial debate embodied within the ancient astronaut thesis; the government-concealed truth behind UFO/alien encounters; the propaganda production of the moon-landing hoax; corporate takeovers, globalization, and the emergence of the new world order; U.S. government involvement in the events of September 11, 2001; the revisionist discourse of an official Holocaust narrative; and the cover-up of Jesus Christ’s bloodline. The two latter conspiracy theories are particularly germane to the context of global religion.

The conspiracy theories surrounding the official Holocaust narrative emerged shortly after World War II when defeated Nazi officers and soldiers began to destroy evidence of gas chambers and records of executions in an attempt to deny and/or conceal their organized effort to exterminate Jews and others they considered “less desirable.” In general, the main tenets of this conspiracy hold that (1) the Nazis never actually had an official policy for exterminating Jews, (2) stories of the use of gas chambers were fabricated, and (3) the total number of Jews killed in the Holocaust was an exaggeration, as the actual figures were much smaller. According to these conspiracy theorists, the Jewish people created the “Holocaust myth” to garner international sympathy and support for justifying the creation of the state of Israel.

The origins of this type conspiracy theory may lie within the late-19th-century text titled The Protocols of the Elders of Zion. The text was actually a propaganda tool first published in full in 1905 by the Tsarist mystic Sergei Nilus that portrayed the Jews as a tightly organized cabal conspiring to take over the world. Although this piece was debunked several times as a hoax, it nonetheless circulated well beyond Paris where it was first distributed. Today, the text can be readily found translated in a variety of countries including Australia, Brazil, Egypt, Indonesia, Iran, Japan, New Zealand, Malaysia, Mexico, Pakistan, Russia, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Turkey, the United States, and the United Kingdom.

Other anti-Semitic and racist groups such as the Ku Klux Klan in the United States began to support such conspiracy theories while crafting and distributing revisionist literary materials. More recently on December 11, 2006, the Iranian Institute for Political and International Studies held an event titled “Conference to Review the Global Vision of the Holocaust.” The two-day gathering was dubbed by many as the “Holocaust Deniers Conference,” where nearly 70 guests from 30 different countries attended to reexamine the atrocities of the Nazi concentration camps. According to the head of the Iranian Foreign Ministry, Rasoul Mousavi, the conference was “an opportunity for scholars to discuss the subject away from Western taboos and the restriction imposed on them in Europe.” Although the event was widely seen as a political stunt typical of the hubristic Ahmadinejad administration, it nonetheless sparked international outrage as to how such horrors of the 20th century could actually be held in question despite the validity of the official story largely considered the tragic truth during the 21st century.

The conference went on to be condemned by notable heads of state and public figures such as German Chancellor Angela Merkel; Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert; British Prime Minister Tony Blair; United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon; spokespersons for Belgium, Canada, France, Mexico, Poland, Russia, Switzerland, and the United States; and officials from the Vatican and the Archbishop of Canterbury. In addition to this criticism, several shadow conferences were held in reaction to Holocaust denial, including one held in Berlin, another in Israel, and yet another in Indonesia.

The cover-up of Jesus Christ’s bloodline is a conspiracy theory that postulates a lineage that contradicts the traditionally accepted narrative in the textual form of the New Testament. The implication of a lineage would indicate that Jesus Christ would have had a partner with whom to procreate and thus would have held a mortal existence. According to conspiracy theorists, Christ’s alleged partner may have been Mary Magdalene, and their descendants would be traceable to the Merovingian Dynasty of Europe. Conspiracy theorists also allege that the Roman Catholic Church has gone to great lengths to cover up this bloodline and preserve the integrity of Christian history.

The tale of a secret bloodline leading to Jesus Christ’s descendents may have received its first impetus in the 1970s, when the British filmmaker Henry Lincoln directed a series of three documentaries that cultivated speculation about the curious French village of Rennes-le-Chateau. Lincoln based much of his investigation of this village on a book titled Le Trésor Maudit de Rennes-le-Château, written by the French author Gérard de Sède. Lincoln, along with Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh, went on to create a 1982 best-selling book titled Holy Blood, Holy Grail, where the tales of a secret society named the Priory of Sion were largely perpetuated.

More than two decades later, in 2003, Dan Brown published The Da Vinci Code, which rekindled international interest in Jesus Christ’s bloodline. By 2010, the book had sold some 80 million copies and was translated into 44 different languages. The book’s popularity gave way to major motion pictures, documentaries examining the truth behind Brown’s claims, several spin-off books, and even “Da Vinci Code Tours” for millions of tourists and conspiracy theorists alike to enjoy. The medium itself had transnationalized Christ’s hidden bloodline conspiracy theory through creating accessibility for millions of readers.

Scholars of conspiracy theories often frame such phenomena as a reaction to larger global and international fears of an uncertain future combined with the democratization of information and ideas as disseminated via the Internet. More specifically, conspiracy theories may be viewed as a form of dealing with what Ulrich Beck called the “risk society,” in which human-manufactured theories produce disorder and anxiety about futurist possibilities. Where conspiracy theorists believed that information-providing institutions have repeatedly failed to present the truth to everyone inclusively, conspiracy theorizing provided a sense of agency in pursuing an alternative view of official narratives.

CONSTANTINE (CA. 272–337 CE)

Constantine I, also known as Constantine the Great, ruled the Roman Empire in the early fourth century CE. He served as Roman emperor from 306 until his death in 337 and was sole emperor from 324 to 337 CE. Constantine is best known for ending the persecution of Christians in the Roman Empire, legalizing the Christian religion, and converting to Christianity himself, becoming the first Christian Roman emperor.

Constantine was born around 272 CE in the city of Naissus (Niš, Serbia). His father, Constantius, was the governor of Dalmatia under Emperor Diocletian. In 285, Diocletian split the Roman Empire in two; although it was still considered one political entity, Diocletian ruled in the east, from Nicomedia (Izmit, Turkey), and Maximian became co-emperor in the west, from Mediolanum (Milan, Italy) and Augusta Treverorum (Trier, Germany). In 293, Diocletian and Maximian appointed subordinate rulers, or Caesars, for each of their two subdivisions: Constantius in the west and Galerius in the east. This system of four rulers was called the Tetrarchy. In 305, both Diocletian and Maximian resigned and were succeeded as coemperors by Constantius and Galerius, with Severus and Maximian taking over as Caesars. When Constantius died in 306, Severus was promoted to emperor in the West and Constantine took over as Caesar, ruling over Britain, Gaul, and Spain. By 324, he was the sole emperor of the vast Roman Empire.

One of the most significant accomplishments of Constantine's rule was the reversal of the Christian persecutions that had gone on previously, including Diocletian's Great Persecution of 303. While he never declared Christianity the official religion of the realm, Constantine did legalize the religion with the Edict of Milan in 313. Although a similar edict was issued by Galerius in 311, the Edict of Milan went further because it not only ordered the removal of penalties for confessing to Christianity but also ordered confiscated property to be returned to the Christians.

Apart from legalizing Christianity, Constantine was influential in the development of the religion in a number of ways. Constantine's mother Helena was a Christian, and at some point, he converted to Christianity as well, becoming the first Christian emperor. The date of his conversion is debated but most likely occurred following the Battle of Milvian Bridge in 312. In 325, he convened the first ecumenical council, the Council of Nicea, the purpose of which was to establish unified doctrines for the religion. He also moved the empire's capital to Byzantium in Asia Minor, rebuilding the city and renaming it Constantinople (Istanbul, Turkey). Constantinople served as the cultural and political center of the Roman Empire from 330 to 395 and as the seat of the Byzantine Church and capital of the Byzantine/Eastern Roman Empire from 395 to 1204.

CONSTANTINOPLE

Constantinople was the capital of the East Roman/Byzantine Empire for more than 1,000 years and is one of the most important cities in world and religious history. Now known as Istanbul, it is located on the Bosphorus Strait in Anatolia on the site of the ancient city of Byzantium. The city was founded by the Roman Emperor Constantine I as “New Rome” in 330 CE to move his imperial capital closer to the frontiers of the empire. For much of its history, Constantinople was the largest and most affluent city in Europe, and its location allowed it to control major trade routes to Asia. It also provided western Europe with a significant defense from both barbarian and Islamic invasions for several centuries. A prime example of the city’s opulence is the jewel of Byzantine architecture, the Hagia Sophia, which was the largest church structure in the world for more than a 1,000 years. Constantinople’s capture in 1453 by the Ottoman Empire is considered by many historians to mark the end of the Middle Ages, as refugees from the city contributed to the Renaissance by bringing an influx of Greco-Roman culture to the rest of Europe.

Constantinople’s role in the history of Christianity cannot be overstated. Its bishop, the Patriarch of Constantinople, was recognized as second in honor only to the pope of Rome in 381, and the tradition that the apostle Andrew had evangelized Byzantium allowed the city to bolster its claim to such prestige. Because the Byzantine emperors desired to ensure that imperial unity was not threatened by Christian division, they summoned seven ecumenical councils during the first millennium to solve major theological disputes; four of these councils were held either in Constantinople or its suburb Chalcedon. In 1054, tensions between the bishops of Rome and Constantinople led to the “Great Schism” between what are known today as the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches, which remain the two largest Christian communions. Due to the schism, the patriarchate of Constantinople became the pre-eminent see in the Eastern Orthodox Church, a position that it still holds.

After Sultan Mehmed II captured the city, he made it the capital of the Ottoman Empire, thus transforming the city from a Christian stronghold into one of the most important Islamic cities in the world. Constantinople’s fall was a major blow to Christendom and its popular belief that the city was protected by God and therefore unconquerable. Conversely, many Muslims interpreted their victory as divine affirmation of Islam’s superiority over Christianity. It remains one of the world’s largest predominantly Muslim cities; however, in the 20th century, the secularization of the city together with the rise of anti-Turkish Arab nationalism, considerably weakened its reputation in the Islamic world. The Republic of Turkey officially renamed the city Istanbul in 1930.

CONSUMER CULTURE

One prominent feature of globalization is embodied within the pursuit of goods, a social phenomenon often referred to as the “consumer culture.” Broadly defined, consumer culture refers to an actual culture within a society that is actively invested in purchasing and/or venerating material possessions. As networks of transnational commerce have maintained and strengthened this culture of consumption, religious beliefs and practices within the global community have adjusted to accommodate for this type of commodity-centered activity. Although this vast web of commodity production and acquisition has certainly been seen as a threat to religious principles geared toward the attenuation of personal pleasures, individuation, and vice, the marketing of religious events and products has complemented consumer culture. Where Émile Durkheim’s conceptual theory of religion advanced the notion of the distinctions between the sacred and profane, the world of commodity production has provided ample material for the sacralizing of any product as well as its process of consumption.

Classical theories of consumer culture stem from the works of the economist Karl Marx. Marx delineated consumption by demonstrating how consumers within the parameters of capitalism become alienated or detached from the use value of a given commodity, while curiously privileging its exchange value. As the exchange value gradually erases any traces of the use value, marketing strategies become free to create myths about the qualities of a given product.

Thorstein Veblen's late-19th-century book The Theory of the Leisure Class advances some of Marx's themes about privileging exchange value over use value by illustrating how certain classes enact processes of consumption in an attempt to display financial superiority over others. Veblen denounced this form of consumption as a type of irrational economic behavior, emphasizing a political tenor that runs through what he termed "conspicuous consumption," whereby the leisure class was capable of maintaining and improving its status based on the accumulation of goods.

In this critical tradition, more contemporary works by Stuart Ewen have drawn on the admiration for and acquisition of goods believed to embody attributes indicative of certain status-building characteristics. This commodity fetishism, as it is known, refers to a process of pursuing goods that will signify a certain ideal status for the consumer. Where the motivation for acquiring goods can be linked to an affinity with unnecessary consumption, the method by which one acquires such goods may also be driven by a symbolic adoration of the goods themselves.

Perhaps the most popular example of this type of consumer culture and religion is found within the celebration of Christmas. This event demonstrates how the economy of consumption and gift giving undermines the principles of this symbolic celebration. Although consumer culture appears to challenge sacred religious principles, it also provides publicity, serving to institutionalize Christmas as a widely recognized celebration regardless of one's religious conviction.

CONVERSION

Conversion is the process of an individual or a group changing religious allegiance from one faith or community to another or from no particular religious affiliation to one with an identifiable name and organization. It is the major way in which religious traditions around the world have expanded beyond their initial communities of origin, though the forms of conversion and its effectiveness are often contested subjects. This entry begins with some background statistics of global world religions competing for converts. Next, it presents an analysis of conversion models and relates these to globalization, the nation-state, the religious organization, and the converting subject, ending with some general conclusions.

Global World Religions Competing for Converts

The 15 main global religions competing for converts worldwide are presented in Table 1. The data from the Internet source of statistics on religious communities, www.adherents.com, also address the internal cohesion and doctrinal standardization of the global world religions. Baha'i and Islam show much greater internal cohesion than Christianity, Buddhism, and especially Hinduism. The large group of people with no religion (16%) is made up mostly of unaffiliated believers with only a tiny portion of atheists included (2.5%). This 16% is the population targeted for conversion by all global world religions.

Although Islam is growing strongly, by almost 3% a year, Christians still form the largest group, constituting one third of the world's population. Christianity is growing on average by 2.3% a year, but this percentage obscures some big differences. Roman Catholicism is growing by only 1.3% a year, because it continues to lose many adherents to Pentecostalism in its main continent, Latin America. Protestantism is growing by 3.3% worldwide, but the real growth explosion is taking place in the "born-again" Christian churches. Pentecostal and evangelical churches are growing by 7% annually. How can conversion models explain these statistics?

Conversion Models

Conversion has been an important theme in the anthropology, sociology, and psychology of religion for many decades. In the sociology and psychology of religion, the crisis or deprivation approach was dominant since the research on "brainwashing" in the 1950s. Later research became increasingly critical of this perspective and moved toward a more actor-oriented approach. This second approach stressed converts as active agents, weighing different religious alternatives and negotiating the requirements for conversion with the religious organization. Structural constraints on actors were included as, for example, socialization, personality, lifestyle, culture, economics, and politics.

The standard conversion model in sociology was developed by John Lofland and Rodney Stark. It was presented as an ever-narrowing funnel. For conversion to occur, three predisposing characteristics (acutely felt tensions, a religious problem-solving perspective, and self-definition as a "religious seeker") had to combine with four situational factors: reaching a turning point when old solutions no longer worked, formation of affective bonds with one or more members, weakening affective ties with nonmembers, and intensive social interaction with members of the religious organization.

The Lofland-Stark model has been criticized as too static and too individualistic. The role of prior socialization was mostly ignored. Alienation and frustration were measured only after people had already become members. Variability in social availability of potential recruits was ignored, and there was a tendency to attribute affiliation with marginal groups to irrationality or emotional instability.

Many later social science approaches to religious conversion confused recruitment to a church with having a conversion experience. Less attention was given to the worldview of the subject prior to conversion (preaffiliation) or to regular visitors becoming formal church members without ever reporting a conversion experience (affiliation in the typology below).

Almost all social scientific research on conversion until the 1990s was based on research in Christian churches or in new religious movements. The scope of these studies was also severely limited by the fact that they were all conducted in the United States or in Europe. A few of these models were being applied to 85% of the world population living in other continents.

The conversion career approach addresses most of these criticisms. The conversion career is defined as the member's passage, within his or her social and cultural context, through levels of church participation. An essential element of the conversion career approach is to develop a typology of religious activity that includes more levels than disaffiliation and conversion. Preaffiliation describes the worldview and social context of potential members of a religious organization. Affiliation refers to formal church membership, which does not necessarily form a central aspect of one's identity. Conversion, used here in the limited sense, refers to a personal change of worldview and identity. Confession is core membership, describing a high level of participation inside the new religious organization and a strong missionary attitude toward nonmembers. Finally, disaffiliation refers to a lack of involvement in a religious organization.

The conversion career approach also distinguishes five main groups of factors influencing conversion: individual factors; social factors; institutional factors, dealing with the religious organization; cultural factors, including political and economic factors; and contingency factors. Contingency factors involve random meetings with missionaries, acutely felt crises, stressful situations, and other contingencies that bring individuals into the orbit of religious organizations. The conversion career is a systematic approach to analyzing shifts in levels of individual religious participation that can be applied comparatively worldwide. It is important to recognize, however, that trends in religious growth and decline are affected not just by rates of conversion but by factors such as varying birth rates within religious groups.

Conversion and Globalization

Religious conversion seems to thrive under the influence of the globalization process. The defining characteristic of contemporary globalization is its speed, aided by technology (mass media and computers) and massive migration from the South to the North. Television brings the reality of life in the North much more intensely into the homes of poor people in the South, stimulating migration. Economic interdependence and mass media create a global society, which provides an excellent breeding ground for religious change and religious mobility. Migrants introduce their religions in other parts of the world. Some cling to their parental religions under new and uncertain circumstances; others become more open to experimentation with new religions. Moreover, some religions, such as Pentecostalism, seem particularly "made to travel."

The increased speed and efficiency of global communication have also led to increased conflicts.

Political, economic, ethnic, and religious struggles are intensified, and often even fueled, by modern mass media and the use of computer technology for mobilization ends. Interreligious competition for members between religions also becomes fiercer because it now happens on a global scale. Most religions nowadays have transnational networks, and all use mass media to spread their message. Because the religious perspective is both powerful and empowering, its adherents are continually tempted to use religion to solve the many problems they face in their daily lives: at home, at work, at school, in their local community, in society as a whole, and finally even in the global collectivity of fellow believers. Under certain circumstances, religious or political leaders try to appeal to all believers of the same faith. Doing this, they support a worldview that distinguishes primarily between "us" and "them," risking conflict on the outside by stimulating cohesion on the inside.

Because religion is such an efficient source for mobilization, it is rarely free from state intervention. Missionaries are subject to strict state controls in most parts of the world. Nations that leave their citizens free to roam the Internet and watch religious programs on television run the risk that many of them will find a new religion that they like. Easy access to abundant information often leads to increased curiosity. Curiosity, in turn, often provides the initial stimulus to seek out new alternatives that eventually may lead to conversion. Hence, the contemporary globalization process clearly also stimulates the forces that want to counteract its effects on national society by putting limits on religious freedom. It has been argued, plausibly, that it is exactly because of the intensified globalization process that many national governments want to curb or even prohibit the activities of (foreign) religious organizations and missionaries. Hence, globalization is a prime factor in the current explosion of religious conflicts and religiously inspired violence in nation-states all over the world.

Conversion and the Nation-State

What does conversion mean for the nation-state? In cultural anthropological and mission studies typical of the 1950s, conversion was considered an element of cultural change. The supposed transition to modernity in non-Western countries was thought to lead to instability and crises in those cultures. Conversion to a (Western) world religion was seen as a response to that crisis—a solution that was at the same time intellectual, psychological, sociological, cultural, and of course religious.

It is not just that culture change leads to a rise in conversions, but the process also works vice versa: An increase in conversions has the potential to change a local culture. Hence, many societies and many nations fear religious change in general and conversion in particular. Their main aim is to protect their own long-established religious traditions, which are often interwoven with the nation-state. In many parts of the world, religion and society are intimately connected. In Indonesia, only five religions are officially allowed. In India, Hindu nationalists claim that conversion to Islam or Christianity is equivalent to robbing the nation of its citizens. Similar accusations are directed against people wanting to convert from Orthodox Christianity to other religions in Russia.

In Latin America, at least until the 1970s, it was also common to hear that to be a Mexican, Chilean, and so on was to be a Catholic—if only a nominal Catholic. The religious monopoly of the Roman Catholic Church in most Latin American countries started eroding in the late 19th century. Protestant missionaries, mostly from the United States, were persecuted violently in some countries in Latin America until the 1950s and 1960s. This has been challenged increasingly with the massive growth of Pentecostalism since then. Although the literature shows that the majority of target populations generally reject new religious options, clearly, under some circumstances, new religions can gain a massive following. In areas with strong Pentecostal presences (all of Central America, Brazil, and the Southern Cone), the concepts of national identity and even citizenship are gradually changing under the influence of this religious change. In these countries, a “Pentecostalization” of religion and society is becoming visible. This illustrates the influence that massive conversions to a new religion can have on their host societies.

Fear for the cultural changes that accompany conversion motivates most countries in the Middle East to allow no religious freedom at all. Islam forms a religious monopoly, protected by the nation-state, leaving Muslims in Middle Eastern countries with three religious options that are all internal to Islam: inactivity, nominal activity, or radicalism.

Religious mobility is currently close to zero in the Middle East, low in western Europe and India, somewhat higher in eastern Europe, much higher in the United States, and probably highest in many African and Latin American countries (especially Brazil and Central America). The Pentecostalization of Latin America illustrates the increasing influence of the globalization process, which in turn is tied to the characteristics of the religious organization.

Conversion and the Religious Organization

No matter how people make choices concerning the religion they profess, religious organizations will typically be competing for members. The quintessential condition is not the “rational” actor or even the implicit or explicit cost-benefit analyses people make of the religious organizations they visit. The essence is religious liberty: the freedom to choose one’s religion and the freedom to express that choice by publicly participating in, or perhaps just visiting, a particular religious organization.

Religious freedom leads to religious pluralism, which in turn leads to interreligious competition for members. Religious organizations can compete against each other by using their unique histories, their core beliefs and doctrines, their codes of conduct, their morality, their special rituals, their unique forms of empowerment (e.g., the Holy Spirit in Pentecostalism), their theologies, their organizations, their leadership, their characteristic religious experiences (e.g., speaking in tongues in Pentecostalism), their prayers, their miraculous healings, their access to prosperity, their music and worship styles, and their special missionary programs and agents.

However, religious organizations require religious freedom and religious pluralism, which exist in differing degrees all over the world. In the United States, religious freedom is essential and constitutes an important cultural factor in conversion. But even here, some religions receive more (tax) benefits than others and some religious organizations are subject to more state harassment than others. In western Europe, mainstream churches are often favored and even subsidized by the state.

The religious market in western European countries tends to be more regulated, and declining religious groups may merge or form a cartel. The demand for organized religion seems to be lower in western Europe than in the United States or Latin America, although the demand for spirituality and other free-flowing forms of religion remains stable among western Europeans.

The religious organization by itself constitutes a major factor in the conversion process. This institutional factor includes not only the appeal of the religious organization—its practices, rituals, doctrines, and so forth—but also how it defines and shapes the conversion process. What are the religious organization's requisites for membership, conversion, and commitment? And how are these enforced? In other words, how much negotiation is possible between the religious organization and the converting subject?

The Converting Subject

Contemporary conversions in areas with religious freedom—the United States, Europe, Latin America, and most of sub-Saharan Africa—still occur typically during adolescence and young adulthood, much as it was in the West around 1900, according to William James. Most conversions still happen between the ages of 15 and 25. However, the literature is also biased in selecting informants overwhelmingly from this age category.

Age is highly relevant in influencing the subject's "structural availability": How much freedom and time do people have to seek out religious organizations and visit them? The converting subject nowadays has many ways to make first contact with the religious groups, but the main avenues are those based on one's social networks, on contacts with the mass media, and on chance encounters with missionary agents from religious organizations. The informant's social network includes not only spouses and children but also friends, family members in the broadest sense (ranging from siblings and cousins to grandparents), and ties to neighbors, colleagues at work, neighborhood dwellers, and acquaintances. Although one would expect to encounter gender differences in the conversion process, starting with the primary socialization in one's parental religion, the literature is mostly silent on this.

Mass media typically bring people in contact with religious organizations: radio and television, the Internet, and occasionally newspapers or weekly magazines. Usually, the program or article explicitly deals with the theme of religion, but occasionally, it is sufficient just to hear compelling conversion stories on the radio or to see people's testimonies delivered on television. This makes people curious about the group, which provides the impetus to visit them, especially if one is accompanied by an acquaintance.

People tend to make implicit or explicit cost-benefit analyses of the religious organizations they visit (although the concept of "rational choice" has been seen as problematic in religion). People typically stay in the religious organizations where they feel at home. For this to happen, various requirements have to coincide: feeling accepted and supported by core members, obeying the religion's code of conduct, understanding core doctrines, and getting involved as a church volunteer. If one or more of these fail to occur, disaffiliation is a likely outcome.

Conclusions

The following are general conclusions with respect to the phenomenon of religious conversion:

- Childhood and adolescence continue to be important stages of the life cycle influencing people's religious commitment later in life.
- Conversion in the limited sense of the conversion career approach always requires a change in religious worldview and identity. Empirical indicators of conversion as a rupture with a former identity and the ubiquitous utilization of the convert identity in all areas of life are still relevant in contemporary studies of religious change worldwide.
- Researchers should be careful to distinguish recruitment (joining a church) from conversion. This distinction provides more insights into the high religious mobility of individuals worldwide.
- The contemporary importance of religious seeking and especially religious shopping is directly related to the increased availability of options on the religious market and the increased accessibility of these options through modern mass media (radio, television, and the Internet).

First contact with new religious groups is nowadays more often established through modern mass media rather than through personal agents.

- The conversion process is primarily influenced by significant others (relatives, friends, and acquaintances) through the social networks the individual belongs to. It is clear from the literature that almost all people, men and women, are recruited to religious organizations through their own social networks. While studying the role of networks in religious recruitment, it is important to identify who are the first in a network to convert to a new religion. These typically are the core members—people at the confession level of the conversion career.
- As these people consider the pros and cons of membership in a religious organization, they always make an implicit or explicit cost-benefit analysis.
- Recruitment to religious organizations is therefore influenced heavily by the competition for members taking place between various religious organizations all over the world. This means that a global religious market is already in operation, although people seem to base their religious choice on the available local options in their neighborhood, city, or country.

COOK ISLANDS

The Cook Islands, named in 1888 in honor of Captain James Cook, who “discovered” them during his second voyage (1772–1775), are 15 islands in the southwest Pacific Ocean, grouped in two archipelagos: The northern group comprises coral atolls, and the southern group includes Rarotonga, the main island where 68% of the population is concentrated. The Cook Islands became a British protectorate in 1888 and were transferred to New Zealand in 1901. In 1964, Cook Islanders obtained self-governance, which gives them a political autonomy and New Zealand citizenship while certain domains (money and defense) remain within New Zealand’s competence. Christianity was brought to these islands between 1821 (Aitutaki Island) and 1857 (Pukapuka Island) jointly by British missionaries of the London Missionary Society (Williams, Pitman, and Buzacott) and Tahitian evangelists or teachers—Papehia being the most famous. From the opening in 1839 of the Takamo College in Rarotonga, Cook Islanders have been trained and in their turn became pastors and missionaries in Samoa, New Caledonia, and Loyalty Islands, in New Hebrides and, after 1872, in Papua New Guinea.

In the 2001 census, the distribution of religious membership was as follows: The Cook Islands Christian Church (CICC), which is the heir of the London Missionary Society, included 55.9% of the population; the Roman Catholic Church, established in 1894, 16.8%; the Seventh-Day Adventists, 7.8%; Pentecostal churches, 4.1%; the Mormon Church (LDS), 3.8%; and Jehovah's Witnesses, 1.7% (Others, 4.1%; No religion or objection to the question, 5.6%).

Since the 1970s, strong migratory movements toward New Zealand and Australia has led to a population decrease and aging in the Cook Islands, with a direct impact on religious practices. In 2006, 19,569 people lived on the Cook Islands, while 58,008 Cook Islanders lived in New Zealand and approximately 30,000 in Australia.

In this context, the CICC exemplifies a three-fold dynamic of transnationalization, cultural reaffirmation, and internal diversification. In 2005, the church had 26 parishes on Cook Islands, 20 in New Zealand (established since the 1980s), and 12 in Australia. These parishes are under the direct supervision of the Mother Church and led by pastors trained at the Takamoa College in Rarotonga. The majority of the college applications come from New Zealand and Australia. This trend throws light on the link between pastoral calling and reappropriation of culture and language and shows how the church can be a place of identity reaffirmation in migratory and multicultural contexts.

In 2005, a debate raised within the church about the recognition of baptism by immersion—which was eventually refused—underlined the influence of an evangelical stream in the church and a functioning inspired by congregationalism that copes with internal diversity.

These three features of the church—transnationalization, cultural reaffirmation, and internal diversification—explain, along with its strong historical legitimacy, the relative dynamism of the CICC, which has demonstrated an ability to face both religious globalization and individualization.

COPTIC CHRISTIANITY

The term Coptic Christianity refers to the various forms of Egyptian Christianity, in particular the Coptic Orthodox Church. Originally, the word Coptic, from the Greek Aigyptos ("Egyptian"), referred to Egyptians in general. However, as Islam became the dominant religion in Egypt, the term evolved to refer specifically to Egyptian Christians. Coptic is also the name of their liturgical language, a form of Egyptian written with Greek and Demotic characters. Of the 10–15 million Coptic Orthodox Christians in the world, the majority are still located in Egypt, with only 2 million spread out among various other countries.

The Coptic Orthodox Church traces itself back to the first century CE. According to the fourth-century church historian Eusebius, St. Mark traveled to Egypt following Jesus' death to preach the gospel and founded the Apostolic See of Alexandria. Over the following centuries, Alexandria became one of the most important centers of Christianity, producing key figures such as Athanasius, Cyril, Clement, and Origen. The Egyptian church also played an important role during the fourth century in determining which texts would be included in the Christian Old and New Testaments. Even Christian monasticism had its roots in Egypt, later spreading to other lands within the realm of Christianity.

Theological controversies within Christianity during the fourth and fifth centuries eventually led to a schism between the Egyptian Coptic Church and the Roman Catholic Church and even to a divide within Coptic Christianity itself. The Church of Alexandria split itself into two groups in 451 after a disagreement over Jesus' human and divine nature. The majority of Egyptians followed the beliefs of what is now known as the Coptic Orthodox Church of Alexandria, under the Coptic Pope of Alexandria and Patriarch of All Africa on the Holy Apostolic See of St. Mark, while others agreed doctrinally with the Roman and Byzantine Churches and formed what is now the Oriental Orthodox Church under the Greek Orthodox Pope of Alexandria and Patriarch of All Africa. Neither group recognized the other's authority, and both tried aggressively to gain the upper hand until Arabs invaded Egypt in 639 and brought the new Islamic faith with them. As Islam gained in popularity, Coptic Christianity waned, becoming the minority religion in Egypt by the ninth century.

Under Muslim rule, Coptic Christians in Egypt faced targeted taxation and fluctuating periods of toleration and persecution, including the confiscation of church property, the destruction of churches and monasteries, and the removal of Coptic civil servants from office. Their situation began to improve in the 19th century under Muhammad Ali's dynasty but deteriorated again following political upheaval in the 1950s, and in many ways, Coptic Christians in Egypt continue to face marginalization in the second decade of the 21st century.

COSMIC WAR AND COSMIC CONFLICT

The enduring image of cosmic war is evidence that the religious imagination is steeped in violence. Biblical bans, Christian Crusades, Islamic jihads, and the warfare of Hindu epics all attest to it. Religiously sanctioned battles may be discerned even in the Buddhist epics of Sri Lanka. The evidence is not only ancient but contemporary. At the turn of the 21st century, it seems as if violence in the name of religion is appearing everywhere. What motivates this? Competing claims to proper conduct or to sacred places drive some of this violence. In other cases, conflict is seen as etched into a turbulent universe, as if the very powers of righteousness were under siege.

Images of great warfare—sometimes conceived in moral terms as the forces of good versus evil, sometimes in metaphysical terms as the power of social order versus the chaos of disorder—have been part of religious thinking since antiquity. The image of Chaoskampf, “the war against chaos,” is an ancient mytheme rooted in narratives of divine combat, wherein a supreme god defeats chaos-monsters such as Leviathan, Bohemoth, Tiamat, Yam, and Mot. Its seeds have been traced to a variety of contexts but mainly to Ugaritic, Mesopotamian, and biblical literatures. As summarized by the historian Norman Cohn (1993), the Chaoskampf conveys a sense of cosmic war: “a conviction that a mighty spiritual power intent on maintaining and furthering life in an ordered world is locked in struggle with a spiritual power, scarcely less mighty, intent on destroying life and reducing the ordered world to chaos” (p. 105).

In the last decades of the 20th century and the beginning of the 21st century, dramatic incidents of terrorist acts have been carried out in the name of religion, most spectacularly the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon on September 11, 2001. Though some of these incidents might be attributed to ideologically manipulated battles for land, authority, or opportunity, many of them were seeped in the rhetoric of ultimate warfare between the forces of light and darkness. It was as if the ancient Chaoskampf motif had returned in the guise of contemporary acts of terrorism. The first scholar to make this connection and to describe these images as “cosmic war” was the sociologist Mark Juergensmeyer in an article in 1987, later elaborated in books published in 1993, 2003, and 2008. Other social analysts also took up the phrase to describe this compelling religious articulation of situations of contemporary conflict. Not only scholars of religion but also national security experts have used the concept in trying to grasp, for instance, the ritualized dimensions of suicide. Cosmic conflict is thus not just a term for ancient mythic themes but an emerging rubric for understanding religious terrorism.

Identifying Motifs

However contemporary in expression, cosmic conflict has primordial features. Telltale motifs may include the following: (1) a perceived rupture between the divinely established social order and the current one; (2) acclaim for glorious heroes, gods, and legends associated with the establishment of a righteous order; and (3) the ritualization of battle, seen in prebattle initiations, oaths, and divinely authorized rules of engagement.

Rupture

A perceived rupture between the heaven-ordained social order and the current one is nowhere more evident than in laments for a world gone awry—surely one of the oldest poetic themes in religious literature. The theme is conspicuous in the writings of the biblical prophets but is implicit also in the story of Adam and Eve, the increasingly destructive cycle of Hindu world ages, the mappo thinking of Japanese Buddhism, and countless quests to recover lost virtue. A sense of rupture lies unmistakably behind notions such as maya—the Eastern sense of everyday life as illusion—and original sin—seen by some Christians to infect the whole of human experience. The sense of rupture has inspired some of the most moving allegories in world religions.

Yet the same notion may inspire remedial and violent religious activism. Acute expressions of such activism may be found in millennial movements over much of the world. Radical examples today include the Christian Reconstructionist movement and Islamist movements fashioned around the thinking of Sayyid Qutb and Abd al-Salam Faraj. Such groups shun what they perceive to be a decadent moral relativism and ardently embrace a return to pure fundamentals, seen as original to the founding moments of their respective faiths—the teachings of the Bible, on the one hand, and of Mohammad and the Qur'an, on the other. They envision, too, calamitous consequences should a return to that founding order fail to occur, which gives their movements apocalyptic urgency. The clash between the world they foresee and the world of their immediate experience is often intense, requiring extraordinary and curative measures. Hence, the Reconstructionists see the establishment of a biblical code of law in the United States as essential to secure Christ's imminent return, and Qutb and al-Salam Faraj saw the return of the Islamic caliphate and Shari'a law as essential to the restoration of justice on earth. Both movements idolize soldiers for their respective causes, whether it is John Calvin, with his promotion of the authority of God in matters of state, or the early companions of the prophet Mohammed, who spent much of their time in holy struggle against polytheists and hypocrites. Seeking to restore a world gone awry, such groups promote violence and intolerance under the mantle of cosmic war.

Warring Deities and Heroes

A related motif is the emulation of legendary divinities and heroes from primordial battles associated with the establishment of a righteous order. Ancient battle narratives are rife with this motif. Just as ancient deities Poseidon, Ares, Athena, Ishtar, Ashur, and Yahweh march in front, leading troops in battle, perpetrating vengeance and divine slaughter, so too do ancient heroes Odysseus, Hector, Achilles, Mursilis, Assurbanipal and biblical figures Joshua and Barak, basically as divine mirrors. Just as ancient battle narratives make gods radiate extraordinary power (destructive fire, cacophonous shrieks, earthly tremors, and paralyzing fear), legendary human warriors exude much the same (e.g., the melammu of kings in Mesopotamia and the mēnis of Achilles in the Iliad) and with equally dire consequences. Miracles are especially savored. Angels descended to fight alongside warriors in early Islamic battles, an angel led the Israelites through the enemy lands from Sinai to Canaan, and the Virgin Mary led the crusading Christian troops against the Saracens in Syria. Ancient deities not only sanction but actually guide holy wars.

That warlike deities and legendary heroes continue to resonate with today's religious warriors is indisputable. Rabbi Meir Kahane, Israeli Kach party founder, explicitly looked to the biblical deity as a role model for militant activism: Just as Yahweh once defeated the Egyptians to return the Israelites to Canaan, so should the chosen people defeat the Palestinians for dominion of the nation-state of Israel. Kahane proclaimed war against Palestinians a mitzvah, a holy duty. The Reverend Michael Bray, promoting lethal attacks on U.S. women's clinics, proclaimed, "The Lord God is a man of war," relying on military metaphors from Exodus, the prophets, Psalms, and St. Paul (i.e., 2 Thessalonians 2; Romans 16:20). The 9/11 terrorists took on pseudonyms of the early associates of Prophet Mohammad, and their last instructions urge, "Remember the battle of the Prophet against the infidels . . . as he went on building the Islamic state." In India, the god Rama once defeated evil forces in Sri Lanka, and centuries of heroic resistance against Muslims and the British incited Indian warriors to defend Rama's birthplace. Legendary heroes provide mythic prototypes for warriors today.

Legendary heroes in cosmic wars tend to be represented not only as victors but also as victims. When battles are lost, it is victims who provide mythic prototypes, usually in the form of martyrs. Imam Huseyn's martyrdom in the 7th-century battle at Karbala is for Shi'ite Muslims today no less redemptive than is the martyrdom of Jesus for Christians and is mimicked during yearly passion plays. Prince Lazar's beheading at the Field of Blackbirds in Kosovo remains an open wound for some Serbian Christians; the 14th-century battle is still declaimed in song and art. Black Tiger Day in Sri Lanka symbolically resurrects scores of Hindu martyrs for the Tamil Tigers fighting Buddhists in Sri Lanka, and Sikhs embrace four centuries of militant martyrs who fought Mughals and the British over land in the Punjab. As the Greek root word attests, martyrs "witness" (μαρτυρ-) to the righteousness of a religious quest. They also die for it. From the age when Christians became martyrs at the hands of the Romans, the promise of a glorious and redemptive death continues to lure religious witnesses of all kinds.

The power of these heroic archetypes to motivate violence is tied to religion's capacity to hallow memories of triumph and to inflame memories of anguish. Yes, Joshua's victory at Jericho was divinely ordained, but it is the horror of the Holocaust and two millennia of pogroms that vividly incite Zionist struggles today. The myth of divine deliverance of Israelites from slavery in Egypt is still appealing to oppressed peoples on three continents; not forgotten too is the deity's habit of hardening the enemy's heart. The martyrdom of the prophet Mohammad's grandson is for Shi'a Islam a source of redemption through the Mahdi, who will return at the end of time. Yet his beheading by fellow Muslims remains a piercing memory, illustrative of many other betrayals. The Roman crucifixion of Jesus is understood to symbolize triumph over death and Satan. Yet it remains an agonizing spectacle for many Christians. By rooting rituals and liturgies in these poignant memories, religion keeps both hope and misery alive.

Ritualization of Battle

The ritualization of battle, and especially of the steps that initiate battle, is apparent in holy wars from ancient times to the 9/11 attacks on the United States. Prebattle consecration of warriors is evident in Joshua 3:5, which mandates that warriors "hallow themselves" before taking Jericho. Constantine had X and R inscribed on the shields of his army to invite divine blessing before the battle at Milvian Bridge, and Frankish priests blessed the swords of Charlemagne's Christian army before it fought the pagans. The Qur'an reports that Allah sent rain to purify warriors before battle (Qur'an 8:11), and the last communications to the 9/11 bombers promise that angels shall pray for the bombers as long as they are in a state of ablution. Purifying rituals help intensify commitments and transform ordinary religious activists into holy warriors for God.

Oaths made before battle hold a similar power. Loyalty oaths to Yahweh are conspicuous in the Bible, and the phenomenon predates Israel in near-eastern oaths of fidelity between heads of state and vassals to be summoned in case of war. Christian Crusaders "took the cross" before setting out to fight "infidels," and failure in that quest was taken as a betrayal of an oath before God. Suicide pledges are famous in the cases of the Jewish Zealots at Masada and the Shinto-informed kamikaze of World War II. The final instructions to the 9/11 suicide bombers urge them to swear an oath to die, even though suicide is expressly forbidden by Islam. Prebattle oaths can catapult the warrior into a sacred sphere, wherein normally proscribed acts are exalted.

Just rules of war (jus ad bellum) often fall under the umbrella of religion. Usually, they are geared toward humane ends. Virtually every religious tradition advocates mercy to suppliants and the sparing of noncombatants in war. The Bible professes strictures about marriage with war captives, and Islamic Hadith expressly prohibit battlefield rape and also the beheading and mutilation of captives. In the East, Sun Tzu warned that wartime excesses will thwart eventual control of civilian populations, and the most popular of Japanese war tales, the Heike Monogatari, laments the suffering of peasants. Nonetheless, mandates for wartime slaughter in exceptional circumstances are provided in the Bible, in the Qur'an, and in religious history. Religious principles may be made to undergird theories of total war as much as of jus ad bellum.

Another facet of jus ad bellum is of course the cultivating of a mental attitude toward combat. Typically, we look to Buddhism and the bushido code of Japan for the ritualized inducement of a pristine mind during actual combat, but the Indian Mahabharata too advocates individual transformation through fighting meditation, in the karma yoga described by Krishna to Arjuna. Sun Tzu espouses a fullness of rapport between leader and fighting forces, and virtually every successful general since Ashurbanipal has known the martial value of religious rhetoric in fanning as well as in checking battlefield excesses. Even the last instructions of the 9/11 bombers promise that the mission is for God and exhort the bombers to strike not for personal pleasure but in pursuit of God's justice only. This might be compared with Augustine's admonition to soldiers that Moses fought for duty only and never for personal quest. Cultivating a sublime mental state is key to training the religious warrior.

On the other hand, religious texts eloquently describe the battlefield frenzy of cosmic enemies, warriors, and gods alike. In the Mahabharata's Battle at Night, supernatural avengers wreak havoc and carnage on the Pandava camp, tearing up and devouring the entrails of corpses as does God Ares to the Achaians slain in the Iliad. Goddess Tiamat of the Babylonian creation epic is depicted as a chaos dragon, whom God Marduk must slay with mighty ferocity, then cut in two to create the earth and heavens. Similarly, the god Yahweh splits open the head of the monster of the sea to open up springs and streams and bring salvation to the earth (i.e., Psalm 74). Zoroastrian texts see the earth and world history as nothing short of a cosmic stage for the battle between Ahura Mazda and all the enemy gods. The entire cosmos is rearranged in Isaiah 24, where Yahweh's vengeance makes the world reel like a drunkard and "terror and pit and snare await the people of the earth." The glamorization of cosmic force and destruction is thus an inescapable motif in religious literature.

Conclusion

Cosmic conflict is a prominent theme in religious literature, encompassing a range of motifs. A rupture between the way things once were and now are is one such motif, often remembered in poetry and also acting as a spur for curative violence. Etiological myths commemorate heroic triumph and defeat, which ritual, myth, and liturgy may inflame into violent activism. Prewar rituals, rules for battle, and special states of mind for warriors are also circumscribed by religion. A preoccupation with extraordinary and redemptive violence may be discerned in religious myths, songs, art, and memories. As the foregoing illustrations show, the notion of cosmic conflict saturates world religions and has done so for a long time.

COSTA RICA

Costa Rica is a country in Central America located between Nicaragua and Panama. It is a confessional state of the Roman Catholic Apostolic religion; however, professing other religions is not prohibited, and among the other predominant ones are Protestant, Orthodox, Mormon, Jehovah's Witnesses, Judaism, Islam, and Buddhism.

In 1519 and 1522, the Spanish conquistadors arrived and thus began the Catholic evangelization of aboriginals, whose traditions were animist. The first church was built in 1544.

The creation of the diocese in 1850 (archdiocese in 1921) and the Concordato of 1851 gave the Bishop control over education to the detriment of liberal policies. Bishop Bernardo Thiel and the Jesuits were expelled in 1884 because of their opposition to secularization laws, which had been passed by the National Assembly. The church became institutionalized as a political party: Unión Católica (Catholic Union). Hence, the liberals authorized the return of Bishop Thiel, catechism to be taught in public schools, and the creation of a Catholic newspaper. The Bishop defended social justice and achieved the support of the rural proletariat.

Between 1870 and 1890, the railroad that would join the Central Valley with the Caribbean was built. Workers from the Antilles entered the country, bringing their beliefs in Myalism, Obeah, and Protestantism.

The following also settled in Costa Rica: the British and Foreign Biblical Society (1845), the Baptist Missionary Society of Jamaica (1887), the American Biblical Society (1890), the Seventh-Day Adventists (1903), the Episcopal Methodist Church (1917), Assemblies of God (1944), and the American Baptist Association (1946).

In the 1940s, Social Guarantees, the Labor Code, and Social Security were approved due to an agreement among the Archbishop Victor Manuel Sanabria; the Secretary of the Communist Party, Manuel Mora; and the President, Rafael A. Calderón Guardia. Also, Vanguardia Popular was born, a communist party that is a strong promoter of the Church's social doctrine, and a Catholic union—Rerum Novarum. After the civil war in 1948, Vanguardia Popular was proscribed, and the Church ended its period of social Catholicism.

The influence of Liberation Theology can be seen in the establishment of the Department of Ecumenical Research and the Ecumenical School of Religious Sciences at the National University.

In the 1990s, a neoconservative tendency emerged in the church, which along with the Catholic organization Opus Dei opposed sexual and reproductive freedom. The consequences were withdrawal of the government-provided sexual education guides, the discontinuation of the government program "Young Love," and an agreement with the ministry of education to maintain subsidies to Catholic schools.

According to a 2007 survey by the University of Costa Rica, among the population of 3,921,108, estimated in 2000, 68.6% declared themselves Catholic, 16.8% Protestant, and 5.6% as belonging to other religions; 9.1% said that they had no religion or did not answer.

COUNCIL OF NICEA

The Council of Nicea (or Nicaea; Greek Nikaia) was Christianity's first ecumenical council. It was called by Emperor Constantine in 325 CE to secure for the first time theological cohesion among the churches, especially regarding Christology and ritual practice. There were approximately 250 ranking attendees to debate and decide the future direction of Christianity.

A creed of faith was determined, imposing a single theology on all Christians. The main debate in the council centered on the Christological Arian controversy. The Arians believed that because Christ was the "only begotten" Son of the Father (see the Gospel of John 1:14, 16; 3:16, 18), he was not coeternal with the Father and must necessarily be inferior to Him. They were staunch monotheists and strictly opposed attributing any multiplicity to God. Those holding what is now anachronistically called the "orthodox" view argued that Christ must in all ways be equal to the Father because only God could offer salvation to man. Christ therefore could not be a creature of God but must be God himself incarnate, which would entail Christ's coeternality with the Father. With Constantine's support of the orthodox contingent, the Creed of Nicea was written using the Greek word homoousion, a word found in the philosopher Origen's work, meaning "of the same substance." It states that Christ is "true God from true God" and affirms God's unity in the face of multiplicity. The Creed also asserted the belief in the Holy Spirit and set the Trinity forever in orthodoxy. All clerics in attendance were required to sign the Creed and all but four did so; two were excommunicated, and two would eventually retract. This signed document of faith made Christianity uniform, at least officially, and became the foundation for all orthodoxy to follow.

Twenty canons were also issued by the Council. These deal with issues of church governance, new and return membership, promotion within church hierarchy, and proper behavior of church governors, as well as determining the preferential status of the Metropolitan sees (Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, with special mention of Jerusalem). Two canons also provided direction concerning cases of apostasy, mainly involving Novatianists (or Cathars) and Paulinists.

Also at issue at Nicea was the date of Easter. While 14 Nisan in the Jewish calendar had been traditional for the East, Constantine convinced the council not only that all Christians should celebrate the most important day in their calendar at the same time, but that the Jewish calculations should be forsaken in preference of the Roman calendar and calculation. From the close of the council, Easter would be determined by all in the manner of the Roman and Egyptian churches.

CREATIONISM

Broadly speaking, creationism is the belief that the universe was created in its current form by an all-powerful

God. In a narrower sense, it refers to the taking of creation narratives as true guides to the history of the emergence of life on earth. As such, it is at variance with the evolutionary theory of Darwinism, which argues that species evolved over long periods of time through the mechanism of natural selection and that divergent groups of plants and animals arose from the same ancestors.

Beyond a shared conviction that evolutionism threatens the underpinnings of society by challenging the cardinal doctrine that man was made in the image of God, creationists agree on precious little. Since the publication of Charles Darwin's Origin of Species in 1859, three competing schools have emerged. "Young-earth creationists" assert that the earth is about 6,000 years old and maintain that radical geological changes occurred because of the Noachian flood. "Old-earth creationists" also reject evolution but argue that the "days" of creation actually refer to long epochs of time and that the earth might therefore be as old as the scientists say it is (4.5 billion years old). Yet another group promotes the theory of "intelligent design," claiming that some biological systems are "irreducibly complex" and are therefore best explained by an intelligent cause, not an undirected process such as natural selection.

Until the 1990s, creationist ideas seemed confined to North America, an offshoot of conservative Protestant movements based in the United States. The first legal battle over evolution and creation (the famous "Scopes Monkey trial") took place in Tennessee in 1925. The concept of "creation science," which aimed to grant evolution and creation equal scientific standing, was born during the 1960s in the works of two Californian advocates of flood geology: Henry Morris and John Whitcomb. The "intelligent design" movement, though inspired by British 18th-century natural theology, was born in a Seattle-based think tank at the end of the 1980s.

The first decade of the 21st century, however, witnessed the spreading of antievolutionism throughout the world and from evangelical Protestantism to Catholicism, Islam, Judaism, and even Hinduism. Despite the efforts of national academies of science in Europe, Latin America, and Asia, it has now become a global phenomenon, indifferent to geographical or theological barriers.

Other than a profound distrust of the explanatory power of science, this phenomenon betrays a general insecurity about the moral health of nations. For most creationists, the rejection of evolution is indeed an entrance point to talk about other things, such as the role of government, the financing of public schools, or the values that children should be taught. This political dimension of the conflict ensures that the creation–evolution controversy will endure long into the next half century.

CROATIA

The Republic of Croatia is a country in southeastern Europe that was once a part of the communist state of Yugoslavia and has had a diverse history of religion, culture, and ethnic conflict. Its eastern coast covers the Balkan Peninsula and faces the Adriatic Sea. Zagreb is Croatia's capital. The earliest Croats were a community of Slavs who, leading a nomadic existence, eventually settled in their present homeland around the late sixth or early seventh century. Croatia's conversion to Christianity, on its greatest scale, took place in the ninth century, when Christian missionaries from Italy, Byzantium, and the Frankish state arrived on Croatian land. Christianization of the Croats developed from two cultural directions. Church rites in the Slavic language and script, which later developed into the Glagolitic script, were used by disciples of St. Cyril and St. Methodius of Salonika to convert the Croats. Also, the Latin language and liturgy were used, and spread, throughout Croatian territory by missionaries. Henceforth, Roman Catholicism would always play a major part in Croatian culture.

In 925 CE, Tomislav I was crowned the first King of Croatia, making Croatia an official kingdom. However, Croatia would not remain autonomous. In 1102, Coloman Arpad, of the Hungarian Arpad Dynasty, was crowned King of Dalmatia and Croatia, thus establishing a union between Croatia and Hungary. During the late Middle Ages, Catholicism continued to play an important role in cultivating Croatian culture. The mendicant orders of the Franciscans and Dominicans entered Croatia during this period, building monasteries and bringing Gothic styles to Croatian art and architecture, which was also promulgated by the formation of cathedrals in major cities such as Split and Dubrovnik.

The Protestant Reformation did not gain strong influence in Croatia, being swiftly subdued by the Counter-Reformation and, particularly, by the eclectic work of the Jesuits. The Jesuits came to Croatia in the mid-16th century, prominently utilizing education to revive Catholic thought and faith in Croatian society. In addition to establishing elementary schools in several Croatian cities, the Jesuits introduced the study of theology and philosophy by founding the Jesuit Academy in Zagreb in 1669, from which the University of Zagreb emerged, becoming the oldest and largest university of southeastern Europe. Many Jesuits played important roles in advancing science and culture in Croatia, thus also attracting support from Croatia's government. Consequently, in the early 17th century, the Sabor (the legislative body of Croatia) proclaimed Catholicism to be the only permitted faith in the country, thus rooting out Protestantism.

In 1526, Austrian Archduke Ferdinand Habsburg was elected king by the Croatian nobility. Ferdinand's election was especially important in aligning Croatia with the Austrian Empire against the invading Ottoman Empire. More than two centuries of wars with the Ottomans had a monumental influence on European culture, leaving Croatia with a particularly iconic geographical position. After Austria and Russia went to war against the Ottomans in 1787, a peace treaty was reached in 1791 separating the Austrian and Ottoman empires through a marked boundary, which today constitutes the line between Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, symbolizing the boundary where the Catholic West meets the Orthodox and Muslim East. Jewish immigration also spread to Croatia, beginning in the late 18th century and continuing to the early 20th, further diversifying the population.

After World War I in 1918, Croatia declared independence from Austria-Hungary and formed the Kingdom of Yugoslavia with Slovenia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Serbia, and Montenegro. During World War II, Nazi Germany established a puppet government in Croatia led by Ante Pavelic's Ustasha regime, which was responsible for the mass killings of thousands of Serbs, Jews, gypsies, and even Croats. It was Josip Broz Tito's role as a leading revolutionary with the Partisans, a Yugoslavian resistance movement against fascism, that elevated him to power after the Yugoslav People's Liberation War of 1941 to 1945. Tito's centralized communist rule of the Second Yugoslavia met with ambivalent reaction. Many Croats saw Tito's presidency as a dictatorship replicating the Soviet model, while other Croats considered him a national hero—Tito came from the Croatian village of Kumrovec.

After Tito's death in 1980, Yugoslavia entered an economic depression. However, as communist rule deteriorated, Croatia experienced a spiritual revival led by the Catholic Church, which organized a Eucharistic Congress in Zagreb in 1984 attended by more than 400,000 people. A significant occurrence fueling the Catholic renewal transpired in Medjugorje, a small mountain village in Bosnia-Herzegovina populated by Croats. In June 1981, six Croatian children from the village reported experiencing daily apparitions of the Virgin Mary. The apparitions in Medjugorje are noteworthy for both their longevity, apparently continuing to this day (nearly 30 years later), and for the fact that they have been subjected to more medical and scientific examination than any other purported supernatural event in history, attracting global attention and mass pilgrimage.

In the 1990s, Croatia faced war as Serbian leader Slobodan Milosevic used strong nationalist language, calling attention to Serbian suffering during World War II, and advocated for a hegemonic Greater Serbia to dominate Yugoslavia. The Yugoslav wars lasted from 1991 to 1995, leading to a final dissolution of Yugoslavia and resulting in an independent republic of Croatia. The Vatican and Iceland were the first to recognize Croatia as an independent republic in 1992, even before the European Union and the United Nations did so. Additionally, Pope John Paul II visited Zagreb in 1994, advocating a spirit of ecumenism and reconciliation, attempting to ease the strife-torn atmosphere that poisoned relations between the diverse religions and ethnicities of the region. The wars, originally provoked by the Serbs as aggressors, led to multiethnic and religious confrontation. As Serbia invaded Bosnia-Herzegovina in 1992, Croatian forces helped Bosnian Croats and Muslims battle the Serbs. However, Croats and Muslims also turned against each other, leading to the Croatian-Muslim war of 1993 to 1994, which resulted in the deaths of more than 10,000 Croats and even more Muslims, including massacres of hundreds of Muslims and the desecration of numerous mosques and schools. The wars drove more than 0.5 million Croats from their homes, devastating the economy after the violence ended.

CRUSADES

Crusades were Christian military expeditions in the Middle Ages organized in Europe and promoted by the papacy, initially to recover formerly Christian territories under Muslim occupation in the eastern Mediterranean. They were soon directed to other regions. Crusading built on a tradition of pilgrimage to Christ's sepulcher in Jerusalem and the evolution of just war into biblically inspired holy war against the enemies of Christendom.

Pope Urban II launched the First Crusade in 1095 in response to a Byzantine appeal for mercenaries to fight the Seljuk Turks who had recently occupied Christian Asia Minor. The Crusaders' initial victims were European Jews, but in 1099, they captured Jerusalem, ultimately establishing four Latin states. The second (1147–1149) and subsequent crusades sought to defend, recapture, or extend these territories, but none repeated the success of the first (1096–1102). Local Muslim warlords increasingly sought legitimacy through waging jihad against "the Franks" until Saladin (Salah al-Din) overcame them in 1187 at Hattin, near Tiberias, subsequently recovering Jerusalem. Christian rule there was restored by negotiation in 1229 but ended by conquest in 1244. The Third Crusade (1189–1192) had seized Byzantine Cyprus and retaken Acre, which was not finally lost until 1291. From the 14th to the 17th century, the Crusaders sought to fend off the Ottoman invasion of Europe.

Expeditions in Iberia and against the popes' European opponents reflected the movement's origins, but Orthodox Christians, too, became the object of crusading, especially after the Fourth Crusade (1202–1204) captured Constantinople. Crusades were launched against Cathar Languedoc (1209–1229), Hussite Bohemia (1420–1431), and Protestant England (the Armada of 1588). To the north, Crusaders and Teutonic Knights fought pagan Wends, Balts, and Lithuanians from 1147.

For six centuries, crusades were promoted by popes, church councils, and other Christian leaders. Most Crusaders to the east incurred huge debts, seeking treasure only in heaven through a life-threatening form of penance. Christian warriors could now use their skills serving God rather than renounce them for the monastery, but these vocations were combined when military orders such as the Templars and Hospitallers conducted holy war instead of manual labor. As pilgrims, the Crusaders had a special symbol (a cloth cross), took a vow, and were promised remission of their sins (and even martyrdom) as well as ecclesiastical protection for their persons, families, and property.

Pope Urban had sought to liberate Eastern Christians from Islamic rule and bring them under papal jurisdiction. By stages, the Maronites and some Armenians entered into communion with Rome, but other Eastern Christians were deeply alienated. Among Muslims, crusading heightened appreciation for the sacredness of Jerusalem, but its impact was far less significant than that of the Mongol invasion. Only in modern times did Muslims learn to regard the crusades anachronistically as an early form of European imperialism. On July 22, 2011, a Norwegian terrorist, Anders Breivik, evoked the image of the Crusades by claiming to be a part of the Knights Templar, a Christian militia devoted to ridding Europe of Muslim immigrants. For both Muslims and Westerners, crusading became a powerful but ambivalent source of myth and symbolism.

CUBA

The largest and most populous island in the Caribbean (about 43,000 square miles and 11 million inhabitants), Cuba is a former Spanish colony, originally populated by Taino Indians. The Taino were either killed or assimilated throughout the centuries, hence there is no ethnic group claiming to be native Cubans. However, many traces of Tainos can be found in the Cuban culture, whether in some place names, such as Guanabacoa or Baracoa, some meals (red pepper soup or ajiaco) or the use of cigar (tabaco) in some African American cults such as Santería.

Roman Catholic Church

Owing to its Spanish legacy, the largest religious institution in Cuba remains the Roman Catholic Church. It is difficult to assess the actual number of regular churchgoers, but the church claims that around 7,000,000 Cubans are baptized Catholics, among which 10% may go to church. There are 11 dioceses in Cuba. The relationship between the Catholic Church and the government regime were tense as the Castro-led guerillas took over from the Batista government in January 1959. More than 400 Catholic schools were closed in the following years, and many priests fled from the island. In 1961, Cuba was officially proclaimed an atheist country. In a 1965 speech, Ernesto “Che” Guevara, a major figure in the Cuban revolution, spoke about the emergence of “the New Man,” and the necessity to “get rid of the past”—hence, “superstitious beliefs” such as religious belief. Even though the 1976 constitution guaranteed the freedom of religion, all believers were barred access to the Communist Party. After the fall of the Berlin wall in 1989, the former USSR stopped supplying Cuba with oil and various commodities, leading to a major economic crisis in the country; the period of economic disarray that followed—and still continues—was called periodo especial by Fidel Castro. Faced with mounting everyday difficulties, many Cubans turned to religion (Catholicism or African American cults). Since 1991, Catholics and followers of other religions have been allowed admittance into the Communist Party. In 1998, Pope John Paul II was given an official welcome by Fidel Castro. In the wake of his visit, Christmas was again recognized as a national holiday, and many people started to attend Mass in church, although in recent years, their number has leveled off.

Other Christian churches are also present on the island. Evangelical and Baptist churches can be found in some big city centers, while there are Pentecostal churches in some poor districts such as Párraga (Havana). There are also a number (probably fewer than 100,000) of Jehovah’s Witnesses.

Judaism

Cuba used to have an important Jewish community, which came to Cuba in two waves: first, Spanish Sephardic Jews who fled from Spain during the Inquisition and then a wave of Ashkenazi Jews coming from the United States in the early 20th century. The district of Guanabacoa still has two Jewish cemeteries, the old one for Sephardic Jews and the new one for Ashkenazi Jews. The majority of Jews left Cuba after the revolution; however, there is still a small community that continues to hold services in Havana and other parts of the island.

Buddhism

Although a considerable number of Chinese people (estimated at nearly 200,000) migrated to Cuba in the late 20th century, there is today no trace of Buddhism in Cuba. Most Chinese immigrants either mixed with the local population by marriage (there were almost no women among the Asian immigrants) or left the island after the revolution.

Spiritism

The 19th-century French spiritist Allan Kardec had a great influence in the Americas. Today, Spiritism is thriving, especially in Havana and the eastern portion of Cuba. Basically, Spiritists follow Kardec's Gospel of Spiritism for their services, which are usually led by a madrina ("a spiritual godmother") who is possessed by the spirit of one or many dead people. These so-called muertos are often stereotypes (the Indian, the Chinese, the Gypsy Woman, Francisco the Slave, etc.). When possessed, the madrina's personality changes, and she may even speak in what is thought by witnesses to be a foreign language. During the service, attendants have to wash their hands and clean themselves with perfumes in front of an altar decorated with flowers, photographs of dear relatives, and glasses of water. In Havana, this cult is strongly associated with Palo (Palo Monte), discussed in the following section.

African American Religions

The diversity of African American religions is one of the most striking aspects of Cuban culture. Spaniards started to settle in the island in the early 16th century. As with other Caribbean islands, the slave trade boomed with the intensification of the sugarcane culture, in the early 18th century. Slaves were brought from various parts of the west coast of Africa, but many of them spoke Yoruba, as the fall of the Yoruba-speaking kingdom of Oyo more or less coincided with the start of the slave trade.

Spain had inherited from the Muslims a legal system that provided the slaves with a legal status. They could buy back their freedom at a set price, earn money, and were allowed a period of rest. In Cuba, slave associations were created as early as the 18th century, where Africans coming from the same area could gather and practice their religious ceremonies. These so-called cabildos de nación helped maintain the African culture throughout the period of slavery and became, as a new Creole society emerged, the cradles of African American religions: Santería or Regla de Ocha, Palo Monte, and Abakuá. The three religions correspond grossly to three geographic areas in Africa where slaves came from: Santería to the vast Yoruba-speaking area (today Benin and Nigeria), Abakuá to the Cross River region in Nigeria, and Palo Monte to the Bantu ethnic groups (from Cameroon to Congo).

Santería is the cult of Orishas, goddesses and gods originally worshipped in Africa. It is the most important African American religion in terms of number of believers. Among these, one must distinguish between the santos, who make the Ocha initiation and the simple believers. Santos have a godmother/father (padrina/o) and a guardian angel (angel de la guarda)—one specific Orisha that looks after her or him. In Spanish, the word Santería is a disparaging term, which refers to the popular worship of the saints. Indeed, each Orisha is associated with one specific Catholic saint. Orishas are also associated to a specific color and to a few props (a rod, an axe), as well as to certain habits (the food they eat, their personality). The main Orishas are Ochún, the goddess of love (dressed in white and yellow); Changó, god of thunder and drums (red and white); Yemayá, goddess of the sea (white and blue); Obbatalá, a major Orisha representing knowledge (white); Elegguá, the Orisha who "opens the way" (black and red); and Babalu Ayé, who cures all diseases (purple). In the first year that follows his or her initiation, the Iyawo ("recent initiate") is required to dress only in white and must carry necklaces (collares) of his or her Orisha. Santos will celebrate the day of their initiation every year (cumpleaño de santo), which is more important to them than their actual birthday. During a ceremony, male musicians play the sacred bata drums, three double-headed drums of different sizes, playing for each Orisha, one after the other, in a special order (always starting with Elegguá). Offerings are laid in front of the altar, usually foods the Orisha is known to relish (honey for Ochún, sweets for Elegguá, etc.). The sacred language in the ceremony is Yoruba.

One branch of Santería is the Regla de Ifa, a system of divination using a table and 16 cowrie shells. The table belongs to Orunmila (the Orisha of divination). Only (heterosexual) men can make the Ifa initiation and then become babalawo.

Palo Monte is a religion worshipping the spirits of the dead. It is often considered as a form of witchcraft, as people resort to it for good as well as bad purposes. As in the case of Santería, Palero or Ngangulero are initiated during a ceremony. The body is cut (rayado) with a knife or a razor blade. Their practice focuses on a vessel called ganga (or prenda), usually a sort of cauldron filled with sticks of wood (palos) and human remains (a skull is preferable) of a powerful man whose spirit (nkisi) will give strength to the nganga, as well as animal remains (dogs, cats, etc.). Palo Monte is divided into two major branches: Mayombe or Kimbisa (created in Cuba in the mid-19th century). The sacred language is Spanish, although people greet each other by saying salaam aleykoun, an Arabic greeting. Palo Monte is said to be more “efficient” than Santería to solve everyday problems. The Tata, the owner of the ganga, may use bilongo (spells) or resort to a ndoki (bad spirit) to neutralize or harm a person.

The Abakuá brotherhood is a men-only initiation society, which is strictly localized in Havana, Matanzas, and Cardenas. About 15,000 men are members of this society, each belonging to any of 110 different tierras. A tierra (also called juego or potencia) is a kind of symbolic territory with a king (eyamba), a priest (isue), an army general (mokongo), a hangman (ekuenyon), and a doorman or bouncer (famba). The simple “soldiers” are called obonekue. A man is usually initiated very young (around 16 years old), after a 1- to 2-year trial period. There is no possession during an Abakuá ceremony (called plante or baroko if there is a sacrifice), although they worship a spirit called ekue, who dwells in a drum hidden from the sight of the noninitiated. Ekue is considered as “the mother” of the Abakuás.

It must be specified that African American religions are in no way exclusive: one may be a Santero (Santeros have to be baptized in a Catholic church before making the Ocha), a Palero, a babalawo, a Spiritist, and an Abakuá at the same time—as well as a baptized Catholic. The Catholic Church, since the revolution, has adopted (at least at the local level) a rather lenient attitude toward African American cults, unlike evangelical or Baptist churches, which consider these practices as “devilish.”

CULTURAL REVOLUTION (CHINA)

The term Cultural Revolution was first used in the Soviet Union to describe a revolution in knowledge, culture, the arts, and education during the First Five-Year Plan (1928–1932) launched by Joseph Stalin. In the context of Stalin’s new state command economy, forced collectivization of agriculture, and rapid industrialization, calls for youths and new workers to challenge established knowledge, control thought and the arts, and attack the old intellectual elites all found a conducive environment in the equation of education with technical skills training. The Cultural Revolution saw the expansion of the mass volunteer organization, the League of the Militant Godless (1925–1947), whose mission was to promote atheism and to educate the people on the harms of religion and benefits of modern science, through the media, demonstrations and parades, lectures, and film screenings.

Historians have yet to trace the exact connection between the Soviet Cultural Revolution and the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution (1966–1976) that occurred in China. This mass mobilization campaign was launched by Chairman Mao Zedong in his struggle for dominance within the Communist Party and represented the most intense antireligious period in China’s 20th-century history of state secularization. By appealing to the revolutionary enthusiasm and unquestioning loyalty of the youth across China, Mao emerged from disgrace after the terrible famine that resulted from his Great Leap Forward campaign (1958–1961). He also sought to forestall a Khrushchevian revisionism from spreading to China, threatening his vision for continuous revolution and class struggle. Mao encouraged the formation of the Red Guards as the shock troops of his renewed revolution.

They were roving bands of local youths who swore loyalty to him and the revolution, yet their activities spun out of even his control. They terrorized local party and government officials, intellectuals, schoolteachers, class enemies (former landlords and capitalists), Rightists (those accused of political unreliability in the Anti-Rightist Movement of 1957), and anyone associated with the old feudal culture of China's past. During this decade of terror, it is generally estimated that 10 million people across China were beaten or tortured to death, hounded to suicide, denied medical care or starved to death, or were simply executed.

There were several fronts in the Cultural Revolution attacks on culture. There was the anti-establishment challenge to party authorities who were seen to have become entrenched and complacent. There were the anti-intellectual attacks on scholars, writers, schoolteachers, professionals, and even scientists. Xenophobia also opened up another front against foreign imperialism, whether against the United States, Japan, the Soviet Union, or any Chinese with overseas connections or relatives. Finally, there was the "Smash the Four Olds" campaign against "old customs, old culture, old habits, and old ideas" during the first 3 years of the Cultural Revolution (1966–1968). Anything dating to before 1949 had the taint of feudalism and backwardness. Antiques, family heirlooms, old books and paintings, and lineage genealogies in people's possessions were all to be turned in and destroyed. Religious rituals and superstitious practices such as divination, geomancy, shamanism, and burning spirit money for ancestors, gods, and ghosts were all banned. Sacred sites across the country such as ancient graves and tombs, archaeological sites, Buddhist and Daoist temples, deity temples, Christian churches, mosques, and historical monuments were often desecrated, the deity statuary defaced or smashed, or the buildings locked up, dismantled, or turned into schools, warehouses, or government offices. Religious clergy were forced out of monasteries into lay life or terrorized and beaten and forced to undergo "thought reform"; many nuns and monks were forced to marry.

Tibet came in for perhaps the most extensive religious destruction during the Cultural Revolution, mainly because the highly religious Tibetan culture had missed out on the waves of secularization that had swept across China proper throughout the 20th century. Thus, Tibetans were regarded as especially backward, and there was much more in Tibet for Red Guard youth to destroy. The Cultural Revolution was so antireligious that even the state's own religious bureaucracies set up in the 1950s to monitor and control religious activities, such as the Buddhist Association, the Daoist Association, the Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association, the Three-Self Patriotic Protestant Association, and the China Islamic Association, were all closed down and their journals suspended from publication during this period. It is historically ironic that the cult of Mao, which attained its zenith during this period, contained strong religious dimensions: the sacredness of the leader's body; the interiority of guilt; faith, submission, and obedience; the Manicheanism of revolutionary virtue and counterrevolutionary evil; moral-political righteousness and violence; self-sacrifice and revolutionary martyrdom; public rituals of loyalty, confession, and recitation of sacred text; and apocalyptic teleology.

CURAÇAO

Heavily Roman Catholic, the Caribbean island of Curaçao was a part of the Netherland Antilles until its dissolution on the 10th of October, 2010. Curaçao is self-governing, though the Dutch government provides support in areas of defense, foreign policy, and the island's finances. A total of 85% of the populace is Roman Catholic, with the next largest religious body adhering to the Dutch Reformed Protestant faith, accounting for approximately 3% of the population. Other significant faiths include Judaism, which represents less than 1%, and smaller communities of Seventh-Day Adventists and Methodists. Some Curaçaoans practice Montamentu, an African Caribbean ecstatic religion introduced in the 1950s by immigrants from Santo Domingo. Most of the religious communities engage in some degree of syncretism, blending Christianity with traditional African religions. Pentecostalism was on the rise at the beginning of the 21st century, alongside a shift toward the Charismatic movement ongoing since the 1970s.

Later used to breed goats, horses, and cattle, Curaçao was first discovered by Europeans in 1499, when Christopher Columbus spotted the island and claimed it for Spain. A good number of islanders were deported to Hispaniola to work in mines in the early 16th century, and the Dutch West India Company took possession of the island in 1634. While plantations were never highly developed due to the climate of the island, it became a center for smuggling, privateering, and the slave trade in the 17th century. Dutch and Sephardic Jewish merchants sold trade goods and slaves from Africa to the American colonies as well as the Spanish mainland. Slave rebellions on the island occurred in the 18th century but were quashed with help from the Roman Catholic Church, which played an important role in the repression of African culture as well as the legitimation of slavery. Protestants and Sephardim continued their commercial dominance when the first oil refineries were opened on Curaçao, which resulted in the importation of numerous workers from other islands and marked the beginning of the industrialization of the island as well as traditional colonial race relations. The importance of the Roman Catholic Church in the politics of the island was depleted with the introduction of universal suffrage in 1949, which resulted in the formation of nonreligious political parties.

Though Roman Catholicism was (and is) the main religion on the island, Curaçao was also historically important for the Jewish faith and is home to the oldest active Jewish congregation in the Americas. Dating back to 1651, the Curaçaoan Jewish community played a key role in supporting early congregations in the United States, including those in New York City. The synagogue on Curaçao is the oldest in the Americas, built in 1732 on the site of an even older synagogue, the dates related to which have been lost. Although the Jewish population is largely Sephardic owing to the Spanish colonization, many Ashkenazi Jews arrived during the time of World War II, and some of those communities continue to call Curaçao home.

CYCLE OF REBIRTH

The cycle of rebirth or reincarnation is a concept that is central to Buddhism, Hinduism, Sikhism,

and other Indian religions. The Sanskrit term for this process is samsara, which means “wandering.” Other cognate phrases include the “transmigration of the soul” and “the cycle of successive existence”; it is also called “the karmic cycle.” The notion of the cycle of rebirth was fundamental to ancient Greek philosophy, such as the philosophy of Plato and Pythagoras. It is premised on the understanding that death is not the final end—it signals the end of that particular life—but the end of one life leads to the beginning of another life. Death is a moment in the cycle of change. Life is construed as a series of rebirths that occur cyclically.

There are a number of overlapping ideas in Buddhism and Hinduism but also some notable differences. There are two fundamental differences that separate orthodox Hinduism and Buddhism. First, Hinduism believes in the idea of a single divine eternal reality, which is termed Brahman. Gods and goddesses in the Hindu tradition are manifestations of this eternal Brahman. Buddhism rejects the idea of an eternal God. It is a God-less religion and believes only in the eternal flow and flux of life in which everything is connected. The second main difference is that Hindus believe in the notion of an immortal soul, which leaves the body on physical death only to enter a new body in a new life. This soul, known as the atman, defines the self of the person. The cycle of rebirth then consists of the continuity of the soul migrating from body to body in each new life. Buddhism rejects the notion of the soul and with it the duality of a soul entering a body. Nothing is real or permanent in Buddhism except the endless cycle of existence.

