See also Freud, Sigmund; Religion and State; Scapegoating; Violence

Further Readings

- Bailie, G. (1995). Violence unveiled: Humanity at the crossroads. New York: Crossroad.
- Bellinger, C. K. (2001). The genealogy of violence: Reflections on creation, freedom, and evil. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Fleming, C. (2004). René Girard: Violence and mimesis. Malden, MA: Polity Press.
- Freud, S. (1913). Totem und Tabu [Totem and Taboo]. Frankfurt, Germany: S. Fischer.
- Girard, R. (1972). La Violence et le sacré [Violence and the sacred]. Paris: Grasset.
- Girard, R. (1982). Le Bouc émissaire [The scapegoat]. Paris: Grasset.
- Hamerton-Kelly, R. G. (Ed.). (1987). Violent origins: Walter Burkert, René Girard, and Jonathan Z. Smith on ritual killing and cultural formation. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Juergensmeyer, M. (Ed.). (1992). Violence and the sacred in the modern world. London: Frank Cass.

GLOBAL CAPITALISM AND RELIGION

Max Weber provided one definition of the relationship between capitalism and religion in seeing the way religion provides the social values that conduce or are resistant to capitalist practices. But global capitalism raises new questions about the dynamics between the two. In the global era, religions pose alternative views and regulatory norms for dominant economic structures and, in so doing, contribute to the local diversity of capitalist economic structures.

Global capitalism is the prime force that drives other processes of globalization, including cultural and political globalization. According to Manuel Castells, among others, its main characteristics are a constant flow of money seeking maximum profit; differentiated, global production networks; and flexibility of the workforce. The new types of production and consumption can have serious consequences for society in general and for religious values: greater social insecurity and inequality, seen as a violation of human dignity; forms of inclusion—including neocolonialism—and exclusion of nonprofitable groups that challenge the religious view of humans as social beings and that prompt charity; destruction of divine natural creation through exploitation of natural resources; and decline of the role of the national state, generally seen by religions as protectors of worldly justice. Especially for those religions that have a strong sense of the world as oikos (as a place that by divine will is to be inhabited and cultivated), these issues are of concern. We focus below on responses to them from within Christianity and Islam.

Some Christian leaders and activists are very critical of global capitalism. Liberal Christian groups have at times sided with antiglobalists in their critique of global capitalist institutions and were quite successful in a global campaign to fight international debt. The Roman Catholic Church grounds its economic critique in a long tradition of social teaching. Since Rerum Novarum (1891), the Church continues to promote the “common good,” subsidiarity in international relations (thus stressing the relative autonomy of national states and regional cultures), and preservation of the earth. Also, in line with the tradition of self-sufficiency of monastic groups, new Catholic initiatives such as Focolare seek to create an alternative economy based on principles of love and justice.

The Islamic world was not greatly affected by the global crisis of capitalism in 2008 to 2009. One reason given for its economic insulation was the difference in spiritual values regarding money. Usury—high interest rates—and forced contributions to charity are believed to alter the economic conditions. At the same time, there are transnational Islamic financial networks that exist in parallel to the capitalist ones. This kind of financial system is increasingly becoming an example for non-Islamic global financial institutions—for example, European banks seeking to offer halal financial products.

Erik Sengers

See also Ecumenicalism; Islam; Roman Catholicism; Weber, Max

Further Readings

- Dahles, H. (2007). Pursuit of capital: The Charismatic turn among the Chinese managerial and professional class in Malaysia. Asian Ethnicity, 8(2), 89–109.
- Gold, L. (2004). The sharing economy: Solidarity networks transforming globalisation. Aldershot/Burlington, VT: Ashgate.
- Lechner, F. (2005). Religious rejections of globalization. In M. Juergensmeyer (Ed.), Religion in global civil society (pp. 115–134). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Smets, P. (1999). Islamic banking practices in India. In P. Smets (Ed.), Money and culture: Examples from Indonesia, South Africa and India. Amsterdam: Vrije Universiteit, Department of Cultural Anthropology.

GLOBAL CITIES

Religious diversity in the world's major cities is, first and foremost, a phenomenon of globalization. The global circulation of people and their cultures forces urban dwellers to encounter different collective identities, often defined by language, race, ethnicity, or religion. Cities have always been places where strangers interact. Members of different faith communities have been sharing the social spaces of modern urban communities for as long as modern societies have existed. The question of how these “cultural strangers” get along—sometimes peacefully and sometimes less so—is key to understanding contemporary urban life and culture.

There are numerous meanings of the term global city. One kind of definition fixes the category based on the roles cities play in the worldwide capitalist system. For example, a global city is a location of significant command and control functionality, or a global city is a hub of significant capital flows. Another kind of definition focuses on the global circulation of people. In this view, a global city is one with a significant immigrant population. The latter type of definition is followed here for contemporary cities, but this was also true historically for imperial cities and their outposts. In discussing religion in global cities, this entry touches on the spatial semiotics of urban neighborhoods in global cities and gives examples from several contemporary cities of how religion shapes global cities.

Religion in Global Cities

The first decade of the 21st century has been a time of rising nativism. In the aftermath of large-scale political violence in global cities—such as the September 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington, D.C.; the March 11, 2004, bombings in Madrid; and the July 7, 2005, bombings in London—much of the anti-immigrant sentiment has been directed at Muslim communities, especially in the developed world. The ongoing conflict in the Middle East has fueled this tension as well. Add to this the long history of anti-Semitism and the flashpoints of sectarian violence within many of the world's religious communities, and one can understand the pressure building in multicultural, multiethnic urban neighborhoods.

Among members of world faith traditions, genuine ecumenical moments are fragile, and it is tempting to conclude that the story of religion in global cities is only about conflict. But a view from the ground, of the quotidian rhythms of urban life, suggests otherwise. Everyday circumstances force people to get along in order to achieve their individual goals. Observing intercultural interactions on the B68 bus along Coney Island Avenue in Brooklyn, Jerome Krase, in an interview to Larry Clamage, noted,

There are two different ways to ride the bus.

One is to look out the window of the bus and see the neighborhoods as you go by. Another way is to look inside the bus. You have all these different populations, which are constantly mixing as people get on and off the buses, depending on where you are along the Avenue.

In a sense it's a marvelous thing to see. Because we see Orthodox Jews and we see Muslims. We see Mexicans, people from Pakistan. We see people who might be warring with each other in some other part of the world—and maybe even the day before they got here—all getting on the same bus. They just kind of understand. They kind of grasp, almost immediately, that this is not the place for that. (<http://www.voanews.com/english/news/a-13-2004-11-23-voa38.html>, accessed June 9, 2011)

This kind of intuition is common in global cities. As Georg Simmel explained, urban life makes people interdependent and forces people to interact, in ways that they might not choose to do so otherwise, as part of the day-to-day rhythms of multilinguistic neighborhoods. Conflict occasionally occurs, but pragmatic cooperation is the norm.

Spatial Semiotics of Urban Neighborhoods

Applying the work of Roman Jakobson, there are three different types of visual markers of collective identity that are commonplace in urban neighborhoods of global cities. Some signs of collective identity are expressive—that is, they are intentional enactments of some aspect of a person's identity for the purpose of signaling that identity to those who share it or to others who do not. When Christians wear a crucifix, for example, they enact an expressive sign. Other signs are conative; their function is to influence others. For example, in Borough Park, Brooklyn, an Orthodox Jewish neighborhood, some of the signage is written only in Hebrew. The effect is to welcome those who understand Hebrew and to repel others. Finally, phatic signs of collective identity are those produced in the normal daily activities of a community that signal aspects of identity. Religious dress, for example, is a phatic sign because the purpose of the practice is to enact the shared culture of the community, to affirm one's membership, or to express piety. Such signs are signals of collective identity to members of both in-groups and out-groups and are familiar to urban dwellers in neighborhoods of global cities around the world.

Examples From Contemporary Global Cities

Perhaps the best way to understand how religion shapes life in global cities is to simply look at the ways in which people share social space in urban neighborhoods. Ordinary people change the meaning of urban places by changing how such spaces look, through their activities and by their presence. The following are a few examples of spatial semiotics.

Brooklyn

Coney Island Avenue runs south from Prospect Park to Brighton Beach in Brooklyn. A majority of the residents in the census tracts along Coney Island Avenue were born outside the United States, and almost two thirds of the population do not speak English at home. Among the distinct neighborhoods along the 4-mile (1 mile = 1.61 kilometers) commercial street are Caribbean, Hispanic, South Asian, Orthodox Jewish, Russian, and Chinese.

The mosaic pattern of the microsegregation results in specific forms of intercultural interaction. Traveling along the avenue, one sees the Muslim neighborhood, "Little Pakistan," abruptly become an Orthodox Jewish one, and then Russian. Signage in Urdu, Hebrew, and Cyrillic function as both conative and expressive signs. Despite the religious differences (with, e.g., Evangelical Protestant, Catholic, Muslim, Orthodox Jewish, and non-Orthodox Jewish communities), people interact in commercial settings such as corner stores, fast-food restaurants, and the ubiquitous pizza shops.

Cape Town

Religious diversity in Cape Town, as in many places in Africa, is the result of colonialism. The people and places in Cape Town reflect the religious traditions that came to the country since the middle of the 17th century, some of which have been influenced by indigenous practices. The earliest Christians were members of the Dutch Reformed Church, and later, Anglicans, Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, and others added to the mix. Islam also came early to Cape Town with the influx of Muslim political exiles as well as South Asian slaves and alter-indentured servants. Today, Muslim migrants from North Africa have diversified local practices. Figure 1 shows a mosque in a township outside Cape Town.

Figure 1 A Mosque in Cape Town

Source: Photograph by Jerome Krase (2000).

A small number of Jews have lived in Cape Town for centuries, but a significant Jewish community only developed toward the end of the 19th century as they fled pogroms in Eastern Europe. One of the most visually interesting areas of Cape Town is Bo-Kap. It sits on the slopes of Signal Hill in the city center and serves as the center of Cape Malay culture.

Germany

Prosperity is a strong magnet for migrants of all sorts, so it is to be expected that contemporary western and northern European cities increasingly reflect global diversity. Significant proportions of the populations of German cities such as Berlin and Frankfurt am Main today trace their origins to foreign lands, and as a result, the sights and scenes of religious diversity have become commonplace. Muslims, especially from Turkey, and Catholics from Poland and southern Europe add the most to this mix. As elsewhere, religious difference can produce negative reactions. For example, plans for building a large mosque in Cologne announced in 2007 resulted in loud protests, and the opposition continued even as the cornerstone was laid in 2009. Similar opposition to what are essentially visual aspects of Islam, such as the veil for women, has become a common feature in European politics, as the size of the Muslim population has grown.

Göteborg

Sweden's second largest city has a large immigrant population, about 25%. Iranian, Iraqi, Somali, and other Muslim immigrants are concentrated in Angered Centrum and other suburbs, while Christian immigrants from Scandinavia and southern and eastern Europe are far less segregated and as a consequence are also less noticed. In contrast to the more industrial Swedish city of Malmö, Göteborg has few identifiably "immigrant" neighborhoods or markets, but shops that cater to their needs such as halal meat markets add color to suburban shopping malls.

Lisbon

Portugal is a predominantly Catholic nation, but there are ample signs of the presence of evangelical Protestant worship in Lisbon. Among the many car dealerships and upscale hotels in the Saldanha neighborhood, one can find several storefront churches, such as the Igreja Evangélica Baptista and Igreja de Christo on Rua Filipe Folque. Most of the immigrants in Lisbon are from former Portuguese colonies, and the signage of these Protestant churches is exclusively Portuguese.

Manchester

Britain has not escaped the anti-Muslim sentiment that has been growing in Europe in the past decade. The northwest of England is a stronghold for the British National Party, which has lately pushed an antimosque platform. But political contests do not tell the full story. In the urban neighborhoods of Manchester, for example, the most visible manifestation of "Muslim culture" might be the ubiquitous "Asian food" shops of the Northern Quarter.

Very often, "what Islam looks like" is at odds with commonplace expectations of "what looks like Islam." Figure 2 shows a warm July afternoon in which hundreds of people gathered in Manchester's Piccadilly Gardens. Members of the local Iranian community took advantage of the crowd-drawing power of the park (and the nearby shopping mall) to stage a prodemocracy protest. The contested election in Iran may have made their connection to the homeland more salient; the protesters had, no doubt, many motives for their participation in the event, but their collective action also functioned as an expressive sign of their ethnic identity that both the English locals and tourists could not help but notice.

New York

The controversy about the building of a Muslim community center two blocks from the site of the World Trade Center (WTC) attack reveals much about the dynamic of intergroup conflict when religious communities are involved. Because the Park51 community center includes a prayer space, and because of its proximity to the WTC site, the controversy has been widely reported as about the "Ground Zero Mosque." In this conflict over public space—though the center is to be built on privately owned, formerly commercial space on Park

Place in lower Manhattan, the debate is about the extent to which the area around the WTC is more than just ordinary urban territory—the visibility of Muslims in the United States is thoroughly politicized. Though many of the participants in the public discussion of the plan to build the community center affirm religious tolerance as an American value, some of the opponents of the center have suggested that Islam is incompatible with American culture. The controversy prompted Time magazine to ask on its August 30, 2010, cover, "Is America Islamophobic?"

Paris

Along with ethnicity and class, religion is one of the principal dimensions of collective identity in contemporary Paris. Because of France's colonial history, North African immigration to France has always been a component of French multiculturalism. The earliest wave of migration was by the Jews, and the most common location in Paris for these Tunisian and Algerian Jews was Belleville in the 20th arrondissement. Later came a wave of Maghreb Muslims. But they, too, likely ended up in Belleville.

Figure 2 "Democracy in Iran" Rally in Piccadilly Gardens, Manchester

Source: Photograph by Timothy Shortell (2009).

Figure 3 Jewish Butcher Shop in Belleville, Paris

Source: Photograph by Timothy Shortell (2007).

There are many ways in which individuals and groups demonstrate to observers who pass by to whom a particular piece of territory, at least symbolically, belongs. Prior to World War II, European cities of any consequence contained a Jewish neighborhood. In many of those places today, visual testaments of symbolic Jewish ownership (expressive signs) are likely to be displayed in plaques or other historical sign markers such as the one seen in Figure 3. This is one of the few remaining Jewish businesses along Rue de Belleville. Around the corner on Rue Ramponeau, a bookstore and restaurant are further reminders of the neighborhood's past. Today, these businesses serve the local Muslim residents as well as the Tunisian Jews who live in the neighborhood or return to it to shop.

Although Muslims are generally more visible in the immigrant districts of Paris, one can still observe Orthodox Jews going about their day-to-day lives, walking home from the temple on the Sabbath along Place de la République, for example. In the decades before World War I, more than 20,000 European Jews fleeing persecution came to Paris, settling in the Marais, in what became known as "Pletzl." Today, the Guimard Synagogue on Rue Pavée is a popular public space of the neighborhood.

Rio de Janeiro

"Rio" is a global city whose image is dominated by its Afro-Christian hybrid religious celebration of the "Carnival" and the huge Christ the Redeemer statue overlooking the city. Rio de Janeiro is the center for major petroleum, media, and communications companies in Latin America. More than 11 million people live there, and almost half are Black or multiracial. The Black community is mostly made up of descendants of African slaves and Whites from Portugal, but due to late-19th-century and early-20th-century immigration, one can find communities of Jews, Arabs, Italians, Spaniards, and Germans, as well as indigenous people. Even though most of them are Catholic and the city is noted for Candomblé and Umbanda worshippers, rapid globalization is diversifying the religious tableau, and a significant portion of the population are Protestants, Jehovah's Witnesses, Jews, and Muslims, to name a few.

Rome

Rome is well known as the seat of the Roman Catholic Church. As to religious diversity, Rome's Jewish Ghetto is one of the world's oldest, and the city, as the nation's capital, is also host to non-Christian residents representing foreign governments, who can be seen in traditional dress in the city's busy center. In recent decades, however, the "Eternal City" has also become home to numerous non-Roman Catholic and non-Christian immigrants. Municipal policies make it difficult for immigrants to establish concentrated areas of settlement, so the most visibly ethnic areas have been near the central station, which offer a "Little Africa," a growing "Chinatown," and a flourishing South Asian and Middle Eastern jewelry trade. Local stores also display culturally appropriate services, provisions, and clothing, but places of worship for Muslims, Buddhists, and Hindus, for example, are not easy to find on the streets. In contrast, Polish, Philippine, Russian, South Asian, and other Christians can be clearly seen frequenting different churches where services are offered in their own languages.

Sarajevo

The history of religious diversity in Sarajevo is both long and troubled. Once it was a model of religious tolerance and coexistence between Jews, Muslims, Roman Catholics, and Eastern Orthodox Catholic residents, which reflected its history as a Balkan crossroads of empires. Sadly, as a result of the Bosnian War (1992–1995) after the breakup of Yugoslavia, the city lost much of its non-Bosniak (Muslim) population, even though many bullet- and bomb-damaged buildings remain, as shown in Figure 4.

Singapore

The Republic of Singapore is an island country at the southern tip of Malaysia and is one of the world's most globalized places. Besides a powerful financial center and busy port, it has long been a country of immigrants. Almost half of its 5 million residents are from China, Malaysia, Philippines, North America, the Middle East, Europe, Australia, and India. This results in a very diverse religious population, including Buddhist (42.5%), Muslim (14.9%), Christian (14.6%), Daoist (8.5%), and Hindu (4%).

Conclusion

The spatial semiotics of vernacular spaces in neighborhoods of global cities reveals some of the ways in which religion shapes urban life and culture. Much of the appearance of vernacular urban landscapes is determined by signs of collective identity. In global cities around the world, members of different faith communities (who often differ also by race/ethnicity and language) share all kinds of social space in urban public places, such as streets, commercial shops, parks, plazas, and public transportation. The presence of this diversity fundamentally changes the nature of urban living; urban spaces and practices become a hybrid of local and global meanings.

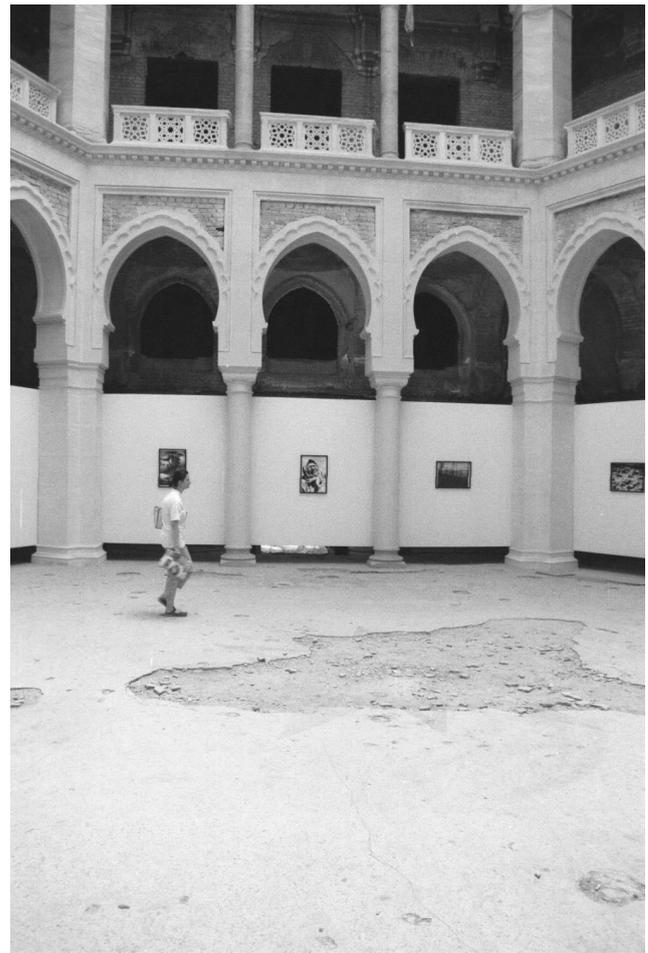

Figure 4 War-Torn Building in Sarajevo

Source: Photograph by Jerome Krase (2005).

Global cities are often the site of religious intergroup conflict, but though such episodes are regarded as more newsworthy than everyday urban life, sociological examination reveals the many ordinary ways in which members of different faith communities get along to get by. Even in a time of rising nativism, the neighborhoods of global cities remain multicultural and multireligious, and this diversity has become part of the taken-for-grantedness in contemporary cities that Georg Simmel observed in early-20th-century urban places.

Timothy Shortell and Jerome Krase

See also Africa; Europe; France; Globalization; New York City; Religious Nationalism; Singapore; United States of America

Further Readings

- Jacobson, R. (1960). Closing statement: Linguistics and poetics. In T. A. Sebeok (Ed.), Style in language (pp. 350–377). Cambridge: MIT Press.
- Krase, J. (2002). Navigating ethnic vernacular landscapes then and now. Journal of Architecture and Planning Research, 19(4), 274–281.
- Krase, J., & Hum, T. (2007). Ethnic crossroads: Toward a theory of immigrant global neighborhoods. In R. Hutchinson & J. Krase (Eds.), Ethnic landscapes in an urban world (pp. 97–119). Amsterdam: Elsevier/JAI Press.
- Osterhammel, J., & Petersson, N. P. (2005). Globalization: A short history. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Sassen, S. (2001). The global city: New York, London, Tokyo. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Simmel, G. (1950). The metropolis and mental life. In The sociology of Georg Simmel (K. Wolff, Trans.). Glencoe, IL: Free Press.
- VOAnews.com. (2004). Board “The Magic Bus” for tour of Coney Island: A multicultural, multiethnic community. Retrieved May 20, 2009, from <http://www.voanews.com/english/news/a-13-2004-11-23-voa38.html>

GLOBAL MIGRATION

The present era is not the first to see great trans-regional migrations; the Roman, Muslim, and Mongol empires all saw large-scale movements of people, as did the 19th and early 20th centuries. In the past 40 years, however, migration has gone global. Large numbers of people now move in all directions, temporarily and permanently, with sometimes startling religious consequences.

Sociologists have typically understood religion’s role in transnational migration by using the “Ellis Island model”—named after the U.S. immigration station in New York harbor (1892–1954). European immigrants to the United States, the story goes, used religion as a way to adjust to their new surroundings. Swedish and Danish Lutherans, Dutch Calvinists, Scottish Presbyterians, and the like founded ethnic churches in the United States, which gave them a bit of the “old country” in the new. They kept their language and customs while getting used to their new country’s ways. American Catholics similarly formed Irish, Italian, Croatian, Polish, and other national parishes, which offered services and support in their native tongues.

America’s recent wave of immigrants may follow the same path, but with variations. Carolyn Chen, for example, showed how Taiwanese immigrants have become more religious in the United States than they were in their homeland. Various studies of new immigrant groups—among them Kerala Hindus, Mayan and Haitian Catholics, Korean Presbyterians, and Vietnamese Buddhists—show how people “become American” by reshaping their religious heritage to fit America’s congregational norm. Religion aids assimilation but changes as it does so.

Ellis Island is not the only story, however. In an age of swift, cheap travel and instant telecommunications, migrants no longer need to live simply in one place; they can participate fully in religious life in two countries at once. Peggy Levitt’s “transnational villagers” do precisely that, taking part equally in their parishes in Boston and the Dominican Republic. African migrants in Europe and the United States similarly work transnationally, sending missions, resources, and financial support in both directions. In such cases, religions help people maintain a bilocal residence, allowing them to have two “homes” simultaneously.

Nor do today’s migrants always integrate to their new surroundings. They can use religion to isolate themselves from their host countries and from each other. Greg Smith’s studies of East London, for example, show a veritable cacophony of immigrant religious groups, few of which interact. Officially, multicultural Britain, it seems, does not require assimilation to any simple norm.

Still, all this speaks to a particular form of migration: from the developing world to the United States and Europe. Today's migration is more complex. For example, it is not unusual to find an Arab born in France of Egyptian refugee parents, educated in the United States, and now working in Malaysia after stints in Berlin, Dubai, and Hong Kong. Olivier Roy calls such migrants "deterritorialized elites" and argues that religion can become, for them, a primary identity. This is not, to him, the only source of radical Islam, but it is one such source. Transnational Pentecostalism can similarly become a stronger identity than national citizenship for some whose lives carry them, for example, from Nigeria to Brazil and then to Canada, South Africa, and Zaire. Here, religion does not just aid the transition between national identities, it becomes a postnational master identity in its own right.

New patterns of global migration thus have religious consequences, perhaps shifting the balance between religions and the state as sources of meaning and belonging. The process is still in flux; however, it is not yet clear exactly where it will lead.

James V. Spickard

See also Globalization; Immigration; Refugees; Translocalization; Transnational

Further Readings

- Adogame, A., & Spickard, J. (Eds.). (2011). Religion crossing boundaries. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Chen, C. (2008). Getting saved in America. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Corten, A., & Marshall-Fratani, R. (Eds.). (2001). Between Babel and Pentecost. London: Hurst.
- Ebaugh, H. R., & Chafetz, J. (Eds.). (2000). Religion and the new immigrants. Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira Press.
- Levitt, P. (2001). Transnational villagers. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Roy, O. (2004). Globalized Islam. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Smith, G. (2000). Global systems and religious diversity in the inner city. International Journal on Multicultural Studies, 2(1), 16–39.
- Warner, R. S., & Wittner, J. (Eds.). (1998). Gatherings in diaspora. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

GLOBAL RELIGION

Religious traditions and communities have always been global. From ancient times, religious beliefs and customs would travel wherever people migrated, from one region to another, settling in disparate locations around the globe. Religious ideas and practices would also travel on their own, passed on from place to place and transmitted far from their communities of origin. The great historian of religion, Wilfred Cantwell Smith, described one such global transmission, the common religious practice of using prayer beads, an idea that spread from meditating Brahmans to chanting Buddhist monks and then to pious Muslims and observant Catholics, who took those transient beads and made them into the rosary, its users unaware of its multireligious global heritage.

Virtually, no part of the world is unaffected by the ideas and cultures of other parts of the planet; and no region consists purely of this religious tradition or that one. The cultural maps with neatly demarcated religious regions are highly deceptive. For instance, though India is largely Hindu—its Indian name, "Hindustan" implies that it is the land of the Hindus—15% of the country is Muslim, and before the 1948 partition of the South Asian subcontinent into the nations of India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh, Muslims constituted 25% of the region. Large Muslim communities in supposedly Buddhist China and Orthodox Christian Russia make those two nations among the largest Muslim countries in the world. Even the world's largest Islamic country, Indonesia, is not exclusively Muslim; it houses a Hindu culture in Bali, Christian communities in Malacca and Timor, and an ancient Buddhist temple at Borobudur. Muslim Egypt has an ancient and thriving community of Egyptian Coptic Christians. China's religious identities are so diverse that most scholars choose to describe the religion of China as "Chinese religion" rather than Buddhist, Daoist, or Confucian, even though most of its population simultaneously accept all of these strands of religiosity as part of one syncretic, Chinese mix. Then there are other faiths in China as well. In addition to the large Muslim communities in China, there are also Christian ones and a Chinese Jewish community that dates back to antiquity. The same situation exists in Korea and Japan, where traditional Korean and Japanese religious traditions are fused with Buddhism and ancient philosophical traditions, and communities of Christians, Muslims, and members of rapidly developing new religious movements exist as islands within these syncretic Korean and Japanese cultures. The religious beliefs in Haiti are both Christian and African; the same population that venerates the saints of Catholicism also sees in them the African gods as interpreted by the local form of Africanized spirituality, Vodou.

The old idea that you could have a map of the religions of the world has dissolved into an image of constant flows and interactions. This was probably always the case. Religious identity throughout history has been more fluid and interactive than static views of religious geography would imply. The case of Christianity is an example. The tradition spread from the Middle East to Europe during the first centuries of the Common Era and then to Asia, Africa, and Latin America during the colonial period, with these regions of the world having the largest percentages of Christians worldwide. And at the end of the Cold War in the last decade of the 20th century, there were missionary expansions of evangelical Protestant Christians into areas of the former Soviet Union. At the same time, religious traditions from around the world were making inroads into Christianity's cultural fortress of Europe and the Americas. The establishment of global communications makes it possible for Caucasian Americans in Los Angeles to adopt Buddhism, for instance, and for Episcopalians in Pennsylvania to practice Hindu yoga. Pacific Island cultures have turned toward the Mormon faith. In the 21st century, almost no region in the world consists solely of members of a single traditional religion.

Religion has always been global religion, in that religious communities and traditions have constantly shifted and interacted over and beyond political and cultural boundaries. Since religious ideas and customs are part of the cultural tradition of communities of people, these ideas and customs move, change, and interact with one another as these communities have migrated around the world. Though most people of faith like to think of their beliefs as anchored in enduring truths, the way those beliefs are expressed change over time, and they are affected by the other cultural traditions with which people come into contact.

In the remainder of this entry, these two forms of global religion—the spread of religious people and religious ideas—will be explored along with one other form of global religion, the new religions that are expressions of globalized, multicultural societies.

Religious Aspects of Migration

Some of the earliest forms of migrant religious communities were unintentional. The term commonly used for a cultural community in dispersion—diaspora, meaning to scatter—comes from the experience of ancient Israelites during the Babylonian conquest in the sixth century BCE. Later, the course of Jewish history was transformed with the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem in 70 CE and the subsequent diaspora of Judaism throughout the Mediterranean world and beyond.

The Babylonian captivity produced some of the most moving passages of the Hebrew Bible (the Christian Old Testament). The lamentations, condemnation, and visions of hope during this time enrich the biblical books of the prophets, including especially Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Hosea. The second scattering of the Israelite people occurred in 70 CE, after the fall of the temple in Jerusalem. This was a decisive moment in Jewish history, when the orientation of worship and community life shifted from the centrality of the temple and the priests to teachers (rabbis) and their teaching centers (synagogues), which were thereafter to be found wherever Jews lived. At first, the Jewish people were scattered around the perimeter of the Mediterranean Sea; later, they were relocated in central and northern Europe, Russia, and around the world.

Increasingly, every religion is a religion in diaspora, and virtually no religious tradition is exclusively the province of a single locale. The Sikh community is an example. Though they have traditionally lived almost exclusively in the Punjab region of India, by the end of the 20th century, about half of their total number, around 12 million, lived abroad—a number roughly equal to that of Jews who live outside Israel. During the period of British rule in India, Sikhs were sent on assignment as soldiers to Singapore and Canada. In the early 20th century, they came to California to become farmers. In the mid-20th century, Sikh professionals and urban workers migrated to the United Kingdom, North America, and destinations around the world. By the 21st century, Sikhs were debating whether it was necessary to keep Punjabi customs in clothing and eating habits in order to be good Sikhs. Indian Hindus have had to face some of the same questions as large Indian populations have settled abroad, constituting the majority of the populations of Mauritius and Fiji and about half of the population of Trinidad.

The Global Transmission of Religious Ideas

In other cases, it is not religious people who have travelled around the globe but their ideas and customs. Some religious traditions are what Max Weber called “religions of universal salvation,” and these adapt easily to every cultural context. Christianity and Buddhism are such religious traditions, and so is Islam, though it often brings its own cultural assumptions with it when its beliefs and practices spread around the world. Judaism is not a “religion of universal salvation,” though in the case of Judaism, it is not so much the ideas that have travelled around the world as the Jewish people themselves, establishing diaspora communities almost everywhere on the planet. Likewise, Hinduism has not been a “universal religion” until the 19th century, when Vedantic ideas spread from the subcontinent to Europe and the United States, and in the 20th century, when new religious movements led by gurus and other popular religious figures transmitted Hindu ideas around the world.

Yet Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam are the primary “religions of universal salvation.” These universal religious traditions, based on transnational teachings, are found everywhere, but they are also rooted in particular historical and geographical locations. For this reason, Buddhists have special regard for the Indian locations of Sārnāth, where the Buddha gave his first sermon, and Bodh Gaya, where he received enlightenment; and Buddhists around the world learn Sanskrit and Pali to master the early Buddhist texts. Muslims from Indonesia to Morocco have a special affinity to the Middle East and especially to the Arabian city of Mecca (Makkah), where the Prophet first received the revelations of the Qur’an, and Muslims around the world diligently study the Arabic language to understand the verses of that Qur’anic revelation. Christians revere Israel as the “Holy Land,” and Roman Catholic Christians regard the Vatican as their central spiritual location and in earlier times studied Latin to understand the texts, theology, and rituals of the tradition.

For this reason, one can claim that there is a cultural character to each of these universal religions—Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam. Yet despite their sense of homeland and their respect for the languages associated with their traditions, these traditions have a dazzling array of cultural diversity within them. Within Buddhism, for instance, one might say that the Japanese Zen tradition is as austere as the Tibetan Buddhist tradition is excessive, and each is emblematic of the geographic regions from which it emerged. Since the Middle Ages, Christianity has been associated with European culture, and yet since 1970, the majority of the world’s Christians are people who live in Asia, Africa, and South America. Apart from the United States, the largest number of Christians at the end of the 20th century were in Brazil and Mexico, with Russia and China close behind. Islam appears to have more of a unified tradition, yet local religious figures, customs, and saints characterize the great cultural difference between, say, Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, and Indonesia.

The Religious Expressions of Transnational Communities

Globalized societies have appeared throughout history, and one might argue that some of the most significant moments in the history of religions have been due to the influence of multicultural communities on the expression of religion. For instance, Christianity as a world religion developed when its teachings were taken out of the provincial context of Israeli Judaism and into the globalized world of the ancient Mediterranean empires, where Christianity’s universal ideas could spread in the fertile fields of a multicultural society. Other religious traditions also flourished in that arena. From Egypt came fertility cults, from Greece came gnosticism, and from Persia came Zoroastrian teachings and the fascinating religion of Mithraism. Probably, the most popular of the new religions of the ancient Mediterranean world, Mithraism’s emphasis on astrology and personal redemption was enormously appealing to an uprooted mobile society. It was more popular than Christianity at the time, and only the acceptance of Christianity as his own religion by the Emperor Constantine vaulted Christianity into a position of prominence in the Roman Empire. Nonetheless, it is fair to say that all of these religious movements in the ancient Mediterranean world were the new religions of globalization of their day. And the Christianity that emerged triumphant was able to assimilate many of these other cultural influences into its polyglot religious culture, adding to its Jewish heritage the Greek ideas of the separation of body and spirit and the gnostic ideas of powerful words and hidden knowledge. And from Zoroastrianism came concepts of heaven and hell, the sanctity of a sacred book, and the salvific power of a savior god. The eclectic ideas of Christianity appealed to a vast and multicultural constituency in the Mediterranean world and beyond. And it focused on religious practices that were extremely portable: The ritual was boiled down to the simple idea of prayer—a spiritual technology that is sublimely portable—and its priestly hierarchy could go anywhere. They were divorced from social and political locations. This was a powerful presentation for people who were also mobile, displaced from their traditional homelands and at sea from their particular cultural traditions.

In the 20th and 21st centuries, some of the most interesting religious expressions of transnational communities have been in the form of new religious movements. Some of these emerged from traditional cultures and spread around the world. From Japan, for instance, came a host of new religions; some have had a powerful international reach, including Soka Gakkai (known in the United States as Nichiren Shoshu of America). Others have come from elsewhere in Asia, including the Transcendental Meditation movement led by the Maharishi Mahesh Yogi during the last decades of the 20th century and the Unification Church led by Reverend Sun Myung Moon from Korea. Still others have no specific religious tradition as their forebear. The Church of Scientology, for instance, appeals to rootless urban people in part because it presents itself as a modern religious science with no strings tied to traditional religions.

The Study of Global Religion

Though the modern field of religious studies and comparative religion has developed only in the last half of the 20th century, it has had an earlier tradition in philosophical speculation about the universality of religious ideas. It also has roots in religious traditions themselves, as theological reflection within religious traditions tried to make sense of the diversity of religious beliefs and practices and the common stratum of spirituality that was experienced by all persons throughout the world.

Within religious traditions, many theological positions have attempted to locate the teachings of one faith within a family of faiths and to recognize the global location of the religious tradition's teachings. In Islam, for instance, from its very beginnings the Muslim tradition was aware of other religious teachings and held a special respect for those non-Muslims who followed the teachings of the book, the followers of Judaism and Christianity. Within the Qur'an itself, as in many Muslim writings, are references to the customs, teachings, and history of these "peoples of the book." The Muslim line of prophecy, for example, extends back from Prophet Muhammad to Jesus Christ and to most of the leading prophets and figures of the Hebrew Bible (the Old Testament). The prophetic lineage begins with the first human mentioned in the Bible, Adam. In Sikhism, reference in Sikh literature is also made to other religious traditions, and the sacred book of the Sikhs, the Guru Granth Sahib, the Adi Granth, is a composite of poetry by medieval poet-saints, most of whom are said to be Hindu and Muslim.

Judaism and Christianity have also interacted with and sometimes embraced elements from other traditions. In Christianity, not only were the early teachings influenced by the Greeks and Zoroastrians, but also many of the later practices were absorbed from pre-Christian European religious traditions, including the idea of holy men or saints and the festival days of Christmas and Easter (the latter taken from the name of a European fertility goddess).

Christian theology has similarly been aware of its location within the family of faiths, particularly after the European colonial expansion and the awareness of an interactive global economy and society in the 17th and 18th centuries. By the 19th century, the problem of a particular religion in a sea of universal religiosity was a major issue for theological reflection. In the early 19th century, for instance, Friedrich Schleiermacher startled the theological world by suggesting that an unseen, unnamed universal global religion was truer than the limitations of particular dogmatic confessional faith. About the same time, a Danish theologian, Søren Kierkegaard, presented the idea that a natural religion was part of a deep stratum of culture that was beneath the diversity that appeared among competing religious traditions. A century later, F. S. C. Northrup went further and imagined a “meeting of East and West.” A similar syncretism was foreseen by William Ernest Hocking, who thought that an evolved form of Christianity would interact with other faiths in a new kind of world civilization. Arend van Leeuwen thought that the global secularism of the 20th century was a manifestation of this new civilization and that it was the fulfillment of Christianity’s role in world history. Like Hocking, he expected that Christianity would shed its particularity and embrace a global unity of faiths. Paul Tillich, one of Protestantism’s best known theologians in the 20th century, did not go as far; but one of his last writings was about the encounter with other faiths and the effect that this had on Christianity as well as on global religiosity. The Roman Catholic theologian, Hans Kung, envisioned a global ethics based on the best moral teachings of the world’s religious traditions and thus creating a kind of moral, if not theological, global consensus.

Global aspects also became part of the study of religion in other disciplines. Though the field of theology had largely been relegated to seminaries that were located outside the secular academic institutions of the modern Western world, the study of religion thrived in the field of history and in the social sciences, where the pioneers of sociology—Max Weber, Émile Durkheim, and Karl Marx—all took the global study of religious phenomena seriously and regarded it as essential to understanding the nature of society itself. Marx regarded the criticism of religion to be the beginning of all other forms of social criticism. Many of the studies undertaken by Weber, Durkheim, and Marx were comparative, covering the major religious traditions of which they were aware; other aspects of their work treated the phenomenon of religion as a universal category that played a structurally similar role in all societies. In these two ways—the study of comparative world religion and of universal religiosity—these early social theorists pioneered the study of global religion.

In the latter half of the 20th century, a new field of religious studies brought the study of religion back into the academy. The methodology of religious studies was explicitly not theological, in that it attempted to be applicable to all religious traditions and to adopt an outsider’s objectivity. Though the objectivity of social studies would later be challenged by scholars who argued that all intellectual perspectives carry with them a distinctive cultural and historical baggage, the attempts of the new field of religious studies to be evenhanded in addressing the world’s religious traditions made it possible for the project of comparative religion to blossom in secular universities.

The approach of comparative religion—putting all religious traditions on an equal footing—became a central project of the field of religious studies. Courses on world religions became the basic introductory course for the field. In the last half of the 20th century, popular interest in world religions thrived. In 1958, a philosopher of religion, Huston Smith, wrote what became the largest selling textbook in the field, The World’s Religions. It examined the structural similarities among the traditions and proclaimed the unique features of each. Another popular approach at the time was the one associated with the University of Chicago historian of religion Mircea Eliade, who searched for what he believed to be the essential religion beneath all the religious diversity, an essential character that was revealed in religion’s mythology. Joseph Campbell, a psychologist of religion, saw in all religious mythology enduring archetypes of human identification.