Hinduism

The process of rebirth or reincarnation in Hinduism involves every living being undergoing an indefinite or an indeterminate series of existences that cease when the individual atman becomes indistinguishable from Brahman (eternal reality). The factor that determines the course of the next life is karma, which means “deeds or actions.” According to the law of karma, one’s actions in this life will have future consequences in the next life. This is one of the justifications for the caste system: Social status is determined by karmic deeds carried forward. The pain and suffering that one endures in one’s life is not regarded as divinely ordained but is the result of one’s karma in a previous life. Karma is used to explain the inequalities that exist between people’s lives. It is a form of cosmic justice.

Reincarnation in Hinduism concerns the journey of the soul. When a person dies, it is just the physical body that perishes. The soul is immortal and indestructible and separates itself from the body. The Rig Veda describes how after death the soul of the dead is carried up to Agni, the God of fire, where it joins the souls of the ancestors. The amount of time that the soul spends with the other souls varies, and the soul continues its journey by entering a womb, ready to start a new life in the earthly realm. The following extract from the Bhagavad Gita conveys this idea: “Worn-out garments are shed by the body; worn-out bodies are shed by the dweller within the body. New bodies are donned by the dweller, like garments” (2.22). One continues in different lives until the attainment of moksha, which means “liberation.” This happens when one overcomes ignorance (avidya), which is the state of those who cannot make a distinction between the limitations of earthly life and the ultimate reality. On achieving moksha, one experiences an identification of the individual self or soul with eternal reality. Hinduism offers many paths that you can take to break samsara. You can adhere to the duties of your caste, devote your life to your god or goddess, or renounce life and choose the path of the hermit. Moksha is the union of the individual soul with eternal reality, Brahman-Atman, and is the state of bliss.

Buddhism

The main point of overlap between the understanding of the cycle of rebirth in Hinduism and Buddhism is the goal, which is that of the liberation from the cycle of existence and, by extension, of suffering. In Buddhism, the state of bliss is known as nirvana. Although these two religions concur on this final stage as the desired outcome, the processes to attain this goal are markedly different. The Buddha rejected the Hindu notion of the atman in the sense of an individual soul or self. He believed that nothing within a person is actually real and that humans are made up of five components or skandhas—namely, the form, perceptions, dispositions, will, and consciousness. The skandhas create the (illusory) sense of identity and persistence through time and relate to what the Buddha describes as the law of dependent origination. The law of dependent origination explains how we build up attachments to the world, including the self, and hence of how we believe in the illusion of the self. There are 12 components that make up dependent origination. These are ignorance, mental formation, consciousness, name and form, the six senses, contact, feeling, craving, clinging, becoming, birth, and old age and death. Each component is linked to its predecessor and its successor in a chain of cause and effect, and so ignorance is the cause for mental formation and so on.

There are two main ways of linking the 12 components—one is to group them according to past, present, and future, where certain components such as ignorance are tied to our past, while the components conveying sentience, such as contact, feeling, and craving, are aspects of this life. The other way is to divide the components into the following three groups. The first group is defilement (klesha), which includes ignorance, craving, and clinging. Ignorance is the main cause for suffering. It leads to craving pleasure and relying on the senses. The second group is action (karma), which comprises mental formation and becoming. The final group is suffering (dukkha). All three groups bring about suffering by causing us to become attached to earthly life. The Buddha believed that life is characterized by dukkha, anicca (impermanence), and anatta (“no self”). This was in contrast with the Hindu view of the self vis-à-vis social class being a measure of past karma. For Buddhists, there is the endless flow of becoming where everything in the universe is in a perpetual process of change and decay. Life is transitory and all forms are ever changing. There is no permanent self or an immortal soul. Karma is a valid concept in Buddhism but it is not attached to an atman, which is the bearer of consciousness. There is also the underpinning idea that all life involves suffering and that this is so irrespective of whether the karma is good or bad—any form of existence entails suffering of some kind. The rejection of the notion of self in Buddhism, which is described as anatta, demonstrates the contrastive and even mutually contradictory outlooks in both religions. The identification of atman is fundamental to the understanding of the human predicament and how to overcome it in Hinduism. Karma provides a self-regulating system whereby individuals can shape their lives accordingly to reduce suffering in the next life. It is precisely the opposite virtues that are required in Buddhism to overcome suffering—thinking about the self aggrandizes desires and attachment. The motivation in Buddhism then is to release the self.

The Four Noble Truths are central teachings in Buddhism that explain how to overcome samsara. The first noble truth acknowledges the presence of dukkha; the second identifies the cause of suffering, which is craving (tanha). The third states that it is possible to end suffering and identifies this state as nirvana. The Eightfold Path is the guide (i.e., the fourth Noble Truth) that leads to the cessation of suffering by breaking the desires and attachments to life. Once freed from tanha, one is liberated from the cycle of rebirth and also from dukkha. This is the ultimate goal for individuals: to be liberated into a state of nirvana. There are six realms of rebirth: the gods (deva); humans and demons (asura) and animals, which are regarded as favorable destinies; hungry ghosts (pretas) and hell (naraka), which are undesirable. These modes of existence can be conceived of as actual modes of existence, but there are some schools of Buddhism, for example Mahayana, that stress that these are symbolic states of mind.

CYPRUS

Cyprus is an island divided; the northern third of the island is Turkish in ethnicity and Islamic in religion, while the larger Greek south is dominated by the Church of Cyprus, an autocephalous institution based on Greek Orthodoxy. The two regions are governed separately and generally treated separately by sociologists. Greeks account for 77% of the Mediterranean island's entire population, with Turks constituting 18%, and both groups residing almost entirely in their respective territories. The Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus is 98% Sunnī Muslim, while allegiance to the Church of Cyprus characterizes 95% of the Republic of Cyprus (the only ruling party officially recognized by many foreign nations). While maintaining its relationship with the Greek Orthodox Church, the Church of Cyprus has played a significant role in the history of the island, supplying the first president of the republic and providing a focal point of unification for Greek Cypriots seeking enosis.

With settlements on Cyprus from around 5800 BCE, the island's substantial copper reserves and position as a crossroads of trade between three continents led to its prominence in early history. Home of the cult of Aphrodite and ruled by the Roman statesman Cicero for a time, Cyprus was visited by the Apostle Paul and Barnabas, who were successful in Christianizing much of the island. That visit had profound ramifications for the history of Cyprus as well as the Christian faith; Paul and Barnabas converted the Proconsul of Paphos, the first Christian of noble birth, and the discovery of the Tomb of Barnabas in the fifth century resulted in the autocephalous status of the Church of Cyprus. Cypriots became part of the Byzantine Empire under Constantine and remained thus until Muawiyah, then emir of Syria and later caliph, attacked in the middle of the seventh century, beginning 300 years of turmoil and the destruction of Cyprus's Christian churches. Richard the Lionheart freed the island during the Third Crusade and used it as a strategic base before selling it to the Knights Templar, who in turn sold the island to Guy de Lusignan in 1192. Under Lusignan's brother, the Roman Catholic Church was awarded Cyprian lands, and Pope Alexander IV signed a bull declaring Cyprus to be under the Roman Catholic Church, a fact largely ignored by the island's inhabitants.

Again becoming a strategic base against the Islamic empire and under Venetian control after mismanagement in the 15th century, Cyprus fell to the Ottoman Empire in 1571 and remained a part of that empire until the British claimed it in 1878 out of fears of Russian occupation. The British advocated for the existence of an independent Cypriot nation amid outcries for union with Greece, which had echoed for centuries prior to their arrival. Cyprus was offered to the Greek nation in exchange for their assistance during World War I, but this offer was declined in favor of Greece's continuing neutrality. The constitution during British rule required three Muslims to be installed on the 12-person legislative council, but the Church of Cyprus was able to regain control of the Greek-speaking Cypriots during British reign. Cyprus gained independence as a unified nation in 1960, though daily life was still de facto segregated. In 1974, a military coup in Greece attempted to overthrow the first president of the Republic, Archbishop Makarios III. Turkey responded to the threat to its people with military invasion and, when the junta was overthrown, used their presence on the island to negotiate for control of the part of Cyprus now known as the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus. In spite of the island's difficult past, as of the 21st century, their economy has recovered and the societies have stabilized, though the border is still rigorously patrolled on both sides.

During the 19th and 20th centuries, some significant syncretic cultural traits developed on Cyprus, including the so-called Cotton Liners (Linopambakoi) who practiced both Greek Orthodox Christianity and Sunnī Islam simultaneously. The region's government is generally friendly to religions: All forms of religious expression (including the wearing of head scarves) are accepted, and the government provides financial support for the building and preservation of mosques on both sides of the island.

CZECH REPUBLIC

The Czech Republic is a postcommunist country located in central Europe (population 10.2 million, 2001), formed in 1993 after the split of Czechoslovakia; it is a member state of the European Union. The country is widely known for its high level of secularity. In the 2001 census, 59% of Czechs declared themselves as having no religion, 27% as Catholics, 2% as Protestants of various denominations, and 1% as members of the Czechoslovak Hussite Church (established in 1921); non-Christian religions had a marginal presence. According to International Social Survey Program (ISSP) 2005 data, of all the countries who participated in the survey, the Czech Republic had the highest proportion of the population who declared that they had no religious affiliation, although more in-depth sociological surveys usually show a higher level of religiosity.

Although the decline in church affiliation was dramatic during the communist period (1948–1989), falling from 94% in 1950 to 44% in 1991, it only strengthened the previously not-so-noticeable process of falling church attendance. The Czech nationalist movement of the late 19th and early 20th centuries identified itself with both secular (or rather non-church) “progress” and the somewhat idealized legacy of the Czech Reformation (Hussitism, Czech Brethren) and thus weakened the affiliation of the majority to the Catholic Church. Formal church membership and the search for alternative spirituality were quite common, but a civic (i.e., nonreligious) education system and rituals had become well established even before the communist takeover.

Some desecularization occurred after the fall of communism, but it did not significantly weaken the out-of-church movement. Funerals and other personal rituals are still heavily influenced by the legacy of anticlericalism; 79% of the population opts for cremation, possibly the highest proportion of any post-Christian country, and approximately one third of funerals have no ceremony at all (half of the rest are secular funerals). However, if a broader view of religion is taken, modern Czechs are not so irreligious. In 2006, for example, more than a half of the population agreed that some fortune tellers can foresee the future and that some form of supernatural power exists, and nearly half believed that star signs can influence the course of life. Although Czechs have a low church affiliation rate and fewer than 10% attend church at least once monthly, many believe in the existence of supernatural phenomena and/or in some form of transcendence.

DA VINCI CODE, THE

Dan Brown's The Da Vinci Code had an enormous worldwide success following its publication in 2003, implanting many misconceptions in the public consciousness. Brown and his publishers announced that the book is a work of fiction, yet they immediately went on to claim that it is based on fact. The first page of the book declares as fact (written in bold capitals) that something called the Priory of Sion is a real, secret organization founded by the European Crusaders in 1099. It goes on to state that in 1975, parchments known as Les Dossiers Secrets (Secret Files) were discovered in the Bibliothèque Nationale (the French national library). These "parchments" identified numerous famous figures of history as members of the Priory of Sion. These "facts" are an almost total falsehood.

In reality, the Priory of Sion is the name of a tiny extremist group founded in the 1950s. It had no existence whatsoever before then. The Dossiers Secrets were not "discovered" in the Bibliothèque Nationale at all. Instead, they were deposited there in 1967 by a 20th-century French fantasist and fanatic named Pierre Plantard, who claimed to be the rightful king of France, a descendant of the Merovingian kings and ultimately of Jesus Christ. These Dossiers include newspaper clippings, imaginary genealogies, and "parchments" forged in the 20th century. None of the documents is ancient or medieval. Plantard himself quit the organization in 1984. Nothing that Brown alleges of the Priory is true, and all the elements deriving from it are false.

Brown's Sion myth is only the first falsehood on which the novel's pretensions to fact rest.

Brown's plot is ingenious, and there are some real facts (as there are in most novels). But fantasies dominate, linking Freemasonry, witchcraft, the Gnostic Nag Hammadi scrolls, Mithraism, Leonardo da Vinci, Botticelli, Newton, Tarot cards, the Opus Dei, the Crusades, the Merovingian kings, the Templars, the Louvre, the Grail, Victor Hugo, Rosslyn Chapel, Jean Cocteau, and other unrelated subjects. Historical evidence contradicts, among other things, the idea that Jesus and Mary Magdalene had children, that Leonardo had painted Mary (instead of the apostle John) in his "Last Supper," that the Grail is the cup used by Jesus at the Last Supper, that the Merovingian kings of the Franks were descendants of Jesus, that Godfrey of Bouillon was a French king descended from the Merovingians, and so on. Fantasy has a legitimate place in civilization, but when presented as fact, it corrodes truth and understanding.

The social importance of Brown's novel lies in its astounding popularity. Plantard's documents are among a long list of forgeries and fantasies about ancient secrets from the 17th-century Rosicrucians, through the anti-Semitic Protocols of the Elders of Zion, through Gerald Gardner's Witchcraft Today, to the present. Many scholars attribute the success of the novel to the tendency of society to cynicism, lack of trust in the use of reason and evidence (whether political, scholarly, or religious), belief in cover-ups and vast conspiracies, relativism, eagerness to believe that "secret truths” are more likely to be true than overt truths, faith in tabloids and uncritical Internet entries, and reliance on intuition and feelings instead of facts.

DALAI LAMA

The Dalai Lama is the spiritual and political leader of the Tibetan people. Most Tibetan Buddhists regard him as an incarnation of the bodhisattva of compassion, Avalokiteśvara, and so he is sometimes referred to in Western literature as a “god king.” Even though the Dalai Lama has not always been unanimously accepted as the supreme sovereign by all Tibetans across the vast plateau of the region, most Tibetans accept the Dalai Lama as a symbol of Tibetan identity. Especially since the Chinese Communist invasion of Tibet, he has become the person Tibetans look to for hope, inspiration, and both religious and secular guidance.

Who Is the Dalai Lama?

The first man to be designated Dalai Lama was a monk named Sonam Gyatso. Sonam Gyatso was a well-known and respected Buddhist teacher of the Gelug school, and in 1578, the Mongolian leader Altan Khan invited him to teach in Mongolia. In Mongolia, he was called dalai lama, meaning “ocean-like” lama: a teacher whose good qualities are as vast as the ocean. According to the current Dalai Lama, however, the word dalai was not intended as a term of admiration but was the Mongol’s translation of the name Gyatso, which means “ocean” in Tibetan. Tibetans, in fact, do not themselves use the title “Dalai Lama” when speaking of their leader but prefer the epithets Gyalwa Rinpoche (“Precious Victor”), Kundun (“Presence”), and Yishin Norbu (“Wish-Fulfilling Jewel”).

While the Dalai Lama is the most well-known lineage of Tibetan reincarnate lamas, the tradition of recognizing reincarnations of important lamas, or tulkus, was already well established by Sonam Gyatso’s time. The lineage of the reincarnate head of the Karma Kargyu school of Tibetan Buddhism, the Karmapa, is traced back to the 12th century and represents the oldest such lineage.

Process of Recognition

It is up to the leading Gelug lamas to interpret various clues and to determine the identity of the next Dalai Lama. The process sometimes begins while the previous Dalai Lama is still alive. Before a Dalai Lama dies, he may give hints as to where he will take rebirth. The 13th Dalai Lama, for example, turned his head toward the northeast as he passed away, and it is said that rainbows and auspicious clouds appeared in the northeastern part of the sky. In correspondence with this, the 14th Dalai Lama was discovered in the northeastern part of Tibet. Lamas consult oracles for advice on where to search for the new Dalai Lama and note any dreams they have about his rebirth. Some go to Lhamo Lhatso, a sacred lake, to look for signs on the surface of the water. When they hear of a promising candidate, a search committee goes to interview the child.

In the case of the present Dalai Lama, he recognized a member of the search committee as his previous incarnation’s teacher and begged to be taken back to Lhasa. When the search committee presented him with a variety of objects, he correctly pointed to the rosary, drum, and walking stick that had been his in his previous life as the 13th Dalai Lama. The search committee also looks for physical signs on the body of the boy, such as birthmarks. When the lamas and oracles have agreed on the identity of the reincarnation, the boy is taken to Lhasa to begin his education.

History

The first person to be named Dalai Lama was not the first but the third Dalai Lama. When Sonam

Gyatso (1543–1588) was declared the Dalai Lama by the Mongols and Tibetans, his prior two incarnations, as Gedundrup (1391–1475), the founder of Tashilhunpo Monastery, and as Gedun Gyatso (1475–1542), were then posthumously named the first and second Dalai Lamas, respectively. Perhaps owing to Monogol influence, after Sonam Gyatso's death, the fourth Dalai Lama was found in Yonten Gyatso (1589–1617)—a member of the Mongol Khan family.

It was the fifth Dalai Lama who made the office of the Dalai Lama the position of religious and political leadership that it is today. The fifth Dalai Lama, Ngawang Lobsang Gyatso (1617–1682), is popularly known as the Great Fifth. With Mongol support, he defeated the King of Tsang in 1642, thereby unifying the various Tibetan kingdoms under a centralized government seated in Lhasa. He began construction of the Potala Palace, which became the official residence for all future Dalai Lamas. The Great Fifth was also a prolific writer and was such a powerful and important leader that when he died, the regent, Sangye Gyatso, kept his death a secret for more than a decade.

The sixth Dalai Lama, Tsangyang Gyatso (1683–1706), was quite unlike the Great Fifth and refused to accept leadership roles in either the religious or the political sphere. He returned his novice monk's vows and lived as a lay person. He is best remembered by Tibetans for his love of poetry. When the Mongol chief Lhabzang Khan attacked Lhasa, the sixth Dalai Lama was banished and was never heard of again. Rumors circulated that he was poisoned; some Tibetans believe that he did not really die but escaped to spend the rest of his life in retreat. In any case, Lhabzang Khan installed a member of his own family, Ngawang Yeshe Gyatso, in his place and claimed that the recognition of Tsangyang Gyatso had been an error and that Ngawang Yeshe Gyatso was the actual sixth Dalai Lama.

Meanwhile, in northeastern Tibet, another boy had been recognized as the seventh Dalai Lama, Kalzang Gyatso (1708–1757). He was brought up in Amdo, where he stayed until it was deemed safe for him to travel to Lhasa. During the reign of the eighth Dalai Lama, Jampel Gyatso (1758–1804), after China sent troops into Tibet to help repel the invading Nepali Gorkhas, the Chinese attempted to insinuate themselves into Tibetan political affairs by, for example, instituting a new custom for choosing the next Dalai Lama. According to this method, the names of candidates were placed in a "Golden Urn," and the name drawn from the pot was to be enthroned as the next Dalai Lama. After the death of the eighth Dalai Lama, Tibetans quickly named Lungtok Gyatso (1806–1815) as his reincarnation before the Chinese had the opportunity to choose someone themselves using the Golden Urn.

The 8th through 12th Dalai Lamas all died at young ages and so did not greatly influence Tibetan history. During periods when a Dalai Lama was too young to rule, a regent would rule in his place, and this was the case for most of the 18th and 19th centuries, including during the lifetimes of the 10th Dalai Lama, Tsultrim Gyatso (1816–1837); the 11th, Keydrup Gyatso (1838–1856); and the 12th, Trinley Gyatso (1857–1875).

The 13th Dalai Lama, Thubten Gyatso (1876–1933), was a strong leader and lived a long and full life. When the British arrived in central Tibet, he absconded to Mongolia and China. Later, when the Chinese invaded Lhasa, he fled to India. During his travels, he witnessed the changes that were taking place in the modernizing world, and on his return, he attempted to reform Tibet's education and military systems. In this, he was opposed by the conservative monastic leaders of the Gelug school, who were concerned with maintaining the power and wealth of their monasteries and feared influence from the West. But the 13th Dalai Lama perceived the need for Tibet to assert its independence on the international stage. He designed the Tibetan national flag and expelled all Chinese residents from Tibet.

Tenzin Gyatso, the 14th Dalai Lama (b. 1935)

Due to historical happenstance and to his remarkable personal qualities, the 14th Dalai Lama has become an internationally recognized figure. In 1950, as Chinese Communist forces invaded Tibet, he was given full political power. After 9 years of failed attempts at negotiation, he fled to India, where he has since established the Tibetan Government in Exile. He continues to spearhead the exiled Tibetans' negotiations with China, and in recognition of his ongoing insistence on non-violence, he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1989. The Chinese government, however, continues to vilify him, characterizing him as a “splittist” and a “wolf in sheep’s clothing.”

Like his predecessor, the 14th Dalai Lama is intent on keeping up with the times. He has stated that on his death, he would return as the Dalai Lama only if there is a need for this, adding that he will not take rebirth in Tibet so long as it is controlled by the Chinese government. In 2011, he renounced the political aspects of his leadership, preferring a democratically elected government to represent the people of Tibet while he retained spiritual authority.

DAN FODIO, OSMAN (1754–1817)

Osman dan Fodio, also known as Shaykh Uthman (or Usuman) dan Fodio, is known for his roles as leader of the Fulani in their jihad (1804–1812), reformer of Islam in West Africa, a leader of the Sufi Qadiriyya order, and a major Muslim educator and writer (in both Arabic and Hausa). Dan Fodio was the descendant of a long line of prominent Fulani, the nomadic cattle herders of West Africa, who through the final decades of the 18th century gathered a large number of followers in his effort to reform the syncretistic Islam of the region of northern Nigeria. His opponents were the Hausa kings and elites, whose more relaxed interpretation of Islam had allowed a wide range of practices not sanctioned by the Shari’a (the divine law). These included veneration of pre-Islamic deities and rites of initiation, marriage rites, and many other practices (see his book Ihya’u as-Sunna wa Ikhmad al-bid’a [The Revival of the Sunna and Destruction of Innovations]). At first, dan Fodio (usually referred to as Shehu) lived in the town of Degel, where he wrote and preached. For the most part, his relations with the Hausa kings were good during this period, and his followers included both Fulani and Hausa.

However, from 1802, his relations with the Hausa kings became more and more acrimonious as his following increased. Starting in 1804, he proclaimed a jihad (divinely sanctioned war) against the Hausa. The jihad commenced with Shehu making a Hejira (emigration) to Gudu and using this remoter location as a base. He deputized a number of Fulani leaders, including his brother Abdullahi and his son Muhammad Bello, to fight and usually had a number of different fighting detachments in the field. While most of the battles of the Fulani jihad lasting until 1812 were successful, culminating in a decisive battle at Alkalawa in 1809, the Fulani overreached themselves by continual fighting. After 1809, Shehu gradually disengaged himself from direct control of the Fulani state and apportioned it out among his relatives and chief amirs (commanders). The descendants of these people still form the Fulani-dominant elite in northern Nigeria and parts of Niger.

Shehu made his major contribution to posterity by his extensive writings, approximately 115 in number. Most of these are comparatively minor tracts, but several of them are major theological works, discussions of harmful innovations, a commentary on the Qur’an, a manual of warfare, and tracts stating the legal reasoning behind the declaration of the jihad. These works, together with the many writings of his close relatives, form an authoritative textual basis for West African Islam to this day, and as most of them are in Arabic, they promote the Arabization of northern Nigeria.

The effects of the Fulani jihad were significant. It established an aggressive Muslim state in the area of northern Nigeria, Niger, and parts of Benin and Burkina Faso that worked to convert pagans and normify Islamic practice in the area. The jihad also closely linked the Sufism of the Qadiriyya order with a tradition of reform that has served as a useful bulwark against contemporary radicalism.

DAOISM

In a modern international context, the Western category of Daoism (also spelled Taoism) may refer to two distinct religious and cultural phenomena: (1) an indigenous Chinese religious tradition that is intricately connected with traditional Chinese culture and is now present throughout the modern world and (2) a new religious movement (NRM) with only loose connections with the earlier Chinese religious tradition. Historically speaking, and beyond dominant Western constructs, only the former is Daoism per se. Nonetheless, both movements are diverse, and both continue to undergo complex transformations within contexts of globalization, multiculturalism, and religious pluralism.

In the West, the matter is complicated by a number of other factors, including Orientalist and popular misrepresentations of the Chinese religious tradition, the complex history of American forms of alternative spirituality, and the use of a “rhetoric of tradition” among self-identified Western Daoists (or, perhaps more in keeping with their own presentation, Dao-ists). The present entry accepts the validity and importance of studying each phenomenon on its own terms while at the same time advancing a critical analysis of “popular Western Taoism” (PWT). (The word Tao is often used in the West; the word Dao is more accurate and is derived from the Pinyin Romanization system.) The reader should not make the mistake of assuming an artificial bifurcation: Real Daoism only exists in China, and transnational forms of Daoism are often fabrications, though there are, in fact, ordained and lineage-based Daoists, Chinese immigrants, and “non-Chinese” converts in the West. The present entry examines each phenomenon—the one Chinese, and now global, and the other Western, having become institutionalized in the United States and disseminated throughout the “developed world.” The entry discusses the history of Chinese Daoism, the emergence of Daoism as a global religious and cultural phenomenon, and the challenges that Daoists and Daoist communities face in the modern world.

Chinese Daoism: History and Interpretation

On the most basic level, “Daoism” refers to an indigenous Chinese religious tradition(s) in which reverence for and veneration of the Dao, translatable as both the Way and a way, is a matter of ultimate concern. From a Daoist perspective, the Dao is understood in four distinct but complementary ways: (1) the source of all that exists, (2) an unnamable mystery, (3) an all-pervading numinosity, and (4) the universe as a cosmological process. There are various indigenous Chinese terms that are encompassed by the Western category of Daoism, almost all of which contain dao in them. However, rather than a reified entity existing in the world, “Daoism” may be taken as shorthand for Daoist adherents, communities, and their religious expressions. At the same time, Daoists have and continue to view their tradition as a tradition, as something larger than personal identity and isolated religious movements. The Daoist tendency to include and synthesize previous expressions of Chinese religiosity into a more encompassing tradition began at least as early as the fifth century CE with Lu Xiuqing (406–477) of the Lingbao (Numinous Treasure) movement. In modern contexts, Daoists often discuss their tradition in terms of the external Three Treasures, namely, the Dao, the scriptures, and the teachers.

One of the principal debates in contemporary Daoist studies centers on when Daoism begins and what should be included. Some would date its origins to the Warring States period (480–222 BCE), while others locate its commencement in the Later Han dynasty (202 BCE–9 CE). More radical interpretations suggest the fifth century CE as a seminal moment, while others go so far as to say that Daoism is simply a modern Western construct. Each interpretation has not only its own evidential support but also its own deficiencies and assumptions, especially with respect to conceptions (constructions) of religion and identity. One of the more challenging issues in these competing interpretative accounts is the fact that Daoist religious movements frequently trace their origins to specific revelations and mystical experiences (e.g., the Tianshi, Shangqing, and Quanzhen movements, as seen in the following paragraphs).

The present entry relies on the most recent revisionist scholarship and adopts an inclusive, historically informed perspective. Daoism is an indigenous Chinese religious tradition whose roots go back to the Warring States period, becoming an organized religion in the second century CE. The history of Daoism may thus be divided into the following periods: (a) Classical Daoism, corresponding to the Warring States (480–222 BCE), Qin (221–207 BCE), and Early Han (202 BCE–9 CE) periods; (b) Early Daoism, corresponding to the Later Han (25–221 CE) period; (c) Early-Medieval Daoism, corresponding to the Period of Disunion (221–581 CE) and Sui (581–618 CE) period; (d) Late-Medieval Daoism, corresponding to the Tang (618–906 CE), Song (northern: 960–1126 CE; southern: 1127–1279 CE), and Yuan (1260–1368 CE) periods; (e) Late-Imperial Daoism, corresponding to the Ming (1368–1644 CE) and Qing (1644–1911 CE) periods; (f) Modern Daoism, corresponding to the Republican (1912–1949 CE) and Communist (1949–) periods; and (g) Contemporary Daoism, roughly from 1980 to the present. Classical Daoism includes what Harold Roth of Brown University has referred to as the “inner cultivation lineages,” associated with the well-known texts of the Dao De Jing (道德經; Tao Te Ching; scripture on the Dao and inner power) and Zhuangzi (莊子; Book of Master Zhuang), as well as lesser known works. Many of these texts provided the foundational cosmologies, principles, practices, and models of attainment for later forms of organized Daoism. Early Daoism includes the Taiqing (太平; Great Peace) and Tianshi (天師; Celestial Masters) movements, with the latter usually identified as the beginning of organized Daoism. The early-medieval period saw the emergence of four major Daoist movements, namely, (1) Taiqing (太清; Great Clarity), (2) Shangqing (上清; Highest Clarity), (3) Lingbao (靈寶; Numinous Treasure), and (4) Sanhuang (三皇; Three Sovereigns). These movements were eventually placed in an all-encompassing textual and ordination system. In the late-medieval period, the Celestial Masters, Highest Clarity, and Numinous Treasure continued to be the dominant schools, but during the Tang, new lineages of Internal Alchemy (Neidan; 內丹) emerged. Internal Alchemy became more systematized during the Song-Jin period, with Quanzhen (全真; Complete Perfection) eventually becoming the dominant form of Daoist monasticism. The late-medieval period also witnessed the creation of new deity cults (e.g., to Lü Dongbin) and new ritual lineages. Late-imperial Daoism principally consisted of the Celestial Masters, also known as Zhengyi (正一; Orthodox Unity), as the householder tradition and Complete Perfection as the monastic tradition. In addition to the new sub-lineages of Internal Alchemy, formal lineages of Complete Perfection were created during the Qing dynasty. Of these, Longmen (龍門; Dragon Gate), associated with Wang Changyue (王常月) (Kunyang, 崑陽; 1622–1680), was the most influential. The modern and contemporary periods were times of immense social and political upheavals in mainland China. During this time, Chinese Daoist adherents and communities, like the representatives of traditional Chinese culture more generally, struggled to survive. The introduction and adoption of modern, secular sociopolitical ideologies, including the dissolution of the dynastic system and imperial patronage, resulted in a global Chinese diaspora and the emergence of Daoism as a transnational religious movement (see below). The history of Daoism includes not only major personages and movements but also significant sacred sites, scriptures, changing pantheons, and various forms of material culture (art, architecture, clothing, etc.). An individual entry could be written on each of the major periods and dimensions of Daoism.

In the modern world, the Daoist landscape in mainland China and the larger Pacific Rim is dominated by the Orthodox Unity and Complete Perfection communities. Members of the former are householders and tend to be village based. Principal religious activities include elaborate rituals carried out by ordained priests, who are often part of family lineages. In mainland China, members of Complete Perfection are primarily monastics and live in temples and monasteries throughout China. However, Complete Perfection Daoists, especially the self-identified members of the Dragon Gate lineage, also reside in Hong Kong, Singapore, Taiwan, and so on, where they are usually householders.

Daoism as a Global Religious and Cultural Phenomenon

Under the leadership of Mao Zedong (1893–1976), the Chinese Communists took over China in 1949. They defeated the nationalists, who along with many members of the Chinese cultural elite fled to Taiwan. In the early years of Communist rule and the subsequent Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), traditional Chinese culture, including Daoism, was designated as “feudal superstition” and severely suppressed in mainland China. It was not until the socioeconomic reforms of Deng Xiaoping (1904–1997) in 1978 that “religious freedom” became more of an actuality and Chinese Daoism began a slow process of revitalization. Today, institutionalized Daoism is part of the Chinese communist bureaucracy, with the Chinese Daoist Association (Zhongguo daojiao xiehui) at Baiyun Guan (White Cloud Temple, Beijing) being the most powerful. Major Complete Perfection monastic communities exist throughout mainland China; some of the more prominent include those in Hubei, Shaanxi, and Sichuan provinces. The principal sacred site of Orthodox Unity is Longhu shan (Dragon-Tiger Mountain) in Jiangxi province.

While in earlier moments of Chinese history, Daoism was transmitted, at least to some extent, to Japan and Korea, during the modern period of Chinese history, Daoists began transmitting and adapting their religious tradition to new cultural contexts. Daoism began a transition from solely an indigenous Chinese religious tradition to a global and transnational religious and cultural phenomenon. Today, there are lineage-based and ordained Daoists and Daoist religious communities throughout the world, including in Australia, Brazil, Canada, Denmark, England, France, Holland, Italy, Malaysia, Russia, Singapore, Thailand, and the United States. These communities are most often associated with Orthodox Unity, Complete Perfection (especially Dragon Gate), or relatively recent family lineages. The latter usually emerged from southern Chinese deity cults and charitable societies. In a global context, such communities tend to be composed of either Chinese immigrants and ethnic, birthright adherents or Chinese immigrant teachers and local converts. For example, in the United States, one often encounters a community composed of a Chinese immigrant teacher and primarily European American converts. However, there are now ordained and lineage-based “non-Chinese” Daoist priests throughout the world. Their communities usually consist of members of the same ethnicity. Few lay Chinese adherents study with non-Chinese teachers. Part of the explanation for this involves dominant forms of religiosity: Chinese immigrants tend to emphasize ritualistic models, while non-Chinese converts, especially in the West, lean toward self-cultivation models. There are also guiding beliefs about the “Chineseness” of Daoism, including its intimate relationship with the Chinese language and traditional Chinese culture.

One of the major challenges in understanding contemporary Daoism in a global context involves “family resemblances.” In addition to ordained priests and tradition-based communities, there are now self-identified Daoists throughout the world who have very little connection with the Chinese religious tradition and who even deny the validity or relevance of that tradition. Contemporary Daoism may thus be charted along a spectrum ranging from “close relations” (Daoist priests, lineage holders) to “distant relations.” While the latter have borrowed some dimensions of their beliefs and practices from the Daoist tradition, their affiliations and characteristics are most often expressions of contemporary forms of hybrid spirituality, with greater influence coming from modern cultural traditions than from Daoism per se. The endeavor to provide an accurate and viable interpretation is complicated by the fact that popular misconceptions and misrepresentations (i.e., historically uninformed views) are ubiquitous.

At the farthest reaches of this spectrum are adherents who are best understood as members of an NRM or, following their own self-representations, an ancient but new and perennially relevant form of “spirituality.” That NRM may be labeled “popular Western Taoism.” In the case of the United States, PWT adherents and communities are the most publicly visible self-identified Daoists. They are most likely to construct Daoism as an “ancient philosophy” and (trans-religious) “spirituality,” wherein the Dao (Tao) is identified as an abstract first principle or “energy field” and wherein Daoists just “go with the flow.” Such accounts of Daoism are characterized by ahistorical, acultural, and antireligious views. Here, the Dao De Jing is read, most often in inaccurate popular translations (e.g., by Ursula LeGuin, Stephen Mitchell), as the “Daoist bible,” as a source of “universal wisdom,” and as a guidebook for alternative spirituality. When people read such translations, they are not reading a Daoist text but rather a contemporary American cultural production.

While its roots extend back to the first moments of the “Western encounter with the Orient,” including received legacies of colonialism, missionization, and Orientalism, PWT as an emerging form of alternative spirituality first emerged in the mid- to late 1970s. Major early players in the formation of PWT included James Legge (1815–1987), John Blofeld (1913–1987), Alan Watts (1915–1973), Gia-fu Feng (1919–1985; Stillpoint Foundation), Al Chung-Liang Huang (b. ca. 1930; Living Tao Foundation), Stephen Chang (b. ca. 1940; Foundation of Tao), Bruce Lee (1940–1973), and Kwai Chang Caine (David Carradine; 1972–1975). While PWT appropriates certain elements from Daoism (e.g., the Dao [Way] and Dao De Jing), its primary informing worldview is derived from modern cultural influences. In the case of the United States, these include Protestant Christianity, American Transcendentalism, the 1960s counterculture, the human potential movement, New Age spirituality, Perennial Philosophy, alternative health care, health and fitness movements, self-help and popular psychology, and so forth. Contemporary PWT adherents are most likely to conflate Daoism with other Chinese cultural traditions, including Traditional Chinese Medicine, feng shui, Chinese martial arts (e.g., Taijiquan), and Qigong, which have only tenuous connections with the Daoist religious tradition. Almost everything found on the Internet is one form or another of PWT. It, along with its representatives’ ubiquitous influence on the popular understanding of Daoism, has now become institutionalized in groups, physically existing and virtual, such as the Reform Taoist Congregation, Tao Bums, Wandering Daoists, and various other Tao groups. The PWT construction of Daoism is found in the whole gamut of New Age capitalism and alternative spirituality, from feng shui consultations and Yijing divination to yin yoga and the “Tao of” genre of literature. There are also various popular appropriations of the Dao De Jing by individuals like Wayne Dyers, Benjamin Hoff, Ursula LeGuin, and Stephen Mitchell, among others.

There are major differences between the historical contours and defining characteristics of Daoism as a religious tradition and the construction of Daoism within PWT. In addition to the obvious connection with Chinese culture, members of the Daoist religious tradition have placed and continue to place a strong emphasis on revelation, lineage, community, material culture, and place. Throughout Chinese history, Daoists have tended to believe that “tradition” was larger than “self.” In addition, although the primary form of Daoist “theology” is monistic, Daoists have recognized the immanent presence of the Dao in all things, including in immortals and gods. Traditionally speaking, Daoists are polytheists. In contrast, PWT, following the cultural traditions mentioned above, tends to reject all of these defining characteristics of Daoism. The matter is complicated by the frequent emphasis on “essences” and the use of a “rhetoric of tradition” by PWT adherents.

Appropriation, Adaptation, and Transmission

In a modern global and transnational context, Daoists and Daoist communities find themselves in societies characterized by multiculturalism and religious pluralism. Such situations prove challenging to the formation, growth, and flourishing of forms of religiosity that maintain a connection with the religious tradition that is Chinese Daoism. Daoists witness the appropriation and commodification of various dimensions of their tradition into easily marketable and consumable products in modern global economies, including the denial of their voices and perspectives in the interpretation of Daoism. One clear trend in international contexts is appropriation. As the popular bumper sticker says, "That was Zen; this is Dao." While popular misinterpretations of Zen Buddhism fulfilled Western desires for a trans-religious philosophy and spirituality during the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s, those desires were subverted by revisionist historiography on the part of Buddhologists and Zen Buddhist monastics. Today, Daoism has become Zen's surrogate, and the contemporary Western misunderstanding of the Daoist tradition parallels earlier inaccuracies concerning Zen. Such appropriations and misrepresentations are rooted in legacies of colonialism, missionization, and Orientalism and involve participants in ethical dilemmas that are most often ignored. At the same time, religious adherents are always responding to changing historical and cultural contexts. Viewed historically, Daoists have constantly transformed their tradition in conversation with other influences, challenges, and experiences. Daoism is a highly adaptable, and therefore diverse, religious tradition. Change necessarily occurs when a religious tradition enters a new cultural context and when religious practitioners have different concerns and motivations. However, without a connection and collective memory, such "innovations" become meaningless names. The matter is complicated by the fact that many self-identified "Daoists" have no connection with the Daoist religious tradition and are most likely to reject its history, self-representations, and defining characteristics while simultaneously and paradoxically relying on it for cultural capital and legitimacy. The transmission of Daoism to the modern world is being carried out, quietly and often invisibly, by Daoist priests, lineage holders, and tradition-based communities in various local contexts. Daoist priests and lineage holders are most often either Chinese immigrants or Caucasian converts who received initiation/ordination from the former or in mainland China, Hong Kong, or Taiwan. The demographics of their communities are diverse in terms of ethnicity, gender, socioeconomic background, and former religious affiliation. Such communities, rarely inhabiting distinctively Daoist places or maintaining formal temples, are a minority voice in the global conversation concerning Daoism. The viability of their religious tradition in an international context remains an open question.

DEATH RITUAL

All religious communities have rituals to honor the body and the spiritual presence of the departed and to facilitate the ascendance of their souls to the world beyond. In this essay, the focus will be on the rituals of Hindus in India and in Hindu diaspora communities around the world, since they illustrate the changing nature of death rituals in a global, multicultural context.

Hindus have elaborate rituals at death and mark the date periodically in later months and years. Most Hindus cremate the dead; however, young children and ascetics are interred, as are members of some communities such as the Lingayats. The ashes after cremation are frequently immersed in nearby rivers or oceans. Immersion of the ashes in the river Ganga is especially recommended. Death rituals for Hindus who reside outside the subcontinent have to be adapted to local laws and customs and modified to local surroundings.

Bodies are cremated soon after death in India, often within 24 hours, and seldom kept longer. In India, the body is washed by the women in the house, and the forehead is anointed with sacred marks. The family priest begins the rituals at home and concludes it at the cremation grounds. Family and friends garland the body and frequently bow down respectfully, facing south—the direction of death. At the cremation ground, the pyre is lit; the ashes are collected the next day and eventually immersed in the ocean or, later on, in the river Ganga.

Rituals overseas, especially in Europe and the Americas, have been adapted to local surroundings. The most important difference is that the dead body cannot be kept at home for the rituals to take place and has to be handed over to a funeral home. Coffins are generally not used by Hindus in India; the body is taken in a bier quickly to the cremation grounds. While family members carried the body in the past, vans are used today in urban areas in India. In most European and American countries, however, the funeral home keeps the body in a coffin and handles all the arrangements. Laws in many countries require that a body cannot be cremated until a certain number of days have passed, in part to ascertain that there will be no further inquiry into the case; thus, in America, the body is not disposed of for several days after the person has died. This is at variance with both text and custom in India.

Since the death rituals are done in the chambers of funeral homes in Western countries, they are minimal and done with family and friends sitting in the pews in front of the dead body. Unlike in India, eulogies have become common during the funeral rituals in the Americas. Soon after the quick rituals—lasting not more than an hour in most countries outside India—the body is taken to an electric crematorium. This is not very different from India; while firewood was traditionally used in the subcontinent, and still is in many parts, electric crematoria are becoming increasingly popular there. While most Hindus and Sikhs who die in the United Kingdom are cremated in gas crematoria, there are occasional legal cases pleading for open-air cremations so that one can adhere to the traditional practices of India. Open-air cremations are not allowed in most countries because they are considered to be a hazard to public health. After cremation, the ashes are sometimes taken for immersion in a body of water, but local laws may have strict rules preventing such rituals outside the subcontinent. Many people take the ashes back to India for immersion in the rivers there.

Death rituals in India continue leisurely for several days, the shortest being 13 days in some communities, after which the monthly anniversary, calculated according to the Hindu calendar, is marked by more rituals. For several days after the death, balls of rice (pinda) and other food items are cooked and offered to the dead. This is supposed to be for the temporary body of the dead person. In Brahman families, on the 10th day after death, a long memorial service is held with the recitation of sacred texts. On the 12th day, the dead person is supposed to join the ancestors, and a small rice ball is merged with a larger lump. The number of days after which such rituals are performed is different for each community. Annual rituals for the dead are also observed by sons and grandsons in India. Almost all these rituals are either jettisoned or abbreviated by Hindus in the diaspora. Most Hindus outside India substitute group singing of popular devotional songs (bhajan) for the traditional rituals.

Death is considered to be inauspicious and ritually defiling, and the family is supposed to be in a state of ritual pollution for several days. The calculation of the number of days of impurity for each person depends on both the closeness of the relationship—the strongest being associated with male connections and patrilineal ties—as well as caste. While in this state of impurity, one does not participate in religious rituals at home or go to the temple, but other than these restrictions, life goes on as usual. The end of a period of ritual pollution is frequently marked by ceremonial bathing, suggesting that the conceptualization of the pollution, at least to some extent, is physical.

The death rituals done immediately after a person passes away and those done through the course of the next year may not philosophically be congruent with notions of immortality and karma. These concepts and practices have evolved over the centuries, and there is no close fit between the philosophies and the rituals. As is the case with many other aspects of the Hindu traditions, many practices are continued or recycled, and these may or may not keep pace with theological changes.

DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF THE CONGO

The Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) is located in west-central Africa. Its first inhabitants were Pygmies, who moved into the forests in large migrations when the Bantu came into the region from the north (2000 BCE–500 CE). It is a vast area of 905,568 square miles, with around 70 million inhabitants. In the contemporary era, the majority of the residents are Christian—50% are Roman Catholic and 20% are Protestant—while 10% are Muslim and another 10% are Kimbanguist, with the remaining 10% belonging to other syncretic and indigenous faiths. Until colonial times, the area that came to be known as the Congo Free State (1885) and as the Belgian Congo (1908–1960) was a land of indigenous religions and shamanism. Christianity, a part of the colonial mission, was imposed on the local inhabitants, as described by the historian Isidore Ndaywel è Nziem.

Since Christianity came to the region, many believers have shifted from one religious group to another. They easily intermingle with other creeds whenever they face different social situations.

Within the changes of religious affiliation and movement from one church to another and from one religion to another, shamanism seems a constant in spite of some modifications in its practices over time. Other forms of religious adaptation include syncretism and the mix of differing religious practices.

Survival of Ancient Shamanism

During colonial times, attempts were made to suppress traditional religious practices that were regarded by the colonialists as uncivilized, primitive, and unworthy. In many places, this resulted in Congolese converting to the religious traditions of the colonial masters. However, despite these conversions, shamanistic practices endured. Some of them persisted as part of the new religious practices, especially when the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches authorized prayer groups that were able to incorporate shamanism.

These prayer groups were organized similar to traditional shamanistic consultations and, like traditional practices, contributed to healing divisions between individuals and dealing with social issues. In traditional customs, the community gathered around the shamans to communicate with ancestors and face social challenges. The shaman was the center for the reinforcement of the Vital Force and for ending the negative impact of witchcraft on the community. The shaman channeled blessings and protection, ensuring that the community members had decent lives, with enough protection and power to face possible enemies.

The ritual was organized following a public invitation that would gather the village around one or more shamans. A popular and highly rhythmic spiritual song was usually performed with the participation of all. Well-trained drum beaters would move from very simple rhythms to complex ones that would reach a climax, leaving many in a trance. The Mukishi, the shaman leader, was often the first to go into a trance and change his identity by bearing the name of the spirit present in him. This spirit took charge of social issues and provided the community with answers to questions regarding pharmacopeia, spiritual assistance, dream interpretation, and exorcism.

This traditional social dynamic was challenged by the introduction of Christian churches, in which the congregation listened to the priest or the pastor reciting prayers and reciting biblical verses. The pastor or the priest was regarded as the only one who could deal with social issues, and for a time, the focus of the community shifted from the shaman to the pastor or priest.

The opening of prayer groups in these churches allowed for leadership by local laymen and women and offered an opportunity for shamanistic practices to return within a Christian context. Families once known for practicing shamanism, or being adept at falling into a trance, had the opportunity to continue their practices. Music and dance set the stage for the trances, in which the community could hear the wise words coming from the woman or man in a trance. The names of Christian saints, however, largely replaced those of ancestors, though ancestors were mentioned and called on to assist the living.

Thus, under the same drum rhythms, often with different names mentioned, shamanistic practices have negotiated their presence in a world of both Christian and indigenous culture. Though attendance at church services has risen, and the congregation faithfully listens to the pastor's sermons, attendance in prayer groups is far larger and more important to the Congolese society. The official services are accepted because they leave a larger opportunity for prayer groups to operate freely.

The Katangan Shaman (Ngaga)

A typical Katangan shaman living close to Moero Lake in the southeastern DRC might appear this way: He would wear a long, oversized robe in the style of priests, or a tunic or any other pastor's chasubles used for religious services, with a big red cross sewn at chest level, a small black cap like the Muslim taqiyah to cover the center of his head, and a white painted face. He might wear big, old glasses perched on a very thin head, he might sport a long and dirty beard, and his thin body might be completely covered by his robe. One might notice his hands to have long, unwashed nails and his feet and toes darkened by long walks. A washbasin of water covered with a buffalo tail would likely be on his right side. On his left, there would be a pan full of smelly pounded roots that he uses either to powder his patients or as incense on a small fire burning in front of him to expel bad spirits and to make sure that his big hut has an appealing aroma. A large rosary would be on the wall, and a voluminous old Bible would lie neglected on the earth floor.

As soon as clients arrive at his hut, the Ngaga (shaman) starts his therapy with a song that recalls the chanting of psalms in the Roman Catholic Church. However, apart from the melody, the chant is quite different: The shaman uses his own words, mentioning his ancestors and different charismatic leaders of his people. He invites them to come and work with him for the consultation, the diagnosis, and the therapy prescription. By the end of his litany, he would have mentioned Jesus, the Virgin Mary, and the good people who did good things all around the world. Then, he pours more incense on the fire, sprinkles the participants with water, and announces that Mukalay, the spirit, is very close. Everybody joins in the singing and dancing.

Then, the drums begin, and a small group leads the participants in a highly rhythmic melody. More and more bodies shake, at first very slowly, before the participants enter into a trance. As the music continues, the public starts shouting and going in all directions, but they are stopped by the shaman's acolytes and regrouped.

The third level in this typical shamanist event is launched as soon as the shaman leading the trance takes the cross from the wall and holds it in his left hand. With his right hand, he sprays powder on the public and pours more on the fire. The patient is led toward the shaman, who holds his hands over him as in a Christian ceremony and walks all the way around the patient. He speaks about the bad spirit that has attacked the patient and forcefully orders it to go away. To one of his acolytes, he murmurs the names of a number of plants that should be used to complete the healing of the patient. Because of the shaman's special status and his use of both Christian and African traditions, many clients come to him.

Midnight Crossroads Miracles and Spiritual Magic

Throughout the rule of President Mobutu, a variety of new spiritual practices entered the country, including those that were not connected to any previous religious tradition present in the country.

Some of these involved black magic, and though the ideas were said to have come from as far away as eastern Asia, many of them were based on indigenous beliefs.

The leaders of such very small mystic groups generally lived hidden away from the public. Among their small number of private clients were athletes and politicians. The athletes sought them out to ensure success and agility to score goals while playing sports such as soccer, and the politicians visited them to seek power and protection against their political enemies. Others visited them to gain power to become rich, to harm their enemies, or gain strength to undertake illegal or immoral actions. Everything was believed to be possible thanks to the assistance of these magicians who mixed worldly goals with mysterious mystical practices.

Often, these magical rituals took place at midnight and were organized at a crossroads. The magician would bring his client there and call on Satan to come for a specific ritual. He would then sacrifice white chickens, whose blood was spread around to make a circle in which Satan would arrive. At the center of the circle would be a water basin and a number of candles. It is believed that the magician would call Satan while reciting incomprehensible words. Satan's arrival was preceded by a violent wind, and the client was asked to close his eyes to avoid any curse as living human beings are not supposed to see Satan. After addressing Satan and asking him to assist the visitor, the magician would proceed with the ritual.

The client would be asked if he believed in the power of the magician and if he was willing to deal with Satan. After the candidate agreed, he would be asked to pay for the magician's work and for the sacrifice. A fairly large amount of money would be given. Human sacrifices were not excluded; the magician would ask for the names of people he could kill and use in his work. The magician would then put white powder on the kneeling client's face, deliver a long incantation, and then put red powder on the client's face. Some of the money offered would be left at the crossroad as an evil enticement. It was believed that whoever picked up that money would die and immediately join Satan and work at his service. The client would then be asked to leave and to go back home without glancing back at the meeting point.

Though most people in the DRC practice standard forms of Roman Catholic and Protestant Christianity, many people also observe these rituals associated with shamanism and black magic. Thus, various forms of spiritual practice intermingle in the country's eclectic religious culture.

DENG XIAOPING (1904–1997)

Deng Xiaoping was the most powerful leader of the People's Republic of China after Mao Zedong. Although he never actually held any of the highest ranking official government posts, three of his protégés did—Hu Yaobang, Zhao Ziyang, and Jiang Zemin. In many ways, Deng was the de facto leader of China from 1978 through the early 1990s and is credited with launching China's rapid social change and economic growth, most notably through developing "socialism with Chinese characteristics" and a model of economic reform that became known as the "socialist market economy." Under Deng's influence, China became open to foreign investment, the global market, and limited private competition.

Religion Before Deng

Prior to Deng's return to government in 1977 (after his ouster in 1966 during the Cultural Revolution and again by the Gang of Four in 1976, having been reinstated by Zhou Enlai in 1973), the public practice of religion in China had essentially been extinguished. During the Cultural Revolution, religious buildings were destroyed, and clergy and laity were persecuted and killed. However, many religious believers continued to gather and worship clandestinely in private homes during this period.

Policy Changes

Under Deng, the official religious associations that had been eliminated during the Cultural Revolution were resurrected, the Bureau of Religious Affairs was reestablished to act as the liaison between the government and religious denominations, and theological seminaries (in which political study was required) were restored. In addition, Article 36 of the 1982 People's Republic of China constitution, which reflects Deng's ideas on how to modernize China, reads as follows:

Citizens of the People's Republic of China enjoy freedom of religious belief. No state organ, public organization or individual may compel citizens to believe in, or not to believe in, any religion; nor may they discriminate against citizens who believe in, or do not believe in, any religion. The state protects normal religious activities. No one may make use of religion to engage in activities that disrupt public order, impair the health of citizens or interfere with the educational system of the state. Religious bodies and religious affairs are not subject to any foreign domination.

However, Merle Goldman points out that China's leaders have frequently demonstrated disregard for the constitution throughout Chinese Communist history. Moreover, the Chinese Communist Party's (CCP) policy continued to privilege the freedom not to believe in religion. For example, party members were prohibited from believing in or participating in religion in "Document No. 19," a directive comprehensively outlining policies on religion as part of Deng's "reform and opening" that was promulgated by the CCP Central Committee in 1982. The basic policy outlined in Document 19, according to Pitman Potter, was one of respect for and protection of the freedom of religious belief, pending such future time when religion itself would disappear. While the freedom of religious belief was explicitly guaranteed, the freedom of religious practice, to be administered by the state, was notably not. Moreover, only five religions, Buddhism, Daoism, Islam, Catholicism, and Protestantism, were recognized, in part to exclude folk religions, superstition, and cults from protection.

Motivations

There were several motivations for these policy changes. Deng's regime recognized that the disillusionment with Marxism-Leninism resulting from the Cultural Revolution had led many Chinese people to search for something to replace it and that religion had often been selected to fill this void. Moreover, the CCP could not monitor or control religion when it was being practiced underground.

Policies of religious tolerance were also partly an attempt to improve the country's international image. Deng's regime hoped that projecting an image of religious tolerance would help obtain foreign aid and/or improve relations with the West, Japan, and the Islamic world. At the same time, the government sought to diminish the influence of the resurgence of Islamic fundamentalism on its Muslim minorities—a growing phenomenon in much of the Muslim world. Thus, mosques and Muslim seminaries were reopened earlier than their counterparts in other religions. Simultaneously, the Party began a campaign of sending millions of Han Chinese to Muslim regions to dilute the Muslim population.

According to Merle Goldman (1986), the Deng regime's "tolerance and even encouragement of public worship did not mean that it had a new appreciation of religion, a policy of religious freedom, or a desire for more religious believers" (p. 150), but rather, it represented attempts at "weaning believers gradually from their religious faith, not through forceful means but through a limited tolerance" (p. 153). Yet she claims that this lenient approach did not appear to reduce the number of religious believers and that unsupervised practice continued in private homes throughout the country.

DENMARK

Denmark is the smallest of the Nordic countries and, since 1849, a constitutional monarchy. A majority of Danes, 82.1% (as of January 2008), are members of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Denmark—by Section 4 of the constitution, the state church, officially headed by the queen of Denmark. Pastors in the Church of Denmark are civil servants employed by the Ministry of Ecclesiastical Affairs, which also constitutes the head of administration. The economic base of the Church of Denmark is state-collected church taxes combined with a direct state subsidiary (12%), which symbolically covers the expenses of the Church of Denmark to run the civil registration and the burial system for all citizens.

The high membership rate and wide use of church weddings, baptisms, and burials combined with a church attendance rate of about 2% has stirred debates on the status of religion in Denmark: Is Denmark a society without God, or does the Church of Denmark function as a carrier of national identity in a civil religious manner?

The approximately 200,000 Muslims constitute the largest minority religion in Denmark. Most of the Muslims are immigrants or descendants of immigrants, the major groups being Turks, Pakistanis, Bosnians, Somalis, Iranians, and Palestinians, but there are also an estimated 3,000 converts to Islam. Efforts to establish strong umbrella organizations for Danish Muslims have been unsuccessful, though many Muslims acknowledge the need for official spokespersons for the Muslims. Most prayer halls are situated in apartments, cellars, and old factory buildings; of the few custom-built mosques, only one—a mosque built by the Ahmadiyya community—displays its identity on the outside. A Muslim cemetery was inaugurated in 2006.

Other large denominations include about 50,000 Catholics and 15,000 Jehovah's Witnesses. The European headquarters of Scientology is situated in Copenhagen.

Denmark has a strong tradition for substantial (75%) state support for private schools. Some 20 Muslim free schools, 22 Catholic schools, a Jewish school, and several Free Church-supported schools have been established on state support. The about 100 recognized/approved religious communities may receive tax-deductible donations and perform legally valid marriages, and they are exempted from various taxes, including real estate tax.

The world's attention fell on Denmark during the 2006 cartoon crisis, when the publication of 12 cartoons of the Prophet in the Jyllands-Posten newspaper provoked strong reactions in the Muslim world, leading to what has been called Denmark's most serious foreign policy crisis since World War II.

DESECULARIZATION

For well over a century since the inception of the social-scientific study of religion, there was a broad consensus that the importance of religion was waning in the modernizing world. The cause for this putative decline was traced to various developments, including the increased division of labor in society, capitalism, and the nature of Protestant Christianity itself. At some point during the middle of the 20th century, these diverse views solidified into what has since become known as the secularization thesis. Never a unified theory in the strict sense of the word, secularization nevertheless was for several decades the main prism through which the role of religion in the modern world was examined and explained.

But the secularization thesis also attracted criticism from early on. In recent years, this criticism has increased and gained in strength, to the point that some scholars have been ready to declare the secularization thesis defunct while others consider it of limited use at best. Peter L. Berger, a renowned sociologist of religion, is a prime example of this change of mood in the field. Although he was one of the best known proponents of the secularization thesis in his early work, Berger has since recanted and has become an advocate of what he has termed the desecularization of the world.

Desecularization can be briefly defined as the resurgence of religion in public life. Contrary to the predictions of the secularization thesis, religion seems to be alive and well in the modern world. In The Desecularization of the World: Resurgent Religion and World Politics (1999), the agenda-setting book on desecularization, its editor Peter L. Berger and the other contributors list many examples of the importance of religion in contemporary public life around the globe. From the evangelical Protestant upsurge in Latin America to the role of Islam in global politics, the world seems to be as religious as it ever was, as Berger puts it in his introduction. Whatever the world is, it certainly isn't secularized.

If this is the case, why is it, then, that so many, Berger himself included, came to believe that secularization was inevitably happening in the first place? Those favoring the idea of desecularization like to point out that the original secularization thesis was the product of an intellectual climate prevailing at a time when the decline or even disappearance of religion seemed plausible, particularly in western Europe. The thriving religious culture of the United States, however, always provided a stumbling block for the secularization thesis. Whereas parts of the developing world might be predicted to secularize in the wake of wider modernization, the United States, though arguably a modernized country, showed very little or no signs of secularization. Therefore, the term American exceptionalism was sometimes used to account for this anomalous case. Today, however, from the perspective of desecularization, it is Europe that seems exceptional. In other words, while the importance of religion in public life and individual consciousness may indeed have declined in some parts of Europe, secularization cannot be considered a global phenomenon.

The major problems with the “desecularization thesis,” as it might be called, arise from the fact that it is akin to what the sociologist Karl Mannheim called a “diagnosis of our times”—more a selective description of what the world is like than a theory of social and religious change. Even Berger, the author of a highly sophisticated theory of secularization, largely ignores his own theoretical framework—apart from stating that it is false. The problem here, as analysts such as José Casanova have pointed out, is that the permanence or resurgence of religion in public life in different parts of the world does not by itself prove the secularization thesis wrong. It does call for the refinement of theory but without reference to the particular theory they are trying to invalidate; individual case studies can help very little in understanding broader patterns of social change.

It should also be remembered that, although under attack from many directions, the secularization thesis is by no means dead. A contingent of sociologists of religion continue to hold—and in some contexts with good reason—that the secularization thesis is a valid perspective on long-term religious change in the modern world. Echoing the more sympathetic commentators, such as Casanova, their issue with Berger's recantation is that it is ultimately ahistorical. What Max Weber (and Berger himself), for example, said about secularization referred to a specific historical and social context, such as the Protestant Reformation. Today, however, desecularization is described as a global phenomenon, said to happen regardless of context. Against this, it can be argued that the religious revolution in Iran does not really refute what has happened in Essex, as the sociologist Steve Bruce put it.

Finally, a problem arises out of the term itself. The term desecularization and the reference to a “resurgence” of religion in the modern world imply that secularization has in fact happened and what we are witnessing now is a return or a new rise of religion in public life. At the same time, however, many of those arguing for desecularization emphasize the fact that the world (with the possible exception of western Europe) has never been secular. There is a clear logical discrepancy here, and while this might seem like a little detail, it shows how problematic the term desecularization is in the first place.

The consensus in the social scientific study of religion has shifted in recent decades: A strict interpretation of the secularization thesis has been abandoned for a more balanced account of religious change in the modern world. The “new paradigm” of rational choice theory has shown convincingly how the vitality of religion in the United States can be explained. Scholars working with other theoretical frameworks and on other areas of the world have also broadly agreed that religion is not universally in decline. Therefore, it would perhaps be appropriate to say that desecularization is a useful term when referring to changes in social-scientific thinking about religion. As a concept for describing religious change in the modern world, it is, for the reasons mentioned above, much more problematic.

DETAINEES

Technically, a detainee can be any individual held by an armed force; detainees along with the wounded and the sick are the three vulnerable populations to which the International Committee of the Red Cross has traditionally directed its services. The term detainee as it is used in public discourse today, however, usually refers to individuals held as suspected terrorists. The legal status of such suspects has been the subject of intensive debate and legislative action in the United States and Europe since the September 11 attacks, particularly on the questions of what interrogation procedures, some amounting to torture, can be used on detainees and the length of detention without trial.

The U.S. presidential administration of George W. Bush (2001–2009) has received especially intense criticism for its creation of a new class of legally unprotected detainees known as “enemy combatants” and for the unprecedented scale of its use of “extraordinary rendition” to clandestinely transfer detainees from one nation to another. The category “enemy combatant” was created by the Bush administration to argue that suspected terrorists should not be counted in any of the four classes of detainees entitled to protection under the Geneva Convention. As stated in the “Joint Doctrine for Detainee Operations,” a 2005 document produced by the Joint Chiefs of Staff,

In reference to the Global War on Terror there is an additional classification of detainees who, through their own conduct, are not entitled to the privileges and protection of the Geneva Conventions. These personnel, when detained, are classified as enemy combatants. (p. I-11)

“Extraordinary rendition” refers to the process of transferring a detainee from one nation to another without any form of judicial or administrative process. Human rights groups such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch have maintained that both actions made the torture of detainees more likely. The Obama administration has removed the term enemy combatant and instituted new measures to prevent torture; however, like the Bush administration, it has maintained the right to hold suspected terrorists indefinitely without charge and to employ extraordinary rendition.

Incidents of detainees being tortured and sometimes killed by U.S. military personnel abroad have been documented at Abu Ghraib prison (Iraq), Bagram Theater Internment Facility (Afghanistan), and Guantánamo Bay Naval Base (Cuba). In some cases, photographs depicting prison abuse, including torture, became publicly available, resulting in high-profile international scandals.

The extreme vulnerability of the least protected detainees has elicited philosophical reflection, perhaps most notably by the Italian critical theorist Giorgio Agamben, who in a 2004 interview with Ulrich Raulff described the situation of enemy combatants as “comparable with those in the Nazi camps. . . . [T]hey have absolutely no legal status. They are subject now only to raw power; they have no legal existence” (p. 6).

DETRADITIONALIZATION AND RETRADITIONALIZATION

Cultural globalization accompanies the economic and financial processes of globalization. Many students of high or postmodernity link those processes and claim that modernization erodes or even eradicates local or national traditions, and the most radical expression of this view maintains that the process of detraditionalization is unstoppable. The position that will be taken in this essay is that there is, indeed, a process of detraditionalization that, however, is coupled with retraditionalization in many societies.

As a number of research projects show, traditional culture is alive and well. Native traditions are spreading; syncretistic religions are strong in Africa and Latin America. There are growing efforts to synchronize traditional cultural and religious values with the changing and modernizing structures of society. This entry examines the complex processes that maintain, erode, or reinvigorate local and national traditions and the role of religion in these processes.

Traditions and Their Role in Society

To discuss the process of de- or retraditionalization, one has to clarify the meaning of traditions. The concept originates from the Latin word tradere, meaning “to hand over, deliver, entrust.” In general, it refers to the beliefs, practices, and customs passed from generation to generation. They are embedded in practices of everyday life, such as celebrating birthdays or significant anniversaries. They are also linked to religious practices celebrating important dates (often linked to significant events in a religion’s history), and the special occasions of a religious tradition can transcend national cultures, as one can see in the holidays of almost all religious traditions. Almost all of the great religious traditions contain traditional elements in their theology. For Judaism, it is a body of laws and doctrines received from Moses and handed down from generation to generation. For Christianity, it is a body of teachings delivered by Christ and the apostles. For Muslims, it is the Hadith—the teachings attributed to the prophet Muhammad. For Hindus, it is the teachings about ethics (dharma) found in ancient texts and in the examples of legendary figures. For Buddhists, it is the dhamma of moral teachings in the Buddhist textual tradition. In Chinese religion, it is the Analects of Confucius and other ancient codes of moral behavior and social responsibility.

Originally, all religious and nonreligious traditions were transmitted orally. This involved the possibility of changing—or even distorting—some elements, as one can observe by studying, say, African traditional narratives. But even traditions transmitted in written form are subject to different interpretations—as one can see, for instance, in the various understandings and explanations of sacred religious texts. Various Christian theologies differ in their understanding of the tenets of Christianity. Orthodox and Reform Judaism do not interpret the Talmud in the same way. Sunnī, Shi'ite, and Wahhabi varieties of Islam also adhere to different traditions.

However, traditions are important elements of identity of an ethnic or national community. Maurice Halbwachs, a French philosopher and sociologist, linked traditions to the collective memory of a group or community. However, collective memory can be manipulated. A good example would be the rewriting of history by authoritarian or totalitarian regimes by reinterpreting important events in a nation's history or culture or interpreting historical events from the viewpoint of a community or nation (cf. the controversy concerning the interpretations of the Armenian massacre or the conquests of the Ottoman Empire).

There is no unanimous agreement among philosophers, sociologists, and anthropologists concerning the interpretation of the meaning and functions of traditions. Some, such as Friedrich von Hayek, the Austrian British economist and political scientist, consider traditions as transmitters of knowledge. Others, however, look at them as perpetuating myths about a community. There is, however, a unanimous acceptance, even among those who interpret traditions differently, such as Karl Popper and Eric Hobsbawm, that they are socially constructed.

Popper's "rational theory of tradition" acknowledges that certain traditions are local and cannot be transplanted to other societies. Rational, scientific approaches to nature and society are relevant in cultures where these have been developed and practiced over a long period of time, inculcated through the educational system and scientific, technical practice. For example, people in modern societies by and large do not believe in witchcraft or sorcery. In his view, the best way to deal with traditions is not to accept them uncritically but rather assess them critically for accepting or rejecting certain traditions.

Hobsbawm and his collaborators developed the theory of "invented traditions." The essence of this theory is that many traditions that are considered ancient are relatively recent inventions by influential elements of society. The contributors to the book The Invention of Tradition (1983), which he coedited with Terence Ranger, list a number of traditions usually considered ancient but that are in fact relatively recent. Hobsbawm's contention is that the reference to a "historic past" with its set of practices, norms, and values implies continuity. However, the continuity is largely fictitious and is invoked in times of rapid social transformations. For example, when former colonies gained independence, they often reversed the "traditions" imposed on them by the colonial powers and returned to—or invented—their own traditions. Another example could be found in east-central European countries after the collapse of the communist regimes. They often invoked national traditions that reflected conditions that no longer exist because of economic, social, and cultural transformations.

The invented traditions, as Hobsbawm sees them, served to strengthen social cohesion and collective identity, in the sense of Halbwachs' idea, but they also helped legitimize social hierarchies and institutions, as well as establish and maintain authority. One could conclude from these considerations that the past is always interpreted and serving the present.

In the religious sphere, the description of events, for example, as relayed by the writers of the Gospels, in the analysis of Halbwachs, serve to establish a continuity within a monotheistic belief system. One could add that other belief systems strive to establish and maintain a real or deemed continuity. Even relatively new and rapidly expanding religious movements, for example, Pentecostalism, refer to selected biblical texts.

Traditions in Late Modernity or Postmodernity

Late modernity or postmodernity brought about profound changes in relating to traditions. The Centre for the Study of Cultural Values at Lancaster University (United Kingdom) organized in 1993 an international conference on the topic "Detraditionalization: Authority and Self in an Age of Cultural Uncertainty." Selected papers were published under the same title in 1995, edited by Paul Heelas, Scott Lash, and Paul Morris.

There was a general agreement that the high- or postmodern conditions led to the erosion of traditional authority because of the increased individuation and the reflexivity characteristic of modern conditions that make a break with previous conditions. Under these circumstances, subjectivity and individual decisions concerning morality and religion became ever more widespread. The very fact of the multiplicity of religions and religious organizations (new religions, sects, and cults; New Age movements) does away with the monopoly of traditional, established churches and their influence on secular institutions and legislations. What was earlier taken for granted—for example, the sanctity of marriage—has been questioned and abandoned. In modern societies, there is no single accepted worldview; there are competing ideologies and cultural meanings, and the individual has to make his or her own choice about cultural trends, about religion, and about morality. For religion, it often means that there is a religion de bricolage (do-it-yourself religion) that allows the individual to choose tenets of his or her religion that fit him or her and ignore others or else assimilate meanings and corresponding behavior from the teachings of several religions, for example, Christianity and Buddhism.

Research shows that in many cases, church religion has been replaced by spirituality, meaning that a person believes in a transcendent power or spiritual authority but not in a personal god. This corresponds to the trend of detraditionalization that forces persons to establish their own identities. However, one should take into account the impact of educational institutions and the mass media in influencing many individuals' attitudes concerning cultural, moral, and religious ideas; therefore, the autonomy of the individual is not fully unrestricted.

Modernity did not entirely eradicate traditions. In many fields of society, they are still present, albeit not as forceful and determinant as in premodern times. Most religious institutions have their roots in premodern times (and often face difficulties in adapting to contemporary cultural norms—e.g., the issue of gender equality in the clergy in the Roman Catholic Church). Certain cultural norms, for instance, the taboo on incest, maintain their validity in modern times as well. Communities, even though they changed forms, are still important elements of societal cohesion. However, postmodern conditions in many cases prevented nation-states from becoming unified communities; they became detraditionalized because the subcommunities (ethnic ones) established or maintained their identities. Moreover, a person could choose to change his or her identity—for example, if he or she converts to another religion.

Detraditionalization is not an all-encompassing process in (post)modernity. It coexists with the maintenance of traditions, albeit in different forms. The “invention of traditions” includes the possibility of “rejuvenation” or reconstruction of traditions adapted to modern conditions. As an example, one can refer to a strengthening of national symbols even under the conditions of increasing supranational organizations. The economic and financial process of globalization, coupled by the mostly American popular cultural one, infringed on the traditional or modern national or local cultural or even political traditions, and the repercussions are increasing. More supranational organizations (the European Community, the Organization of American States, etc.) experience a growing pressure of the constituting members to preserve their own legal systems within the common decisions of those organizations.

Retraditionalization occurs when nations and communities react to the pressures of cultural globalization. It happens under different conditions: (a) as a reaction to the overpowering, mostly American, popular culture and (b) due to the desire to maintain or (re)establish traditional culture or social institutions. For example, when previously colonized entities gained their independence, they reverted to their traditional culture and societal arrangements. Retraditionalization could include conservative trends as well when it evokes traditions that stem from premodern periods—for instance, reintroducing positions that churches once occupied in the political, cultural, or educational sphere, as one can observe in the practice of many postcommunist states.

De- and retraditionalizations are not mutually exclusive processes. Roland Robertson, the English social theorist, invented the term glocalization. Its meaning is that the process of globalization is accompanied by the effort of maintaining local identities. This is analogous to the coexistence of abandoning and retaining or returning to traditions. Postmodernity creates an insecurity for the individual inasmuch as traditional ethical norms have become relative; left to the volition of the individual and community, relations have weakened or disappeared.

Cultural Globalization and Religious Traditions

This dynamics can be seen in the religious situation. All monotheistic religions are global. The largest Islamic country is Indonesia. Christianity, in its various forms, is present worldwide. Judaism is not restricted to Israel. All of them have to cope with the problems and tensions created by modernity. That causes controversies and even splits within religious communities and contributes to the emergence of fundamentalist, traditionalist movements. A good example is the controversy within the Anglican Church about ordination of women and homosexuals, and about the position of women and celibacy of priests in the Roman Catholic Church. On the other hand, it contributes to the emergence and a certain popularity of new religious movements that feel free from the perceived constraints of traditional churches or religious institutions.

The globalization and localization in the religious sphere can be observed in two large tendencies. One is the spread of popular and syncretistic religions, mostly in developing societies, although they are still present in modern societies as well. Pilgrimages, fetes of saints, penitents' associations, and so on show that even in developed societies religious traditions have not entirely disappeared. However, popular religions are more widespread in the developing world. Their vitality can be observed in Latin America, even in urban settings. Popular religion is an intermediary between official and indigenous religions and performs meaning-giving functions for the masses. In this, it constitutes a powerful means for constructing and maintaining identity, especially in the face of globalizing culture. Modernization in developing societies creates a large mass of displaced former peasants who eke out a living in an urban setting, and popular, syncretistic religions can provide them with a community. It is closer to their traditions and counteracts the rigid, ethical religions.

The other tendency is the rapid expansion of Pentecostalism worldwide but mainly in Africa and Latin America. Pentecostalism is now a truly global religion that within a century went from a small community originating in the United States to the fastest growing Christian community. Estimates indicate that in 2000, Pentecostals constituted about a quarter of Christians worldwide.