These efforts at comparing religious traditions and searching for essential universal elements in all religious traditions may be regarded as precursors to the study of global religion, though many of their assumptions have been challenged by subsequent scholarship. At the end of the 20th century, the “world religions” approach to teaching religious studies became largely discredited by scholars who observed that the attempt to create a common template of religious experience through which all religions could be compared was a way of privileging some religions—such as Christianity—over others. The ideas that a religion had to have a founder, a sacred text, and an organization were elements distinctive to Christianity but not necessarily to, say, Hinduism or Confucianism. The approaches of Eliade and Campbell to universal religious themes were criticized as being covertly theological.

At the turn of the 21st century, the very concept of “religion” has been challenged. In an earlier work, Wilfred Cantwell Smith had questioned the utility of the term religion, seeing it as a modern invention. Then, scholars such as Talal Asad and Charles Taylor went further in reflecting about the concept and traced the origins of the idea to a pattern of Western thought that was part of an Enlightenment view of public life, one dominated by secular thought devoid of the superstition and intolerance of religion. In this view, the very terms religion and secular constituted an invented dichotomy in which to understand the ideological perspectives through which one saw the world, leading to a whole pattern of public institutions, ideas, and worldviews that Taylor called “the secular age.”

In what may be described as the postsecular age of the 21st century, the major assumptions of “the secular age” are under assault. On the one hand is the postmodern critique of master historical narratives that privilege the concepts of European and American political and intellectual elites, including the ideas of secularism and religion. On the other hand are the religious political movements of the late 20th and early 21st centuries that frame their opposition to Western secular political institutions in religious terms. In a curious way, however, one could accuse these religious activists of accepting the religion/secular distinction but reversing the order, placing religion as primary in public life rather than privileging secular ways of thinking. A true “postsecular” attitude is one that rejects the dichotomy. It regards all public life to be at least potentially infused with a moral and spiritual sensibility that is characteristic of what has been described as “religion” and regards religion as a stratum of morality and spirituality that is endemic to all forms of personal and public life.

The study of global religion, therefore, is one that attempts to understand not only the diversity of religious traditions over time and space but also the shifting meaning of the idea of religion itself.

The task of understanding global religion in its fluid shape is one that requires a leap of intellectual imagination and an ability to see the world from diverse and changing perspectives. Ultimately, then, the study of global religion requires an intellectual stance that is itself global in its outlook and multicultural in its diversity of worldviews.

Mark Juergensmeyer

See also Africa; Chinese Popular Religion; Christianity; Diaspora; Globalization; Hinduism; Islam; Jainism; Judaism; Mahayana Buddhism; Secularism; Sikhism; Theravada Buddhism; Vajrayana, Tibetan; World Religions; Zoroastrianism (and Parsis)

Further Readings

- Asad, T. (2003). Formations of the secular: Christianity, Islam, modernity. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Beyer, P. (1994). Globalization and religion. London: Sage.
- Calhoun, C., Juergensmeyer, M., & VanAntwerpen, J. (Eds.). (2011). Rethinking secularism. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Casanova, J. (1994). Public religions in the modern world. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Falk, R. (2003). Religion and humane global governance. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Huntington, S., & Berger, P. (Eds.). (2002). Many globalizations: Cultural diversity in the contemporary world. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Jenkins, P. (2002). The next Christendom: The coming of global Christianity. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Juergensmeyer, M. (Ed.). (2005). Religion in global civil society. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Juergensmeyer, M. (Ed.). (2006). The Oxford handbook of global religions. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Kung, H. (1998). A global ethics and global responsibilities. London: SCM Press.
- Masuzawa, T. (2005). The invention of world religions: Or, how European universalism was preserved in the language of pluralism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Rudolph, S., & Piscatori, J. (Eds.). (1996). Transnational religion and fading states. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Smith, W. C. (1991). The meaning and end of religion. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press. (Original work published 1962)
- Toft, M. D., Philpott, D., & Shah, T. S. (2011). God's century: Resurgent religion and global politics. New York: W. W. Norton.

GLOBAL SECULARIZATION PARADIGM

The concept of secularization is controversial. Though ideas of secularization dominated sociological studies of religion through the 1960s and 1970s, the meaning of the term broadened to the point where its utility in describing the relationship between religion and society had been compromised and scholars began to criticize it. Criticisms tend to converge on the observable fact that religion has not disappeared; it remains a force in the lives of people and proves its power politically and culturally through revolutions both peaceful and violent.

In 1993, R. Stephen Warner encapsulated these criticisms and described a developing paradigm in the sociological study of religion in the United States. The new approach shifts attention from declining religion to how the supply of and demand for religion vary according to whether and how much governments regulate the religious market and shift attention away from the European experience toward the U.S. experience of religion and society.

In response to this declaration of a new paradigm in the sociology of religion, other scholars pointed to several still fruitful strands of secularization. One of these paths, secularization as differentiation at the institutional level, has mounted the most promising defense of the old paradigm. These scholars point out that the new paradigm à la Warner does little to challenge the classical insight that religion as an institution in society is now one institution among others and that the relative strength of religion as an authoritative institution has declined over time.

Peter Beyer is one of the chief proponents of this approach to secularization, and his work documents how this manifests at a global level as a dilemma for religion. Religion is the only institution whose function is to speak about the whole of reality, while at the same time the language and logic of religion work best within the functional sphere of religion. Thus, the Islamic Revolution in Iran was successful in instituting a religious state structure more aligned with religious principles, but these very principles conflict with a global political institutional system that is highly secular and frowns on sectarian guided government.

Frank Lechner draws on David Martin's general model of secularization to sketch a larger point about globalization. Martin's general theory of secularization posits that the frame through which a society or nation enters the institutional differentiating process has lasting effects for how a society relates to religion. For Lechner, Martin's approach provides a distinctive frame for thinking about globalization: The notion that states enter the modern era with respect to religion and state also has consequences for how a state enters the global era.

Little empirical research has been conducted with respect to these two insights, but together they represent a potential research program for students of religion and globalization. Examining the relationship of religion and society at the global level explodes the focus on either European or North American exceptionalism and expands the classical secularization paradigm into a global era.

David V. Brewington

See also Desecularization; Globalization; Modernization; Secularization

Further Readings

- Berger, P. (1967). The sacred canopy. Garden City, NJ: Doubleday.
- Beyer, P. (1994). Religion and globalization. London: Sage.
- Chaves, M. (1991). Secularization as declining religious authority. Social Forces, 72, 749–774.
- Lechner, F. (1991). The case against secularization: A rebuttal. Social Forces, 69, 1103–1119.
- Martin, D. (1978). A general theory of secularization. New York: Harper & Row.
- Robertson, R. (1992). Globalization: Social theory and global culture. London: Sage.
- Warner, R. S. (1993). Work in progress toward a new paradigm for the sociological study of religion in the U.S. American Journal of Sociology, 98, 1044–1093.
- Yamane, D. (1997). Secularization on trial: In defense of a neosecularization paradigm. Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion, 36, 109–122.

GLOBALIZATION

Globalization is a process whereby the institutions of our daily lives, including religion, are greatly affected. The term is commonly used to describe the current era. While the term globalization is notoriously difficult to define, it can be understood as the confluence of several factors, including communication connections, world economy, and migration. Technological advancements have permitted communication connections that are worldwide, allowing every corner of the globe to interact with one another instantaneously. The world economy, dominated by transnational corporations, has grown and become interconnected, leading to the erosion of national borders and the formation of worldwide markets. Opportunities and demands of the global marketplace have instigated voluntary and involuntary movements of people across borders. While reflecting on these factors, their religious dimensions and the consequences of globalization on religion must also be considered. Indeed, religion and the religious have an integral role in globalization. Religion and globalization can be characterized as having a cause-and-effect relationship. Missionary movements and religious territorial expansions have functioned to instigate globalization. Religions in all forms have become globalized, with technology, communication links, and migration playing a significant role in carrying religion across national borders. Globalization has accelerated both the spread of religion as well as the creation of the religious. While globalization has allowed religions to grow and achieve global status, it has also served as a corrosive agent, causing religions to break down from their traditional forms and localize to the areas in which they exist.

Religion as a Carrier of Globalizing Tendencies

Global religious revival and activism movements have in part heralded globalization, acting as a carrier of globalizing tendencies within the world. Religious missionary movements as well as territorial expansions cultivated the initial modes of globalization. There has been a long historical process, including the history of European and Western propelling of its power around the world, leading to the contemporary age of globalization, and the geographical expansion of Christianity was a crucial part of that historical process. The Christian tradition has become the world's largest religion, expanding globally to all six continents. Its early historical efforts to create a global network of adherents as well as its missionary outreach have acted as transmitters of globalizing tendencies.

The movements and expansions of other religions have functioned in a similar way. Islam is the second largest and the fastest growing religion as a result of da'wah (meaning "invite") efforts, which began with Muhammad. Asian religious leaders have brought the message of their traditions to the West through missionary movements. Along with other factors, this outreach has resulted in Los Angeles now having the largest Buddhist population in the world. Aspects of this historical pattern within religions are widespread. The universal aspirations of religious traditions have resulted in missionaries making significant contributions over time to international, cultural, and commercial exchange.

Globalization of Religion

While religion has partially functioned to promote globalization, globalization has allowed religions to achieve global status. Technological advancements, communication, and migration have triggered the globalization of religion. All religions, including small and new religious movements, are now able to attain expansion beyond national borders and engage in overseas proselytizing activities while fostering new religious developments, including cyber religions, interreligious dialogue, and global peace and social justice movements.

Advanced technology, communication links, and social media have allowed and promoted the free flow of information, permitting religions to achieve global status. Cyber religion has become popular and offers new modes of religious engagement online. For many religions, the use of blogs, Facebook, podcasts, and other cyber pursuits is widespread, and these have become common tools for communication. Thus, on account of technology, religions have reached mass populations who may not have otherwise been accessible.

Globalization has also brought about a strong awareness of religious pluralism, resulting in interreligious dialogue and a collaboration of religions in an effort to work toward social justice. Through interreligious dialogue, traditions have come together to work toward peace, compare beliefs and spiritual practices, as well as resolve doctrinal debate and conflict. In addition, globalization has enabled the collaboration of religions with the purpose of addressing global social injustice, a task that is argued to need assistance from the resources of all traditions. Because religious social justice and action groups work toward global sociopolitical change, they are a global phenomenon.

Both voluntary and involuntary migration has resulted in the globalizing of religion. Along with populations, their religious systems and spiritual beliefs are crossing national borders. As migrants practice their beliefs in cultural, social, political, and economic transnational arenas, the cultural characteristics of one region are established in another region. Consequently, this process results in practitioners of a particular religion in different geographical locations sharing very similar religious beliefs. Cultural and religious practices are extended across transnational boundaries, and transnational interactions are established and maintained.

Globalization has led to the creation of the metaphorical religious marketplace. Thus, individuals and groups within the global religious community have the option to choose their religious orientation rather than have a specific tradition transmitted to them via family and culture. Within the religious marketplace, religious traditions compete for adherents, and religious practitioners shop for a religion that best fits their needs and beliefs.

While globalization offers positive elements for religion, it also acts as a corrosive agent. Achieving transnational status results in religious traditions adapting to new social contexts and interacting with other cultures. Consequently, a transformation of the religions themselves as well as their cultural environments occurs.

It has been argued that globalization threatens the religious and cultural values of traditions and creates homogeneity. Fundamentalist and extremist social movements have responded with resistance for this reason and have sought to reclaim the authority over sacred tradition. These movements have rebelled against globalization in an effort to return religion to the center stage.

Gina Messina-Dysert

See also Global Capitalism and Religion; Global Cities; Global Migration; Global Religion; Globalization; Globalization

Further Readings

- Beyer, P. (1994). Religion and globalization. London: Sage.
- Beyer, P. (2006). Religions in global society. London: Routledge.
- Csordas, T. (Ed.). (2009). Transnational transcendence: Essays on religion and globalization. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hopkins, D. N., Lorentzen, L. A., Mendieta, E., & Batstone, D. (Eds.). (2001). Religions/globalization: Theories and cases. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Kurtz, L. (1995). Gods in the global village: The world's religions in sociological perspective. Thousand Oaks, CA: Pine Forge Press.
- Reid, J. I. M. (Ed.). (2004). Religion and global culture. New York: Lexington Books.

GLOBALIZATION AND CONVERSION

The defining characteristic of contemporary globalization is the accelerated circulation of people and ideas across the globe, aided by technology and typified by mass migration from the Southern to the Northern Hemisphere. There is no lack of literature on globalization and transnational religion. Robertson and Chirico's is the earliest theoretical analysis of the link between globalization and religion, in which they point to the increasing eruptions of religious and quasi-religious concerns and themes within societies worldwide. This entry identifies four main dimensions of the contemporary relationship between religion and globalization.

First, religions currently follow intercontinental immigration networks, making their presence and recruitment now truly global. This is an important factor in many contemporary religious conflict zones, especially where these conflicts are based on economic and political power imbalances.

Second, the construction of global religious networks and global religious identities is accelerated. This is connected to the first dimension, but it goes beyond that. The global spread of religions implies increased contact between religions and, where allowed by national states, increased interreligious competition for members. This often makes the dialogue between them more complicated.

Third, the increased use of mass media—especially television, the Internet, and e-mail—in both religious practice and religious recruitment is noteworthy. Again, this is connected to the first two factors, but it also has a dynamic of its own. Some religions, such as Pentecostalism, prefer to use certain mass media (radio and television), but there is almost always an influence following from this use on the religious organization itself. Its liturgical styles often change, the “health and way” gospel often becomes more important, and the religious organization continuously needs more funds to finance its mass media operations.

Fourth, political religion or religious fundamentalism was already on the rise in the 1970s, culminating in the guerrilla insurgency against the Russians in Afghanistan and the Islamic Revolution of Iran in 1979. Political religion was visible during the starting phase of all world religions, but the current pace of globalization has intensified global religious competition and hence global religious conflicts. In some areas, especially the Middle East and South Asia, this tendency has led to armed conflicts that are framed in religious terms.

Globalization and Conversion

Conversion, which is defined as a change in religious worldview and identity, seems to thrive particularly under the influence of the globalization process. The defining characteristic of contemporary globalization is its speed, aided by technology (mass media, computerization) and mass migration from the South to the North. Television and the Internet bring the reality of life in the North much more intensely into the homes of the poorer people in the South, providing an important impetus for migration—no matter how high the costs. This global context provides an excellent breeding ground for religious change. Migrants introduce their religions in other parts of the world. They either hold on to their home religions under new and uncertain circumstances or might be open to experimenting with other religions. Moreover, some religions, such as Pentecostalism, seem particularly made to travel.

The increase in the speed and efficiency of global communication also leads to an increase in conflict. Political, economic, ethnic, and religious struggles are intensified, and often even fueled, by modern mass media and the use of computer technology for purposes of mobilization. Religious competition is now more intense, because most religions nowadays have transnational networks and all use mass media to spread their message. Because the religious perspective is holistic, powerful, and empowering, its adherents are continuously tempted to use religion to solve the many problems they face in their daily lives: in their families, at work, at school, in the neighborhood, in their village or city, in politics, in the society as a whole, in their own religious local or national organization, and finally even in “the collectivity of fellow-believers.” Under certain circumstances, usually for concrete purposes, certain religious or political leaders may find a way to address all believers of the same ilk collectively. By doing this, they provide legitimatization for a worldview that distinguishes primarily between “us and them,” risking conflict on the outside by stimulating cohesion on the inside (Huntington, 1996).

Moreover, geopolitical conflicts that are framed in religious terms—such as President George W. Bush’s war against radical Islamist terrorists—tend to escalate when there are significant power imbalances, cultural differences, economic inequalities, and underlying secondary conflicts (e.g., Israel and the Middle East or U.S. support for corrupt Muslim rulers). What is in essence a political conflict now becomes a religious struggle, allowing President Bush some years ago to use the ill-considered term crusade and allowing Muslim terrorists to hijack Islam for their own purposes.

Because religion is such an efficient source for mobilization, it is easily mixed with politics and rarely free from state intervention. Missionaries are subjected to strict state control in most parts of the world. Nations that leave their citizens free to roam the Internet and watch religious programs on television run the risk that many of them will find a new religion that they like. Increased information often leads to increased curiosity. Curiosity, after all, provides an initial stimulus to seek out new alternatives that may lead to conversion. Hence, the contemporary globalization process also stimulates the forces that want to counteract its effects on national society by putting limits on religious freedom. It is exactly because of the intensifying globalization process that many nations want to curb or even prohibit the activities of (foreign) religious groups and missionaries. Most of the Muslim Middle East, Russia, India, and Indonesia can be mentioned in this respect.

Conclusion

Religious mobility is currently close to zero in the Middle East, low in western Europe and India, somewhat higher in eastern Europe, much higher in the United States, and probably highest in most Latin American countries (especially Brazil and Central America). But what does a high religious turnover mean for the host society?

In cultural anthropology and mission studies typical of the 1950s, conversion was considered an element of cultural change. The supposed transition to modernity in non-Western countries was thought to lead to anomie, instability, and a general feeling of crisis in those cultures. Conversion to a (Western) global religion was seen as a response to that crisis—a solution that was at the same time intellectual, psychological, sociological, cultural, and of course religious.

Culture change not only leads to a rise in conversions, but the process also works vice versa: An increase in conversions has the potential to change local culture. Although Rambo (1993) and Stark and Finke (2000) show that the majority of the target populations generally reject new religious options, many societies and many nations fear religious change in general and conversion in particular. Their main aim is to protect their own long-established religious tradition(s), which are often interwoven with the nation-state. In many parts of the world, religion and culture are intimately connected. In Indonesia, only five religions are officially allowed. In India, Hindu nationalists claim that conversion to Islam or Christianity is equivalent to robbing the nation of its citizens. Similar accusations are directed against people wanting to convert from Orthodox Christianity to any other religion in Russia.

At least until the 1960s, it was also common to hear that to be a Mexican, Argentine, and so on was to be a Catholic—if only a nominal Catholic. This was increasingly challenged with the massive growth of Pentecostalism since that time. Clearly, under some circumstances, new religious options can gain a massive following. In countries with a strong Pentecostal presence (Central America, Brazil, and the Southern Cone), the concept of national identity is changing under the influence of religious change.

Henri Gooren

See also Conversion; Global Religion; Globalization; Hinduism; Internet; Islam; Pentecostal Movements; Television

Further Readings

- Beyer, P. (2006). Religions in global society. London: Routledge.
- Beyer, P., & Beaman, L. (Eds.). (2007). Religion, globalization, and culture. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Dempster, M. W., Klaus, B. D., & Petersen, D. (Eds.). (1999). The globalization of Pentecostalism: A religion made to travel. Oxford, UK: Regnum.
- Gooren, H. (2010). Religious conversion and disaffiliation: Tracing patterns of change in faith practices. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hoover, S. M., & Clark, L. S. (Eds.). (2002). Practicing religion in the age of the media: Explorations in media, religion and culture. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Huntington, S. P. (1996). The clash of civilizations and the remaking of world order. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Lehmann, D. (2002). Religion and globalisation. In L. Woodhead & P. Heelas (Eds.), Religions in the modern world (pp. 299–315). London: Routledge.
- Leonard, K. I., Stepick, A., Vásquez, M. A., & Holdaway, J. (Eds.). (2005). Immigrant faiths: Transforming religious life in America. Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira Press.
- Meyer, B., & Moors, A. (Eds.). (2006). Religion, media, and the public sphere. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Poewe, K. O. (Ed.). (1994). Charismatic Christianity as a global culture. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- Rambo, L. R. (1993). Understanding religious conversion. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Robertson, R., & Chirico, J. (1985). Humanity, globalization, and worldwide religious resurgence: A theoretical exploration. Sociological Analysis, 46(3), 219–242.

Stark, R., & Finke, R. (2000). Acts of faith: Explaining the human side of religion. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Warner, R. S., & Wittner, J. G. (Eds.). (1998). Gatherings in diaspora: Religious communities and the new immigration. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

GLOCALIZATION

Globalization theorists have coined the term glocalization to better understand how global economic and social forces affect individuals. This neologism, combining global and local, shifts the study of globalization to the periphery of transnational organizations. Whereas the idea of globalization connotes an overwhelming, unidirectional, and homogenizing force, in practice globalization rarely is experienced as a compulsion to eat the same foods, wear the same clothes, and sing the same songs. Instead, these theorists assert, one often sees a mélange of the global and the local in everyday life. By looking at the ways in which the global and the local interpenetrate, these theorists seek to establish the extent to which individuals have the ability to act when faced with the force of globalization.

The term was first popularized by Roland Robertson, who feels it is absurd to suggest that globalization originates from a particular country or a particular corporation. He obtained the idea of glocalization from the term dochakuka, which was popular in Japanese business circles in the 1980s. Dochakuka, derived from dochaku, or “living on one’s own land,” suggests that one must adapt the principles of farming to one’s immediate situation; among business leaders, this term came to describe the practice of creating products for specific markets. Robertson uses this concept of a global marketing strategy masking itself in local traits to point to an important difference between what is one’s home territory and the sense of the same that one receives in the shadow of the global. Even though one might think of the local as being opposed to the global, he asserts that this is a false dichotomy. A global mind-set creates a particular sense of the local; there is no need to describe certain traits as local if one does not have the sense of an encroaching globalization. He uses the term glocal to mark this local identity that only exists in conjunction with a global awareness.

In spite of this origin, glocalism is sometimes cast as a positive ethic. John Tomlinson, for instance, suggests that in a global society one needs to promote a sort of “ethical glocalism.” The appropriate stance for policy makers or citizens of the world is to understand how their local world is touching the outside world, avoiding ethnocentricity and paternalism, and cultivating the sense that there is no “other” in the world; “we” are all “us.” Others such as Richard Giulianotti and Roland Robertson point to the important process of identity formation as an individual negotiates local traditional and global culture, emphasizing individual agency. Some theorists go so far as to suggest that the “glocal” can be a site of resistance. Embracing the collaborative possibilities between local knowledge and global resources, these thinkers praise hybridity as an appropriate aesthetic for the 21st century.

The idea of glocalization is so ensconced in the transnational business community that it becomes difficult to recuperate it as an ethical position. Businesses have realized that baldly foreign products will not fare well in the markets they wish to exploit; this is readily seen in restaurant marketing, where standardized menus are customized to local dietary restrictions or tastes as an affected concession to customer needs. Television networks like MTV and CNN have epitomized this lesson. Glocalized marketing is recently seen in telecommunications, where it is difficult to identify the global corporation(s) behind companies because of branding and promotional material that seems to firmly root the companies in the country in which they operate. Glocalization is such an integral part of transnational businesses’ best practices that there are theorists who are uncomfortable with the positive spin that others attempt to apply to the term.

George Ritzer invents another term, grobalization, to address this tension. Combining growth and globalization, the grobal is the result of the imperialist imperative of organizations and corporations to expand their scope into new territories. He identifies the grobal as the malevolent force that needs to be resisted, thus admitting the possibility that the glocal can be a positive space for resistance. He posits that these two forces are in tension in contemporary societies and that one cannot be understood without the other.

There seem to be many examples of how globalization is best characterized by such interpenetration. For instance, one can see consumers responding to global products by customizing them: Global clothing retailers may make their presence felt by dispersing their brands in many markets, but an individual may adapt one of their products, such as denim pants, with embroidery and paint. Popular music is often cited as a force of globalization, but there is no simple domination from a centralized source. Consider rap music: From one perspective, it is a force that spreads the English language, American values, and ready-to-wear fashions around the globe, demolishing traditional values among youth. Yet the hip-hop ethics of sampling, garage production, and micro-marketing support the development of indigenous performers wherever rap music finds an audience.

Christopher Leslie

See also Global Religion; Globalization; Local Religion

Further Readings

- Giulianotti, R., & Robertson, R. (2006). Glocalization, globalization, and migration: The case of Scottish football supporters in North America. International Sociology, 21(2), 171–198.
- Ritzer, G. (2004). The globalization of nothing. Thousand Oaks, CA: Pine Forge Press.
- Ritzer, G. (2007). The globalization of nothing 2. Thousand Oaks, CA: Pine Forge Press.
- Robertson, R. (1994). Globalisation or glocalisation? Journal of International Communication, 1, 33–52.
- Robertson, R. (1995). Glocalization: Time-space and homogeneity-heterogeneity. In M. Featherstone, S. M. Lash, & R. Robertson (Eds.), Global modernities (pp. 25–44). London: Sage.
- Tomlinson, J. (1999). Globalization and culture. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

GOD

Exemplary instances of globalization can be captured through a variety of economic, political, social, and cultural currents. One cultural current in particular that has spanned the entirety of the globe is the notion of God. Perhaps no other figure of worship has reached so extensively into the past of ancient history and geographically throughout all reaches of the world than the idea of God itself. Although there are religions that focus directly on the worship, existence, guidance, or tyranny of God, no tradition could be said to lay exclusive claim to His or Her invention or creation. It is with this notion of theocratic plurality that any religious tradition may hold insight into the concept of God. This entry will discuss references to God, Goddess, gods and goddesses; qualitative and quantitative theistic categories; attributes of God; globalization of God; and concepts of God.

As contentious differences among religious practitioners and academic scholars have had considerable influence over the interpretation of God-figures, the principles of objectivity and cultural consciousness surrounding depictions of God have always had a lesser role. Terms denoting precivilized, premodern, or even non-Western concepts of God, such as “primitive,” “savage,” “tribal,” or “pagan,” have demonstrated this type of politicism involved in a contextualization of God. Given the potential subjectivity of these discourses, there is little consensus over the religious and/or cultural origins of the idea of God.

The plurality of ideas found within globalization fortifies at least an accepted sense of diversity with regard to these interpretations. However, the notion of syncretism among religious beliefs challenges the linear historical models that situate the intersection of ideas about God and globalization as a new and/or emerging phenomenon. In fact, the foundations on which many of the modern religious traditions were built have had a number of transgeographical/transcultural origins. The building of the Etruscan-Roman mythology borrowed from the Greeks; the influence of Zoroastrianism on the Abrahamic traditions; the sects, chasms, and denominationalism emerging from the Judeo-Christian traditions; and the emergence of eclectic new religious movements in the 20th and 21st centuries are all telling examples of the religious integration prior to modern globalization.

Although God may have always been an eclectically devised entity cast throughout a globally historical and perceptively multidimensional world, the Enlightenment provided a momentum that would establish a footing for burgeoning ideas such as the creation of the nation-state, technological advance, and reasoning that has driven a more intense form of globalization. In an instance of this type of movement, the very etymology of the word God and the variety of terms by which God is referred to demonstrate the diverse ways of conceptualizing a God-figure. Despite specific names given to the deities of particular institutions of worship throughout history, the actual term God derives from the Proto-Germanic word guthan, meaning “to invoke.” While some traditions described God through parables and metaphysical concepts, others transformed God into a carnal living being, even developing hagiographies that support the indoctrination of particular beliefs. Still others understood God as a manifestation of nature and followed God’s teachings to incur similar attributes within the harmony of life. Yet regardless of the ontological characteristics that distinguished these understandings of God, the geographical, social, and cultural conceptions that undergirded God’s existence were the impetus for major wars, stretches of peace, grounds for exploration and conquest, and the establishment of ancient moral codes and ethical strictures.

To view God today within the global community is to peer into the past and trace an amalgamation of historical religious traditions that have shared at least some homogeneous interpretations of God. However, as differences inevitably emerge, no single tradition holds dominion over the notion of God.

Referring to God, Goddess, Gods, and Goddesses

References to God, Goddess, gods, and goddesses are typically differentiated by classical conceptions based on historical developments of the God-figure itself. The referent “God” expressed with a capital “G” is used as a singular noun, a pronoun in place of a more particular reference to a deity, and at times a proper noun. Similarly, “Goddess” refers to the singular feminine noun, a pronoun in place of a more particular reference, and, less frequently, a proper noun or name of a deity. Within an impoverished lexicon, Goddess can also be substituted by the masculine or unisex pronoun God. The terms gods and goddesses expressed with a lowercase “g” are generally used as plural references to multiple gods, though they can also denote an intentionally ambiguous reference to the notion of God.

Qualitative and Quantitative Theistic Categories

Interpretations of God can be classified according to a variety of quantitative and qualitative categories. There are at least four primary categorical varieties pertaining to the beliefs in God or gods. Quantitative varieties include monotheism, or the belief in and/or worship of a single god, and polytheism, or the belief in and/or worship of several gods. Parallel categories of these quantitative varieties include henotheism, which is the belief in one god combined with the belief in the possibility of other existing gods, and monolatry, which denotes the worship of one god while recognizing the existence of other gods.

A telling example that demonstrates more than one of these quantitative varieties can be found in the early emergence of differing devotional affinities in ancient Israel during the sixth century BCE. The diversity of faiths during that period held a polytheistic scope pertaining to multiple deities. Although the early Israelites were considered monotheists as prescribed by Hebrew scriptures, the presence of polytheism has led some scholars to conclude that these Israelites may have operated under the principles of monolatry or even henotheism.

Among qualitative interpretations of God, there are pantheism and panentheism. Where the former refers to God’s existence as an equivalent entity to the universe itself, the latter refers to the notion of God as equivalent to the universe, yet adds that God is also greater than the universe with regard to time and space.

Animistic traditions of Japan have often been associated with pantheism. The animistic-based religion of Shintoism involves the polytheistic worship of spirits that take on tangible forms in nature, such as rocks and plants. Shintoism demonstrates a pantheistic feature through the worship of several deities as equivalent to a nature-based universe.

Panentheism may be found among many traditions of the Indian subcontinent. Religious doctrines undergirding the belief in God found within Sikhism—a monotheistic religion geographically surrounded by polytheistic traditions—incorporate an example of a panentheistic concept of God. The Sikh God-figure, Vahiguru, is considered to be larger than the universe itself and is thus of the panentheistic variety.

Attributes of God

Although there are several attributes associated with the conceptions of God, there are at least three that are commonly used across the majority of traditions: omnipresence, omnipotence, and omniscience. As each of these attributes includes the prefix omni—a derivative of the Latin term omnis, denoting “every”—these terms suggest an expression of an all-encompassing feature of the suffix that follows.

Omnipresence

Omnipresence, or the always present nature of God, may be viewed through several Christian traditions that have adopted the concept of the Trinity. In accordance with the Nicene Creed of the early fourth century, the Trinity expresses the existence of God as constituted through the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Although there may be other symbolic expressions of the omnipresence of God, the Trinity demonstrates how the presence of God is embodied separately and simultaneously among three vital figures that make up the foci of the Christian tradition.

Omnipotence

Omnipotence denotes an all-powerful attribute of God. The Jewish God of the Hebrew scriptures is viewed as an omnipotent figure. In the Book of Exodus, the prophet Moses leads the enslaved Israelites out of Egypt with the assistance of God. According to the text, God is said to have implemented deadly plagues in an attempt to coerce the Pharaoh and the Egyptians to release His people. This show of power over the destiny of man is an example of the omnipotence of God.

Omniscience

Omniscience denotes an all-knowing attribute. Among the 99 terms used for God in Islam, there are at least 11 names that suggest the omniscience of God, including Al-Hakam (“Adjudicator”), Al-Mujeeb (“Response Giver”), Al-Haseeb (“Thinker”), Al-Mu'min (“Affirmer of Truth”), Al-Bari' (“Corrector”), Al-Hakeem (“Wise”), Al-Khabeer (“All-Aware”), Al-Wajid (“Perceiver”), Al-Muqutadir (“Determiner”), Ar-Rashid (“Teacher”), and Al-Alim (“Omniscient”). Although the first 10 could be considered attributes of omniscience, the 11th, Al-Alim, in particular, is a direct indication of the omniscience of Islam’s God.

Globalization of God

The globalization of God can be most frequently found in the textual similarities between religious traditions and the adoption of religious doctrines by influential rulers. As no religion has grown as vast and large as Christianity, the concept of the Christian God is particularly telling. One reference to the globalization of the Christian God comes from the interpretation of presence and dominion. The biblical story of Jacob’s ladder found in the Book of Genesis tells the story of Jacob’s vision of a ladder to heaven. In the story, the Hebrew God speaks to Jacob and conveys a future inheritance to Jacob’s people, stating his dominion over territories beyond Jacob’s local area. In this way, textual references to God’s jurisdiction demonstrate the way in which a concept of God can expand over a vast portion of a variety of geographic locations.

The history of religious ideas has also shown an inseparable relationship between the talent of humankind in expressing their convictions and the vast migrations of people abroad. The missionary movements of the Christian saint Paul and the translation of the Vulgate by Saint Jerome illustrate the mobility of humankind’s influence over the concept of God. In addition, the early-third-century Roman emperor Constantine’s conversion has also had an enormous impact on the proliferation of a Christian God.

Concepts of God

The concept of God varies over time and space. Even traditions that are said to be associated with each other have held different interpretations of what the concept of God constitutes. Among the Abrahamic traditions, there are monotheistic interpretations of God where, in some instances, a mixture of human and mortal contributes to an image of the deity (i.e., Christianity). Within many of the Eastern and African traditions, polytheistic interpretations of God draw out several different components of a variety of gods that serve as vast representations of one single God or God-like entity. New religious movements have held eclectic interpretations of their gods, and in some instances, they have de-emphasized a standard model for conceptualizing God. Yet one certainty that is found among all these differing traditions is that each one has had to deal discursively with a concept of God.

Abrahamic Traditions

The concept of God among the Abrahamic traditions may have begun well before the time of Abraham through the creation myths of Sumerians. Though there are obvious distinctions between the pre-Abrahamic traditions and those of ancient Mesopotamia, the similarities between stories suggest a type of cultural and historical continuity that extends to the Abrahamic traditions of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam.

Within Judaism, Hebrew scriptures used the tetragrammaton of YHVH for the expression of God. Subsequently, English transliterations of YHVH have resulted in names such as “Yahveh,” “Yahweh,” and “Jahveh,” all of which have been used to describe God within Judeo-Christian religions. The God of Judaism is considered an eternal entity bearing no anthropomorphic attributes. For Judaism, God is said to have created the entirety of the earth.

The God of Christianity grows out of the Jewish tradition through a contiguous interpretation of Hebrew scripture connected to the life and death of Jesus of Nazareth. Christians believe in a Trinitarian concept of God whereby the three entities God the Father, Jesus the Son, and the Holy Spirit constitute an all-encompassing Godhead.

In Islam, the Muslim version of God is referred to in Arabic as Allah, though the term is also used among all Arabic-speaking members of faiths within the Abrahamic traditions as the name for God. According to Islam, the concept of God is strictly monotheistic and has the attributes of omnipresence, omniscience, and omnipotence over all things. Despite these all-encompassing attributes, the God of Islam cannot be realized as incarnate.

Traditions of the Americas

The pre-European traditions within what is now known as the Americas date back at least as far as the 12th century BCE. For roughly the next 2,700 years, several hundred cultural civilizations, including the Olmec, Chavin, Adena, Mogollon, Inuit, Maya, Inca, and Aztec, would worship thousands of gods through polytheism. A sample of these gods includes the fertility goddess of the Inuit, Akna; the Incan god of rain, Kon; the Aztec god of war, Huitzilopochtli; and the feathered serpent, Quetzalcoatl, found across a variety of Mesoamerican traditions.

After the conquest of the Americas by Europeans, formally beginning in the mid-16th century, practitioners of Mesoamerican traditions assimilated to Christianity or practiced their religions in secret. However, in much more common practices—inclusive of a system of slavery that accompanied European migration—some Mesoamerican traditions underwent a synchronization of religious belief, practice, and conceptualization of the gods. As a result of this synchronization, many religions became infused with new notions of God that reflected myriad African, American, and European traditions. A sample of these new versions of God includes the Orixá manifestations of several new world religions; Nana Buruku of Vodou and Candomblé; Olodumare of Candomblé; and Jah or his Ethiopian incarnate, Emperor Haile Selassie I (1892–1975).

Eastern Religions

Within Hindu traditions, there are certainly beliefs about the existence of several different gods—denoting polytheism—yet that does not necessarily preclude the worship of only one god or all gods as an extension of a God. Furthermore, this polytheistic categorization is complicated by early-19th-century Orientalist interpretations of Hindu traditions as the unified religion of “Hinduism.” In contrast to such misleading assumptions, there are complex differences among Hindu gods that extend well beyond Western interpretations of quantitative or qualitative theistic categories. One misconception therein holds that Hindus worship

Vedic gods guided by the textual foundation of the Vedas themselves. However, scholars of Indology have pointed out that the Vedas are not as central to the Hindu system of beliefs as some might presume. Rather, Vedic gods and texts are influential though not central to Hindu beliefs.

For these Hindu traditions, the more commonly recognized interpretations of God would revolve around a three-faced expression of gods known as the Trimurti. This Trimurti consists of Brahma (the creator), Vishnu (the preserver), and Shiva (the destroyer). From these three expressions comes a variety of avatars and consorts that make up the Hindu pantheon of gods.

Out of these traditions of the Indian subcontinent, the teachings of the fourth-century BCE figure Siddhartha Gautama established the philosophical principles known as Buddhism. Although the general philosophy of Buddhism does not include a concept of God, some traditions have adopted the adoration and worship of the Buddha, and others who have achieved enlightenment, as God.

Within Sikhism, God is known as Vahiguru, or “wonderful master/teacher.” As strict monotheists—often a pronounced feature as a distinction from any form of Hinduism—Sikhs may realize the Vahiguru through discipline and practice of their faith, but they do not describe the Vahiguru in mortal terms.

Greco-Roman Traditions

The Greco-Roman traditions embody entire pantheons of gods from religious and mythological contexts. The close relations and adaptations of these figures across Greek and Roman history exponentially increase the number of their gods. In this way, the Greco-Roman traditions have been interpreted within the framework of polytheism. The major categorical pantheons include the primordial gods (Aether, Chaos, Chronos, Erebus, Eros, Gaia, Hemera, Nyx, Ophion, Tartarus, and Uranus); the Titans (Oceanus Tethys, Hyperion, Theia, Coeus, Pheobe, Mnemosyne, Themis, Chronus, and Rhea); and the Olympians (Aphrodite/Venus, Apollo, Ares/Mars, Athena/Minerva, Artemis/Diana, Demeter/Ceres, Hephaestus/Vulcan, Hermes/Mercury, Hestia/Vesta, Poseidon/Neptune, and Zeus/Jupiter).

New Religious Movements

One feature of new religious movements is their tendency to operate in an eclectic fashion that allows for a variety of differentiation with regard to their conceptions of God. Religions such as the International Raëlian Movement, the Unarius Academy of Science, and the Aetherius Society all share beliefs in an assortment of extraterrestrial gods and celestial prophets from a futuristic interpretation of the cosmos.

Christian-oriented new religious movements, including the Jehovah’s Witnesses and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, all share a belief in Jesus Christ as their Savior; however, they differ drastically from the traditional Trinitarian model as well as the hagiography used in support of Christ’s narrative found among mainstream Christian traditions. Members of the Jehovah’s Witnesses reject the Trinity doctrine of Christianity in favor of a more separated model of God, opting instead to believe in Jehovah as their God and Jesus Christ as God’s son. The Mormons also believe in the separation of God, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Ghost. In addition, the Mormon’s informal belief that God is married breaks considerably from much of Christ’s hagiography within Christianity.

Salvador Jiménez Murguía

See also Atheism; Axial Age; Global Religion; Globalization; Goddess; Myth; Polytheism; World Theology

Further Readings

- Armstrong, K. (1994). A history of god: The 4,000-year quest of Judaism, Christianity and Islam. New York: Ballantine Books.
- Eliade, M. (1978). A history of religious ideas: From the Stone Age to the Eleusinian mysteries. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Eliade, M. (1982). A history of religious ideas: From Guatama Buddha to the triumph of Christianity. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Kurtz, L. (1995). Gods in the global village: The world’s religions in sociological perspective. Thousand Oaks, CA: Pine Forge Press.
- Madan, T. N. (2003). Thinking globally about Hinduism. In M. Juergensmeyer (Ed.), Global religions: An introduction (pp. 52–62). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

Stark, R. (2007). Discovering God: The origins of the great religions and the evolution of belief. New York: HarperOne.

Weber, M. (1951). The religion of China. New York: Free Press.

GODDESS

The term goddess refers to a feminine deity, both as an abstract concept of the divine (analogous to god) and in reference to a particular deity. Goddesses were prominent in ancient religions in many parts of the world and have continued to play an important role in Asian religions, particularly Hinduism. The rise of universal monotheism, as articulated by Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, displaced the worship of goddesses in favor of masculine god images in much of Europe, Africa, and the Americas. However, the rise of feminism has led to a rebirth of goddess religion in the West as well. This entry discusses goddesses in ancient religions and in Asia, Europe, Africa, and the Americas.