Pentecostalism has its roots in charismatic Christian ideas. It puts the emphasis on personal faith and spirituality. It does not have a sophisticated theology; it is rather a religion of practice and has strong links to indigenous cultural-religious expressions. Therefore, it can shed the image of a missionary religion superimposed by colonial powers, and its members have a common language with their spiritual leaders. Its rituals make widespread use of music and chanting, more than other Christian rituals. Pentecostals believe in the gift of the Holy Spirit guiding their lives, in divine healing, and in prophesying. They practice glossolalia—that is, speaking in tongues (which in some cultures is akin to what practitioners of witchcraft or some native Latin American ceremonies use). Pentecostalism encourages honest work and emphasizes marital fidelity and equality of women, who play an important role in Pentecostal communities; it discourages consumption of alcohol.

While Pentecostalism is not directly involved in the economic and political sphere, it exerts an influence on them, mostly because it is against the corrupt power elites—especially in Africa—and, contrary to the traditional missionary practices and the position of established churches—especially the Roman Catholic Church in Latin America—it encourages self-reliance. In Latin America, Pentecostalism is reinforcing the Protestant presence, and in sub-Saharan Africa, it contributes to the detraditionalization process without totally rejecting traditions. Pentecostalism combines both globalizing and localizing trends in religious culture. Because Pentecostalism negates the division between the this-worldly and the supernatural and refutes multiple realities, it can alleviate for its adherents the difficulties in coping with the exigencies of the (post)modern world.

The rapid transformation caused by globalization causes a weakening and erosion of traditional structures and ideas but does not fully eradicate them because people, communities, and societies need to maintain a historically developed continuity in their identity. This is why retraditionalization processes attempt to be countervailing forces.

DHARMA, KARMA, AND SAMBARA

The notions of dharma, karma, and samsara constitute the conceptual space within which an orthodox Hindu mindful of the classical Brahmanical tradition lives out his or her adult life. Dharma is the expression in the affairs of human beings of cosmic harmony and stability (rita). Literally, it means that which maintains, sustains, and supports. It includes the ideas of natural law, moral righteousness, and religion as these terms are generally understood. Concretely, dharma refers to the complex of duties that a person should discharge in the course of everyday life. While certain duties such as truthfulness are binding universally (sādhāran dharma), most are context sensitive, varying according to the actor's social status (varna, jāti, or caste) and the stage of life (student, householder, retiree, or renouncer) (varna-āshrama dharma).

The sources of dharma are as follows: (a) a timeless morality received through "internal" revelation (shruti, that which has been heard from the seers, notably the Veda), (b) time-honored textual and oral traditions (smṛiti), and (c) good customs (sadāchār) derived from the lives of exemplars. Moral preceptors themselves, like Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948), have often invoked the ultimate authority of the conscience or "inner voice" (ātmanah tushti).

Dharma, then, is the foundation on which the moral agent constructs his or her social life, in which he or she sows the seeds of action (karma). Karma is invariably goal directed and value oriented, goals and values being ideally inseparable.

In its most general expression, karma is dharmic action. Concretely, it refers to ritual performances, whether life cycle rites (karma-kānda) or devotional performances (such as pujas and pilgrimages). Besides, there are "secular" activities, most notably the rational pursuit of economic and political ends (artha) and aesthetic and sensual enjoyment (kama). The pursuit of artha and kama must take place within the framework of dharma, establishing a hierarchy of goals and values (purushārtha).

All purposeful action is bound to bear fruit (karma-phala), and it is the fate of the actor to enjoy or suffer the same, for suffering (dukha) follows evil action just as surely as satisfaction (ānanda) follows good actions. Karma, thus, has the double connotation of practical action as well as eschatology or self-constructed fate. Karmic action usually comes in three forms, namely, (1) mental acts (e.g., compassion, forgiveness, greed, anger), (2) speech acts (e.g., praise, abuse), and (3) physical or bodily acts (e.g., exclusion from personal physical contact).

The fruits of individual karmic actions are rarely, if ever, exhausted in a single lifetime; they accumulate (sanchit karma). One of the persistent problems in this context is whether the load of karma may be lightened by transferring some of it to another person through ritual procedures. At the time of death, the body perishes, but the residue of the fruits of karma necessitates reincarnation of the soul in another corporeal body. This "wandering" of the soul from body to body is called samsara. Just as the notion of social action (karma) cannot be separated from its moral foundation (dharma), it can also not be detached from its consequences, resulting in samsaric bondage. Traditionally, the ultimate goal of every moral agent should be to obtain release (mukti) from the cycle of birth-death-rebirth, or the transmigration of souls.

DIASPORA

Diaspora has become a key term in both religious practice and the analysis of religions from a global perspective, a lexical frame linking reflections about collective identifications, migration, territory, imagination, and memory. As a term that is both one of social practice and one of scholarly analysis, its use requires special care. At the simplest level, analytical attempts to define “diaspora” refer to three issues: (1) a group’s dislocation from a perceived homeland, (2) the incomplete assimilation of that group in a host society, and (3) the ongoing relations of a group with a place and people left behind—ranging from a minimal relation of sentiments to a maximal one of remittances of money and goods or even frequent bodily returns. This entry builds from this simple characterization to examine various ways of defining diaspora, specifying what the construction and maintenance of a diaspora requires and considering particular issues relevant to thinking about diasporic religion.

Paths Toward Definition

The notion of diaspora has been progressively widened over the past century from the classic Jewish, Greek, and Armenian cases to potentially include almost everyone. Its colloquial use suggests affiliations given by virtue of biological descent, which allegedly transmit “blood” continuity across space: The Jewish diaspora from this perspective is the set of people whose families were from, but then were exiled or otherwise departed from, Palestine in the distant past during dispersions under Babylonia, Rome, or other conquerors. The Irish diaspora is built of the descendants of the families that left the green isle during the potato famines of the 19th century, and so on.

For analytical and comparative purposes, this folk meaning falls short on at least two counts. First, in this view there exist perennially stable groupings of humans who under conditions of emigration inevitably turn into diasporas. The problem with this is that there are no such naturally existing groups and, it follows, no natural diasporas either. The maintenance of sentiments of affinity linking even apparently highly cohesive social groups requires enormous cultural work and is never simply “given.” The second problem with everyday uses of diaspora is that the category is overly broad. It is not helpful to say that everyone is diasporic, though it is true that if one expands the temporal horizon widely enough, all human beings are descendants of East Africa. The reason most people are not East African diasporans, though all have ancestors from there, is because that memory is not part of their conscious experience: Neither is it constitutive of their bodily habitus, nor are they viewed by others as members of that category. Folk invocations of diaspora fail to specify the cultural particularity of a diaspora—that this cultural form depends not merely on having a family tree that sprouted in another place but also on the fact that the double consciousness in relation to place is central, even actively conjured in their lived experiences. Diasporans feel a gap between here and there, where they are really from. Often, they even value and cultivate that gap, finding in it a unique and vital distinction.

The prevalence of these confusing folk usages, not to mention the mixed approaches of analytical meanings—as a collective memory, as a self-conscious identifier adopted in varying degrees, as an ideological mode of cultural performance making political claims—suggests the need to more clearly give boundaries to the term.

Definition by Etymology

One way to delimit its semantic range is through etymology. Diaspora derives from the Greek verb speirein (“to sow or scatter,” as in seed) and the preposition dia (“over”), thus meaning “to scatter over.” The same Indo-European root, sp-, appears in words such as spore, spread, or sperm. Diaspora was first used by the Greeks to describe the colonization of Asia Minor and the Mediterranean world, and it probably connoted a sacrificial loss of the homeland for the cause of Greek expansion.

The word took on a different valence as applied to the Jewish experience, as a translation of the Hebrew term galut in the Greek version of Hebrew scripture, the Septuagint, connoting severance, exile (Deuteronomy 28: 25, 58–68), and the Jewish dispersions (732 BCE, conquest by Assyria; 586 BCE, conquest by Babylonia; 70 CE, conquest by Rome). Yet at least in the later context of rabbinic teaching it also carried the promise of ultimate return. In Jewish thought, diaspora carries within it a soteriology, the promise of the future salvation of the people through a return to their place of origin. Other groups' religious diasporic practice may proffer analogous promises of geopiety projected into the future. This suggests how diasporas not only have distinct causes but also draw on different, imaginative, and sentimental valences: diasporas of hope, of terror, of despair, and of desire.

Definition by List

Another route to definition has been the attempt to specify the empirical contents of a diaspora, so as to enable the differentiation of "diaspora societies" from other kinds of societies. Scholars have by now agreed on a relative consensus of traits constituting diasporas. Most obvious in these lists is the dispersion of a present group of past ancestors from an original center to two or more new sites. Next is some retained collective memory about the homeland. A third standard criterion is the maintenance of relations with the departed homeland, at least as an imagined community, which defines in significant ways the contemporary experience of the host land. These relations may include economic as well as social and cultural remittances sent back and forth, or they may entail ritual performances that call the homeland to mind to improve or transform the experience of the host land.

A fourth characteristic of a list-based definition calls attention to the need for institutional infrastructures that make and sustain diasporic sentiments through stagings and performance. This is important because it points to the constraints on diasporic cultural forms: Emigrants must rely on artifactual representations that recall the homeland to mind, only some of which are possible using the materials at hand in the host land.

A fifth common feature invoked is that a diaspora group remains at least partly separate, distinct, or alienated from the mainstream society within the host country. Often the sense of separate difference is fueled in part by the nostalgic idealization of a specific ancestral homeland and ancestral time, which may or may not be linked to aspirations of actual return. For example, relatively few African Americans actually remove themselves permanently to Africa, though the ritual experience of momentary "return" both in space and in time is widely performed in African diaspora religions of the Americas.

Defining by Relation

It will aid the definitional process to confront an apparently simple question: Who is not in diaspora? First, people can go back to wherever they consider home; when they do so on a permanent basis, they cease to be in diaspora. Recent examples include ethnic Germans and Greeks returning to their homelands from the former USSR after 1989. A second way a group can be nondiasporic is by remaining always in transit, for example, as nomads, such that the lack of any established homeland location precludes any sense of territorial dislocation. The Bedouins and the Gypsies (Romani) provide possible examples.

Next, a community that is entirely uprooted to a new homeland is no longer dispersed; it remains "intact," merely in a new place, and the key spatial feature of diaspora, the engagement of host land and homeland communities across a gap, is forfeit. Moreover, at least as a logical possibility, one can imagine a group that remains dislocated from a homeland community but that so fully assimilates in the host land that it is no longer cognizant of the homeland and abandons the sort of coresponsibility that is constitutive of active diasporas.

Finally, a group lacking the resources, time, energy, and political clout to continually guard and fan the sparks of memory can cease to live in diaspora. Diasporic affiliations and representations come into being under certain historical conditions and may be transformed or disappear under others.

Making and Maintaining Diasporas

To these common ways of defining diaspora, five further considerations may be added to further sharpen the use of diaspora and to evaluate how diasporas are made and maintained in practice.

A Diaspora Is a Specific Kind of Culture

Diasporas are cultural rather than biological forms. For a diasporic culture to be maintained or transmitted, information such as memories, tastes, and habits must be held in common by multiple individual participants. Individual minds must receive and reproduce the words, habits, and tendencies that, if and when assembled densely and consistently enough with those of a group of people located in another place, come to be called a “diaspora” in speech contexts of comparisons with other clustered habits, memories, aesthetic preferences, or languages. The reproduction of such a sufficient though partial similarity requires communications between individuals that bridge interpersonal space. Diaspora culture is distinctive in that the transmissive gaps that must be bridged are enormously widened.

Diasporas Cross Gaps and Are Also About Such Gaps

Diasporic cultural transmissions no longer entail the receptions and incorporations of words or ideas passed contiguously, through direct contact or immediate networks, but rather signals and symbols exchanged via electronic media, phone calls, letters, videotape, or informal gossip networks. Cultural transmission may no longer be conducted through human copresence in known places, as in the homeland, but rather at a distance across empty space dividing the homeland from the host land. The wider the spaces those transmissions must cross, and the more rival signals that exist in the cultural field of reception, the more variation may occur. This is so even if, as is often the case in diasporic religions, there arise strident discourses insisting on traditional fidelity and absolute continuity between the homeland and the diasporic group.

The diasporic experience often entails not only a spatial gap but also a perceived temporal gap, as the homeland is considered by those in diaspora to carry the symbolic weight of the “original” and the “inherent,” just as for those remaining in the homeland, the diaspora often must bear the load of “modernity.” For example, when a Caribbean in New York receives a videotape of a ritual from her home village and watches it in her high-rise apartment, she may view the videotaped actions according to a script in which the ritual is happening not only elsewhere but also else-when: in an earlier time, the time of her childhood. The homeland acquires an aura of origins and authenticity, at once a geographic backwater compared with the city and a sacred place—sacred because it mediates the past in some way that resists transience—even though the homeland village is itself fully engaged with its own local processes of modernity.

Diaspora as a Series of Interventions, Not a Permanent State of Being

The Irish Americans of Chicago may be sentimentally joined to Ireland for a given occasion, such as the Saint Patrick’s Day parade or a Notre Dame football game, but only with substantial effort. To not only be of Irish extraction but to also feel it as a central part of one’s being is contingent and usually temporary, since it is only one among a set of possible affiliations. Such emotions are evoked by some situations and not by others, which is why such diasporic conjunctions require more or less elaborate stagings.

Performing diasporas requires a discursive framework—holidays set apart, songs, rituals, texts, and so on—as well as extensive material and social infrastructural supports. Thus, the manifestation of “the Irish diaspora” in the United States depends on the distinction of a given day from others on the calendar, on major cities’ assent to closing streets for parades, and on the manufacture and sale of green hats, beer, and buttons. It entails a conjunction of commercial and civic interests that can only be achieved infrequently and not achieved at all for other only potentially diasporic groups that lack sufficient numbers, capital, and political clout. Without repeated commemorations, diasporas may disappear from the minds of potential members. When the homeland cannot be called to mind, or fails to evoke sentiments of affinity, a diaspora ceases to exist.

Such commemorative labor is enjoined not only in large performances that are consciously and ideologically diasporic but also in small, often unconscious habitual acts. For example, a Jamaican diasporan uses the colors of his hat to keep that identity “in mind” both for observers and for himself, though he may never devote conscious deliberation to the matter. Diasporas are sentimental communities but also habit communities. The homeland must be performed again and again. But why do this work? Diasporas are desirable because they are consequential actions. By naming a horizon of expectation, they provide solidarity, purpose, identity, and futurity. Against this horizon, diasporans not only perform rituals but also raise funds and mobilize campaigns to effect change in both émigré communities and the homelands they remember or revisit. The Garifuna diaspora in New York, for example, generated the revenue that brought electricity to many Honduran villages in the early 1980s. It also won a new status for Carib, its mother tongue, as an “official language” recognized by the city of New York, a recognition that prodded the state of Honduras into following suit. Invoking a “diasporic” identity helps define and legitimize cultural boundaries within a competitive cultural market of recognition, which can help generate support from city and state governments for social services, for institution building, and for the spaces required for commemoration.

Diaspora Culture Is the Elevation of One Group Over Others

Because being diasporic does something, diasporas are interested interventions that temporarily level differences by suspending rival reference group affiliations and elevating just one. For example, Caribbean English- and French-speaking Blacks in the United States often emphasize their West Indianness or Haitianness and their distinctive accents so as not to be too easily conflated with their African American proximal hosts, who are perceived as suffering discrimination and reduced social status. A Haitian in New York may under certain circumstances feel, be identified as, or introduce herself as “African American,” “African,” “Caribbean,” or “French”; but all of these are likely to be suspended during a Vodou ceremony in Brooklyn in favor of an authentic “Haitianness,” since that is the diasporic identifier most befitting that particular occasion.

Still, while diasporic affiliations elevate one identification over others for emphasis, the nomenclature of diaspora also connotes distance and limits any absolute identification with the distant place. Being a member of the African diaspora both forges a link with Africa and guards a critical distance, allowing for its selective invocation. For example, during the 1980s, many African Americans actively protested South Africa’s apartheid system in part by virtue of African diasporic loyalties that found common cause with South African victims of apartheid. Yet similar mobilizations have not occurred as frequently in relation to other African traumas, notably in Sudan and Rwanda, because famines and massacres were less directly familiar to the North American Black experience than South Africa’s racial segregation. This suggests how diasporic sentiments and political interventions are constrained by what is imaginable and relevant within the cultural repertoire, political context, and material context at hand.

Diasporic Religion

Many scholars have argued that religious participation is enhanced through migration and diasporic affiliation. The hypothetical acceleration of religious action occurs because migrants are forced to assimilate and become homogenized in the economic or productive sectors of life, leaving cultural domains—religion, music, or style—as primary resources for maintaining a sense of continuity with the past. Where cassava cultivation and the hanging of hammocks is impossible for most Caribbean emigrants in large urban centers, for example, religious performance may shoulder a heavier load as a source of ethnic affiliation and spatial memory of the place left behind.

An even stronger hypothesis claims that not only is religion accorded special emphasis in diasporic settings, diasporas in certain respects actually make religions.

Consider the classic case of the diasporic religion Judaism. Because the Jewish diaspora carries within it the idea of the anticipated future return to the homeland, the historic dispersion from the homeland entailed not only loss but also great vitality. The destruction of the Temple brought forth by necessity a more transportable, transmissible style of Judaism, one based not on temple ritual but rather on the Law (Mishnah) and its interpretation. Out of the diaspora emerged the formation of an incipient scriptural canon, the formation of synagogues under the leadership of charismatic prophets, the exegetical style based in contact and communication with rival traditions, and even the very notion, value, and ritualization of “return” itself. In this sense, Babylon was the crucible that made Judaism a fully articulated religion.

In diasporic situations, religious words and acts that were formerly “natural” parts of the social environ and its quotidian routine become the object of conscious selection. They must be planned for, allotted space, deliberated, and agreed on. For groups in exile or emigration, religion is reified by being dislodged from its embedded, unspoken status to becoming a discrete object of contemplation and contest. This critical reevaluation can have the effect of accelerating religious sentiments, discourses, and practices or at least allowing space for critical revisions of tradition to occur.

Yet this is far from inevitable. The acceleration of religious participation under diasporic conditions depends on the status of religion in the receiving country. It is not at all clear, for example, that Moroccans who arrive in Paris become more religious by virtue of that transit in the same way that Koreans do on arriving in the United States, since religion is not a historically privileged and legally protected category for social organization in France to the degree that it is in the United States. In such cases, religion may become less central upon its becoming a problem for reflection. As religious practices are refracted through diasporic contexts, what they will surely not do is to remain the same.

DIVINATION

Divination is the act of foreseeing and foretelling the future, and interpreting present actions and decision-making processes, via omens and supernatural means. Divining is facilitated by trained diviners, soothsayers, shamans, seers, priests, and psychics, who use ritual objects to “spiritually read” symbols and signs. Divination can be used to decipher potential life warnings, upcoming illnesses, personal struggles, symbolic dreams, individual relationships, and problematic social interactions. Practitioners employ divination to answer life-altering questions about a variety of topics, from finding the perfect spouse or job, to knowing when to build a house or business, to uncovering personal or communal wrongdoing, to even determining the time of one’s death. In communities where water or produce resources are sparse, divination can unearth what actions are required for rain or crops to bountifully return. As a worldwide phenomenon, practiced in both ancient and modern times across religions, divination serves as an indicator of humanity's continued fascination with discerning unknown questions through spirit-centered methods. For practitioners, divination is an individual and community tool relaying a seeker's potential life outcome through revealing the necessary steps to follow to avoid ill fortune and achieve success.

Objects used to divine can vary from culture to culture, ranging from Tarot cards, rune stones, palms, astrological signs, pendulums, Ouija boards, tea leaves, and coffee grounds in Europe to spiritually reading sand, mirrors, divination chains, divining rods, dreams, candles, the Bible, eggs, animal entrails, and cosmological signs (such as thunder, and star and cloud formations) in Africa and Latin America. China is noted for its Book of Changes, the I Ching, which is more than 4,500 years old. Many other divinatory methods around the world are used—the connection between the methods being that the objects used are ritualized, held to high esteem, and seen as conduits capable of revealing higher answers from supernatural orders. Ifa, an elaborate divination system originating with the Yoruba of Nigeria, uses divining chains (opele) holding 256 possible codes, with each code containing 16 different stories, proverbs, herbs, and divinities determining a divination's outcome; training and initiation can take decades to master. Other divination methods, such as palmistry, can be rudimentarily book learned within a few weeks.

Practitioners generally believe that divination is made possible through one of the following means: (a) divine beings or spirits associated with prophecy, (b) ancestral beings speaking on a person's behalf, (c) energetic presences manipulated or honed from other worlds or dimensions, (d) a diviner's intuition or telepathic abilities, (e) a scientific system of nature interpreted, or (f) for those outside a communal religious system, "magic" and sheer luck. For nonbelievers, divination can be viewed as chicanery or merely coincidental—an ill-attempted form of personal psychotherapy—or, on the other end of the spectrum, as a demonic practice inviting ill-tempered spirits to heretically act against God's law.

DIVINE LAW

For most religious traditions, even indigenous, divine law consists of mandates believed to be given to human beings by a deity or deities. These mandates pertain to communal regulations, civil laws, liturgical practices, morality, ethical behavior, dietary practices, and personal hygiene habits. The mandates can be passed down through poetry, sacred stories, songs, place names, and sacred writings. Divine law is arguably the most important law of any society. It is central to most, if not all, religious traditions. Since it is derived from the divine, it is considered sacred. To break, ignore, distort, or reject the law is to reject the creator of the law, and it is believed that the divine will exact punishment for any such actions. Even more, every society and religious tradition has created a hermeneutic, or a science of interpretation, to comprehend, categorize, and apply divine law to a given situation. In Hinduism, the transcendent law is related to the concept of dharma; in Buddhism, it is dhamma; and the Confucian tradition in China has the notion of righteous behavior associated with the concept of li. Westerners are most familiar with three different conceptions of divine law: Jewish, Islamic, and Christian.

Jewish conceptions of divine law are based on the Tanakh. The Tanakh, or Hebrew scriptures, is divided into three major portions: Torah (Teaching), Nevi'im (Prophets), and Ketuvim (Writings). Although all the books contained within the Tanakh are considered to be divinely inspired, the first five books, or the Torah—that is, the books of Moses—hold primacy in Jewish theology. Contained within the Torah are the 613 obligations or mitzvahs incumbent on all Jews. These obligations are mandated by God. They cover morality, communal governance, ethics, dietary regulations, and ceremonies. In addition to the Hebrew Scriptures is the Oral Torah, which essentially consists of the Talmud. The Talmud itself is made up of the Mishnah and Gemara. In essence, the Talmud contains rabbinical interpretations and commentaries about the Tanakh and proper liturgical practices. It is believed that God's words as recorded in the Tanakh cannot be properly understood without familiarity with the Oral Torah or Talmud. In this way, the Talmud is part and parcel of divine law.

Islamic conceptions of divine law are based on the Qur'an (recitation) and the Hadith (trodden path), which consists of the Shari'a (the way). The Qur'an is the sacred scripture of Islam. Unlike the Tanakh, it is divided into suras (chapters), not books. These suras are arranged from the longest to the shortest, not chronologically or thematically. The Hadith consists of the most reliable accounts of the actions and teachings of the Prophet Muhammad on practical matters. In this way, the Hadith complements and supplements the Qur'an. It is believed that the Qur'an cannot be properly understood without reference to the Hadith. One must accept both books as being divinely inspired, though the Qur'an holds primacy. Both the Qur'an and the Hadith taken together make up the Shari'a. The Shari'a is commonly broken up into five categories of mandates: (1) belief, (2) morality, (3) devotion, (4) interactions, and (5) consequences. As with the Tanakh and the Talmud, most aspects, if not every aspect, of a believer's existence are covered by these divinely established laws.

The Christian conception of the divine law combines the Hebrew scriptures with the Christian scriptures or the New Testament. The New Testament is used to interpret the Hebrew scriptures, or Old Testament. Christians believe that the arrival or advent of Jesus Christ is promised throughout the Old Testament. What Christians call the Old Testament, Judaism, the religion that Jesus and his disciples were born into and practiced, calls the Tanakh. Jesus did not write any portion of the New Testament. In the Christian view, the New Testament is the articulation of God's new covenant with mankind, thereby rendering the ceremonial practices, dietary regulations and liturgical laws of the Hebrew scriptures obsolete. For Christians, the Hebrew scriptures tell of God's old covenant with Israel. In this way, the Old Testament is interpreted through the lens of the New Testament.

There was no Christian Bible for at least 100 years after Christ's death. Most of the churches had been founded by the actual apostles of Christ or people who were the disciples of the apostles of Christ. The four books relating the ministry of Christ are written from four different perspectives. The Acts of the Apostles is a continuation of the Gospels. According to Luke, it is the second part, so to speak. It was written by Luke. The Pauline Letters are epistles or letters written by Saint Paul to specific churches or individuals. The Catholic Letters are called Catholic because they are considered to be universal; that is, they were written at the time intentionally for the benefit of all Christians and not just for specific churches or individuals. The Book of Revelation records a vision of the end of the world seen by Saint John of Patmos.

The Christian concept of divine law was popularized by the Dominican theologian, Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274), when he categorized and ordered what he perceived to be the four laws that govern human existence. Previous church philosophers, especially Augustine of Hippo, had long recognized the idea of divine law but had failed to clearly define it and articulate its relation to other forms of law. Aquinas in his monumental Summa Theologiae not only clearly defined divine law but also explained what it is and how it relates to other types of law. For Aquinas, there are four kinds or categories of law: (1) lex aeterna (eternal law), (2) lex naturalis (natural law), (3) lex humana (human law), and (4) lex divina (divine law).

Eternal law is the overall law governing the universe; it is God's architectural blueprint; it is the physical law that governs the universe. Eternal law dictates that humans have an instinctive desire or impulse to reproduce just as any other kind of animal. Natural law makes humans capable of loving, caring, and educating their offspring beyond what is needed or required for base survival. Natural law is the intrinsic human ability to judge right from wrong. It is the law written on the heart of every rational creature. Simply put, it is practical reason. For Aquinas, because of natural law, humans know inwardly that the murder of innocent people is wrong, that certain sexual activities are wrong, that the family as an institution is good, and that people must work together for society to function.

From natural law, human law emerges; it provides specifics. Bad human law is a lesser evil than having no human law. Human law is the only form of law that originates directly from human beings, not God. As such, these laws are posited or positive laws. There are two kind of positive laws. First, civil law is created by humans for the proper governance of a particular city. Second, ius gentium, the law of nations, is a universal law created by humans that all have in common and for the purpose of “international” relations. That is, all peoples or nations have laws regulating private property, murder, theft, warfare, communication, and travel. From this stems ius peregrinandi, the law of the foreigner, which implies trade.

Finally, divine law is revealed law or law based on Christian scriptures. Because natural law is too broad and human law is concerned with actions affecting society, the aim of revealed or divine law through the Bible is to regulate the actions of humans within the Christian community for the purpose of spiritual salvation. According to Aquinas, only Christians have divine law and thus can be punished for its violation. Jews have the old or obsolete divine law, and Islam’s divine law is fraudulent. In this way, non-Christians cannot be punished for violations of divine law because they lack the revealed word of Christ. The natural and human laws of all peoples must be respected, even by Christians, so long as divine law is not contradicted.

DIVINE LIGHT MISSION

The Divine Light Mission (DLM) was one of the better known of the new religious movements that received attention during the turbulent 1960s and 1970s, particularly in the United States. The movement originated in India in 1960, led by Guru Shri Hans Ji Maharaji, but was promoted in the United States and other Western nations by his youngest son, Guru Maharaj Ji, whose Indian name was Prem Rawat. Maharaj Ji assumed leadership of the movement when he was 8 years old, after the death of his father, but actual leadership rested with his mother, with whom he had many conflicts before breaking with her and traveling to the United States and United Kingdom at the age of 13 to establish the DLM in those and other Western nations.

The DLM achieved considerable success for a time, especially in Western nations, and at its prime, it was operating in 37 countries and established several hundred centers and ashrams for its participants. The DLM attracted considerable media attention through the large numbers of young people who joined and attended its festivals, which were a major way by which the organization raised funds necessary for its operations. Participants were called premies—the designation for those who had received the special knowledge associated with joining the movement. The movement also attracted some well-known people, inducing them to become followers, at least for a time. Among them was Rennie Davis, one of the famous defendants in the Chicago Seven trial, who was in charge of one major festival that took place in Houston’s Astrodome in 1973. This festival was not successful and left the DLM with a large debt that took years to pay off and resulted in severe restructuring of the organization.

Further problems arose for the movement when in 1974 Mahari Ji married his secretary, a non-Indian, which was against his teaching of celibacy and also very upsetting to his mother as well as many followers. Many followers left the movement, and the decline of the DLM became noticeable, with a majority of the followers leaving during the late 1970s. What remained of the DLM in the Western nations became quite Westernized under the leadership of Prem Rawat. The organization's name was changed in 1983 to Elan Vital, and it continued to operate in a limited way using this designation. The DLM does exist in India, with the organization being headed by the eldest brother of Prem Rawat, Satpal Rawat.

The DLM attracted attention from the Anti-Cult movement and even some governments, with many accusations of "brainwashing" and "mind control" being made, based in part on the dramatic behavior changes observed sometimes in members of the movement. Those living in the ashrams were expected to practice celibacy and abstain from alcohol and meat. A number of "deprogrammings" of participants occurred during the time of the DLM's prominence in the media, but attacks against the DLM faded as the movement itself started to decline.

DJIBOUTI

Djibouti (locally called Jumhuriyat Jibuti) is a small, recently formed East African nation located on the Horn of Africa, southeast of Eritrea and at the crossing of the Gulf of Aden and the Red Sea. Independent from France in 1977, the Republic of Djibouti holds a strategic location in the Muslim world, as its position is adjacent to the Middle Eastern nation Yemen and at the Red Sea crossing. Approximately 94% of the country identifies as Muslim, with small percentages of foreign-born Catholics and practicing Christians, many of whom are refugees from the neighboring countries.

Before 1859, when France's interest in the area arose due to British pressure seeking control over the Red Sea, the arid, volcanic region was sparsely populated by nomadic groups, particularly the Issas and Afars. The Issa are of Somali origin and typically reside in the south, constituting 60% of the population, whereas the Afar, about 35% of the population, hold allegiances with Ethiopia and reside in the north. Both groups are predominantly Sunnī Muslim, and the country since 1977 has been a member of the Arab League.

Islam became regionally present as early as 615 CE, with mass conversion by the 10th century; nevertheless, local festivals, traditions, and styles of dress remain and often become fused or practiced in conjunction with the Muslim faith. Today, the practice of all faiths is permitted under the nation's 1992 constitution, though the sole recognized religion of the state is Islam. International groups have noted that strong pressure exists for Muslims to remain Muslims, with converts to Christianity facing tremendous social and familial ostracism. Equality between the sexes is poor. Female Muslims in Djibouti are typically circumcised, have literacy rates below 20%, bear an average of around three children each, and cannot marry outside of their religion.

With a population near 750,000 and less than 0.1% arable land, food production is difficult. Education beyond basic schooling is limited, and access to higher education is usually sought outside the country. Despite Djibouti's economic and agricultural poverty, the United States holds a strong interest in the country as a means to countering threats of global terrorism, with the only U.S. military base in sub-Saharan Africa located on Djibouti's soil.

Today, the official spoken languages are Arabic and French, though Afar dialects of lowland eastern Cushitic and Somali are still prevalent in the region. Formerly called French Somaliland, Djibouti's borders were created without regard to former ethnic allegiances or traditional lineages. This haphazard construction of its oft-contested borders and access to railway transport have contributed to ethnic, political, and social tensions within Djibouti's borders as well as in relation to its neighboring countries—Somalia, Ethiopia, and Eritrea—for more than the past century. In 1981, Djibouti became a one-party state, and in 1991, the Afar Revolt began via the Front for the Restoration of Unity and Democracy, inciting civil war, which was unresolved until 2001. Though the 1992 constitution provides for a multiparty system, the second-term president, Ismail Omar Guelleh, was controversially reelected in 2005 with a received vote of 100%.

Eihei Dōgen, transmitter of the Soto Zen tradition to Japan, is widely regarded as one of the most profound and original of Japanese philosophers.

Born of aristocratic parents, Dōgen was orphaned young and entered the great Buddhist monastery of Mt. Hiei near Kyoto. He was, however, disturbed by doubts, especially concerning the common Mahayana doctrine of “original enlightenment,” asking why, if we have an inner enlightened Buddha nature from birth, we then need to strive for enlightenment. Traveling to China to study, he eventually attained Zen enlightenment at a Soto monastery in 1225. On his return to his homeland, Dōgen founded the Eihei-ji temple in the Soto tradition. That lineage emphasizes enlightenment in the context of quiet sitting and everyday work.

The value of everyday experience is really the background of Dōgen's greatest intellectual achievement—the uji, or the “being-time” argument—as explained in his most famous work, the Shobogenzo (which could be loosely translated as “collection on true dharma seeing”). The exposition is difficult but seems to mean that every moment of time, and the world as it is in that moment, is a distinct here-and-now reality, linked to the past and future only by unreliable mental constructs, memory, and imagination. Dōgen's thought has been compared with Einstein's relativity and modern existentialism, though his point was to validate enlightenment as one with “just sitting” and daily-life activities such as working in the kitchen rather than as something to be attained outside one's present self.

Dōgen was also far ahead of his time in his equal evaluation of the religious experience of women and men. He died in obscurity, however, and it was only later that the importance of his teaching was realized. By the late 18th century, his writings had become normative for Soto Zen. In postwar Japan, the “Critical Buddhism” school, seeking to determine what had gone wrong in Japanese Buddhism that allowed it to be so easily coopted by Japan's medieval samurai and modern militarists, saw the flaw to be in the “original enlightenment” concept Dōgen had questioned. They alleged that, according to it, because we have an enlightened Buddha nature within us from birth, whatever we do with “no-mind” sincerity, including swordsmanship or dying for the emperor, is legitimate. Dōgen emphasized enlightenment as not something attained but as consciousness that must be realized moment by moment.

Many of the Western Zen centers are in Dōgen's Soto tradition, and his philosophical influence is widely felt throughout the world.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

As with most Caribbean nations, the religious setting in the Dominican Republic is changing rapidly. Still, the predominant religion is Christianity, specifically Roman Catholicism. Officially, roughly 90% of the population practices it, and the Church still exerts enormous influence on the country, through strong linkages with the government, a well-established education system, and the legal sanctioning of marriages. For a brief period in the 1950s, religion and the Church were suppressed under the oppressive rule of Rafael Trujillo. But after his assassination, Catholicism quickly reclaimed its dominance.

While most citizens practice traditional Roman Catholicism, through a process known as syncretism, it has melded with African (Benin, Congo, Yoruba) and native Amerindian (Taino) religious elements to produce a form of Dominican Catholicism. A heady mix of African religious symbolism and gods with Roman Catholic ritual, this hybrid form is otherwise known as Dominican Santería, or Congo del Espiritu Santo. The unabashed inclusion of African drums is a distinctive feature of Dominican Catholicism and other religions as well.

In addition, there is an approximately 5% Protestant presence. Because of the efforts of missionaries, Protestants from the United States and the West Indies have established footholds in the Dominican Republic since the mid-20th century. As in the rest of Latin America, though, Evangelicalism is presently the fastest growing form of Protestant belief among the population. Evangelical churches have sprung up rapidly throughout the country and are quite strong in the rural and poor areas. Some see this rise in Protestant belief as a direct result of the failure of Roman Catholic churches to satisfy the material needs of the poor. Evangelical churches tend to promote a disciplined and frugal lifestyle, a personal conversion experience, public confession of sins, spiritual healing of illness, relief from poverty through prayer, and demonstration of faith through the gifts of the Holy Spirit, namely, the ecstasy of speaking in tongues.

In addition to the evangelical churches, there are Baptist, Mormon, and Seventh-Day Adventist communities. Also, there are some non-Christian communities as well; synagogues have been present on the island since the arrival in the 1930s of World War II Jewish refugees. More recently, mostly due to immigration, there is a growing presence of other, perhaps less expected, faiths, each with a less than 1% share of the population; Baha'i, Buddhist, Chinese folk religion, Islam, and Hinduism have well-attended centers of worship on the island.

Perhaps the most controversial form of spirituality in the republic is the practice of Vodou. Borrowed from neighboring Haiti, Vodou has historically been looked down on by many professed Dominican Christians because of racial and social pressures (many view it as a Haitian practice). And yet it is becoming more popular and openly practiced as resistance to it is reduced through multicultural education. In the Dominican Republic, Vodou has been recast as Las 21 Divisiones and is a more fluid version than its Haitian counterpart, which is also practiced (though naturally less popular). Again, the main difference between the two is the use of different African-inspired musical instruments during the ceremonies.

DOUGLAS, MARY (1921–2007)

Mary Tew Douglas, a British anthropologist, is most famous for her work on ritual purity, bodily symbolism, and cultural perceptions of risk. Trained at Oxford under Evans-Pritchard, she began her career studying the Lele of the Congo. After numerous articles and two books on these and other central African peoples, she turned to more theoretical matters—notably, connections between how people order their conceptual worlds and how they order their social lives. She applied her insights broadly, arguing that culture and social structure must be seen as part of a single system, not as two unconnected parts of life.

Purity and Danger (1966) was Douglas's first book to attract attention from scholars of religion. There, she presented ritual purity and taboo as expressions of both mental and social dividing lines. For example, the rules in the Book of Leviticus that describe what the Hebrews could and could not eat were neither early health edicts nor random prohibitions. Instead, they resulted from anomalies in the Hebrews' classification system. Pigs were tabooed as food because they share the cloven hoof of (edible) ungulates but do not chew their cud. Animals that chew cud but do not have cloven hooves—camels, rock hyrax—were similarly shunned. Such purity systems, said Douglas, are not primitive; instead, they exemplify well-developed analytic thinking. For the Hebrews, they also simultaneously symbolized and enforced the Hebrews' status as a people set apart from others. Food, marital status, and social endogamy went together.

Douglas argued against dividing peoples into “moderns” and “primitives”—with the former somehow thinking more flexibly than the latter. In Natural Symbols (which appeared in two conceptually different versions in 1970 and 1973), she pointed out that Mbuti Pygmy theology was every bit as abstract as modern liberal Protestantism. Simultaneously, one can find what amounts to magical thinking both among the Lele and in contemporary urban professionals. There are, she said, three basic patterns: (1) societies that emphasize classification and hierarchy are prone to ritualism, (2) societies that emphasize individual enterprise are antiritualistic, and (3) societies that maintain high boundaries against outsiders while simultaneously claiming that all insiders are equal, suffer from sectarianism and fears that one's enemies are consorting with evil. (The Lele, along with many university departments, fit this mold.)

Scholars have since applied her “grid-group theory” to topics as varied as New Testament communities, 19th-century scientists, and ancient China. Douglas herself came to focus on why people in different societies evaluate risks differently (Risk and Culture, with Aaron Wildavsky, 1982). She then developed her approach in two directions. First, she emphasized the active role that people play in constructing both their cultural beliefs and their social orders (In the Active Voice, 1982). Then, she combined this active-voice sociology with a revised functionalism, asking what practical purpose various beliefs play in people's lives (How Institutions Think, 1986).

Douglas's ability to find the clever example and the perfect turn of phrase gave her work considerable influence, sometimes despite a logical imprecision hidden beneath her stellar prose. Her short essays, especially, were startlingly creative on a variety of fronts (e.g., Implicit Meanings, 1975). Above all, her work forces one to think about what one takes for granted about the world—and what this might mean about how people order their collective lives.

Louis Dumont was an influential Indologist and social anthropologist who made a significant contribution to the global consciousness about religion and culture. Dumont was born in the Ottoman city of Salonika, Turkey, in 1911, where his French engineer father had served the interests of the Turkish government. Soon after the family moved back to France, young Louis won a place in the elite École Polytechnique in Paris to study mathematics. The career in science and technology envisioned for him by his parents, however, proved to be stifling. After only a short while in these studies, Dumont quit them in a brash spirit of youthful rebellion. Throughout much of his 20s, Dumont indulged in Bohemian pursuits in Oriental exotica and experimental modes of art. He was drawn to self-styled esotericist mystics such as René Guénon as well as to the avant-garde philosophical and surrealist circle, known as Collège de Sociologie, one of whose members, Georges Bataille, sought to institute human sacrifice in the great traffic circle that is today's Place de la Concorde.

Abandoning his studies in mathematics invited the wrath of Dumont's family, who promptly disowned him. What might have been a potential calamity for others succeeded in liberating Dumont from a gray provincial careerism and steered him instead toward a cross-cultural and comparative ethnology and Indology—the very two disciplines that fitted him out to contribute to the studies of world civilizations from a global perspective. Dumont can be said to have professionalized his jejune interests in things “primitive,” acquired perhaps from Bataille and the Collège de Sociologie, as well as exploiting the equally exotic excursions into Indian thought that so fascinated René Guénon. From the romantic primitivism of the Collège de Sociologie, Dumont learned how setting modern culture in relation with so-called primitive ones could shed new light on our own preoccupations. If “we” believed in the preeminence of the individual and “they,” of the “whole,” what else might this tell us about ourselves? Going well beyond Guénon's binary opposition of hierarchical India to the egalitarian West, Dumont adapted Claude Lévi-Strauss's new structural methods of seeking binary opposition across cultures to illuminate mathematically precise systems of Indian kinship or, in other words, to shed light on the nature of the opposition of pure and impure that defined the much misunderstood scheme of caste in classical India. Dumont's gradual emergence from youthful romance into the beginnings of an original career that would be destined to feature wholesale global comparisons of the civilizations of the West and India would, however, be rudely interrupted by the global cataclysm of world war in 1939.

In that fateful year, Dumont entered the French army but, along with thousands of his compatriots, was captured by the Germans at the end of the so-called Phoney War (Drôle de Guerre) in the spring of 1940. While Dumont's imprisonment in Germany might well have terminated, or at least suspended, his Indological pursuits, it unexpectedly facilitated them. With the connivance of sympathetic prison guards, Dumont stole away from his prison factory labor job to receive instruction in Sanskrit from the Jaina specialist Professor Walther Schubring at the University of Hamburg.

After the war, Dumont worked in a menial capacity for a while at the Musée National des Arts et Traditions Populaire. His friends and professional acquaintances encouraged him to resume the career in ethnology that he had begun before the war. Among these sympathetic sponsors were the great Indo-Europeanist Professor Georges Dumézil and the director of Musée National des Arts et Traditions Populaire, Georges-Henri Rivièrè. Under the direction of Rivièrè, Dumont took his first steps in the ethnographic field to study a festival of the Rhone River monster, La Tarasque, native to the Provençal town of Tarascon. Dumont's first monograph, La Tarasque (1951), is a testament to his work in Provence.

But by 1948, India would beckon. Dumont began his first stint of fieldwork there, now greatly influenced by the new structuralism of Lévi-Strauss. Putting Lévi-Strauss's structural methods to use in his South Indian studies of kinship and affiliation, he published two works—Une Sous-Caste de l'Inde du Sud (A South Indian Subcaste) and his great classic on caste in India, Homo Hierarchicus: Le système des castes et ses implications (Homo Hierarchicus: The Caste System and Its Implications)—in 1957 and 1966, respectively. Both show the influence of the cross-cultural methods brought forth by structuralism by putting the relationship of opposition, both binary and otherwise, at the center of theoretical attention.

After lecturing from 1951 to 1955 at the Institute of Anthropology in Oxford, Dumont returned to India in 1955 and between 1957 and 1958, for a total of about two further years of fieldwork, this time in North India. Between these fieldwork trips, Dumont assumed the post of Director d'Études (Director of Studies) at the École Pratique des Hautes Études, VIième Section (section 6) and both established the Centre d'Études Indienne and founded the periodical Contributions to Indian Sociology. From the early 1960s, Dumont began a series of publications that would define his intellectual profile for the remainder of his life. These would be his classic writings on caste, individualism, and world renunciation in Indian religion: Homo Hierarchicus (1957) and La Civilisation Indienne et Nous (Indian Civilization and Us; 1964). These works may be seen as setting a kind of high watermark of his Indological work. His essays on world renunciation in India would be gathered into an anthology in 1970—Religion, Politics and History in India. In these works, Dumont worked out a series of answers to problems vexing Indologists for generations: How does one explain the role and characteristics of that strange Indian cultural phenomenon—the man outside the world, the world renouncer? How, in particular, is he related to the person who remains securely ensconced in the everyday, caste-ridden society and, most curiously, to the modern Western individual? How might we see the civilizations of India and the West as representing two systematically varying schemes of choices as to ultimate social values—the one, India's, opting for hierarchy and the other, the West's, for equality?

In the mid-1960s, Dumont turned away from direct attention to India and redirected the priority of his gaze halfway round the globe on what he saw as its polar opposite—the West and its ideology of individualism. From Mandeville to Marx (1977) was an effort to comprehend the nature of Western individualism insofar as it had to do with the emergence of the “economy” as a cultural a priori. The peculiarity of our arrangement of things, with the economy effectively swallowing up and dictating to politics, stands out when we bear in mind the diametrically opposed arrangements of classical India, where the value of artha encompassed both what we would call politics and economics but was still in all matters subordinated to dharma. Seeking the ultimate origins of Western individualist ideology, which emerged with such a vengeance in the victory of the economic, Dumont argued that it was in Christianity that the grounds of our belief in the sacredness of the individual were to be found. “A Modified View of Our Origins: The Christian Beginnings of Modern Individualism” first articulated this viewpoint. Shortly thereafter, Dumont collected his shorter writings on individualism into two volumes: (1) Essays on Individualism (1983/1986) and (2) German Ideology: From France to Germany and Back (1991/1994).

In all these later works, Dumont's central concern was to discover how it was that the Western individual, unlike the Indian equivalent, was a this-worldly creature, in contrast to the first Christian individuals, as well as the Indian world renouncers. This is the same question as why a “this-worldly” individual did not develop in India. Similarly, why was the evolution of the modern state coincident with the emergence of the worldly individual? Dumont's answer lay in the evolution of the relation between the Western empire and the church. At a crucial juncture in the history of the West, the church gave up its otherworldly character and embraced a worldly political role. This process entailed two remarkable and defining characteristics of the West: First, caught up in the transformation of the church, the ideal of the human person became that of the worldly individual and, second, the state took on some of the spiritual character of the church. In embracing a political role, the church itself invested politics and thus political structures with transcendent qualities, but the state assumed in the bargain that it would have “churchish” qualities as well. This is why the nation bears the qualities of a transcendent reality and why nationalism expresses so compelling a system of absolute values. For Dumont, the modern state is thus a transformed church, and thus, any global encounter of the West with other cultures needs to take this into account—both to the extent that other societies have adopted the Western model and to the extent that they might seek to operate from other foundational principles.

DURKHEIM, ÉMILE (1854–1917)

Known generally as France's first sociologist, Émile Durkheim was far more than that. Durkheim was born David Émile at Epinal in Lorraine in 1858, the eldest male in a Jewish family that had produced generations of rabbis. As expected, Durkheim prepared himself for the rabbinate, but in a fit of rebellion, he quit this training at about 14. The emotionally charged nationalism of the day played a major part in Durkheim's embrace of a "religious" patriotism. It seemed to overwhelm any affiliation to a traditional religion, even his own Judaism. By the age of 18 or so, Durkheim turned atheist, or at least agnostic. Durkheim had his higher education at the prestigious École Normale Supérieure, where Numa Denis Fustel de Coulanges, author of a classic study of ancient Roman religion, The Ancient City, greatly influenced the young Durkheim. Like his classmates at the École Normale, Durkheim was drawn to the work of the spiritualist philosopher Émile Boutroux. On completing his studies, Durkheim went almost immediately into teaching, first in secondary schools, then in the University of Bordeaux, and eventually in Paris.

It was from the works he published during his university career, the academic periodical that he founded, L'Année Sociologique, as well as the "school" he created around the journal that Durkheim's impact on the study of religion can be measured. What one soon realizes in considering his life's work is that Durkheim was among the first modern scholars to internalize a global perspective in the study of religion. He did so in at least three ways: (1) he put cross-cultural studies of the social dimension of religion at the forefront of his writing, (2) he devised and championed a durable method and practical program of cross-cultural comparison, and (3) he was responsible for the creation of a team of scholars who collaborated in the study of religion and who influenced others in later generations of scholars in many countries to carry on the study of religion in a Durkheimian way. From France, all across Europe to Turkey, to the Americas, both North and South, and across the Pacific to Japan, Durkheim is counted as a major thinker on society and religion. There is little to account for the renown that Durkheim gained internationally other than the fact that his scholarship was global from its first years.

Durkheim achieved a global perspective by bringing the cross-cultural and comparative study of the social dimension of religion into play. This meant that he would accord more attention to the collective, group, or institutional functions and contexts of religion—wherever and whenever they occurred. Durkheim was, for example, particularly interested in institutionalized asceticism such as that found both in Christian monastic groups and in the ritual ordeals practiced in small-scale tribal societies. He also was particularly drawn to the emotional dimension of religious rituals, such as in the "charismatic" religious movements so sacred among the early Christians. By comparing the Christian example with the role of emotional effervescence in the festive sacred revelry of aboriginal Australia, he felt that he could make sense of both better. Furthermore, insofar as Durkheim's work concerned philosophical, psychological, or theological matters in religion, he wished to show how they depended on their social location for much of their form and content. Following up on the case of Christian charismatic movements, how might the early Christian belief in the visitations of the sacred Holy Spirit be related to the effervescent emotional vitality of the young community and its avid ritual life? How and why was the notion and experience of the “sacred” so widely deployed in the religions of the world, and why was it so often linked with the identities of religious communities?

Beyond his early sociological works, The Division of Labor in Society (1893) and Suicide (1897), Durkheim was also a historian of moral and educational theory. Later in life, culminating in his great classic, The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (1912/2001), he established himself as an expert in the study of remote small-scale societies around the globe, with special attention to their ritual and religious lives. What is remarkable even in the earlier works is Durkheim’s facility with data from across many cultures. Although The Division of Labor is on its face about industrial organization in modern societies, it works cross-culturally and comparatively with data drawn from tribal Africa; ancient Greece, Rome, and Egypt; the Bible; Brahmanical India; Confucius; the Eskimos; the Franks; the Jews; and the Visigoths. While focused locally on the social problem of suicide in contemporary France, Durkheim’s Suicide also engages comparative data regarding taking one’s own life that goes beyond the French scene among Catholics, Protestants, and Jews to include comparisons across Europe, both historically and in his own day—with Slavs, Gallo-Romans, and the Germanic nations.

In the service of globalizing the study of religion, Durkheim made one of the greatest theoretical contributions to the creation of an analytic language for religious studies—the definition of religion as the administration of the “sacred.” The use of sacred made it conceptually possible to embrace the entire world of religion under one globally applicable notion. This improved the conceptual situation commonplace in Durkheim’s day of defining religion as “belief in god.” Durkheim explicitly rejected this term on the grounds that it was not inclusive. It did not reflect global religious realities. Such a definition in terms of “belief” narrowed religion into being understood solely as an intellectual matter. But, more controversially, it made religion wholly theistic, or god centered. This stricture excluded too much of the religious world that was not theistically based. For instance, at least three sorts of Buddhism—Theravada, Ch’an, and Zen—are not theistic, nor are Indian religions such as Jainism or Advaita Vedanta or, for that matter, Chinese religions such as Daoism or varieties of Confucianism. Thus, by opening the conceptualization of religion to a more inclusive notion such as the “sacred,” Durkheim allowed the study of religion of his day and ours to become global enterprises.

This new concept would, however, make little difference in achieving a globalized study of religion were it not put into practice. The chief way one puts such inclusive notions into practice is by the process of cross-cultural comparison. Durkheim was just such a confirmed comparativist. He thought that cross-cultural comparison of religion was not only desirable but also essential to the proper scientific study of religion. His comparative sociology was thus not a special brand of sociology but rather sociology itself. A good example of how this viewpoint broke out in print came from Henri Hubert, one of Durkheim’s closest collaborators. He wrote an introduction to his French translation of the Protestant theologian P. D. Chantepie de la Saussaye’s Manuel d’histoire des Religions (Handbook of the History of Religions). In defense of a global comparative study of religion that favored no faith, Hubert specifically attacked Chantepie’s claim that because of their special link with divine truth, Judaism and Christianity were exempt from comparison with other religions! The Durkheimians stood for the proposition that cross-cultural comparison needs to be global and to include every religion.

I have already indicated how even Durkheim’s early sociological work dealing with the social problems of his own milieu were enriched by comparison. The same may be said a fortiori of his great work—ostensibly—on the religious life of aboriginal Australia. From the outset in The Elementary Forms, Durkheim makes the remarkable admission that the purpose of his close case study of the religious life of Australian aborigines is not to do the equivalent of local history but to reveal the essential and universal nature of religion—everywhere and at all times! Thus, what looks like a parochial case study is in reality one of the most ambitious works ever undertaken to discover the global nature of religion.

Finally, however great an individual thinker may be, his or her work sometimes falls by the wayside because no one carries it on into succeeding generations. Durkheimian thought retains an originality and vitality into our own day. The bulk of responsibility for the continued interest in Durkheim's thinking worldwide lies in the fact that Durkheim created a team of coworkers who together did collaborative research and writing. This effort was decisive in the creation of an entire generation of scholars who studied religion in the same cross-cultural comparative mode pioneered by Durkheim himself. Consider, for instance, how globally minded Henri Hubert and Marcel Mauss, Durkheim's two closest coworkers were. Mauss covered Africa, Australia, the Americas, India, and Oceania; Hubert took responsibility for the Celts, Greeks, and Romans, together with their Mesopotamian and Near Eastern counterparts. Mauss commanded Buddhism, Hinduism, and the "primitive" religions; Hubert was in charge of Druidism, Gnosticism, Judaism, Christianity, and the "mystery" religions. Marcel Granet wrote on Confucianism and Daoism; Paul Masson-Ouseil brought out the role of magic in early Hindu religion; Celestin Bouglé applied Durkheimian ideas to the analysis of caste, as did his latter-day successor, Louis Dumont; Mary Douglas developed Durkheim's concept of the sacred, insofar as it generated notions of purity and pollution; Louis Delaporte's work on Mesopotamian religion brought the role of women priestesses to light at a time when modern scholarship paid little or no attention to women's roles in religion; Alexandre Moret argued that totemism was even present in so-called high religious traditions such as that of ancient Egypt; Adolphe Lods attempted to understand the prophets of the Hebrew Bible in relation to their social class membership; Charles Guignebert likewise sought to better understand the dynamic of ancient Jewish cult formation; and so on.

What such a list indicates is not that Durkheimian thought is widespread among different intellectual domains but that in its substance it has always had global ambitions.

EAST TIMOR

East Timor is a largely Christian state in Southeast Asia that occupies the eastern half of the island of Timor in the Indonesian archipelago. At the time of Portugal's relinquishment of colonial control over East Timor in 1974, only one third of the population espoused Catholicism as their religious faith, the majority worshipping luliks or animist objects. There was no pressure for mass conversion to Catholicism on the part of the Portuguese colonizers, though there had already been some missionary work mixing local ancestor worship and Catholic doctrine, and emphasis had been placed by the missionaries on the apparent parallels between traditional indigenous Makasae mythology and the Old Testament. Following World War II, the Catholic Church used Tetum, an indigenous East Timor language, thereby rendering the liturgy an expression of national identity, and the Church was one of the only colonial institutions to highlight abuses in the Portuguese regime.

It was the Indonesian invasion and subsequent annexation of Timor in December 1975 that served as a catalyst for mass popular Catholic conversion in Timor. The Catholic Church came to prominence as a focal point for resistance to Indonesian attempts to forcibly integrate Timor through the Church's documentation of human rights abuses, calls for national self-determination, and provision of sanctuary for Timorese dissidents. The "Catholicization" of Timor culminated in Bishop Carlos Belo's winning the Nobel Peace Prize in 1996 (along with José Ramos-Horta, a prominent Timorese nationalist). In East Timor, Catholicism interacted with nationalism to provide a moral basis for action, a centripetal force uniting potentially disparate identities, and an institutional framework for mobilization and action. These factors are particularly apparent in the Santa Cruz massacre (November 1991), when protesters took refuge from Indonesian Army intimidation in Catholic graveyards and chapels and were subsequently massacred. Sites of massacre, such as the Santa Cruz cemetery, emerged as places to commemorate fallen nationalist heroes. In the Timorese case, Catholicism translated worldly suffering—that is, massacres and oppression—into spiritual injustices against the Timorese "nation," and these were viewed as being perpetrated by Islam against Christianity. In these circumstances, the Timorese struggle for national self-determination emerged increasingly as one shaped by Catholic identity and practice.

EASTER

The Christian festival of Easter combines elements from several religious traditions. The Christian holiday celebrates the resurrection of Jesus from the dead after his crucifixion at the time of the Jewish observance of Passover. The timing—and the name—of the festival is based on pre-Christian pagan rites at the time of the spring equinox, most likely associated with the goddess Eostre and, hence, Easter. The fertility symbols of the rabbit and the egg are likely associated with these pagan customs as well. In the contemporary age, the holiday has nonreligious associations with springtime and nature.

Easter, a major Christian holiday celebrating the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, has both religious and secular significance today. In the religious context, Easter has particular significance for Christians and those for whom the resurrection of Jesus is a religiously significant event. The timing of the liturgical celebration of Easter varies to some extent among Christian groups. For instance, within the Roman Catholic Church, Easter occurs at different times for those who follow the Latin Rite and those who follow the Syrian, Greek, and other Eastern Rites owing to the calendar and the method used for calculating the date. The Latin Rite uses the Gregorian calendar, which is also the dominant calendar used by the majority of societies and for commercial purposes. Some groups use the Julian calendar, while Jews use a lunar calendar.

Generally, the Sunday on which Easter is celebrated varies depending on whether the Latin Rite of the Roman Catholic Church or the Gregorian calendar is followed.

As with the evolution and development of the annual liturgical calendar, Easter as it is now celebrated evolved from the understanding of Jesus' apostles (all of whom were Jews) and their familiarity with Jewish practices and was adapted as the adherents encountered other cultures and practices. Hence, Easter parallels the Jewish celebration of Passover that commences with the Triduum, which is Latin for "3 days." Following the traditional Jewish practice of days beginning and ending at sunset rather than the secular day of midnight to midnight, the three days begin with the evening celebration of Holy Thursday, continues through Good Friday, and culminates in the celebrations of the Holy Saturday Easter Vigil and the Sunday celebrations. Easter is then celebrated for 7 weeks or 50 days, until the feast of Pentecost. Being approximately a seventh of the 365 days or 52 weeks of the year, the Easter season bears a relationship to the liturgical year in the same proportion as Sunday is to the week. For Christians, Easter season is, in this sense, the beginning of a new and renewed life.

For observant Christians, as for Jews, the Passover experience conditions, modifies, and determines the understanding of life and all of reality. For instance, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy issued by the Second Vatican Council of the Roman Catholic Church states,

Holy Mother Church is conscious that she must celebrate the saving work of her divine Spouse by devoutly recalling it on certain days throughout the course of the year. Every week, on the day which she has called the Lord's day, she keeps the memory of the Lord's resurrection, which she also celebrates once in the year, together with His blessed passion, in the most solemn festival of Easter. (para. 102)

Following the proximate preparation for Easter in the season of Lent, the Easter season concluding with Pentecost provides an opportunity for annual renewal through reflection on the significance of Passover to the new life. The Easter experience leads to a new covenant and appreciation of the adherents' lives. It is a time for renewal and the commencement of new life and progression into spiritual time. For Christians, Easter holds the possibility of a life lived with the spiritual enlightenment initiating the new kingdom of peace and joy—a new creation.

Culturally, Easter is a time associated with semi-religious or secular practices as they have evolved over the centuries. Commercial products such as Easter bunnies and Easter eggs are marketed in association with this festival. Easter as a festival defined as a springtime reaffirmation of life is thus widely diffused within those cultures where Christianity has been influential historically.

EASTERN ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY

Eastern Orthodox Christianity, or the Orthodox Catholic Church, is one of the three major branches of Christianity and the world's second largest Christian communion. Eastern Orthodoxy is the majority religious affiliation in Russia, Greece, Romania, Bulgaria, Georgia, Serbia, Moldova, Ukraine, Belarus, Macedonia, Montenegro, and Cyprus and is a significant minority in numerous countries throughout the world. The Eastern Orthodox community is not a single ecclesiastical institution but actually a communion of independent churches that remain united through common theological beliefs and worship practices. The Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople holds a preeminence of honor among all Orthodox bishops but has no administrative authority outside of his patriarchate, nor is he believed to possess doctrinal infallibility. The Orthodox Church has grown considerably since the fall of communism in Europe, and the center of Orthodox monasticism, Mount Athos, has undergone remarkable revival. Estimates place its number of adherents close to 300,000,000, which makes Eastern Orthodoxy the world's third largest religious body after Roman Catholicism and Sunnī Islam. This entry discusses the beliefs and practices of the Orthodox Church, its history, and the church today.

Beliefs and Practices

Leaders of Eastern Orthodox Christianity believe it to be directly descended from Jesus Christ and his apostles through an unbroken apostolic succession of its bishops. Its governance is hierarchical and conciliar, which means that all theological disputes must be worked out through councils of bishops—not through the exclusive promulgation of any individual bishop. The Orthodox Church adheres to the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, and thus, like the vast majority of Christians worldwide, it holds firmly to the doctrines of the Trinity and the divinity of Christ. Its Holy Scripture consists of the New Testament together with the Greek Septuagint text of the Old Testament, which includes the “apocryphal” books.

In many of its doctrines and practices, the Orthodox Church resembles the Roman Catholic Church, with which it shares a millennium of common history. However, Greek patristic writers have had a much greater influence on Orthodoxy than Latin writers like Augustine. The Orthodox place little emphasis on the doctrine of Original sin and the hereditary guilt that it implies. Thus, while much Western theology understands the spiritual salvation of human beings in primarily juridical terms—in terms of a need to be legally acquitted before God—the Orthodox, on the other hand, are less concerned with legal acquittal than with progress in theosis, or deification. Deification does not signify a process of becoming a god but rather progressive conformity to the likeness of God. Salvation, for the Orthodox Christian, is therefore the unending transformation of human beings into reflections of the divine. The doctrine of theosis provides the theological rationale underlying nearly all other aspects of Orthodox belief and practice.

The Orthodox Church's worship is highly liturgical and sacramental, with a strong emphasis on the activity of the Holy Spirit. The church officially recognizes seven sacraments, although its understanding of this number is less rigid than in Roman Catholicism. Four of these sacraments are incumbent on all Orthodox Christians. Baptism, which represents the believer's death and resurrection with Christ, is the sacrament by which new members enter the church. It is administered by triple immersion in water, to both infants and adult converts. Baptism is immediately followed by the sacrament of chrismation, in which the newly baptized person is anointed with a specially prepared oil that bestows the indwelling presence of the Holy Spirit. The Eucharistic service, or Holy Communion, is practiced with leavened bread and wine that is believed to be transformed, through an invocation of the Holy Spirit called the epiclesis, into the mystical body and blood of Christ. The Eucharist is administered to all baptized and chrismated Orthodox Christians, including infants, and is the sacrament by which one is united with Christ and all other Orthodox Christians. The most common Eucharistic liturgies used by the Orthodox are the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom and the Liturgy of St. Basil the Great. Preparation for participation in the Eucharist is made through confession, the sacrament by which sins committed after baptism are absolved. A practicing Orthodox Christian is expected to go to confession at least four times a year.

Marriage is a sacrament among the Orthodox because it is understood to represent Christ's union with his church. Although marriage is a sacrament and considered holy, voluntary celibacy is also highly valued and is a prerequisite for all monastics (monasticism is considered to be a sacrament by some Orthodox, although this is not universally recognized). Ordination is the sacrament through which leaders in the church are appointed; the Orthodox Church currently ordains only men to its three major holy orders—bishops, priests, and deacons—although for several centuries female deacons were ordained. Priests and deacons may be married, but bishops must be celibate. The final sacrament of the seven is Holy Unction, a rite in which the seriously ill are anointed with oil for the healing of their souls and bodies.

The Orthodox Church has a rich and distinctive spiritual tradition. Central to Orthodox spirituality is the practice of hesychasm, or stillness, which centers on "the Jesus prayer," a short, frequently repeated prayer for mercy that aims at quieting the soul, thus increasing its receptivity to the will of God. Orthodox monastics often practice hesychasm in conjunction with specialized postures and breathing techniques intended to aid in promoting stillness, but these practices are generally not recommended for the average practitioner. Whether or not one practices the Jesus prayer, it is normal for practicing Orthodox to have a set of liturgical prayers that they recite each day. In addition, it is Orthodox practice to fast from animal products on Wednesdays and Fridays as well as during appointed seasons throughout the year. Also important in Orthodox spirituality is the veneration of icons of Christ and the saints, which is believed to help focus attention during prayer and aid in making the presence of God manifest. Most Orthodox icons are two-dimensional paintings that follow strict guidelines for composition; statuary is generally discouraged. Orthodox likewise maintain that the veneration of saints inspires the believer to achieve greater holiness, and they actively seek saints' prayers and intercessions. Of particular significance is Mary, who is honored with the title Theotokos, or "Mother of God," and is viewed as the supreme model of obedience to God for all Christians.

The Orthodox Church also follows a highly developed calendar in which all days throughout the year commemorate "feasts" of saints and/or major events. The most significant of these is Easter, which is more commonly referred to by its Greek name, Pascha. Because all Orthodox churches (except Finland) calculate the date of Easter using the old Julian calendar, the Orthodox date of Easter usually differs from the date used in Western Christianity. Orthodox are renowned for the jubilation of their Easter celebration, which is always preceded by Great Lent, a 40-day period of fasting, intensified prayer, and almsgiving. Three other feasts throughout the year are preceded by a fasting period: Christmas (December 25), the Falling Asleep of the Mother of God (August 15), and the Feast of the Apostles Peter and Paul (June 29). In addition to these feasts, 10 others are major holidays in the Orthodox world: Palm Sunday, the Ascension of Christ, and Pentecost, which move in relation to the date of Easter, and the Nativity of the Mother of God (September 8), the Elevation of the Cross (September 14), the Entry of the Mother of God Into the Temple (November 21), the Baptism of Christ (January 6), the Meeting of Our Lord (February 2), the Annunciation (March 25), and the Transfiguration of the Lord (August 6). Thus, the entire year is punctuated with fasts and feasts that remind the Orthodox believer of God's redemptive actions.

History

Some Western presentations of the Eastern Orthodox Church claim that it originated with the "Great Schism" of 1054, in which the Pope of Rome and the Patriarch of Constantinople mutually anathematized each other on account of several disagreements, most notably the Pope's addition of the filioque clause to the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed. Such an account is problematic for several reasons. First, the date of 1054 is somewhat artificial because tensions had been brewing between Rome and the East for several centuries prior. Second, there is strong evidence that Christians in both the East and the West continued to identify strongly with each other for nearly a century and a half until the Fourth Crusade sacked Constantinople in 1204. Perhaps most important, however, is that the "Great Schism" did not represent the formation of any "new" ecclesiastical body but, rather, the fracture of the "one, holy, catholic, and apostolic church" of the Byzantine Empire into two. Since the sixth century, the Byzantine church had been jurisdictionally administered by five patriarchates: Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. The predominantly Latin-speaking patriarchate of Rome became known as the Roman Catholic Church, whereas the four Greek-speaking patriarchates of the East became the Eastern Orthodox Churches.

The history of the Orthodox Church therefore begins with the earliest centuries of Christianity, during the periodic persecutions of Rome, which tested the new religion with frequent martyrdoms. These persecutions permanently ended with the conversion of Emperor Constantine to Christianity in the fourth century. After Christianity became the official religion of the Byzantine state, the emperors quickly realized that doctrinal unity facilitated political stability, and therefore, over the span of five centuries, they summoned seven "ecumenical councils" to work out major theological disagreements. These seven councils constitute the backbone of official Orthodox dogma. The two major councils of the fourth century, Nicaea (325) and Constantinople (381), condemned challenges to the divinity of Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit as heresy. In the fifth century, Christological controversy arose concerning the exact relationship between Christ's humanity and divinity. The councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451) together attempted to clarify that Christ possessed both a divine and a human nature, which were held in unity but without mixture. This century saw the first lasting schisms of Christianity as the Assyrian Church of the East rejected Byzantine authority in 424; the Oriental Orthodox Churches (e.g., the Coptic, Ethiopian, and Syrian Orthodox) are descended from those groups that were dissatisfied with the outcome of Chalcedon. Constantinople II (553) and Constantinople III (680–681) further clarified the definitions of Chalcedon, and the second council of Nicaea (787) defended the propriety of the veneration of icons against the iconoclasts.

The first millennium also witnessed two major missionary efforts that hold a great place in Orthodox history. In the ninth century, Saints Cyril and Methodius undertook missionary efforts among the Slavic peoples of Europe. They are credited with translating the Bible and liturgical texts into what is now known as Old Church Slavonic and are believed to have developed the Cyrillic script, which is still used in many eastern European nations. Their feast day is a national holiday in many Slavic countries. Of similar significance is the conversion of Prince Vladimir of Kiev in 988, which in turn led to the conversion of the Russian people and, ultimately, several centuries later, to the establishment of contemporary Orthodoxy's largest wing, the Russian Orthodox Church.

After the sacking of Constantinople solidified the 1054 schism between Rome and the East, there were several attempts at reunification. The most notable was the apparent achievement of union at the council of Florence (1439), but the unification was rejected by the majority of Orthodox in Constantinople. Efforts for reunion continued but were abruptly cut off when the Ottomans captured Constantinople and brought about the demise of the Byzantine Empire in 1453. The Orthodox under the jurisdiction of the Ottoman Empire were allowed to practice their religion under the auspices of the millet system, in which the Orthodox clergy became civil rulers, reporting directly to the Ottoman authorities. As a result of Constantinople's captivity, Russia assumed the most prominent role in Orthodoxy from the 16th century until the rise of communism. The Russian Church undertook extensive missionary activity, most notably in China, Japan, and Alaska. The spread of Orthodoxy to most Western nations occurred, however, not through missionary activity but as a result of eastern European and Arab Orthodox immigrants fleeing Muslim and communist governments.

The Church Today

The Orthodox Church today is made up of 14 independently self-governing, or "autocephalous," churches. In order of descending rank of honor, they are the ancient patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem and the national churches of Russia, Serbia, Romania, Bulgaria, Georgia, Cyprus, Greece, Poland, Albania, and the Czech Lands and Slovakia. The Orthodox Church in America was granted autocephaly in 1970 by the Russian Orthodox Church, but this has yet to be recognized by Constantinople, which regards the church as merely "autonomous"—that is, self-governing in most respects but dependent in some ways on their mother churches. Autonomy is possessed by several churches, including Finland, Japan, Ukraine, and Mount Sinai.

The contemporary Orthodox Church is facing a unique challenge that has been brought about by the emigration of peoples from traditionally Orthodox lands to western Europe, the Americas, and Australia. This has created a situation in which a majority of the autocephalous Orthodox churches have established competing jurisdictions within a single region. This problem is exacerbated by the lack of consensus among the Orthodox concerning how a local church becomes autocephalous; the Church of Russia, for example, believes that autocephaly should be granted by the mother church that first evangelized a region, while Constantinople asserts that it has jurisdiction over all lands that lie outside of Orthodox countries. In the early 21st century, efforts to find a compromise solution for the "diaspora," as Orthodox Christians living in non-Orthodox lands are often called, have intensified, although no conclusive resolution has been reached.

A related difficulty for the Orthodox Church is its relationship to religious nationalism. Although the Orthodox officially repudiate phyletism, the heresy of equating church and nation, most Orthodox churches are national churches. Membership in the local church is often seen as synonymous with national identity, and religious loyalties are often bound up with patriotism. This is particularly significant in the nations that constituted the former Soviet Union, as several national churches that are not recognized as autocephalous have sprung up, in part due to nationalist fervor. In these countries, the Russian Orthodox Church often maintains a presence that stands in tension with the local Orthodox churches. In Ukraine, for example, membership in the autonomous Ukrainian Church under the jurisdiction of Russia, instead of the local Ukrainian Orthodox Church, which claims an unrecognized autocephaly, is sometimes interpreted as unpatriotic. Similarly, in the diaspora, nationalist loyalties among first-generation immigrants facilitate disunity among Orthodox jurisdictions and create tensions with the younger generation of Orthodox, many of whom desire assimilation into the surrounding culture. For these and other reasons, the Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I declared nationalism to be one of the greatest problems facing the Orthodox Church.

Religious fundamentalism has also proved to be a threat to the unity of the Orthodox Church as numerous groups have split from the major churches over a variety of issues, especially disputes over the ecclesiastical calendar and ecumenism. Controversy over the calendar has resulted from the 13-day discrepancy between the Julian calendar and the Gregorian calendar produced by Pope Gregory XIII's reforms in 1582. Because the Gregorian calendar is the accepted civil calendar in most countries worldwide, an Orthodox council in 1923 resolved to adopt a revised Julian calendar that is in substantial conformity with the Gregorian version. Jerusalem, Russia, Serbia, and Georgia opted to remain on the old Julian calendar but remained in communion with the rest of the Orthodox world. Some Orthodox groups consider the adoption of the “new calendar” as an unacceptable concession to non-Orthodox powers and have gone into schism. A related issue is the fundamentalist accusation that the major Orthodox churches have succumbed to the “heresy of ecumenism” and are engaging in unacceptable activities with the non-Orthodox, such as recognizing Protestant and Catholic baptisms, engaging in open theological dialogue, and holding common prayer services.

Nevertheless, most Orthodox churches have been very active in ecumenical dialogue and are members of the World Council of Churches. Many Orthodox and Protestant theologians have had productive theological dialogue with each other. Likewise, greater understanding has been facilitated with the Oriental Orthodox Church and the Assyrian Church of the East. The Orthodox and Catholics have enjoyed particularly cordial relationships since the mutual anathemas of 1054 were lifted in 1965 by Pope Paul VI and Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras I. Missionary activity, however, has strained relationships between the Orthodox and other Christians. The Russian Church, for example, has had tense relations with Rome due primarily to disputes over Jesuit missions in Russia. Likewise, many Orthodox churches have been dismayed by the large influx of Protestant missionaries since the fall of communism and have cooperated with their respective state governments to restrict missionary activity. Nevertheless, most interaction between Orthodox and other Christian groups is considered positive, and there is a general trend toward facilitating greater understanding and cooperation with non-Orthodox churches. Of particular interest is the leadership the Orthodox Church has shown in its concern for the natural environment; Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I has written so extensively on the theological basis for environmentalism that he has been nicknamed the “Green Patriarch.”