Goddesses in Ancient Religions

There are numerous accounts of goddesses in the local religions of ancient cultures, such as the cult of Cybele in ancient Greece, Isis in Egypt, Asherah and Anat in Canaan, Kuan Yin in China, and Prajapati in India. What we know about these goddesses is based partly on literary evidence (e.g., the poems of Homer and Hesiod or inscriptions on Egyptian tombs) and partly on archeological findings (e.g., excavations of temples, pottery, or votive offerings). But the interpretation of this material is difficult, and scholars continue to debate both the meaning of goddesses and their implications for human gender roles.

The apparent prominence of goddesses in various ancient civilizations has led some scholars to propose the theory that the predominance of patriarchal religions was preceded by an earlier, matriarchal age in which goddess worship was universal. This theory has its roots in the 19th- and early-20th-century scholars of myth, who saw goddess worship as rooted in primitive cultures that perceived motherhood as magical. That argument was first articulated by Johann Jakob Bachofen, whose book Mutterrecht (Mother-Right) traced the idea of mythical female power to ancient fertility cults. The theory was further supported by James Frazer, who in The Golden Bough compiled mythical examples from various cultures of a goddess and her dying son/male consort. The notion that religion began with female, rather than male, divine imagery was later strengthened by psychologists such as Carl Jung, who wrote extensively about the Great Mother as an archetypal being. In the mid-20th century, these mythical accounts were supplemented by archaeological findings of female figurines in “Old Europe,” Greece, Malta, Egypt, India, and the Near East, which were interpreted by some archeologists as evidence of a universal goddess culture. Perhaps the best known and most controversial work was that of Mariya Gimbutas, whose The Gods and Goddesses of Ancient Europe caught the attention of feminist scholars seeking to recover lost or suppressed evidence of female divinity. Feminists postulated that human society began everywhere with goddess religion, whose priestesses fostered a peace-loving, egalitarian culture. That religion was violently suppressed some 4,000 years ago by the rise of warlike, nomadic tribes (the Aryan migration to India and the Israelites in the Near East), who imposed the patriarchal religions that are still with us today.

Other scholars reject this theory. They point out that in most cultures where goddesses were worshipped, they were part of a pantheon of various deities, both male and female, animal and spirit, which does not support the notion of one universal goddess as a kind of counterpoint to patriarchal monotheism. When we do have evidence for worship of a high goddess, it is still not clear what that meant for human women in that culture. For cultures where we have written documents, such as ancient India, Greece, or Rome, it appears that ancient goddesses were revered by both genders and that their cult was sometimes officiated by males and sometimes by females. Ordinary women in these societies, however, often had few rights and were treated as the property of men. In contrast, much of the evidence for a goddess-worshipping matriarchal society comes from preliterate cultures, the interpretation of which is impossible without conjecture. The determination of the meaning of a female stone figurine, for example, relies heavily on contextual factors, such as where it was found (e.g., in the ruins of a temple or by itself) and the other objects found with it (e.g., weapons or pottery), and these factors are subject to varying interpretations. Modern interpreters risk projecting contemporary readings onto ancient cultures. They assume, for example, that a figure with large breasts must be a mother goddess. But many ancient cultures symbolized the divine in animal form; thus, a stone figure of a human female could refer to a human woman rather than a goddess. We also lack information about the structure of these societies; thus, visual images of female participation in a typically male activity—for example, hunting—does not tell us that women shared equally in power or authority. In short, critics assert that there is insufficient evidence to verify the existence of universal goddess worship or a causal relationship between goddess religion and gender roles.

The wide variety of goddesses may necessitate a diversity of interpretations. Female deities, like male ones, have many different associations, and while it is true that divine imagery is often modeled on human experience, it is not an exact correspondence. Thus, we find many examples of grain goddesses (e.g., Demeter in Greece, Ezina in the Near East) that may reflect a perceived correspondence between female and earth fertility. There are also several goddesses associated with writing and record keeping (e.g., Sarasvati in India, Nissaba in Sumeria) who may have originated in women's duties as managers of the household, which included the storage and administration of goods. But we also find male fertility gods (e.g., Shiva in India) and goddesses associated with warfare and battle (e.g., Ashtar in Accadia, Durga in India), even when textual evidence suggests that women were not involved in military activity.

Divine femininity could have diverse associations even within a single culture. In Mesopotamian religion of the third millennium BCE, for example, we find accounts of creation resulting from the interplay of male (heaven) and female (earth) divine elements and also accounts of one goddess, Nammu (the personification of water), as the progenitor of all subsequent deities. The meaning of a goddess may also change over time. The Sumerian goddess Inanna first appeared in the fourth millennium

BCE as the patron deity of a city; later, she is associated with the morning and evening star (the planet Venus). By the third millennium BCE, she has become the Lady of Heaven, who, unattached to any masculine deity, is depicted as virginal in some hymns, licentious in others. Retaining all of her seemingly contradictory attributes (the youthful goddess of love, the warlike protector of a people), her imagery eventually merges with that of her Semitic counterpart, Ishtar, to become a liminal deity of infinite variety, associated with life and death, love and war, both powerful and dangerous. Similar evolutionary processes in the meaning of goddesses have been documented in other cultures such as that of India.

Goddesses in Asia

Goddesses continue to be significant in various contemporary cultures, particularly in South and East Asia. The most prominent living goddess religion is found in Hindu India, where goddess worship is widespread among both men and women. In Hinduism, as in other polytheistic traditions, we find a multiplicity of goddesses who are revered alongside various gods, often for their association with a particular location (e.g., a village goddess) or realm of human life (e.g., Sarasvati, the goddess of learning and music, who is worshipped by schoolchildren every year). Yet millions of Hindus are devoted to one great goddess, Mahadevi, who can take many forms, perhaps most notably as Kali, the goddess who will destroy a corrupt world so that a new, perfect one can emerge.

The meaning and significance of Hindu goddesses has changed over time. Tracy Pintchman argues that, while references to female divinities can be found as early as the Vedas (texts dated as early as 1500 BCE), the process of elevating the feminine principle to supreme status took several centuries, and it is not until the Puranas (sixth century) that the idea of one supreme goddess is fully articulated. As such, the goddess is understood to be the energizing principle of the universe, Shakti, responsible for both originating and eventually destroying our world. The cult of Mahadevi, however, did not displace the worship of other deities, male or female, or overturn the patriarchal interpretation of religion that has been the norm in much of Brahmanical Hinduism.

In Hindu mythology, the most powerful aspects of god—creation, preservation, and destruction of the universe—are associated with a trinity of masculine gods: Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva, respectively. Goddesses are shown as the wives or consorts of these gods (e.g., Lakshmi, the goddess of wealth and royalty, is the wife of Vishnu; Parvati, a beautiful mother goddess, is the wife of Shiva). Classic philosophers understood Mahadevi as a complement to the functions of the masculine trinity. The divine is the union of opposites, which are symbolized as masculine and feminine. Female divine power, or Shakti, brings forth prakrti (the material world) and maya (temporary existence), while masculine divinity is associated with purusha (spirit) and Brahman (eternal divine consciousness). The feminine divinity is powerful and creative, but it is also dangerous, and unless properly channeled will cause destruction. This view is reflected in law books such as Manu, which assert the need to control women's power, especially their sexuality, and require that females always be subordinated to males. It is also seen in popular mythology, where married goddesses are generally depicted as benign, whereas independent female deities such as Kali are described as dangerous and frightening.

Historically, the worship of Hindu goddesses has generally not served to empower women. While India is a secular democracy that, at least on paper, grants women the same rights as men, females continue to struggle with gender discrimination (e.g., the higher rates of female infanticide, illiteracy, and unemployment), which is often legitimated by the patriarchal religion. Thus, some Indian feminists point out that it is hard to fight domestic abuse in a society where the most emulated goddess of the Hindu epics is Sita, the model of a chaste and submissive wife, who remains devoted to her husband no matter how poorly he treats her. There are alternative readings of Sita (as a model of moral fortitude) as well as other goddesses that might present a more modern role model to women. Examples are Draupadi (a goddess in the popular epic Mahabharata), whose marriage to the five Pandava brothers has been interpreted as affirming both her sexual and her intellectual needs, and Durga (a warrior goddess), whose image was used in campaign advertising for the late Indian prime minister, Indira Gandhi. And while much of Indian feminism has been secular, an emergent religious women's movement has led to new interpretations of the Hindu goddesses that can and do serve to empower women, both socially and economically.

Goddess in Europe, Africa, and the Americas

The worship of goddesses in Africa, Europe, and the Americas has been largely displaced by the great monotheistic religions, though it has persisted in popular and native traditions. The local religions of pre-Christian peoples were usually polytheistic and included female deities, and the process of converting them included both force and persuasion and was sometimes welcomed and often resisted. There is evidence that missionaries to European peasants were willing to co-opt some elements of goddess worship. The church tolerated or even encouraged the association of local goddess symbolism with the reverence for women saints (e.g., in Ireland, St. Brigid is venerated at the site of a Celtic goddess), and the cult of Mary has a significant place in the Catholic and Eastern traditions. But Christian leaders made clear that such women were human and thus distinct from god, and the worship of goddesses as such was persecuted as heresy, leading to the execution of hundreds of witches, most of whom were women. Goddesses also persisted in the Americas. Some Native Americans simply combined Christian worship with reverence for goddesses. Inez Talamantez, for example, writes about the Apache goddess Isanaklesh, who continues to play a central role in girls' puberty rites, even among Apache Christians. Other colonized cultures used Christian symbols to disguise their continued worship of ancient tribal goddesses. The religious practices of Haitian Vodou, for example, were created by African slaves who "hid" their deities behind the images of Catholic saints, such that Mary is conflated with a female water spirit of West Africa. Because the spread of Christianity and Islam was closely tied to military conquest and colonization, the revival or maintenance of native goddess traditions may be seen as a form of local empowerment. But as in the case of Hindu goddesses, this does not always serve to empower women. In West Africa, for example, images of the Great Mother were common in the Yoruba religion. Yet, as Mercy Oduyoye writes, the culture was deeply patriarchal even before the Christianization of Nigeria under British rule.

While goddess worship continues to be rejected by most Christian denominations, the rise of feminism, particularly in Europe and the United States, has led to an explosion of interest in articulating a concept of a feminine divine. Goddess, in the context of feminist theology, refers to a feminine symbol of god and the powers associated with the divine, such as wisdom and goodness. Feminist theologians have pointed out how an exclusively masculine symbolization of god legitimates patriarchal structures, which has harmful effects for both men and women. If god can only be addressed as father or son, for example, not mother or daughter, then god is essentially male. It follows that men are more godlike and thus wiser and morally superior to women. Such arguments—buttressed by scriptural interpretations that blame woman for the fall of mankind and dualistic philosophies that associate man with culture and woman with nature—can and have been used for many centuries to support male authority in the family and society and to deny basic human rights to females. Even when women are granted the same legal rights as men, patriarchal religion continues to restrict females both culturally and psychologically by shaping our very definitions of what it means to be a man or a woman. Thus, various Christian and Jewish theologians have attempted to articulate a concept of goddess analogous to god. Some have sought to ground this understanding in new readings of biblical texts (e.g., by identifying the goddess as divine wisdom); others have argued that even if there never was a goddess in the biblical tradition, we would, as Mary Daly put it, have to invent her. The use of goddess metaphor and language is thus a means to create gender balance and redeem biblical religion from the sins of sexism.

Other religious feminists rejected the biblical tradition in favor of an emergent goddess religion. This movement builds on academic theories of ancient goddess religion and the symbols and rituals of Neo-Paganism to restore an ancient religion that was woman centered, peaceful, and ecological. Goddess feminists appropriate female deities, often rather eclectically, from various religious traditions, asserting that names such as Isis, Astarte, and Diana are merely different labels for the same divine reality. This goddess is often symbolized in her three aspects of virgin, mother, and crone, which correspond to the seasons of a woman's life as well as those of nature. She is identified with the sanctity of the earth, sexuality, and the body (especially the female body), aspects of our existence that have been denigrated by patriarchal religion. Goddess feminists self-consciously reject the customs of biblical religion; they often eschew texts, rotate leadership, worship outdoors in a moonlit circle, and claim the right to both reconstitute ancient rites and create new rituals. Goddess symbolism has also influenced environmental spirituality (where reverence for the goddess means restoring the planet) as well as some schools of psychology (where goddess ritual and symbolism are a way to affirm the value of female identity and are used as a tool for healing and recovery).

Still other feminists have questioned whether the goddess symbol is necessary or sufficient to liberate and empower women and create a society that values both genders equally. They assert that the goddess movement's reverence for the Great Mother may unwittingly affirm sexism by maintaining gender stereotypes (e.g., by associating the goddess with motherhood and the earth, whereas masculine deities are identified with a much wider range of function, or by asserting that women are peaceful and nurturing while men are aggressive and warlike). They also point out that many goddesses are neither nurturing nor benign and that efforts toward gender equality have progressed far more in secular societies than they have in those that worship goddesses. While it is clear that goddesses have powerful symbolic meaning, the actual impact of that symbol depends on how it is used.

Christel Manning

See also Ancient Near Eastern Religions; Gender; Global Religion; God; Hinduism; Native North American Religion; Neo-Pagan Movement; New Religions in the United States; Vodou; Women's Roles

Further Readings

- Eller, C. (1993). Living in the lap of the goddess: The feminist spirituality movement in America. New York: Crossroad.
- Goodison, L., & Morris, C. (Eds.). (1998). Ancient goddesses: The myths and the evidence. London: British Museum Press.

- Grigg, R. (1995). When god becomes goddess: The transformation of American religion. New York: Continuum.
- Hawley, J., & Wulff, D. (1996). Devi: Goddesses of India. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hiltebeitel, A., & Erndl, K. M. (Eds.). (2000). Is the goddess a feminist? The politics of South Asian goddesses. New York: New York University Press.
- Kinsley, D. R. (1986). Hindu goddesses: Visions of the divine feminine in the Hindu religious tradition. Berkeley: University of California.
- Pantel, P. S. (1992). A history of women in the West: Vol. 1. From ancient goddesses to Christian saints. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

GOLDEN RULE

The most common statement of the Golden Rule is probably “Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.” This moral teaching appears twice in the New Testament. Matthew 7:12 in the New Revised Version of the Bible reads, “In everything do to others as you would have them do to you; for this is the law and the prophets.” The reference to “the law” is to the Torah, the first five books of the Jewish scriptures. Luke 6:31 in the New Revised Version reads, “Do to others as you would have them do to you.” Both Gospels attribute this teaching to Jesus.

The Golden Rule urges us to put ourselves in the place of others, to see the world through their eyes, to act on our empathy. It affirms our common humanity.

In this respect, it is not unique to Christian teaching, although other forms of the same moral rule are generally expressed as a prohibition. At the beginning of the first century, Hillel, a leading rabbi in Jerusalem, taught, “What is hateful to you, do not do to your fellow men. This is the entire law: all the rest is commentary” (Talmud, Shabbat 31a). Two centuries earlier, a Chinese compilation of teachings attributed to Confucius asserted, “Surely it is a maxim of loving kindness: Do not unto others that you would not have them do unto you” (Analects 15:23). Similarly, a collection of Buddhist teachings includes the statement, “Hurt not others in ways that you yourself would find hurtful” (Udana-Varga 5:18).

The Golden Rule should not be confused with consequential reasoning. It does not say, “To get others to treat you fairly, you should treat them fairly.” Confucian, Buddhist, Jewish, and Christian teachings affirm what is right and good, not what is expedient. The Golden Rule is not a calculation as to how we may achieve what we want but an affirmation of what we should do and the persons we should be.

The Gospel of Matthew explains that this commandment sums up God’s revelation through Moses and the prophets of ancient Israel. The Gospel of Luke introduces the Golden Rule with the well-known teachings attributed to Jesus: “Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you. . . . If anyone strikes you on the cheek, offer the other also” (6:27–29). In the Gospel of Matthew, the same teachings are presented earlier (5:38–40) in what is known as the Sermon on the Mount, which includes the Golden Rule in its conclusion.

Christian teaching not only reaffirms a traditional moral maxim but also transforms it. In the New Testament, the Golden Rule becomes the rule of love:

But love your enemies, do good, and lend, expecting nothing in return. Your reward will be great, and you will be children of the Most High; for he is kind to the ungrateful and the wicked. Be merciful, just as your Father is merciful. (Luke 7:35–36; see also Matthew 5:44–48)

Robert Traer

See also Bible; Christianity; Ethics

GOOGLE

Google is an Internet search company founded in 1998 by Sergey Brin and Larry Page, who met while they were graduate students in computer science at Stanford University. Headquartered in Mountain View, California, Google has become widely recognized as the world’s largest search engine. Operating in more than 150 countries and 100 languages, Google’s mission is to organize the world’s information and make it universally accessible and useful. Through its proprietary PageRank technology, which ranks webpages according to their relevance to any given search query, Google allows users to find information online at no charge. As the presence of online content related to religion has increased dramatically over the past decade, with millions of webpages devoted to religious content, Google enables users around the globe to find sites relevant to their queries.

Searching the Internet is Google's primary utility, but Google offers users free communication and publication services as well, such as Gmail (Google's e-mail service), Blogger (a weblog publishing tool), and Google Book Search (a project to provide access to digitized print material). Thus, Google assists in both the dissemination and collection of religious content online. The easy accessibility of information online can undermine the authority structures of religions, especially those of new religious movements, which lack the deeper plausibility structures of the more established religions. On the other hand, web publishing tools such as Google's Blogger can assist in the proliferation of religious messages and the construction of religious identities. The Internet's international reach also increases the visibility of religions across the globe and can help sustain transnational diaspora communities.

Google does not always play an assisting role in online communication. Because Google complies with the censorship policies of the countries in which it operates, it sometimes censors religious content. For example, the Chinese government censors content related to the Falun Gong spiritual movement, the Dalai Lama, and other sensitive topics. Google displays a notice to users when content has been filtered, but controversy continues over its role in censoring information. Google has also been the subject of criticism for its advertising policies and for displaying pornography in its search results, although it does provide a default "safe search" to block pornography. Google generates income by serving ads alongside search results, and its policies are regarded as idiosyncratic by some. For example, Google refused to host antiabortion ads from Christian advocacy groups until it faced court action and was forced to revise its position. In general, Google tries to abide by local laws and customs.

"Google" is a deliberate misspelling of googol, a term for the number starting with 1 and followed by 100 zeros.

A. R. Bjerke

See also Globalization; Internet; Modernization; Postmodernism

Further Readings

- Dawson, L., & Cowan, D. (2004). Religion online: Finding faith on the Internet. New York: Routledge.
- Højsgaard, M., & Warburg, M. (2005). Religion and cyberspace. New York: Routledge.
- Vise, D. A. (2005). The Google story. New York: Delacorte Press.

GOSPEL OF JUDAS

The Gospel of Judas is an early Christian text that was discovered in the late 20th century. Scholars were previously aware of an ancient Gospel of Judas, but no known copy had survived. In his book Against Heresies (ca. 180 CE), Bishop Irenaeus of Lyons mentioned a group of Christians who glorified Judas Iscariot, the man who betrayed Jesus to the authorities according to the New Testament. Irenaeus said that these Christians claimed that Judas was the only one who knew the truth of Jesus' message and that they wrote a text called the Gospel of Judas to back up their claims. The recovered Gospel of Judas is believed by many to be the same Gospel as the one mentioned by Irenaeus.

The Gospel of Judas came from the antiquities black market, so the details of its discovery are somewhat unclear. It was found in the 1970s in Middle Egypt near Al Minya, in a fourth-century CE papyrus book that contained three other Christian texts. The texts are described as Gnostic, and the Gospel of Judas is typically assigned to the Sethian school of Gnosticism. The Gospel is a fourth-century copy of an earlier Greek text. It was written in Coptic, a form of Egyptian written with Greek and Demotic characters. The Greek original likely dates to the second century; if this is the same Gospel of Judas as the one mentioned by Irenaeus, then it was certainly written before 180 CE, probably around 150 CE.

Dealers tried for years to sell the book but were unsuccessful until 2000. The Gospel was in such a poor physical condition by this time that it took 5 years for experts to restore it and translate the text into English. In 2006, the Gospel of Judas was finally released to the public. However, not everyone agreed with the restored text and translation. The many holes in the text leave much of the Gospel unclear and open to speculation, and its unusual contents allow for multiple interpretations. Prominent scholars have produced alternative translations, disagreeing over key words such as daimon, which some translate as “spirit” and others as “demon.” There is also a division over the Gospel’s stance toward Judas. One side reads the Gospel as favorable to Judas, saying that it portrays him as the only disciple who truly understands who Jesus is. Judas’s betrayal is seen as obedience to Jesus’ instructions. However, the other side argues that this interpretation relies heavily on Irenaeus’s description and claims that a careful reading of the text shows that it actually vilifies the figure of Judas.