EBENEZER BAPTIST CHURCH

Ebenezer Baptist Church is situated in the Sweet Auburn district of Atlanta, a neighborhood that has been called the cradle of the civil rights movement. Ebenezer was a spiritual center of civil rights activism, most notably as the home church of Martin Luther King Jr. Drawing inspiration from this legacy, Ebenezer has remained committed to nonviolence and the fight for social justice. The church derives its name, Ebenezer, from a Hebrew word meaning “stone of help” (1 Samuel 7:12).

Ebenezer was organized in 1886 by a former slave, John A. Parker, who became the church’s first pastor. Ebenezer’s initial home was a small, boxlike structure on Airline Street in Atlanta’s historically diverse Fourth Ward. When Alfred Daniel Williams became Ebenezer’s minister in 1894, the church’s membership swelled rapidly. Ebenezer decided to build a larger sanctuary on McGruder Street in 1895 and relocated twice more before putting down roots on Auburn Avenue in 1914. During his tenure at Ebenezer, Williams was a strong advocate in the struggle for racial equality in Atlanta; for instance, his labors helped secure the bond that funded the construction of Booker

T. Washington High School, which in 1924 became the first public secondary school for Blacks in the state of Georgia.

Martin Luther King Sr. assumed Ebenezer's pastorate after A. D. Williams died in 1931. King had married Williams' daughter, Alberta, in 1926 and had served as assistant pastor at Ebenezer since 1927. As part of his ministry of social justice, King took part in the efficacious campaign to equalize teachers' salaries in Atlanta and led repeated efforts to register African Americans to vote. In 1960, King enlisted his eldest son, Martin Luther King Jr., to be copastor of Ebenezer, and his presence instilled the church with a more ecumenical and international orientation. The funeral services for the famous civil rights leader following his assassination on April 4, 1968, brought worldwide attention to Ebenezer. Alfred Daniel Williams King Sr., the younger brother of the deceased, was appointed as the new copastor of the church but died suddenly in 1969. Otis Moss Jr. served briefly as Ebenezer's third copastor during 1971. On June 30, 1974, tragedy struck again when Alberta Williams King, the organist, and Edward Boykin, the deacon, were shot and killed during Sunday service by Marcus Chennault, a young man from Ohio. Shortly after, in 1975, the elder King retired after 44 years of service at Ebenezer.

Joseph L. Roberts Jr. was selected as Ebenezer's fourth full-time minister and oversaw the construction of the church's Horizon Sanctuary in 1997, a new, larger facility located across the street from the old property. The original building, which is now called the Heritage Sanctuary, still attracts many visitors as part of the Martin Luther King Jr. National Historic Site. On Roberts's retirement in 2005, Raphael Gamaliel Warnock took up the pastorate of Ebenezer.

ECKANKAR

Eckankar was founded by Paul Twitchell (1909–1971) in California in the mid-1960s. Although the Hindi/Punjabi term Ek Onkar (lit. “one God/Power”) was most likely derived from Guru Nānak's Japji (the first set of hymns in the Sikh holy book, Gurū Granth Sāhib), Twitchell altered its original phonetic spelling and definition, claiming that Eckankar was a Tibetan-Pali word meaning “coworker with God.” According to Twitchell, Eckankar was an ancient spiritual path with a lineage of 970 “Eck” Masters who trace back to Gakko, who brought the true teachings of soul travel from the city of Retz on the planet Venus. Twitchell alleged that through this bilocation philosophy, a neophyte can leave his or her body via an inner light and sound and soul-travel to higher regions of consciousness, which lead ultimately to the supreme lord, Sugmad.

In an early article titled “The Cliff Hanger,” published in Psychic Observer in 1964, Twitchell explained the basis behind his new group. He claimed that Eckankar was based on his own experience in Shabd-Yoga, a meditation practice aimed at uniting the individual spirit with the universal sound current, a form of yoga that is the hallmark of the Radhasoami religious tradition in North India. Eckankar's organization and teachings have evolved since Twitchell died of heart disease on September 17, 1971, in Cincinnati, Ohio, shortly after giving a talk. Twitchell's widow, Gail Atkinson, claimed to have had a dream in which her husband appointed Darwin Gross to be his spiritual successor and the leader of Eckankar. Gross, who eventually married and then divorced Atkinson, served as the Living Eck Master for 10 years until 1981, when he appointed Harold Klemp to succeed him as the spiritual leader of the organization. Two years later, in 1983, there was an acrimonious split between Klemp and Gross, which resulted in the latter being excommunicated from Eckankar.

Under the present leadership of Klemp, Eckankar has expanded its core audience worldwide and has an estimated paid membership of anywhere between 40,000 and 100,000 members yearly. Klemp has also produced a wide-ranging series of books and discourses and has moved Eckankar's former center of operations from Menlo Park, California, to Chanhassen, Minnesota, where he established the temple of Eck.

Eckankar has weathered a storm of controversy since its inception, primarily because of questions concerning Twitchell's alleged plagiarism, biographical redactions, and purported historical antecedents. While Eckankar has been directly influenced by the Self-Realization Fellowship, Theosophy, Scientology, and particularly the Sant Mat teachings of Radhasoami (which has a similar specialized version of sound-current yoga), it has, in turn, influenced a number of new religious offshoots, including the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness, founded by John-Roger Hinkins; MasterPath, founded by Gary Olsen; the Ancient Teachings of the Masters, founded by Darwin Gross; the Divine Science of Light and Sound, founded by Jerry Mulvin; the Sonic Spectrum, founded by Michael Turner; and the Higher Consciousness Society, founded by Ford Johnson. Each of the founders of these groups was at one time a member of Eckankar, and they have all incorporated many Eck terms and ideas into their respective organizations.

ECONOMIC ISSUES AND RELIGION

Most religious traditions have been profoundly ambivalent about economic issues. On the one hand, many religious teachings advocate a division of the spiritual and the material and the religious necessity of becoming removed from worldly life. On the other hand, most religious traditions teach the importance of moral responsibility for social matters. This requires the need for discipline and justice in economic affairs as in other areas of public life.

In the Hindu tradition, these contradictory attitudes are expressed by the differing moral and spiritual requirements for each of the four stages of life. While the last stage of life stresses ascetic withdrawal from the world to seek spiritual perfection, the householder stage of life requires responsible engagement in economic and social activities. The classic Hindu text, The Arthashastra, is a manual for correct behavior in the political and economic realm. In other religious traditions, the ambivalence toward economic issues is expressed in the moral restraints on economic activity that are prescribed in religious teachings.

There are several ways in which religious traditions have conceived the relationship between religion and economic matters:

1. Religion and economics are separate: This is the position taken by many Christians in their interpretation of Jesus' statement "Render unto Caesar what is Caesar's" (Matthew 22:21). When asked about the requirement to pay taxes, Jesus showed his followers a coin that had the image of Caesar imprinted on it. Some Christians regard this as meaning that religion and economics are distinct from each other and that religion has no role in economic life.

2. Religion includes economic obligations: The sacred scriptures of most religious traditions include rules of behavior that touch on economic matters. Debt bondage from usury, for instance, is a form of wealth creation that is banned in Islam and discouraged in Judaism and Christianity. All three major monotheistic faith traditions recommend tithing for the purpose of charity, as well as enumerating inheritance laws that increase opportunity and prevent stagnation. Both Hindu and Buddhist traditions incorporate economic morality into their rules for daily life.

3. Religion provides values that affect economic behavior: Max Weber argues in The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism that the rise of capitalism in Protestant countries is related to the value system of the society, which in turn is influenced by religion. Protestant values, for instance, require the faithful to work hard and responsibly but prohibit them from displaying their wealth in an ostentatious manner. With the creation of excess wealth that individuals are prevented from lavishing on themselves, the money is saved and reinvested in business, thus stimulating capitalist economic development.

4. Religion involves a kind of economic exchange: Marcel Mauss, a disciple of the great French sociologist Émile Durkheim, wrote in The Gift that religious rituals and practices involve a kind of reciprocity of gifts, offering sacrifices and prayers to God and receiving worldly and spiritual benefits in response. In another way of thinking about this interrelationship between religion and economics, religious teachings require humans to be responsible stewards of the world. Hence, the world's religions are concerned with securing and regulating the creation and circulation of worldly resources, including monetary wealth. Slavery is a special case of an economics issue that is also a profound issue of human rights. The practice extends to ancient history—Plato and Aristotle, for instance, agreed in The Republic and Politics, respectively, that human beings are inherently unequal and that, thus, slavery is legitimate. The early books of the Hebrew Bible (Old Testament) assume that slavery was a normal condition, and hence, for example, Deuteronomy 5:14 states that everyone is equal on the Sabbath; even slaves should not be forced to work. In ancient Hebrew society, every 50th year, some slaves were offered their freedom in accordance with the admonition given in Leviticus 25:10. In the name of Christianity, Theodora, the showgirl-turned-empress, outlawed slavery in the Roman Empire.

In recent centuries, all religious traditions agree that all human beings are equal before God, and largely as a result, slavery is illegal. When most Westerners think of slavery, they picture the transatlantic transport of Africans to the Americas chained in the holds of ships, and indeed, this form of slavery is illegal today. More broadly defined, slavery is the inability to change employers due to the weight of debt or the threat of physical violence. In that sense, slavery has never been more prevalent than in recent decades, with only a limited amount of religious protest against it. In 2001, the U.S. State Department acknowledged that human trafficking at its current growth rate will surpass drugs and guns as the world's largest illegal industry. Laws against underage prostitution or child sex tourism are inconsistently enforced around the world.

Debt Bondage and Usury

One form of slavery that is banned by religious decrees but is still rampant around the world is debt bondage, where an employer pays a worker less than the worker's debt to the employer. This practice is most prevalent in South Asia, but significant international corporations are also involved. A portion of the world's chocolate supply, for example, is harvested by child slaves in the Ivory Coast. Allegations of rampant exploitation in the diamond mines of the Congo and on sugar cane plantations in Brazil have received publicity and are under investigation.

Usury is the charging of excessive rates of interest that can lead to debt bondage. Shakespeare's father was arrested for usury based on a 25% loan in the mid-16th century. By strict interpretation, usury means all interest. Credit cards, payday loans, and adjustable rate mortgages are convenient services yet are advertised and structured so as to take advantage of desperate or suffering people unfamiliar with the concept of compound interest. State usury laws were circumvented by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1978, and then, credit card rates doubled during the 1990s from highs of 20%–40%. Payday loan interest rates of 400% were allowed in North Carolina in 1997 and then limited to 36% for military families. American banks were instrumental in creating a global recession in September 2008 after competing to make home loans to people who could not afford them.

In 1976, an economics professor at Chittagong University, Muhammad Yunus, freed 42 women stool makers in Jobra, Bangladesh, from debt bondage with $27 out of his own pocket. He then founded Grameen Bank, which would go on to lend amounts below $100 to 7 million women entrepreneurs. A founder of microfinance, Yunus was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 2006 for his efforts. Islamic finance circumvents the prohibition against usury by requiring mudaraba, or profit and loss sharing, known in the United States as venture capital, in which the lender becomes a partner motivated to share in the risk and the reward by helping the entrepreneur. In 2008, the Amana Mutual Funds of Bellingham, Washington, ranked as one of America's best investments by avoiding usury.

Sustainable Taxation

In addition to promoting innovation and efficiency over physical and economic slavery, religious ethics promote the circulation of wealth to increase initiative and opportunity and to promote stewardship, including philanthropy. Charity in Islam is especially important for social services such as education, health care, and the environment, which religious ethics (on stewardship and social justice) generally encourages.

Giving Time

In The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, Max Weber described how the religious values of honesty, hard work, and saving for the success of the nuclear family helped northern European economies to surpass Mediterranean economies during the Industrial Revolution. Marcel Mauss agreed in The Gift that how we choose to give of our time influences our level of economic and social power. In addition to sacred religious practices, economic exchanges contain opportunities for meaningful relationships and the sharing of traditions, including knowledge and wisdom.

ECUADOR

Ecuador, a country of approximately 13.9 million inhabitants, straddles the equator (for which it is named) on the Pacific coast of South America, bordered on the north by Colombia and on the south and southeast by Peru. The country is split, geographically and culturally, into three distinct regions. The lowlands along the Pacific coast have a Spanish-speaking, mainly mestizo (mixed indigenous and European heritage) population. The Andean highlands that constitute the central region of Ecuador are home to a population of predominantly indigenous descent, many members of which speak Kechwa, a dialect of the Incan imperial language Quechua, either exclusively or in addition to Spanish. In the Amazonian basin in the east, the site of much of Ecuador's sizable petroleum reserves, a number of small indigenous groups, such as the Huaorani, continue to live a traditional lifestyle despite the incursions of settlers from outside the region. Estimates of the religious demography of Ecuador suggest that 90%–95% of the population identifies as Catholic, with the bulk of the remainder comprising members of various Protestant denominations, including many who are Pentecostal believers. Church attendance among Catholics is relatively low, but personal devotions and sacramental rituals thrive in many areas.

The roots of Ecuador's modern religious landscape lie—as they do for much of Latin America—in the collision of European and indigenous cultures during the Spanish invasion and conquest of the 16th century. When the first Spanish expedition, accompanied by a Dominican friar and a priest, arrived in Ecuador in 1532, they encountered the northernmost expanses of the vast Inca Empire, which had occupied the area in the waning decades of the 15th century. The popular, or folk, Catholicism that many Ecuadorians practice today, characterized by sacramentalism and veneration of a variety of saints, developed out of the semisuccessful efforts of European Catholic missionaries to convert the population of the Spanish colony. A dearth of religious education in local languages and the lack of an indigenous clergy left room for substantial devotional diversity and innovation.

From Ecuador's independence in 1830 until the latter half of the 20th century, the Catholic Church allied itself primarily with conservative political groups in opposition to liberals, such as Eloy Alfaro, who invited Protestant missionaries to Ecuador in 1895. The global ecclesial reforms of the Second Vatican Council and the progressive sentiments of the 1968 Episcopal Conference in Medellín did, however, take root in Ecuador. Many clergy, notably Bishop Leonidas Proaño, adopted tenets from the emerging liberation theology. Proaño, along with 17 other bishops, was arrested by the Ecuadorian military government in 1976 on charges of "subversion."

The growth of Protestant churches that began during Alfaro's presidency expanded rapidly in the second half of the 20th century but has not yet reached the level in other Latin American countries, such as Chile and Guatemala. It remains to be seen whether Protestant growth will continue and to what extent Catholicism will remain the dominant religious influence in Ecuador's future.

ECUMENICALISM

Ecumenicalism, the friendship and cooperation among differing religious groups and faiths, has a long and rich history. The varied trends in ecumenical thought and action can be traced to the various understandings of the word itself. "Ecumenism" originates from the Greek noun oikoumenē, "the inhabited earth" or "the whole world," and the adjective "oikoumenikos," understood as "ecumenical." There are few biblical passages that use the word oikoumenē. The 15 references to oikoumenē are all found in the New Testament; interpretations of each use and its significance vary.

With so few references, the purpose and function of ecumenicalism has been derived mostly from applications of the term. During the fourth century CE, oikoumenē often referred to the Christian empire under Roman rule. Ecumenical councils gathered periodically to discuss the state of the Christian faith within the Roman Empire and to settle disputes among Christian groups. Both Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox traditions are considered to have continued this trend with their own ecumenical councils. Similarly, early creeds, such as the Nicene or the Apostles' Creed, are generally considered ecumenical because they are widely accepted by Christians. Since these early instances, the term largely fell out of use until the 19th century, when Christians became increasingly concerned with divisions in doctrine and polity among Christians around the world. From this concern, the modern ecumenical movement was born. The modern ecumenical movement was and is the pursuit of reconciliation among various Christian groups, including the Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant faiths. As a result, much of the history of ecumenicalism pertains to Christians working together for the "church universal," or a single Christian church. More recently, however, common parlance often equates "ecumenical" with increased interaction and unity among world religions through interfaith dialogue and cooperation. These contemporary ecumenical organizations promote religious pluralism and pursue increased interaction among diverse faiths rather than agreement on theology.

The Modern Ecumenical Movement

The modern ecumenical movement began among Protestant denominations after the 1910 World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh, Scotland. Delegates from various Protestant missionary organizations met to consider the division and competition among Christians. Noticeably absent from the conference were Catholic and Orthodox delegates as well as representatives from non-Western countries. Though representation at the meeting was not ecumenical in composition, the principle topic for the 1910 conference was an ecumenical one. The intent of the World Missionary Conference was to unite “Christendom” in an effort to advance worldwide missions. Focusing on the mission set forth in Matthew 28:19 to “make disciples of all nations,” delegates agreed that fulfilling such a mission appeared impossible in light of divisions over theology and polity. The goal of the conference was to develop a consensus on how the Christian church, broadly conceived, could progress in its missionizing efforts in a cooperative way. Several issues emerged as central to this ecumenical movement: the missionary enterprise of the church, the shared social and welfare services offered by churches, and the ideological points of contention that separate denominations from one another.

One legacy of the 1910 World Missionary Conference was the creation of the World Council of Churches in 1948. The World Council of Churches hosted its first assembly in Amsterdam in 1948 with the theme “Man’s Disorder and God’s Designs.” In all, 90 churches around the world accepted the invitation to join. The Roman Catholic Church surprisingly declined the invitation, though it remained open to dialogue. Still in existence today, the goal of the World Council of Churches is to unify all Christians under one ecumenical organization. Currently, the World Council of Churches includes 349 churches from 110 countries. Although Roman Catholic churches are not members of the World Council of Churches, dialogue between the Roman Catholic Church and the World Council of Churches continues to occur. Dialogue began in 1960 when Pope John XXII created an official secretariat position for Christian unity.

After the Second Vatican Council (1962–1964), Roman Catholics became increasingly interested in ecumenicalism. With the Decree on Ecumenism, the Roman Catholic Church officially expressed interest in reconciliation with other Christian faiths and in restoring the universal Christian Church. This document provided the basis for ecumenical endeavors by the Roman Catholic Church as a whole and its members as individuals. Since the Second Vatican Council, Roman Catholics have had a strong presence on interfaith councils and in ecumenical organizations. Roman Catholic affirmations of ecumenism continued with Pope John Paul II. In a letter titled The Light of the East (1995), Pope John Paul II affirmed the theology of Orthodox Christianity and the important relationship between the Roman Catholic and Orthodox traditions. Despite the schism, Pope John Paul II stressed the eventual unification of both traditions. Additionally, Pope John Paul II’s encyclical That All May Be One (1995) continued the ecumenical trend of the Second Vatican Council by asserting the Catholic Church’s responsibility in moving toward Christian unity.

Ecumenical Debates

Christian ecumenism has not been without internal problems. Members of ecumenical organizations and councils often find the role of women a controversial issue. The ordination of women and the acceptance of female church leadership proves to be a historic and contemporary divisive issue on which members cannot always agree. Likewise, division within ecumenical councils often occurs on “generational” lines between “older” and “newer” faiths. For instance, the issues of theology and polity that drove Roman Catholics and Protestants apart historically are of little relevance to contemporary Asian, African, or Latin American Christian groups. The methods of reconciliation between Roman Catholics and Protestants do not necessarily apply to all reconciliation efforts among Asian, African, Latin, European, and American Christians. Moreover, “newer” groups insist on maintaining indigenous thought and practice rather than accepting European forms as normative. Ecumenical organizations often avoid these doctrinal points of discord by focusing on service as the true mission of ecumenism. Goodwill toward humanity theoretically unites members of ecumenical councils; however, members often disagree on the methods of service. Divisions occur over two approaches: (1) those that focus on the individualism found within Christianity and the need to reform society through transforming the inner life of individuals and (2) those that focus on the social nature of Christianity and the need to reform individuals through a transformation of systemic social structures. Although most Christians understand both foci as necessary for change, ecumenical members often disagree on which should take priority.

Ecumenism and Interfaith Dialogue

Ecumenical and interfaith interest is not limited to Christian denominations and organizations. Ecumenism includes interaction among the world's faiths. After World War II, for instance, Christian ecumenical organizations committed to dialogue with Jewish organizations. Acknowledging a shared identity in the biblical figure of Abraham, Christian ecumenists renewed their interest in reconciling relationships among Abrahamic faiths. In the late 20th century, as globalization reached new heights, global religions turned toward ecumenicalism. The tendency to join ecumenical organizations spread across all faiths. Though ecumenical outreach began with Islamic reform movements in the 18th century, interfaith dialogue has increased between Muslims and other religious adherents in the late 20th century. As globalized terror organizations proliferated and gained worldwide attention, the interfaith community intensified its efforts to promote awareness about Islam's core beliefs. Many ecumenists also promoted the universalities found in each religion, rather than stressing the points of discord.

Worldwide Challenges

Ecumenical movements have not existed without criticism. In the early 20th century, as ecumenical Christian organizations formed, Protestants were increasingly divided over the creation of these organizations. Viewing denominational and ideological boundaries as less important than solving urban social problems such as poverty, liberal Protestants turned toward ecumenicalism as an opportunity to achieve their social and political goals. Viewing denominational and ideological boundaries to be of paramount importance, conservative Protestants, in contrast, viewed these efforts as a rejection of the fundamentals of the Christian faith. Along with ideological divisions around the issue of ecumenicalism, conservative Protestants viewed ecumenical organizations as an expression of the urban elite. Though specific to Protestants in the United States, this example parallels broader, global divisions over ecumenicalism. Many faiths have accused ecumenical organizations of religious syncretism, sacrificing religious truths for acceptance, and abandoning efforts to proselytize. The primary criticism of ecumenical organizations is that they promote universalities and similarities among religions at the expense of fundamental truths of specific religions. Despite these criticisms and challenges, however, ecumenical movements continue to grow, especially around colleges and universities, connecting local denominations to other faiths worldwide.

EGYPT

Egypt has long been at the crossroads of cultural influences and home to a variety of religious faiths. The Bible attests to Egypt's political importance in the ancient Near East and to its place in monotheistic history. Judaism, Christianity, and Islam have all left their mark—in terms of material and intellectual culture—on Egypt. But it is Islam that has played the dominant role in ushering the country into the global era and shaping its identity. Indeed, the growing public, political nature of Islam in Egypt is tied to globalization and attests to the power of religion to provide a voice for social protest and change.

Colonialism, Defensive Modernization, and Religion

Egypt entered the global age as a territorial possession of a declining Ottoman Empire and an important regional player in an emerging world system dominated by Western powers. This new world system was the result of historical forces that had transformed Europe into the center of modern science, technology, commerce, and politics. Other regions were integrated into this new system as “the periphery” and compelled—either through force, self-interest, or both—to accommodate to Western-style modernity. This asymmetric power arrangement gave rise to European colonialism, which deeply affected much of the Muslim world. In Egypt, Ottoman authorities, starting in the early 19th century, welcomed British advisors and investors to help invigorate the economy and revamp social institutions. By the end of the century, Egypt had witnessed dramatic social and economic changes, but it had also accumulated a significant debt. The British, following a pattern of colonial insertion first begun in India, took control of Egypt to ensure their financial interests and to further exploit the country’s resources. Their colonial presence would not end until the mid-20th century, after a tide of nationalism swept through the country.

While religion was not at the forefront of the new world system, it did infuse the cultural undercurrents of modernity, modernization, and colonialism. At the historic center of this system, the British viewed their culture, including Christianity, as essential to their modern success and as superior to the native cultures and religions over which they ruled as a colonial power. In fact, Christian missionary activity was part of the colonial enterprise—an attempt on the part of the British to transmit not just the material blessings of modernity but its cultural sources as well. For Egyptians, the interpretive link between modernity and religion, and Islam in particular, proved more ambiguous because the social transformations within their country had a foreign origin and were not directly tied to their cultural past.

Keenly aware of their weakness vis-à-vis the West, Egyptians recognized the need to adopt new industries, technologies, and practices and to reform their traditional systems of law, education, and politics. They also questioned religious traditions and institutions that were thought to have allowed a once-great Islamic civilization to decline. At the same time, Egyptians were rightly worried about the seeming Western orientation of modernity and modernization and about the cultural threat entailed in equating modernization with Westernization. Thus, while the global reach of the new world system and the colonialism that accompanied it set in motion an unprecedented exchange of goods, ideas, and ways of life, it also created a crisis of identity and authenticity in Egypt and other peripheral countries. The response to this crisis, which has been called defensive modernization, embraced development and change to empower native populations and thus limit further Western incursions. It emphasized laying the infrastructure for a modern society that could compete economically, politically, and militarily in a new global age. And religion proved to be an important factor in this competitive environment.

In Egypt, in the late 19th century, modernizers like Jamal al-Din al-Afghani and Muhammad Abduh criticized traditional Muslim thinkers who had rejected Western science as foreign, un-Islamic innovation. Islam, according to the modernizers, had always accepted science and new knowledge, but with the expansion of Islamic power in the classical period, Muslim thinkers had grown complacent, and Islamic thought had stagnated. A return to the true path of Islam, so the modernizers argued, would allow Muslims to develop and recover their rightful power.

By framing modern knowledge and change in terms of Islam, modernizers provided cultural legitimacy for the seemingly foreign-born social transformations already under way in Egypt and reaffirmed an identity and tradition challenged by recent trends. As a result, a new Muslim self-consciousness became fused with modernization.

Secular and Religious Nationalism

A tourist poster popular in Egypt in the 1980s announced that Egypt was the cradle of monotheism. The images on the poster depicted a history that linked the most recent manifestation of monotheism—Islam—with its Abrahamic predecessors—Christianity and Judaism—and then back to the monotheistic sun worship of the Pharaoh Akhenaton. Such imagery captures the way modern Egyptians wished to present themselves to the outside world: a nation with a rich and pluralistic history. It also reflects the creative efforts that drove nationalist thinking in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Of all the modern political ideas that took hold in Egypt, none put down deeper roots and made more of a lasting impression than nationalism. Like its precursors in Europe, nationalism in Egypt drew on the history, language, and symbolism of native religion(s) to unify the people and shape a common political identity; also like nationalisms in Europe, Egyptian nationalism proved to have an ambivalent and competitive relationship with religion—particularly Islam, the majority religion. In the hearts and minds of some Egyptians, this new political identity supplanted Islam; in others, it vied for supremacy; and in most, the two became inseparably fused.

The British takeover of Egypt, in the late 19th century, spurred patriotic sentiment and calls for independence. But Egyptians expressed their growing sense of political identity through two modern ideas introduced by the British: nationalism and political parties. Both ideas were secular in their European and Egyptian contexts, which is to say that they did not fall under any institutional religious authority or have a particular religious or theological agenda; both were also subject to cultural influences that made otherwise secular political expressions take on religious hues. Secular nationalism in Egypt encompassed a range of differing and sometimes contradictory views. Some thinkers, such as Ahmad Lutfi al-Sayyid, argued for a particular “Egyptianness” that made those living along the Nile unique both culturally and politically. Others, such as Taha Hussein, claimed that Egyptians had more in common culturally and politically with Europe (the West) than with the Arab region or the Islamic world (the East). But the strongest strain of secular nationalism among Egyptians combined Arab ethnicity and Islamic tradition—twinned elements that traced back to Islam’s origin in the Arabian Peninsula. Arab Muslim armies had conquered Egypt in the seventh century, and over time, Cairo had emerged as one of the great urban centers of Islamic civilization—a place to seek out Islamic learning and culture. These same armies had once operated on the world stage, competing against and, in some instances, winning out over Christian Europe.

The glories of the Arab-Islamic past were prime material for Egyptians to work with as they imagined their nation’s history and culture, despite the fact that other emerging Arab nations were working with the same material. And evidence of the country’s Islamic heritage permeated the architectural landscape. Of course, Egypt’s Pharaonic past was also readily at hand, but it was a dead culture, and a nation required a living culture—a past that was not really past but ongoing. Even Egyptian Christians, the Copts, engaged in Islam-infused secular nationalism, for they, too, as a protected minority (dhimmi), had been part of this civilization and had contributed to its greatness.

While secular nationalism was the rule in Egypt, there was an exception: The religious nationalism fostered initially by the Muslim Brotherhood and later by other activist Islamist groups. Founded in 1928, at the peak of nationalist ferment, the Muslim Brotherhood rejected Western-style politics. Nationalism and the nation-state, according to the Muslim Brotherhood, imposed a false European political consciousness on Muslims, thereby dividing the umma (the community of believers) and pitting Muslims against one another. The founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, Hassan al-Banna, called for the formation of a unified Islamic state ruled by Islamic law, but he recognized that this kind of transnational enterprise could not be achieved overnight. So he advocated instead a religious nationalism that, unlike secular nationalism, took Islam seriously in both the political order and the social life of citizens.

The religious nationalism of the Muslim Brotherhood was, in many ways, a counternationalism, an attempt to create an alternative political modernity that did not depend on Western models. In the context of the British occupation, it operated like other nationalist movements, fighting for independence, building a political base, and appealing to the perceived needs of the Egyptian people. After independence and the creation of a secular state system, the Muslim Brotherhood went into political opposition, working in the streets to demonstrate Islam's potential to manage a modern society. Militant offshoots of the Muslim Brotherhood, such as Takfir wa'l-Hijra (Excommunication and Emigration) and al-Gama'a al Islamiyah (Islamic Group), adopted a more confrontational political style, hoping to end secular rule through violence.

Instead of fading from the scene, religious nationalism—which when speaking of the Muslim world is more typically referred to as political Islam or Islamism—has remained a powerful force in Egypt throughout the second half of the 20th century and the first decade of the 21st. Its ongoing challenge to the legitimacy of the secular state has ensured a heightened role for religion in the public sphere and compelled the state to secure a religious legitimacy of its own.

Religion and the State

The foundations of a centralized modern state in Egypt started with the leadership of the Ottoman Khedive Muhammad Ali and continued under the British. The ideological direction of the state, however, only emerged after the 1952 revolution, which brought the charismatic Gamal Abdel Nasser to power. A military officer with no formal political training, Nasser gradually found a political niche for himself, as international defender of Third World peoples, and a political direction for the country, a state-imposed Arab socialism that emphasized rapid development and shunned democracy. Nasser proved himself a clever student of Cold War politics when, in 1956, he nationalized the Suez Canal, which was still owned and controlled by the British and set off an international incident that almost led to war. To acquire the necessary aid for development, Nasser turned to the Soviet Union. While Nasser's successor, Anwar Sadat, reoriented Egypt's political economy, shifting to capitalism and bringing the country into the U.S. orbit of power, he continued the authoritarian style of rule that Nasser began and that continued until the brief popular uprising that led to the resignation of Sadat's successor, Hosni Mubarak, in February 2011.

The state, under each of these leaders, adopted a common policy toward religion: to control religion in order to exploit it for state purposes or to prevent it from becoming a weapon against the state. This policy has largely failed, and the failure has contributed to the domestic and global strengthening of Islam and Islamism.

The group of Free Officers who led the 1952 revolution recognized the political potential of Islam. After taking power, the Free Officers eliminated party politics but allowed the Muslim Brotherhood to continue its activities. A member of the Free Officers and Nasser's second in command, Anwar Sadat, reached out to the Muslim Brotherhood in the hope of using the organization's popular base to rally support for the new regime. The effort failed and demonstrated to the then leader of the Muslim Brotherhood, Sayyid Qutb, the cynical attitude toward religion held by the Free Officers. After a botched assassination attempt by a lone Muslim Brotherhood gunman in 1954, the government cracked down on the organization: Thousands were arrested, often never having been charged or brought to trial, and the organization was declared illegal. It was from one of Nasser's prisons that Sayyid Qutb penned what would become a modern jihadist classic, Maalim fi'l-Tariq ("Milestones"). Influenced by the writing of Maulana Abu al-Ala Mawdudi of Pakistan, Qutb argued that modern Muslim society had fallen into a state of jahiliyyah (ignorant sinfulness), which could only be purified by the fire of God-sanctioned violence.

Nasser's offensive against Islamists, both radical and moderate, ran parallel with his efforts to create an acceptable, politically neutral version of Islam in Egypt. To this end, he nationalized Al-Azhar, the oldest Islamic university in the Islamic world and the voice of traditional Islamic authority. Once under the government wing, faculty members became state-paid functionaries, whose careers depended on supporting government policies and steering clear of sensitive political issues. Al-Azhar was also forced to change its curriculum to include secular subjects because the state only wanted religious scholars who were attuned to the modern world to preach in mosques and teach in schools. Over time, the state brought all mosques under government control—ostensibly to ensure upkeep but in truth to police public preaching.

Nasser's unstated authoritarian bargain with the Egyptian people required the (temporary) sacrifice of political freedoms for fast-paced industrial and economic growth. It was a bargain many were ready to make. But Egypt's stunning defeat by the Israelis in 1967, along with the stubborn realities of slow economic development, forced Egyptians to question the wisdom of Nasser's way forward. It also sent the country into a spiritual crisis as many began to question why God was punishing Egypt. Islamists had a ready answer: By following a secular, Western model of development, Egypt had strayed from the path of Islam. When Sadat took charge after Nasser's death in 1970, he forged a new state relationship with Islamists. But he too, like Nasser, had his own political agenda in mind. Eager to counter the Nasserist forces that questioned his abilities, Sadat released Islamists from prison and empowered them to criticize socialism and Nasser himself. Sadat also cast himself as the believing president, someone who was sensitive to the obligations of faith and aspects of the Islamist cause.

Sadat's outreach to Islamists did not prevent the 1970s from becoming a bloody decade of Islamist violence. Radical groups such as al-Fanniya 'Askariya ("Military Academy Group") and Takfir wa'l-Hijra burst onto the scene, attacking symbols of state power and authority. Nasser's prisons may have kept militancy in check and thwarted serious political opposition, but they also engendered deep hatred and resentment toward the government. The prison experience produced different responsive tracks within the broad array of Islamist groups: moderates who took their message to the people through preaching, teaching and charitable work; separatists who established a bloc of the faithful apart from society; and militants who turned to violence to address Egypt's sinful condition. These tracks were amorphous, and both individuals and groups shifted their responses over time. At the end of the decade, the Jihad group, outraged over Sadat's peace overtures toward Israel, assassinated him. The new government responded by declaring a state of emergency and imposing martial law—a condition that has remained in force to the present.

Having witnessed the mistakes of his predecessors, Mubarak adopted a cautious, carrot-and-stick approach toward Islamists. And Islamists, radical and moderate, gave the regime plenty of reason to feel threatened. The radicals attacked Copts and tourists and established de facto control in areas of Upper Egypt and Cairo. At the same time, the moderates ran successfully for office in professional unions, one of the few venues for free and fair elections. A dramatic event in 1997 proved to be a watershed moment for radicals and Egyptians in general. Members of Gamaa Islamiya (Islamic Group) killed 58 tourists and 4 Egyptians in a frenzy of bloody violence at the temple of Hatshepsut near Luxor. Reports of tourists being hacked to death with hatchets and swords shocked Egyptians and caused imprisoned members of the group to renounce violence.

The violence of the radical Islamist movement had been aimed at the Mubarak regime, but what brought his rule to an end on February 11, 2011, was about as far from jihad as one could imagine. It was a series of massive, nonviolent movements of largely middle-class and relatively young professionals who organized their protests through Facebook, Twitter, and other forms of electronic social networking. These protests constituted a catalyst for change.

There was, however, a religious element to the 2011 Egyptian nonviolent movement. The peak moments came after Friday prayers, when sympathetic mullahs would urge the faithful to join the protest as a religious duty. But theirs was not the divisive, hateful voice of jihadi rhetoric. In a remarkable moment when the Muslim protestors were trying to conduct their prayers in Tahrir Square and Mubarak's supporters tried to attack them as they prayed, a cordon of Egyptian Coptic Christians who had joined the protests circled their Muslim compatriots, shielding them. Later, a phalanx of Muslim protestors protected their Christian comrades as they worshipped in the public square, an urban intersection that was for that time transformed into a massive interfaith sanctuary. Rather than separating Muslim from non-Muslim, and Sunnī from Shi'a, the symbols that were raised on impromptu placards in Cairo's Tahrir Square were emblems of interfaith cooperation; they showed the cross of the Coptic Christians together with the crescent of Egypt's Muslims in a united religious front against autocracy.

Since then, Islamist-state confrontation has continued to be tense at times. The Muslim Brotherhood has had a new lease of political life in the elections that have taken place both nationally and locally. Hence, religion has continued to play a role in Egypt's political life, though in more diverse and less strident ways than before.

Secular Failures and the Turn Toward Islam

The last two decades of the 20th century saw a renewed emphasis on Islam in Egyptian public and private life. This renewal was evident in the increase in mosque attendance, the number of Islamic books being published, and the percentage of women veiling. It was also clear in the spate of public confessions by famous Egyptians, especially female media stars, who spoke of their decision to adopt an Islamic lifestyle. And newly minted converts to Islamism confessed to their previous belief in Arab socialism or communism. News stories reported on trends in religious activity, such as women attending dars or informal religious instruction in private homes and the charitable work of Islamic NGOs. Egyptian secularists voiced concern about the growing presence of and dependence on Islam in public discourse. But it was secularism itself, or more accurately its perceived failures, that led to the new turn toward Islam.

Egypt's experience with secularism was tied to three successive authoritarian governments that increased the nation's foreign debt, thwarted meaningful political participation, abused human rights, and failed to create sufficient jobs. With this kind of track record, Egyptian frustration with Western-style modernization is understandable. This is not to say that Egyptians have come to embrace Islamist politics or the imposition of Islamic law, but they have come to realize the potential of Islam to mediate the ill effects of modernity. On a personal level, Islam is seen as a spiritual refuge from the harsh social and economic realities of daily life in Egypt. On a social level, Islam's moral teachings of compassion and integrity are seen as an antidote to rampant corruption and government ineptitude.

Global factors also contributed to the turn away from a Western developmental model and toward a model infused with native Islamic values. While Western colonialism has ended, Western control over Egypt's economic life has not. The World Bank and International Monetary Fund—the new face of Western economic interests—oversee Egypt's currency and bread prices. And the new world system, in which Egypt found itself a peripheral player, brought its own set of political compromises and contradictions. International support for Israel has allowed what many Egyptians consider a Western colonial power to take over the border, in the heartland of the Arab Muslim world. Peace with Israel did bring benefits to Egypt—a return of the Sinai Peninsula and a yearly payment from the United States—but it also meant betraying the Palestinian cause. Moreover, United States financial aid to Egypt was used to maintain a militarized state that suppressed its own people. According to many Egyptians, the United States, contrary to its own stated policies and goals, has not fostered democracy in Egypt, the Middle East, or the Muslim world. Instead, it has supported corrupt, autocratic regimes that ensured the flow of oil and assisted in the new war on terrorism, which seems to some like a war on Muslims and Muslim societies.

Western intervention in the Muslim world—starting with the first Gulf War and continuing to the invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan—has raised fears of a new era of Western colonialism and heightened transnational Muslim loyalties. These fears and loyalties are reinforced by Western discourse, following the collapse of the Soviet Union, about an emerging clash of civilizations and the rise of Islam as the new enemy.

The clash that did come was not what the West expected, for it took the form of a global jihad that rendered borders obsolete, and then in the second decade of the 21st century, it took the form of the Arab spring protests. Both global jihad and non-violent democratic protest have attracted the attention and participation of Egyptians. Its first wave came in the Afghan battle to remove occupying Soviet forces, a fight portrayed as a religious duty and secretly supported by the United States. Stymied in their efforts to create an Islamic order in Egypt, militant Egyptian Islamists were among the volunteers who traveled to Afghanistan to support their Muslim brothers and sisters. One of the recruiters for this anti-Soviet jihad was Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman, an Al-Azhar-trained cleric who had provided Sadat's assassins with religious justification for the deed. After serving time in prison, Sheikh Omar took his radical message on the road to Sudan and Pakistan, ending up in the United States, where he was implicated in the first plot to destroy the World Trade Center. Another famous global jihadist of Egyptian origin is Ayman al-Zawahiri, a medical doctor and a member of Gamma Islamiya. al-Zawahiri became one of the Afghan Arabs, as the Arab jihadists in Afghanistan were known, and then, after the defeat of the Soviets in 1989, went on to join al Qaeda, where he served as Osama bin Laden's second-in-command and became the shadow leader of the movement after bin Laden's death in 2011. Few Egyptians support the violent attacks associated with the global jihad, but many are sympathetic to Muslims' efforts around the world to liberate themselves, in the name of Islam, from Western dominance. The uprisings in Cairo's Tahrir Square and elsewhere in January and February 2011 that resulted in Mubarak's resignation were democratic in spirit but also self-consciously Egyptian.

For Egyptians, and Muslims in general, Western political and technological achievements no longer appear as convincing and invincible as they once did. Muslims living in European nations, where political ideals of freedom and equality are affirmed, find themselves treated as second-class citizens because of their religion and culture. And the United States, the winner of the Cold War, has seen its policy goals in Iraq and Afghanistan foiled by seemingly unsophisticated enemies.

These global events are receiving special attention because of the growth of the Internet and the emergence of media outlets such as al-Jazeera. As a result, Egyptians are experiencing Islam on multiple levels—personal, social, national, and international—and the combined effect reinforces broader Muslim identity and consciousness. It is not surprising, in this regard, that the 2011 protests were organized largely through cell phones and Internet social networking, such as Facebook and Twitter.

A New Global Future for Islam?

Polling data indicate that Egyptians, like Americans, are a highly religious people. The processes of modernization and globalization, however, have led Egyptians to understand and experience their religiosity in specific ways. The public turn to Islamic militancy and to Islamic democracy in a post-Mubarak period is the result of identity politics driven by national and international factors—not the expression of Islam's traditional form in Muslim society. The future of Islam in Egypt, then, depends on the new global formations that have yet to emerge.

EL SALVADOR

The Central American country of El Salvador, one of the smallest nations in the Americas, is among the least diverse religiously. Although most Salvadorans are Catholic, a growing Protestant population and changes within Catholicism have transformed the nation's religious profile in recent decades.

Religious life in El Salvador, as in most of Latin America, has been dominated by the Roman Catholic Church since colonization by Spain. Until the 1960s, the vast majority of Salvadorans practiced a form of syncretic popular Catholicism that centered on the saints and the Virgin Mary. The country's patron saint is Jesus, El Salvador del Mundo ("The Savior of the World"). Under the leadership of Luis Chávez y Gonzalez, archbishop of San Salvador from 1938 to 1977, the Salvadoran church began modernizing even before the second Vatican Council (1962–1965). Following Chávez, Oscar Romero's 3 years as archbishop (1977–1980) were marked by intensifying political radicalization and violence. Progressive Catholicism influenced by liberation theology spread farther in El Salvador than in most of Latin America. Romero was nominated for canonization 10 years after his assassination in 1980. Presently, Salvadoran Catholicism includes not only popular and progressive variants but also a large Charismatic movement that enjoys significant institutional support.

The first Protestant missionaries arrived in El Salvador from the United States in 1915. Although it is hard to know exactly how large El Salvador's current Protestant population is, most estimates place it at around 25% of the populace, mostly Pentecostal. In addition to Pentecostal groups such as the Assemblies of God, several mainline Protestant churches have a strong presence in El Salvador, including the American Baptists, Episcopalians, and Lutherans, who have been leaders in social and political reform.

El Salvador's relative lack of religious diversity stems partly from the fact that it has experienced little immigration due to political instability and high population density. Furthermore, having no Atlantic coast, the nation lacks the vibrant Afro-Caribbean population present in other Central American nations. That said, El Salvador is still far from homogeneous religiously. There are small populations of Asian and Middle Eastern descent, and some important national leaders have come from these communities. Less than 2% of the population embrace Judaism and Islam, although there are small, active communities, primarily in the capital city, San Salvador. There is also a small but significant indigenous revitalization, especially in the western part of the country, with both cultural and religious elements.

While few people have immigrated to El Salvador, as many as 2 million Salvadorans have left the country, most to North America. They have taken with them distinctive values and practices, including both liberationist Catholicism and Pentecostal Protestantism.

ELIADE, MIRCEA (1907–1986)

Mircea Eliade was one of the founders of the modern academic field of history of religions and was a pillar of the University of Chicago's school of comparative religious studies from 1958 to 1986. Eliade was a prodigious Romanian novelist who survived World War II as an exiled fascist cultural attaché before becoming the most influential founder of religious studies in the United States.

As an attempt to bridge East and West and archaic and modern, Eliade's scholarship encourages cultural dialogue and a respect for the power of symbols and history. His critics allege that generalizations about ethnic and religious communities for the sake of comparison minimize the important roles that conflicts and politics play in religion. His support for fascism in Europe before World War II combined with his writings about the revolutionary power of nostalgia seem to endorse violence despite his nonpolitical humanistic stance.

As a high school student in Bucharest, Eliade published a hundred articles and taught himself multiple languages in his parents' attic. He trained himself to sleep 5 hours a night and wrote fiction for relaxation, eventually becoming one of Romania's most famous novelists. While studying the influence of Neoplatonism on Italian Renaissance philosophy in Rome after college, Eliade wrote to the Maharaja of Kassimbazar, who sponsored 3 years of study in the home of the famous Hindu philosopher Surendranath Dasgupta in Calcutta. According to his autobiography, Eliade desired "to become truly 'Indian'" before he was expelled from the house for seducing his mentor's daughter Maitreyi.

While "in the field," Eliade combined his textual study of Sanskrit, scripture, and philosophy with yoga techniques in a Himalayan ashram near Rishikesh, where he "awoke at daybreak and bathed in the Ganges, just a few meters from my kutiar." At age 25, back in Romania, he served a brief mandatory stint in an artillery unit despite his poor eyesight. Later, Eliade participated in Christian nationalist political efforts, where he opposed both the proletariat and the aristocracy; instead, he considered it best to have a fascist dictator lead the modernization of the nation since democracy required too much patience. First imprisoned by King Carol II for 4 months, he was then "exiled" as cultural attaché to London in time to survive the Blitz. After his wife died of cancer in Lisbon in 1944 and the war ended, Eliade was reborn a nonpolitical, humanistic educator through what he called a "spiritual resurrection."

An intellectual trying to bridge East and West, primitive and modern, Eliade was well positioned to heal Westerners distressed by the Holocaust and the H-bomb's devaluation of human life, using romanticism and reason. With a variety of languages and 3 years of Hindu practice to his credit, along with the discipline to synthesize large amounts of scholarship, Eliade tried to resacralize the West using Eastern and archaic wisdom. As he told his interviewer, recruited by Georges Dumézil to teach at the Sorbonne, Eliade had his greatest impact following Joachim Wach at the University of Chicago, where he was to train half of America's distinguished chairs of religious studies between 1958 and 1986.

Though his methods have been called into question even by his most prominent supporters, Eliade's profound impact on the academic study of religion is indisputable. Eliade championed the comparative study of religions, which he called the history of religions, employing a phenomenological approach—for instance, examining how the multiple meanings of a symbol change over time. Since this method avoids the absolute truth claims of theology, it could be taught in public schools following the Schempp decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in 1963, which mandated the academic study of religion. Eliade's approach further avoids reducing religion to its social or psychological functions, thereby treating the beliefs and practices of pre- and non-Christians as worthy of study and respect.

Eliade has been criticized for overemphasizing commonalities between religions and for ignoring specific historical and political contexts. As a synthesizer, he was accused of being an armchair anthropologist. A more damning accusation is that Eliade's postwar goal of uncovering the universal principles of homo religiosus required that he essentialize, or generalize, about entire ethnic or faith communities, which eerily shadows his prewar support for messianic totalitarianism in Romania, according to Robert Ellwood. Following his self-proclaimed postwar "resurrection," Eliade himself refused to clarify his association with known anti-Semites in Bucharest during his 20s, in particular the prominent role his patron Nae Ionesco played in the Legion of the Archangel Michael (also known as the Iron Guard). Among personal accounts, a Jewish colleague, Mihail Sebastian, wrote of Eliade's "catastrophic naiveté" during his young adult years.

Whereas specialists respect his dissertation on yoga and his book Shamanism as distinctive works of scholarship, three works are highlighted here for their attempt to champion the sacred in a secular age, to bridge East and West, and past and present. In 1949, Eliade published Patterns in Comparative Religion, which may be the best introduction to his thought. Here, Eliade introduces his theory that all religions provide people with order and orientation in time and space. In particular, Eliade emphasized the importance of creation myths around the world, which tell of cosmic struggles between order and chaos at the original time (or illo tempore) and require annual renewal in religious festivals. Heroic battles against serpents or the emergence of cosmic trees of life coincidentally span multiple cultures. In modern Judaism, Passover continues to commemorate the Exodus from Egypt and thereby renews the community each spring. According to Eliade, the experience of demarcating sacred from profane space is also universal, with a particular emphasis on the symbolism of the center, or axis mundi. For example, Mecca provides a sacred touchstone for Muslims, who walk in the footsteps of Abraham and Muhammad simultaneously.

Also, in 1949, Eliade published in French a more philosophical text comparing linear and cyclical conceptions of time in The Myth of the Eternal Return. For Eliade, a secular age involves a “terror of history” by privileging the free will of the autonomous individual who remains powerless to influence linear history. Cyclical history follows destruction with creation so that freedom is actualized. For Eliade, secular moderns have lost their awareness of how the sacred can contribute to sociohistorical regeneration.

Third, in The Sacred and the Profane (1957), perhaps Eliade’s most frequently assigned text in college classes, Eliade neatly combines Rudolf Otto’s and Émile Durkheim’s definitions of the sacred as irreducible, meaningful, powerful, set apart or marked, and not profane in support of his theory of order and orientation in time and space. The sacred can be observed in its empirical manifestations, or what Eliade termed hierophanies. The study of a symbol’s history reveals unconscious meanings; however, the sacred cannot be manufactured since its power originates in a catastrophic event (kratophany). Eliade’s work not only helped create religious studies as a field of study in universities; it has been very much at the center of debate in the development of major concepts for that field.

EMERGENT RELIGION

Emergent religion is an approach to religious identity and belonging that, while rooted in historical precedent, is situated and made at home in post-modern, postestablishment settings. First evident among Christians in “post-Christendom” contexts in the United Kingdom, the United States, and Australia/New Zealand, it has since manifested itself among Israeli, North American, and British Jews, and there are signs of emergence in American Islam. The communal life of emergent practitioners is marked by holism, pluralism, and an acceptance of ambiguity. Rather than form a community defined by physical location or gatherings at certain times and places, emergents define their community as people who have a shared mission in the world.

Emergent practice is concerned with “authenticity”—that is, experiences consistent with the roots of the tradition but still contemporary and accessible in as many ways as possible. The inner life of the emergent religious practitioner may include meditation, contemplation, and body movement (e.g., yoga). The marks of spirituality are often outside the congregational service and in the everyday lives of the practitioners. In this way, emergents create a lived religious repertoire not only with other like-minded individuals but in the external world, where religious and secular forms of pluralism reign.

Many emergent religious leaders contrast their interest in and comfort with talking about God with the reticence and discomfort of their institutional counterparts. They frequently encourage their participants to talk about, or at least reflect on, spiritual life in the secular world, even using the secular world for theological reflection. The distinction between the sacred and the secular becomes blurred. They do not see a tension between science, religion, and spirituality.

Emergent religious communities are connected through shared narratives of the ancient past, rooted in their scriptural tradition. Narratives of liberation and redemption are revisited in their original textual form and reinterpreted for application to the contemporary context and as a prescriptive guide for community action. Among emergent Christians, these approaches are called “ancient-future” because they claim a return to ancient texts for the purposes of building a just future. Emergent religious reformers also use a narrative of having navigated a transition from institutional religion to spiritual community as a tool for community organizing.

Emergent communities see themselves as innovative, but not from a blank slate; instead, they create new modes within specific liturgical traditions. Often, emergent religion involves a return to liturgical languages and forms unused by denominational or institutional practitioners. Rather than assign ritual planning and execution to ordained or paid professionals, there is a high value placed on the involvement of lay and volunteer ritual experts.

Emergents often combine theological conservatism with social progressivism, rooting commitments to equality, human dignity, the environment, peacemaking, and social justice in close readings of scripture. They often frame their faith and practice in the context of a world that is broken and hostile toward them. One prominent example is the practice of hospitality, whether through community meals or through meals delivered to those in need (both crises and celebrations). A meal shared with neighbors connects faith and daily life into a meaningful whole.

Emergent religious communities move from location- and function-based institutions toward mission-based institutions. They do not build large buildings—many of them would rather meet in a café or a rented religious space. They also meet in homes, either regularly or to celebrate or mark significant events in the community. As such, they tend to define themselves by their actions in the world rather than by historic, internal rituals. While the specific forms and missions of emergent communal organizations vary according to the interests of the given community, many share a resistance to marketing their religion or religious institution to gain more adherents. Instead, they often position their organizations as countercultural correctives to commercial spirituality and reinvent “citizenship” by avoiding typical dues-based forms of congregational membership.

Emergent leaders exercise moral authority by modeling it rather than prescribing it; in this is a recognition that participants voluntarily join these communities—they are not born into them. Moreover, communal decisions and directions frequently are expressed clearly but without judgment against those who disagree or might not share the same priorities. A key example of this occurs in Jewish emergent communities, where communal standards of kashrut (food regulations) are stringent (to enable as many people as possible to eat) but implemented with the recognition that they are not practiced by all (to enable as many people as possible to contribute food).

Many emergent communities are led by groups of leaders, often without ministry training and without pay. Some emergent communities are led by charismatic leaders who wield as much power as, if not more than, the lay boards do in typical congregations. Nonetheless, they tend to avoid hierarchical models of executive leadership, preferring to act as spiritual directors or guides.

ENCYCLICALS

The term encyclical is used in the modern Roman Catholic Church to designate a formal pastoral letter written by, or under the authority of, the pope as the bishop of Rome and spiritual and administrative leader of the church, which includes the Latin Rite and Eastern Catholic Churches in full communion. In its etymology, encyclical is drawn from linguistic roots in Latin and Greek, meaning “encircling.” In the early church, an encyclical was a pastoral communication in letter form sent out by any bishop and spread to the churches functioning within a particular geographical region. The Eastern Orthodox and Anglican churches have retained this traditional usage. Beginning with Pope John XXIII (1958–1963), encyclicals were written not only for Catholics but for the consideration of the entire human community.

Encyclicals engage a variety of significant issues relating to Catholic faith and doctrine. They can be addressed to the Catholic bishops of a particular locality or to the bishops representing the universal church. The title of papal encyclicals is taken from the first words of the letter. Pope Benedict XIV issued the first modern encyclical in 1740 (Ubi Primum), and since Pope Pius IX (1792–1878), these letters have become the primary way for the pope to communicate authoritatively as a teacher and interpreter of the Roman Catholic tradition. Although the pope may write and is always given credit for the content of his encyclicals, these statements are often the result of collaborative work. One of the most controversial 20th-century encyclicals was Humane Vitae (Of Human Life) by Paul VI, which reaffirmed the traditional church teaching against artificial means of birth control.

The social encyclicals have been particularly significant as globally relevant statements that treat vexing issues such as economic justice, human rights, and peace. Their method of instruction involves a combination of social critique and pastoral advice. The tradition of offering social encyclicals to the world community began in 1891 with Leo XIII’s promulgation of Rerum Novarum (On the Condition of the Working Person). This papal letter is concerned with the effects of the Industrial Revolution on individuals and their communities. It seeks to show the institutional church’s concern with the working class by applying Christianity’s traditional teachings to the problem of elimination of poverty in the working classes, the right of workers to form labor unions, just wages, and safe working environments. Major anniversaries of this encyclical have been marked by various popes with letters of their own reconsidering its major themes. Quadragesimo Anno (After 40 Years) is a 1931 encyclical by Pius XI that reflected on ideas of justice in relation to the world social order. Issued in the midst of the Great Depression and the advances made by communist totalitarianism, it questioned the basic ideas of both capitalism and socialism and promoted the principle of subsidiarity—the value of small-scale societal living and cultural expression over large-scale societal control and subsequent human alienation. Mater et Magistra (Mother and Teacher) is a 1961 encyclical of John XXIII that continues the discussion of the duties of the state in the economic order. In 1981, John Paul II addressed the theme of the dignity and spirituality of work, and in 1991, he marked the hundredth anniversary of Rerum Novarum with Centesimus Annus (The 100th Year), addressing the rights of workers, especially in light of the fall of communism in Europe.

Encyclicals do not always mark anniversaries but often reflect specific global concerns. Pacem in Terris (Peace on Earth) of John XXIII, issued in 1963, is a systematic social theory concerning the dignity and rights of the human person, including the duties of nations to each other as the keepers of peace on an international level in the midst of the Cold War. Paul VI addressed the theme of international relationships and how they can work for global development in his 1967 Populorum Progressio (Progress of Peoples). Benedict XVI's 2009 Caritas in Veritate (Charity in Truth) offers moral direction in the context of the global economic crisis.

ENGAGED BUDDHIST GROUPS

Engaged Buddhist groups constitute a diverse range and network of leaders and communities that have made significant contributions to contemporary Buddhist transnational activism through their espousal of social critique, nonviolent political action, charitable service, and fellowship. Also known as socially engaged Buddhism, the movement developed throughout Asia over the course of the 20th century and more recently in North America, Europe, and elsewhere. A popular idea among intellectuals in French Indochina after World War II was the philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre's theory of engagement, which championed the resistance hero as a prophetic redeemer who responds to oppression by charting a path toward emancipation. The Vietnamese monk and poet Thich Nhat Hanh likely drew on this idea for inspiration when he coined the term engaged Buddhism in 1963, after encouraging fellow monks and nuns to take mindfulness practice out of the meditation hall and into the villages to aid those suffering from the ravaging effects of war.

What characterizes engaged Buddhism as historically unprecedented are the following features: the recognition that suffering (dukkha) has both internal (personal) and external (social) causes that are mutually dependent; “dual liberation,” or the conviction that these two dimensions of suffering can be overcome through the observance of Buddhist precepts (e.g., to abstain from harming living beings), principles (selflessness and interdependence), and practices (mindfulness, loving kindness, and compassion) applied to the social field through service and activism; and the cosmopolitan embrace of Gandhian principles, including selfless service, nonviolence, and self-sufficiency in tandem with Western liberal democratic values (human rights, equality, civil rights, educational opportunity, and the advancement of social, economic, and environmental justice), as compatible with Buddhist aspirations for transforming suffering in the world. Linking the realization of inner peace with world peace to these core Asian and European American values is a distinctive feature of engaged Buddhist groups and their global appeal.

Today, engaged Buddhists are found throughout the world. Sarvodaya Shramadana, led by A. T. Ariyaratne in Sri Lanka, has developed thousands of self-sustainable, village-based communities. B. R. Ambedkar's Dhamma Revolution has brought education and social welfare programs to the Dalit community of South Asia. Humanistic Buddhism has revitalized modern religious life in Taiwan (Tzu Chi Foundation) and Japan (Soka Gakkai). Thailand's lay activist and social critic Sulak Sivaraksa founded the International Network of Engaged Buddhists in 1989 to promote the global integration of Buddhist spiritual values with social and environmental activism. In America, the Buddhist Peace Fellowship, founded in 1978, unites thousands of Buddhists around a common vision of liberation through social engagement.

ENGLAND

England has been a multicultural and multireligious country for more than two millennia. Throughout the centuries, new immigrants have arrived, bringing their own beliefs and practices. Battles, both political and bloody, have been fought on and beyond her land for religious supremacy. Laws have been passed, and continue to be passed, to control and protect those of opposing faiths. Today, England is host to literally hundreds of different religions. It is, however, still possible to say that it is a Christian country, although this may be more apparent at a cultural than at a practicing level, with only around 8% of the adult population attending a church service once a week. England dominates the United Kingdom, which also includes the countries Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland.

Archaeological evidence suggests that pagan cults, most notably Druidry, existed in England from at least the fourth millennium BCE. In 55 BCE, the Romans introduced their particular brand of paganism, to be followed by gods from Egyptian and other pantheons. Christianity may have crept into parts of the country as early as the second century; the Celtic church certainly existed by the fourth century, but gradually it came under papal control. With the Norman Conquest in 1066, Roman canon law became increasingly powerful and corrupt. The ensuing irritation and frustration culminated in Henry VIII's breaking away from Rome over the issue of divorce from the first of his six wives and declaring himself head of the Church of England (C of E) in 1534. Henry's daughter, Mary Tudor, attempted to restore Catholicism, but after her death, her half sister, Elizabeth I, definitively secured a Protestant future for the country, and since 1559, the C of E has been "by law established."

The political predominance of the C of E has not, however, meant that all other forms of religiosity were eradicated. Expelled from England in 1290, Jews were readmitted in 1656 and have been a small but significant presence in English society ever since. Catholics have maintained a presence, supplanted by migration, primarily from Ireland and, more recently, Poland. From the 16th century onward, Puritans and other Protestants joined the religious scene, with some (e.g., Quakers and Methodists) being indigenous and others (e.g., Baptists and Unitarians) being predominantly from continental Europe and, later, North America. In the 19th century, several new sects arrived—some homegrown (e.g., the Salvation Army) and others (e.g., Seventh-Day Adventism, the Church of Christ, Scientist, Jehovah's Witnesses, and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints) from the United States. Around the turn of the century, Eastern ideas started to be popularized among a small section of the English population by movements such as the Theosophical Society.

The 1950s saw an influx of West Indian immigrants, who, finding the White churches staid and unwelcoming, started their own Charismatic and Pentecostal churches. Students from Nigeria and elsewhere in Africa brought their churches (including the Church of the Lord [Aladura], Cherubim and Seraphim, and the Celestial Church of Christ), then their families, and by 2007, 44% of those attending church in inner London were Black.

From the 1960s, successive waves of economic and political refugees have arrived from India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, and East Africa, which has led to the construction of Sunnī, Shi'a, and Ahmadiyya mosques; Sikh gurdwaras; and a variety of Hindu temples. Increasing globalization is further evidenced by the numerous places of worship where rituals are conducted in languages other than English, including Armenian, Brazilian, Hausa, Japanese, Filipino, Polish, Swedish, Taiwanese, Tibetan, Ukrainian, Urdu, and Vietnamese.

England also plays host to around a thousand of the New Religious Movements that have become visible since the 1960s. Most of these are imported, although several are indigenous (e.g., the Aetherius Society, Emin Foundation, Jesus Army, School of Economic Science, and a variety of Pagan and New Age groups, especially in London, Glastonbury, and the West Country).

A voluntary question introduced into the 2001 national census asked, "What is your religion?" The results in percentages were as follows: None 14.6, Christian 71.7, Buddhist 0.3, Hindu 1.1, Jewish 0.5, Muslim 3.1, Sikh 0.7, any other religion 0.3, and not stated 7.7. Among the "others," 390,127 people declared themselves to be Jedi, surpassing Sikhs, Jews, and Buddhists. Although the number of non-Christians is relatively small, the percentage of the various migrant populations is almost certain to continue to grow due to differential birth rates, even with the increasingly strict immigration control.

English law has shown a steady progression away from separation and control toward increasing liberalism. The last heretics (two Anti-Trinitarians) were burned at the stake in 1612, and the last witchcraft trial was in 1712. The 1689 Act of Toleration accorded freedom of worship and the right to their own ministers to Nonconformists or the Free Churches, though not to Unitarians, and it was not until 1850 that the Roman Catholic hierarchy was restored in England. The Test Acts (denying public office to those who refused to take communion in an Anglican church) were finally repealed in 1829, and university religious tests were abolished in the 1870s and 1880s.

While discrimination on the grounds of sex or race became illegal in the 1970s, discrimination on religious grounds was not an offense until the Human Rights Act 1998 came into force in 2000, with the aim to "give further effect" in U.K. law to the rights contained in the European Convention of Human Rights. There is no requirement for religions to register in England, although they may apply for charitable status, which confers certain tax benefits. Generally speaking, legal restrictions on religious activity are confined to restrictions of the criminal code.

England has witnessed occasional outbreaks of anti-Semitism, some organized "anticult" activity since the 1970s, and some more serious tensions with the Islamic community since 1989, when Ayatullah Khomeini issued a fatwa ordering Muslims to kill the novelist Salman Rushdie following the publication of Satanic Verses. Islamophobia became further pronounced after 9/11 and the July 7, 2005, London Transport bombings.

Although established, the C of E does not have a complete monopoly of privileges or power. Prison, hospital, and military chaplains now include some other faiths. About a third of state schools are faith schools; two thirds of these are C of E and most of the rest Catholic, but there are a few other state-funded schools (mainly Jewish, Muslim, Sikh, and, since 2008, Hindu).

It has been argued that the C of E tended during most of the 20th century to provide a discreet cultural and ceremonial backdrop to English life rather than a strong religious presence. It was generally assumed that one's religious identity was C of E, unless one made a clear statement to the contrary. Toward the end of the century, however, a number of controversial issues resulted in the church becoming a more conspicuous part of public life. First, its theological credentials began to be questioned, with the publication of the Bishop of Woolwich's radical Honest to God in 1963. The questioning reached a crescendo in 1984, when, apparently as a sign of divine retribution, York Minster was struck by lightning 3 days after David Jenkins, well known for his allegedly heterodox beliefs, was consecrated there as Bishop of Durham.

In 1982, Archbishop Runcie annoyed Mrs. Thatcher, the then prime minister, by praying for the Argentinean as well as the British dead during a thanksgiving service at the end of the Falklands war. Furthermore, the church, popularly characterized as the Tory Party at prayer, began to concern itself with social reform. In 1985, Faith in the City, a report authored by the Archbishop of Canterbury's Commission on Urban Priority Areas, was accused of "Marxist theology" for blaming the policies of the Thatcher government for much of the spiritual and economic poverty of Britain's inner cities.

Meanwhile, gender issues have been dominating the C of E's internal politics. When the General Synod voted in favor of the ordination of women priests in 1992, several hundred clergy left the church in protest, many being accepted by the Roman Catholic Church, even if they were married. Subsequent disagreements over the role of women and homosexuality have been threatening to split the wider Anglican Communion.

Nonetheless, despite some very real challenges resulting from its religious diversity, when compared with other countries, England can be seen as entertaining a relatively tolerant pluralism. One finds little of the fervent fundamentalisms and enthusiasm common in the United States and other parts of the world, and despite the existence of a National Secular Society, the British Humanist Association, and the widely publicized pronouncements of the biologist Richard Dawkins, neither does one find much of the fierce antireligious sentiments that exist in parts of continental Europe.

modernity stems from the Enlightenment as well as the antirational Romantic movement that followed it. Many, if not all, of the processes of modernization, such as industrialization, urbanization, establishment of democratic governance and civic society, and social and educational reforms have their roots and legitimacy in Enlightenment thought. The French Revolution, with its stress on human freedom, equality, and fraternity, viewed itself as the daughter of the Enlightenment. However, so did the ideas of the absolutism of the state over the individual, centralism, and reforms enforced “from above”; the belief in the automatic progress of mankind; and the nationalistic, fascistic, and totalitarian evils of the 20th century.

Though the “enlightened” 18th century referred to itself as the Age of Reason, the later term Enlightenment (lumières in French, illuminismo in Italian, die Aufklärung in German) meant the spread of a new, rational, scientific, and humanistic light. Enlightened thinkers and rulers tried to transform the ancien régime through revolution, but the term originally signified more of an atonement or gradual process of reform than a radical shift in power. The confident, rationalistic rectification of past faults, “superstitions,” and “fanaticism” was to apply to everything, from political and economic reforms, to the reconstruction of “true” Christianity or a “natural” religion, and even to technical innovations.

Historians widely agree that there were two main sources for this reformism. First, whereas 17th-century thinkers like Descartes and Spinoza had established rationalism as a system of scientific thought, their disciples took it further and made it a tool for understanding and redressing the wrongs of society as a whole. Enlightened philosophes in France and elsewhere thus criticized despotism and the incompetence of the perpetual dominance, the brutality, and the religious intolerance of the confessionalist age, which in their eyes was conduct incompatible with “true” Christian ethics. Others criticized the social embeddedness of human institutions in the name of a “natural” law or religion: They wanted to liberate society from the influence of the church and the market from its artificial restrictions (reducing the impact of Adam Smith’s “invisible hand”). Second, criticism of the past grew stronger through evaluation

ENLIGHTENMENT

In the late 17th century and the 18th century, enlightened thought and reforms, which represented a sharp break with the preceding Baroque period and age of confessionalism, occurred in various European countries and worldwide and developed everywhere relatively undisturbed until the French Revolution (1789). Our concept of of “other,” non-Western societies, distinct from anything known in Europe or the Mediterranean, the Bible, and classical antiquity. Chinese and Indian societies thus became (idealized) models of “how to do things better”—for example, positing a mandarin as the archetype of the virtuous atheist. For Enlightenment thinkers, reason alone, emancipated from all its historical and institutional restraints, was capable of judging what is the “right” form of social organization or ultimate course of development humankind should take.

Although cosmopolitan in nature and clearly led by the French, the Enlightenment was not one single movement. On the contrary, it was polycentric in nature and comprised various “national” streams that differed in both theoretical thinking and social applications. English, Scottish, and Dutch intellectuals and even immigrants to these liberal countries established learned societies and a free press, contributing to the rapid development of public thought. They called for the liberation of humanity, separation of powers, and establishment of a “true” religion. These new ideas were well suited to Protestant virtues and popular interests, so even though this type of radical freethinking died out early, it still had a significant impact on practical everyday life. In England and its North American colonies, and in Holland, the Enlightenment transformed itself into the struggle to achieve progress, industrialization, and democratic social organization from the bottom up, with an emphasis on individual endeavor. Even the American War of Independence, led by the enlighteners, can be seen as this kind of individualist, civic, and capitalist movement. With respect to religion, radical critics of the revealed religion (i.e., church-based Christianity) were not around for very long, and most societies followed liberal versions of Protestantism, which eventually led to secularization, though there were some counterrevivals, especially in the United States, known as the Great Awakenings.

The situation in most of continental Europe was altogether different. There was a large popular consciousness in France, but the prerevolutionary Bourbons pursued an absolutistic and centralist form of rule, and the Catholic Church opposed many reforms. Consequently, in France, the Enlightenment manifested itself in the form of critical intellectual and popular debates, in salons, literature, and the media (influenced by Voltaire and Montesquieu and later by D’Alembert, Beccaria, Condorcet, Diderot, d’Holbach, Rousseau, and others), which challenged the top powers and ultimately culminated in bloody revolution. Religion was a crucial element in this, as reformers and revolutionists opposed Catholic dominance, even though the great majority of them were Catholics. During the Revolution (1789–1799), they established religious freedom and “reformed” the church in accordance with their own views (popularly elected priests and bishops, nationalization of church property, dissolution of monastic orders, etc.). During the most radical period of the Jacobin dictatorship, there was even an attempt to establish a new religion, the cult of the Supreme Being (Être suprême). However, this does not mean that the earlier years of the French Enlightenment were necessarily anti-Catholic. Although some thinkers, like Voltaire, were avowedly antichurch in attitude (but he himself also stressed the church’s role in upholding morals and disciplining the masses), there were many Catholic abbés among the contributors to the Encyclopédie, the grand synthesis of all human knowledge.

Other European countries, such as Austria, Sweden, Russia, and German and Mediterranean states tended to have a less developed public sphere, so new ideas were usually introduced by the rulers in cooperation with small cliques of intellectuals and bureaucrats. This was the case of Frederick the Great of Prussia (ruling 1740–1786), Maria Theresa and Joseph II of Austria (1740–1780 and 1780–1790, respectively), and Peter the Great and Catherine the Great of Russia (1682–1725 and 1762–1796, respectively). In the Catholic countries of southern and central Europe, the introduction of Enlightenment reforms was greatly inspired by L. A. Muratori (ethical Christianity) and I. Febronius (national Catholic churches). No radical antichurch attitudes such as those in revolutionary France emerged, but the vehemence of state rulers in these regions was such that it eventually led to the Pope’s dissolution of the Jesuit Order (1773) and to many changes in Catholic religiosity directed at the “ethicization” of Catholicism. Such reforms usually involved establishing religious tolerance and applying restrictions to religious orders, Baroque rituals, and feasts, which the reformers viewed as “superstitions.”

Throughout Europe, the Enlightenment led to the establishment or extension of religious tolerance and a reduction of the influence of the clergy and churches in general, excluding them altogether from a growing range of affairs that came to be perceived as purely secular, and to a growing sense that religion belongs mainly to the private sphere. At the same time, enlighteners established universal popular education, which led to a massive rise in literacy and a notable increase in the circulation of books and newspapers, wherein religious themes were replaced with secular topics dealing with the cultivation of knowledge and popular entertainment. Some historians believe that as a result, the Enlightenment widened the intellectual gap between rulers and the people, the educated and uneducated, but the numbers of the latter were greatly slashed by the spread of education, reading culture, media, and a general idea of progress driven by reason, science, and humanity. However, such progressivism also meant that society shifted from being “heteroreferential,” paying respect to the “other” (i.e., God and His laws, values, and norms), to being “autoreferential,” capable of establishing its own laws, rules, and institutions.

The Enlightenment has traditionally been seen as a starting point for European and subsequent worldwide secularization, with the probable exception of the United States alone. However, this assumption is nowadays widely questioned, as western Europe remains the only territory where an “out-of-church movement” occurred, according to some, compensated by other forms of religiosity/spirituality. Jose Casanova noted that secularization emerged as a self-fulfilling prophecy in Europe, legitimizing the “modern” knowledge regime, which in a global perspective was a unique situation. The sociologist Shmuel N. Eisenstadt has therefore espoused a “multiple modernities” thesis, which disputes the automatic connection between modernization and secularization and shows that while some versions of modernization involved secularization (as in post-Enlightenment Europe), others certainly did not.

ENUMA ELISH

The Babylonian epic poem Enuma Elish (Akkadian, “When on high . . .,” the first two words of the text) is one of several creation stories from ancient Mesopotamia and describes how the principal city god of Babylon, Marduk, defeats a threat of chaos in the form of Goddess Tiamat (Akkadian “Sea”) and establishes his kingship over the pantheon. Although the historical and political circumstances under which the poem was composed are not entirely clear, many scholars date the Enuma Elish to the 12th century BCE under King Nebuchadnezzar I (ca. 1125–1104 BCE), a time of nationalistic revival. Indeed, the exaltation of Marduk to the head of the pantheon in the Enuma Elish is thought to have direct political parallels in Babylonia at the time of its composition; as divine patron of the city of Babylon, Marduk’s success in battle, ability to reorder the cosmos, and ascension to absolute kingship reflects the ideal image of the Babylonian king, and the many copies of the poem that have been discovered throughout Mesopotamia dating to the first millennium BCE attest to its importance in imagining both divine and human kingship. The Enuma Elish also apparently played a prominent role in the Babylonian Akitu festival, a 12-day New Year’s event celebrated annually.