Victoria J. Ballmes

See also Bible; Christianity; Egypt; Gospel of Thomas; Heresy; Jesus

Further Readings

- Ehrman, B. D. (2008). The lost Gospel of Judas Iscariot: A new look at betrayer and betrayed. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Kasser, R., & Wurst, G. (Eds.). (2007). The Gospel of Judas, critical edition: Together with the Letter of Peter to Philip, James, and a Book of Allogenes from Codex Tchacos. Washington, DC: National Geographic.

GOSPEL OF THOMAS

The Gospel of Thomas is an early Christian text with strong parallels to the New Testament Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. However, while the New Testament Gospels contain both sayings of Jesus and narratives of his life, the Gospel of Thomas is simply a collection of 114 sayings, most of which are introduced by the phrase “Jesus said.” Written largely without narrative, the Gospel of Thomas is the only surviving example of one of the oldest forms of Christian literature, namely, the sayings collection. Its discovery was important for the field of Christian studies because it proved that such a sayings collection was used in early Christian circles. Many scholars had posited for years that an unrecovered sayings Gospel, referred to as Q, was one of the two main sources for the Gospels of Matthew and Luke. The discovery of the Gospel of Thomas, another sayings Gospel, lent credibility to the argument for Q and also helped demonstrate the many forms of early Christianity that existed in the ancient world.

Scholars had long known of the Gospel of Thomas, but the Gospel itself remained lost until the 20th century. In 1945, a copy of the Gospel of Thomas was found in a collection of fourth-century CE texts buried in a fifth-century jar near the city of Nag Hammadi in Egypt. The jar contained 45 texts written in Coptic, a form of the Egyptian language written with Greek and Demotic characters. Many of these documents were early Christian texts with a distinctly Gnostic flavor. Like most of the texts, the Gospel of Thomas was a Coptic copy of an earlier Greek text original written by at least the second century CE, most likely in Syria. The Gospel claims to be written by Didymos Judas Thomas; the first line reads, “These are the secret sayings that the living Jesus spoke and Didymos Judas Thomas wrote.” Both Didymos and Thomas mean “twin,” however, so the document is claiming to be written by Judas “the twin,” possibly referring to Jesus’ brother Judas (mentioned in Mark 6:3 and Matthew 13:55).

Although it is not a true Gnostic text, the wisdom sayings, parables, and prophecies preserved in the Gospel of Thomas place a strong emphasis on knowledge similar to that found in Gnostic literature. According to the Gospel of Thomas, “The Kingdom of the Father” can be found by gaining knowledge (gnosis) of one’s own self through the sayings of Jesus. This emphasis on knowledge rather than faith as the basis of salvation became an integral aspect of Christian Gnostic literature, exemplified in texts such as the Apocryphon of John and the Gospel of Mary.

Victoria J. Ballmes

See also Bible; Christianity; Egypt; Gospel of Judas; Jesus

Further Readings

- Kloppenborg, J. S., Meyer, M. W., Patterson, S. J., & Steinhauer, M. G. (1990). Q-Thomas reader. Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge Press.
- Koester, H., & Lambdin, T. O. (1990). The Gospel of Thomas. In J. M. Robinson (Ed.), The Nag Hammadi library (pp. 124–138). San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco.

GRANADA

Granada, the capital of the southern Spanish province of the same name, is a celebrated city rich in political, cultural, and religious history. Today, its principal religion is Roman Catholicism, but Granada was once the capital of the Nasrids, the last Muslim dynasty to rule in the Iberian Peninsula. Granada was also home to a flourishing Jewish population. During the convivencia, or period of coexistence shared by Jews, Christians, and Muslims that lasted between 711 and 1492 in Andalusia (Muslim-ruled Spain and Portugal), it served as a major center of scholarship by accommodating scholars from around the world, including the medieval historian Ibn Khaldūn.

Granada is home to three UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) World Heritage Sites: (1) the Alhambra fortress, (2) the Generalife garden complex, and (3) the currently Muslim-majority Albaicín neighborhood, all of which exemplify the blending of Moorish and Andalusian architectures. The Cathedral of Granada, built over the city's previous Great Mosque, represents the region's transformation from Islamic to Christian governance. Also counted among the city's culturally significant constructions are the cave dwellings located in Granada's hillside Sacromonte district, currently inhabited by a six-century-old Roma population. Crowning the hill is the Abbey of Sacromonte, a pilgrimage destination founded in the early 17th century after the discovery of relics buried at that site, among them plaques describing the martyrdom of San Cecilio, Granada's patron saint and first bishop.

The year 2003 saw the opening of the Mosque of Granada, the city's first new mosque after the passing of more than 500 years since the reconquista conducted by the Catholic monarchs Ferdinand and Isabella in 1492. Built and staffed mostly by converts to Islam, the mosque represents a landmark social advancement for native Spanish Muslims and North African immigrants alike. Francisco Franco, head of state for nearly 40 years during the mid-20th century, banned the practice of religions other than Catholicism, and the nation did not recognize Islam as a legitimate religion until 1989, 14 years after the dictator's death. Today, the Mosque of Granada serves approximately 500 Muslims, many of whom were spiritually curious communists before their conversion in the early post-Franco era.

It is the Alhambra palace-fortress complex, however, that serves as the greatest reminder of Granada's religious history. The architectural icon began as a simple citadel and evolved over the centuries into a conglomerate of palaces commissioned by Muslim kings and ultimately Charles V, the Holy Roman Emperor. Due to the continual additions made to the citadel, there is no apparent logic in the monuments' layout, but the captivating buildings, gardens, and bathhouses, especially the Court of the Lions, manifest the quintessence of Andalusian artistry. The Alhambra remains Granada's primary tourist destination and represents the constant evolution of Muslim-Christian interaction in Spain.

Emily Pollokoff

See also Global Cities; Ibn Khaldūn; Inquisition; Islam; Roman Catholicism; Spain

Further Readings

- Bahrami, B. (1998). A door to paradise: Converts, the New Age, Islam, and the past in Granada, Spain. City & Society, 10, 121–132.
- Dietz, G., & El-Shohoumi, N. (2002). "Door to door with our Muslim sisters": Intercultural and inter religious conflicts in Granada, Spain. Studi Emigrazione/Études Migrations, 39(145), 77–106.
- Harris, A. K. (2007). From Muslim to Christian Granada: Inventing a city's past in early modern Spain. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

GREECE

The southern European country of Greece is a majority Christian Orthodox country, with approximately 93% of its population belonging to the Greek Orthodox Church (GOC) and Orthodoxy declared as the “prevailing religion” in the Greek constitution. Surveys suggest low levels of church attendance relative to high levels of self-declared religiosity. The country’s religious situation is characterized by a strong relationship between religion and national identity and between church and state (including tensions in the latter), the increasing presence of religious minorities, and fluctuations in the church’s public profile according to changes in church leadership.

A perception of “Greek” and “Orthodox” as coterminous is a historical fixture, not the least from the four-century experience of Ottoman rule, under which non-Muslim subjects were divided into groups according to religion (millets), with the Orthodox millet ruled by ethnically Greek clergy. This conflation of Greek ethnicity with the Orthodox faith was buttressed soon after Greek independence was won in the early 19th century, when the autocephalous GOC was established in a unilateral decision by the state and thus became a symbol of national sovereignty. The religion/national identity link has been cultivated since then by both the church and—when politically expedient—the state.

Close church-state relations are embedded in Greek legislation and practice: The clergy of the GOC are remunerated and pensioned by the state, bishops are given a role in the issuance of licenses for the building of places of worship for minority faiths, the lessons of religion in public schools reflect official Orthodox positions, state holidays are compatible with the religious calendar, the Statutory Charter of the Church is passed by the parliament, and church and state leaders often jointly preside over state functions and national holiday celebrations. All of the above contribute to the strong public presence of religion in the Greek public sphere.

At the same time, Greece is increasingly less homogeneous religiously due to the mass influx of immigrants’ (representing approximately 10% of the total population) since the 1990s. This situation renders somewhat awkward the aforementioned privileges enjoyed by the majority church over the other faith groups. The lack of a functioning mosque in Athens is conspicuous, as are complaints of limitation of religious freedom by minority religious groups (in particular, Jehovah’s Witnesses, who have won multiple cases against the Greek state in the European Court of Human Rights).

Efforts to limit the privileges of the GOC have led to intense church-state conflict, notably over church property ownership (ongoing since the 1980s) and, more recently, the state’s removal of reference to religious affiliation from national identity cards (in 2000). In such conflicts, the church has tended to mobilize public opinion in its favor and to thus limit politicians’ will to address such issues for fear of losing political support.

The situation was particularly acute during the reign of Archbishop Christodoulos (1998–2008), a vocal and politicized religious leader who frequently invoked the religion/national identity link in his dealings with the state. Archbishop Ieronymos (2008–) distances himself from his predecessor’s populist tactics: He calls for separate church-state roles but close cooperation on matters of joint interest, such as the use of church property for the general good of Greek society. The new archbishop’s election was greeted with enthusiasm, especially by the elite.

Effie Fokas

GREENLAND

Greenland, an island nation in the far North Atlantic region, is the most sparsely populated territory in the world (about 56,000 inhabitants). Globalization has brought Greenland out of geographical isolation through global economy, communication, human mobility, and the media. In recent decades, the indigenous cultural and religious practices have been revitalized to counterbalance the social influence of the Danish culture and language. Up to the present, Greenland has remained largely unaffected by the transnational flows of global migration due to its geographical remoteness and harsh arctic or subarctic climatic conditions.

A typical Greenlandic community is small. Most of the population are ethnic Inuit, and a minority are of Danish (about 12%) or of mixed Danish and Inuit descent. Two thirds of the population are Evangelical Lutherans, the rest are mostly Christian minorities—Catholics, Pentecostals, Jehovah’s Witnesses, and Seventh-Day Adventists.

Several hundreds of Baha'is form the largest non-Christian minority.

The Inuit ("humans" or "people" in Inuit language) are the indigenous inhabitants of Greenland (Kalaallit Nunaat). The Inuit tribes started to settle down in the coastal areas of north Greenland as early as 2500 BCE, but they were converted to Christianity only during the 18th century.

Until 1721, when the Danish colonization and Christianization of the Inuit began, the Inuit were living in a hunter-and-gatherer culture. Pre-Christian Greenland Inuit culture included the practice of polygamy, animistic beliefs, and shamans, who acted as mediators between this world and the supernatural world. Christianization undermined the social position of shamans, discouraged the practice of polygamy, but did not interfere with the traditional productive lifestyle (seal hunt).

In the 20th century, the Greenlandic communities experienced rapid modernization. Scattered communities of seal hunters and fishermen living in mostly turf dwellings were turned into an urbanizing postindustrial society with raised living standards and improved health care and education but also dependent on the global market.

Since 1979, when Greenland was granted Home Rule from Denmark, Greenlandic Inuit have been striving for political autonomy and for the revitalization of their distinct cultural heritage. The process of indigenization of Evangelical Lutheranism started already in the 19th century with the emergence of Inuit clergy, bibles, hymns, and religious services. Since 1979, there has also been a revival of some pre-Christian traditions (ice fishing, dogsled races) and beliefs, especially those connected with hunting and fishing. At present, Greenlandic Lutheranism, which still is a part of Denmark's Evangelical Lutheran Church, is planning to become an independent Church of Greenland.

In 2009, the Greenlandic language was elevated to the status of the sole national language. The Danish language ceased to be an official language, which demonstrates the growing self-assertion of the Inuit culture over the Danish. Greenlandic Inuits are linguistically and culturally close to other Inuit communities in Canada (Nunavut), Alaska, and Chukotka in the Russian Federation.

Alar Kilp

See also Denmark; Indigenous Religions

Further Readings

- Marquardt, O. (2002). Greenland's demography, 1700–2000: The interplay of economic activities and religion. Études/Inuit/Studies, 2, 47–69.
- Rygaard, J. (2003). Youth culture, media and globalization processes in Greenland. Young: Nordic Journal of Youth Research, 4, 291–308.

GRENADA

Grenada, an island nation in the eastern Caribbean archipelago, was discovered by Columbus on his third voyage in 1498 and was colonized by the French and later by the English. After slavery was abolished in 1850, there was a shortage of labor on the plantations, and therefore the British imported a considerable number of indentured laborers from Nigeria, mostly Yoruba speakers from Ilesha. Although they were superficially Christianized, they have kept a number of their original religious traditions until today. In the so-called Shango cult, Yoruba deities (orishas) are invoked in a dialect derived from their native African language. The believers are mostly peasants, who construct simple altars or shrines (stools) for their favorite divinities, such as Ogun, Shango, Yemanya, and Oshun, next to their houses, where food and libations are offered almost daily, to receive protection from their guardian spirits. They are implored to provide a good harvest and to prevent people from becoming sick.

From time to time, the believers join together for special rituals. A temporary shrine is constructed, where candles are lit and offerings of food and flowers are deposited. Drummers are invited. The queen of Shango, an old female worshipper or priestess, is in charge of this ceremony. After invoking the deities in prayers, she is induced, by drum rhythms and songs, to dance and eventually is possessed by Shango or any other African deity, who may then be consulted by the faithful, speaking from her mouth. She may also perform a healing rite, as it is believed that the old queens possess a wide knowledge of herbal medicine and magic formulas. Most Shangoists are also members of one or another Christian church at the same time. In many Pentecostal congregations, African rites are considered to be complementary to Christian rites. The Shango religion in Grenada is less structured than its counterpart in Trinidad, where it is organized by male leaders in the local temples.

Grenada and the neighboring little island of Carriacou are the only places in the Caribbean area where commemorative rites for remote African ancestors, such as Mandingos or Congos, are still performed today. During these rites, called saracas, sacrifices of food and libations are offered to the dead. These feasts are usually organized by the members of an extended family, considering themselves to be the descendants of a particular African ethnic group, who arrived as slaves in colonial times, before the free Yoruba laborers. Similar events are also celebrated for thanksgiving after a good harvest or at the occasion of a wedding or a funeral. Sometimes saracas are also given when a new house is inaugurated or if the community has a good reason to celebrate. They are known as Big Drum Dances or Nation Dances. Each African ethnic group preserved special drum rhythms and songs. In saracas, spirit possession does not occur. Today, Big Drum Dances do not take place very often, due to their high cost. They may now be witnessed only in Carriacou. Shango practices are also less frequent nowadays, as most of the old queens of Shango have died.

Angelina Pollak-Eltz

See also Santería; Trinidad and Tobago; Vodou

GUADELOUPE

Predominantly Catholic, the island nation of Guadeloupe in the eastern Caribbean is a former French Antillean colony that has been considered an overseas department (département d'outre-mer) of France since 1946. The island's residents are French citizens with all the rights, privileges, and responsibilities of French nationals, including military duties. Guadeloupeans have stressed that French influences often overpower their African, East Indian, and Amerindian heritage, making their affiliation with France potentially tenuous in the long term. The nation is mostly populated by citizens of African (70%), East Indian (15%), and European (9%) descent, with approximately 400,000 permanent residents. Religiously, Guadeloupeans today are mostly Roman Catholic, with only 10% of the population practicing Protestant, African, or Hindu forms of worship. In Guadeloupe, Catholic practitioners may also adhere to other available religious traditions, including taking African-derived healing remedies and attending Hindu celebrations.

Guadeloupe is an archipelago that includes the outlying islands of La Désirade, Marie-Galante, and Îles les Saintes, as well as the larger Guadeloupe two-part island Grand-Terre and Basse-Terre, which is separated by the Rivière Salée body of water. From 1963 to 2007, the French Saint Martin and Saint Barthélemy islands were considered arrondissements (French subdivisions) of Guadeloupe, but today the islands are considered regionally and departmentally separate. France took control of Guadeloupe in 1635. Within a decade, the French had both suppressed the local Amerindians and established a thriving plantation economy. The French saw Guadeloupe as a New World cash crop resource, transporting thousands of enslaved Africans to the region for sugarcane labor production. Though slavery was abolished in the French colonies during the French Revolution, white planters called békés sought to reestablish it, and under Napoleon, slavery was reinstated. After emancipation was reestablished through the 1848 revolution, contracted immigration of predominantly Hindu, East Indian laborers was used to aid in sugarcane production. The island department of France produces bananas, rum, and sugarcane for export and partially relies on tourism for income. At the beginning of the 21st century, a fusion of Afro-Indian, Afro-French, and Afro-Caribbean cultural influences can be seen in food culture, religion, music, art, and dance.

Christi M. Dietrich

See also Caribbean; Diaspora; France; Hinduism; Missions and Missionaries

Further Readings

Burton, R. D. E., & Reno, F. (1995). French and West Indian: Martinique, Guadeloupe, and French Guiana today. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press.

Haigh, S. (1999). An introduction to Caribbean Francophone writing: Guadeloupe and Martinique. Oxford, UK: Berg.

GUAM

Guam is the largest island of the Mariana Islands in the Pacific Ocean, which include Saipan and Tinian of World War II fame. It is located roughly 1,500 miles (1 mile = 1.609 kilometers) east of the Philippines. Presently, it is a U.S. territory, and as such there is a substantial U.S. military presence on the island. The United States is one of three foreign powers, along with Spain and, briefly Japan, to occupy Guam. Roman Catholicism is the dominant religion of the indigenous Chamorro population. This is due to nearly 300 years of Spanish contact, missionization, and colonialism. Native-born Protestants make up a small minority, and there are still those who practice the traditional Chamorro religion.

The first European to set foot on the island was the Portuguese explorer Ferdinand Magellan in 1521. The explorer, sailing for Spain, claimed the archipelago for the Spanish Crown. He named the islands the Islands of the Thieves due to his experience with the indigenous population. Magellan's stay was short. After the explorer's departure, European contact was infrequent. It was not until the establishment of the Spanish colony in the Philippine Islands in the 1560s that Spanish ships, primarily galleons, stopped at Guam at regular intervals. Although Spain had long claimed Guam and the other islands, there had been no systematic effort to either convert the indigenous population to Catholicism or establish a permanent colony.

This changed in 1662. Father Diego Luís de San Vitores of the Society of Jesus briefly arrived in Guam while en route to the Philippine Islands. He believed that the indigenous population of the island chain was ripe for conversion. While in the Philippines, he agitated for funds and permission to lead a mission to the islands. After a few setbacks, the Guam mission was authorized by the Queen Regent of Spain, Mariana of Austria. In 1668, Father San Vitores founded the first mission and renamed the Islands of the Thieves as Mariana Islands, in honor of Queen Mariana. Initially,

Father San Vitores's conversion efforts were peaceful, but within a short time war broke out between the Chamorros and the Spanish soldiers sent to protect the missionaries, eventually costing the ambitious priest his life. The Chamorros were eventually subdued by force, and Catholicism was forced on the population. Roman Catholicism maintained a monopoly on religion in the Mariana Islands until the end of Spanish colonial rule in 1898.

With the U.S. victory in the Spanish-American War, Guam became a U.S. territory to be governed by the Department of the Navy. Prior to its surrender, Spain ceded the other islands to Germany. The arrival of U.S. naval rule ushered in a new era of missionary activity. Missionaries attempted to convert the Chamorros from Catholicism to Protestantism. For the most part, they failed. This occurred for two reasons. First, Spanish Catholicism had long been established, and second, the Protestant missionaries were poorly funded. Thus, Catholicism has maintained its dominant position in Guam.

Robert L. Green Jr.

See also Indigenous Religions; Pacific Islands/Oceania; Roman Catholicism; Spain

Further Reading

Rogers, R. F. (1995). Destiny's landfall: A history of Guam. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.

GUATEMALA

Guatemala is the largest country in Central America, with 13 million inhabitants. Table 1 shows the main global religions present in Guatemala: Roman Catholics, Protestants, marginal Christians, other world religions, and new religious movements.