The Enuma Elish is composed of six tablets. In Tablet I, we are introduced to the creatrix of the gods, Tiamat, and her husband Apsu, who wants to kill their children. Ea foils the plan by killing Apsu, and a furious Tiamat responds with a threat to undo the established divine order.

Marduk, Ea's son, rises to face the threat in exchange for a place as the eternal, supreme leader of the gods/goddesses. The deities surrender their authority to Marduk, after which he is proclaimed king in Tablet IV and given the authority to create and destroy. The battle ensues, and Marduk inflates Tiamat with a gust of wind, pierces her stomach with an arrow, smashes her head with a mace, and divides her corpse in half—one part becomes the heavens, the other is fashioned into the earth. In Tablet V, Marduk organizes the heavenly bodies and the cosmos generally, and in Tablet VI, another deity (Qingu) is killed, and his blood is used to fashion a human being. The gods then build Marduk a temple, Esagila, in Babylon, and a celebration feast is held. Marduk's installation as divine king is complete, and Marduk is given 50 names, symbolizing a coalescence of divine power under Marduk. Many elements of the epic pattern in the Enuma Elish (e.g., defeat of threat/sea by a new, younger male deity; reordering of the cosmos; erection of a temple and a celebration feast, etc.) are also found in the Ugaritic materials (particularly the Baal Epic) and in the Hebrew Bible.

to and influenced by cultural and hence spiritual perceptions. Questions about the engagement of religious traditions with the environment have been triggered by what has been called the “spoliation of nature debate,” initiated by the American historian Lynn White. In a 1967 article, White argued that the Judeo-Christian tradition, in which God created nature for humanity's benefit, establishes the dualism of man and nature. Since then, in a context where the “environmental crisis” has gradually become a central theme in Western societies and a foremost issue in national and international public policies, all major religions have taken up the controversy by reexamining the relationship of humankind and nature in their respective roles and by questioning the utilitarian paradigm. In parallel, religious ecology has emerged as a new trend in environmental policy and as a field of academic scholarship.

The Dualist Paradigm

Even before the emergence of modern environmentalism as a mainstream movement in the West, late-19th-century American naturalists such as John Muir and Aldo Leopold challenged the notion prevailing in Western culture that humanity was apart from, and not part of, nature. Leopold claimed that certain biblical passages had a negative impact on the environment because conservation was incompatible with the Abrahamic concept of land regarded as a commodity belonging to man. One biblical text he quoted to support this view is Genesis 1:28: “God blessed them and God said to them: ‘Be fertile and increase, fill the earth and master it; and rule the fish of the sea, the birds of the sky, and all the living creatures that creep on earth.’” The American poet Gary Snyder followed this stream of thought in the 1950s and was inspirational to the founders of the deep ecology movement of the late 1960s and early 1970s, in particular Arne Naess, a philosophy professor at the University of Oslo. Naess criticized Cartesian or scientific rational philosophy and the Judeo-Christian tradition, which he saw as justifying the subsuming of nature to man's destructive aims. Subsequent proponents of this approach, including New Age, neo-Pagan, and neo-Shamanist movements, have argued that the perception of nature as sacred is central to non-Western and non-Abrahamic traditions, especially

ENVIRONMENT

The environment, understood as ecosystems, does not consist only of physical attributes; it is subjected indigenous cultures where people perceive themselves as part of nature and adhere to views of the cosmos where this split does not exist. According to this argument, traditional ways of living, including those that practice custodianship of the natural world, have been subjugated to a dualistic approach that in many cases accompanied colonialism. To replace the lack of critical spiritual connectivity between people, nature, and landscapes, radical ecology calls for a “new environmental paradigm” or an ecosophy—that is, a philosophical/ecological total view inspired by naturalism, Buddhism, and other nondualistic philosophies.

Alliance Between World Religions and Environmentalists

In the context of the dualist controversy, some Christian churches began to address growing environmental and social challenges. They also responded to a pressing call for involvement on the part of less radical environmentalists who sought to gain the support of moral institutional authorities in view of grounding environmental issues in ethics. As of the mid-1970s, the World Council of Churches was the first religious organization to articulate a theological reflection on environmental destruction and social inequities around the centrality of the notion of creation and life. In 1992, at the time of the U.N. Earth Summit in Rio, the World Council of Churches facilitated a gathering of Christian leaders that issued a “Letter to the Churches” calling for attention to pressing eco-justice concerns. In addition to major conferences held by Christian churches, several interreligious meetings have been held, and various religious movements have engaged with the issue of environment. Some of these include the interreligious gatherings on the environment in Assisi in 1984 under the sponsorship of the World Wildlife Fund (WWF) and in 1986 under the auspices of the Vatican. For its part, the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) has established an Interfaith Partnership for the Environment. Since 1995, an Alliance of Religion and Conservation has been active in England, while the National Religious Partnership for the Environment has organized Jewish and Christian groups around this issue in the United States. Religious groups have also contributed to the drafting of the Earth Charter. This new alliance of world religions and environmental conservation has resulted in culture-specific religious concepts of ecology and nature being increasingly mainstreamed in national and international environmental policies, in particular in the field of biodiversity conservation.

Religious leaders and laypersons have been increasingly speaking out for protection of the environment. Environmental activism is an important emphasis of the major new movements of engaged Buddhism in recent decades, particularly in Korea and Japan. In 1989, the 14th Dalai Lama proposed in his Nobel Peace Prize acceptance speech that Tibet should become an “international ecological reserve.” Rabbi Ishmar Schorsch of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York has frequently spoken on the critical state of the environment. The Greek Orthodox Patriarch Bartholomew has sponsored several seminars to highlight environmental destruction in the Black Sea and along the Danube River, calling such examples of negligence “ecological sin.” From the Islamic perspective, Seyyed Hossein Nasr has written and spoken widely on the sacred nature of the environment since the 1970s. In the Christian world, along with the efforts of the Protestant community, the Catholic Church has issued several pastoral letters since the 1990s. Pope John Paul II wrote a message for the World Day of Peace, on January 1, 1990, titled “The Ecological Crisis: A Common Responsibility.” In August 2000, at a historic gathering of more than 1,000 religious leaders at the United Nations for the Millennium World Peace Summit of Religious and Spiritual Leaders, the environment was a major topic of discussion.

Revisiting Traditions

With the aim of grounding environmental ethics in their respective faiths and traditions, institutions or individuals in various Christian churches and several streams of Judaism and Islam have undertaken to reexamine sacred texts, classical sources, normative legal traditions, historical precedents, and the writings of past religious thinkers. The concept of man’s “stewardship” over natural resources has commonly emerged from these undertakings. However, various currents among each of the three Abrahamic faiths have expressed contrasting positions vis-à-vis the issue. In the Islamic world, Shi'ite scholarship on the environment developed as early as the 1970s based on reinterpretation and adaptation of traditions. Inspired by these precursors, in the 1990s, Sunnī scholarship on religion and environment took opposition to trends of political Islam that reject the environmentalist approach as West inspired. In Judaism, debates are ongoing about the compatibility of the position of classical thought with recent international or interfaith texts that refer to nature as sacred. Some scholars of Judaism and the environment argue that there is an irreconcilable difference between the environmental outlook of Hasidism, based on a view of God as immanent, and that of the Mitnagdim, who believe in the dualistic nature of God. Christian Creationists and other literalists, for their part, have refused to engage with the issue.

Academic scholarship has followed and accompanied religious scholarship. The most noted initiative has been a 3-year intensive conference series, titled "Religions of the World and Ecology," organized at the Center for the Study of World Religions at Harvard Divinity School to examine the varied ways in which human-Earth relations have been conceived in the world's religious traditions. From 1996 to 1998, the series of 10 conferences examined the traditions of Judaism, Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Jainism, Buddhism, Daoism, Confucianism, Shinto, and indigenous religions. It brought together more than 700 international scholars of the world's religions as well as environmental activists and grassroots leaders. Since 1998, an ongoing Forum on Religion and Ecology has been organized to continue the research, education, and outreach begun at these earlier conferences.

Finally, grassroots environmental movements have developed in many Third World nations—some inspired by deep ecology, others by mainstream environmentalism. They have often stated that their claims for social and environmental justice necessitate a domestic and international recognition of their nondualistic visions of the cosmos and nonutilitarian views of the relationship between humankind and nature.

EQUALITY

Equality is a term used in the context of religion to describe fair treatment, personal rights, community membership, and privileges in a particular context. Equality is not a simple concept, since its definition and application vary between different countries and cultures. Equality in religion is intertwined with political, societal, and economic facets of culture as well.

Genders

Discussions about gender equality in religion typically focus on empowering and alleviating oppression of women in traditional religions. Feminist theologians in developed nations advocate for gender-inclusive language, equal leadership roles for women, and a celebration of feminine spirituality in traditional rituals. Many religious traditions—Islam, Christianity, Buddhism, and Judaism—face challenges related to women's leadership and involvement.

One example of the struggle for equality for women in Christianity is the battle over female ordination to the priesthood in Catholicism. Women are allowed to serve as nuns and lay leaders but cannot enter the priesthood. In evangelical churches globally, women are often prohibited from assuming public-speaking roles, preaching, or assuming pastoral roles, though, of course, there are exceptions. Conservative scholars argue that women are equal in value but not equal in function in the Christian church. In China, however, women administer one third of the pastoral roles in registered churches. In Judaism, feminist scholars have advocated for the inclusion of prayers written by women and a reinterpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures to make women more visible within the traditional history.

Islamic practice and laws toward women vary depending on whether the setting is a Muslim-majority or Muslim-minority country. Islamic women in Cairo, Egypt, have for some time worked in professional offices and could choose whether to wear a veil. Women who are faithful to Islam in Iran have fewer legal rights and face increased restrictions in their daily lives. According to Leila Ahmed, women understand Islam from an oral, familial tradition that focuses on equality and mercy, while men follow a textual, rigid interpretation of the same sacred text. There are abuses and violence toward women that exist in tribal areas of Muslim-majority countries that are not consistent with Islam or the teachings of the Qur'an as a whole.

For the global population beyond the developed nations, women are more concerned about equity—that is, fair treatment and access to necessary resources for daily life. Groups such as the Circle for African Women represent the efforts of Third World women to work out feminism in order to address those needs that are most relevant to women in their context. Advocacy by women and for women in their own contexts, such as the Dalit women of India, is becoming increasingly common.

Ecofeminism is a burgeoning movement with strong female involvement. Balance and interconnectedness are words used in this philosophy to represent the concept of equality between people, nature, and all living creatures. Women's organizations in minority religious traditions, such as the Baha'i Faith, have worked to advance equality for women in the areas of education, literacy, and increased skills for income and greater attention to gender roles in indigenous communities.

Races

Equality among races exists to varying degrees in religious traditions and secular society. With the advent of the civil rights movement in the United States, religious leaders had to confront obvious inequalities in racial participation. Christianity, according to the Bible, offers equality to all races under one church, although Christian history does not always typify this principle in practice. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. observed that the 11 o'clock hour for Christian worship on Sunday mornings was the time when Americans were most segregated. Many of the early activists in efforts toward the abolition of slavery were religious persons, driven by theological convictions for racial equality, a theme very important later in the civil rights movement.

Racial tensions exist in global settings, which also influence religious life. For example, the Pomaks, a religious minority of Bulgarian-speaking Muslims, are dispersed throughout various countries and have a complex identity as a community. Individuals may feel more affinity to Turks or to Bulgarians, Christians, or Muslims. There are significant political and social implications for this diverse identity. The struggles in the Pomak community represent racial dimensions of language, religion, and culture that have an impact on equal access politically and economically.

Classes and Caste

Classes and castes are a significant part of the discussion related to race and religious community. India is typically the center of discussion, with its highly structured caste system that exists in society, buttressed by traditional religious concepts of a stratified social order. Traditionally, persons of a lower caste in society may not receive equal benefits and privileges of citizenship in the country as a whole, though the government of India has gone to great lengths to promote caste equality, including the provision of reserved positions in government employment and university admissions and reserved seats in both state and national legislative bodies. Hindu religious groups in India have also removed their restrictions against allowing persons of lower castes to enter temples.

Issues of equality between economic groups in India parallel socioeconomic disparities in other global communities. Latin American religions struggle with issues of equality and social class related to land ownership, education, and general income level. Resources are out of balance in countries such as Chile and Mexico, which affects religious institutions such as the Catholic Church. Political and religious power heavily influence each other in a society where inequality is the norm. Adherents of Liberation Theology within the Catholic Church have taken a strong stand in favor of economic equality in Latin America, whereas many leaders in the traditional hierarchy have defended the status quo.

Sexualities

Equality among sexualities may be one of the most controversial concepts in traditional religions in this century. Evidence for this claim lies in the heated religious debates related to same-sex marriage and ordination of homosexual priests. Protestant Christian denominations have experienced significant schisms from divergent theological views and their subsequent practical application. The Episcopal Church in America, with ties to the Church of England and the worldwide Anglican communion, selected an openly gay bishop, Gene Robinson, in 2003, and an openly lesbian bishop, Mary Glasspool, in 2010. The ripples of these decisions have led to major divisions in the tradition; many African Anglican churches, for instance, have adamantly opposed these choices. Other traditions are facing questions of equality for gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered persons in their congregations and religious bodies. A highly politicized issue, gay marriage, is no longer controversial in certain European countries with a Protestant Christian majority—notably Denmark and the Netherlands. Strong Catholic countries, such as Italy and Spain, however, do not recognize the marriages of same-sex couples, given the strong prohibition from the church. Some Jews and Muslims believe that homosexuality contradicts teachings in their traditions as well. Battles regarding equality in the area of sexuality in traditional religions will continue to be fought in future decades.

Handicaps/Disabilities

Social equality for disabled persons in religion intersects with political and economic factors. One dramatic example in the United States was the inclusion in the 1990 Americans with Disabilities Act of persons with AIDS or those who are HIV positive. Faith groups of various backgrounds joined in support of the original bill, all fueled by a common compassion for suffering individuals. Religious bodies brought a great deal of support to the legislation. Similar to civil rights involvement, religious beliefs by traditionalists or fringe groups emphasize the equal value of all human life.

The World Council of Churches established the Ecumenical Disability Advocates Network to help churches and organizations that advocate for disabled persons in global contexts. They are particularly concerned with disabled persons in the midst of war and human rights violations. Religious leaders in Buddhism advocate for the equality of persons who suffer from disease or handicaps.

Judaism calls for compassion for all persons as made “in the image of God.” Older interpretations of Hebrew Scriptures attributed disability as retribution for sin. Islam also teaches equality of persons, despite any disability, since all of humanity is derived from one couple, Adam and Eve. Christianity is patterned after the example of Jesus Christ, who focused his ministry on the rejected persons in society. All three traditions emphasize mercy and compassion for all people, without prejudice.

Minority Religious Groups

Equality for minority religious groups involves the discussion of religious liberty. The United Nations issues international laws to protect the practice of any religion, whether majority or minority. Human rights conventions have prohibited religious discrimination but recognize that religions often fail to uphold international declarations of liberty. Even in as diverse a country as India, Muslims, the largest religious minority, claimed that the Hindu nationalist party, the Bharatiya Janata Party, discriminated against them during their years in power, when they led the national coalition government from 1998 to 2004. The continent of Africa has nations that are predominantly Christian and others that are predominantly Muslim. Nontraditional religions tend to be more accepting of plurality and equal practice of various faiths. Minority religious groups have an impact on traditional religions and continue to grow in almost every country in the world.

Conclusion

Historical accounts in traditional and minority religions demonstrate conflicting accounts of equality and inequality. From the perspective of disadvantaged persons, inequality precludes opportunities for equal access, while the privileged view equality as commonplace. Most religions hold values and beliefs that acknowledge the equality of all persons, irrespective of gender, race, sexuality, caste, or religious preference. As theologians observe, religious doctrine diverges at times in practice or interpretation. Battles for religious equality continue in a wide array of countries, traditions, and peoples around the world. Such battles demand analyses of different facets of complex political, economic, historical, and social issues.

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

Known as Spanish Guinea when it was a colony, Equatorial Guinea consists of three small islands and two larger islands alongside a small area of mainland West Africa. Two main cultural heritages exist within Equatorial Guinea: the Fang ethnic group residing on the mainland and the Bubi on the island of Bioko. The population is at least nominally 87% Roman Catholic, though syncretism is largely evident in the country. Protestant Christians and independent Christian organizations constitute another 6% of the populace, and adherents to Islam and the Baha'i Faith constitute an additional 1%. The Muslim community of Equatorial Guinea was growing rapidly at the beginning of the 21st century, largely due to growing numbers of immigrants from West Africa and the Middle East. Much of the remaining population practices traditional African religious traditions, including ancestor worship and animist beliefs. Sorcerers are held in high esteem in Equatorial Guinea and are recognized as leaders of local religious communities.

Tribal wars that ravaged the area in the 12th and 13th centuries led to the domination of the Fang on the coastal mainland until they were pushed farther inland by the British, French, and Dutch slave traders. Bioko served as an important center for the slave trade and would be acquired by Spain in the 1700s from Portugal. Though ostensibly a Spanish colony, Equatorial Guinea was ruled by a British administration until 1858 when Spain's control of the islands began, followed by the country's governance of the mainland in 1926. Following the conclusion of the Spanish Civil War in 1939, the Spanish spent a great deal more energy developing the area of Equatorial Guinea. The country declared independence in 1968, and violence, economic devastation, and brutal dictatorship soon followed. During this time, the Catholic Church, already established in the country, became a vigorous voice of dissent for the beleaguered populace. This pursuit is more dangerous and important since the two dictators who have ruled Equatorial Guinea since its independence—Francisco Macias Nguema, until he was overthrown in 1979 by Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, who was in power at the time of this entry's writing—have been recognized as two of the worst civil rights abusers in Africa.

This historical association between the Catholic Church and the country's government has led to an unstable relationship between the two at the beginning of the 21st century. The church's role as a proponent of civil rights is recognized by the government, and it has responded by emphatically calling on religious leaders to stay out of politics. Still, the government has had to bow to popular sentiment and now recognizes Catholic holidays, and in a 1992 presidential decree, preferential treatment was granted to both the Roman Catholic Church and the Reformed Church of Equatorial Guinea. Even non-Catholic Equatoguineans are expected to attend Catholic services, and Catholicism is encouraged for those seeking advancement in government positions. Catholic religious education is also a part of the public school curriculum.

At the beginning of the 21st century, a great wealth of oil was discovered in Equatorial Guinea, which led to its being considered one of the fastest growing world economies in 2004. Unfortunately, 70% of the population lives below the poverty line, and the existing government has used the newfound wealth to further entrench itself. The country is now one of the largest African oil suppliers south of the Sahara desert but is a classic case of the “resource curse,” where very few enjoy the benefits while the majority suffers.

ERITREA

Eritrea is a nation in the Horn of Africa, bordered by Sudan, Ethiopia, and Djibouti and by the Red Sea. In Eritrea, the religious majority are Orthodox Christian, while the second largest religious population is Muslim. According to official 2002 census figures, the religious composition of Eritrea was as follows: about 64% Christian (58% Orthodox, 5% Roman Catholic, and less than 1% Protestant), 36% Muslim, and less than 1% traditional believer or ethnoreligionist. While the greater proportion of the country is Christian, with an estimated population of more than 3 million (3,250,849) in 2009, the Muslim population is almost 2 million (1,854,000).

Christians and Muslims are not evenly distributed geographically around the country. Christians are the majority in only two of the six administrative regions in the central highlands, while Muslims are predominant in the lowlands, the remaining four regions hugging the coastline.

The geographic distribution for the two predominantly Christian provinces is as follows. In Debub, Christians constitute almost 89% (about 85% Orthodox, 4% Roman Catholic, and less than 1% Protestant) of the population, while 11% are Muslims and less than 1% are ethnoreligionists. The population in Maekel is 94% Christian (almost 89% Orthodox, 4% Roman Catholic, and more than 1% Protestant) and 5% Muslim.

In the lowlands, Muslims are the majority. Anseba comprises about 61% Muslims, 26% Orthodox, 13% Roman Catholic, less than 1% Protestant, and less than 1% ethnoreligionist. In Debubawi Keih Bahri, the population is approximately 62% Muslim, 36% Orthodox, 1% Roman Catholic, less than 1% Protestant, and less than 1% ethnoreligionist. Gash-Barka is composed of 63% Muslims, 31% Orthodox, 4% Roman Catholics, 1% ethnoreligionists, and 1% Protestants. Semenawi Keih Bahri is composed of 87% Muslims, 12% Orthodox, and less than 1% of Roman Catholics, Protestants, and ethnoreligionists.

The Ethiopian Orthodox Church has had a strong influence on the country. Historically, these populations, many of which are from the Amhara of the Shoa and Hagerge regions of Ethiopia, have controlled the political structures of the region. From religious beliefs to calendars and land distribution, the Orthodox Church had a great impact on society from the 1500s to the 1800s. As it aligned with the Ethiopian monarchy in the mid-1800s, the Orthodox Church played a central political role by divinely ordaining emperors and exacting taxes. In the 1950s, the Orthodox Church played an important role in the country's efforts for political independence. During the 1970s and 1980s, both Christians and Muslims were highly involved in the struggle for liberation.

Muslim influence was felt beginning in the early eighth century CE. Trade and migration from the Arabian Peninsula built up the influence of Islam.

In the 19th century, missionary activity by Sufi brotherhoods extended the reach of Islam. By the end of the century, most lowland groups were Muslim. After enjoying a period of proliferation in cultural institutions and communal life in the earlier part of the 20th century, Muslims experienced oppression and disintegration under Ethiopian rule as Eritrean autonomy decreased. Since liberation in 1991, Muslim communal life has been revitalizing itself at a cautious pace.

ESTONIA

Despite being a captive nation under the rule of the officially atheistic Soviet regime for nearly half of the 20th century, the Baltic country of Estonia (population 1.34 million) has historically been a Christian nation. Its first encounters with Christianity date to the 11th century, when Orthodox missionaries first appeared in the eastern areas closest to the present-day Russian state. However, it was the northern crusade of the 13th century, with the twin goals of territorial conquest and the conversion of Europe's last pagans, that brought Roman Catholicism to the Estonian lands. While German knights conquered the northeastern tribes, German priests baptized them and administered the faith during the later Middle Ages. In the 16th century, however, the region's rulers broke with the Church and embraced Lutheranism, which became the principal religious confession of both the German minority and the Estonian majority. While the Germans who dominated the region left Estonia (and neighboring Latvia) during World War II, the Russians, who began arriving in large numbers in the 19th century, supplanted the Germans as Estonia's principal minority and brought the Orthodox faith with them.

For half a century, religious life in Estonia was suppressed by the Soviet regime, whose arrival in 1940 to 1941 resulted in the arrest, exile, or outright murder of thousands of people whom the new authorities regarded with suspicion and hostility—including dozens of Lutheran pastors. Partly as a result of the Soviet regime's draconian policies, church membership declined in Estonia, which today is one of Europe's most secularized countries.

The Estonian state today has no official church, and the constitution provides for full freedom of religion; yet only 30% of the Estonian population profess any religious faith at all. The main profession of the country's ethnic Estonians (who constitute nearly 70% of the population today) is the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church, with an estimated 180,000 members (less than 13% of the total population).

While most ethnic Estonian believers are affiliated with the Lutheran Church, most of the country's ethnic Russians, constituting about a quarter of the population, are Orthodox. In Estonia, Orthodoxy been divided since 1944, when the leaders of the autocephalous Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church (EAOC), which was canonically subordinate to the Patriarchate of Constantinople, fled Estonia and settled in Sweden. Meanwhile, Orthodoxy in Soviet-occupied Estonia came under the control of the Moscow Patriarchate. With the restoration of Estonian independence in 1991, a struggle between the EAOC and the Diocese of the Moscow Patriarchate immediately ensued, with each claiming to be the legal successor to the pre-war Estonian Orthodox Church and, thus, the legal inheritor of its property. While the Moscow-based church, now registered as the Estonian Orthodox Church of the Moscow Patriarchate, ended up being the loser of the struggle, there can be little doubt that the Russian-language Orthodox congregations are stronger and more influential than the Estonian congregations of the EAOC.

Among the other religious groups in Estonia are a small Jewish community of about 2,500 people, residing mostly in Tallinn, as well as communities of Old Believers (an Orthodox splinter whose adherents fled to Estonia to escape tsarist persecution), Catholics, Baptists, Methodists, and other religious associations. American evangelical religious influence is felt in Estonia in the form of its small communities of Pentecostals and Jehovah's Witnesses.

ETHICS

Ethics may be defined as the knowledge of moral values and duties or as the study of the ideal human character, actions, and ends. The term may also refer to a treatise on morals. Every religious tradition advocates high standards of human behavior, and in that sense, all religious communities have a moral component. The concept of “ethics,” however, emerges from the Western philosophic tradition. For this reason, this entry will first consider the development of this idea in Western philosophy and then explore the parallel forms of moral reasoning in the diverse religious traditions.

Aristotle, whose Nicomachean Ethics is surely one of the earliest treatises on the subject, thought of ethics as a “practical” science. In this sense, ethics is distinguished from “theoretical” inquiries such as physics as well as from “productive” sciences such as sculpture. In comparison with the former, ethics focuses on acts performed in view of a goal or an end (a telos). The acts chosen may hit or miss the mark; also, human beings are able to choose better and worse goals. The distinguishing characteristic of the kinds of action of interest in ethics, then, is that these deal with things that “could have been different.” By contrast, the distinction between ethics and the productive sciences is that the goal is not to make a “finished” product. Rather, the goal is to live in a certain way, so that the end of ethics is itself found in the living of a good life.

This means that the science or knowledge sought in the study of ethics is, in some sense, a moving target. Furthermore, it implies that ethics cannot, or at least should not, seek to establish certainties of the type aimed at in physics. As Aristotle had it, a reasonable person does not demand more certainty than is possible, given a certain subject matter. The only thing certain in ethics is that one must grant the possibility that there is such a thing as good behavior; the inquiry is therefore about the ways in which human beings might distinguish this kind from other sorts.

Theories of Ethics

Textbooks in ethics often begin with a review of various theories about the nature of moral judgment. Given Aristotle's comments, one might understand these as attempts to generalize about the kinds of action that accord with a good life. All theories of ethics, including Aristotle's, rest on the notion that “good” actions are those that conform to the living of a good life. In this sense, all theories might be described as teleological—that is, they have to do with action that is purposive or intentionally aimed at attaining an end.

Nevertheless, some theories of ethics move from this descriptive point to various kinds of prescriptions. Aristotle himself proposed to think about moral action in connection with the cultivation of virtues, understood as habits or dispositions to act in ways that could be considered excellent. The presupposition of such thinking is that one has already been trained through living in a particular familial and social setting to make judgments about right and wrong. One can then proceed to think about the kinds of behavior that characterize courageous action, self-control, and the like.

Other theorists proceed in ways that differ from Aristotle's. “Consequentialists,” for example, advance a prescription of the following form:

Always act in the way that will bring about the best results. This suggests that the form of a good life is one in which human beings, over time, try to do those things that achieve a certain kind of outcome. In the most familiar forms of consequentialism, this outcome is one that may be deemed useful or in accord with a notion of utility. So Jeremy Bentham wrote that human beings should always seek to maximize pleasure and to minimize pain. This, he said, accords with the judgment pronounced by wise people, who say that the greatest happiness of the greatest number is the foundation of morals and legislation. Refined by John Stuart Mill and others so as to distinguish higher from lower pleasures, and thus to make the general principle less subject to manipulation, utilitarianism resonates with some of the most common modes of thinking characteristic of modern societies. For example, when one reads of policy makers who speak about the costs and benefits of certain approaches to health care or of committing a state to military intervention, it seems likely that a version of the utility principle is in play. Advocates of utilitarianism continue to debate the best ways of calculating costs and benefits; also, there is an important difference between “act” utilitarians, who urge that the uniqueness of every situation rules against any generalizations regarding right action, and “rule” utilitarians, who argue that norms such as “do not kill” or “keep promises” represent a storehouse of wisdom regarding those actions that normally correlate with the greatest good for the greatest number. Finally, it is interesting to note that some utilitarians argue that since the experience of pleasures and pains is not limited to human beings, their theory narrows the gap between human beings and other animals. A theorist like Peter Singer, for example, avers that, on utilitarian grounds, one might speak of animals as having rights and ground judgments in favor of vegetarianism or against the use of animals in at least some experimental procedures.

In contrast to the utilitarians, some theorists emphasize the performance of duty and argue that the consequences of our acts are largely beyond human control. Two terms are commonly used in classifying this perspective: One may speak either of “formalist” theories or, more commonly, of a deontological (from Greek deon, “duty”) approach to ethics. The former term reflects the fact that theories of this type focus on the formal characteristics of acts: Certain kinds of acts simply have the character “right” or “wrong.” For example, to describe an act as “telling a lie” is to place it in a certain class or species; the acts in this species are wrong, and one’s duty is therefore to avoid lying, even if it seems that good consequences may follow. Immanuel Kant provides one of the best examples of this kind of theory, arguing that moral agents should always act in a way that is consistent with the highest standard. This standard, which Kant described as the Categorical Imperative, allows for no exceptions—though it does have several formulations, each of which proposes a somewhat different measure for human acts. “Always act, so as in your own person, to treat others as ends and not means only” is perhaps the most widely cited form of this ultimate norm. The emphasis on respect for the dignity of each and every person is widely held to articulate the basis for some of the most basic of contemporary moral standards—for example, that it is never right to use torture.

Just as utilitarians continue to debate a number of questions, so deontological theorists worry about various matters. For example, on the question “Are there ever exceptions to moral norms?” some advocates of a duty-based approach suggest that there are cases in which emergency conditions allow the use of torture or in which the possibility of saving lives allows for the telling of a lie. Those who take such an approach sometimes argue that the definition of torture or of lying actually builds in such exceptions. Others argue that the performance of duty requires one to acknowledge the importance of several different values and that these may come into conflict in particular cases. Thus, W. D. Ross suggested that there is a duty to avoid inflicting harm on other persons. At the same time, there is a duty to help others who are in need. These are best construed as prima facie obligations, meaning that they should always be considered in evaluating human acts. It is possible, though, that these duties come into conflict in a particular situation; for example, one might find it necessary to inflict bodily harm on a would-be criminal in order to protect a potential victim. In such cases, one’s actual duty involves overriding one of the prima facie obligations for purposes of dealing with specific circumstances.

Kant, it should be said, argued that no such conflicts ever occur and that speaking in the ways advocated by Ross leads to hopeless confusion. In particular, he thought that such reasoning is a way of allowing consequentialist considerations back into moral theory. For Kant, the problem is that once we allow consequences to determine our conduct, there is no clear way of establishing the limits of human behavior. Suppose we say that torture is allowed when necessary to protect the public interest, for example. Even if one argues that this is simply for exceptional cases or for extreme emergencies, “the public interest” seems an elastic category. Better to think like Bishop Joseph Butler, a British theorist, who suggested that God might be in a position to take consequences into account but that human beings are better off sticking with duty. Kant’s famous statement that the moral life consists in the performance of one’s duty as though it were a matter of divine commands expresses a similar notion.

Religion and Ethics

Comments by Butler and Kant raise another question of interest, not only to advocates of deontology but also to students of ethics generally. What is the role of religion in ethics? All religions engage in moral instruction. Whether one is thinking of the role of the notion of Torah (“instruction”) in Judaism, of the commandments to love God and one’s neighbor in Christianity, of filial piety in Confucianism, or of the “noble eightfold path” in Buddhism, we have ample evidence of the ways in which religious traditions attempt to guide human beings in matters of practice or “applied” ethics. Also, given that most religions tie good behavior to notions of flourishing or doing well in this world and to salvation or an afterlife, it seems clear that the great religious communities have an interest in motivating believers to do what is right. Perhaps the clearest examples of this interest are presented by religions in which a deity distributes rewards and punishments according to an individual or communal pattern of life. In the Gospel according to Matthew, those who failed to take care of persons in need “will go away into eternal punishment” and the “righteous into eternal life” (25:46). Or, in another biblical source (Deuteronomy 30:16), “If you obey the commandments of the Lord your God . . . then you shall live and become numerous, and the Lord your God will bless you.” But even in religions that place less emphasis on divine beings, individual and communal well-being can be tied to proper behavior. For example, Confucianism lays stress on the connection between the righteousness of rulers and communal prosperity, which follows from the “Mandate of Heaven,” a kind of impartial law governing relations between the ruler and his subjects.

If the promotion of substantive moral teachings and practice is a general feature of religions, what shall we say about moral theory? Do religions develop distinctive theories of ethics? Or do they reflect options similar to those developed by philosophers like Aristotle and Kant, and Bentham and Mill?

Biblical Religions

It is often said that certain religions, which by dint of shared emphases might be described as biblical or Abrahamic, advocate a special theory of ethics, usually described as a divine command theory of ethics. For example, Christianity, Judaism, and Islam all provide examples of thinking that suggest that ideal behavior involves human conformity to the directives or guidance of God, the Creator and Lord of all that exists. To live rightly simply is to obey the command to love God and neighbor, to observe the 613 commandments of the Torah, or to exert oneself in the task of bringing oneself and one’s world into a pattern of behavior consistent with the Shari’a or path approved by God. Indeed, Kant’s comment describing the moral life as the performance of duty as though it were a matter of obeying divine commands suggests the importance of this idea.

At the same time, Kant’s statement indicates the resonance of the notion of obedience to divine commands with at least one of the moral theories already outlined in this essay. To obey God’s commands is to do one’s duty; in that sense, Christianity, Judaism, and Islam advocate a version of deontology. For example, consider the saying attributed to Jesus in the Gospel according to Mark: “Who are my mother and my brothers” (i.e., Who is a part of my community)? And the answer is: “Whoever does the will of God is my brother and sister and mother” (4:34–35).

The trend toward deontology in biblical traditions certainly is very strong. Nevertheless, one may find strands in scriptures and other sources of authority that resonate with other moral theories. Thus, the great al-Shafi'i, one of the principal figures in the development of Islamic jurisprudence, wrote that the "declarations" of God in the Qur'an and in sound reports of the Prophet's words and deeds point human beings to a way of living that leads to happiness in this world and the next. In emphasizing the connections between obedience and happiness, al-Shafi'i certainly spoke in ways reminiscent of the utilitarians. In later generations, some theorists wrote in ways even more suggestive of this tendency, saying that considerations of public welfare (al-maslaha) should be taken into account by scholars asked to render opinions regarding the duties of Muslims in particular cases. Finally, there are important examples of intellectuals in each of the theistic religions who describe the moral life as the cultivation of virtues and the avoidance of vices. In this, they may be described as developing the perspective of Aristotle, though they typically present this in connection with an emphasis on divine law. For example, Thomas Aquinas thought of moral virtues such as courage or prudence as dispositions to behave in ways approved by God. Such ways accord with the end or goal for which human beings were created—that is, to enjoy the vision of God in a condition of eternal bliss. In this way, Thomas and others could combine elements of various theories within an overarching account of the end or telos of human existence.

An emphasis on divine commands probably does not suggest a moral theory independent of deontological or other approaches, then. It may suggest a distinctive theory of moral obligation—that is, biblical religions typically do try to answer the question "Why be moral?" in connection with beliefs about the nature and destiny of human beings or regarding the ultimate purpose of the world. For example, the Qur'an declares that God did not make the world for sport but rather as a way of distinguishing truth from falsehood or right from wrong (21:16–18). In other passages, the point of the world is to provide a kind of testing ground for human beings, to see which of them will honor God through the performance of good works. All things come from God and to God all will return—creatures act in accord with their nature when they give praise to their Creator; correlatively, their destiny involves judgment by God, the merciful and compassionate Lord. If one asks, "Why be moral?" then the answer is "because this is the purpose for which you exist" or "because proper moral behavior accords with your nature."

This picture of human beings as creatures of God not only presents a distinctive explanation of moral obligation, but it also illumines another issue connected with theories of ethics—namely, "How do we know what is right?" For Kant, moral knowledge is derived from critical reflection on the phenomenon of practical reason itself—that is, the categorical imperative may be described as a necessary presupposition of any sort of thinking that distinguishes right from wrong. For other philosophers, moral knowledge similarly stems from reflection on some aspect of human reason and/or experience.

Biblical religions hold, by contrast, that human beings derive moral knowledge by way of a relation with God. God governs the world with wisdom. Human beings learn to distinguish right from wrong as they participate in or apprehend those parts of this wisdom appropriate to their existence. In particular, God speaks to or "addresses" human beings in a variety of ways, so that they are able to understand their obligations. The Bible, the Qur'an, and other texts indicate one mode of such speaking: God reveals God's will, so that human beings may know the right way to live. In this connection, biblical religions are often said to connect moral knowledge with special revelation, so that an ability to distinguish right from wrong itself involves a willingness to read and study sacred texts or to follow the teachings of religious authorities.

Remembering that these religions hold that moral obligation correlates with the nature of human beings, however, one has reason to look more carefully at this emphasis on special revelation. After all, if one answer to the question, "Why be moral?" is that right behavior accords with true human nature, then too much stress on sacred texts or teachings seems inconsistent, in that it restricts moral knowledge only to believers. And in fact, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam all insist that moral knowledge is not restricted in this way. Ideas of "natural law," general revelation, or “common grace” all point in this direction and provide a way in which these religions connect with the claims of Kant and other philosophers. These ideas suggest that moral knowledge is available to all humans by way of reflection. As Thomas Aquinas put it, the natural law is a part of God’s wisdom that human beings are able to grasp through the use of “natural” means—in particular, reason. Divine law, meaning the teaching presented in scriptures and the tradition of the church, confirms, complements, and extends the natural law. But it does not violate or negate the value of simple reflection as a source of moral knowledge. To put it another way, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam hold that special revelation helps sharpen and clarify our knowledge of right and wrong. But this does not mean that such knowledge is only available to believers.

Religions of South and East Asia

If the biblical religions emphasize the notion of divine commands in matters of ethics, what about other traditions? The religions of India as well as those identified with China and more generally East Asia certainly put forth notions of deity and, in some cases, suggest that divine beings provide directives for human affairs. Nevertheless, scholars typically argue that divine beings in these traditions play a rather different role than in the biblical religions. And thus, discussions of ethics in Hinduism and Buddhism or in Confucian and Daoist traditions do not typically deal with questions about divine command theory. Rather, they focus on the way in which an impartial, even impersonal, cosmic system sets the context for human action. In some sense, the practical role of religions then has to do with providing or pointing to the kind of wisdom that will help human beings navigate, and perhaps eventually escape from or overcome, the necessities of the cosmos. Deities, divine or at least superhuman beings, may assist human beings with respect to wisdom. But ultimately, even gods and goddesses participate in and must deal with limits. As one very ancient Hindu text has it, the divine beings are more recent than the creation of the cosmos. If we ask who knows about cosmic origins, we are left with mystery. “He, the first origin of this creation, whether he formed it or did not form it, whose eye controls this world in highest heaven, he truly knows it, or perhaps he knows not” (Rig Veda X:129; Griffith translation).

The religions of India speak about the impartiality of the cosmos in terms of karma, which here may be thought of as the insistence that one reaps what one sows. Actions inevitably yield consequences, and these have import for social and personal well-being. To live well, or to navigate the cosmos with success, means that one lives in accord with dharma, which may variously be translated as “law,” “teaching,” or (perhaps best for present purposes) “wisdom.” The idea that dharma provides guidance in dealing with karma suggests that ethics in the context of Hindu, Buddhist, and other Indian traditions will have a teleological cast, and scholarly treatments of these religions typically stress this. Thus, Max Weber’s famous work Religion of India emphasizes the importance of an otherworldly goal (or release from karma) in directing human action; similarly, the discussion of Theravada Buddhism in David Little and Sumner B. Twiss’s Comparative Religious Ethics describes the primary trajectories of moral thinking in this tradition in terms of a teleology focused on transpersonal (social) or intrapersonal (individual) welfare. The transpersonal or social elements in this tradition resonate strongly with the maxim of classic utilitarianism: Always act in ways that will yield the greatest good for the greatest number. At the same time, the intrapersonal or individual elements of the tradition seem to be in conflict with this aim, since these suggest that one must renounce or get beyond the attachments of family, community, and state if he or she is to attain the ultimate goal of release or salvation from the cosmic system.

Such interpretations run the risk of underemphasizing strongly deontological trajectories in Indian religions, however. Remembering Aristotle’s suggestion that all moral action is purposeful or goal oriented, we should not be too quick to take Hindu or Buddhist presentations as simple equivalents of utilitarianism; considerations of duty also play a role. An ancient Hindu text, the Laws of Manu, provides detailed indications of the duties appropriate for people of various castes or social classes, and the various prescriptions for laypersons, monks, and nuns in Buddhist teaching are all expressed in terms of duty.

One of the most interesting presentations of the importance of duty in the history of ethics occurs in the Bhagavad Gita or “Song of the Lord,” a short though often excerpted portion of the epic Mahabharata. The Gita presents the dilemma of Arjuna, a member of the warrior caste and thus charged with the duty of preserving and protecting social order. Arjuna’s duty is plain; he is to fight with honor in the service of established authorities. Yet on the eve of battle he falls into despair because he knows that fortune has brought him to a point where fulfilling the duty of his vocation will involve him in fighting against members of his own family, who are serving in the opposing force. The requirements of honor are thus in conflict. Should Arjuna do his duty as a knight, he will violate his obligation to his family. Should he honor the ties of family, he will violate his duty as a knight. As he broods over the issue, his attendant or servant begins to give him counsel. As we come to understand, this attendant is none other than Krishna, the avatar or incarnation of Vishnu, and thus a particularly significant figure in the pantheon of Hindu deities. Never fear, says Krishna to the brooding warrior. Karma has brought you to this place and also has brought your family and others to this situation of conflict. Your task is not to resolve the conflict but to soldier on and to resolutely carry out your duty as a warrior; your colleagues and your opponents, family members and others, will all perform their duty as well. The consequences are not your concern—at least not in any immediate sense. What is important is that as you fulfill your duty, you remain detached—that is, you must not yield to anger, hatred, envy, and other negative emotions. For as you fight, your actions contribute to the formation of a certain kind of character. And ultimately, that must be your concern. Krishna then proceeds to outline various approaches to the cultivation of character and ultimately to salvation: Arjuna and others may follow the path of action and service, meaning they perform their duties scrupulously, with compassion and skill. They may follow the path of knowledge, meaning they meditate on and achieve understanding of the ways in which the cosmic process works. Or they may follow the path of devotion, in the sense of attaching themselves to one or more of the divine figures in the Hindu pantheon, trusting that love of the divine will provide the proper orientation to action in this world, enable forgiveness of one’s shortcomings, and lead to salvation or deliverance from the cosmic system.

The encounter between Arjuna and Krishna thus resonates with all the major theories of ethics discussed thus far, for we come to understand that the performance of duty yields consequences of great importance with respect to both social and personal welfare. And with respect to the latter, we are presented with a view like that of Aristotle or of Thomas Aquinas, in which the living of a virtuous life is itself a kind of excellence, leading to ultimate bliss.

In a similar vein, the moral perspective developed in the religions of China combines notions of duty, social utility, and virtue in a holistic perspective. Confucianism and Daoism do not emphasize adherence to divine commands in the manner of biblical religions. In this, the religions of China resemble those of India, so that the various texts and practices presented speak frequently of various deities while making them subject to the same cosmic system that constrains human beings. “Heaven” (ti’en) accomplishes its dictates in ways that are largely outside the control or grasp of human beings. By various means associated with the term dao (the “way”), persons and groups may order their lives in ways consistent with the workings of Heaven. These include, but are not limited to, observance of norms related to good conduct. Thus, Confucianism focused on the cultivation of filial piety in specific relations: the ruler and the ruled, husband and wife, parents and children, and teacher and student. To behave properly in these relations is akin to the proper performance of a ritual. Over time, those who perform the ritual correctly and with the appropriate attitude will develop the characteristic of ren, variously translated as benevolence, magnanimity, generosity, or “human-heartedness.” A ruler, for example, should seek the interests of the people in his realm, exercising the proper mix of mercy and justice in matters of policy. Citizens should show respect to the ruler, adhering to the law and otherwise following the ruler’s lead. Teachers should seek the welfare of their students, not the enhancement of their own reputations. Students should honor their teachers by attending to their lessons and acting in ways that indicate gratitude and devotion.

It is often said that Confucianism is a social or politically oriented religion, while Daoism developed in the interests of preserving a kind of mystical, personal devotion. And it is true that Daoist texts focus on the role of great savants—sages whose powers enable them to work miracles and otherwise overcome the normal constraints of existence. Nevertheless, Daoist discipline also included the observance of social norms, and over time, Chinese and other East Asian cultures seem to have viewed these traditions as complementary. Thus, one who follows the way of Heaven will observe the social proprieties advocated by Confucianism while at the same time thinking of Daoism in connection with an attempt to bring his or her self, beginning with the body, into a pattern of behavior consistent with the ebb and flow of the cosmic process.

The religions of India and of China, then, exhibit a relationship to the moral theories outlined at the outset of this entry that is rather similar to that of the biblical religions. They do not, in other words, represent independent or unique theories of morality. They do, however, provide an overarching perspective or context for moral conduct that suggests responses to questions about moral obligation, motivation, and moral knowledge. With respect to the first, the express intention of the religions of India and of China appears to be connected with the desire of human beings to navigate and eventually to overcome a cosmic system in which pleasures and pains, good fortune and bad, are largely beyond human control. One of the ways in which human beings manage to survive and even to flourish within an ambiguous environment is through cooperation, so that the moral life is in part motivated by the need to foster and preserve group existence. At the same time, persons have aspirations that are not entirely attained by means of participation in groups. Indeed, group life itself imposes constraints on the desires of human beings, and moral norms are to a large extent an expression of these. The idea that one who behaves properly will in the end develop a kind of character or obtain a standing that overcomes the world is a way of addressing such concerns. By answering the question “Why be moral?” the religions of India and China address such concerns, even as do the biblical religions.

With respect to moral knowledge, the biblical religions focus on divine wisdom, made known through special and general revelation, as we have seen. The religions of India and of China seem not to speak in this way, which follows from their rather different depiction of divinity. Instead, the characteristic way of thinking about moral knowledge appears to be reflection, particularly as illustrated by or represented in the teachings of exemplary persons—sages, whose insights into the cosmic process may be represented as providing the kind of wisdom indicated by the terms dharma or dao. One learns by attending to the teaching of masters; this teaching, in turn, has validity because of long experience. Generations of practice show that the teaching has merit in terms of the religious as well as the social and psychological needs of human beings. Thus, reading texts, commenting on them, hearing experts discussing them, attending to their role in ritual practice—all these are a part of the religions of India and of China, even as they are an aspect of biblical religions.

Here and Now

In 1918, just following Germany’s defeat in World War I, Max Weber delivered a lecture titled “Politics as a Vocation.” Among other things, Weber observed that contemporary moral and political discourse might be analyzed in terms of a conflict between advocates of an “ethic of ultimate ends” and an “ethic of responsibility.” By the former phrase, Weber pointed to a style of reasoning in which convictions about right and wrong as well as about the ultimate good for human beings and the world do not allow for compromise. They also do not admit the importance of considering the likely consequences of particular actions. Such an ethic is admirable, in the sense that it proceeds from a profound sense of duty. According to Weber, however, it is quite unsuitable to the practice of politics or, more generally, to modern social life. For politics, one must always consider the likely results of actions taken. It is always possible that adhering to a particular conception of duty will actually yield more harm than good. As an example, Weber cited pacifist convictions, by which no one could ever authorize the use of armed force; he also cited the idea that “tell the truth” is a norm that can never be compromised. An ethic of responsibility requires that one consider the possible outcome of a course of action. Indeed, since there may be more than one possible result, a responsible agent must consider the variety of outcomes possible, and finding his or her duty will involve deliberation about the best way to achieve good consequences. One need not be a convinced utilitarian according to Weber's view—following the happiness principle might itself be a kind of ultimate end. But to be responsible, one must consider that finding one's duty may not be a simple thing. In modern settings, human beings not only deal with a variety of agents and relationships, but they are accountable for the fact that these agents include people whose convictions about ultimate ends may be quite different from their own, and it may be that sustaining the kinds of relationships necessary for social cooperation involves compromises between these.

In arguing in this way, Weber outlined one of the central problems of moral action in the modern world. As the processes associated with globalization proceed, people thinking about ethics become more and more aware of the fact of religious and moral plurality. The study of ethics thus involves a series of questions: What are the various beliefs people hold with respect to right and wrong? Where we find disagreement, how serious is it? How deep does it go? Is it the case that moral diversity suggests we must think of a plurality of values? Or is diversity simply a matter of human beings working out so many variations on an overarching set, or perhaps even a single value? If so, what would that (or those) value(s) be? Is some degree of disagreement reasonable or at least tolerable? If so, how much? And what is the role of religion in such matters? We have argued that religions typically do not advance distinctive moral theories but rather reflect the characteristic emphases of deontology, utilitarianism, and virtue identified in the history of ethics. At the same time, we have suggested that religions do provide a set of overarching beliefs about the world and regarding the nature and destiny of human beings. Insofar as these provide some distinctive answers to questions such as "Why be moral?" and "How do we know right from wrong?" religions may shape the ways in which persons and groups approach particular questions about moral judgment. When, if ever, is war appropriate? In particular circumstances, is it appropriate to use torture in the service of preventing great evils or not? Is constitutional democracy, conceived as government of, by, and for a group of human beings, the best form of political organization? Or should government be a matter of applying divine law?

In this connection, some moral theorists have argued that the fact of religious diversity suggests the importance of limiting the sphere of government in ways that are characteristic of constitutional democracy. For example, John Rawls argued that limiting the role of government, so that it does not become embroiled in controversies over religion or other proposals about the "comprehensive" (Weber would have said "ultimate") good of human beings, is the best way to avoid the kind of violence typically associated with wars of religion. This means that when office holders, and in particular judges, make decisions about law or public policy, they must do so in terms of a framework associated with public reason—a set of terms and, behind those terms, beliefs that reasonable people either have or would agree to, given the fact of a world characterized by religious, and to some extent moral, plurality. This thesis of Rawls is often characterized as a "thin" theory of morality or of the good, in that it limits the lawmaking and policy aspects of social and political life to a very basic or limited set of norms. In particular, Rawls held that social and political life should be guided by (1) a principle of equal opportunity, in the sense that all people have an equal right to share in a system of basic liberties, and (2) a "difference" principle, by which the differential capacities of people to access basic liberties and the different outcomes obtained in terms of wealth or other social goods are to be regulated by the idea that differences should be considered just only insofar as they actually work to increase the possibility for those who might be described as disadvantaged to more effectively access basic liberties.

Rawls's two principles of justice, and in particular the difference principle, are certainly controversial. At this point, however, we are more interested in the overarching idea that social and political life should be governed by a thin theory of morality. This idea is criticized by Alasdair MacIntyre, among others. For MacIntyre, moral discourse cannot proceed unless a community of people agree on an overarching notion of excellence or virtue. Rawls's thin theory of morality is not only impoverished, it actually leads to the kind of endless disagreement and even strife that Rawls wishes to avoid. For MacIntyre, the seemingly intractable conflicts modern societies experience with respect to issues such as abortion and euthanasia provide a case in point. And that is not even to mention the kinds of large-scale conflicts presented by the differing visions of political order offered by constitutional democracies and, say, militant or radical Islam. Human beings cannot hope to resolve such conflicts with an agreement on a comprehensive theory of the good. If, as MacIntyre says, we cannot currently see how such an agreement would be possible, that does not suggest that it is so. Invoking a figure important for leading the society of his day out of the rubble left by the decay of the Roman Empire and toward the establishment of Christian civilization, MacIntyre writes that we must wait on a new St. Benedict, a charismatic figure who will show the way.

In the context of globalization, then, we have a large-scale debate about the place of moral theory, about religions and their impact on moral practice, and about the ways in which human beings should deal with an increased awareness of religious, moral, and other forms of plurality. In this context, we could do worse than to direct our thinking to the proposals advanced by the great religions of the world and to further bring them into dialogue by considering the relations of their normative teachings to those theories developed in the history of ethics as ways of generalizing about the kinds of actions that accord with a good life.

ETHIOPIA

Modern Ethiopia in East Africa was formed with the conquest of today's southern Ethiopia by the Christian Abyssinian king Menelik II during the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Christianity was introduced into the Axumite kingdom, which later became Christian Abyssinia, at an early date through its commercial and maritime relations with the Byzantine Empire, but the actual founders of the Axumite church were Syrian brothers, Frumentius and Aedesius, although those early Christian merchants gave them a foundation on which to build. Orthodox Christianity was imposed on the conquered peoples of the south, southeast, and southwest by force during and after Menelik's conquest and the subsequent creation of the Ethiopian empire state.

Islam arrived in Ethiopia in 615 CE, brought by a group of Muslims counseled by Prophet Muhammad to escape persecution in Mecca by the Quraish and travel to Abyssinia, which some consider the first Hejira in the history of Islam. Islam then expanded gradually throughout modern Ethiopia, especially in the country's low-lying parts, with the expansion being more vigorous in the 19th and early 20th centuries as a resistance to the conquest by Christian Abyssinia. Nearly all Ethiopian Muslims are Sunni.

Religious Distribution

The Federal Central Statistical Agency (based on the 2007 Census) reported the following religious distribution: Ethiopian Orthodox Christians (EOCs), 43.5%; Muslims, 33.9%; Protestants, 18.6%; followers of indigenous religion, 2.6%; Catholic, 0.7%; and others, 0.6%. All religions are found in all regions, with variations in their share among the total population. For instance, EOCs are dominant in Addis Ababa, Amhara, and Tigray, while Muslims constitute the larger proportion in Somali, Harari, Afar, Oromia, and Benishangul Gumz. In the Southern Nations, Nationalities, and People's Region (SNNPR) and Gambella, Protestants have larger representations. Christian evangelical and Pentecostal groups continue to be the fastest growing groups.

Indigenous religion includes a variety of belief systems practiced by different ethnic groups, who in many instances practice their indigenous beliefs side by side with their "official" religions. Among some ethnic groups such as the Gamo and Tambaro, and in some parts of the Hadiya and Kambata zones, there is what Tibebe Eshete (2009) has called "the well-preserved heritage of a fascinating mix of Christianity and traditional religion" (p. 32). The Oromo, the largest ethnic group in Ethiopia, believe in one Supreme Being or Creator called Waaqa (God); their belief system is called Waaqeffanna, and a believer in Waaqa is called Waaqeffata. Waaqeffanna is solemnized by a high-ranking priest known as Qaalluu; these priests are referred to as the guardians of the laws of Waaqa on earth.

State and Religion

From its introduction to the kingdom until the fall of the last monarch in 1974, Ethiopian Orthodox Christianity was the official state religion. To describe the support Ethiopian Orthodox Christianity received from the monarch, Patrick Gilkes proposed the term theocracy—that is, religion was a major preoccupation of the emperors, and the main function of the throne was to support the church. However, the Dergue's 1987 constitution, Article 46(3), separated state and religion, while the 1995 constitution of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia (FDRE), Article 11, not only reaffirmed the separation of state and religion but also declared that neither should interfere in the affairs of the other. Nevertheless, this does not necessarily mean that the state does not interfere in the internal affairs of religious organizations, nor does it mean that it always treats all religions in the same manner. Muslims, Protestants/Evangelicals, and indigenous believers accuse the state of being biased in favor of the EOCs. (For the suppression the Protestants/Evangelicals faced under the Dergue, see Eshete, 2009.)

Inter- and Intrareligious Tensions

Under the imperial regimes, Ethiopia used to be identified as a Christian country despite its multi-religious society. As a result, according to David Shinn and Thomas Ofcansky, the authorities always treated Islam as a secondary religion and discriminated against Muslims. In spite of this, Ethiopians of different religious traditions coexisted peacefully for centuries. Nevertheless, despite the long history of peaceful coexistence and constitutionally guaranteed equality of religion and religious freedom, recently, there are signs of growing tensions between the EOCs and the Muslims. In recent years, there have been conflicts that caused loss of lives and destruction of churches and mosques in some places. Reliable information on what triggered the conflicts is lacking, but reports indicate that disputes over sites of religious rituals resulted in violent conflicts. This is part of the bigger agenda of the two religions—namely, the Muslims' struggle to assert themselves as Ethiopians with equal rights as Orthodox Christians and the latter's determination to contest the status of Muslims as Ethiopians, invoking the old myth that "Ethiopia is the Island of Christianity" and drawing on the old Amharic adage, which can be translated as "Muslims' country is Mecca."

In Islam, the Wahhabis have been accused of intolerance for interfaith interaction between Muslims and Christians. This creates tension between the Wahhabis and mainstream Muslims, who want to continue to have a good relationship with their Christian neighbors.

The EOCs, especially the Mahabare Kedusan (an ultraconservative Orthodox group) accuse the Evangelicals of attempting to dismantle the Orthodox Church because they actively engage in converting Orthodox followers. There are also tensions within EOCs—between the growing reformist group and the “Orthodox” EOCs.

ETHNIC NATIONALISM

Ethnic nationalism has come to mean nationalism based on membership through genetic and cultural inheritance—based on blood and often, though not always, consisting of members of the same religious group—as opposed to nationalism that is inclusive and open for outsiders to join. Ethnic nationalism is often understood in opposition to civic nationalism, which is conceived of as mass, civic, and democratic. Within this paradigm, ethnic nationalism is interpreted as a reactionary force among ethnolinguistic groups (or, more accurately, reactionary elites who mobilize such groups on ethnic grounds) that seek to either maintain or increase their power vis-à-vis emerging civic nationalist democratic states. The word ethnic stems from the Ancient Greek ethnos meaning “people” or “group,” but it has often been used to denote “out”-groups rather than reflexively and was used by the Greeks to denote those groups outside their own community. Ethnic is often still used in the same way, referring to groups outside or not quite full members of a nation. It is crucial, however, to emphasize that ethnic and civic nationalisms only exist as ideal types. A nation may appear to have more ethnic than civic characteristics, but there will be components of civic nationalism apparent in ethnic nations, and the opposite holds true for civic nationalism. As an ideal type, civic nationalism is more commonly associated with a top-down elite-led construction of democratic states (often described as citizenship) in the face of pressures from industrialization and modernity, whereas ethnic nationalism is seen as coming from below—a reactionary movement on the part of reactionary conservatives looking to block the progress of modernity and largely volk-centered in its appeal. As ideal types, these paradigms are often exemplified by invoking progressive British and French nationalisms against the regressive and brutally violent nationalism in interwar Nazi Germany and Russia.

Prior to the last quarter of the 20th century, theories of nationalism were dominated by structural approaches to the emergence of identity within the state—that politics inspired by national identity were subservient to the needs of the state to create citizens, that nationalism was a temporary and reactionary response to class development or economic conditions, or that nationalism emerged where religious practice and belief were in decline. In Elie Kedourie's Nationalism in Asia and Africa of 1971, nationalism was portrayed as a return to the "Dark Gods," and in most of the writings on nationalism during this period, nationalism was considered a form of politics that was anti-Enlightenment, especially where it emerged as a movement to assert the rights of minority groups that challenged universal citizenship, essential to the coherent functioning of the liberal democratic state. In such cases, nationalism serves no point in contemporary economic and political development but is rather an attempt through an elite, which is either academic or politician led, construction of false consciousness to address the alienation of industrialization. False consciousness here refers to the manner in which these elites construct a way of thinking about issues of nationalism that were not "organically" present in the population but rather instrumentally introduced into political debate to try to subvert or manipulate political perception and discussion. In this way, nationalist politics, which eschewed class demands and were even potentially antithetical to them, were being interpreted as regressive and out of tune with the needs of an industrialized and interdependent world. This led to analyses of a bad Eastern (ethnic) versus good Western (civic) nationalism, where the one was typified by exclusionary membership in the nation based on blood and birth (German and Russian nationalisms) and the other by membership that was construed as inclusive and open, based on a willingness on the part of potential conationals to accept those who willingly took up essential national practices (often portrayed as French Republican nationalism, with an emphasis on the importance of Francophonie—literally, the willingness to adopt the French language as the universal and discrete means of communication within the French nation).

Why good civic and bad ethnic nationalisms? Within these accounts, causation has been drawn between perpetration of ethnic cleansing and ethnocide and the exclusive character of national identity. Put simply, the Nazis are alleged to have perpetrated the Holocaust because no Jew could ever be considered to be German. Similarly, in cases such as the Balkans and Rwanda, the impermeable and noninclusive nature of ethnic identity is construed as the rationale behind the high degrees of brutal ethnic violence. The exclusive nature of such ethnic nationalism was placed in relief by the apparently inclusive nature of civic nationalism, where even those educated in the farthest reaches of the French Empire—in Indochina or North Africa—would be taught the French language and culture and could be expected to benefit from and participate in the French nation and colonial project. This French form of civic nationalism was seen as being progressive, insofar as, to coin Eugene Weber's famous title, it turned "peasants into Frenchmen," taking a linguistically, culturally, and religiously disparate population and creating a unified workforce, ready to take the state and industry into a modern era—a citizenship inherently loyal to the Republican values of liberté, égalité, and fraternité (liberty, equality, and fraternity). To this extent, good civic states were meant to be populated by nations that were culturally (and often religiously and racially) homogeneous, a homogeneity born out of inclusiveness. This ideal type provided the foundation for the nation-state, within which nation and state were congruent, interdependent, and mutually reinforcing.

Yet the French and British examples are beset with problems. In the French case, the emphasis on a French form of secularism, the French language, and the glass ceiling of race and religion (apparent in the Dreyfus Affair, the experiences of North African immigrants, and recent debates on the wearing of the veil) all indicate that civic nationalism is being defined, at least partly, through an inherently ethnic identity. Furthermore, the experiences of exploitation, discrimination, and violence against Algerians in France during the interwar period were enough to convince some future members of the Front de Libération Nationale of the need for Algeria to separate itself, violently if need be, from the French nation-state. In this way, French nationalism can be understood to be inclusive on its own terms—it demands assimilation for membership, yet the conditions for assimilation are being defined by the dominant French ethnic group. That is to say, French identity is not being constructed ex nihilo (neutrally, from nothing) but through an organic French perspective on the meaning of the nation and what membership should entail. Similarly, ongoing debates on the meaning of Britishness, in light of English, Scottish, Welsh, and (Northern) Irish nationalism, indicate the extent to which there is disagreement over whether Britishness has been defined in light of English nationalism. Does Britishness reflect the extent to which England has dominated the British state, or is it a category broad enough to include all manner of ethnic and national groups except the English? (Note the recognition of national holidays except the feast of England's patron saint, St. George.) In this case, there can be little or no doubt that elements of ethnic and religious identity matter greatly in the root definition of Britishness. In other paradigmatic examples, such as the United States, where a national identity is nominally being constructed and reinforced not out of a shared cultural heritage but from shared conceptions of an immigrant past, this identity reflects the concerns of White Anglo-Saxon Protestants (WASPs), who have held, and continue to hold, many of the most important political, economic, and cultural positions. The United States has seen an increasing emphasis on English as a national language as a bulwark against Latino immigration, and these culture wars have created new debates on how American identity should be defined.

If ethnic nationalism does not exist empirically and can only be understood as an ideal type, why is it important as an academic term? Despite the fact that it is only an ideal type, civic and ethnic nationalism often help indicate how nations came into being—that is, either through top-down or bottom-up processes—and may also help interpret and understand the foundations of contemporary immigration and citizenship policies. This can aid in interpreting how policies such as German nationality law, which had largely been based on jus sanguinis (lit. “right of blood”), whereby citizenship was acquired through the parental line, has evolved into one that is more open to accommodate long-term immigrants and their children. Within the accounts of scholars such as Rogers

Brubaker, the historical German use of jus sanguinis has been contrasted to French reliance on jus soli (lit. “right of the soil”) citizenship laws, whereby citizenship is conferred by place of birth rather than by heritage. Yet both examples are subject to significant change over time and, as illustrated above, really only indicate ideal types rather than a definitive indication of national identity in state policies. Another reason these ideal types are useful is the way in which they have been placed into theoretical dialogue with one another. This allows for highly pertinent discussions surrounding issues of democracy, citizenship, and nationalism. Scholars such as Habermas, Plamenatz, Miller, Horowitz, O’Leary, and many others have engaged in debates over the extent to which identity based on membership in the nation can unify democracies—which otherwise may be subject to intense competition for power and resources—or the extent to which nations defined by dominant ethnic groups come to antagonize and fragment such situations.

ETHNOGENESIS

In its basic semantics, the word ethnogenesis is composed of the Greek words ethnos (ἔθνος, “volk,” “tribe,” “group of people”) and genesis (γένεσις, “creation,” “origin,” “a coming into being”). The term ethnogenesis is first mentioned by the American poet Henry Timrod (1828–1867) in his poem of the same name concerning the birth of his own nation, the Confederate States of the American South.

As a scientific concept, ethnogenesis refers to the processes by which a group of people come into being as a definable group, aggregate, or category at some point in history. These people could then be understood or understand themselves as ethnically distinct from the wider sociocultural context from which their grouping emerges. The history and historicity of people are main points in the conceptual understanding of these processes. Other key features are language, appearance, religion, name, or the whole cultural context as distinct from other ones. The complementary dimension of ethnogenesis could be understood as ethnocide, which is the conscious effort by powers to obliterate a people’s lifestyle.

The process-related understanding of ethnogenesis could be studied under several aspects and in several ways. There are three main approaches—namely, the sociobiological, functionalist, and symbolical approaches.

The sociobiological approach has been considerably influenced by the theory of evolutionism. The processes by which a group of people came into a definable category are usually conceptualized as based in biology and determined by genetic and geographical factors. Explicitly within the Russian and former Soviet anthropology, the result of ethnogenesis was seen as a unity of “blood and soil.” This perception was derived from Herder’s neo-romantic concept of the volk. The processes of ethnogenesis were determined to be geographic and a combined effect of landscape and endogamy (a marriage rule in which marriages are only approved within a specific group, such as one’s own caste, etc.). Ethnos is understood here as a group originating from successful genetic-biological reproduction and thus, over time and space, an expanded group of related families. In this primordial sense, ethnic groups are objective and homogeneous entities with certain inherent sociobiological characteristics, such as language, territory, mentality, and economy.

In the functionalist approach, the processes of creating ethnicity were defined in terms of the objective cultural structure and institutions of a given society. Ethnicity was a product of political myth, created and manipulated by sociocultural elites in their pursuit of advantages and power. The cultural forms, values, and practices of ethnic groups become resources for elites in competition for political power and economic advantage and in the dynamics of elite competition within the borders determined by political and economic realities.

The third and most influential approach, symbolical and constructivist in its theoretical foundation, could be understood as symbolic in verbal and nonverbal form. This means that these processes are value laden and can move people to action. The ethnogenetic processes could be interpreted as the dialectical negotiating of the objective and subjective within a set of sociocultural diacritics such as physical appearance, name, language, history, nationality, and religion. These sets define a shared identity by inclusion and exclusion. The signs always convey meaning, and therefore, they are to be understood as reference points of a cultural context—“webs of significance man himself has spun” (Geertz, 1973, p. 5).

There is always a relationship between ethnicity, religion, nationality, and cultural identity. All aspects are interdependent and overlap at certain points. This means, for example, that in religious movements, ethnogenetic processes can also be of major relevance, especially in their millenarian manifestations and realignment: For example, Jews are different from Christians because the former do not accept Jesus as the Messiah. The cultural and symbolic history of both demonstrates a flow of common cultural signs that differ from each other by ethnogenetic processes.

EUROPE

There are two ways of looking at the religious situation in Europe: The first considers the features that are common to Europe as a whole; the second looks at the differences across the continent. This entry begins by looking at a range of factors that can be found throughout Europe. The second section develops a series of variations based largely on the different confessional blocs—that is, Orthodox, Catholic, and Protestant. It also considers the contrasts between what is commonly known as West Europe and the parts of the continent that were under communist domination from 1948 to 1989. In the latter, the religious trajectory is noticeably different. The final section points to the current paradox: On the one hand, there are the relatively high levels of secularity in most if not all of Europe, but on the other, there is the marked resurgence of religion in public debate—a combination that was not anticipated.

Common Factors

There are six very different factors, which—taken together—contribute to a better understanding of the place of religion in modern Europe. These factors change and adapt over time. Currently, they are interacting in new ways to produce distinctive formulations of religion in Europe, some of which are unexpected. The six factors are as follows:

1. The role of the historic churches in shaping European culture
2. An awareness that these churches still have a place at particular moments in the lives of modern Europeans, though they are no longer able to discipline the beliefs and behaviors of the great majority of the population
3. An observable change in the churchgoing constituencies of the continent, which operate increasingly on a model of choice rather than a model of obligation or duty
4. The arrival in Europe of groups of people from many different parts of the world, with very different religious aspirations from those seen in the host societies
5. The reactions of Europe's secular elites to the increasing salience of religion in public as well as private life
6. A growing realization that the patterns of religious life in modern Europe should be considered an “exceptional case” in global terms—that is, they are not a global prototype

Cultural Heritage

The starting point reflects the undisputed role of Christianity in shaping European culture, bearing in mind that other factors (notably Greek rationalism and Roman organization) must also be kept in mind. One example will suffice: The Christian tradition has had an irreversible effect on the shaping of time and space in this part of the world. Both week and year follow the Christian cycle, even if the major festivals are beginning to lose their resonance for large sections of the population. The same is true of space. Wherever you look in Europe, there is a predominance of Christian churches, some of which retain huge symbolic value. This is not to deny that in some parts of Europe (notably the larger cities), the skyline is becoming an indicator of growing religious diversity. Europe is evolving, but the legacies of the past remain deeply embedded in both the physical and cultural environment.

The Historic Churches

Physical and cultural presence is one thing, but an active role in the everyday lives of European people is quite another. Commentators of all kinds agree that, with very few exceptions, the latter is no longer a realistic aspiration for the historic churches of Europe. That does not mean, however, that these institutions have entirely lost their significance as markers of religious identity. The following terms are useful in understanding these ambiguities: first, the notion of believing without belonging and, second, the concept of vicarious religion.

Believing Without Belonging

One of the most striking features of religious life in contemporary Europe is the mismatch between different measurements of religiousness. There exists, first of all, a set of indicators that measure firm commitments to (a) an institutional life and (b) creedal statements of religion (in this case, Christianity). These indicators, moreover, are closely related to each other insofar as institutional commitment both reflects and confirms religious belief in its orthodox forms. The believing Christian attends church to express his or her belief and to receive affirmation that this is the right thing to do. Conversely, repeated exposure to the institution and its teaching necessarily disciplines belief.

No observer of the current religious scene disputes that these dimensions of European religion are both interrelated and in serious decline. There is, on the other hand, considerable debate about the consequences of this situation. The complex relationship between belief (in a wider sense) and practice is central to this discussion, for it is clear that a manifest reduction in the “hard” indicators of religious life has not, in the short term at least, had a similar effect on rather less rigorous dimensions of religiousness. For the time being, the latter remain relatively strong (the data are clear on this point). It is precisely this state of affairs that is captured by the phrase “believing without belonging.”

It is important to remember, however, that many secular institutions have declined similarly, both in Europe and beyond. The most obvious examples are political parties, trade unions, and the wide range of leisure activities, which require “gathering” on a regular basis. In other words, believing without belonging is a pervasive dimension of modern European societies; it is not confined to the religious lives of European people.

Vicarious Religion

The connections between emergent patterns of belief and the institutional churches are complex. Not only do the latter continue to exist, but they quite clearly exert an influence on many aspects of individual and collective lives—even in Europe. The notion of vicarious religion is helpful in this context.

By vicarious is meant the notion of religion performed by an active minority but on behalf of a much larger number who (implicitly at least) not only understand but quite clearly approve of what the minority is doing. The first half of the definition is relatively straightforward and reflects the everyday meaning of the term—that is, to do something on behalf of someone else. The second half captures the legacy of the state churches of Europe and is best explored by means of examples. Religion can operate vicariously in a wide variety of ways: Churches and church leaders perform rituals on behalf of others (at the time of a birth or a death, for instance)—if these services are denied, this causes offense; church leaders and churchgoers believe on behalf of others and incur criticism if they do not do this properly; church leaders and churchgoers embody moral codes on behalf of others, even when those codes have been abandoned by large sections of the populations that they serve; and churches, finally, can offer space for the vicarious debate of unresolved issues in modern societies.

One way of illustrating these features is to consider the place of religion and the continuing role of religious institutions in European societies when they face the unexpected or the tragic. Specifically, European populations still turn to their churches at the time of a death (whether individual or collective)—and even more so if that death is considered untimely. The reactions that followed Princess Diana's death in 1997 offer an excellent illustration. And if large numbers of people are involved (e.g., in an accident or natural disaster), the effect is cumulative.

From Obligation to Consumption

Rather different are Europe's diminishing but still significant numbers of churchgoers—that is, those who maintain the tradition on behalf of the people described in the previous section. Here, an observable change is clearly taking place, best summarized as a shift from a culture of obligation or duty to a culture of consumption or choice. What was once simply imposed (with all the negative connotations of this word) or inherited (a rather more positive idea) becomes instead a matter of personal choice. Europeans now go to church (or to another religious organization) because they choose to, sometimes for a short period or sometimes for longer, but they feel no obligation either to attend in the first place or to continue if they no longer want to.

As such, this pattern is entirely compatible with vicariousness: The historic churches need to be there in order that Europeans may attend them if they so desire. Their nature, however, gradually alters—a shift that is discernible in both practice and belief, not to mention the connections between them. There is, for example, an easily documentable change in the patterns of baptism in the Church of England. The overall number of baptisms has dropped dramatically in the postwar period, evidence once again of institutional decline. In England, though not yet in the Nordic countries or indeed in parts of southern Europe, baptism is no longer seen as a ritual associated with birth but has become increasingly a sign of membership in a chosen voluntary community.

In other words, membership of the historic churches is changing in nature. They are becoming more like the growing number of free or independent churches that can be found all over Europe, though more in some places than in others. Voluntarism is beginning to establish itself de facto, regardless of constitutional legacies.