Roman Catholicism

The Roman Catholic Church entered with Spanish colonization, establishing the Guatemala diocese in 1534. A shortage of priests curtailed the strength of

Table I Main Global Religions in Guatemala: 1995, 2000, 2004

Main Religion	1995	2000	2004
Roman Catholics	8.4 million (84.2%)	9.6 million (84.3%)	57%
Protestants	2.5 million (21.1%)	2.5 million (22%)	30%
Jehovah's Witnesses	33,500 (0.34%)	NA	24,008 (0.19%)
Latter-Day Saints	148,013 (1.41%)	196,707 (1.39%)	200,537 (1.34%)
No religion	157,500 (1.6%)	204,900 (1.8%)	NA
Other world religions:
Buddhism	1,850	2,000	NA
Judaism	1,000	1,000	NA
Islam	850	910	NA
Transnational new religious movements:
Spiritualists	22,200 (0.2%)	23,800 (0.2%)	NA
Baha'is	18,000 (0.2%)	20,100 (0.2%)	NA
Chinese religions	3,500	3,700	NA
Other religions	1,900	2,000	NA

Sources: Barrett, Kurian, and Johnson (2001), CID Gallup (2004), and Holland (2002).

the Church for centuries. After independence (1821), Conservative dictators supported the Roman Catholic Church, whereas the Liberals were anticlerical and annexed the Church properties.

The Guatemalan Bishops' Conference

Since the 1940s, Guatemalan bishops supported Catholic Action, a lay movement fighting communism, Protestantism, and Indian religious syncretism. The Bishops' Conference, founded in 1964, was conservative and hardly influenced by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965). Cruel oppression by military governments in the 1980s made a few bishops sympathetic to Liberation Theology, which proposed an active role for the Church in establishing a just society. The Bishops' Conference played a crucial role in the Peace Accord (1996), ending 36 years of war.

The Catholic Charismatic Renewal

The Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) arrived in Guatemala in the year 1973, stressing a personal relationship with the Holy Spirit and a strict morality. The CCR had 921,300 participants by 1995, representing the majority of active Catholics. The Bishops' Conference supported the CCR to retain membership.

Mainstream Protestantism

The Liberal dictator Barrios invited U.S. Presbyterian missionaries to Guatemala in 1882. The Central American Mission arrived in 1899, followed by the Quakers (1902), Nazarenes (1904), Adventists (1908), Lutherans (1935), and Baptists (1946). None were successful in converting the Guatemalans.

Pentecostalism and Neo-Pentecostalism

Missionaries from the U.S. Full Gospel Church of God arrived in 1916, followed by the Church of God of Prophecy (1923), Assemblies of God (1937), Foursquare Gospel (1945), and many others. A successful local brand of Pentecostalism was El Príncipe de Paz (The Prince of Peace), founded in 1945. Between 1976 and 1986, the Pentecostal denominations increased from 3% to 17% of the population.

Guatemalan Neo-Pentecostalism exploded with the start of Verbo (1976), Fraternidad Cristiana (1979), Shaddai (1983), and Lluvias de Gracia (1984). Verbo and Shaddai enjoyed influence during the reigns of General Ríos Montt (1982–1983) and President Serrano (1991–1993). Brazilian Neo-Pentecostal churches, emphasizing faith healing and prosperity, started using old cinemas in the mid-1990s. The Universal Church of the Kingdom of God and God Is Love attracted many members.

Marginal Christians

The Jehovah's Witnesses arrived in 1920 and had 33,500 members by 1995. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints sent its first missionaries to Guatemala in 1947. Mormons claimed 205,221 members in 2006, but only about one quarter were active.

Other World Religions and Transnational Religious Movements

Other global world religions in Guatemala are Buddhism, Judaism, Hinduism, and Islam. All arrived with immigrants, and none proselytized beyond their own ethnic group.

Since the 1980s, globalization influenced the arrival of transnational new religious movements in Guatemala. These include the Baha'is, the Family, Hare Krishna, and Soka Gakkai. Except for Baha'is, their membership is modest.

Henri Gooren

See also Baha'is; Catholic Charismatic Renewal; Hinduism; Judaism; Liberation Theology; Mahayana Buddhism; Mormons; Pentecostal Movements; Protestant Christianity; Roman Catholicism; Theravada Buddhism; Vajrayana, Tibetan

Further Readings

- Barrett, D. B., Kurian, G. T., & Johnson, T. M. (2001). World Christian encyclopedia (2nd ed.). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- CID Gallup. (2004). Public opinion survey: Guatemala, # 39. Retrieved October 29, 2008, from <http://www.cidgallup.com/Documentos/Gua39ebrief.pdf>
- Gooren, H. (1999). Rich among the poor: Church, firm, and household among small-scale entrepreneurs in Guatemala City. Amsterdam, Netherlands: Thela.
- Gooren, H. (2001). Reconsidering Protestant growth in Guatemala, 1900–1995. In J. W. Dow & A. R.

Sandstrom (Eds.), Holy saints and fiery preachers: The anthropology of Protestantism in Mexico and Central America (pp. 169–203). Westport, CT: Praeger.

Holland, C. L. (2002). Guatemala. In J. G. Melton & M. Baumann (Eds.), Religions of the world: A comprehensive encyclopedia of beliefs and practices: Vol. 3. Countries D–J (pp. 566–571). Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO.

Samson, C. M. (2006). Guatemala. In A. Riggs (Ed.), Worldmark encyclopedia of religious practices: Vol. 2. Countries A–L (pp. 424–433). Detroit, MI: Thomson Gale.

GUERNSEY

The Bailiwick of Guernsey is a self-governing British Crown dependency that includes the island of Guernsey, the second largest of the English Channel Islands, along with the smaller islands of Alderney, Sark, Herm, Jethou, Brecqhou, and Lihou; together with the Bailiwick of Jersey, it is the last remnant of the medieval Dukedom of Normandy. The Church of England is the established church in Guernsey; thus, the British monarch is officially the Supreme Governor of the Church, with the Archbishop of Canterbury as the spiritual leader. As a Royal Peculiar, Guernsey is annexed to the Diocese of Winchester, having been formerly part of the Norman/French Diocese of Coutances. The Dean of Guernsey (the head priest over Guernsey parishes) is directly appointed by the Crown and serves as a Commissary for the Bishop of Winchester. The Guernsey Bailiwick and Deanery today cover less than 30 square miles (1 mile = 1.609 kilometers), with a population of approximately 65,000. The Anglican clergy perform a significant percentage of funerals and weddings, but church attendance continues to decline.

The Church of England does not own most of the ecclesiastical buildings in Guernsey, and the taxpayers are responsible for the maintenance of the church and cemetery. Anglican clergy also have civic responsibilities; until 1948, Anglican clergy were automatically members of the States of Deliberation (Guernsey's parliament) and are still ex officio members of the State of Elections. Guernsey has been largely Anglican since the Act of Conformity was applied following the English

Civil War and includes 16 Anglican parishes at present. There is also a significant Methodist presence (12 churches) and a strong Roman Catholic Church as well (3 churches). Other denominations include Baptist, Pentecostal, and Presbyterian churches as well as the Society of Friends. Recently, Guernsey has experienced the influence of the evangelical/nondenominational movement, with the Newfrontiers network setting up the Church on the Rock in Guernsey.

There is also a small but growing non-Christian presence in the Bailiwick, including Muslim, Jewish, and Hindu communities. In 2007, the Guernsey Islamic Charitable Trust became the first Islamic organization to be established on the island. Recently, clergy members have been promoting ecumenism and interfaith dialogue, organizing regular meetings between the clergy as well as community events.

During the German occupation of Guernsey from 1940 to 1945, many islanders, especially Jewish residents and children, left Guernsey never to return. Concentration camps were built on Alderney in 1942, and hundreds died before the camps were closed in 1944. Guernsey changed drastically due to the trauma of the German occupation, and it continues to change as the banking and offshore finance industry attracts newcomers, especially wealthy Britons.

Lauren Horn Griffin

See also Anglicans; United Kingdom

Further Readings

- Fraser, D. (2000). Jews of the Channel Islands and the Rule of Law, 1940–1945: Quite contrary to the principles of British justice. East Sussex, UK: Sussex Academic Press.
- Marr, J. (2001). The history of Guernsey: The Bailiwick's story (Rev. & updated ed.). Vale, Guernsey: Guernsey Press.
- McCormack, J. (1986). Channel Island churches. London: Phillimore.

in West Africa composed of four ecological regions alongside three distinct ethnic groups. The lowlands of Basse-Coté are populated mainly by the Susu ethnic group, composing 20% of the total population, while the Fouta Djallon mountain region is home to the Fula (previously Peul) group, the most ardently Islamic community of the nation and comprising approximately one third of its people. The Maninka (aka Malinké or Maninko) reside in the Sahelian Haute-Guinea northeastern region, making up 33% of the population, and the jungle regions of the southeast have several ethnic groups living together. As the majority religion of the country, Muslims constitute 85% of the population, mainly Sunnī, with Shi'a communities growing. Christians, mostly Roman Catholic, account for approximately 8% of the populace, and while 7% engage in exclusively indigenous religious practices, syncretism is widely evident in the use of amulets as well as kinship and life cycle rituals.

Islam is recorded to have been introduced in Guinea as early as the 17th century, when Muslim immigrants settled in the small city-state of Baté on the banks of the river Milo. It would attract Islamic scholars and traders from across Africa. While Islam did not make significant inroads into the southeastern region, the Fulas created a theocratic Muslim state in Fouta Djallon following the displacement of Susu ancestors in the 18th century. Roman Catholic missions were more successful in the coastal regions, where the Susu had gained dominance in the 17th and 20th centuries through trade with Europeans. Guinea was colonized by the French in the 1890s, and while it participated in the slave trade, it was never a significant contributor.

Guinea gained independence in 1958 under the presidency of Sekou Touré, who blended African institutions with a Marxist agenda and looked to the communist Soviet Union and China for aid while being a leading voice for Pan-Africanism. After the iron-fisted leader began losing popularity in the 1970s, Touré successfully looked to Islamic institutions to legitimate his rule. The cooperation between the nation and Muslim religion continues up to the present, and the imams of the principal mosque in the capital, Conakry, are government employees. There is a system of Islamic education in Guinea for children who cannot attend a government-run school, though despite ongoing efforts, Guinea's Ministry of Education has as yet been unable to integrate madrasas into the Franco-Arab education system funded by the government.

GUINEA

Guinea (formerly French Guinea, also known as Guinea-Conakry) is a small, mostly Muslim country

With Lansana Conté seizing power after Touré died in 1984, and Moussa Dadis Camara similarly gaining leadership, Guinea's history is riddled with violence and struggle. Conté opened the country to Liberians and Sierra Leoneans in the 1990s, but later found them ready scapegoats for the border town attacks of the early 21st century. Though the European Union, International Monetary Fund, and World Bank have been active under Conté, privatizing utilities and improving infrastructure, Guinea's people remain among the poorest in the world, in spite of their vast mineral resources. The country held its first successful democratic elections in 2010, with Alpha Condé being declared the victor, but continued discontent between ethnic groups fuels continuing fears of Guinea becoming a failed state.

John Soboslai

See also Africa; Indigenous Religions; Islam; Syncretism

Further Readings

- Harrison, C. (1998). France and Islam in West Africa, 1860–1960. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Kastfelt, N. (2001). The role of religion in African civil wars. New York: Hurst.
- Martin, B. C. (1976). Muslim Brotherhoods in nineteenth century Africa. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Sarró, R. (2009). The politics of religious change on the Upper Guinea coast. Edinburgh, UK: Edinburgh University Press.

GUINEA-BISSAU

One of the smallest and poorest West African nations, Guinea-Bissau is the only former Portuguese colony without Christianity as its majority religion. The majority of the population practice traditional, indigenous religion, while Islam also has a very strong presence in this country. Some sources assert that Islam has become the majority religion, but a lack of authoritative statistics makes that claim questionable; what is certain is that Muslim communities have increased dramatically during the end of the 20th century and continue to grow into the 21st century, mostly through the Fulani and Malinké ethnic groups, which constitute approximately 30% of the population. While approximately 50% of the populace engage in traditional religion exclusively, around 45% adhere to Islam (nearly all Sunnī), with roughly 5% of the country belonging to Christian communities, mostly Catholic, with some Protestant groups as well. Christianity is concentrated mostly in the capital of Bissau, whereas Islam reigns especially in the north and northeast of the country, and traditional beliefs dominate in the coastal and central regions.

Ethnic identity has not played a large role in national unity, but tribal attachment is evident in many life cycle rituals that still mark the lives of Guineans (“-Bissau” was added to distinguish the country from its southern neighbor). The indigenous religions practiced by many citizens are largely animist in nature, and reverence for ancestors is ubiquitous throughout Guinea-Bissau. Most households contain shrines to forebears, and villages are likely to have shrines to guardian spirits that are at the center of religious festivals. Spirit possessions during festivals are common, and sacrifices of alcohol, food, and animals are made publicly to avert misfortune. The tenacity of these beliefs can also be seen in the heavy syncretism evident in national varieties of Islam and Christianity.

Following the establishment of the slave trade on the coast of Africa, the Portuguese colonizers exploited tribal tensions by promoting intertribal raids to supply slaves for trade. After the slave trade was abolished, economic and political chaos ensued, fueled by Muslim factions struggling for power and coming into contact with European coastal groups. Islam initially entered Guinea-Bissau likely through the Fulani ethnic group coming out of Guinea—a group that would dominate the countryside for much of the 19th century. The Portuguese were able to wrest control of the area by manipulating schisms in Muslim leadership and aligning with the Fula community under Abdulai Injai. After the alliance had served its purpose, the Portuguese turned on the Fulas and decimated their once partner group. The Portuguese controlled the area as well as the islands of Cape Verde until the 1960s, when challenges coming from African nationalists under Amílcar Cabral began the road to Guinea-Bissau's independence. That independence came in 1974, and the leaders of the revolution that brought it about are still celebrated and enjoy leadership positions in the 21st century. (Interestingly, it is estimated that in the year 2010 more than half of Guinea-Bissau's population was born after the 1974 revolution.)

Poverty is the greatest problem plaguing Guinea-Bissau at the beginning of the 21st century. Efforts to liberalize the economy have resulted in widening the gap between government officials and citizens, a gap that spans all ethnicities and religions. Ongoing coups have split the allegiance of the military and resulted in growing animosity to the perceived riches of Cape Verdeans, who were almost incorporated into the country. Civil unrest in 2010 has led to more concerns of increased drug trade and corruption. Christian missionaries are still active in the country but with unspectacular results. Christian aid during times of unrest may result in a greater number of adherents, but demographic changes at the time of this writing are mostly in the direction of increasing conversion to Islam.

John Soboslai

See also Africa; Ancestors; Cape Verde; Indigenous Religions; Postcolonialism; Syncretism

Further Readings

- Einarsdottir, J. (2004). Tired of weeping: Mother love, child death and poverty in Guinea-Bissau. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Forrest, J. B. (1992). Guinea-Bissau: Power, conflict and renewal in a West African nation. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Forrest, J. B. (2003). Lineages of state fragility: Rural civil society in Guinea-Bissau. Athens: Ohio University Press.
- Maloba, W. O. (2007). African women in revolution. Trenton, NJ: Africa World Press.
- Vigh, H. (2006). Navigating terrains of war: Youth and soldiering in Guinea-Bissau. New York: Berghahn Books.

GULEN MOVEMENT

The Gulen movement is an Islamic religious/civic movement begun in Turkey in the 1960s by Fethullah Gulen, a scholar, preacher, and imam. The movement has spread worldwide to virtually every country. It is one of the many Nur movements that were inspired by the teachings of Said Nursi, an Islamic preacher who taught that Muslims should not reject modernity but engage with it. After being part of Nursi reading circles in his youth, Gulen as an imam in Izmir began preaching the necessity of educating Turkish youth both in the principles of living a faithful Islamic life while being educated in the natural and social sciences and in modern technologies.

In the early 1980s, encouraged by the neoliberal policies of President Ozal, Gulen and his supporters began building Gulen-inspired schools throughout Turkey. These schools follow the state curriculum but are administered by principals and staffed by teachers who are inspired by the Gulen movement. While Islam is not directly taught in these schools, the example of the dedicated teachers, who often tutor children after school and meet with parents to engage them in their children's education, provides a model of dedication inspired by Islamic values. By the mid- to late 1980s, the Gulen-inspired schools were considered among the best in Turkey, and students from these schools began winning the top prizes in international science Olympiads.

The many educational projects that are part of the Gulen movement are financed by trusts established by businessmen who are inspired by the ideas and goals advocated by Gulen in his teachings and writings. In addition, supporters of the movement set up local reading circles, based on people sharing occupational or residential interests, who meet weekly to discuss the Qur'an and the writings of Gulen. The circle participants also support educational projects. The average financial donation given by movement supporters is 10% to 15% of one's annual income.

In addition to the schools, supporters of the Gulen movement have established a large media empire in Turkey (e.g., the Zaman newspaper, Samanyolu television, magazines); Asya Bank, the largest Islamic bank in Turkey; Fatih University; the Journalists and Writers Foundation; six private hospitals; and Kimse Yok Mu Solidarity and Aid Association, a relief agency that supports disaster victims worldwide.

In the past two decades, many Gulen-inspired businessmen have expanded their businesses globally, especially into the countries of the former Soviet Union and into the Balkans. As they become more financially involved in these countries, they see the need for better educational opportunities for the youth there, pledging their own financial resources and soliciting financial assistance from friends and associates in Turkey to build schools and tutoring centers. As former Ottoman provinces, the Balkans and the Central Asian countries were the first countries to which Gulen supporters moved and established Gulen-inspired schools. However, currently, participants of this movement are also found in western Europe, the United States, Australia, South and Southeast Asia, and Africa. The exact number of supporters varies; however, common estimates are that the participants number between 8 and 10 million people worldwide, with approximately 1,000 Gulen-inspired schools existing in more than 100 countries on five continents.

In addition to education, a major goal of the Gulen movement is to promote interfaith and intercultural dialogue. As Turks have migrated to various countries, as businessmen, professionals, and students, they have established local organizations to promote the goals of the movement, especially the promotion of religious and cultural dialogue. The Gulen movement, rooted in moderate Islam and dedicated to education, science, and interfaith dialogue, has become a global religious-civic movement.

Helen Rose Ebaugh

See also Islam; Islamic Modernism; Liberal Islam; Turkey

Further Readings

- Cetin, M. (2007). The Gulen movement: Its nature and identity. In I. Ilmaz et al. (Eds.), The Muslim world in transition: Contributions of the Gulen movement (Conference Proceedings, pp. 377–390). London: Leeds Metropolitan University Press.
- Ebaugh, H. R. (2009). The Gulen movement: A sociological analysis of a civic movement rooted in moderate Islam. Amsterdam, Netherlands: Springer.
- Fuller, G. (2008). The new Turkish Republic: Turkey as a pivotal state in the Muslim world. Washington, DC: U.S. Institute of Peace Press.
- Kalyoncu, M. (2008). A civilian response to ethno-religious conflict: The Gulen movement in southeast Turkey. Somerset, NJ: Light.

GURU NANAK (1469–1539)

Guru Nanak, the founder of the Sikh tradition, was one of several important religious figures in medieval North India. His ideas are seen to have emerged from a creative interaction between indigenous Hindu beliefs and those that came with Islam to the Indian subcontinent beginning in 1000 CE. Unlike other contemporary figures, however, Guru Nanak established a community of followers (Sikhs) whose lives were centered on his spiritual ideals. By the closing decades of the 16th century, the Sikhs created detailed narratives of his life and mission, and it is not hard to reconstruct his life as the community remembers it.

Guru Nanak was born into an educated, land-owning, influential Hindu family that lived in Talwandi (Punjab), a village established by an upper-caste Hindu convert to Islam. At the village temple, Guru Nanak learned about Hindu religious texts, elementary mathematics, and record keeping; at the local mosque, he learned Farsi. He married a woman named Sulakhani at a young age, and eventually they had two sons, Srichand and Lakhmidas. With his family in place, Guru Nanak found employment in Sultanpur, an important city that was situated on the main road that connected Lahore with Delhi. According to accounts of Guru Nanak's life, during those years, his spiritual life reached a level of new vibrancy. At some point during this period, Guru Nanak had a revelatory experience in which he describes having visited the Divine Court (darbar) and having been entrusted with the mission of spreading the Divine Word (nam).

In this new role, Guru Nanak is remembered as having embarked on an extensive period of travels where he met both ordinary men and women who showered gifts and affection on him and preeminent religious figures who recognized the importance of his mission. In 1521, Guru Nanak witnessed the large-scale violence wrought by the invasion of Babar, the Mughal chief from Central Asia, and subsequently, he halted his period of travel. The Guru acquired a piece of land on the banks of the river Ravi and settled down to start a farming community there, naming his town Kartarpur ("City of the Creator"). Once the community was firmly in place, he again began his travels and encounters throughout the region.