New Arrivals

The fourth factor concerns the growing number of incomers in almost all European societies. There have been two stages in this process. The first was closely linked to the urgent need for labor in the expanding economies of postwar Europe—especially in Britain, France, Germany, and the Netherlands. The second wave of immigration occurred in the 1990s and included, in addition to the places listed above, both the Nordic countries and the countries of Mediterranean Europe (Greece, Italy, Spain, and Portugal)—bearing in mind that the latter, until very recently, have been countries of emigration rather than immigration.

This is not primarily a religious movement, but the implications for the religious life of Europe are considerable and vary from place to place, depending on both the host society and new arrivals. Britain and France offer an instructive comparison. In Britain, immigration has been much more diverse than in France, both in terms of provenance and in terms of faith communities. Britain is also a country where ethnicity and religion crisscross each other in a bewildering variety of ways (only Sikhs and Jews claim ethnoreligious identities). The situation in France is very different: Here, immigration has been largely from the Maghreb, as a result of which France has by far the largest Muslim community in Europe—an almost entirely Arab population. Rightly or wrongly, Arab and Muslim have become interchangeable terms in popular parlance in France.

Beneath these differences lies, however, a common factor: The growing presence of other faith communities in general, and of the Muslim population in particular, is challenging some deeply held European assumptions. The notion that faith is a private matter and should, therefore, be proscribed from public life—notably from the state and from the education system—is widespread in Europe. Conversely, many of those who are currently arriving in this part of the world have markedly different convictions and offer—simply by their presence—a challenge to the European way of doing things. European societies have been obliged to reopen debates about the place of religion in public as well as private life—hence the heated controversies about the wearing of the veil in schools, about the rights or wrongs of publishing material that one faith community in particular finds offensive, and about the location of “non-European” religious buildings. There have been moments, moreover, when a lack of mutual comprehension, together with an unwillingness to compromise on many of these issues, has led alarmingly fast to dangerous confrontations, both in Europe and beyond.

Europe’s Secular Elites

Such episodes raise a further point: that is, the extent to which the secular elites of Europe make use of these events to articulate alternatives—ideological, constitutional, and institutional—to religion. It is important to remember, however, that such elites, just like their religious counterparts, vary markedly from place to place.

Key in this respect is an awareness that the process of secularization has taken place differently in different European countries. For example, what in Britain, and indeed in most of northern Europe, occurred gradually (starting with a de-clericalization of the churches from within at the time of the Reformation), became in France a delayed and much more ideological clash between a hegemonic, heavily clerical church and a much more militant secular state. The result was “la guerre des deux Frances” (Catholic and laïque), which dominated French political life well into the 20th century. The legacies still remain in the form of a self-consciously secular elite and a lingering suspicion concerning religion of all kinds—the more so when this threatens the public sphere. The fact that these threats are no longer Catholic but Muslim does not alter the underlying reaction.

That said, Britain now plays host to some aggressively secular voices. Indeed, all over Europe, resurgent religion brings with it resurgent atheism. Two points are immediately clear in this respect: first, that this situation is qualitatively different from that which preceded it and, second, that this was not anticipated. The latter is crucial: Resurgent religion has taken Europe by surprise—hence the vehemence of the reaction.

Europe: An Exceptional Case?

The final factor introduces a different perspective. Instead of asking what Europe is in terms of its religious existence, it asks what Europe is not. It is not (yet) a vibrant religious market, such as that found in the United States; it is not a part of the world where Christianity is growing exponentially, very often in Pentecostal forms, as is the case in the Southern Hemisphere (Latin America, sub-Saharan Africa, and the Pacific Rim); it is not a part of the world dominated by faiths other than Christian but is increasingly penetrated by these; and it is not for the most part subject to the violence often associated with religion and religious differences in other parts of the globe—more so if religion becomes entangled in political conflict. Hence the inevitable, if at times disturbing, conclusion: that the patterns of religion in modern Europe, notably its relative secularity, might be an exceptional case in global terms.

This point is all the more crucial given that the paradigms of social science emerge from the European case and are very largely premised on the notion that modern societies are likely to be secular societies. It follows that the traditional, European-based understandings of social science may be markedly less suitable for the study of religion in other parts of the world.

Regional Differences

Confessional Blocs

The preceding section described the factors that are common to Europe as a whole. Central to this story is the mutation in the historic churches of Europe as these once-dominant institutions come to terms with a very different situation. Common to all these churches are their historic attachments to political power—first in the form of empire and later in the form of the nation-state. A crucial legacy of these arrangements is the connection between Europe’s state churches and territory, a link expressed at every level of society—supranational, national, and local. This last is important: The whole of Europe, literally, is divided into parishes—the core unit of administration, which for centuries had civic as well as ecclesiastical resonance.

This situation dates from the time of the Roman emperor Constantine, who in 325 convoked the Council of Nicaea. The Nicene Creed (promulgated by the council) included the phrase “the one holy catholic and apostolic Church.” By the end of the fourth century, this church—Orthodox Christianity—had become not only the state religion but a defining institution of the Byzantine Empire. This sharing of power was a world away from first-century Palestine and the beginnings of Christianity as a vulnerable sect. At its zenith, the empire stretched from central and eastern Europe into Asia and through much of North Africa. It lasted for 10 centuries, coming to an end in the fall of Constantinople (Byzantium) to the Ottoman Turks in 1453. Even now, Orthodox Christianity remains the dominant creed of much of eastern Europe: in Greece, Cyprus, Romania, Bulgaria, Serbia, and, of course, Russia.

The first major split in the Christian world occurred in the 11th century, when the continuing tensions between Western (Catholic) and Eastern (Orthodox) Christianity could no longer be contained. The reasons for such tensions were both doctrinal and ecclesiological: The former concerned the nature of the Trinity (specifically the filioque clause, which altered the relationship between the three persons of the Trinity); the latter reflected the preeminent role of the pope in the Western church, which contravened Orthodox teaching that all bishops were essentially equal—in other words, that every bishop is Peter’s successor in his own church. Events came to a head in 1054, the date generally accepted for the “great schism.”

The Western church was centered on Rome and stretched both to the north and to the west. Until the time of the Reformation, the Roman church and the Holy Roman Empire were the core institutions of western Europe and closely interrelated. Such links continued until the 16th century (Charles V was the last emperor to be crowned by the pope, in 1530). The relationship was not always peaceful, however, as secular power vied with the church for dominance, notably over the appointment of bishops. It was never entirely clear who was dependent on whom. In the early-modern period, however, both these Pan-European institutions suffered as the aspirations of local rulers grew stronger, a movement that coincided with the growing criticism of the Catholic Church at the time of the Reformation. The movement took different forms in different parts of the continent, but a second upheaval in the politico-religious life of Europe became increasingly inevitable.

The term reformation is highly ambiguous: Does this imply innovation and the breaking of new ground, or does it involve a return to and rediscovery of primitive excellence? The political implications are equally hard to define. Were those who endorsed the theological changes taking place at this time looking primarily for radical change or simply for greater independence? It is clear that the motives were mixed. The latter, rather more conservative option was bound to appeal to political rulers anxious to establish independence from external authority (whether secular or religious) but with a careful eye on stability within. Both were possible within the Lutheran concept of a “godly prince.” Sometimes, the prince had jurisdiction over a whole kingdom or kingdoms. Such was the case in Scandinavia, where Lutheranism became embodied in the state churches of northern Europe. Elsewhere, the process was far more local and concerned relatively small patches of land. The German case illustrates the latter, leading to patterns that are not only extant but influential some 400 years later. Both examples embody the principle of cuius regio, eius religio (“whose realm, his religion”), established in the Peace of Augsburg, 1555—a concept that brings to an end the pre-Reformation concept of a unified Christendom.

The Reformation as such, moreover, was differently understood. In addition to Lutheranism, some Europeans—notably the Swiss, the Dutch, the Scots, some Germans, some Hungarians and Czechs, and a small but significant minority of French—were attracted first by Zwingli, then by Calvin, toward a more rigorous version of Protestantism. Calvinism was both more radical and more restrained than Lutheranism: radical in the sense of a new kind of theology based on the doctrines of predestination and redemption but restrained in terms of its stringent moral codes. The effect of this particular combination on the subsequent economic development of Europe has provided inexhaustible material for continuing debate among historians and sociologists alike.

Broadly speaking, however, West Europe divided itself into a Catholic south (Spain, Portugal, Italy, France, but including Belgium and Ireland) and a Protestant north (Scandinavia and Scotland), with a range of “mixed” countries in between (England and Wales, Northern Ireland, the Netherlands, and Germany). Central Europe exemplifies similar categories, though the geography is rather more complicated. Lithuania, Poland, Slovakia, Slovenia, and Croatia are firmly Catholic; Estonia and Latvia are Lutheran and relate closely to their Nordic neighbors (a commonality strongly reemphasized as the Baltic Republics regained their political independence in the early 1990s); Hungary and the Czech Republic, finally, are rather more mixed (primarily Catholic but with significant Protestant minorities). In other words, boundaries gradually emerged all over Europe, dividing one nation from another, one region from another, and one kind of Christianity from another. Boundaries, moreover, imply dominance as well as difference. Majorities and minorities were, and still are, created depending on the precise location of the line in question.

This, in essence, is the confessional map of western Europe that took shape in the early-modern period and that has remained relatively stable ever since. It would be a mistake, however, to assume that church–state arrangements necessarily follow suit. What emerges in the latter respect is a bewildering variety of arrangements dictated for the most part by particular historical circumstances and that change over time as political necessity dictates or as economic or social shifts suggest. These very individual histories continue to resonate in the 21st century as different European societies come to terms with the changes outlined in the previous section—including the arrival of new and different faiths—but each in its own way.

Communist and Noncommunist Europe

Europe was differently divided following World War II. In the immediate postwar period, not only Germany but Europe as a whole was divided between the Western allies and the Soviet Union. The Baltic States, Poland, East Germany, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Albania, and (until 1948) Yugoslavia fell under Soviet control. The implications for religion were considerable. The ideology that pervaded the Soviet bloc was aggressively secular—to the point of serious harassment and, in some cases, outright persecution of anyone who displayed almost any form of religion except entirely private belief. Public displays of religiousness were considered a threat to the regime and were suppressed, more brutally in some cases than others. Exactly what happened in each of the countries listed above varied; equally different were the effects of Soviet policies on religious vitality.

For example, in those countries that had embraced Lutheranism at the time of the Reformation and that found themselves under Soviet control after 1948 (i.e., Estonia, Latvia, and East Germany), there were undoubtedly countless acts of individual heroism. Institutionally, however, the church was less able to resist, leading to much reduced levels of religious activity in these parts of Europe—a situation that has not really changed since the fall of communism. The Catholic Church was in a rather different position and became in some places, if not all, a major bulwark against communism. This was particularly true in Poland, a situation that became all the more visible after the election of a Polish pope (John Paul II) in 1979. The Soviet authorities found it increasingly difficult to resist the forces of popular Catholicism, galvanized by a charismatic and globally visible pope.

The Orthodox countries display similar contrasts: Bulgaria, for example, became increasingly secular, while Romania did not. Indeed, in the latter, religious practice remains particularly high. As ever, the reasons for these different reactions lie in the specificities of each case. The Uniate, or Greek Catholic churches, offer a final example in this regard. These churches follow the Orthodox rite but remain in full communion with Rome. They are found on the eastern border of Europe, notably in Belarus and the Ukraine. The fact that they are more Western facing than either the Russian or the Ukrainian Orthodox churches is of significance in the political alignments of their members. This is particularly true in the Ukraine, a country that straddles the East–West divide.

One point is clear, however, and common to all these cases. In all of them, the collusions of religious and political power described in the previous section were necessarily subverted. No longer were the dominant churches of this part of Europe dependent on the state for favors; they were, rather, victims of an aggressively secular ideology. Of course, some churches and some individuals were compromised, but in many cases, religious institutions became the natural and very effective carriers of an alternative ideology—providing space for gathering and for increasingly public debate. As we have seen, this was particularly true in Poland, where the protest was highly visible. Interestingly, an equally effective example can be found in East Germany, where—at the critical moment—a tiny, infiltrated, and seriously weakened Lutheran church became the focus of resistance. In the Nicolaikirche in Leipzig, for example, meetings for religious discussion became more and more political and gradually spilled out into the streets.

Such protests constituted one factor in the collapse of the Soviet bloc, which becomes a pivotal moment not only in the history of Europe but in the entire global order. The implications for religion are difficult to overestimate.

Levels of Religious Activity

It is important, finally, to look at the different levels of religious activity in different parts of Europe. The first and most obvious contrast lies between the notably more religious countries of southern Europe (both Orthodox and Catholic) and the less religious countries of the Protestant north. This variation holds across almost every indicator; indeed, they are interrelated. Levels of practice are markedly higher in Romania, Greece, Poland, Lithuania, Italy, Spain, Belgium, and Ireland (closer in its religious life to continental Europe than to Britain) than they are elsewhere. Unsurprisingly, one effect of regular attendance is a corresponding strength in traditional belief in both Orthodox and Catholic Europe.

There are, however, exceptions to this rule. France, for example, displays a very different profile from the other Catholic countries, a contrast that cannot be explained without reference to French history. Spain, moreover, looks likely to follow this pattern, in contrast to Italy, where practice remains relatively high. Other exceptions to a European pattern, or patterns, should be looked at in a similar light. Conspicuous here are the two Irelands where high levels of religious practice endured for longer than they did elsewhere. Once again, the particular nature of Irish history accounts for this: Religion has become entangled with questions of Irish politics on both sides of the border. The persistence of religious practice as well as belief in both the Republic and Northern Ireland is both cause and consequence of this situation.

One final variation in the overall framework should be noted. In France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and possibly Britain (more especially England), there is a higher than average incidence of those claiming no religion or at least no denominational affiliation. It is quite possible that this may become the norm in other European societies.

Concluding Remarks

That said, it is the unpredictability of the present situation that is most striking. In western Europe, two things are happening at once. On the one hand, there are higher levels of secularity in many parts of Europe than there are in other parts of the world—a situation that leads inevitably to a decline in religious knowledge as well as in religious belief. No longer is it possible to assume a degree of religious literacy across the continent as younger generations in particular resist, passively or otherwise, the faith of their parents and grandparents. At precisely the same moment, however, religion has reentered the public square—creating a situation that demands attention. Religious issues are once more in the spotlight, provoking considerable debate in both the continent as a whole and in its constituent nations. The resulting discussion, all too often, is both ill informed and ill mannered as Europeans are obliged to reopen questions they had considered closed.

In eastern Europe, a rather different situation pertains as the postcommunist countries continue to work out their newfound freedom. Here, the religious indicators remain volatile and are not always easy to interpret. They are closely bound up with national identities—sometimes benignly, sometimes less so.

In both cases, Europe needs to be seen in its global context. New forms of religiousness are coming in from outside—that is certain. Equally important, however, are the movements from one part of the continent to another. Poles, for example, are moving to the West—to the United Kingdom and to Ireland; Romanians are moving to Italy. In short, the patterns of religion in Europe continue to remake themselves as old boundaries dissolve and new ones arise.

EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

The European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) is perhaps the most important court in the world in terms of its impact on people and nations. It is the court of last resort for more than 900 million people from 47 member nations of the Council of Europe (COE). Established as the enforcement arm of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which was developed in the aftermath of World War II and signed by 10 nations on November 4, 1950, the convention took effect on September 3, 1953. The court has been operating since, serving an ever-growing number of nations and people with a court that allows individuals to make claims of human rights violations against their own government, a unique judicial innovation of great significance. A significant number of complaints involve issues of religious freedom for individuals and for various minority religions. However, it was not until 1993 that the first violation of Article 9 dealing with freedom of religion and conscience was found. Since then, a number of violations of Article 9 have been found, mostly associated with Greece or with former Soviet-dominated nations.

The court has one judge elected from each member country of the COE, and they must handle a huge workload of cases. There has been a dramatic increase in members of the COE since the fall of the Soviet Union, with many nations formerly dominated by the Soviet Union successfully seeking membership in the COE. This has increased the workload of the court significantly, increasing delays in getting cases reviewed and heard before the court. Just 10 years ago, there were 10,000 to 12,000 cases filed per year, but that figure has grown to more than 50,000 cases per year, leading to a summary dismissal of most cases submitted to the court. A three-judge panel known as the “filtering committee” reviews all cases submitted and decides if the case should be considered further. Reasons for these decisions are not reported, and the process has been criticized for possibly allowing bias to enter the court’s deliberations. There have been concerns also about how the court enforces its rulings. Some nations apparently ignore the judgments or simply pay whatever monetary fines are awarded but do not change their laws or practices.

The ECHR was originally organized quite differently, with a European Commission on Human Rights reviewing all cases and making decisions on the seriousness of the claim and whether it violated the convention. If a case was deemed worthy, it was forwarded to the Council of Ministers made up of all the foreign ministers of the member states. If the ministers decided the case warranted adjudication, then it was referred to a much smaller, and even part-time, ECHR. In 1998, major reforms were undertaken, abolishing the commission and deleting the Council of Ministers from the process. Now the judges of the court handle all cases submitted directly.

The court is located in Strasbourg, France, which is also the home of the European Parliament, the entity that conducts the business of the COE. It has a remarkable library of materials dealing with human rights issues, and its adjudicated cases are compiled in a massive database, HUDOC, which is accessible to all via the Internet.

EUROPEAN UNION

The European Union is a political supranational and intergovernmental organization sui generis, with characteristics of both a joint federation of countries and a federal state but not acting entirely as one or the other. More precisely, the label European Union (EU) applies to a system of interstate cooperation communities and treaties. The name currently refers to the overall framework consisting of the European Communities (EC and European Atomic Energy Community [EURATOM]—supranational), the Police and Judicial Co-operation in Criminal Matters (PJCC—intergovernmental), and the Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP—intergovernmental). Following the passage of the Reformation Treaty of Lisbon, however, these three areas of cooperation merged to become the new EU and a single judicial entity. As of 2010, the EU spanned 27 European nations, almost half a billion people, and 23 languages, with one of the biggest GDPs in the world. It is a global hot spot of ethnic, economic, cultural, and religious interaction and integration. The EU is not to be confused with the Western European Union or the Council of Europe.

The main competences or powers of the EU are economy (common market; customs; trade of services, capital, and goods; currency policy; agriculture; and regional and structural development), environment and energy policy, infrastructure and traffic policy, and to some degree foreign policy, education, and social policy. The following sections review the history, structure, and religious profile of the EU.

History

Following the devastating wake of World War II, the remaining European nations pledged mutual cooperation, communication, and harmonization of national interests to overcome the vicious cycle of the security dilemma. After the founding of the Council of Europe in 1949, a mere discussion forum, the first real breakthrough was reached in 1951/1952. With the Treaty of Paris, the age-old conflict between Germany and France over resource-rich border areas was finally defused. The new European Community for Steel and Coal (ECSC) created the first supranational organization in the world's history. An independent market for coal and steel, overviewed by an independent commission, judiciary, and representatives of the involved governments and ministers, was the first step for six nations (France, West Germany, Belgium, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and Italy) to conglomerate certain key areas of national sovereignty. The declared goals of this young organization were (and still are) peace and security, prosperity, a new self-concept, freedom and mobility, and to become a common international power.

Even as early as 1957 to 1958, the so-called treaties of Rome pushed for integration. The founding of the EURATOM and European Economic Community (EEC) created a three-pillar system that kept the EU operational. To achieve the goals of a customs union, common policies of agriculture and trade and free transportation of goods, capital, and services (in short, the creation of a common market), the Rome treaties established the European Commission, the European Parliament, and the Council of the European Communities. These institutions later became the core of the EU. The years 1965 to 1967 saw the merger treaty of Brussels combine the first three communities (ECSC, EURATOM, and EEC) into the European Community (EC) and confirmed another early goal of the six founding states: peaceful expansion to the rest of Europe. In 1973, the first northern expansion brought the United Kingdom, Ireland, and Denmark into the EC. Greece joined 8 years later.

In 1986 to 1987, the Single European Act set a deadline for the establishment of the common market and created the European Political Cooperation (the first foreign policy coordination and forerunner of the CFSP). In the same year, Spain and Portugal were admitted to join after they embraced democratic forms of government. The Treaty of the EU, signed in Maastricht in 1992 to 1993, established the pillar structure, enlarged the competences of the EC/EU, and determined to create a common currency, the euro. Sweden, Finland, and Austria joined in 1995—the second northern enlargement. Two years later, the Treaty of Amsterdam established the European citizenship, significantly bolstered the rights of the European Parliament, and again confirmed the overall goals of freedom, justice, and security. In 2001, the Laeken Declaration expressed the will of the member states to extend European integration by constituting a convent for drafting a European constitution. Also in 2001, the Treaty of Nice was signed to amend the treaties of Maastricht and Rome and to prepare the EU for the upcoming eastern expansion. In 2004, the European Constitution was signed by all European heads of state but failed after referenda in France and the Netherlands (2005) and therefore could not be ratified. The first eastern expansion took place nevertheless, and the EU grew by another 10 nations (Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Czech Republic, Slovenia, Slovakia, Hungary, Malta, and Cyprus) in 2004. Three years later, with the second eastern expansion, Romania and Bulgaria joined the now 27-member-strong federation. Also in 2007, under the German presidency, the Reform Treaty of Lisbon was set up to reach essentially the same structural changes envisioned by the failed constitution: (a) the change of voting mechanism, (b) further reinforcement of the parliament, (c) abolition of the pillar system, (d) the establishment of a European President and a High Commissioner for Foreign Affairs, (e) provisions for further enlargement, (f) the creation of an EU public prosecutor and a withdrawal clause, and (g) declaring the European Charter of Fundamental Rights legally binding. The Lisbon Treaty was rejected by an Irish referendum in 2008, causing a major crisis in the integration process. Following renegotiation, a second referendum took place in Ireland, and Germany, Poland, and the Czech Republic have ratified the treaty as well.

Structure

The main EU institutions are the European Council, the Council of the EU, the European Parliament, the European Commission, and the European Court.

- The European Council brings the heads of state, the foreign ministers, and the president of the Commission together. It has no legislative power and is not integrated into the practical structure of the EU. It nevertheless sets the guidelines of the overall European policy; by this council, the presidency (changing every half a year by rotation between member states) becomes a powerful tool of integration policy.

- The Council of the EU is one of two legislative organs of the EU. It combines the area secretaries of member states and drafts laws in conjunction with the parliament. The voting mechanism varies depending on policy area. The president is the secretary of the leading nation in the European Council.

- The European Parliament is the second part of the legislative branch, and its constituents are elected directly every 5 years by all EU citizens, as they have been since 1979. It has 785 members. Nonetheless, the parliament remains weak regarding legislative processes since most of the laws are made by the council, causing heavy criticism of the deficiency of the democracy of the EU.

- The European Commission functions principally as the executive branch, but it also possesses the sole initiative right to propose laws and is therefore a key constituent of the legislative. It consists of 27 commissioners appointed for durations of 5 years by every member state. As in a national cabinet, every commissioner has his or her own responsibility. The commissioners are independent of national will and act according to their sole discretion. So the commission is a complete supranational institution. The commission elects the president.

- The European Court of Justice is composed of one judge out of every member state and nine general attorneys. It is the judicative branch of the EU.

The classical “checks and balances” procedure of federal states has been realized in the EU to a limited degree by means of this breakdown of power. For example, the commissioners are not elected by the parliament, which has no power in certain policy areas (PJCC and CFSP). Therefore, the national governments (the executives) sometimes override their home parliaments and pass laws through the EU, which members have to ratify. This is the main concern of the Lisbon Treaty, which aims to strengthen the European Parliament.

Religion and Religiousness Within the EU

The EU combines a multiculturally diverse area containing all major religions. More than two thirds of the European population are followers of an institutionalized religion. The strongest faction numerically is Christianity (about 80%): Roman Catholicism (approximately two thirds), Protestantism, and Orthodox Christianity. But an estimated Muslim population of 25–30 million and about 2–3 million Jewish Europeans (declining) add to the religious landscape, as does the presence of followers of Buddhism, Sikhism, Hinduism, Baha’i, and Neo-Paganism to a lesser degree (less than 1%). According to the special Eurobarometer Nr. 225 of 2005, 52% of the EU population believes in God, and another 27% thinks that there is some sort of spirit or life force (countries with more than 50% of the population believing in God: Malta 95%, Cyprus 90%, Greece 81%, Portugal 81%, Poland 80%, Italy 74%, Ireland 73%, Slovakia 61%, Spain 59%, Austria 54%; countries with less than 40%: United Kingdom 38%, Latvia 37%, Slovenia 37%, France 34%, Netherlands 34%, Denmark 31%, Sweden 23%, Czech Republic 19%, and Estonia 16%). Of the later-integrated countries, 90% in Romania and 40% in Bulgaria profess belief in God, as does 95% of the Turkish population. Turkey has been an official candidate country since 1999 and has been negotiating possible admission since 2005.

Alternative beliefs are strong in major Protestant countries (Estonia 54%, Czech Republic 50%, Sweden 53%, and Denmark 49%) but also in some major Catholic countries (Latvia 49% and Slovenia 46%). Eurostat’s Eurobarometer shows that more women (58%) than men (45%) believe in God. Additionally, those who are 55+ years old (63%) and politically conservative (57%) associate themselves with faith.

Church attendance rates are generally very low. Only in Italy (55%) and Poland (71%) are the numbers significant. Similarly, in Italy (47%) and Poland (53%), many people say that they pray daily at the least. In most other EU countries, these rates are around 30%.

Regarding the status of personal belief and the condition of churches, one must conclude that the role of churches and importance of spirituality (church attendance and prayer) in Europe is weakening—except in Poland and Italy. Nevertheless, some form of individualized religion is clearly visible, for every other EU citizen professes a belief in God.

As an official state church/religion, Christianity can only be found in Malta (Roman Catholic), the United Kingdom (Anglicanism), Cyprus (Orthodox), Denmark (Protestant), and Greece (Orthodox), but many states have some special judicial treatment or relationship with certain religions. Laicism is the constitutional approach toward religion in France, Portugal, and the candidate nation Turkey. In all states, freedom of religion is guaranteed, but nonetheless, religious conflicts are still a major issue in and around the EU. Violent riots between Protestants and Catholics, for example, regularly erupt in Northern Ireland, and the genocide of Muslims in Bosnia-Herzegovina in 1995, in the very backyard of the EU, proves the significance of ethnic-religious components in political conflicts.

The EU and Religion

The EU itself is a secular body and avoids direct involvement with religions as far as possible in accordance with the maxim of church and state separation. It is worth noting that although churches or religious groups played no significant role in its genesis, Catholics were visible among the founding fathers (i.e., Robert Schuman, Konrad Adenauer). The main competence of the EU still lies in economic issues, but the integration of European economics is complete, and therefore, a subsequent cultural integration is fast advancing.

Only rarely does the EU address religious issues directly. Guided by the principle of the subsidiary (according to which the EU can act only when the actions of individual countries is insufficient), the EU's ability to pass laws is restricted to its competences (as described in the European treaties) and by national capabilities.

- The EU Treaty states that “the Union shall respect fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms” (Title I, Article 6, para. 2).

- Declaration 11 in the Treaty of Amsterdam affirms that the EU respects the status of churches, religious groups, and other groups in every member state according to its national law.
- European Community Treaty, Article 13 provides that the Council of the EU has the competence to act against discrimination because of sex, race, ethnicity, religion or worldview, disability, age, or sexual orientation on all levels as it sees fit—a very controversial regulation because it gives the EC the power to pass laws against religious discrimination, such as those regarding employee selection in church communities or sexual discrimination in Catholic clerical policy.
- The Preamble of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU states that the EU recognizes the spiritual and moral heritage of Europe in affirming “human dignity, freedom, equality, and solidarity.”
- The European Social Charter, Community Charter of Social Rights of Employees, and Convention for the Protection of Human Rights affirm nondiscrimination and freedom of religion.

The complete body of European Community law (i.e., laws passed by the European Commission and European Parliament)—the so-called acquis communautaire—contains numerous laws regulating areas such as labor; privacy; culture; the treatment of animals; economics, finance, and customs; divorce; same-sex marriage; sexual education; and abortion. The acquis communautaire, which consists of approximately 85,000 pages of laws, codes, and regulations, must be implemented absolutely by every new candidate as a condition of admission to the EU. Although there is no law concerning religious institutions directly, the EU does regulate key issues concerning religion and personal life. Some of its policies on religion have been criticized, especially in Poland, Malta, and Italy, for failing to make appropriate exceptions or adjustments to various laws when applied specifically to religious groups. Examples include the requirements that sacramental bread for the Eucharist be printed with a use-by date; monasteries that produce milk or wine abide by laws concerning quotas, production, and distribution; and priests, regarded by the EU as independent contractors, have a right to a pension, even if they worked outside the EU, for example, as missionaries.

A special case of European Law is the proposed European Constitution. It would have reformed the primary law had it not been rejected, yet the discussion about a reference to God in the preamble and the famous Article I-52 can only be seen as a clear indication of a European legal interest in religion. During the drafting process, for example, religious groups tried to implement specific Christian or religious references. As part of an effort to make the process transparent, all citizens could make proposals via the Internet and comment on every proposal. The Conference of European Churches and the Commission des Episcopats de la Communauté Européenne (Commission of Bishops of the EC), especially, proved to be very engaged. Discussion in a variety of religious and humanistic contexts led to an examination of European values. Different proposals, ranging from a total absence of any reference to religion (advocated mainly by France) to an invocation of the Holy Trinity (supported by Greece and Ireland), revealed the problematic nature of Europe's cultural diversity. In the end, the preamble called on the cultural, religious, and humanistic inheritance of Europe. Therefore, no direct invocation of God and no reference to the Christian heritage found their way into the draft. But Article I-52 (Status of Churches and Non-Confessional Organizations) recognized the importance of religion for the European integration process and therefore established an open, transparent, and regular dialogue with churches and non-confessional organizations. This development cannot be underestimated because, for the first time, it elevates churches and religious groups to the status of independent legal bodies, not merely subjects of law as they had been since the Treaty of Amsterdam. Other articles in the proposed constitution relate to freedom of faith, conscience, and creed; the right to education; nondiscrimination; and respect for the diversity of cultures, religions, and languages.

The EU's institutions have their own relationship to religion. The commission has established permanent contact with more than 150 religious organizations, churches, and nonconfessional groups (in 2006), more than 50 of which have their own representation in Brussels. Since 1982, a special advisor to the president of the commission deals with religious questions via the Bureau of European Policy Advisors, formed in 2005. The European Parliament includes many members of various religious parties, and they have held monthly ecumenical prayer meetings and annual prayer breakfasts since 1980. An ecumenical prayer room in the parliament building is still a source of controversy. The Council of the EU has only seldom ever made contact with religion, and an institutionalized European religious dialogue has yet to be realized. The extreme heterogeneity of the EU caused a major identity crisis—resulting in the lowest voter turnouts in EU history in 2009—and an ongoing search for common values, moral integrity, and legitimacy.

EVANGELICAL MOVEMENTS

Even though in the United States “Evangelicals” are often seen as supporters of the status quo, this religiously conservative Christian sector has started and joined movements, both religious and sociopolitical, of all kinds. Indeed, sociologist Michael Young has argued that the religious sentiments, rituals, and theology of American Evangelicals in the temperance and antislavery movements played the primary role in the development of the first national social movements in the United States by laying the groundwork for a “confessional protest” mixing public confession with strategic organizing. Evangelicals are no strangers to social movements.

A Global Phenomenon

Today, Evangelicals from Asia and the Global South are at least as active in social movements, if not more so, than their counterparts in North America and western Europe. In fact, the enormous growth of evangelicalism, especially in its Pentecostal and charismatic expressions, is arguably one of the most successful global movements of the 20th century. After all, Pentecostalism emerged from a tiny group of marginal religious enthusiasts in Kansas and California at the beginning of the century only to become a vast swath of global Christianity representing, by conservative estimates, approximately 250 million people, or 4% of the global population. Although a number of large denominations such as the Assemblies of God do exist, Pentecostalism has been a largely schismatic movement from its inception, aided in part by its institutional flexibility. Dissatisfied members or clergy who feel so moved by the Holy Spirit can separate to form new or independent congregations and denominations and tend to do so with great frequency and entrepreneurial zeal. Furthermore, Pentecostal congregations, both in North America as well as in the Global South, provide rituals of healing and a warm surrogate family that aid many in negotiating personal and familial crises—crises that are all too common in the barrios, favelas, and shantytowns on the outskirts of a globalized economy. But Pentecostalism’s greatest vitality and a key factor in its attraction lies in its ability to tap deep emotions within the worship service, harnessing enthusiastic music, close physical proximity, and mutual focus of attention to generate moments of personal transformation, especially amenable to individuals (e.g., “exiting” gang members) eager to reconstruct a failed or stigmatized identity.

Traditionally, Pentecostals, who understand themselves as firmly within the evangelical tradition, have tended to embrace the conservative doctrine of evangelical Christianity and bear a decidedly sectarian approach to politics. They have thus preferred to focus on matters of the soul rather than get involved in the messy world of politics. But Donald Miller and Tetsunao Yamomori have argued that a new generation of “progressive Pentecostals” is emerging around the globe. Spurred to action by theological reflection and a “coming of age,” as more and more Pentecostal youth gain an education and become professionals, these progressives still tend to avoid direct political action but aim to address the social and physical in addition to the spiritual needs of the poor in their communities. Although the authors believe that progressive Pentecostalism is gaining momentum, they recognize that there are other forces within Pentecostalism that have led many in other directions, including a “health and wealth” gospel.

Brazil

Not all evangelical movements restrict their activities to meeting spiritual needs or engaging in charity. One of the more interesting movements among Evangelicals in Latin America is the Brazilian evangelical Black movement recently documented by John Burdick. Burdick, an anthropologist, provides evidence of a burgeoning antiracism movement spearheaded by African Brazilian Evangelicals. Beginning in the 1980s and gaining momentum in the late 1990s, this rapidly growing movement combines evangelical conviction with active efforts to combat racism and build a strong Black identity. In the decade from 1995 to 2005, Burdick documents the emergence of more than 30 such Black evangelical antiracism groups, culminating in the creation of a coordinating committee called the Movimiento de Negros Evangélicos (Movement of Black Evangelicals). Especially significant is the fact that, in contrast to the preexisting non-Christian Black movements, the evangelical Black movement speaks a language well understood by a vast swath of the Brazilian population. Furthermore, Burdick's study seems especially prescient given the strong showing of support in the 2010 elections for Marina Silva, the Green Party candidate and the first African Brazilian candidate to make a strong showing in a presidential election. As an evangelical and an environmentalist who publicly opposed abortion, Silva and her presidential bid, which forced a runoff by grabbing nearly 20% of the vote, remind us that evangelical movements in the Global South today often break the conservative mold cast by 20th-century American Evangelicals.

Asia

In Asia, most Evangelicals face a vastly different cultural and political context than that experienced by their counterparts in the Americas. In some places within the region, it is not uncommon for local and national political leaders to oppose and even repress Evangelicals for their unwillingness to abide by restrictions of religious and civic gatherings. Nevertheless, evangelical growth has been strong for several decades, and authors such as David Lumsdaine argue that Evangelicals have contributed cultural and institutional resources that have helped move democratization forward throughout the region both through conscious mobilization efforts as well as through the indirect impact of a strengthened notion of individual agency and personal initiative among evangelical citizens. In the same volume, Young-gi Hong uses interviews with pastors and civic leaders (including a former president and evangelical) as well as polling data and historical documents to detail the extent of the contribution of Korean Evangelicals to democratization in that country. There, the contribution of Evangelicals has taken the form of direct organizing among congregations, clergy, and evangelical students and intellectuals who began organizing democratic activism as early as the 1970s, in spite of the repressive tactics of the military government of the time. These Evangelicals began gathering in Christian worship spaces (alongside Catholic priests and activists) to protest and plan demonstrations, since the Korean autocracy was less likely to exercise repression on groups meeting in places of worship. Although many if not most rank-and-file Korean Evangelicals were not supportive at first of the Christian students and intellectuals at the forefront of the movement for democratization, that changed during the 1980s, especially in 1987, after a university student died from torture while in the hands of Korean police. The event helped crystallize the democratization movement and made active participants out of even the conservative evangelical denominations.

By June of the same year, the political pressure was so intense as to force the hand of an incoming president who conceded to holding autonomous elections, reforming the constitution, and establishing freedom of expression and of the press. Although the Roman Catholic Church played a crucial role in the movement, Hong argues that evangelical denominations played an outsized role in this key moment due to their (1) increasing numerical strength, (2) organizational capacity, (3) international connections, and (4) economic and financial resources. Since 1987, civic groups promoting social justice and democracy proliferated, and once again, Evangelicals have played an important role, with some estimating that as many as 70% of participants belong to evangelical churches. One such group, the Christian Ethics movement, grew out of a Bible study among professors of Korean Christianity at the national university in 1987. Today, as Hong notes, the Christian Ethics movement, which advocates noncoercive promotion of ideals such as economic equality and social justice as well as ethical leadership by example among the evangelical congregations, boasts a membership of more than 10,000.

United States

Evangelicals in the United States continue to participate in a variety of social and religious movements. Although lack of space prevents discussion of evangelical initiatives such as the evangelical environmental movement or the broadly supported evangelical efforts to fight AIDS in Africa, one movement that begs mentioning is the so-called emerging church movement. The term emerging (or emergent) was embraced by a loosely knit cadre of young pastors and theologians dissatisfied with what they believe is a defensive, reactionary stance with regard to religious pluralism and post-Christendom in the West. The movement gained momentum in the early 2000s as its spokespersons sought to re-imagine both a theology and an ecclesiology that allowed for considerable ambiguity, welcoming, rather than defending against, the narrative turn in literature and postmodern philosophy. While the movement draws inspiration from its understanding of early Christian churches, its most active spokespersons tend to eschew theological shibboleths as alienating and uninspiring. Instead, leaders like Brian McLaren have advocated for a “generous orthodoxy” that draws on the strengths of a variety of Christian theological traditions and seeks to explore biblical themes as narratives rather than define and protect boilerplate theological doctrine. The emerging leaders, most of whom consider themselves firmly within the evangelical tradition, have riled many of the more traditional evangelical leaders and theologians. Furthermore, a number of emergent author-ministers such as McLaren, Robb Bell, and Greg Boyd—the spokespersons of the movement are almost all well-educated White males—tend to be highly critical of U.S. foreign policy and of capitalist consumerism, thus angering and alienating many evangelical rank and file. Finally, the movement’s openly critical stance toward institutionalization and formal leadership roles may have already undercut its longevity as a definable movement. Nevertheless, the fact that these authors continue to sell books and fill large venues in spite of the vocal opposition of prominent evangelical leaders seems to indicate that, whatever their status as a “movement” with a name and institutional structure, their message continues to find an audience, especially among a younger cohort of educated Evangelicals.

Conclusion

Evangelical movements today exist in great abundance and variety. This fact should hardly come as a surprise, given Evangelicals’ long tradition of disestablishment and lack of a clearly defined governance structure for unifying or regulating action. Thus, they continue to adopt and adapt cultural and social movements according to the particular context in which they find themselves.

FAITH TOURISM

Faith tourism—also known as religious tourism, special-interest tourism, knowledge-based tourism, and heritage tourism—is a form of religious travel that is motivated principally but not exclusively by the spiritual or religious content and associated services of the destination. It thereby covers a wide variety of both secular and religious purposes, including recreation, leisure, interest, intellectual edification, healing, and spiritual experiences. Faith tourism does not apply to a journey that carries a religious purpose, act, or practice in itself and therefore lies in the somewhat vague area between secular tourism and pilgrimage. The destination nevertheless must contain some sort of spiritual value for the visitor and can usually be broken down into five categories: (1) natural locales (sacred places, e.g., the Sea of Galilee), (2) religious buildings (temples and shrines, e.g., the Dome of the Rock), (3) buildings that incorporate religious content (museums, e.g., the Vatican Museum), (4) special events or festivals with a religious background (e.g., Ganesh Chaturthi), and (5) secular sites connected to a particular sacral happening or meaning (e.g., Lourdes, when it is visited outside the pilgrimage context). The visitor or visiting group is not obligated to spiritually identify with the religious background of the destination, nor need the sites necessarily be associated with current or existing religions. The travel must be voluntary, temporary, and unpaid for if it is to be considered a type of faith tourism.

Tourism is a constantly growing business, and its profitability has soared since the evolution of mass tourism in the 1960s. In economic jargon, faith tourism belongs to the category of special-interest tourism, which requires a particular set of management skills. Problems such as accessibility, noise protection, maintenance, and waste management must be solved without damaging the spiritual content (the “religious capital”) of the site. Thus, the atmosphere at the site is an essential part of faith tourism, but it is at the same time extremely vulnerable to contamination by the more mundane issues involved with its upkeep.

A relatively recent development in the realm of faith tourism is the attempt to commercially generate religious capital (e.g., religious theme parks, old or distinctive churches that attract tourism, etc.). Such capitalization on religious piety is a manifestation of a greater historical issue: whether spiritual value can be artificially created or managed like a secular product or service. This more contemporary phenomenon has yet to establish itself as a common characteristic of faith tourism.

With a growing amount of travelers motivated by religious attraction of some sort, religious organizations recognized the opportunity for connecting faith tourism to proselytizing; in other words, they discovered the public relations value of faith tourism. Therefore, religious sites that are especially famous have increasingly become assets to enhance the public image of the religion itself and to generate income. Furthermore, competition over both possible and currently existing sites is a problematic side effect that heightens tensions between religions whose relations may already be heavily strained. Another issue is the perceived profanization or desacralization of the sites by tourists. Thus, the tourist and religious value of a certain site can be contradictory and raise an immense field of problems within the religion.

FALUN GONG

Falun Gong, also known as Falun Dafa, is a new religious movement that draws on Chinese Buddhist, Daoist, and qigong traditions to promote a system of daily practice that aims at the transformation of one's "human flesh-body" into an immortal Buddha body. The movement's founder, Li Hongzhi, rapidly rose to fame amid the widespread popularity of qigong practices in Chinese society in the 1980s and 1990s, claiming that Falun Gong was distinct from and superior to any other practice or path. Having emerged in northeastern China in 1992, the group claimed as many as 70 million practitioners in China by the time the movement was outlawed by the Chinese Communist Party in 1999, when it was officially denounced as an evil cult. After years of reeducation programs for one-time practitioners in China, Falun Gong has reportedly been eradicated in that country. Over the same period of time the movement has spread around the globe, claiming worldwide practitioners numbering more than 100 million, though this number cannot be verified as Falun Gong maintains no records of membership. Li currently lives in exile in the United States, continuing to lecture around the world as well as to disseminate his writings via the Internet.

Li's teachings can be seen to adopt and adapt many well-known concepts and practices found generally throughout China's myriad religious traditions, yet Li also eschews tradition, purporting to offer a highly individualized spiritual practice suitable for anyone regardless of personal income, background, or social standing. Through the daily performance of five physical exercises and adherence to the teachings of Master Li, adherents aim to transform themselves in an effort both to harmonize and to ultimately transcend this world. Falun Gong followers believe that Li has implanted invisible mechanisms within them to aid their spiritual and physical progress, including a fa lun or dharma wheel as well as more than 10,000 qiji or energy mechanisms. The exercises are intended to reinforce the work of these implanted mechanisms. Benefits of this process range from the achievement of perfect health to the development of supernormal powers such as precognition.

Practitioners around the world, including Taiwan and Hong Kong, Australia and New Zealand, Western Europe, Canada, and the United States, gather regularly at public parks, some daily, others weekly, to perform the Falun Gong exercises. Many groups also meet regularly to read and discuss the writings of Li Hongzhi. Since 1999, practitioners in some countries regularly maintain a presence at the entrances of popular tourist sites, handing out literature and displaying posters promoting Falun Gong as a method of cultivation practice as well as attempting to draw attention to what it says are the horrors of the Chinese government's campaign against the group.

FARAJ, ABD AL-SALAM (1952–1982)

Muhammad Abd al-Salam Faraj was a primary figure in the formation of Tanzim al-Jihad (Jihad Organization), also known as Islamic Jihad, the militant Islamist group that carried out the assassination of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in 1981. His pamphlet The Neglected Duty (al-Faridah al-Gha'iba), regarded as one of the most coherent statements of modern Jihadist ideology, builds on and further articulates the framework laid forth in Sayyid Qutb's Milestones. Most salient is his logical expansion of Qutb's doctrine that present society and its ruling authorities were directly comparable with the pagan state of pre-Islamic society, known in Arabic as al-jahiliyyah (the age of ignorance). Faraj, implicated in Sadat's assassination, was executed in 1982.

Faraj, an engineer by profession, was a member of the Muslim Brotherhood but was unsympathetic to the organization's gradual approach to Islamic revival. Faraj parted with the group, seeking more direct militant solutions to the perceived problem of secular government that prevented the implementation of an Islamic state ruled by Islamic law (Shari'a). He also disagreed with other radical Islamist groups, such as Mustafa al-Shukri's Takfir wa al-Hijra (Excommunication and Withdrawal), whose members physically separated themselves from society and lived in communes outside urban centers. Faraj regarded such approaches as ultimately succumbing to the tyranny of jahiliyyah and undermining the mandated duty of physically combating the non-Islamic state. As such, Faraj preferred infiltrating the security services and the military to take over the state machinery directly and then impose a Shari'a-based Islamic system. In the short run, Faraj's strategy was successful—Khaled Islambouli, Sadat's assassin, was an army lieutenant.

Jansen (1986) began The Neglected Duty with an emphasis on jihad as an offensive struggle (refusing to confine it to spiritual struggle or defensive struggle), which is fundamental to the revival of Islam:

Jihad, . . . in spite of its extreme importance and its great significance for the future of this religion, has been neglected by the ulema

(religious scholars) of this age. They have feigned ignorance of it, but they know that it is the only way to the return and the establishment of the glory of Islam anew. (pp. 160–161)

The ultimate end goal of his treatise is the restoration of the Caliphate, which, in turn, is only possible through the establishment of an Islamic state.

Echoing Qutb's radical reading of the Qur'anic verse 24:55, "Whosoever does not rule by what God sent down, those, they are the unbelievers," Faraj declares the Muslim administrators of a non-Islamic state to be infidels. This distinct theological position provides the basis for the legitimization of warfare against a Muslim leader and was used as justification for the assassination of Sadat. As an appeal to orthodoxy and tradition, Faraj grounded himself in the rulings (fatwas) of the revered medieval jurist Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328) and thus compared the present leaders with the Mongols, who after conquering Muslim lands, allegedly only nominally converted to Islam.

FAROE ISLANDS

The globalization of religious culture is confronted in the Faroe Islands, an isolated island cluster in the North Atlantic Ocean, north of Scotland and midway between Iceland and Norway. Its diverse Christian influences were imported and deeply integrated during the 20th century and more recently have been affected by the movements for exporting evangelization overseas.

In this peripheral society of fewer than 50,000 Faroese, self-governing within the kingdom of Denmark since 1948, about 85% of the inhabitants belong to the Lutheran Church. This church was a diocese of the Church of Denmark until July 29, 2007, when it became independent and one of the smallest state churches in the world. Although registered in the state church, many Faroese attend other churches. Indeed, apart from this state church, three main influences have shaped the religious landscape of the Faroe Islands.

The Calvinist influence of the Plymouth Brethren was first introduced in 1865 by the Scottish missionary William G. Sloan and today reaches around 15% of the population, with more than 27 churches. Nineteenth-century Christian revivalist movements, such as Grundtvigian pietism from Denmark, established 30 churches and greatly influenced evangelical culture on the Faroe Islands. Finally, Pentecostalism of Norwegian influence made inroads after 1920. It now accounts for around 6% of the population and 10 churches. In addition, many free Pentecostal believers do not belong to any denomination and attend private religious services at home. Since the 1980s, a growing interest in charismatic revival focuses on the intimacy of relationship with Jesus and the theology of personal success, particularly among the youngest believers.

This unusually high rate of believers gives to the Faroe Islands a singular Christian status among the Nordic secularized societies. In recent decades, globalization has revitalized the internationalization of religious activity. The biggest charismatic churches frequently invite foreign preachers to perform “worship meetings.” Many Faroese travel abroad to attend Bible studies courses in Norway, Scotland, or North America. They generally come back with an increased legitimacy in their own church and sometimes found a new one. All the churches are also affiliated with Christian missionaries’ international networks that they actively support, both financially and by sending staffs. The Plymouth Brethren have about 50 missionaries in permanent positions worldwide, whereas Home Missions are known for annually sending young people to different countries. When they finish high school, these young believers often take a break for several weeks or months and get new experience by spreading the gospel or doing volunteer work.

Thus, there is a strong religious culture in Faroese society. However, it can also be a subject of great controversy. At the local level of villages, two or three churches traditionally divide the community into distinctive networks of social and economic membership. At the national level, the distinction between born-again Christians (represented in parliament) and secular Christians asserts itself more and more, especially on issues such as abortion, homosexuality, gender equality, creationism, and Darwinism.

FATHER DIVINE AND THE PEACE MISSION MOVEMENT

Father Divine (1876–1965) was the founder of the International Peace Mission Movement, a new religious movement that sought to bring about racial harmony as well as alleviate the suffering of the poor and disadvantaged in inner-city America during the middle decades of the 20th century. At its height in the 1930s and 1940s, the Peace Mission movement claimed upward of 2 million supporters and 150 centers operating throughout the United States, Canada, Western Europe, and Australia. Since Father Divine’s death in 1965, the work of the Peace Mission Movement has been guided by Mother Divine (Edna Rose “Sweet Angel” Ritchings), whose vision has transformed the movement, for the most part, into a well-respected, albeit declining, charitable organization.

Little of certainty is known of the early life of Reverend Major Jealous Divine (born George Baker Jr.) before 1919, when he, his first wife, Peninniah (d. 1943), and a small group of followers settled on Long Island, New York. Lacking formal education, Father Divine worked as a gardener and itinerant preacher, his own brand of religion being a mix of New Thought (a late-19th-century spiritual movement emphasizing positive thinking) and a personal ethic that stressed hard work, good health, and responsible living. Father Divine's message had its greatest appeal among poor urban African Americans, whose lives Divine sought to improve, especially during the hard economic times of the Great Depression. During this period, Father Divine provided work for his followers and welcomed all who were in need to dine at sumptuously prepared meals for as little as 5 cents. He argued that it was work, not welfare, that gave worth to a man.

As early as 1912, Father Divine had claimed divine status, at first adopting the title "The Messenger" and later simply declaring himself to be God as well as the second coming of Christ. Divine taught that with his appearing, a new dispensation had dawned, one in which the peace and goodwill of God would spread throughout the world and war, sickness, hunger, hatred, social injustice, and despair would no longer plague humankind.

Despite his claims to being the incarnation of God, or perhaps because of it, Father Divine inspired donations from a number of wealthy individuals. One such donation, the 72-acre estate Woodmont outside Philadelphia, became the movement's headquarters and Father and Mother Divine's home after 1953. In addition to the belief in the divinity of Father Divine, the Peace Mission required and continues to require its members to observe a strict moral code, which includes bans on alcohol, tobacco, sexual intercourse, and other practices it regards as vice.

FÁTIMA

Fátima is a city in Portugal whose Catholic shrine has become one of the world's largest centers of pilgrimage, religious tourism, and Marian devotion. Although its resident population does not exceed 8,000, Fátima is visited every year by 4 million people, many of whom are walking pilgrims. Beginning with a series of apparitions of the Virgin Mary in 1917, devotion to Our Lady of Fátima has since spread worldwide and originated a network of sister shrines in several other countries, playing an important role in anticommunist and conservative Catholic movements and sensibilities. In spite of this global scope, religious practices in the shrine and along its pilgrimage paths remain largely an expression of Portuguese popular religiosity, revolving around the cure of physical and psychological ailments and the fulfillment of promises.

At the place where Fátima stands today, three young shepherds allegedly witnessed, from May to October 1917, several apparitions of the Virgin Mary. In October 1930, the Catholic Church officially declared the apparitions "worthy of belief," responding to the already massive popular devotion to regain its local power amid a period of strong republican and anticlerical feelings in certain strata of Portuguese society. Since then, the shrine has achieved a privileged status in the Catholic world through the personal commitment of Pope Pius XII, Pope Paul VI, and especially Pope John Paul II, who credited Our Lady of Fátima with saving his life following the assassination attempt in 1981.

Central to the history of Fátima's shrine is Lucia Santos (1907–2005), the only one of the three seers to live through adulthood, who after the apparitions became a Discalced Carmelite nun. In her original reports to the ecclesiastical authorities, Lucia stressed the main points of Our Lady of Fátima's message: the importance of (a) praying the rosary, (b) performing acts of reparation, and (c) converting sinners; these are still the fundamental tenets that structure the "message of Fátima" promoted by the shrine. Later, in her published memoirs and correspondence with church authorities, Lucia articulated these tenets with the struggle against communism and the conversion of Russia, an effort that eventually influenced the consecration of Russia to the Blessed Virgin Mary by Pope Pius XII in 1952.

Insofar as an estimated 100,000 pilgrims arrive each year on foot at Fátima, the shrine stands, along with Compostela, as one of the last bastions of walking pilgrimages in Western Europe. Most pilgrims originate in the rural areas of Portugal, and their practices are modeled according to traditional romarias and the cult of saints; recent studies conclude that healing is still the main motivation that drives the Fátima pilgrim. However, the past decade witnessed a revival of interest among the young, educated, and urban population, largely due to the popularization of St. James's Way to Compostela and the encouragement of the Church for more contemplative and devotional pilgrimage practices, as against the penitential ones.

Fatwa as a practical aspect of Islamic Shari'a law is a nonbinding legal response that is sought by an individual questioner (mustafti) from a jurisconsult (mufti) who practices the act of "fatwa giving" (ifta). Made infamous by events such as those surrounding Ayatullah Khomeini's issuance in 1989 of a fatwa against the publication of the Satanic Verses, charging its author Salman Rushdie with blasphemy and pronouncing a death sentence against him, and the "Declaration of Jihad" (1996) and "Declaration of Jihad Against Jews and Crusaders" (1998), authored by Osama bin Laden (d. 2011) and Ayman al-Zawahiri, the fatwa is not limited to threats of punitive violence or warfare. Fatwas are used for confirming correct ritual practice and social behavior and are representative of the importance of continued ijtihad (independent interpretation of Islamic law and its sources) to the maintenance and construction of authority and practice within predominantly Muslim nation-states, minority Muslim diasporic communities, and discourses of formal schools (madhabib) of religious thought.

As an independent ruling, the fatwa is a synthetic result of the dialectical relationship between the questioner, the questioned, and the question itself. Any legal response by the mufti is delimited by the specificity of the presented question. A mufti is meant neither to investigate all aspects of the question nor to write lengthy disputations as a conclusion. When a question is presented, the mufti will use a process known as taswir al-mas'alah (the envisioning of the question) to bracket the particular elements necessitating a legal response. The mufti will then make an assumption (takyif al-masalah) about the act under question. This is a characterization of the action as permissible or impermissible without any biases toward legality or illegality. A ruling (hukm) completes the fatwa. The mufti is expected to express a ruling using clear, sometimes idiomatic, language that is germane to the situation and demands of the questioner. Once the fatwa is issued, the questioner will receive a copy of the question, and nowadays, the fatwa may be published as part of a redacted collection.

The term fatwa is derived from the trilateral Arabic root f-t-w, and in its 4th (afta) and 10th (istifta) derived verbal forms, it indicates the practice of asking and answering questions. Though the Qur'an does not contain specific reference to these terms as a legal enterprise, it does contain 500 verses of ascertainable legal proscriptions and sources for legislation. The Qur'an, intended as the final divine revelation of the will of God for humanity, along with the sunna (the sayings and actions) of Prophet Muhammad, is the foundational element of Islamic legal and theological discourses. Early legal principles, such as consensus (ijmā) and analogy (qiyas), alongside other instruments, were formed by the ulema (religious scholars) as the foundations of Islamic legal theory (usul al-fiqh) so that all legal rulings (ahkam, singular Hukm) could be grounded within the two primary sources.

By the ninth century (the third century of the Islamic calendar), scholars discussing Islamic jurisprudential discourses were in open conflict about the utility of the concepts of ra'y (opinion) and 'ilm (knowledge) for the practice of Islamic law. Fatwa rulings, as a form of ijtihad, were issued in response to rapidly changing social and political circumstances. The categories and boundaries necessary for authorizing the formation of legal opinions—and for determining those individuals permitted to issue fatwas—arose from debates between the partisans of ra'y and 'ilm. The Risalah (thesis) of Abu 'Abdullah Muhammad Ibn Idris al-Shafi'i (767–820 CE) was among the initial articulations of formal approaches for the production and interpretation of new legal rulings and opinions. Al-Shafi'i felt that to qualify as a mufti, an individual must be a mujtahid capable of exercising ijtihad and possessing a deep knowledge of the sources and instruments of law (usul al-fiqh).

Though the mufti was required to be a mujtahid by al-Shafi'i, the qualifications were later transformed with the emergence of particular schools of interpretation. The conditions required for the exercise of ifta were taqwa (a pious belief in Islam), 'adala (justice or integrity), and independent legal reasoning (ijtihad). A mufti possessing these characteristics could be either a freed person or a slave, male or female, and healthy or physically challenged. The advice of the mufti, who was to view the practice of ifta as an incumbent religious duty, was sought by high political authorities, local magistrates, judges (qadat, singular qadi), or individuals possessing neither public obligation nor duty.

Within Islamic legal and theological discourses, there coincided with the debates of the partisans of reason and tradition a gradual shift toward a coherence of legal authority, necessitating doctrinal and hermeneutical uniformity. Scholars such as the Cordoban jurist Ibn Rushd (1058–1126) and the Shafi'ite scholar Abu 'Amr Uthman Ibn al-Salah (d. 1245) constructed typologies meant to locate muftis within a spectrum of jurists balancing the demands of independent legal thought with the demands of affiliation to a tradition. Often, the typological spectrum included, at one end, the mujtahid, an independent scholar using ijtihad, and, at the other, the muqallid, one who ruled on the basis of a taqlid (tradition) of a particular legal and doctrinal affiliation. These categories were often intermingled; a mufti was often either a muqallid or a mujtahid.

While the mujtahid was essentially an independent position, the position of the mufti gradually became associated with political authority. Collections of fatwas, representing an authoritative and edited corpus of an individual mufti's legal thought, were circulated throughout societies and increased the popularity of particular muftis. By the second century of Islamic government, the Umayyad Caliphate invited muftis to participate in political activities in an effort to control the use of the fatwa as a source of political criticism. Such associations later led to state apparatuses for licensing particular muftis. Within the Ottoman Empire, the fatwa (or fetva in Ottoman Turkish) proclaimed by the muftis of the Sunnī Hanafi school of religious thought were gradually brought under a central administration. The office of the Shaykh al-Islam, established during the reign of Murad II (1421–1451), became the focus of a network of imperial jurists located throughout the empire who were used to enforce the social order in varying capacities. Though the position of mufti is not as prevalent in historically Shi'a communities, currently the individual holding the authority of marja'-i taqlid (source of emulation) often issues legal rulings on particular social and political behaviors.

The contemporary practice of istifta is both a public and a private practice that occurs through a variety of media, including traditional physical encounters between the questioner and the mufti and, within the digital domain, through submitted e-mails and text messages. A number of nations, demonstrating the continued relationship of the office of the mufti to political authority, have an authorized bureau of fatwa issuance, such as Egypt, which established a state office of grand mufti in 1895, Indonesia (1975), Jordan (1922), Lebanon (1955), Malaysia (1955), Saudi Arabia (1953), and Yemen (1962). Institutions such as Cairo University and Al-Azhar in Egypt, Dar al-Ulum Deoband in India, and Dar al-Ulum in Karachi are among many throughout the Muslim world that feature formal coursework on ifta.

Individual muftis unaffiliated with state institutions have also flourished in the present age due to the proliferation of media technologies of the spoken and written word, such as newspapers and printed texts, the radio and television, and cassettes, compact discs, and digital audio recordings. In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, individuals such as Sayyed Abu al-A'ala Mawdudi (d. 1979) in Pakistan and Muhammad Rashid Rida (d. 1935) in Egypt authored a number of fatwas in their respective publications. Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi (b. 1926), an Egyptian Muslim scholar and mufti who lives and works in Qatar, provides substantial legal advice on his Al Jazeera television program and a website, IslamOnline, that he cofounded.

Contemporary fatwas are issued in response to a variety of questions, many of which reveal both the worldwide nature of fatwa production and the attempt to adapt various ideals of an Islamic lifestyle to the perceived demands of modern society. Many fatwa collections and discussions emphasize particular discussions of social relations and social issues such as political ideologies (e.g., the permissibility of communism or democracy in an Islamic society); human sexuality (e.g., the permissibility of abortion, homosexuality, and transgendered living); religion and violence (e.g., punishments for murder or the question of suicide); alcohol and tobacco consumption; questions of marriage, divorce, and inheritance; and technological consumption (the permissibility of the Internet, television, music, and radio). While questions related to economic transactions are still present in some collections, many contemporary fatwas deal with issues of family law exclusively.

The broad social appeal of fatwas has led to the increasing popularity of muftis perceived to be "liberal" or "conservative." In an effort to seek out particular audiences, many muftis are controversially perceived as being too "populist" with the inclusion of comparative philosophy and religion in their rulings. These developments, however, do not signal a departure from the fatwa tradition but just another historical transformation.

FELLOWSHIP OF RECONCILIATION

Since its founding in 1914, the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR) has been an outspoken advocate of pacifism, economic justice, and racial equality. The FOR has been an international organization with a global perspective from the beginning. Its membership and identity are rooted in liberal Protestant Christianity, and this strong religious identity distinguishes it from other pacifist organizations of comparable vintage, such as the War Resisters League. By the end of the 20th century, the FOR's culture had become considerably more interreligious, with Catholics, Jews, and Buddhists, as well as Protestants, ranking among its most prominent members.

The FOR began in Cambridge, England, during the first months of World War I. The next year saw the formation of an American branch, FOR-USA. Many of the FOR's early members had been missionaries overseas, and their experiences caused them to question the fierce nationalism that fueled the war. During the conflict, they spread their pacifist convictions through other Christian organizations such as the YMCA (Young Men's Christian Association), as well as in military camps for conscientious objectors.

Between the world wars, in the United States, FOR leaders such as A. J. Muste and Reinhold Niebuhr developed alliances with the labor movement as they began to see economic justice as an extension of the peace agenda. Revolutionary labor called into question some of the organization's core convictions; as World War II loomed, it stood nearly alone among its allies in opposition to the conflict. The International FOR sent "Ambassadors of Reconciliation" to world leaders in the hope of easing tensions. During the war years, its members in Europe smuggled Jewish refugees to safety and protested the Allies' practice of saturation bombing.

It was also during the 1930s that its leaders began to discover Mohandas Gandhi and his non-violent independence movement in India. FOR member Richard Gregg traveled to India to learn from Gandhi and synthesized his teachings in The Power of Nonviolence. After the war, the FOR promoted Gandhi's ideas amid the burgeoning African American civil rights movement. In particular, Bayard Rustin and Glenn Smiley worked closely with the movement's leaders to ensure that it would take a nonviolent form. Those turbulent years of civil rights and the Vietnam War witnessed the FOR's greatest prominence, counting Martin Luther King Jr., Dorothy Day, and Thich Nhat Hanh among its active membership.

At the start of the 21st century, the FOR continues its work around the world alongside a variety of other organizations, secular and interreligious. As tensions grow between the West and Iran, it has sent members to Iran to foster dialogue. The FOR facilitates nonviolence training for youth and maintains a program in war-torn Bogota, Colombia. In all, it has a presence in 48 countries around the world.

FENG SHUI (GEOMANCY)

Feng shui (風水, lit. "Wind and Water") is often referred to as "Chinese geomancy," or the art or science of divining by landforms. On the most basic level, feng shui is concerned with the ways in which wind and water flow through landscapes. By extension, it is concerned with the smooth flow of qi (ch'i), or energy, through places and structures, with qi having similar movement patterns as wind and water. Considered comprehensively, feng shui includes astronomical, astrological, cosmological, geographical, and topographical dimensions. It places primary emphasis on the energetic qualities of place, which are then correlated to human constitutions and architectural design, including actual site organization and interior design. In this way, feng shui may be seen as expressing a more bioregional or ecological perspective.

Like qigong (Ch'i-kung), Taiji quan (T'ai-chi ch'üan), and traditional Chinese medicine, feng shui is most often misidentified with Daoism. While Daoists have used feng shui, especially in choosing specific sacred sites as well as in temple compound and monastery design, feng shui is neither inherently nor originally Daoist. It is best characterized as a part of traditional Chinese culture. In contemporary Western societies, feng shui tends to be reduced to interior design for health and wealth. It has become increasingly visible through "feng shui consultants" and corporate architects, who charge large sums of money for their analysis, advice, and design. Traditionally speaking, feng shui has been employed to analyze the qualities of specific sites and to design appropriate buildings. It may also be used to "correct" problems in previously constructed structures.

Feng shui is sometimes divided into feng shui for the dead and feng shui for the living, although from a traditional Chinese perspective the two are not as separate as one may assume. Feng shui for the dead involves selection of appropriate burial sites (full-body interment) and the actual placement of the coffin. In addition to providing support for a happy afterlife for one's deceased relatives (ancestors), this form of feng shui also analyzes the way in which such placement will influence surviving descendants. There are many stories about family arguments over interment matters, with different feng shui consultants providing different advice for specific relatives. This type of feng shui is less common, though it continues to be practiced in rural China and Taiwan.

Feng shui for the living is the more common form of feng shui practice. It parallels the above principles. This type of feng shui focuses on the contours and qualities of specific places, including landforms and compass orientations. It then considers how to place human structures within that landscape. This includes the actual design of the buildings, although the range of those choices was much smaller in a traditional context. The possibilities increase dramatically with the emergence of modern and postmodern architecture. In this respect, feng shui includes external and internal morphology, the materials used, furniture placement, and color choices.

With respect to specific principles and applications, feng shui identifies the “ideal site” as south facing (greatest yang). If the site does not actually face south, feng shui systems, nonetheless, discuss it in terms of “ritual south”—that is, as though it faces south. Feng shui also employs Chinese correlative cosmology or systematic correspondence, which centers on yin and yang and the five phases (Wood, Fire, Earth, Metal, and Water). The five phases have various associations, including Wood/east/azure dragon, Fire/south/vermilion bird, Metal/west/white tiger, and Water/north/mysterious warrior (snake-turtle). If the site is taken as oriented along a north–south axis, feng shui identifies the features in front as the vermilion bird (south), on the right as the white tiger (west), on the left as the azure dragon (east), and in the back as the mysterious warrior (north). This is basically the shape of a horseshoe. Ideally, there should be balance and beneficial influences from each of these. An example might be the following: a large rock formation in the rear (north), a strand of willow trees in the distance in the front (south), and rolling hills that surround the site (west and east). This ideal topography ensures that qi will pool in the center of the site and support the dwelling places and inhabitants. Although this is the ideal feng shui form, each place has its own unique characteristics, and each site is evaluated on its own terms.

With respect to interior design, the smooth flow of beneficial qi is seen as especially important. This includes the way in which qi moves in and out of the structure and then through the various rooms. Sunlight and fresh air are major beneficial influences. From a feng shui perspective, the layout of rooms and the placement of furniture also create distinctive patterns. The aim is to enhance beneficial patterns and to remedy harmful influences. In the case of specific rooms, the corner farthest from the entryway is considered to be the “wealth corner,” or the place where qi tends to pool. Interior design also encompasses the specific materials and colors of furniture and decoration. The five phases are again applied, including actual materials (e.g., wood furniture, fireplaces, metal siding, etc.). The associated colors are as follows: wood/green, fire/red, earth/yellow, metal/white, and water/black. Different materials and colors exert particular influences on specific constitutions. According to its adherents, feng shui assists in accessing, using, and modifying certain energetic qualities.

Within a contemporary global context, feng shui has become a part of “alternative spirituality” as well as health and fitness movements. It has been incorporated into personal wellness programs and various forms of “New Age capitalism.” As is the case with the globalization and popularization of other Chinese cultural practices, such as qigong, there is a tendency to establish certification programs, which replace the previous model of apprenticeship. In such contexts, feng shui is most often presented as a way to design personal living spaces in order to increase health and wealth. The importance of place is eliminated from the system.

FESTIVALS

Festivals are found in every known society, historical and contemporary. There are festivals for major religious commemorations and for relatively minor local ones. When many people hear the word festival, they immediately think of religious festivals. These festivals do play a major role in most religions and in the overall category of festivals. Certainly, religious festivals strengthen religious ties and beliefs while underscoring the importance of certain events and beliefs as well as seasons of the religious year. As is the case with all festivals, there are expected ritual activities and symbols associated with them. Some festivals celebrate joyous events, while others commemorate times of mourning and meditation. Moreover, all festivals serve to achieve major goals of human society. Among these goals is societal unity. Toward that goal, festivals provide an atmosphere favorable for the creation, preservation, and foundation of social solidarity. Festivals aid that unity in the midst of various types of diversity.

Unity and Diversity

Diversity has many sources. A society may have a diversity of people. There may be, for example, many immigrants present in a society. There may be conquered people who require incorporation into the group. Many religions may be at hand or political groups. The source of diversity may be economic, class based, or rank based. No matter what its source, there must be a means for uniting these diverse interests. Festivals play a significant role in forging a common or transcendent identity.

Underscoring the need to address both diversity and unity is the element of reversal found in festivals. Festivals are meant to transform people, to take them from one place to another. Thus, after World War I, when many immigrants came to the United States, the United States government issued a manual of activities to promote patriotic solidarity. A number of festivals were suggested. One festival had immigrant children being wheeled onto school stages in a shoe. Each child was dressed in his or her traditional clothes. Once on the stage, the children emerged from the shoe and shed their traditional clothes, revealing them dressed in American clothing. This was a graphic example of shedding one identity and putting on another one.

Rituals of inversion or reversal are found in all festivals. By breaking the rules, performers draw attention to the rules, thereby reaffirming social unity and the importance of the rules. For example, in mummers' plays, which are performed in many English-speaking communities around the world, such as Newfoundland, Canada, and Philadelphia, participants in riotous pantomime provide a rollicking good time, when even the most staid of people engage in rule-breaking behavior. However, these times of simple fun not only provide a break from the tedium of everyday life, they also highlight problems within society. By burlesquing these problems, mummers and carnival performers hold these problems up to ridicule, not so subtly prodding those with the power to address these problems in order to fix them.

Another example lies in the Palio festival of Sienna, Italy. The Palio combines many different elements. It is a parade and horse race, linking political and religious aspects. These competitions are carried out on one level of the city's life. Without appropriate supervision, however, the various competing forces would get out of hand. Hence, there is a higher level of the city's life, the level in which final power resides, overseeing the competitions. Thus, the competitors are free to let their wilder instincts run rampant, knowing that if they stray too far out of bounds, they will be brought back to a safer place. This allows for the airing of all sorts of grievances and the calling to the attention of those in authority the need to address them and find solutions for them. Unity is thus aided by seeming chaos.

Festivals of the Dead exist in many societies and clearly demonstrate the unifying principles of festivals in general. The Dukawa of Northern Nigeria exemplify the great time and care that go into such festivals. It generally takes at least a year to prepare for the festival. The family must gather great amounts of food for the party, which is an integral part of the festival. The surviving contemporaries of the dead man prepare toasts for his party. They will sing his own song, which he composed for his wedding and which they helped him perform. There will be hired musicians to play for the festival, and villagers from the surrounding area will attend, many to recount their memories of the dead. In the course of these celebrations, many other dead people are celebrated. Articles that are associated with the dead person are given away, thus spreading his memory and helping to keep it alive in the survivors. Such festivals renew ties among family, friends, and the wider community.

Festivals of Incorporation

Sometimes festivals serve to incorporate strangers, even enemies, into a society. The Iroquois of western New York never exchanged prisoners taken during their wars. They either killed a prisoner or inducted him into the society. Women played a major role in deciding who would live or die; those whom they deemed worthy husbands would generally be spared. However, the spared prisoner would have to go through a ritual of incorporation in which he would forgo his old identity and accept a new one. The prisoner had to run a gauntlet and then take a new name, signifying his identity change. At the next religious festival, elders would formalize this change by announcing the inclusion of the new names, families, and clans in the community.

The ritual was a rite of passage. The prisoner's capture was his separation from his former state. Running the gauntlet, in which the Iroquois beat or whipped the prisoner, signified his death, while his change of name demonstrated his rebirth as an Iroquois, replacing the dead whom his former tribal mates had killed. Therefore, the festival and its accompanying rituals served to maintain the stability and unity of the Iroquois people. Warfare threatened that unity, but the festival reaffirmed Iroquois identity and unity.

Basic Characteristics of Festivals

Each of the festivals mentioned so far exhibit and share certain characteristics. They share a certain sense of license and play, showing that things can be other than they are. Festivals also convey meaning; that is, they are a form of communication, employing many devices to do so. The iconographic level of meaning is one in which diagrams or pictures seek to express a deeper reality. Consequently, the icon or figure is not only what it appears to be, for instance, a bear or a young girl, but also a sacred bear or the Virgin Mary.

Festivals also share an aspect of mystery requiring interpretation. The festival may present a metaphor of the society itself. Perhaps an aspect of the group is represented. It may be tension within the group or between the group and other groups in the social environment. Whatever it is, it presents a mystery requiring interpretation for its solution. Hindu tradition, for example, has a large number of festivals. The 4-day New Year festival, Diwali, for example, comes in either October or November, depending on the lunar calendar. The Holi festival honors Krishna, a trickster god, in a free-for-all carnival atmosphere, while Rama is honored during the spring equinox, Rama Navami. Other deities are feted at different times.

Jewish, Christian, and Muslim Festivals

Judaism has various festivals, such as Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement), Rosh Hashanah (New Year's Day), Purim, Hanukkah, Pesach, and others. Hanukkah celebrates the victory of the Maccabees and is a time for gift giving. Christianity also has many feasts, the most important of which are Easter, commemorating the resurrection of Jesus, and Christmas, marking his birth.

Muslims have a large number of festivals. The Id-al-Aadha, or Feast of Sacrifice, is celebrated when the annual hajj or pilgrimage to Mecca (Makkah) is completed. It commemorated the founding of Mecca by Abraham and his son Ishmael. Another important festival, Id-al-fitr (meaning "fast breaking"), ends the Ramadan fast. Ramadan is the 9th month of the lunar year. Shi'a Muslims have a feast termed Muharram, after the 1st month of the Islamic calendar. On the 10th of the month, a play of heightened passion is performed, marking the martyrdom of Husain, the son of Ali and the grandson of Prophet Muhammad, at the hands of warriors of the Damascus Caliphate.

Social and Cultural Contexts of Festivals

It is crucial to remember that there is a social and cultural context to the festival performance itself. There is a physical and cultural location to the festival. There are participants in the festival. Other events precede and follow them. People bring their experiences and understanding to the festival, which color their interpretations of what is occurring. Additionally, festivals have cultural functions in a society.

Festivals empower those who have little or no power in society, allowing them to express their grievances openly and safely. They also demonstrate that things can be other than they are, as identities change and the dead continue a kind of life. These and other aspects place them clearly in the realm of the ludic, play. Play includes aspects of imagination and creativity. This characteristic provides festivals with a frightening power, for it indicates that there is an antistructure for every structure. It intimidates those in power by suggesting that the world as it is can be replaced by the world that is yet to be.

African Festivals

African festivals, for instance, fit comfortably within this framework. Their songs, dances, and costumes are entertaining. Their playfulness facilitates the possible subversion of commonly accepted definitions of reality, reflecting and promoting changes within society. Furthermore, they guarantee that these changes will fit together with other cultural aspects of the group. Accordingly, they help keep society open to change and discussion of mores, customs, and traditions. They facilitate change in a structured manner as part of the tradition rather than as one counter to it.

It is important to be aware of the fact that as cultural conditions change, festivals may change their names and content while keeping their functions. The Hausa of northern Nigeria provide an example of just such a festival. During the modification of Hausa society under British colonialism, the Wasan kara-kara ceremony underwent significant changes, including a name change. Moreover, White colonial officials became the target of the humor in these festivals. Because it was impossible to find a White man who would portray a White official in a comic derogatory manner, Hausa put on new "White masquerades." The idea of satirizing officeholders was not new. Nor was the purpose of getting officeholders to amend their ways. However, the masks had to be new to fit the facts of new officeholders. Similar changes transpired in other parts of Africa. The Poro and Sande/Bundu secret societies maintained order through the use of festivals. The Yoruba Egungun masquerade societies used spirits called on in festivals to establish and maintain social order.

Masquerades

It is necessary to point out that masqueraders are an integral part of African festivals. These dancers are members of religious societies. Most scholars agree that there are four kinds of masqueraders and that each has a particular role in society. There are entertainers who simply entertain. Others represent gods or nature spirits. Some masqueraders embody ancestral spirits, while some soothe the gods through dance. Of course, some of these functions may be combined. Entertainment, for example, is a fundamental characteristic of much African ritual.

There are also many different types of masks. For instance, animal masks are quite common throughout Africa. There are, of course, many styles of animal masks. These masks represent different forms of animals. Sizes of masks also may differ, ranging from small to very large ones. Some are delicate and graceful, while others are large and rather intimidating. Dancers adapt their styles to their masks. If one is wearing a raffia palm mask with a swaying waist fringe, the style of dance will be different from that of a person dressed in a small mask. The message will also differ from mask to mask.

Dance

Dance is an integral part of ritual and festival. Along with music and song, it helps define the role of groups and individuals within the community. For example, a ruler in a complex African society is obliged to perform a dance befitting his authority. Among the Yoruba of Nigeria, for instance, a ruler heads a parade of masqueraders through the town while dancing in his carriage. He is joined in his dance by his wives and subordinate chiefs. Each member of the society performs a dance commensurate with his or her rank—hunter, palace chief, woman market chief, and so forth. Each renders tribute through a dance.

Dance plays a large part in the Ox Dance Festival in Parintins, Amazonas, Brazil. This dance is performed during the final 3 days of June. Over time, it has emerged as the largest and most magnificent folk festival of northern Brazil. Once again, there is the idea of finding unity in opposition. It asserts caboclo identity (or mestizo) through employing cultural and ritual themes. However, it asserts this mixed identity, namely, European and Indian, not as separate from but equal to Brazilian identity. It is a ritual of incorporation.

Festivals in the United States

Festivals in the United States are the equivalents of those found in traditional societies, seeking to unify apparent opposites and heal breaches within society. We find these festivals stressing the theme of reflecting community values and contemporary relationships, seeking to reinforce these values and relationships. The western United States celebrates a number of festivals similar to Wyoming's Cheyenne Frontier Days. We find the usual characteristics of competition, resolved in unifying events such as parades, rodeos, carnivals, and livestock shows. Tensions, of course, are released through the competition and resolved in the unifying events. A common heritage is fostered, and people take pride and feel unity through participation in such festivals.

New Year Festivals

New Year festivals are also found in numerous places. The most famous may be the Chinese New Year Festival. Because the Chinese observe a lunar calendar year, their New Year falls on a different date from that of the Western calendar. There are a number of rituals associated with the festival. There are anticipatory rituals beginning about a month before the festival. People purchase presents, special food, decorations, and clothing. They also undertake a massive house cleaning in preparation for the New Year. The cleaning serves not only to clean the material house but also to sweep away any bad luck in the home. People repaint doors and windows, usually in red, considered a lucky color. Moreover, they decorate doors and windows with paper representations of good things, including happiness, wealth, and long life. The festival's highlight is New Year's Eve. Special food is prepared, such as seafood and dumplings, representing good wishes. Symbolic value is also attached to other food. Prawns represent liveliness and happiness. Fish salad leads to good luck and prosperity. Clothes of red color are worn to ward off bad spirits. In contrast, white and black clothes are avoided because these represent mourning and sorrow. The New Year's Eve festival ends with fireworks at midnight.

On New Year's Day, children and unmarried adults receive money wrapped in red envelopes from married couples. Family events predominate with visits, forgiveness of past slights, and requests that others forgive them for similar transgressions. There is a theme of restoration of harmony and peace in the community.

Food Festivals

Food is a significant part of every festival. Those festivals specifically labeled food festivals are not simply about the food; they may use food as a means for gathering people together. They also serve to unite communities, using food as a draw and common link among individuals and groups. Modern food festivals clearly draw on ties with traditional harvest festivals and even Thanksgiving celebrations, celebrating plentiful yields and the smile of a god. The celebration is a necessary homage to the powers above so that they may continue their blessings.

Conclusion

Festivals serve a community's needs. There are many different types of festivals, each meeting a specific need or needs. Included in these festivals is an entertainment function. Celebration facilitates the sense of unity that fosters social solidarity. Religious, social, geographical, and other groups find a sense of belonging and an increase in community identification through participation in festivals. Modern festivals, no less than traditional ones, serve to communicate a sense of belonging and tradition. We find that modern festivals in plural societies need to focus on ethnic and cultural sources of identity and incorporation. Now and in the past, festivals are times when elders provide a sense of continuity from generation to generation, sharing stories, traditions, and lore with one another and with descending generations.

Festivals are reminders of the fragility of human ties and the difficulty of forging and maintaining them. They are reminders of death as well and the need to instill new generations with links to those who have come before, invoking ancestral memories to strengthen ties among those who remain to carry on the work and identity of the group. Entertainment helps ease the message and communication among group members. It encodes and surrounds the more serious communications in a pleasant wrapping, reaching the heart so that the brain may all the more willingly be open to the serious and significant messages of the festival. Resolving the contradictions of life is, after all, no easy task. Extracting unity from human diversity never is. Forging a common identity, often in the face of conflict and change, is an equally difficult task. Festivals nevertheless perform these difficult tasks with relative ease, allowing people to enjoy a certain license while establishing flexible but definite limits to that license. Festivals also provide a period in which people can expose the weaknesses within the community and bring them to the attention of those in power who could address and attend to them.

FEZ

The fez is a piece of headwear, made from pressed wool, worn primarily by Muslim men in the regions of the former Ottoman Empire. The fez likely originated from the urban centers of the Balkans, where the fez-like hat has deep historical roots; it was subsequently adopted and refined by adding the tassel and red color by Ottoman Muslim Mediterranean sailors and merchants in port cities along the Mediterranean coast. Its name is derived from the Moroccan city of Fez, which became an important production center for the headwear. The fez afforded its users with several practical religious advantages over the ubiquitous turban: It was convenient (not necessitating the time-consuming wrapping), it allowed the forehead to be pressed to the ground during daily prayers, and it was accompanied by an air of fashion-forward respectability. The fez came into style, in earnest, in the late 1820s, when Mahmud II phased out the turban, in an attempt to distance himself from the specifically Arab influence in the empire’s religion. It was resisted heavily by the powerful conservative Jannisaries, but soon it won widespread, even enthusiastic, acceptance all across the Ottoman lands and became a symbol of Orientalism for the West.

In the Ottoman system, society was divided into *millet*s (the main *millet*s being Muslim, Jewish, and Orthodox) according to religious affiliation; each millet enjoyed considerable self-governance in return for loyalty to the Porte (the Ottoman administration). The fez was valuable as a distinguishing symbol in the millet system in the 19th century; it should be noted, however, that the fez was worn by many who wanted to enjoy the benefits of Islamic affiliation without conversion. Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, the father of modern Turkey, banned the fez in 1925, after the dissolution of the empire, as a key aspect of his Westernization program. Many in Turkey were profoundly offended when Atatürk singled out the seemingly innocuous fez as the symbol of Ottoman backwardness. Especially among community religious elders, the fez was central to Ottoman Islamic identity against European secular ways and its apostate “Western hat.” It is no surprise then that the ban resulted in riots in the eastern districts of Turkey, to which Atatürk responded with strong troop deployments, military tribunals, and a media flurry celebrating the advantages of the Western hat. Nonetheless, Atatürk’s attitude has prevailed in modern Turkey, where the fez is rarely worn and is derisively associated with being quintessentially Ottoman.

Today, the fez is worn by many in the former Ottoman Empire, most prominently among Balkan Muslims and Moroccans, whereas in other areas of the former empire, it is a symbol of Ottoman domination. The fez was a symbol not only of Ottoman affiliation but also of religious adherence to Islam. The fez became a more pronounced cultural symbol in 20th-century Morocco against French dominance and is still favored among the royal court of Morocco. Nonetheless, during the nationalist revolutions of the 20th century, the fez was more or less viewed derisively as monarchist and foreign. Even among Moroccans, and others fond of the fez, it is used less and less and is viewed as a relic of the past.

Fiji

Due to its colonial history, the South Pacific island country of Fiji has a variety of religious communities on its territory. Prior to the British colonial conquest, Fijians believed in the divine forces of earth and sea, which are now technically classified as animist. Aboriginal Fijians did not have a unified system of beliefs or a hierarchy of deities, but they highly venerated personified forces of nature, their ancestors, and totems. They prayed to patrons of certain trades (fishing, canoe building). Certain types of fish, birds, animals, and trees were venerated and protected as ancestral totems. Both gods and ancestors were called Kalou. Various rocks, giant trees, and stones were venerated as Kalou. In their villages, native Fijians had temples called Bure Kalou. Priests (Bete) as well as Fijian chiefs played an important role in the social life of the aboriginal Fijians.

In the 19th century, British colonial occupation and economic activity led to the replacement of the local religion by Christianity and the introduction of Indian religions in the islands with the indentured labor from South Asia brought by the British to work on their sugar plantations. Christian churches of Anglican, Roman Catholic, and Methodist missions replaced the old Fijian Bure Kalous. Fijians chiefs converted to Christianity. The old beliefs mostly disappeared, though some places are still considered as the abode of old deities, and aboriginal witchcraft is still practiced by certain native Fijian magicians.

Today, Indo-Fijians, the descendants of the Indian indentured laborers and “the passengers” (free migrants), constitute about 40% of Fiji’s population of approximately 830,000. As such, they constitute the largest population group in Fiji. They are not, however, united in ethnic and religious terms. Many of the early Indian laborers were from Bihar and elsewhere in eastern India and from various parts of South India; later immigrants were more wealthy, and came from Gujarat and the Punjab. The major religions of the Indo-Fijians are Hinduism, Islam, and Sikhism. Hindus are represented by both the reformist Arya Samaj and the traditionalist Sanatana dharmi Hindus. The former are followers of the Indian religious reformer Swami Dayananda Saraswati (1824–1883). The reformist movement founded in 1875 in Bombay (now Mumbai) appeared to be more successful outside India, particularly in Fiji, rather than in the country of origin. The Arya Samajists advocate the revival of Vedic religion, though their interpretation of this religion is different from that of the traditionalists. The latter in the diaspora are united under the umbrella name of Sanatana Dharma, or the true religion. Both branches of Hinduism in Fiji have their temples, educational institutions, missions, and charity organizations. The Hindu sect of Kabir Panthis also has its branches in Fiji.

Muslims of South Asian origin in Fiji are both Sunnīs and Shi'ī, traditionalists (Barelvis) and reformists (Deobandis). The Ahmadiyya sect in Islam is also present in Fiji.

Sikhs represent one of the largest communities of Indo-Fijians. They have their worship centers (gurdwaras) in many Fijian cities. The Sahajdhari Sikhs are popularly known as “shaven Sikhs” because they do not maintain the traditional Sikh appearance of the beard and turban. This group is distinct from the Keshdhari, or “bearded Sikhs.” In Fiji, there is no apparent conflict between the groups despite their different styles of observance.

FINLAND

Situated in the northernmost part of Europe, Finland is a country of little more than 5 million inhabitants. Before its independence in 1917, Finland was from the 1320s onward a part of the Kingdom of Sweden and from 1809 to 1917 an autonomous grand duchy of the Russian Empire. Finland's religious history has been dominated by Christianity, with religious pluralism and multiculturalism emerging only at the end of the 20th century. The indigenous Finnish pagan religion was supplanted by Catholicism, spread by Swedish crusaders, from the 12th century onward. Catholicism, in turn, was replaced by Protestantism when the king of Sweden declared Lutheranism as the state religion in 1527. At the same time, an Orthodox Christian minority culture developed predominantly in the eastern parts of the country neighboring Russia.

Like the rest of the Nordic countries (Denmark, Iceland, Norway, and Sweden), Finland has a strong Lutheran church. Although Finland became officially religiously neutral with the implementation of the Freedom of Religion Act of 1923, the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland and the Orthodox Church retained a special status. For example, the churches are financed by a “church tax” collected by the state from the members of the churches. Similarly, the Freedom of Religion Act's provisions concerning the legal status and registration of religious communities do not apply to either of these churches, whose legal standing is defined in other laws. These statutes remained unchanged in the new Freedom of Religion Act of 2003.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland currently claims a membership of 82% of the population, with roughly 2% belonging to the Orthodox Church and to other religious communities. The fastest growing group, constituting 16% of the population, has no religious affiliation. These membership figures, however, tell very little about the religiousness of Finns. Only a fraction of the members take part in weekly Mass, which implies that, for many people, membership is more a social custom than a question of devotion. In the context of different social rites of passage, such as baptism and marriage, the church is still seen as important, but belief in the central tenets of faith or traditional mores is increasingly contested or ignored among the membership. Balancing this are strong revivalist movements that, unlike in many other countries, have mostly remained within the Lutheran Church.

Contemporary Finnish religiosity has been described as “new popular religiosity”—that is, an individual faith practiced outside religious institutions. Recent years have also witnessed a pluralization of the religious field in Finland with the emergence of immigrant religions, especially Islam, the emergence of alternative spiritualities, and the growth of independent charismatic Christian groups.

FLOOD MYTH

Among the various world cultures, an account of a catastrophic deluge is almost ubiquitous, and these accounts are as varied as they are widespread. Yet this myth represents more than a mere anthropological interest to modern scholars. The presence of this myth in Genesis, part of the Hebrew Bible (and the Christian Old Testament), has meant that this narrative has a central place in Western religion. Moreover, a version of the story—based on the much older biblical account—has found a place in the Qur’an, the authoritative scripture for Muslims. Consequently, the most famous account of a primordial flood—the story of Noah and his ark—has a central place in the Western imagination and, more important, world religion.

The Biblical Account

This preeminent narrative is found in Genesis 6:5–9, 19. Here, the myth begins with the Lord observing the great wickedness of humankind, noting “every inclination of the thoughts of his heart is only evil all the time” (6:5). He, consequently, repents of having created humanity and determines to wipe it from “the face of the earth” (6:7), along with all the animals. Noah, however, finds grace (חן) “in the eyes of the Lord” (6:8). He is, therefore, commanded to build an ark to meticulous standards. On the ship’s completion, Noah and his family—his wife, three sons, and their wives—enter the ark, along with representatives of “all flesh” (6:19). In turn, a great flood (לִוְבַח; LXX κατακλυσμός) covers the earth, rising “fifteen cubits” above the mountains (7:20) and destroying “all which had the faintest breath of life in its nostrils” (7:22). Eventually, the waters begin to recede, and the ark comes to rest “on the mountains of Ararat” (8:4). After waiting 40 days, Noah releases a raven—to serve as a type of primordial barometer. He then, in turn, sends out a pair of doves, the second one returning with “the fresh leaf of an olive tree in its mouth” (8:11). Cognizant of the fact that the earth is drying, Noah waits another 7 days before sending out a final dove, which, because the earth is dry, does not return. Eventually, the righteous shipwright leaves the ark, together with his family and the surviving animals. He then builds “an altar to the Lord,” sacrificing from the clean animals (8:20). God, pleased by the odor of the offering, establishes a covenant with Noah, urging the patriarch and his three sons—Shem, Ham, and Japheth—to repopulate the earth: “Be fruitful and be great and fill the earth” (9:1). In turn, God promises never again to destroy “all flesh” (9:11) with a flood, and as a sign of this promise, he places his bow in the clouds.

In one sense, the narrative functions—like many biblical myths—as an etiological story. In this case, the presence of a rainbow in the sky after a thundershower is explained by God’s promise to Noah. The “bow”—a natural phenomenon observable by everyone—is, consequently, a reminder to God of the covenant he had created with Noah (known to scholars as “the Noachide covenant”). Biblical myths, like this one, frequently use narrative to account for the inexplicable features of the world in which the writers lived. For example, the account of the Tower of Babel explains the origin of the various language and ethnic groups. Likewise, in the flood myth, God also grants humankind the right to eat meat, the dispensation to slaughter animals being a channeling of the violent impulses that initially caused such displeasure in Him.

Sources

The centrality of this myth to ancient Israelites is witnessed, moreover, not only by its ability to explain the world but by the fact that the Bible actually records two different accounts of the same story. The narrative material found in Genesis 6–9 is actually a composite of two documents—the Priestly and the Yahwistic sources, known as P and J, respectively. While authorship of the Pentateuch has traditionally been imputed to Moses, for the past two centuries scholars have been aware that the Torah is actually the product of the combination of four different source documents. While these documents are hypothetical, the innumerable contradictions within the biblical narrative testify to their tenability.

More specifically, the flood narrative is rife with contradictions. For example, God commands Noah to take two of every kind of animal into the ark (6:19), yet the Lord also commands the patriarch to bring with him seven pairs of all clean animals and a single pair of unclean animals (7:2). Later, the text mentions only one pair of animals entering the ark (7:9), which would make Noah's sacrifice to God a holocaust of the only animals left on earth. Additionally, there is chronological confusion: In the J account, the flood lasts 40 days (7:17, 8:6), while in the P version, the waters swell for 150 days (7:24). The epithets used for the divine name also differ, with YHWH (traditionally translated as "Lord") in the J account and elohim ("God") in the P. There are also significant repetitions, with God, for instance, twice seeing the corruption of the earth (6:5, 6:12) and twice warning Noah about the impending deluge (6:13ff, 7:1ff). Ultimately, these sources are divisible into two complete narratives, each of which is internally consistent.

Ancient Near Eastern Accounts

In addition to the existence of multiple versions of this story within Israelite scripture, in the past two centuries scholars have discovered that the Ancient Near Eastern (ANE) culture—in which the Bible was produced—was rife with versions of this legend. There are Assyrian, Babylonian, and Sumerian versions of the flood myth, all of which share a great many features with the biblical account(s). For example, George Smith's 1872 discovery of what he would term, in a lecture given to the Society of Biblical Archaeology, "The Chaldean Account of the Deluge" has revolutionized modern understandings of the flood myth. This account, contained on the 11th of the 12 tablets that were unearthed in the library of Ashurbanipal, is a part of the Epic of Gilgamesh, and its revolutionary importance stems not only from its incontrovertible similarity to the biblical story of Noah but also from the fact that it antedates the biblical myth by many centuries.

The similarities the Akkadian legend bears to the more well-known biblical myth are striking. In the context of the epic, Gilgamesh—the king of Uruk and protagonist of the tale—is searching for immortality. He encounters Utnapishtim, who has been granted eternal life by the gods. Eager to know how he can likewise become immortal, Gilgamesh persuades Utnapishtim to recount his story. The latter claims that, long ago, the god Enlil grew disaffected by the great clamor of humankind.

He, consequently, resolved to obliterate humanity. Another god, Ea, learning of this plot, warned Utnapishtim in a dream, commanding him to build a boat to predetermined specifications. Once the seven-story ship was seaworthy, Utnapishtim loaded his family, all types of animals—both domestic and wild—and craftsmen (the intention seeming to be the preservation of various skills) aboard. Rain fell so violently that even the gods were terrified by its fury. After the tempest, the boat eventually ran aground on Mount Nisir. To determine how dry the earth was, Utnapishtim sent out a series of three birds (a dove, a swallow, and a raven), and when the final one didn't return, he opened the ship. On the mountain, Utnapishtim immediately made a sacrifice, the smell of which drew the gods thither like flies. And, just as the rainbow serves as a reminder to God, the goddess Ishtar pledged never to forget the deluge. Finally, Utnapishtim and his wife were granted immortality by Enlil.

The similarities between the accounts are vast and obvious; moreover, they are shared by other ANE legends, such as Atrahasis. Although the exact nature of the biblical narrative's literary genealogy is undeterminable, its author was no doubt influenced by these older myths. Perhaps it is more interesting, therefore, to examine how the biblical account differs. While its monotheistic position warrants mention, the myth's focus on the moral excellence of Noah as the reason for his deliverance is more revealing. It was precisely this moral preeminence that would later captivate readers of the myth. In the Book of Ezekiel, Noah is held up as a moral example, with references made to his righteousness (צדקה; 14:14). Additionally, Christian writers would see in the myth not only an example of deliverance but a "type" (τύπος) of baptism (see 1 Peter 3:20–21). The cataclysmic nature of the flood also served as an analogy for their eschatological models (see Matthew 24:37–39, 2 Peter 3:5–7).

These later readings, especially, contributed to the literal interpretation of the myth that has been prevalent in Christianity. Although there is no archaeological or geological data to suggest a worldwide deluge, this narrative has retained a central place in contemporary debates about the relationship of the Bible to science. Additionally, the pervasiveness of the myth—and the discovery of astonishingly similar ANE accounts—was initially perceived as evidence to support the historicity of the biblical account. However, the dissimilarity of these global myths makes it implausible that they are related, and the more ancient dates for the ANE accounts means that the tale of Noah and his ark is a product not of historical record but of a creative mind at work on traditional mythological material.

FO GUANG SHAN

Fo Guang Shan (lit. “Buddha Light Mountain”) is a Buddhist organization headquartered in Taiwan. It originated in a monastery founded in 1967 by the monk Hsing Yun (d. 1927) in southern Taiwan and has since grown into one of the largest and most visible Buddhist associations on the island and beyond. Inspired by the reformist teachings of the monk Taixu (1890–1947), Hsing Yun espouses humanistic Buddhism—that is, a Buddhism concerned with social issues rather than exclusively focused on monastic cultivation. He advocates social action as the creation of “pure lands” in the here and now, thus moving the focus of attention from the “pure land” as a feature of the afterlife to a utopian ideal in this world. His organization pursues this aim through the founding of temples and outreach centers across the world, as well as through the establishment of charitable and educational institutions. Fo Guang Shan is especially known for the latter, including primary and secondary schools, colleges and seminaries, and three full-scale universities: Fo Guang University and Nan Hua University in Taiwan and the University of the West in California.

Hsing Yun modernized monastic education by adopting curricular structures similar to secular colleges in Fo Guang Shan seminaries. He has been an early adopter of new communication technologies in Fo Guang Shan educational ventures and in his approach to dharma propagation. While Fo Guang Shan is best understood as a monastic order consisting of hundreds of nuns and monks, since 1991 it has been complemented by the Buddha Light International Association (BLIA), which counts both monastics and laypeople among its members. BLIA has become an important fundraising and outreach organization with chapters on all five continents. The founding of international BLIA chapters and Fo Guang Shan temples and monasteries outside Taiwan is an important part of Hsing Yun’s endeavor to spread the dharma and usher in the globalization of Buddhism. Kaosiung remains the global headquarters, but the order maintains almost 200 other temples and practice centers in Taiwan and across the globe, with the Hsi Lai Temple in Hacienda Heights, California, as one of the best known and earliest international foundings (1988). While the geographical spread of the Fo Guang Shan network demonstrates the successful internationalization of a Taiwanese Buddhist order, it is not in itself indicative of the emergence of a globalized Buddhism, as BLIA chapters the world over tend to draw most of their membership from among overseas Chinese communities and thus remain closely tied to a culturally specific Buddhist tradition.

It is Hsing Yun’s ideal to progressively break down ethnic and sectarian borders within Buddhism. He is actively engaged in dialogues with leaders from other Buddhist traditions and has taken a lead in organizing multitradeational ordination rites, especially for nuns, thus aiding efforts to reestablish a female order in Theravada and Tibetan Buddhist traditions.

FOLK SAINTS IN LATIN AMERICA

Although Latin America is considered to be a stronghold of Roman Catholicism, folk religious practices often differ from the official teachings of the Church. People are devoted to their saintly protectors or to one of the many apparitions of the Virgin Mary. Moreover, to cope with their problems, many Latin Americans have adopted their own folk saints or animas milagrosas (miraculous souls), who were never officially beatified or sanctified. Until the 12th century, most saints were freely chosen by the people in this way, but today sanctification is a serious process of the Sacra Rota (Vatican Court) in Rome.

Latin American animas usually died a violent death in an accident or were killed in action. In life, they may have been doctors or folk healers, humble peasants, or pious Christians. Others were criminals, Robin Hood types, drug dealers, or bandits who were shot by the police or during a revolution. They are always remembered in legends. Cults often start on the site where an accident occurred, and soon travelers stop to pray for protection on their journey. The graves of persons who were killed by the police are often visited by those who knew them in life. Ex-votos, candles, and flowers are placed on the tomb, and soon, a chapel is erected, where the beneficiaries sometimes leave precious gifts.

In Venezuela, José Gregorio Hernandez is the most popular folk saint. He was a medical doctor who died in a car accident in 1928. Among his worshippers are also many Spiritists. For this reason, Rome so far has not beatified him. Nevertheless, thousands of his devotees make pilgrimages to his native village and to other shrines. He is asked to cure the sick.

In Caracas, many students visit the tomb of Maria Francia, where they deposit their copy-books after successfully passing exams, thanks to the help of this anima. She was the daughter of a wealthy citizen, who forced her to marry a man she did not love. On the day of her wedding, she was bitten by a snake and died. In 1970, a guerrilla leader by the name of Montenegro was shot by the National Guard. A shrine was built for this popular hero, who is invoked to free political prisoners. Juan Mata Silva used to revolt against the dictator Gomez in the 1930s; he stole from the rich to help the poor but was finally killed by the police. Machera was a drug dealer and the head of an urban gang in Merida in the 1980s; he died in his "war for the poor." Students ask his anima to help pass exams. His tomb is decorated with candles, bottles of rum, and flowers. His mother, who often sits there, receives monetary gifts from the devotees. On the tomb of Gabriela Matos, many ex-votos and plaques thank her for her help to conceive a child. There are at least 50 folk saints adored by Venezuelans of all classes. In recent years, the animas de malandros (souls of criminals who were killed recently) are frequently implored either by evildoers or by those who are fighting against crime. During their life, they committed murder, assaults, and kidnappings and were finally killed by the police. Today, their spirits are also invoked to take possession of Spiritist mediums, who can be consulted by the faithful.

Cults for animas are found in all Latin American countries. In Argentina, la Difunta Correa (the dead Correa) has many shrines and is implored to cure the sick or help in finding employment or a husband. She died of thirst and starvation while her baby still suckled her breasts. In Brazil, some of the animas were children who died in accidents or were killed by their parents. Others used to be spiritual healers, who may also possess mediums to give advice to the faithful. Romualdo Hernandez was a revolutionary in Chile; he died in 1893 and is still implored to help the poor and cure the sick. In Uruguay, Dionisio Diaz died in an accident in 1929. His anima is invoked to find lost objects. The anima of Terrine Duque miraculously cured her mother in 1957 and, since then, is implored to help the sick.

In the United States, a cult for Elvis Presley developed after his death. In Seradace, Sicily, in 1960, a young man driving his motorbike on a highway was killed by a truck. A few days later, his soul appeared to his uncle in a dream, and since then, he is invoked on his grave by the faithful to help them solve their problems.

In popular Catholicism, folk saints are venerated in the same way as ordinary saints. Daily prayers are said during a certain period of time. A vow is made; when the wish is granted, it has to be fulfilled immediately. As long as saints help their devotees, they are lavishly praised, but when prayers are no longer answered, they are forgotten.

FOUCAULT, MICHEL (1926–1984)

At the time of his death in 1984, Michel Foucault held the chair in History of Systems of Thought at the Collège de France, the country's most prestigious academic institution. This title seems an apt description of the breadth of Foucault's interests and influences. Written in the wake of Continental structuralism, his texts seek to refashion "the human" and, therefore, the human sciences, particularly discourses of psychology, medicine, epistemology, politics, and sexuality. Though he wrote very little that treats religion explicitly, his impact on its study has been and continues to be profound, especially in the contemporary attention it devotes to bodies, genders, practices, and power.

Foucault was born in 1926 and raised in Poitiers, the son of an eminent local surgeon. There he attended the Jesuit Collège Saint-Stanislas and passed his baccalaureate exams in 1943. He moved to Paris and attended Lycée Henri IV to prepare for entrance to the École Normale Supérieure, which he obtained in 1946. At École Normale Supérieure, he earned a licence in philosophy in 1948, a licence in psychology in 1949, and an agrégation in philosophy in 1951. He also earned a diplôme in psychopathology from Paris's Institut de Psychologie in 1952. This led to his first publication, Mental Illness and Psychology, in 1954. From 1952 to 1960, he held a series of short-term appointments at the University of Lille in France, University of Uppsala in Sweden, University of Warsaw in Poland, and French Institute in Hamburg, Germany.

During this time, particularly at Uppsala, Sweden, Foucault researched and wrote Madness and Civilization, a massive tome that combines archival, historical research with philosophical erudition to construct an archaeology of madness in modern Europe from the 16th to the 18th centuries. In it, he charts madness's shift from a part of everyday life to an institutionalized condition, leading to the advent of the asylum and the physical and conceptual confinement of insanity. The mad, according to him, come to be regarded as inhuman, so that their confinement becomes a moral issue that society must police. Madness also becomes an epistemological issue, equated with unreason and therefore excluded from the civilized domain that reason constructs. Published in 1961, Madness and Civilization was quickly recognized and highly regarded by French academics—so much so that it earned Foucault his doctorat ès lettres (along with his secondary thesis on Immanuel Kant's Anthropology From a Pragmatic Point of View).

Madness and Civilization also provides a methodological template for his "archaeological" period. In it, he isolates a key social category and construct (in this case, madness) and performs a careful, historical analysis to uncover its constructed status and to chart the progression of its construction. Hence, his works wed conceptual and concrete examinations, moving from the archival data toward theoretical conclusions. His next text, The Birth of the Clinic (published in 1963), applies this method to medicine and the attention it gives to the human body. More specifically, The Birth of the Clinic focuses on the medical gaze as a new way of seeing body, disease, and pathology: Medicine turns its gaze to the body and to bodily phenomena and symptoms rather than to the individual. This gaze creates new modes of experience and new possibilities for knowledge that emerge from the cultural and political conditions in 18th-century Europe. It also results in a new understanding of life's and death's co-implications vis-à-vis disease.

Foucault's archaeological period culminates in The Order of Things, published in 1966 (the same year as Jacques Lacan's Écrits and 1 year before Jacques Derrida's Of Grammatology and Writing and Difference). This text, whose French title is Les Mots et les Choses (Words and Things), proposes "an archaeology of the human sciences," as its subtitle announces, taking "the human" as its object of investigation. Its thesis is bold: The human is a recent invention. Foucault proposes that the human is an invention, an artifice, a construct, rather than a natural occurrence or emergence. This invention arises in modern Europe, as Foucault again turns his attention to the 17th and 18th centuries and a variety of their discourses, including grammar, taxonomy, currency, science, and other systems of signification and representation. All of these are part of an episteme, or an epistemological field that conditions and structures knowledge. Because an episteme is historically and culturally located—Foucault maintains that all knowledge is situated (in time and space, in language, in culture, etc.) and bound to a praxis—it is contingent and changes as knowledge changes. Hence, the episteme of the human that emerges in the 18th century is contingent and will change when knowledge morphs into new forms. This morphing owes to discursive changes, for the human episteme depends on a Cartesian cogito and a particular understanding of finitude. Consequently, Foucault suggests, the human might be nearing its end.

Despite its conceptual range and density, The Order of Things became a surprise bestseller in France. Foucault enjoyed this success while abroad, spending 2 years teaching in Tunisia. He returned to France following the events of May 1968 to become chair of the philosophy department at the newly formed University of Paris VIII at Vincennes. But he left that post a year later on his election to the Collège de France in 1969 (the same year in which he published The Archaeology of Knowledge). Foucault's inaugural lecture, L'ordre du discours (published in English as "The Discourse on Language"), focuses on the theme of "discipline," understood as a system of control in discourse production, with discourse understood as a practice or a violence imposed on things as a means of regularization via rules and procedures. This lecture marks the beginning of Foucault's genealogical period, pointing to the growing influence of Friedrich Nietzsche on Foucault's work. Instead of the archaeological focus on episteme and the conditions governing discourses, his genealogical focus is on dispositifs as articulations of discursive (and nondiscursive) practices. Accordingly, his genealogical analyses concentrate on power rather than on knowledge.

Discipline and Punish, published in 1975, was the first of these genealogical texts to emerge. This groundbreaking examination of the prison stems in part from Foucault's leftist political activism concerning prison conditions and reforms beginning in 1971 and from his visit to New York's Attica prison in 1972. Discipline and Punish retains the rich historicity of his earlier works; in this work, however, Foucault turns his attention to practices of punishment and, more specifically, their effects on prisoners' bodies. These practices subject bodies to control while making them productive, according to a political economy of bodies. Here, the central concern is power, as Foucault now claims that power produces knowledge. Power is, more generally, a productive technology: It produces not only knowledge but also reality and truth. Discipline thus becomes a technique of power (or, as Foucault also calls it, power-knowledge) that subjects and normalizes. For Foucault, power names not a structure but an omnipresent, relational network of processes and strategies.

Foucault next turns his attention to sexuality. In the first volume of his History of Sexuality, published a year later, in 1976, Foucault seeks to define the regimes of power, knowledge, and pleasure through which sex is put into discourse as a technology of power and a will to knowledge. Foucault traces the genealogical roots of "sexuality as discourse" to the Christian confession, understood as a practice of permanent verbalization. This means that sex is constituted as a matter (or problem) of truth—one whose genealogy reveals a change from an ars erotica to a scientia sexualis in 17th-century Europe. Foucault goes on to explore the deployment of sexuality as a technology of power and, more narrowly, of political power exerted on bodies. In the final section of History of Sexuality, Foucault articulates this nexus of sexuality, politics, power, and body as a sovereign's power morphs from one of taking life to one of fostering life. As life and its management become political matters, politics becomes biopolitics, whose limit is death.

Though Foucault originally projected a multi-volume study that would include considerations of children, women, and "perverts" as sexual subjects, he abandoned this plan in the late 1970s. This abandonment coincides with his shift in political activism toward issues of human rights, including (for the first time) gay rights. Foucault's work now enters its third and final phase, focused on ethics and on the problematics of subjectivity. He turns his attention away from modern Europe to ancient Greece and Rome and investigates historical technologies of subject formation in ethical terms, with particular interest in how sexuality becomes constituted as a moral experience. These investigations were published as the second and third volumes of History of Sexuality in 1984, the same year that Foucault succumbed to AIDS.

FRANCE

In 2006, an official report by Jean Pierre Machelon drew the following distribution of the religious population in France: 65% of the French people declare themselves Catholics, 25% Agnostics, 6% Muslims, 2% Protestants (including more and more of Evangelicals and Pentecostals), around 750,000 Historical Christians (Orthodox, Armenian, Copt, Syriac, Chaldean, Maronite, etc.), 600,000 Jews, 400,000 Buddhists, and a notable presence of “members of New Religious Movements.” However, some scholars believe that the reality of religious life in France is less Catholic and more Protestant than the statistics suggest.

History

France has been traditionally called the “eldest daughter of the Church” because of its strong Catholic tradition. This history has been marked by the conversion of King Clovis in 496, the king who became Saint Louis in 1297, the patron saint Joan of Arc (who played a decisive role in the French victory against Britain, and in the restoration of the monarchy, during the Hundred Years’ War in the 15th century), and the consecration of France to Our Lady (the Virgin Mary) by Louis XIII in 1638. In addition, France housed official papal residences during the 14th and 15th centuries (the Papacies of Avignon); Avignon was home to both popes and antipopes (simultaneous with the contested popes of Rome, after a schism). Ecumenical councils of the Catholic Church also took place in France from the 4th to the 19th century.

The religious history of France has not been without conflict. French Catholics indeed experienced difficulties, due to politico-religious debates (e.g., the Jansenist debate and the banishment of Jesuits in 1763) or anticlericalism (e.g., the prosecution and the dissolution of the order of the Assumptionists, who were exiled in 1900). In the 13th century, a debate about the heresy of the Cathars led to political and religious repression, with the inquisition conferred on the Dominican Order of Preachers. Later, French Protestants (Walloons, Huguenots, and Camisards) were the main victims of religious persecution, with an escalation of violence during the St. Bartholomew’s Day massacre (1572) and after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685).

The presence of Jews has been significant throughout French history, with Bordeaux as an important site for Jewish commercial and religious activity. Many major French authors, including Michel de Montaigne and Marcel Proust, were Jewish or part Jewish. There has, however, been significant persecution of Jews in France: Jews were banished from France in the 12th and 14th centuries and deported during World War II.

Muslims have been present in France since the eighth century. They contributed to the early French universities, especially in Montpellier and Paris, in philosophy (Averroism), medicine, astronomy, and sciences in general.

Separation of Church and State

Church and state are separated in France according to the principle of secularity (laïcité). As a heritage of the Bologna Concordat of 1516, of the French Revolution, and of the concordat of 1801, the separation is now legally framed by the law of 1905, which states that the Republic guarantees the freedom of consciousness and of worship within the limits of specified conditions concerning the interest of public order. . . . [The Republic] neither acknowledges nor gives salary nor financially supports any religion.

Nevertheless particular places such as Alsace, Moselle, and Guyanne remain under prior conditions. Controversial laws recently fixed more limitations on the freedom of religious expression: in 2004, a law forbidding the use of “religious signs” in public schools and, in 2010, the prohibition of the veil (niqab) in public. Despite this separation policy, the Central Bureau of the Religious Affairs depends on the French Ministry of Interior Affairs—replacing, since the early 20th century, the Napoleonic Ministry of Religious Affairs.

Shrines and Pilgrimages

One of the oldest shrines of France is the Neolithic Carnac Alignments. This megalithic ensemble inspired many myths and beliefs associated with Celtic Paganism. In the context of magic in Brittany, the Brocéliande forest is also known for the survival of druidic practices.

Because of its Catholic tradition, France has seen the rise of many forms of Marian devotions, visible through the presence of a quantity of shrines mostly related to apparitions, pilgrimages, and healing practices: The most well-known are Lourdes (1858) and the Chapel of Our Lady of the Miraculous Medal in Paris (1830). Other sites are also spread across the territory, with minor but more ancient and continuous activities. In southwest France, for instance, a few are remarkable: Verdels (11th century), Garaison (16th century), Our Lady of Buglose (16th century), Our Lady of Payragude (1000), and Our Lady of Betharram (17th century, with a statue that dates from the 13th). Several shrines are also highly popular: the Sacré Cœur in Paris (one of the most visited places of France), the Saintes-Maries-de-la-Mer (a traditional pilgrimage destination for the Romani people), Vézelay (a departure point for the journey to Santiago de Compostela), Our Lady of Lorette (a World War I memorial), and Mont Saint Michel. The ecumenical Christian Community of Taizé, founded in 1940, gathers visiting young people from all over the world.

People

Numerous French Catholics have been significant, including Pascal, Malebranches, Bossuet, Thérèse of Lisieux, Bernadette of Lourdes, Jeanne Jugan (founder of the Little Sisters of the Poor), Vincent de Paul, Bernard de Clairvaux, Francis de Sales (of the Salesian school), John Baptist de La Salle, Lamennais (priest and politician theoretician), Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, Jacques Maritain, François Mauriac, Emmanuel Mounier, Étienne Gilson, Maurice Blondel, Gabriel Marcel, and Georges Bernanos. Though not French himself, Thomas of Aquinas died in France and was buried in Toulouse. Scholasticism found a major ground in Parisian universities of the 13th century. The Jansenists Antoine Arnauld (the “Grand Arnauld”) and Pierre Nicole theorized logic frames known as “Port Royal Logic,” which gave rise to the modern study of logic and language (e.g., Noam Chomsky).

Jean Calvin was an influential Reformation theologian. In the Protestant area, Albert Schweitzer has been acknowledged as a missionary and a music analyst. Paul Ricoeur and Jaques Ellul share a French Protestant background as well. And the cofounder of the megachurch of Illinois the Willow Creek Community, Gilbert Bilezikian, was originally from France as well.

Other authors such as Henri Bergson and Simone Weil made influential contributions to the Christian thought of the 20th century.

In addition, Jewish people held key political positions: René Cassin as one of the drafters of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Léon Blum as a French president.

Congregations, Movements, and Nongovernmental Organizations

The congregations and orders of French origin include the Cistercian Order, the Sisters of Saint-Joseph de Cluny, the Spiritans, the Society of Mary Marianists Brothers and Priests, and the Vincentian Family (Congregation of the Mission, Company of the Daughters of Charity of Saint Vincent de Paul).

Several nongovernmental organizations originated in France: Caritas (started by Jean Rodhain, founder of the Secours Catholique, which became Caritas Internationalis), the Saint Vincent de Paul Societies (from the Conférences de Saint Vincent de Paul, founded in Paris in 1833 by Frederic Ozanam), the ACAT (Association of Christians Against Torture), and the Alliance Israelite Universelle.

Some new religious movements and cults rose in France as well, such as Raelism, a new religious movement based on the concept of UFOs (unidentified flying objects).

Religious Studies

The main French places dedicated to religious studies in the state educational system are the École Pratique des Hautes Etudes, the École des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales, and the University of Strasbourg. Many confessional universities and study centers exist too, with several Instituts Catholiques (in addition to the Jesuit Centre Sèvres and the Dominican Centre du Saulchoir) and Protestant Institutes of Theology.

The core religious studies scholars of the 20th century were Roger Arnaldès, Roger Bastide, Pierre Chaunu, Henry Corbin, Henri Desroches, Émile Durkheim, Reginald Garrigou-Lagrange, Arnold Van Gennep, René Guénon, Robert Hertz, Yves Lambert, René Laurentin, Alfred Loisy, Louis Massignon, Jean Séguy, and Claude Tresmontant. Among the current most influential scholars are Jean Baubérot, Philippe Boutry, Erwan Dianteill, Sébastien Fath, Rita Hermon-Belot, Danièle Hervieu-Leger, Nathalie Luca, Marcel Gauchet, and Jean-Paul Willaime.

FRENCH POLYNESIA

In the South Pacific island territory of French Polynesia, the two large historic churches, the Ma'ohi Protestant Church (Église protestante ma'ohi, or EPM) and the Roman Catholic Church, claim more than three quarters of the population as members. But the 1980s marked the beginning of a new religious era, with faster and deeper diversification in relation to social and economic changes. Following the establishment in 1963 of the Pacific Test Center (Centre d'expérimentation du Pacifique), French Polynesia moved to an economy combining massive imports, consumption, and rapid growth of the public administration. Migratory movements from the rural islands toward the capital island led to an increasing concentration of population in the urban zones of Tahiti. This mobility underlines the decline of a traditional way of life that closely linked membership to a territory and to bonds of family solidarity and community religious identity. It has contributed to the diversification of the population, leading to a great decrease of religious homogeneity in couples and families.

The census of 1951 listed only five religious organizations. A quarter of the population was then Catholic, and half was Protestant. The remaining churches were the Seventh-Day Adventist, Sanito (the local name of Community of Christ, formerly known as the Reorganized Mormon Church), and the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-Day Saints, which together constituted only 6.41% of the inhabitants. Today, one French Polynesian in five belongs to neither the Catholic nor the historic Protestant Church, and within these two churches, the level of religious practice is decreasing. New churches have developed strong communities in French Polynesia, especially Jehovah's Witnesses (officially established since 1960) and Pentecostalism, which first appeared in 1962 in the Chinese community and reached a larger audience in the 1980s, with the expansion of the Assemblies of God. Above all, two older churches have progressed significantly since the 1980s: The Church of Latter-Day Saints, whose first missionaries arrived in 1844, now constitutes 6.5% of the population; the Seventh-Day Adventist Church, established in 1890, has gained a similar influence (5.8%). Their progress, mainly due to converts from the EPM Church, testifies to a new religious mobility (intergenerational and individual) and a trend toward greater individual autonomy with respect to inherited religious identity.

The Catholic Church would probably have lost many more members to newer religious movements had it not been for the spectacular revitalization brought to it during the 1980s by the Charismatic renewal. About 40% of French Polynesians today identify themselves as Catholics, but the commitment of the Charismatics (approximately a quarter of the membership of Catholics) contrasts with the great mass of the nonpracticing. Despite its relative decline, the EPM still constitutes about 40% of the population and remains a strong identity reference. The EPM remains strong partly because of its long history in French Polynesia; it is the heir of the first Protestant missionaries who disembarked in 1797 from the ship Duff chartered by the London Missionary Society and established the first Christian church in Tahiti. Also, the EPM has retained much of its membership and has continued to attract new adherents due to its committed stance against nuclear testing and its consequences, in favor of political independence, and in defense of indigenous culture and language (re'o ma'ohi).

FRENCH REVOLUTION

Religion played a considerable role in the course of the French Revolution, and the revolution was a major milestone in the evolution of religious life in France. But that milestone had two very different sides to it.

The liberal side constituted the adoption of pluralism in France by means of Article X of the Declaration of Rights of 1789, which proclaimed religious freedom; the Constitution of 1791, which virtually established freedom of worship; and specific laws that guaranteed civil equality for Protestants in December 1789 and for Jews of the entire realm in September 1791. Such pluralism was completely exceptional: The longer term effects of French-style “emancipation” of the Jews have raised a lot of comments and controversies, but the immediate and complete civil equality that was offered to them was at that time completely unprecedented in Europe.

The other side was conflictual and violent. The revolution was, at the outset, in no way antireligious or anti-Catholic—in fact, quite the contrary. But the Constituent Assembly had recourse to the assets of the Church (only those not necessary for services) to resolve the public financial crisis, and it thought it could adapt the laws of the Church to the reform of the realm without touching strictly spiritual matters. This “Civil Constitution of the Clergy” would nonetheless be more difficult to apply than the deputies imagined.

Considered “recalcitrant,” this resistance was perceived as a form of political opposition, which was true in some but not all cases, inextricably intertwining politics and religion and thus provoking what historians have called the French “split,” a split not only between the political and religious leaders but also within the entire social body. Religion—all historical religions that henceforth appeared as a danger to the republic produced by the revolution—was rejected during a short but brutal period that would result in the first attempt to separate church and state in France in 1795.

It is true that Catholics and even priests numbered among those who called for the harshest measures against the recalcitrants. For the revolution inherited so many ancient conflicts from within the French Church that we may speak of the “religious origins of the French Revolution.” Thus, the heritage of the revolution was twofold. We are most familiar with the “war between the two Frances” that resulted in French laïcité. But if the conflict actually had its roots in the revolution and the scars it had left behind and if the fathers of the republic, who were also the founders of laïcité, had always situated their actions in continuity with the French Revolution, that particular conflict would have had its own repercussions during the 19th century.

Less visible, the liberal path never disappeared, and the Vichy regime would be the only one that would really bring freedom of worship into question using the most violent means. The last assault against the authentic legacy of the French Revolution remains a major characteristic of France: In France, it was the state that imposed pluralism on a non-pluralistic society.

FREUD, SIGMUND (1856–1939)

Sigmund Freud was the founder of psychoanalysis, one of the great theoretical contributions to 20th-century Western modernity. Psychoanalysis is simultaneously a theory of mind and of psychopathology, a therapeutic method, and a theory of culture. In his works on culture, Freud wrote extensively about religion, but situating Freud within the context of global religion reveals certain contradictions. First, many of Freud’s writings are harshly critical of religion. Second, Freud’s work, often seen in the tradition of Enlightenment thought, propounds a universal theory of the psyche that implies psychological commonalities across cultures; yet it was conceived in the shadow of European imperialism and, like other disciplines that emerged at around the same time, can be seen to bear the marks of Western ethnocentrism. Nonetheless, both Western and non-Western students of religion have made significant use of Freud’s work to understand a variety of the world’s religions.

Freud was born in what is now the Czech Republic to a Jewish family that emigrated to Vienna 4 years after his birth. He trained as a neurologist before turning his interest to hysteria and studying with the French neurologists Jean-Martin Charcot and Hippolyte Bernheim. After returning to Vienna in the 1890s, he began to treat patients with his newly developing method of free association, and he engaged in his own self-analysis. In 1900, he published The Interpretation of Dreams, and by 1905, he had written several books that set out many of the elements that would remain central to psychoanalysis: the unconscious, infantile sexuality, the Oedipus complex, and the mechanisms by which the conscious mind defends itself against knowledge of the contents of the unconscious.

Although born into a Jewish family and in spite of his abiding identification as Jewish, Freud was himself not religious. He famously called himself a “godless Jew,” and his antipathy toward religion is central to many of his writings on culture. Starting with the essay “Obsessive Acts and Religious Practices” in 1907, where he traced the psychological analogies between obsessional neurosis and religious ritual, calling religion a universal obsessional neurosis, Freud’s cultural works detail the human and compensatory nature of religion, although they also display continuous revisions throughout his life. In Totem and Taboo, Freud set out his theory that religion, like civilization itself, arose from the murder of the leader of the first human community—the primal horde—by the leader’s own sons. After this primal sacrifice, Freud argued, the sons were so filled with remorse that they internalized the very prohibitions their leader had enforced: prohibitions against the oedipal desires of incest and murder. This remorse also led to the worship of the slain father, creating the beginnings of religion.

In The Future of an Illusion, Freud condemned religion for providing illusions—wish fulfillments—unable to stand the test of reason. In Civilization and Its Discontents, he went on to accept religion as a necessary feature of civilization, one that provided compensation for the strains of living within civilization’s constraints yet increased personal guilt in so doing. Freud’s approach to religion took a final turn with the posthumously published Moses and Monotheism. This highly speculative and scientifically antiquated work represented religion as the traumatic, repressed events of a people’s history: Here, religion has for Freud a psychological history, validity, and function. The guilt that it creates is no longer simply pathological but is now seen to be linked to the production of greater ethical capacities.

Alongside these works, in which he forged a specifically psychoanalytic understanding of religion, Freud’s writings on dreams and myths and on the formation of subjectivity, gender, and sexuality have been of equal or greater interest to religionists. Freud analogized from dreams to myth: Myths are the dreams of human cultures. The mechanisms of dream interpretation, such as condensation and displacement, could thus be mobilized for the interpretation of myths, religious narratives, and religious symbolism, while the mechanisms involved in subject and gender formation could shed light on the development of religious personalities.

The first challenge set by Freud to the student of religion is his appraisal of religion as a human creation, as deriving from the oedipal complex, and as primitive, narcissistic, and illusory. This challenge was taken up by Western religionists in the church and the academy. As one of the towering intellectual figures of the 20th century, Freud’s was a challenge that needed to be faced by a theology that was equal to its time. The theologian Paul Tillich and the religious philosopher Paul Ricoeur both wrote major works that acknowledged the power of the Freudian hermeneutic. Taking on Freud’s critique of religion directly, they aligned what Freud criticized in religion with idolatry, in this way making room both for Freud and for a religious dimension beyond Freud. In addition, the largely Protestant field of pastoral counseling made use of psychoanalytic theory to enlarge pastors’ capacity to help their congregants in distress. There also developed a literature and subdiscipline devoted to the relationship between psychoanalysis and religion, often seeking to understand the relationship between Freud’s work and the Christian faith or between Freud’s work and his Jewish background. Later generations of psychoanalysts modified Freud’s thought in ways that made it easier to find more positive relationships between psychoanalysis and religion, and recent theorists have begun to see in Freud’s own work spiritual possibilities not previously envisaged.

The second challenge to the student of global religion in particular is the question of universality: To what extent are Freud’s theories universal and to what extent ethnocentric? Freud proposed a universal psychological commonality across humanity, located in the primitive unconscious. But since, for Freud, this very “primitivity” of the unconscious not only lived on in the modern Western psyche but also referred to Europe’s dark-skinned others, it points to a hidden ethnocentrism, elements of which can be found scattered throughout his work. The question of Freud’s universality can therefore be formulated in two ways: (1) Do all humans possess an Oedipus complex? (2) Is Freud’s universality compromised by a covert ethnocentrism that designates full subjectivity to the modern Western subject alone? These questions are similar to those faced by feminist psychoanalysis, which has questioned the androcentrism of Freud’s work while also making significant contributions to the study of religion.

The complexity of Freud’s work has allowed for a range of responses to these questions. On the one hand, Freud’s universalism has led many to make use of his work to criticize colonial and racist conditions around the world. For example, Frantz Fanon, the Caribbean psychiatrist, who worked for the Algerian revolution, found Freud indispensable for his anticolonial and antiracist purposes. Others, however, used Freud’s universalism to understand (formerly) colonized peoples or African Americans, with results that many would judge as racist and colonialist today. Freud's work was both a stimulus and a challenge to American cultural anthropology, which was discovering cultural relativism at the same time as psychoanalysis was making its inroads into the American scene. Some anthropologists embraced Freud's work as universal and integrated psychoanalysis into the school of psychological anthropology. Others, starting with Bronislaw Malinowski, challenged the universality of the Oedipus complex and argued that differing familial and social structures produce differing psychological structures. Both streams of thought—and many in between—have found their echoes in religious studies down throughout the decades. An especially fertile area for these discussions has been the religions of South Asia, where the possibilities and varieties of an "Indian Oedipus" have been explored by several scholars.

The use of psychoanalysis for the study of non-Western religions poses a double challenge. Since in the comparative study of religion and psychoanalysis both have connections with Europe's 19th-century colonizing enterprises, the risk of ethnocentrism is compounded. Many scholars of the world's religions have, nevertheless, used psychoanalysis productively to examine the unconscious signification of religious symbolism and of various religious practices and beliefs. While early psychoanalytic forays into this area employed a vulgar Freudianism (reducing religious symbolism and practices exclusively to genital particulars and/or judging religious patterns to be inferior or pathological when they didn't fit Freud's model of autonomous maturity), recent efforts by religious scholars have been hermeneutically sophisticated and sympathetically explorative, even if provocative. Both Western academics and non-Western academics (often studying their own culture and religion) have contributed to this literature. Western psychoanalysts, too, have recently begun drawing connections between psychoanalysis and non-Western religions such as Buddhism.

For some religionists, then, Freud's assumptions about religion can be ignored while his methods of interpretation are used to advantage, whereas others accept these assumptions as part of a larger religious framework. At times, however, the non-transcendental origins of religion and the sexual dimensions of religious symbolism asserted by psychoanalytic theory have been found offensive by Western and non-Western religionists alike. In addition, non-Western religionists may see these assumptions not only as an offense to their religious sensibilities but also as a continuation of the epistemological violence that accompanied the Western colonialism by which they were governed not so long ago. In India, these questions have recently been absorbed into larger and more invidious cultural-political struggles, with the result that threats of physical violence have been directed at some outstanding scholars of Hinduism who have used psychoanalysis to probe their topics. In conclusion, the results of Freud's work can produce valuable insights into world religions, but it can also at times be sorely contested by those who are followers of the religion in question.

FULANI JIHAD

The Fulani Jihad refers primarily to the Usman dan Fodio Jihad, launched in present-day Nigeria from 1804 to 1810. This, however, was just the fourth in the series of Fulani Jihads. Others were those of Bondu, Futa Jalon, Futa Tooro, Massina, and Toucouleur. Usman dan Fodio, himself, was of the Fulani people, also variously known as Peul, Fulbe, Fula, and Fellata. Traditionally, the Fulani are nomads, but over the years, some of them have settled into urban and agricultural life. They are scattered in the West African countries of Senegal, Guinea, Guinea Bissau, Mali, Burkina Faso, Niger, Nigeria, Chad, and Cameroon.

The word jihad is from the Arabic language and literally means “struggle.” In its ordinary sense, it could mean struggle of any kind. In its Islamic use, it could refer to the following:

1. A struggle against aggressive evil: Aggressive evil in this sense means an offensive attack against the Muslim or his faith. In such a situation, violent combat is permissible for self-defense; but even in this situation, women, children, crops, and animals must not be destroyed. Such a struggle is regarded as a holy war.
2. A struggle within the mind or soul of a Muslim against sin in his or her life: Prophet Muhammad praised this type of jihad above the first.

Many factors were responsible for the Fulani Jihad. These include religious, political, and socioeconomic factors. Before the launch of the jihad, the Fulani settled among the various Hausa kingdoms. The latter were nominal Muslims and treated the Fulani as second-class citizens. The rulers of these states imposed heavy taxation on the populace, which was endured grudgingly. All these factors combined to fuel the fire of jihad when it was launched.

The immediate cause of the jihad was the treatment meted out to Usman dan Fodio, an Islamic cleric serving at the court of the ruler of Gobir. At Gobir, he taught Bawa, the ruler, and his nephew, Yunfa, who succeeded the former as ruler of Gobir. It is on record that Bawa had allowed Usman to establish an independent Muslim community. However, when Yunfa ascended to the throne, he not only undermined the authority of Usman over the independent community but also attacked it and threatened to assassinate Usman. Usman and his faithful resisted the attack at Degel, to no avail. He then fled to Gudu, where he remobilized and launched the Jihad of 1804 to 1810. The King of Gobir and the other Hausa rulers were defeated.

Following his victory, Usman established an Islamic empire with headquarters at Sokoto, which is known to this day as the Sokoto Caliphate. Usman's supporters were drawn mainly from his fellow Fulani and some disgruntled Hausas. It can therefore be concluded that apart from being a religious war, the Fulani Jihad was launched to address ethnic, political, and economic issues.

FUNDAMENTALISM

The 20th century saw the rise of conservative politicized movements in the world's religions. Those movements have often been categorized together under the label fundamentalism.

American Protestant Fundamentalism

In the North American context, there were at least three social forces that gave rise to the movement that took the name fundamentalism: (1) sweeping economic changes with the industrial revolution, (2) restructuring of gender roles and expectations with the move from rural-agrarian to urban-industrial lifestyles, and (3) the intellectual-theological challenges arising from biblical criticism, historicism, and comparative religion. Nineteenth-century evangelicalism split into two camps, often called modernist and fundamentalist, divided over the proper relationship between religion and culture. Modernists saw religion as a part of culture that changes over time with the changing needs of a changing culture. Fundamentalists, on the other hand, saw religion as fixed and revealed once for all time. For fundamentalists, culture should be measured by, and should conform to, the truths revealed in religion. While modernists developed critical, historicized readings of the biblical texts, the opponents launched a series of booklets, The Fundamentals, defending teachings such as the inerrancy of the Bible, the virgin birth, substitutionary atonement, and literal readings of the miracles described in the Bible. The books were sent to pastors and Bible teachers all over the country, and it is from those books that the movement took its name. It should be noted that while fundamentalists lay claim to a literal reading of the Bible, this is, in fact, impossible and is a rhetorical move made by fundamentalists to claim authority for their reading. Fundamentalist Protestants, for example, claim to be reading the Book of Revelation literally when they interpret it to explain present-day events. And substitutionary atonement, as another example, is an interpretation of the biblical texts.

This is a very complex movement, and it brought together various strains of antimodern Protestantism. There was the populist form discussed above, but there was also an elite, intellectual form that found its home in the Presbyterianism of the Princeton Theological Seminary. Theologians such as John G. Machen, Charles Hodge, and B. B. Warfield built a philosophically sophisticated, Calvinist theological system that rooted fundamentalism in historical Christianity and laid the groundwork for the new evangelicalism that was to develop within fundamentalism a generation later. The populist form was overwhelmingly premillennialist. In fact, the historian Ernest Sandeen saw premillennialism as the point at which the strands of fundamentalism converged. But elite fundamentalism could be postmillennialist or amillennialist. Populist fundamentalism was also revivalist in character and decidedly separatist—some forms even advocating double separation (i.e., a believer must separate not only from nonbelievers but also from believers who don't practice separatism). This strong insistence on separation, coupled with premillennialism teaching that the world is about to end any minute, made the early fundamentalists opposed to involvement in politics. That opposition to political involvement, however, began to fall away by midcentury, after which the Religious Right became the public face of American fundamentalism.

Through the 1950s and 1960s, fundamentalists began laying the groundwork for a critique of American culture that led to the view that America had a special calling from God but that the country had fallen away from its special place in history as a Christian nation. Social changes in the 1960s and 1970s (integration, changes in the status of women, the sexual revolution, and the secularization of public institutions) led to the political mobilization of American Protestant fundamentalists. They first fought the Equal Rights Amendment, the Supreme Court's legalization of abortion, and the regulation of private Christian schools and home schools. Later controversies over the rights of gays and lesbians and battles over evolution and creationism in public schools anchored their political agenda and mobilized their followers. The political power of the Christian right ebbed and flowed into the 21st century, with the movement remaking itself every decade or so.

By the second half of the 20th century, a variety of movements developed around the globe in religious traditions other than Christianity, which scholars also labeled "fundamentalist." In the early 1990s, the University of Chicago launched a major research project under the direction of Martin Marty and R. Scott Appleby, The Fundamentalism Project, to examine the developing global movement. Because each of the movements is unique and dependent on its own cultural context, there has been much debate about the use of a singular category as well as the use of a label that is so closely tied to the form as it developed in the North American context. Nonetheless, the movements do share some common characteristics, and it is undeniable that they have transcended their cultures of origin to become global phenomena in their own right.

Examples in Judaism

Among Jews, there developed in the 19th century a movement known as Haredim (lit. “tremblers”), rooted in the culture and history of Eastern Europe. The Haredim is a blending of two forms of contra-aculturative orthodoxy (Hasidic and Misnagdic); they actively oppose acculturation and assimilation of Jews and advocate separation from assimilationists. In the years following World War II and the Holocaust, diasporic Jews, seeing themselves as the faithful remnant on whom the preservation of Judaism depended, sought to re-create Eastern European Jewish life in ethnic enclaves in America, Western Europe, and Australia. By midcentury, there were a variety of Hasidic forms of Haredim, the most well-known of which are Lubovitchers and Satmar. In Israel, these Jews seek enforcement of Sabbath laws; exemption from military service, particularly for girls (boys could gain exemption by studying at a yeshiva); and other remedies to preserve tradition with public protests, sometimes ending in violence. Another important group of Haredim settled in Israel are Zionists, who believed that Haredim in other countries, including the United States, still assimilated too much and were no longer “real Jews.” These religious Zionists should not be confused with the secular Zionists in Israel. In fact, secular Zionists are, in many respects, the modernists against whom the orthodox Zionists resist, thus fitting the model of fundamentalists. Organizing in the 1970s, some of these religious Zionists took the name Gush Emunim, meaning the “Block of the Faithful.” The group is composed primarily of yeshiva students and graduates. Members of this movement seek to expand the boundaries of the state of Israel through a variety of tactics, most notably settling in Palestinian territories—exacerbating global tensions between Islam and Israel (and the allies of Israel).

Fundamentalism in Islam

In the 18th century, Muhammed ibn Abd al-Wahab led a movement to cleanse Islam of influences he believed had corrupted it. In ways that followed closely the Protestant Reformation in Christianity, he advocated a return to the emphasis on the Qur’an (sola scriptura) and claimed that more recent developments had moved Muslims away from the true faith delivered by the Prophet. Foreshadowing later developments among North American Christian fundamentalists, he advocated that the Qur’an be read literally, opposing philosophical analysis of the text and efforts to place it in historical context. In the 20th century, Wahhabism underwent something of a revival during the early years of the establishment of Saudi Arabia. As Saudi Arabia became more powerful and wealthy, toward the end of the century, Wahhabism spread around the Muslim world by claiming to be the orthodox form of Islam; at the same time, it spread dimensions of Saudi Arabian culture.

The Egyptian writer Sayyid Qutb developed an Islamic critique of globalism and the influence of the West on the Muslim world and on Egypt in particular. In the 1940s, Qutb traveled and studied in the United States and came to see American culture as corrupt and racist and the American government as dominated by Israel and powerful American Jews. His view that Jews dictated Middle Eastern policy and his recognition of the influence of the United States on his own government led to his work This Religion of Islam, in which he argued that religion is the force that divides humanity, and he advocated a return to Muslim law and put forth the notion that violence in defense of religious truth is justified.

Examples Outside Monotheism

Some scholars have argued that monotheism, with its inherent dualism and textual basis, lends itself to fundamentalism, but scholars of fundamentalism have identified movements in Hinduism and Buddhism as fundamentalist as well. The Hindutva movement links together the nation of India, the religion of Hinduism, and the language of Hindi (all of which share a linguistic root). This movement is a development from Vinayak Savarkar's Hindutva: Who Is Hindu? (1928), in which he argued that Christians and Muslims in India are foreigners and are both religious and cultural threats to Hinduism. Critical of the forces of globalization as corrosive to Indian values and culture, the Hindutva movement today has gained political power with the rise of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) and seeks to establish India as a Hindu state.

Twentieth-century Theravada Buddhism gave rise to nationalist movements in Sri Lanka, Burma/Myanmar, and Thailand. As responses to the Christianizing and secularizing influences of British colonial rule, these movements developed simplified, moralistic Theravadan traditions, rooted in dualistic mythical histories and critical of Western immorality, and focused on restoring strong nationalist identities.

Conclusion

None of these examples is intended to be exhaustive of the movements that can be labeled fundamentalist in the world's major religions. They are, instead, presented as a sampling illustrating the presence of some commonalities as well as the diversity to be found within the movements around the world. While violent sects exist across religious traditions, religious justification for violence is not present in all movements that can be labeled fundamentalist. Furthermore, though scholars have grouped these movements together under the label fundamentalist, that grouping is not without problems. Most followers of these movements do not consider themselves as fundamentalist, and many of the components of fundamentalism as they exist in Christianity are not present here. That said, the opposition to modernity, an aggressive form of nationalism, political efforts to protect traditionalism (albeit a traditionalism rooted in a mythical past) and a gendered world, and a strict division between those on the inside and those on the outside are all present.

All these movements developed as critiques of modern culture and secularism. They engage in political activity aimed at returning culture to what is envisioned as a time when it adhered more closely to the standards of religion; at the heart of that vision of the idealized past is typically a gender ideology that segregates men and women and subjugates women. While some scholars have seen the opposition to modernity as such a crystallizing force for fundamentalist movements that they have argued that antimodernism is the central unifying quality of fundamentalism, the fundamentalist's critique of modern culture and secularism is selective. Other scholars have pointed to the degree to which fundamentalisms can exist only in the context of modernity and how, in fact, fundamentalists are very modern in the ways they fight modernity—using the Internet and the global transportation system, for example, to launch a terrorist attack against the modern world. Paradoxical, also, is the effort to return to an imagined ideal time, sometimes called traditionalism or traditioning. In the United States, for example, there is a political effort to return to “traditional family values,” which are not really all that traditional since they refer to the nuclear family that emerged in the West in the 19th century. Finally, the gender ideology, shared by divergent fundamentalist movements, warrants comment and theorizing. Though the severity of the limitations on women varies greatly, fundamentalists of all stripes exhibit concern over the status and roles of women; issues of purity and defilement, like those of order and chaos and the sacred and the profane, figure centrally. While Christian fundamentalists in the United States battle over women in leadership positions in religious institutions and advocate women's submission in the home, the Muslim Taliban in Afghanistan prohibited education of girls, barred women's presence in public when unaccompanied by an appropriate male, and enforced the most extreme form of women's veiling, in which the burka includes even a mesh covering over the eyes so that no part of the body is exposed.

Opposition to globalization as a form of colonialism divides fundamentalists in the United States from those in other parts of the worlds. American fundamentalists have opposed aspects of globalization such as multiculturalism and pluralism, but other aspects have been seen positively as the spread of American values. Around the world, however, that spread of American values has been the impetus for the rise of fundamentalist movements as it has been interpreted as cultural imperialism.

GABON

Almost 75% of the 1.5 million population of the African country of Gabon are Christian, a legacy of the country's French colonial heritage. The remainder—largely immigrants—are Muslim or profess no faith. Christian practices are merged with traditional Bantu tribal beliefs and customs. At the turn of the 21st century, the country has been influenced by a dramatic rise of conversions to Pentecostal Protestant Christianity and by syncretic new religious movements.

The Gabonese Pentecost, like similar movements in other African countries, is characterized by a variety of conversion techniques. Evangelism is a requirement of its members. Signs are posted announcing Pentecostal recruitment activities, including crusades, international conferences, seminars, and Christian films shown in public places. New churches and prayer groups have been created, and some cinemas and nightclubs have been transformed into churches.

A chapel of the Assemblies of God of Gabon was installed on the site of a temple where a syncretic cult called Spiritual Science of the Heart of the Holy Spirit was formerly located (studied by Stanislaw Swiderski). Its founder, Michel Nez-Mba “the Cross,” born in 1914, established the movement after he claimed to have received several calls from God to serve others. He responded to a dream in which he saw Christ on a huge cross inclining toward him. Religious ceremonies (Ngozi) show the syncretic nature of the ritual.

According to Swiderski, this cult was an example of various attempts to search for the true face of African spirituality, which was called into question by the colonial era. The movement was poised between the ancestral past and the Western Christian present, and it tried to guide people toward a “de-Westernized” Gabonese culture. The religiosity is fully expressed by the cult of the cross of Christ and the Blessed Virgin. It focuses on eschatology, the final trial, and the eternal life.

After the death of Michel Nez-Mba in 2001, the temple and its objects (the rituals elements) were still in place. But the Pentecostals, in a spirit of defiance, occupied the place. The Assemblies of God of Gabon set out their objectives in the Pastoral Gamba in May 2000, which they called “the quinquennium of the harvest.” Prior to that date, the number of members was in the tens of thousands. The quinquennium of the harvest proposed that the number of members should double by 2005 and that there would be three worship services every Sunday in all the assemblies. Following this plan, a missionary group went to survey the neighborhood at Lalala Libreville, and after they contacted the head of the district, the eldest son and heir of the estate of Michel Nez-Mba, the movement's quarters were given to them. The widow of Michel Nez-Mba, and priestess of the rite of Ombouiri, was opposed to the transfer of property and claimed that if the site was not protected, misfortune would fall on the village. During this confrontation, a member of the missionary team was seriously injured, and some of the family fell ill. But the Pentecostal mission was able to begin its activities on the site.

This case may be seen as an example of the process of religious change affected by the forces of cultural globalization in Gabon and elsewhere in Africa.

GAMBIA

The Republic of the Gambia is a small, narrow West African country with a largely Muslim population, located on the Gambia River. Almost all sides of the 4,361 square mile (1 square mile = 2.59 square kilometers) country are surrounded by Senegal. The majority of Gambia's 1.7 million residents (2010 United Nations estimate), according to the 2003 census, belong to the Mandinka (42%), Fulani (18%), Wolof (16%), Jola (10%), and Serahuli (9%) ethnolinguistic groups. Nationally recognized languages include the official language, English, and the locally spoken Mandinka, Wolof, and Fula. Gambia gained independence from Britain in 1965 and briefly was involved in the federation of Senegambia with Senegal from 1982 to 1989. Today, Senegal and Gambia are on mostly cooperative terms, engaged in trade agreements with occasional infighting over chosen policy. Gambia has been a multiparty republic since the 1996 constitution reinstated presidential elections following a 2-year military regime run by Yahya Jammeh. Jammeh has provided an ironfisted stability to the country as president since 1996, instituting a tightly watched press as well as establishing his own HIV/AIDS (human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immunodeficiency syndrome) clinic, which was internationally denounced in 2007, after Jammeh claimed to have personally "cured" AIDS patients through his scientifically unproven, dream-inspired healing methods.

The nation's religious makeup is 90% Muslim, 8% Christian, and 2% indigenous practitioners. Muslims in Gambia have traditionally combined local Sufi forms of marabout divination, community ceremony, griot storytelling, and rituals of protection with tenets of the Islamic faith. Marloes Janson notes that the Indian-derived Islamic missionary movement, Tablighi Jamaat, which stresses purification of practices, prayer, and moral standing, is on the rise for youth in Gambia, creating an odd imbalance between traditional views of elder knowledge being deferred to and the younger generation's perception of "true" faith requiring proselytization to the masses. This cultural mix of religious themes is increasingly apparent and the basis of some controversy, as variations in the mix differ from locale to locale.

Today, rural citizens are most likely to find work in agricultural industries, particularly in fishing, animal husbandry, and the farming of groundnuts, rice, cassava, palm kernels, cotton, and sorghum. Due to the capital's strategic waterfront location and the country's affordable pricing by European standards, in recent years, vacationers have used Gambia's beaches for rest and relaxation, with a booming tourist market catering to British nationals. Because the predominantly Muslim nation dresses conservatively, with females wearing long and loose Dutch African prints and batiks, the exposure to British bikinis, alcohol consumption, and more open displays of public affection have led to cultural clashes with many Gambian residents. This, however, has been tolerated because of the nation's reliance on foreign aid and the struggle to financially progress as Gambians seek improvement in literacy, health, transportation, and education.

GANDHI, MOHANDAS (1869–1948)

Mohandas Gandhi was a leader of India's independence movement and a global icon of nonviolent protest. Though he was a devout Hindu, Gandhi's religious background is complex, and his influence stretches far beyond the borders of his religion. A number of his ideas illuminate current discourse on religion not only in India and within Hinduism but also elsewhere in the world, notably the West. They include the nature of religion and its relationship to the scriptures, to the discipline of prayer, to the state, and to social action. His thoughts on the phenomena of religious pluralism and secularism have also been significant.

The Nature of Religion

Religion according to Gandhi is that which disposes humans toward the quest for Truth or God and, in doing so, gives them a deep sense of their identity and the ultimate purpose of their being. He recognized two distinct but related aspects of religion: (1) religion as a social organization (dharma, as in "Hindu Dharma") and (2) religion as a means of spiritual transcendence (moksha). Religion, like the family, has its specific social structure. Through its scriptures, belief system, rituals, moral codes, art, architecture, and an intricate array of symbols, it provides for a deep sense of cultural identity and group solidarity. At the same time, it provides its individual members with the means of true self-knowledge, self-purification, self-reform, and ultimately self-transcendence, which in Hinduism is called merger into the Absolute (Brahman) or union with God (Ishwara)—depending on doctrinal understanding. He acknowledged the validity of the three traditional paths to spiritual transcendence—those of (1) knowledge (dhyana), (2) devotion (bhakti), and (3) action (karma). His own preference, however, was for the third. Likewise, he acknowledged the validity of the six systems of philosophy that clarified the nature of the liberation process, namely, Nyāya, Vaiśeṣika, Samkhya, Yoga, Mimamsa, and Advaita.

He did not posit any natural incompatibility between religion as organization and religion as the means to spiritual transcendence. He saw organized religion and spirituality as being in a symbiotic relationship: Underlying every organized religion there was a spirituality that beckoned transcendence. He was aware however of the possibility of a rupture between the two. The rupture occurred when religion as organization became corrupt. The way to cure corruption was to restore spirituality to its rightful place.

Religion and the Scriptures

Gandhi regarded the scriptures as the revealed sources establishing the spiritual validity of religions. According to him, the Vedas and the Upanishads (Sruti), the Dharma Shastras (Smriti), the Mahabharata (which includes the Bhagavad Gita), the Ramayana, and the Puranas constitute the Hindu scriptures. Since the canon of these scriptures was formed over a millennium, since corruption of the texts occurred due to interpolation and poor editing, and since social institutions such as caste and gender inequality were justified in terms of the scriptures, the criteria for interpreting them correctly became critical to him. His search for the correct criteria of interpretation led to the following result: Only those truths that appealed to any conscience could be considered revealed truths. Nothing could be considered part of divine revelation that could not be tested by reason or experienced spiritually. Learning was necessary but not sufficient for the correct interpretation of religious truths. In addition to learning, holiness of life and the actual experience of the truth to be interpreted were also needed. Applying these criteria to the interpretation of the Hindu scriptures, he reached the practical conclusion that the caste system and gender inequality had no scriptural sanction. Their validity was purely historical, not scriptural.

Religion and Prayer

Prayer according to Gandhi is a mental activity that related human consciousness to Truth or God.

It is the religious activity par excellence. He distinguished between prayer as worship and praise, congregational prayer (as in his famous public prayer meetings and daily ashram prayer, morning and evening), and individual prayer (in the form of self-analysis and contemplation of religious truths). Music was an important part of his prayer life. He edited the Ashram Hymnal (1930), a collection of 253 religious hymns gathered from different parts of India and later translated into English and published in 1934. His prayer schedule had an ecumenical flavor, Cardinal Newman's "Lead, Kindly Light" being his favorite Christian hymn. Daily recitation of and meditation on the Bhagavad Gita formed the heart of his ashram prayers. Prayer was instrumental in deepening his self-knowledge as a finite and fallible human being; in increasing his trust in divine guidance, especially in moments of personal doubt and inner crisis; and in releasing the spiritual energy that accounted for his prodigious outer activities.

Religion and the State

In Gandhi's political theory, the state remains neutral toward religion. He rejected the traditional Hindu theory that tended to identify sacred monarchy with the state. He was totally in favor of the movement that saw the replacement of the traditional Hindu monarchy by the modern secular republic. The republic itself was to be neither hostile nor partial toward religions, including Hinduism. The de-linking of Hinduism from state patronage is a major historic innovation in both traditional Hindu political theory and Hindu religious practice.

In addition to the above, Gandhi strongly supported the theory that the state (though sovereign in its relation to other states) was morally limited by the fundamental rights of its citizens. Because of the priority of fundamental rights to state sovereignty, the citizen had the right and the duty to resist the state nonviolently when it was in violation of those rights. The practice of the celebrated satyagraha is based on this theory. The fundamental rights of citizens included the right to the freedom of conscience and the right to the free choice of religion. Gandhi saw no inconsistency between his deep Hindu religiosity and the neutrality of the state in religious matters.

Religion and Social Action

One of Gandhi's major contributions to religious thought has been to bring to an end the historic alienation within Hinduism of contemplation from action. As his Autobiography makes clear, he made nonviolent action in the field of artha (politics and economics) the path to moksha (spiritual liberation). He justified this innovation in light of his interpretation of the Bhagavad Gita. To attain spiritual transcendence, it was no longer necessary to leave the real world of politics, economics, and social reform. Modern Hindu spirituality is to be expressed through nonviolent service (seva) to fellow human beings and not through adherence to outmoded rituals. Drawing on the Vaishnava tradition, he battled against the social evil of untouchability. The term Harijan ("people of God") was coined to refer to the erstwhile untouchables; the same term was given to the weekly he founded in 1933.

Religious Pluralism

Gandhi has made significant contributions to the field of religious pluralism. He has two explanations of this phenomenon. The first is the theory of "the many-sidedness of reality" (anekantavada): Humans tend to perceive religious reality differently. Second, even though religions in their origin had divine inspiration, the way the inspiration was expressed varied according to the diversity of languages and cultures. Differences between religions therefore are natural and deserve respect.

Certain practical consequences follow from the de jure character of religious pluralism. First, at the popular level, pluralism calls for an attitude of toleration toward all religions, based not on skepticism but on the strength of the two explanations given above. Second, on a more informed basis, one should go beyond mere passive toleration toward active respect for religions. Gandhi called this attitude one of "equal respect for all religions" (sarva dharma sama bhava). Third, pluralism calls for an intellectual effort to learn from religions other than one's own. Such effort can lead to mutual understanding and to a lessening or even the elimination of prejudices and past hatreds. Fourth, pluralism calls for dialogue between religions. Ethics, Gandhi believed, will be a better starting point for dialogue than would be religious doctrines. The one emphasizes what is common between religions, while the other tends to emphasize what is different. Finally, the object of inter-religious dialogue is not the creation of a new religion out of the existing religions but a deepened appreciation of the potential religions have to promote truth, nonviolence, and justice among humans.

Secularism

While Gandhi contributed toward the secularization of Hindu society, he was opposed to the ideology of modern secularism. His interpretation of the theory of the four purusharthas guided him here. According to this theory, striving for wealth and power (artha), ethical and religious integrity (dharma), pleasure (kama), and liberation (moksha) is equally necessary for human well-being and compatibility with one another. Artha, embodying secular values, is as indispensable for human well-being as are dharma and moksha. However, modern secularism seeks to eliminate dharma and moksha in the interest of artha. Here, as Gandhi sees it, the role of religion as the means of transcendence is to cure the ensuing malaise of secularism.

GANGA

The river Ganga, known in the Western world as the Ganges, is one of the most important rivers in India. The history, geography, ecology, food production, and economic fortunes of India have all been closely connected to the river, and millions of Hindus hold it to be sacred. Culturally, it is a symbol, standing for Mother India, a synecdoche for home, and for Hindu religious traditions. It is closely associated with the many North Indian towns and cities on its banks, especially Haridwar, Allahabad, and Banaras. The river flows south from the Himalayas and enters the plains at Haridwar and then flows east to Bengal in parallel with the Himalayan mountain chain. In Prayag (Allahabad), it joins the river Yamuna and, according to tradition, the mythical Sarasvati River, to form a sacred confluence of three rivers (triveni sangama). Banaras, whose traditional name is Kasi, or the "city of light," is also on the banks of this river and is a holy place for Hindus. Millions of Hindus bathe in the river every year, with special crowds making the pilgrimage on holy days, such as Makara Sankranti (in mid-January), or during festivals such as the Kumbh Mela. Hindus are given waters from the river Ganga on their deathbeds. Most Hindus are cremated at death, and sometimes families immerse the ashes of the dead in the Ganga River.

Ganga is a goddess, a celestial and earthly river. She is said to have been in the heavens and at the prayers of the legendary king, Bhagiratha, came down to earth. Since the force of the descent to earth would have been more than the planet could bear, it is said that the Hindu god Shiva caught the river in his head to break her fall; he eventually let a drop out to flow as the river in India. Ganga is also a beloved consort of Shiva in some traditions; ninth-century inscriptions in Cambodia refer to Shiva as the husband of Uma (Parvati) and Ganga. Headless images found in the temple of Bakong, Hariharalya, the ninth-century capital of the Angkorian kingdom, are said to be of Shiva with his arms around Parvati and Ganga. Sculptures of the personified rivers Ganga and Yamuna are found outside Hindu temples, including in Singapore.

Water from the river Ganga is used in rituals. It is now commercially packed and sold in stores that sell Indian groceries around the world. While bathing in the river is said to purify one of all sins, the waters, in whatever measure, are considered to be ritually purifying. The packaged water is thus used for domestic rituals, especially death rites. Temples use larger quantities, mixed with waters from other rivers of India and the country where the ritual is to take place, to consecrate new towers or to bathe the deity.

While the waters drawn from the river Ganga are used in rituals, many Hindus believe that the celestial Ganga can be invoked in or be present in almost any waters around the world. People from South India, for instance, believe that the Ganga is present in all waters on the sacred festival day of Divali, the festival of lights that is celebrated on the new moon that comes between November and December. The traditional greeting for Divali in South India is “Have you bathed in the Ganga today?”

Hindus who live outside the subcontinent have, over the centuries, considered local rivers to be as sacred as the Ganga and, in some inexplicable way, to be the real Ganga itself. The celestial Ganga manifests itself thus in many countries. The Siem Reap River, near Angkor in Cambodia, was identified as a sacred river, and hundreds of lingas and icons of Vishnu were carved in its bed. The Ganga Talao, a lake in Mauritius, is said to have been created from a few drops of the Ganga that fell from Shiva’s head. In 1976, Sri Ganapati Sachchidananda Swamiji, a guru from India, declared the river Aripo in Trinidad to be a sacred tributary of the river Ganga. When the first major Hindu temple was built in Pittsburgh, devotees of Sri Venkateswara (a form of Vishnu) deemed the city to be particularly holy because there were two rivers there with a third subterranean one joining them, similar to the sacred confluence of the Ganga, Yamuna, and Sarasvati in Prayag (Allahabad). Through worship, through rituals, and through the re-creation of the sacred cosmos, therefore, Ganga remains strong in the lives of Hindus around the world.

GAUTAMA, SIDDHARTHA

Siddhartha Gautama (Pāli: Siddhattha Gotama) is the name of the man who came to be known as the Buddha in ancient India approximately 2,500 years ago. His charisma, in part, provided the stimulus for the formation of the religion now called “Buddhism.” Siddhartha is his personal name, while Gautama refers to his family’s clan name. The term buddha is an honorary epithet literally meaning “awakened” and refers to a fully enlightened being who has attained perfect knowledge and full liberation from the cycle of death and rebirth (samsāra). In discussing events prior to his enlightenment, Siddhartha is frequently referred to in sources as the bodhisattva (Pāli: Bodhisatta), a term that refers to a being on the path to enlightenment.

Few today seriously question Gautama’s actual existence; however, debate continues over the dates of his life due to the lack of irrefutable evidence. Traditional accounts place the date of his death anywhere from 2420 to 290 BCE. However, some scholars have narrowed this range to roughly 486 to 360 BCE, with newer literary, archaeological, epigraphical, and cultural-historical evidence suggesting an even narrower—although not definite—range of 420 to 350 BCE. The Buddha is held to have been approximately 80 years old at the time of his death, though again the dates cannot be historically verified with accuracy.

No single biography or hagiography about the Buddha Gautama exists. The life story of the Buddha is part of a larger biographical process that is both complex and multilayered. Although the varying Buddhist traditions have much in common with regard to the life of the Buddha, they also differ, sometimes considerably, in many ways. Nevertheless, by weaving together events from a wide array of sources—both canonical and noncanonical, and from a variety of languages including Pāli, Sanskrit, Tibetan, and Chinese, a general and chronological narrative does emerge.

Siddhartha Gautama came from a line of kṣatriyas (“noble warriors”) belonging to the Śākya tribe who resided in Kapilavastu (Pāli: Kapilavatthu), a town at the base of the Himalayan mountains near the present-day India-Nepal border. His father was the kṣatriya Śuddhodana, and his mother was Māyā. The commonly used epithet Śakyamuni (“Sage of the Śakyas”) reflects Siddhartha’s heritage. In hagiographical accounts, royal designations such as king and queen are often employed in descriptions of Siddhartha’s parents, and Siddhartha himself is frequently described as a prince coming from the wealthy ruling kingdom of Kapilavastu. However, one of the Indic terms for kings, rājā, need not imply anything more than that his father was the head of a clan. Scholars have argued that the Śakyas were part of a republican system in which the kṣatriyas governed through regular public assemblies composed of members from the leading clans. Therefore, when sources mentioning Śākya assemblies speak of rājās in the plural, they may merely indicate that each representative kṣatriya at the assembly was honorifically referred to as a rājā, a “king.”

According to commonly accepted accounts within the Buddhist tradition, Siddhartha was born just outside Kapilavastu in Lumbinī Park in the present-day area of southern Nepal. Here, his mother, Māyā, is said to have given birth standing while holding on to the branch of a tree. Twenty years after his consecration (248 BCE), the Mauryan emperor Asoka visited Lumbinī to pay homage to the birthplace of the Buddha and erected a pillar documenting his pilgrimage. Lumbinī and nearby Kapilavastu continue to be one of the four main pilgrimage destinations in Buddhism, the other three being (1) the bodhi (Enlightenment) tree at Bodh Gaya, where Siddhartha is believed to have attained enlightenment; (2) Deer Park at Sārnāth, where the Buddha gave his first instruction in the Dharma; and (3) the village of Kuśinagarī, where the Buddha passed away.

The legend recalls that Māyā died soon after giving birth, and Siddhartha was entrusted to be raised by her sister and Śuddhodana’s second wife, Mahāprajāpatī Gautamī (Pāli: Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī). Siddhartha later married Yaśodharā, who bore him a son named Rāhula. As the scion of a well-to-do kṣatriya family, young Siddhartha is frequently described as living a luxurious lifestyle in which every need, desire, and wish was provided for. Eventually, however, Siddhartha became dissatisfied with his life. The Sanskrit Lalitavistara (ca. fourth century CE) illustrates the hagiographical event in which Siddhartha’s dissatisfaction arises in part from encounters during a chariot ride outside the confines of his home. During this outing, Siddhartha is said to have witnessed four signs: an old man, a sick man, a corpse, and finally a composed mendicant (bhikṣu). These four signs brought about the uncomfortable realization that, like all beings, he was subject to old age, sickness, and death. Therefore at the age of 29—inspired by the composed mendicant who did not seem to be bothered by the surrounding old age, sickness, and death—Siddhartha is said to have abandoned his home and family to become a wandering mendicant in order to resolve the dilemma of suffering.

According to the legendary accounts, for the next 6 years, Siddhartha peregrinated in the area of northeastern India. He studied under two meditation masters—Ārāḍa Kālāma (Pāli: Ālāra Kālāma) and Udraka Rāmaputra (Pāli: Uddaka Rāmaputta)—and later undertook the practice of extreme austerities. Neither the meditation masters nor extreme ascetic practices, however, provided the solution to old age, sickness, and death arising from the cycle of death and rebirth. Siddhartha, therefore, abandoned such practices. Realizing that neither extreme sensuality nor extreme austerities provided the solution to his problem, he decided on a middle way. Siddhartha is then said to have partaken of a reinvigorating meal and bath and retreated to meditate under a fig tree (ficus religiosa, later called a bodhi tree). Under that tree—which is said to be the very one that is still standing, located in present-day Bodh Gaya in the Indian state of Bihar—Siddhartha attained perfect enlightenment.

After deciding to share his discovery of liberation, according to the legendary accounts, the Buddha (as he was then called, for now he was “awakened”) traveled to Deer Park at Sārnāth, located just outside present-day Banaras. Here, he gave the first recitation of his teachings (the Dharma) to five mendicants he had previously practiced austerities with for a short time. During this sermon, the Buddha expounded the Four Noble Truths (āryasatya) and the doctrine of No-Self (anātman). This important event is referred to as “Setting in Motion the Wheel of Dharma” or “Turning the Wheel of Dharma” (dharmacakrapravartana), and it marks the beginning of the Buddha’s teaching career, which would span the next 45 years and spread the Dharma throughout the middle Ganges region.

The legendary accounts recall that during this peripatetic period of teaching, the Buddha also established a monastic order. Undoubtedly, the monastic community was formed very early in the history of the Indian Buddhist community, and to this day, Buddhism has one of the oldest continuing monastic traditions in the world. Initially only monks (bhikṣu) were accepted, but eventually nuns (bhikṣunī) were ordained into the monastic order as well. The nuns, however, had to adhere to an additional set of rules. From the beginning monks and nuns were only a part of the greater Buddhist community known as the Sangha. In addition to monks and nuns, the Sangha is composed of lay men (upāsaka) and lay women (upāsikā). The relationship between these two communal spheres—the laity and the monastic community—is one of symbiosis in which the laity provides material support to the monastic community, which, in turn, reciprocates the laity’s generous support with the gift of Dharma.

According to the legendary accounts, at approximately the age of 80, the Buddha, lying between two trees in Upavarta Grove just outside the village of Kuśinagarī (present-day Kasia), passed away amid a group of devoted disciples. His body was cremated, and the surviving bodily relics were divided among eight ruling families, which then placed the sacred remains in commemorative reliquaries called stūpas, which were erected back in their respective home countries. The urn and ceremonial ashes also constituted relics and were said to have been enshrined in stūpas by the Brahmans Droṇa and Pippalāyana, respectively. Today, relic veneration continues to be an important practice in Buddhism.

According to the account of the Buddha’s life given in the Mahāparinirvāṇa-Sūtra, the Buddha declined to appoint a successor or leader to the monastic community prior to his “final extinction” (parinirvāṇa). Instead, he is said to have instructed the monastic community to abolish negligible disciplinary precepts, be islands unto themselves, and let the doctrine and discipline be their principal guides. This left the possibility of varying degrees of ecclesiastical interpretation, which could be potentially disastrous for the monastic community. Thus, a series of periodic communal recitations, or councils, were convened to arrive at a general consensus regarding matters of doctrine and discipline. The first of these councils is said to have been held shortly after the Buddha’s death by 500 enlightened monks in the city of Rājagṛha. The number of councils held, the dates of the councils, and the actual historicity of the councils all remain matters of dispute among Buddhists and academic scholars alike.

GAY AND LESBIAN THEOLOGY

Gay and lesbian theology is a growing body of thought that brings the experiences of same-sex-loving people into conversations about ultimate meaning and value in a range of religious traditions. It began in the late 1960s in Christianity and Judaism and is now emerging in most of the major world religions. Though they do not necessarily use the term theology, Buddhism, Hinduism, Islam, Chinese religions, and indigenous groups are dealing with the impact of people from a variety of sexualities on ways of being religious. Those are properly discussed under the rubric of religion and same-sex love, while this theological focus is narrower.

The experiences of bisexual and transgender persons and of those who use the more generic term queer, meaning anyone who transgresses the heterosexual norm, are more recent additions to the conversation. A common way to refer to this work is as LGBTQ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer) theologies, emphasizing both the variety of starting points and the plurality of conclusions. It is controversial and contested but a dynamic part of contemporary theology and religious studies. Some seminaries, rabbinical schools, and departments of religion offer courses on gay and lesbian theology. The Center for Lesbian and Gay Studies in Religion and Ministry (<http://www.clgs.org>) at Pacific School of Religion in Berkeley, California, is dedicated to promoting scholarship and practice in the field. The Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender Religious Archives Network (<http://www.lgbtran.org>) is a resource center and clearinghouse for the historical records of LGBTQ religious movements.

Scholarship, religious practice, and the composition of communities are all influenced by this new and challenging dimension of religious experience. Scholars in virtually every tradition are looking at same-sex issues because they raise foundational questions about the anthropology and ethics of the group and the nature of its belief. If same-sex love is healthy, good, natural, and holy, then certain basic assumptions about the normativity of heterosexuality and heterosexual marriage, the confining of sex to heterosexual marriage, and matters related to the gender constellation of parents with children—concepts that have religious roots—are all in question. For example, if two women or two men can love one another in a divinely sanctioned way, then presumably they, like their heterosexual counterparts, would be eligible for religious as well as civil marriage. Moreover, concepts of the divine shift if same-sex love is considered good since God or Goddess is no longer thought of as prescribing one way of being human.

Religious practice and membership issues are also in the balance. If “good sex” is not simply heterosexual, then same-sex-loving people can be full members in good standing of their religious communities. They are eligible for election to leadership, ordination, and membership in religious congregations. In short, they are full and equal members.

These matters are by no means settled. They remain areas of controversy that have become prolonged struggles in many religious groups. For example, the Presbyterian Church (United States) has spent decades debating and voting on the ordination of openly LGBTQ people before voting to accept them in 2011. The worldwide Anglican Communion has approached schism over the question of same-sex-loving clergy. New configurations of Anglican churches are emerging to express opposition to the American Episcopal Church’s installation of gay and lesbian bishops, an expression of the disjunction between pro and anti gay and lesbian positions.

Gay theology began with the spiritual dissonance of persons who were discriminated against religiously because of their sexuality. It emerged in the late 1960s, when the gay liberation movement challenged the norm of heterosexuality and claimed that homosexuality was equally valid and should be equally licit. Religious beliefs, especially in Christianity and Judaism, were used as the foundation of social and legal prohibitions. For example, sodomy was prohibited by laws based on biblical texts and religious teachings. Thus, critical exploration and deconstruction of those religious aspects was a necessary strategy for societal change.

Religious people took on the task, engaging in serious scholarship to make counterproposals. Religions are dynamic entities that change, however slowly, as each generation brings its insights to bear. Scholars including John Boswell, Mark Jordan, and Jose Cabazon opened up the field of inquiry in religious traditions as diverse as Christianity and Buddhism.

Many early proponents of gay liberation claimed that it was precisely their religious commitment to “love thy neighbor” that prompted their actions for change. They included ministers like the Reverend Troy Perry, who gathered a dozen worshippers in his living room in San Francisco in the fall of 1968, well before the Stonewall riots in New York City in June 1969, which are seen as the beginning of the gay liberation movement. That small group of worshippers later became the Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches, a church explicitly for LGBTQ Christians and their friends. It is now a thriving denomination of more than 40,000 members in 300 churches in 22 countries worldwide.

The Reverend John McNeill, a Jesuit priest, pioneered the Catholic work by arguing that homosexuality ought to be morally acceptable because God created gay and lesbian people to be loving human beings like everyone else. He was eventually forced to leave his religious order and became a well-respected therapist and spiritual director in New York City. McNeill helped found Dignity, a Catholic lesbian and gay support/advocacy group that continues to flourish. He helped open the conversation about homosexuality in Catholicism, a religious tradition that has same-sex religious orders and all-male clergy as well as teachings against all forms of same-sex expression.

Jewish scholars took on similar issues in their teachings, exploring scripture and rethinking traditional teaching in light of the new social-scientific data about same-sex love. Progressive Jews, mostly from the Reform tradition, established LGBTQ-friendly synagogues. Congregation Beth Simchat Torah founded in New York City in 1973 and Bet Mishpachah founded in Washington, D.C., in 1975 were prototypes for others around the country.

Lesbian theology flowered as part of the feminist awakening in the field from the 1970s onward. Women's experiences in general and lesbian women's experience in particular were left out of most theological reflection. Early gay work followed the same pattern, focused on men by men yet making sweeping claims that alleged to include women. Hence, the early work in gay and lesbian theology was predominantly male. Feminist scholars unmasked these dynamics throughout the field and developed their own constructive work as well.

Sally Miller Gearhart offered the first critical lesbian perspective in the early 1970s, bringing together feminist theological arguments with lesbian sensibility. Scholarly work by Bernadette Brooten established that lesbian women in the early Christian period were oppressed not simply for their sexual acts, but rather, they were subjected to criticism because in their attempts at sex between equals, namely, women, in a culture that saw all women as inferior to men, they transgressed the boundaries of top-down sexual dynamics that characterized men's sexual lives whether with women or with men who were younger, weaker, or poorer. Carter Heyward, Judith Plaskow, Mary E. Hunt, and others focused on lesbian women's experiences as a source for theological thinking.

Lesbian women far outnumbered gay men among the first openly same-sex-loving people ordained and otherwise engaged in public leadership roles in religious organizations. Virtually all of them experienced a severe backlash. Christian Lesbians Out Together (CLOUT) was formed to provide support and nurture for its members. The Conference for Catholic Lesbians was another such group concerned with the specific needs of women that were not addressed by male-led groups.

As bisexual and later transgender persons claimed their full rights as religious people, scholarship and practice were challenged again. Few documents exist on the spirituality, much less the theology, of bisexual persons, but there is work in progress. Transgender persons are making strong claims about their rights and therefore their religious lives. Their most powerful challenge is to static notions of sex and gender and all the complexities that the deconstruction of those categories involves. For example, if an ordained man becomes a woman in a tradition that does not ordain women, is he then a woman ordained? Such questions remain to be resolved, but they are now part of the broader theological conversation.

At issue in most of the same-sex debates is not so much homosexuality but heterosexism, the normative assumption that everyone is heterosexual. So contemporary scholarship on the religious roots of heterosexism rather than a continued focus on homosexuality is gaining a wide audience. The search continues for a level ethical playing field for all regardless of sexuality orientation. The work is now done in broadly interreligious terms, with insights emerging from one tradition that can be useful in another.

Gay and lesbian theology remains a relatively new field. Its impact can be seen most readily in pastoral counseling, spiritual direction, and ethics, where the new insights are lived out. There is no consensus either on the issues of same-sex love or on the acceptance of same-sex-loving persons in religious groups. But there is recognition of the importance of such foundational theological discussions and hope for their eventual resolution.

GAZA

Gaza is an Israeli territory fronting the Mediterranean Sea and bordering Egypt, populated almost entirely by Palestinian Muslims and Christians. A mere 25 miles (1 mile = 1.61 kilometers) long and 4–7 miles wide, what is now known as the Gaza Strip might aptly be likened to a large metropolis, yet its miniature dimensions belie the area's global political and religious significance, past and present. The early history of the Gaza Strip is still being written, and relatively little is known about some periods even as new archaeological discoveries are continually being made, some extending as far back as the Early Bronze Age. As the control point of an ancient route between Asia and Africa, the narrow strip of land has been fought over by numerous powers from the Egyptian pharaohs to the Philistines, the Israelites to the Assyrians, Alexander the Great to Herod the Great, and Napoleon to Hulagu Khan. Since the 1948 war, Gaza has been a major locus of struggle and contestation between Arabs and Israelis, Muslims and Jews, and, presently, Palestinian Islamists and Palestinian nationalists. It is bordered on the north and east by Israel, on the south by Egypt, and on the west by the Mediterranean Sea. The population numbers approximately 1.5 million, many of whom are refugees, although no accurate census has been taken for many years. Seventy-five percent of Gazans are under the age of 25 and 99% are Sunnī Muslim.

The religious history of the strip is rich and complex and cannot be separated from its political history. Gaza's denizens have included Jews, Christians, and Muslims as well as adherents of Semitic religions about which we know relatively little today, including that centered on Dagon, which figures in the biblical story of Samson, the blinded Israelite who wreaks revenge on the Philistines by bringing down their god's temple in Gaza. Numerous archaeological sites, many of which feature large, impressive mosaics, attest to a long tradition of Christian monasticism in Gaza and the vicinity, a movement that began perhaps as early as the third century CE and flourished with the Christianization of Gaza in the beginning of the fifth century CE. Gaza was captured and held by the Arabs from the 7th century until the 12th century, when it was taken by the Crusaders. For the next three centuries, the city was destroyed numerous times and was fought over by the Ayyubids, the Mongols, and the Mamluks. From the 16th through the mid-20th century, it was controlled by the Ottoman Turks.

The modern presence of the Jews in Gaza began during the Ottoman Empire, when Turkish authorities encouraged both Spanish and Turkish Jews to settle in the area. Their status changed during World War I, with the British defeat of the Turks. During the war, the strip was the scene of a particularly vicious battle between the two armies that left the banks of the Wadi Gaza littered with 15,000 corpses in the space of 2 days, neither side having gained an inch of territory. Under British rule, Jews were forbidden to live in Gaza. They returned, nevertheless, and in 1946 reestablished Kfar Darom, which had been destroyed during the Arab revolt in the late 1930s. Two years later, the Muslim Brotherhood, the Pan-Islamist movement established in Egypt in 1928 by Hasan al-Banna, entered Gaza in the vanguard of the invading Egyptian army, embarking on its first jihad against the nascent Israel, a struggle that has continued into the 21st century. Beginning in 1951, Palestinian nationalist fighters known as fida'iyun launched a series of attacks against Israeli targets from locations in Syria, Jordan, and Egypt. In 1956, in response to these incursions, Israel initiated the Sinai Campaign and was joined by France and Britain, which were alarmed at Egypt's nationalization of the Suez Canal.

Egypt occupied the Gaza Strip from 1948 to 1967. Israel began its occupation in 1967, at which time a new settlement policy was initiated. At its height, the number of settlers amounted to nearly 7,000 individuals. With a durable peace with Egypt in place by 1979, Israel's occupation of Gaza came to be seen by many Israelis as a burden. In 2005, Ariel Sharon, the architect of many of Israel's settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, announced that Israel was pulling out of the strip, and Israeli soldiers proceeded to dismantle 21 settlements inside it. Within a few weeks, the Jewish population of Gaza fell to zero. Palestinian elections in the strip were held the following year and were won by members of Harakat al-Muqawamat al-Islamiyyah, the Islamic resistance movement Hamas, which had been founded in Gaza at the beginning of the first intifada as the Palestinian branch of the Muslim Brotherhood. In contrast to the secular agenda of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), Hamas presented itself as a Qur'an-based movement and the conflict in the region as ultimately a religious rather than political one. The group's mithaq, or covenant, penned directly after the first intifada began, calls for the replacement of the Jewish state with an Islamic one. Palestine, the document asserts, belongs to the Islamic waqf, the Islamic charitable trust, until the Day of Judgment.

Hamas won parliamentary elections in 2006 and formed a Palestinian Authority national unity government with its longtime rival, Fatah, the largest faction of the PLO, under Hamas leader Isma'il Haniya. Tensions between the two parties soon became acute and in June 2007 culminated in the Battle of Gaza, a series of violent clashes and assassinations that lasted for 2 weeks, from which Hamas emerged victorious and removed Fatah officials by force. The strip was still technically part of the Palestinian Authority, but controlled completely by Hamas, and possessed a status approaching that of a Corpus separatum, while the West Bank remained in the hands of Fatah. Beginning in 2001, Palestinians had begun launching thousands of rockets and mortars into southern Israel, and in December 2008, Israel launched an air assault on the strip and, shortly thereafter, a large ground assault, resulting in the deaths of approximately 1,500 Palestinians, many of them civilians. Since the Islamist takeover, both Israel and Egypt vastly curtailed movement of goods, services, and people across their borders. Gaza's airspace remained controlled by Israel, whose air force routinely overflies it, searching for the next suicide bomber or missile launcher. On both the Egyptian and Israeli fronts are massive antismuggling barriers. Linking the strip surreptitiously to the Sinai Desert are scores of tunnels through which are smuggled food and livestock, arms, explosives, money, fighters, and people simply trying to escape the confines of life in the strip. In 2011, following the ouster of President Hosni Mubarak in Egypt, the Egyptian government reopened a crossing from Egypt into Gaza. A pact of cooperation signed between Hamas and the Palestinian Authority in 2011 anticipated the reconciliation of the two branches of Palestine.

GEERTZ, CLIFFORD (1926–2006)

Clifford Geertz was an influential American anthropologist who made seminal contributions to the study of culture and religion. Geertz earned a doctorate in anthropology in 1956 from Harvard University's Department of Social Relations. He later served on the faculty at the University of Chicago from 1960 to 1970 and was appointed to a senior research position at the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, New Jersey, from 1970 to 2000. Over the course of his life, Geertz was increasingly recognized for his contributions to what became known as the symbolic and interpretive school of anthropology. Symbolic and interpretive anthropology treats culture as a system of shared meanings that are transmitted through key symbols, rituals, and social practices.

For Geertz, the analysis of culture is not an experimental science in search of generic laws but an interpretive one in search of contextually oriented meaning. Geertz developed his particular approach to cultural analysis through extensive fieldwork in Southeast Asia and northern Africa. For example, in his book the Religion of Java (1960), Geertz paid close attention to the symbolic dimensions of the Slametan, a communal feast used to ritualistically mark important social events in Javanese society. In a similar vein, Geertz and Geertz's Kinship in Bali (1975) was a study of the specifically cultural dimensions, including the ideas, beliefs, and values of the Balinese kinship system.

Drawing on his ethnographic work, Geertz wrote a series of essays, including "Religion as a Cultural System," "Thick Description: Toward an Interpretive Theory of Culture," and "Deep Play: Notes on a Balinese Cockfight," which became influential across the social sciences and humanities. These essays, among others, were collectively published in The Interpretation of Cultures (1973) and develop Geertz's theoretical and methodological arguments regarding cultural analysis. In Local Knowledge: Further Essays in Interpretive Anthropology (1983), Geertz explored the nature of anthropological understanding and the importance of what he calls "local knowledge" to the meaning-making process. For Geertz, anthropological writings are carefully constructed interpretations, and the ethnographer's role is to grasp cultural meaning through thick description and close attention to local knowledge. Throughout his career, Geertz used this approach to provide insights into a broad range of cultural phenomena, with particular attention given to religion.

In "Religion as a Cultural System," Geertz provides analytically powerful conceptions of both culture and religion. Culture, according to Geertz, is best understood as a historically transmitted pattern of meanings embodied in symbols. These symbolic forms constitute a system of inherited conceptions through which people communicate and develop their knowledge about and attitudes toward life. The analyst, therefore, should seek to grasp the meanings embodied in various symbolic forms and to interpret the ways in which these symbolic forms are used and understood by members of a particular culture. Geertz's understanding of religion also emphasizes the role of symbols. Religion, according to Geertz, is a system of symbols that acts to establish powerful, pervasive moods and motivations in people by formulating conceptions of a general order of existence. This order of existence is characterized by an aura of factuality so that the moods and motivations seem uniquely realistic. This distinctive understanding of religion highlights the way symbols are used, often through ritual, to establish shared experiences and interpretations of social life.

While many of his ideas, including those on religion, remain contested, Geertz's influence in the field of anthropology and beyond is unquestionable. Arguably the most influential American anthropologist of the late 20th century, his work remains essential for those seeking to study the complex webs of meaning that characterize human existence.

GENDER

Gender, in religion, refers to sex-associated characteristics and behaviors in both the natural and the supernatural world: the earth and its creatures, objects, spirits, and the gods. Gender and religion are dynamically interrelated, with religions shaping gender, and gender influencing religion. In recent times, gender has been at the heart of major controversies in religion and has led to new ways of studying and explaining religion.

Religion Shaping Gender

Religion has played an important role in defining the meaning of gender both as a symbol and in practice. In ancient times, religions assigned gender to various aspects of the natural world—the earth, rivers, mountains, sun, moon, and stars—which in turn were associated with spiritual power. In an ancient Aztec myth, Coatlicue, an earth goddess, gives birth to the sun (male) and the moon (female). In indigenous Chinese religion, all aspects of the universe derive from the interplay of two opposing forces, symbolized as yin (feminine) and yang (masculine).

The designation of gender was often, but not always, connected to inherent characteristics of the natural object or to human gender roles in the culture. The sun was a male deity in ancient Egypt but female in Canaan. Goddesses associated with grain production and warrior gods in the ancient Near East corresponded to men's and women's activities. But we find both male and female deities associated with warfare and with fertility in these cultures.

During the axial age, the traditions that were to become what we now call the major world religions began to articulate the divine as transcending nature, but gender symbolism persisted. In Hinduism, gods and goddesses came to be understood as personifications of one underlying divine reality. Yet deities continue to display characteristics and behavior mirroring the roles of human males and females in Indian society. Sometimes the divine couple is understood as a model for human behavior (e.g., Sita's chaste and submissive relationship to Rama). Other times, the gods symbolize broader spiritual forces (e.g., the carnal embrace of Shiva and Shakti). In the major monotheistic religions, divine transcendence of nature meant a decoupling from sexuality—God became an asexual being. God continued to have a gender but was now exclusively masculine: in Judaism as Lord and King, in Christianity as Father and Son. While Islam has stricter sanctions against the anthropomorphizing of God, the language of the Qur'an addresses God as masculine.

The idea of divine transcendence of nature in the major world religions was accompanied by a new use of gender symbols: the spiritual, eternal dimension is increasingly symbolized as masculine, while the female is associated with the material, temporary world and the human condition of passion and sexuality. We see this in Hindu philosophy: Purusha (spirit) is male, while Prakrti (matter) is female, a distinction that carries over to the conceptualization of Brahman (eternal divine consciousness) as masculine versus maya (the temporary illusory material world) as feminine. We also see it in Jewish tradition, where god is masculine (Father, Lord, King), while the people of Israel may be understood as feminine (bride of God), and in Christianity, where Jesus is male and the church is the bride of Christ. The emergence of such gender dualism in religion served to legitimate and enforce the unequal power relationships between men and women: If females are more passionate, more sexual, they are also less rational and morally suspect and therefore must be controlled by males. The use of gendered religious symbols, then, shapes how we understand what gender means.

Religions also shaped gender by articulating distinct behavioral roles for men and women. Historically, the major religious institutions formulated legal codes governing gender behavior. The Qur'an, the Mishnah, and the Laws of Manu spell out the specific rights and responsibilities of men and women in Islam, Judaism, and Hinduism, respectively. All these texts assign legal and familial authority to males and designate women's roles as primarily domestic. Prior to the modern age, adherence to religious gender codes was enforced by the courts and continues to be so today in nations that do not separate church and state.

Gender roles are also transmitted in stories whose values are internalized by the young. The Bible tells us that God created Eve from Adam's rib to be his helpmate; the Ramayana tells us that Sita always put her husband's welfare first. And gender roles are modeled in religious practice. Among the Asabano, a drum carried by male initiates is designated as female; it serves as a proxy for women, who are to be controlled by men. In Egypt, many Muslim women do not attend Friday religious prayers, perceiving the mosque as male space. Young Catholics in America, no less than Muslims in Saudi Arabia, are accustomed to seeing only males in positions of religious authority, and surveys consistently show religion, more than any other demographic factor, to predict gender attitudes. Thus, even in today's secular Western society, religion continues to influence gender roles.

Religious gender roles are significantly connected to concepts of sex and sexuality. Historically, most religions have encouraged men and women to marry. The union of male and female may be presented as a religious duty (Hinduism, Judaism) or as an option to avoid illicit sex (Christianity, Buddhism), but marriage was always heterosexual and conformed to patriarchal standards. The subordination of women is rooted in part in the association of the female with sexuality. In the Bible, Eve's desire is for her husband, but he will rule over her; in Buddhist texts, temptation appears in female form, and an enlightened princess takes on a male body before entering nirvana.

Religious sanctions against homosexuality are common but do not emerge as a consistent theme until the axial age. In ancient cultures, such as Greece and Rome, homosexual sex was widely tolerated. But the religious separation of the divine from nature, and by extension sexuality, seems to coincide with more restrictive views of sex. The sacred texts of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam address only male homosexuality, and some passages judge it as a violation of divinely ordained gender roles. In other religions such as Hinduism, a "third gender" is defined for those who do not fit clearly into traditional male or female identities. While such individuals were tolerated, ordinarily they remained outside religious norms, though in some cases, such as the bardache in Native American religious traditions, they were regarded as specially spiritually endowed.

By connecting gender to nature and to a divinely ordained order, religions present their norms as immutable fact and serve to legitimate traditional gender roles. Religious communities have frequently punished gender-inappropriate behavior—be it uppity women or openly gay men—by exclusion or sometimes death. Joan of Arc was burned at the stake for cross-dressing; homosexuals in Iran can be and occasionally are executed to this day. Even in secular societies, movements that challenge gender roles (e.g., to ordain women or permit homosexual marriage) are viewed by conservatives as attacking not only gender but religion itself. As Mary Daly put it, religion is the ideological glue that binds gender to sex.

Gender Shaping Religion and Religious Studies

Less obvious, but no less important, are the ways in which gender shapes religion. Traditional religion presents itself as existing prior to culture and the link between gender and sex as natural, a cosmic certainty ordained by God. In contrast, modern thinkers assert that both religion and gender are culturally constructed.

Feminists have pointed out that it was men who wrote the sacred texts and built the institutions that enforced religious gender norms. They assert that those norms are neither natural nor divinely ordained but rather reflect the values of ancient patriarchal societies. Invested in maintaining their own power, male founders created religious symbols, practices, and institutions that legitimated existing gender relationships. Religion itself, then, is shaped by gender.

Religion created by women (or by men with a less patriarchal outlook) may look different: more egalitarian and more affirming of the body and nature, as illustrated by contemporary pagan groups and feminist Jewish and Christian communities. But women have always shaped religion, even in patriarchal traditions—their contribution has just been overlooked, partly because what women did (e.g., domestic rituals, the creation of artifacts used in popular devotions) was not counted as part of religion as men had defined it.

Starting with feminist attempts to recover the missing women in religious history and expanding to other academic disciplines, gender has become an important category of analysis in the study of religion. The gender lens has focused attention on the distinctions between institutional religion (created and maintained by a male, literary elite) and popular religious movements (in which women often play a more important role), between public religious practice (dominated by men) and domestic religion (often defined by women), and between official religious teachings and actual religious practice, and on the materiality and embodiment, rather than only the intellectual dimension, of religion.

Gender study in religion has become popular partly because it is viewed as more neutral than women's studies and thus depoliticizes feminist analysis. But the gender lens also has its critics. Conservatives view gender as a secular category that distorts our understanding of religious people. Some feminists view gender as a continuation of patriarchal discourse. The whole notion of gender as cultural presumes that sex is natural, leaving the latter un-theorized and thus immutable. They point out that gender, like race, is an artificial category developed by one group to oppress another. Gender, in short, is likely to remain at the heart of contemporary religious controversies for many years to come.

GENERATION X

See Generational Change

GENERATIONAL CHANGE

Generations comprise people born within the same time period, who share similar formative experiences in adolescence and early adulthood. The concept of generations has been used to explain change and continuity in societies by social scientists and historians since the 18th century. Most recently, the concept of the generation has been used as a way to describe different groups in society, such as baby boomers or Generation X, and how their characteristics are somehow unique from other generational groupings.

The sociologist Karl Mannheim laid the groundwork for understanding the dynamics of how generations form and how social change takes place across different generations. For Mannheim, generations operate similarly to social class, with the crucial element being the common experience of the same historical problems and participation in the same social and intellectual movements that shape and transform the historical situation in which they grow up. Because of their common location in the historical process and their similar stage of personal development, those who experience and participate in similar historical and cultural events constitute a generation. All members of a particular generation, however, do not understand their common experiences in the same ways. Rather, they tend to differentiate into subgroups that express their common experiences in politically and culturally different ways.

If generational continuity takes place through the successful socialization of younger generations into the dominant societal system of values, norms, and beliefs, generational change takes place as younger generations come of age and experience tension or conflict with the values they have been taught and how those values relate to their own experiences. As these conflicting experiences are shared across a generation of people, generational consciousness emerges. As this new consciousness comes to constitute the outlook of a generation and is enacted through different generational subgroups coming into contact and conflict with each other and with previous generations, new ideas and values emerge, and social change takes place.

As applied to religion, as younger generations are socialized into religious beliefs, rituals, and practices, they interact with these in the context of their own experiences and expectations, from within their own particular sociohistorical situation. Thus, the particular experiences of younger generations that support or come into conflict with existing religious values and teachings drive the accommodation of religion to the needs and experiences of successive generations.

When assessing social and religious change, however, it is difficult to separate generation from other categories of analysis such as race and class. Using generation more as a descriptive category to delineate the differences between and within different generations, while focusing on how other variables influence how generations understand themselves and experience the world, is likely a more fruitful approach.

GENEVA CONVENTION

The term Geneva Convention (GC) is commonly used to denote a system of four international treaties and three additional protocols regulating the treatment of noncombatant personnel (wounded, shipwrecked, and captured soldiers) as well as civilians in cases of armed conflicts between states. These treaties do not refer to the use of weapons, which is covered by the Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907. The GC is not to be confused with the Geneva Protocol of 1925, which bans the use of chemical and biological weapons. Only states can become members of the conventions; nonetheless, nongovernmental organizations and substate organizations may still voluntarily declare compliance with the GC. The GC names the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) as the sole body empowered to enforce compliance on the part of the member states.

The first convention (GC1: “For the Amelioration of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces and Field”) followed the founding of the ICRC in 1863 and was ratified by 12 European nations in 1864. The initiator of the GC was Henry Dunant, the founder of the ICRC. With the first revision in 1906, the Hague Conventions III (1899) and X (1907) became the cornerstones of the GC2 (“For the Amelioration of the Condition of Wounded, Sick and Shipwrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea”) in 1949. In 1929, another revision led to the framework of GC3 (“Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War”—at that time GC2 but became GC3 in 1949), and in 1949, the third revision, in the aftermath of World War II, resulted in the addition of GC4 (“Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War”). The four GCs have now been ratified by 194 countries. They include, famously, a ban on the use of torture to extract information from prisoners of war.

The protocols were added in 1977 (I: “Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts” and II: “Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts”) and 2005 (III: “Adoption of an Additional Distinctive Emblem”). Protocol I has been ratified by 168 (as of July 2009), II by 164, and III by 43 states.

GC1 calls for equal treatment of personnel and wounded, regardless of race and religious or political affiliation. This guarantee extends to both the ICRC personnel and noncombatants in all matters. Article 17, Chapter 2, ensures that the treatment of corpses and burial or cremation standards meet the religious requirements of the deceased as far as possible. GC2 extends this stipulation to include naval personnel. GC3 (Chapter V, Articles 34–37) regulates the conduct of religious activities during captivity, stating that prisoners of war (POWs) must be allowed to exercise their religion (Article 34) and ensuring the provision of all relevant necessities. The convention mandates that captured military chaplains be allowed to fulfill all their duties; to that end, chaplains must be provided with all necessities and free correspondence with their religious institutions in the nation in which they are held (Article 35). The same applies to any captured person who is not an army chaplain but a clergyman (Article 36). POWs have the right to the services of a clergyman even if none has been captured (Article 37). GC4 calls for the provision of spiritual services for occupied civilians and for the facilitation of the distribution of religious texts (Articles 58, 86, Part III). Any regulation of GC3 also applies to detained civilians.

GEORGIA

Georgia, located on the Caspian Sea south of Russia, is one of the oldest Christian countries. Christianity became the state religion in the beginning of the fourth century. In the post-Soviet era, however, religion in Georgia is mostly a sign of national-cultural identity. Though it is not clear how many believers observe religious obligations out of religious motivation and how many out of custom or national loyalty, the number of Orthodox Christians has increased from 9.8% in 1998 to 17.5% in 2006.

According to the data of 2006, the population of Georgia comprises 4.7 million, with ethnic Georgians constituting the greatest part of the population, some 83.8%. The number of Orthodox Christians was almost the same as those of ethnic Georgians, 84%, indicating an overlap between those two categories. The remainder of the population were Muslims (9.9%), Armenian Apostolic (3.9%), Roman Catholic (1.2%), and Jews (0.8%). There were also small groups of Jehovah's Witnesses, Pentecostals, Lutherans, and others.

Legal Regulation of Religious Life

Article 9 of the Georgian constitution declares freedom of religion and independence of the church from the state. It also acknowledges the special role of the Orthodox Church in the country's history. In 2002, a constitutional agreement was signed between the state and the Georgian Orthodox Church, making the Orthodox Church a subject of public law. Other religious organizations are subjects of private law.

Processes After Regaining Independence

In 1991, after Georgia restored independent statehood, the new historical context provided for an expansion of religious organizations and the rise of religious minority groups. The influential right wing of the Orthodox Church tried to impose a total domination of the religious market. New religious groups appeared with modern missionary tactics, such as Jehovah's Witnesses, Mormons, and others. These were resented and aggressively rejected by right-wing orthodox Christians in the late 1990s and the first decade of the 21st century. At the same time, there was a general rise of nationalism within the country that helped support the nationalist identification with the Orthodox Church. Influential political groups tried to make the Orthodox Church their ally, but in general, the leaders of the Orthodox Church preserved their distance from the political processes.

Opposition to Globalization

From the late 1990s, Orthodox fundamentalists and even moderate representatives of the church have expressed suspicion toward globalization, liberalism, and ecumenism. In the beginning of the 21st century, many Orthodox believers, rallying around church leaders, have attempted to stake out their own historical and social claims to Georgian religious superiority. This may be considered to be a form of opposition to the currents of global culture that have affected many other parts of the world.

GERMANY

Germany is at the center of Europe and is the historic cradle of the Lutheran Reformation. It was also on several occasions in the 16th and 17th centuries the seat of fratricidal religious wars between Catholics and Protestants (German Peasants' War, Schmalkaldic War, Thirty-Years' War), wars that sometimes had Pan-European dimensions. These struggles were resolved through attempts to create peaceful coexistence between Catholics and Lutherans, first through the Peace of Augsburg in 1555 and later by the Peace of Westphalia in 1648. In the later evolution of the Holy Roman Empire (962–1806), these arrangements led to a strengthening of state power, which guaranteed civil peace in the framework of territorial states. In a sense, the prince of the state became the high priest, who had the right to impose his confessional religious beliefs on his subjects, who had a choice either to convert or to emigrate (until 1555) or simply to be tolerated (as of 1648). This status of state church lasted until 1918 and was abolished only with the adoption of the Weimar Republic constitution (in August 1919).

Since the 16th century, Germany has been a biconfessional land of Catholics and Protestants and has been deeply marked by the political, cultural, and social stakes of this fragile coexistence. According to historians like Manfred Kittel, this confessional antagonism slowed down the development of German democracy and is said to have lasted until 1970. The period 1800 to 1970 represented a second confessional era (Olaf Blaschke), like the period 1530 to 1730, as described by the historians of the Reformation, Heinz Schilling and Wolfgang Reinhard. The internal conflict it created in the national state had consequences on exactly what was the logic underlying German church-state relations.

German law continues to have a legal and institutional bias toward Christian churches. They are regarded as public law corporations. This status dates from the 19th century and was guaranteed to churches by the Weimar constitution (Article 137.5) as a compensation for the loss of state church status (Article 137.1). It also gave special status to groups such as humanistic congregations (Article 137.7). Being public law corporations, churches were constitutionally guaranteed specific rights, such as the right to levy funds with the help of the state (Article 137.6), including a church tax, representing 8%–9% of the income tax; the right to dispense religious courses/instruction in school; the right to have theology faculties in state/public universities (guaranteed today by the Länder constitutions or church-state conventions); and the right to have a pastoral presence within public institutions, such as chaplains in the army, hospitals, prisons (Article 141 WRV).

Due to the para-public nature of the status of churches in Germany and of these domains of action shared between churches and the state, the church-state relationship has been described as one of “limping separation.” The Basic Law of contemporary Germany took over nearly all the articles related to religion in the constitution of the Weimar Republic (Articles 136–139 and 141 WRV). However, the interpretation of these laws is affected by the changing historical context and the various changes that were made in the most recent constitution. It adds references to God in the preamble to the Basic Law, which were not there in the Weimar constitution; it stipulates religious freedom (Articles 3.3, 4) and the right to religious instruction in school (Article 7.3); and it requires oath taking to have a reference to God, as opposed to the secular practice enforced under the Weimar constitution. This positive attitude toward religion and religious freedom is explained by the immediate postwar acceptance of Christian values after the secular nationalism of the Third Reich and also by the influence of the Allies, who were supportive of the churches due to the mediation role that they played between the occupation forces and the population. By giving religious communities the right to impart religious instruction at school, the state admitted its incompetence in transmitting values itself and delegated this responsibility to religious communities. This attitude is an essential part of the German church-state system and is manifest also in the humanitarian sector (hospitals, retirement homes, nursery schools, etc.), which is managed by the churches. These humanitarian service agencies run by the churches have an enormous social and financial impact since they constitute the second largest employer in the country after the state.

This administrative arrangement between church and state is supported by a relatively large consensus in West German society, where Christian values play the role of civil religion. The only opposition to it has come from the young liberals of the FDP in 1973 and the East German political leader Wolfgang Ullmann, himself a former pastor, who brought forward a motion in January 1994 to eliminate the reference to God in the Basic Law and modify a large part of the church-state system. There have also been repeated criticisms of the state's support for the church, albeit in a minority, from the Association of the Defense of Civic Rights and from the Association of Free Thinkers.

The ratio of Catholics to Protestants has varied over the years. There was a quantitative and ideological preponderance of Protestantism under the Bismarck Reich, and there was a political and social renaissance of Catholicism in West Germany in 1949, when the Federal Republic of Germany was founded. The reunification of the two Germanys has reestablished the numerical balance between Protestants and Catholics (25.4 million Catholics [31%] and 24.8 million Protestants [30.2%] in 2007 out of a population of about 82 million inhabitants) since, with the admission of the Basic Law for the East Länder in October 1990, the population increased by about 16 million inhabitants (about 2.2% of them Protestant and 4% Catholic, though a majority of 70% claimed no religious affiliation in 1990). This high percentage of people without religious affiliation expresses an important break with the East German Protestant past (80% of Protestants in 1949 and 60% in 1964 against 11% and 8% of Catholics in the respective years). Among the various reasons for this are the reduction in the number of Christians in some industrial regions, the departure to the West of certain Christian social classes, and antireligious politics practiced by the German Democratic Republic through the introduction of the Jugendweihe (a secular coming-of-age ceremony for 14-year-olds) in 1954 and the propagation of scientific atheism. It is a fact that besides the massive presence of people without religious affiliation in the German society, there has been since the 1990s a regular increase in de-affiliation from the churches (Kirchenaustritte [2007]: 93,667 = +11% for the Catholic Church; 130,331 = +7.2% for the Protestant churches), which is associated with the demographic aging of the population. This has led the Protestants to contemplate making structural reforms (fusion of parishes and of provincial churches) in anticipation of a drastic reduction of financial resources. With regard to the Catholic Church, the euphoria following the election of a German pope ("wir sind Papst" was the headline of the gutter press daily paper Bild-Zeitung) was short-lived, and a growing ill-feeling appeared in the face of the Church's managing of the pedophilia scandals.

An evolution has occurred in the domain of religious instruction. In the state of Brandenburg, in 1996, a compulsory course was established for everyone in each class, having to do with religions and ethics. In 2009, Berlin introduced a multicultural course of ethics for everyone in a city that had become multicultural. So the federal states are taking the initiative to gather students of any philosophic or religious origin in order to pass on a common language about these matters and discuss the rules to observe to live together. Another evolution is in taking into account negative religious freedom. In 1995, the Federal Constitutional Court struck down a Bavarian rule that the crucifix must be displayed in classrooms as not being in accordance with the neutrality principle of the state.

The presence of a substantial Muslim community (about 5% of the population, i.e., 4 million inhabitants in 2010, of whom 1 million have obtained German nationality) is a second breaking point in the German biconfessional tradition. It contributes to the religious diversity of the country along with the 1.2 million Orthodox Christians and a little more than 100,000 members of the Jewish community. The majority of Muslims (2.6 million in 2006) are of Sunnī origin, and most—some 60%—are Turkish, with a higher birthrate than the national average. After the Schröder government (a coalition of SPD [German Social Democrats]/Green parties) made access to nationality more flexible in 1998, it became easier for foreigners living in Germany to become naturalized, but these communities do not yet have much weight in Germany's political life.

As far as religion is concerned, on the other hand, the right of Muslims to practice their beliefs is well established. In 2009, there were about 200 mosques (a number that had tripled between 1997 and 2000) and about 2,600 other premises in which to pray. Muslim religious instruction in public schools is not offered in the whole country as it is in Austria, but it is being conducted as an experiment in all states of western Germany and in Berlin. During the first decade of the 21st century, political debates broke out regarding the Muslim veil—whether it could be worn by teachers or state servants; discussion also occurred over the architecture of mosques (the height of the minarets, the appropriateness of mosques in old inner cities) in certain big towns such as Köln or Duisburg.

The main stumbling block in terms of equality with other religions, especially Christianity, is the status of Islam. Unlike in Austria, Islam has not been given public law status in Germany. The reasons given are its absence of doctrinal authority, the diversity of its communities of obedience, and the lack of a census of the numbers of members of these communities. However, since Germany officially declared itself “an immigration country” in 2005, integration is on the agenda. In September 2006, in accordance with the initiative of the interior minister of the time, Wolfgang Schäuble (Christian Democratic Union), meetings were held that brought together public authorities and various Muslim associations to formulate concrete proposals aimed at religious integration into German society.

GHANA

Ghana is a West African country located on the shores of the Atlantic Ocean. It exhibits the characteristics captured in John Mbiti's (1990) famous statement: “Africans are notoriously religious” (p. 1), a sentiment also shared by Geoffrey Parrinder (1974), who called Africans “this incurably religious people” (p. 9). The religious landscape of Ghana defies the secularization theory, which predicts that religion will gradually be consigned to the private sphere in an increasingly modern-rationalist world. Religious activity in Ghana today depicts an upsurge in individual participation in religious activity (private sphere) as well as the continued influence of religious groups in the public sphere. Churches, particularly Pentecostal/Charismatic churches, are springing up throughout Ghanaian society. This development is largely an urban phenomenon that, to mark their success, has also become transnational in nature through the establishment of branches in the Global North and other parts of the Global South.

The growth of Christianity in Ghana is remarkable given its fairly recent advent from Europe. The historic churches, also known as the mission, mainline, or orthodox churches, have asserted their presence in Ghana since the 19th century. The “Basel Mission,” for example, “arrived in Ghana in 1828, the Methodists in 1835” (Gifford, 1998, p. 57). And although consistent Catholic evangelization did not begin in the Gold Coast until 1880, a Portuguese chaplain celebrated the first Catholic Mass at Elmina in 1471 (Wiltgen, 1956). The presence of these churches is easily noticeable in their influence on the Ghanaian public sphere through their provision of social institutions, predominantly in the areas of education and health care.

Today, Pentecostalism is a salient sector of African Christianity. African Pentecostalism has roots in African Independent Churches, established after the 1950s to mark the independence struggle; Western Pentecostal churches (e.g., the Baptist Church), which gained entry into West Africa in the 1970s, growing considerably in Ghana since the late 1990s (Darkwah, 2001, p. 12); and the new churches (e.g., Aladura [Peel, 1989] and Nakaba) that originated in Africa. Now it is fashionable for Ghanaians to found churches that are beginning to take on new roles of providing social services, thereby emulating the historic churches.

Consequently, the religious face of Ghana is undergoing rapid transformation. Christianity has witnessed the most rapid growth in Ghana (26%) over a 40-year period (since 1960), moving from 43% to 69% of the population, while adherents of African traditional religion have plummeted from 45% to 6%—a 39% decrease (Gifford, 1998, p. 61). Islam has remained relatively stable, moving from 12% to 15.9%, while a new development has occurred with 6.1% of Ghanaians now reporting no religious affiliation (Ghana Statistical Service, 2002).

Pentecostal churches account in no small way for such a rapid growth of Ghanaian Christianity, even though the birth of Pentecostalism in Ghana is fairly recent. Statistics from the Registrar General’s Department indicate that in 2005, 443 new religious groups were registered in Ghana. The total number of both secular organizations and religious groups registered over the same period was 1,931.

The increasing involvement of churches in socioeconomic life renders meaningless the view that consigns religion strictly to the private life of individuals. In everyday life, the experiences of the private and the public constantly intersect for most Ghanaians, making it difficult to draw a sharp distinction between religion as a private and a public affair.

GHAZALI (1058–1111)

Abu Hamid Muhammad ibn Muhammad al-Ghazali (1058–1111) is one of the most important figures in the history of Islamic thought and has influenced almost all Islamic disciplines. He was born in Tus, present-day Mashad, in northeastern Iran. After his basic education, he attended the Nizamiyah Madrasa, a higher-learning institution, in Nishapur, where he became a student of Abu al-Maali al-Juwayni (1025–1085). Then, at the age of only 33, he was appointed as the head of the Nizamiyah Madrasa in Baghdad by Nizam al-Mulk, the vizier of the Turkish-Seljuk ruler Malikshah. Because of his lectures at the Nizamiyah Madrasa, his fame spread throughout the Muslim world. In 1095, he left his job and headed to Mecca (Makkah) for a pilgrimage due to a personal spiritual crisis. In al-Munqidh min al-Dalal, a spiritual autobiography of sorts, Ghazali explains that he chose seclusion as a means to endure this crisis. After living in various cities, such as Damascus and Jerusalem, he returned to his homeland in Tus, where he passed away in 1111.

Ghazali was a Sunnī scholar, belonging to the Ash'ari school of theology and the Shafi'i school of Islamic law. He represents a turning point in Islamic thought. The literature of Islamic thought is usually divided as before and after Ghazali. An exceptional and multidimensional scholar, he was interested in multiple fields, such as law and legal theory, theology, philosophy, and Sufism.

It is reported that Ghazali's writings fill over 400 letters and books, which were in circulation throughout the Muslim world even in his lifetime. He began to write on Islamic law and legal theory at an early age. He composed three main books on Islamic law, written mainly from a Shafi'i perspective, titled al-Wajiz, al-Wasit, and al-Basit, and also wrote two books on Islamic legal theory. The first is al-Mankhul fi al-Usul, which some say is his first published work; but his main influence in Islamic legal theory occurred through another book, al-Mustasfa fi al-Usul, which was written toward the end of his life. In this work, he presents an original classification and a new approach to Islamic legal theory that is still influential in the discipline.

Ghazali has also made an important impact on theology through works such as Fadaih al-Batiniyyah, al-Iqtisad fi al-I'tiqad, and Ijlam al-'awam an 'ilm al-kalam, though he wrote many other important works on theology as well. Ghazali's legacy in the history of Islamic theology is exceptional. He left behind an epistemological system striving to reach certain truth and a distinct understanding of existence.

Ghazali was also interested in philosophy and wrote two important books in the field. He devoted Maqasid al-Falasifah to explaining in detail what philosophy is, and he critiqued both Greek and Muslim philosophers in Tahafut al-Falasifah. Despite his critical approach to philosophy, however, his Mi'yar al-'ilm made Aristotelian logic, the topic of the work, a necessary tool for every Islamic discipline.

His most celebrated work on Sufism, Ihya' ulum al-Din, has been widely considered one of the most influential works of Islamic thought. With this work, he fundamentally changed the way Sufism was understood and, in certain ways, legitimized it among Islamic disciplines. Ghazali, with his exceptional thought, continues to influence the ways in which current Muslims perceive Islam and to give shape to present Islamic movements on a global scale.

GHOST DANCE RELIGION

The Ghost Dance was a prophetic Native American religious movement that started around 1870 in response to the White European American conquest, and it rapidly spread throughout two thirds of the United States, with local variations. It sprang from the harsh conditions the Indians had been forced to accept. It promised to restore ancestral might, and it helped revitalize native cultures. It was strongly marked by Christian moral teachings, apocalypticism, and messianism.

It had been prepared by several prophets who had seen in visions what the Indians must do to be freed from White oppression and bring back the good old times: Neolin or the Delaware Prophet (in the 1760s), Smohalla (Wanapam, ca. 1815–1895), Tenskwatawa (Shawnee, 1775–1836), Kenekuk (Kickapoo, ca. 1790–1852), and Tavibo (Paiute, ca. 1835 to ca. 1915).

A major surge in the practice of the Ghost Dance occurred in 1890, resulting from the revelation received by Tavibo's son, Wovoka, aka Jack Wilson (ca. 1856–1932). On January 1, 1889, after a solar eclipse, Wovoka saw the spirits, the ghosts, of the dead ancestors with the Great Spirit, who told him to preach the Ghost Dance and good moral conduct. Unlike other prophetic messages, the new movement tolerated the Whites, who were, however, expected to retreat to their own world. Wovoka was given power through five songs.

The prophecy guaranteed that once the Whites had gone, their possessions would revert to the Indians; diseases, poverty, and death would vanish; and the preinvasion golden age would prevail, allowing the dead ancestors to be reunited with their descendants. They would bring back the buffaloes. Several groups, mostly the Sioux, wore a ghost shirt, a white garment (perhaps inspired by the one worn by the Mormons) decorated with feathers and mythological designs, which rendered the dancers purportedly invulnerable against weapons, and they held the traditional bow and arrow. The dance lasted 4 or 5 days, mostly at night, in an open space with details differing according to the tribes. The fasting dancers formed circles and pressed against one another so as to form a single organism. The leader sang an invocation to the departed, to the rhythm of the participants' steps, followed by laments and cries. The Great Spirit was then called on to bring the dead to communicate with the dancers. This climax was performed in a trance that would be repeated several times. The Dance acted out the final destruction of the world as well as its regeneration, providing for the salvation and healing of the disciples.

Though peaceful, such messianism was so obviously leveled against the White Americans that it worried them. The massacre at Wounded Knee (December 1890) was in part caused by the army's urgency to suppress it. This struck a major blow to the Dance; nevertheless, it continued to be performed.

Like most prophetic movements, the Ghost Dance turned to Pan-Indianism to vanquish the Americans.

Yet while it fought against them, it incorporated many of their spiritual features, for its disciples felt that the superiority of the European Americans must come from their religion, which thus had to be integrated into traditional rituals to strengthen their efficiency. (The major report on the movement was written by James Mooney in 1896.) An American anthropologist, Weston LaBarre, theorized that the emergence of the Ghost Dance Religion was a paradigmatic example of how all religions emerge as a response to crisis and imminent destruction, including the ominous threat of cultural obliteration.

GILGAMESH EPIC

The ancient Mesopotamian Epic of Gilgamesh has earned a preeminent place in world literature because of its universal themes of love, loss, despair, and coming to terms with fate. Its motifs and themes have echoed throughout the early religious traditions of the Middle East. Introduced to the modern world in the late 19th century, the story struck a chord with biblical and classical scholars, who recognized the motifs of a forfeited paradise, initiation by seduction, a catastrophic flood, and the powerful love between heroes, one of whom dies. Along with the Enuma Elish, the Epic of Atrahasis, and other discoveries, the Epic of Gilgamesh excited research into the shared Mesopotamian-Mediterranean religious imagination. Today, the stories are studied as biblical and Greek Ur literature and also as classics in themselves.

The Epic of Gilgamesh is not of one shape, size, and theme in all its manifestations. Related texts exist in half a dozen languages and adaptations, stemming geographically from Mesopotamia to Anatolia and historically from the 21st to the 7th century BCE. Few scholars believe that the actual exploits of one historical king stand behind these. Sumerian king lists date a King Gilgamesh to 2700 BCE, cult lists deify him by 2500 BCE, and he becomes the subject of song by 2100 BCE. Yet narratives about him reflect a significant evolution of authorial interest, from praise for a superhero (two-thirds god, one-third human) to, ultimately, meditations on human arrogance, love, and certain death. The versions known as Old Babylonian (ca. 1700 BCE) and Standard Akkadian (1300–1200 BCE) are masterpieces in their unique ways, the latter synthesizing the tale of a primeval flood with a despairing hero's vain quest for immortality. Across and also within these stories, Gilgamesh the tragic hero supersedes Gilgamesh the mighty god-king.

The universal appeal of the Standard Akkadian version is tied to its twin themes of love and death. The love between the cohorts Gilgamesh and Enkidu is figured in a variety of ways. They are bride and bridegroom, adoptive brothers, and hybridic adventurers. The themes of love and death unite squarely when Enkidu rages against his imminent demise and the loss of innocence that led to it. The sun god admonishes him: Had Enkidu not left his innocence behind in the wilderness, he would not have known profound love and joy with Gilgamesh. Later, Gilgamesh weeps for the dead Enkidu like a grieving woman and possibly as a spouse. The death of Enkidu impels Gilgamesh to undergo a futile search for immortality. Eventually, the only immortal human—a Noah-like figure named “He Has Found Life”—reports to Gilgamesh the story of the flood and that all humans now are destined to die. Gilgamesh returns home sobered but also wiser. The Standard Akkadian version concludes by offering enduring works of architecture and literature as consolations for death, whereas the Old Babylonian version offers love and family.

Essential parallels are often drawn among the Mesopotamian figures of Gilgamesh and Enkidu, the biblical David and Jonathan, and the Homeric Achilles and Patroklos. The power of all three stories may be gauged by their continued resonance today.

GIRARD, RENÉ (B. 1923)

René Girard is considered by many to be one of the most important theorists of religious violence of his era, though severe scholarly criticism also has been leveled at his theories. His works have played an important role in discussions about religious studies in general. His focus is on ritual and sacrifice and the role that mimetic competition plays in shaping human culture.

Born in 1923 in France, Girard migrated to the United States, where he completed a doctorate in history at Indiana University in 1950, having previously majored in medievalism while in Europe. After a variety of teaching appointments, he settled at Stanford University, where he taught between 1981 and 1995. Although he has published profusely, his books La Violence et le sacré (Violence and the Sacred; 1972) and Le Bouc émissaire (The Scapegoat; 1982) are the most influential.

In both, Girard's ideas about sacrifice are principally indebted to the writings of Sigmund Freud, especially Totem und Tabu (Totem and Taboo; 1913). Freud's ideas on the psychology of violence provide the lens through which Girard begins to examine mimetic desire, the process of scapegoating, and sacrificial crisis, key theoretical ideas that he develops via analysis of literary texts.

Mimetic desire is the cornerstone of Girard's theoretical edifice. Also described as “acquisitive mimesis” or “triangular desire,” it describes a simple situation that most adults have seen around children: One child notices a specific toy that had previously gone unnoticed until then; but when that first child notices the toy and makes an effort to acquire and play with it, the second child notices this and, in turn, is compelled by desire for the exact toy, regardless of what other toys are available. Conflict thereby ensues as they both vie for the same toy. Under the influence of such mimetic desire, adults are just as susceptible as children, but the consequences are worse because they lead to unsupervised forms of violence and vengeance. This is especially the case when the desire is thwarted by those possessing the same acquisitive interest.

Ritual sacrifice alleviates the tensions of mimetic desire. A key aspect of the ritual is the biblical notion of the “scapegoat,” where the ritual victim assumes the violence that otherwise would have torn apart a community burdened with intense mimetic rivalry. The communal murder of the scapegoat channels violent tendencies into a grand act of controlled violence. The catharsis induced by the sacrifice effectively stabilizes the clan and keeps violence outside its walls. However, under ultra-constrained or competitive conditions, sacrifice can sometimes be arrested. In this suspended state, the channeled catharsis of sacrifice is impeded, yielding a dangerous condition that Girard calls the “sacrificial crisis.” When this crisis arises, the stream of sacrificial violence can no longer maintain its trajectory outside the religious community. When the release of ritual and sacrifice can find no other outlet, violence erupts and strikes wherever it can, targeting even within the community. Potentially, this violence can spin out of control and breed itself in cyclically rejuvenated vengeance. Thus, the disorder and mayhem that issue primarily from mimesis and secondarily from the sacrificial crisis become key elements for understanding the role religion plays as the victim, instigator, and mitigator of violent activity in society.

Scholars in literature and religious studies especially have recognized the groundbreaking implications of Girard’s work and, in particular, the insights that he forcefully forges between religion’s use of violence and the state’s use. His ideas point to religion as the primary custodian of violence, in much the same way as a state aims to monopolize the violence of its constituency. The state, like religion, thus has a stake in minimizing the violence not issued by its own administration, lest it face its own secular sacrificial crisis in the form of revolution, civil war, or coup d’état.

There have been attempts to apply Girard’s theories to real instances of religious violence in contemporary life. A volume on Violence and the Sacred in the Modern World (1992), edited by Mark Juergensmeyer, explores Girardian themes related to modern-day instances of religious terrorism, militancy, and intergroup conflict. Though appreciative of Girard’s approach, some of the authors provide alternative interpretations, including Juergensmeyer, who sees the contest between alternative visions of social order to be a larger driving force than mimetic rivalry in creating the conditions of discord that are, as Girard argues, symbolically diffused through acts of ritualized violence.

Gil Bailie’s Violence Unveiled (1995) examines foundational violence and the subtle differences between Freud and Girard. He explains that in Freud’s system, violence is originary. The killing of the father by the sons is the “once and for all” violence that sets the religious wheels in teleological motion. For Girard, violence is not the causal link to religious practice; rather, mimetic desire is. Mimetic desire is the foundation for the killing of the father, which it precedes. Moreover, this violence is not the onetime origin story that Freud presents. Instead, mimesis is a human trait, a common denominator of the species.

Other scholars have connected Girard to the notion of “atonement,” or “satisfaction” theology. This school of thought situates violence within the realm of theology, in effect prescribing violence on theological grounds. Under the sway of such subjectivity, society creates its own modern class of scapegoat, including vagabonds, the homeless, and especially criminals. Increasingly, these ideas gain ground in the area of criminal justice since they articulate the state’s interest in maintaining a permanent category of secular scapegoat to maintain social stability and control. Thus, under Girard’s scheme, those in the criminal justice system might be properly viewed as the sacrificial equivalent of the scapegoat, whose parallel perhaps reaches its full zenith in the practice of capital punishment.

René Girard’s inquiries into the nature of religious violence point to religion as a remedial measure for managing the violence that invariably attends mimetic desire. Violence against the scapegoat is the primary vehicle to accomplish this feat, which simultaneously lessens the potential and proclivity for random, uncontrollable acts of violence. Since Girard holds up as exemplary the Christian narrative of Christ as the God who plays the ultimate role of victim in sacrificing his life, his ideas have sometimes been criticized as having a Christian bias. One of his last books on sacrifice, however, is dedicated to analyzing the Vedic texts of the ancient Hindu tradition, in which he finds similar themes. Thus, he argues that all religious narratives relating to ritual and sacrifice attest to the mimetic desire that is mitigated by the symbolic representation of violence.