Guru Nanak's beliefs were centered on the unity of God and the beauty of his creation. According to Guru Nanak, God runs the world along the twin principles of justice (nian) and grace (nadar). Guru Nanak urged his followers, given the unique opportunity provided by a human life, to live according to the principles of immersion in the Divine Name, charity, personal purity (nam, dan, ishnan), and service to humanity (seva). Rejecting the rigors of asceticism and renunciation, Guru Nanak believed that liberation was collective, and congregational worship (sangat) was the best mode of devotion. This worship was defined by a set of liturgical practices, rituals of initiation, and, most important, the presence of the Guru. While the beliefs and practices of his successors would continue to develop in response to historical circumstances, the core of the tradition is rooted in the original vision of Guru Nanak. With Sikhs currently enjoying the status of being the fifth largest religious community in the world, the success of the experiment of the founder is obvious.

Gurinder Singh Mann

See also India; Sikhism

Further Readings

- Grewal, J. S. (1969). Guru Nanak in history. Chandigarh, India: Punjab University Press.
- Mann, G. S. (2001). The making of Sikh scripture. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Mann, G. S. (2003). Sikhism. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.
- McLeod, H. (1968). Guru Nanak and the Sikh religion. Oxford, UK: Oxford Clarendon Press.

GUYANA

Guyana (officially known as the Co-operative Republic of Guyana, as well as British Guiana) is a country located in South America, lying on the continent's northern coast. Unlike other countries in South America, Guyana receives much of its cultural mores from the Caribbean islands influenced by England and the United States; likewise, it is the sole country on the mainland joined to the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Guyana's two primary religious faiths are Christianity and Hinduism. According to Guyana's census statistics, roughly 57% of the residents are Christian, with the denominations being a mixture of Protestants (Holiness, Presbyterians, Seventh-Day Adventists, Anglicans, Methodists, etc.) and Roman Catholics. In addition, a great proportion of the population practice Hinduism (brought to South America by indentured servants from East India), with roughly 28% believing its precepts. Other faiths include Sunnī Islam, Rastafarianism, and the Baha'i Faith. Four percent of the Guyanese state that they have no religious beliefs. Guyana is highly diverse, with a number of different races and ethnicities calling the country home. Likewise, the diversity of the citizens is visible in the various religious groups scattered about the country.

The Anglican Church is thought to be the largest Christian denomination in Guyana, with one estimate stating that it had roughly 125,000 believers. Roman Catholicism had approximately 94,000 believers during the mid-1980s, with the majority of them living in Georgetown. Although the Roman Catholics were a mixture of all racial and ethnic groups, the Portuguese were the most vocal and outgoing members of the congregation. Guyana's third largest denomination is the Presbyterian Church, which has approximately 40,000 adherents. Other Protestant churches with a substantial membership include the Methodists, Holiness (primarily Pentecostal with the central theme being charismatic services, centered on the gifts [charisms] of the Holy Spirit, e.g., speaking in tongues), and Seventh-Day Adventists, each comprising roughly 20,000 followers.

The influence of Christianity in Guyana's system of ethical principles and mores is due to the outcome of colonial history. When the Europeans moved to the land to plant sugarcane, they brought with them their overseers, their system of justice, and missionaries. With time, if a Guyanese native wanted inclusion within the ruling junta, he had to profess belief in Christianity as well as practice the dictates of the religion. Although Whites felt it useless to teach the Black slaves their religious beliefs, Christianity ultimately spread throughout the country. After slavery was abolished, Christianity grew to become an inherent part of the lives of the former slaves. When the East Indians arrived (during the late 1830s), they found Guyana strongly aligned with Christianity. It was not until the mid-1900s that the Indo-Guyanese became strong politically; thus, Hindus and their religious principles are now viewed as being equal with those of their Christian counterparts.

Most of the East Indian migrants were Hindu, and their belief system centered on Vaishnavite Hinduism. As is common throughout India, different castes had dissimilar rites and ceremonies. People of the higher castes prayed to the archetypal Hindu gods, Vishnu and Shiva. Today, Vaishnavite Hinduism is still the principal faith of the Indo-Guyanese.

Cary Stacy Smith and Li-Ching Hung

See also Anglicans; Caribbean; Hinduism; Latin America; New Religions in South America

Further Readings

Abrams, O. (1998). Metegee: The history and culture of Guyana. New York: Eldorado.

Ali, A. (2008). Guyana (2nd ed.). Hertfordshire, UK: Hansib.

Smock, K. (2008). Guyana: The Bradt travel guide. Buckinghamshire, UK: Bradt Travel Guides.

HAITI

The Republic of Haiti occupies the western half of the Caribbean island of Hispaniola, which it shares with the Dominican Republic. On the surface, the most popular religion in Haiti is Christianity, though most Haitians also practice forms of the Afro-Caribbean religion known as Vodou. About 80% of Haitians claim to be Roman Catholic, while most of the other 20% claim various forms of Protestantism (10% Baptist, 1% Congregational, 1% Seventh-Day Adventist, 4% Pentecostal/Evangelical). Though Islam was present in Haiti from the start, there has been a recent surge of Islam and Buddhism—sharing about 3% between them—mainly among immigrants in Port-au-Prince. Fleeing Nazi persecution in Germany, Jews came in considerable numbers to Haiti, and recently there has been an influx of Jewish immigrants, now totaling a bit less than 1% of the population.

The common practice of Vodou is Haiti's most distinctive religious tradition. As a result of Hollywood portrayals, the indigenous religion of Vodou enjoys a notorious reputation. To avoid racism and prejudice, Haitians are often evasive about their true religious practices, and thus, the actual number of Vodouists is not known (though it is undoubtedly large). Western popular culture has sensationalized the more dubious ritual elements. However, underlying this accretion of practices such as “voodoo dolls” and zombies is a deeply mysterious and culturally irresistible force for good in Haitian society. The gods, symbolism, and instruments from central and west Africa are predominant in Vodou.

Vodou survived colonialism by adopting an acceptable Christian facade through a process known as syncretism. Whether this syncretism was simply a survival tactic or a signal of a genuinely new blend of African, native, and European elements, the fact remains that Vodouists comfortably worship Catholic saints and African gods together on the same altar.

Vodou services are held over a period of days and consist of litanies and sacred dances eulogizing and inviting various spirits (Iwas) to possess the participants. The fact that much of the ceremony happens at night has contributed to erroneous associations of Vodou with evil and death. Recently, more responsible scholarship and artistry have begun to turn the tide on such hostile impressions, an effort helped by the Constitution of 1987, which guarantees freedom of religion. Ironically, involuntary isolation meant that non-Western beliefs such as Vodou would remain relatively unchallenged, and there has always existed a tension between the state, aspiring elites, and the struggling poor in Haiti. At its worst, this has meant outright persecution of Vodouists, but usually it has meant an uneasy, and unfortunate, silence.

There has also been a recent surge of Pentecostalism/evangelicalism throughout Haiti. Scholars note that the reasons Haitians so readily believe in intercessory Catholic saints and Vodou spirits are the same reasons Pentecostalism is becoming popular. These churches emphasize material help (Creole bourad, or “boost”) in times of need, and in return they demand strict allegiance to doctrine, liturgy, and morality—a fine trade for many poor Haitians. Whereas the state as well as Catholic and mainline churches are perceived as failing to meet the needs of the people, Pentecostal churches, and their mainline and Catholic imitators, are seen as filling the gap—both materially, through charity, and emotionally, through success stories of members who have transformed their lives to rise out of poverty.

The massive 2010 earthquake that struck the capital of Port-au-Prince was a transformative experience for Haitian society. It destroyed many churches and religious institutions in addition to displacing some 3 million people and taking hundreds of thousands of lives. The involvement of international relief agencies—many of them religious—has brought interfaith cooperation and global attention to the Haitian community.

Leonard D. McMahon Jr.

See also Latin America; Vodou

Further Readings

- Brown, K. M. (1991). Mama Lola. A Vodou priestess in Brooklyn. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Dupuy, A. (1997). Haiti in the new world order. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Glazier, S. D. (Ed.). (1980). Perspectives on Pentecostalism: Case studies from the Caribbean and Latin America. Washington, DC: University Press of America.

HAJJ

The hajj is one of the largest annual religious gatherings in the world today. Known also as the fifth “pillar” (rukṅ) of Islam, it is a pilgrimage that all Muslims are required to undertake—to travel to the holy city of Mecca (Makkah) in western Saudi Arabia (a region known as the Hijaz) at least once in their lifetime if they are able to do so. The journey can be accomplished only between the 8th and 13th days of Dhu al-Hijja, the 12th month of the Muslim lunar calendar. During this time, all the pilgrims, known as hajjis (or ḥujaj), must purify themselves, abstain from certain ordinary bodily practices, and don special pilgrimage garments (iḥrām). Then they perform a sequence of ritual actions at several stations between the Sacred Mosque (al-Masjid al-Haram) in Mecca and the plain of Arafat, about 13 miles (1 mile = 1.609344 kilometers) east of the Sacred Mosque. These rituals include seven circumambulations around the Kaabah (a cubic building in the central court of the Sacred Mosque), seven “runnings” between the hills of Safa and Marwa next to the Sacred Mosque, an encampment at Mina (between Mecca and Arafat), midday assemblage and prayer at Arafat on the 8th day of Dhu al-Hijja, an encampment that night at Muzdalifa (near Arafat), a return to Mina to throw stones at three pillars representing the devil and to perform animal sacrifices, and farewell circumambulations at the Kaa’bah. The sacrifice is celebrated worldwide by Muslims as the Great Feast (al-’īd al-kabīr) or the Feast of Sacrifice (’īd al-aḍḥā). A lesser pilgrimage known as the ’umra occurs throughout the year; it includes only the rites of iḥrām, circumambulation of the Kaabah, and the runnings between Safa and Marwa. This does not, however, satisfy the hajj requirement. Both pilgrimages, the hajj and the ’umra, draw millions of Muslims from around the world but are forbidden to non-Muslims, who are permanently banned from entering Mecca. Pilgrims customarily also include a visit to Muhammad’s mosque in Medina, the second most holy city in Islam, on their way to or from Mecca. This is a supererogatory act of devotion and is not required.

The hajj requirement and the spatiotemporal ritual multiplex it entails are based on the Qur’an and Sunna. Muhammad’s farewell pilgrimage of 632 serves as the paradigm for all Muslims to emulate, but Islamic tradition also invokes other exemplary figures known from Islamic sacred history: Adam, Ibrahim (Abraham), and Ibrahim’s wife and son, Hagar and Ismail (Ishmael), respectively. The narratives about the involvement of such figures clearly suggest that the hajj was understood as a universal duty for humankind at an early stage in Islam’s history, not just an obligation restricted to Arabs living in and around

Mecca. Specific details and issues pertaining to the performance of the hajj were taken up for discussion by the ulema (Muslim scholars and jurists), starting in the late seventh century, leading to the eventual composition of instructional manuals and handbooks for pilgrims going to Mecca. Today, hajj manuals and instructions are available in multiple languages around the world via the print media, videos, CDs, and the Internet. Pilgrims must nevertheless rely on an array of guides and government agencies to complete the requirement successfully. In addition to fulfilling the hajj as a divinely sanctioned religious duty (farḍ), many Muslims believe that it is a penitential act, wherein sins are forgiven, as well as an expression of the values of equality and unity. Also, it is often stated that the gathering of pilgrims at Arafat in their simple white garments is a preview for the final Resurrection and Day of Judgment.

For many centuries, participation could be taken up by only a select portion of the Muslim population. The journey could take months, and numerous dangers had to be overcome—both natural and man-made. Caravans had to be conducted under armed escort to guard against attacks by Bedouin raiders. Disease, famine, warfare, storms, and drought were other hazards that might be faced. Muslim rulers were obliged to patronize the pilgrimage, ensure the well-being and safety of the pilgrims, and maintain the holy sites in Mecca. This was especially so for those who claimed control of the holy cities in the Hijaz. Prior to the creation of Saudi Arabia, Ottoman authorities in Istanbul, Damascus, and Cairo assumed primary responsibility for the hajj between 1517 and 1923. They usually worked in cooperation with local dynastic rulers in the Hijaz, known as the Sharifs.

Pilgrims came from all parts of the Middle East and in lesser numbers from Africa, central Asia, South Asia, and Southeast Asia. Statistics for hajj participation are inexact for the Ottoman period and earlier, but available records indicate that the number of pilgrims varied between 83,000 and 202,000 in the 19th century. The introduction of modern mechanized transport, such as steamships, railroads, automobiles, and, more recently, airplanes, have contributed significantly to the increase in the numbers of pilgrims. Extensive European colonial involvement in Muslim lands, together with the two world wars, curtailed participation rates during the first half of the 20th century, but they began to increase significantly in the 1950s with peace and national independence. Indeed, it is estimated that 2.5 million Muslims now go to Mecca for the hajj annually, with most coming from nearby Arab countries (led by Egypt, Yemen, Algeria, Iraq, Libya, and Jordan). Nonetheless, hajj participation has become more globalized than ever before, with large numbers coming from Iran, Pakistan, Turkey, Indonesia, India, Nigeria, Malaysia, and Bangladesh.

To accommodate the increased regional and global demand for access to its holy sites, the government of Saudi Arabia spent more than $100 billion between the 1950s and the 1990s to modernize and expand the pilgrimage facilities. Additional steps have been taken recently to redesign and further modernize Mecca's pilgrimage landscape to accommodate even more pilgrims. Since 1988, the Saudis have also worked with other Muslim-majority countries through the Organization of the Islamic Conference to institute a quota system—allowing 1,000 pilgrims per million Muslims in the country of origin. This situation is not satisfactory to all parties, and often the quotas have to be renegotiated to allow for special circumstances. While the quota system affirms Saudi control of the holy sites and pilgrim traffic within their borders, it also opens the way for the involvement of other Muslim-majority countries, where hajj politics has important domestic as well as international implications.

Juan E. Campo

See also Islam; Mecca; Ottoman Empire; Pilgrimage; Sacred Places; Saudi Arabia

Further Readings

- Bianchi, R. R. (2004). Guests of God: Pilgrimage and politics in the Islamic world. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Faroqhi, S. (1994). Pilgrims and sultans: The hajj under the Ottomans. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Long, D. (1979). The hajj today: A survey of the contemporary pilgrimage to Makkah. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Peters, F. E. (1994). The hajj: The Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca and the holy places. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

Qu'aiti, S. G. (2007). The holy cities, the pilgrimage, and the world of Islam, a history: From the earliest traditions till 1925 (1344 H). Louisville, KY: Fons Vitae.

HALAKHA AND SHARI'A

Halakha is the body of Jewish religious law. It comprises biblical laws found in the Hebrew Bible, Talmudic law, and post-Talmudic religious legalistic texts, as well as in traditions and customs that have developed throughout centuries of Jewish practice and as a result of scholarly deliberations. The word Halakha is derived from the Hebrew word for "walk" or "go," and so it refers not only strictly to law but also to the way Jewish persons should live their lives and the path on which they should journey. Although later distinctions were made between the more particular ritual laws (known as hukkim) and the more universal ethical/moral laws (called mishpatim), the Torah itself makes no such division; both are of equivalent importance within Israelite society. From a global standpoint, it is significant to note that unlike other religious codes of law, such as the Muslim Shari'a, Halakha also contains many basic principles that apply to people of all faiths. In that sense, Jews perceive Halakha as a global system of religious law, particularly as it relates to ethical practices and monotheistic belief. The seven Noahide laws, basic ethical principles and practices that are incumbent on Gentiles from a Jewish point of view, are such an example.

The earliest contribution to Halakha comes from the five books of Moses, known as the Torah, where according to tradition, all or nearly all of the 613 foundational commandments (known as mitzvot) can be found. Subsequent to the Torah is the next major work of Halakha—the Talmud, a 26-volume compilation of laws and customs developed by rabbinic scholars after the canonization of Torah and encompassing discussions from approximately the second century BCE to the seventh century CE. Following the Talmud, social and technological advances within Jewish life gave rise to new interpretations and codifications of Jewish law, which were collected in later religious texts, such as the Mishneh Torah, authored by the great philosopher and jurist Moses Maimonides in the 12th century, and the Shulchan Aruch, written by the mystic and jurist Rabbi Yosef Caro in the 16th century.

Since more than 2,000 years of Jewish life have taken place while in exile from the Jewish homeland of Israel, the preponderance of Halakha naturally relates to life in the diaspora. Whereas in premodern times, Jews lived within semiautonomous communities that were governed by Halakha, and thus, so long as a Jew remained in the community, he or she automatically lived under the halakhic system, today, strict observance of Halakha is a voluntary choice of Jews, generally undertaken by those living solely within the Orthodox Jewish community. Disagreements exist among Conservative, Reform, and Orthodox Jewish communities over how Halakha should be interpreted. Furthermore, even among Orthodox communities, one may find differences in the interpretation and practice of Jewish law, since there is no single central halakhic authority that is empowered to decide between different understandings of Halakha for the entire Jewish community as a whole. In the modern state of Israel, Halakha is not generally used as the state civil law, except in certain areas of family and personal status law.

Halakha has left a lasting global impact through its influence on the two monotheistic faiths that succeeded Judaism, namely, Christianity and Islam. In the case of Christianity, Halakha was perceived not so much as a system to follow but mainly as a system to avoid, as is evident by statements in the New Testament, different synods of the Church Fathers, and other anti-Jewish legislation and regulations undertaken by the Church. But although Christianity chose to distance itself from the ritual and more particular aspects of Halakha, it maintained most of the ethical/moral principles found within it. Moreover, since the Hebrew Bible is considered a sacred scripture, Christians know of its existence and some of its particular laws through stories in the Old Testament as well as those in the New Testament that touch on halakhic issues in the life of Jesus and his disciples/followers. Finally, in time, the Catholic Church developed its own system of religious law known as canon law, which displays some similarities to Halakha.

In the Islamic context, a famous statement ascribed to Prophet Muhammad is reported to have described the proper relation of Islam to the other, older monotheistic religions: "You will follow the traditions of those who preceded you span by span and cubit by cubit—so closely that you will go after them even if they creep into the hole of a lizard." According to S. D. Goitien (1974), this was stated "in the most authoritative collections of Muslim oral traditions" (Goitien, p. 46). Thus, it is no surprise to find so many similarities between Islamic law and Halakha. While early Halakha has influenced Shari'a, later Halakha in turn was influenced by Shari'a as well. Although one may find the early beginnings of this influence in the Qur'an itself, this process of mutual effect started largely in the eighth century under the Caliphate of Baghdad in Babylon (Iraq of today). Babylon had been the world center of Jewish study of Halakha for many centuries prior to the rise of Islam and was the birthplace of the main source of Jewish law, the Babylonian Talmud. The interaction of Jews and Muslims there and throughout the world opened a two-way channel of mutual, ongoing impact. For its part, Islam adapted the notion of religious law from Judaism in general, as well as specific customs and laws in particular, such as some dietary laws (i.e., the prohibition of eating pork and the need for ritual slaughter of the animal before its meat can be consumed, to name a few examples). Within Judaism, the great Jewish rabbi-jurist Moses Maimonides was clearly influenced by the systematic structure of Shari'a, whose organization he attempted to replicate in his seminal work of halakhic codification, the Mishneh Torah.

Shari'a

Like Halakha, Shari'a, meaning "the way," is the body of Islamic religious law. In addition to serving as the legal framework for observant Muslims, it also addresses many aspects of the social, political, and daily life of Muslims. In a global sense, it is the most widely used religious law today and the third most employed legal system in ijmā world, after civil law and common law.

In addition to the Qur'an, Shari'a is primarily derived from three other key sources: (1) the Hadith, a record of Prophet Muhammad's life; (2) Ijmā, a consensus of Islamic scholars throughout many centuries; and (3) Qiyas, or reasoning by analogy in situations not covered by traditional Islamic texts. As with Halakha, differing interpretations and schools of thought regarding Shari'a exist throughout the Muslim world, often depending on the geographic region in which it was formed.

The degree to which Shari'a is applied in Muslim-majority countries varies greatly. Turkey was until recently an example of a Muslim state at the secular end of the spectrum, going so far as to overturn certain traditional Islamic laws by banning the wearing of the veil by women. At the other end of the spectrum in the Islamic world are Saudi Arabia and the Islamic Republic of Iran, where Shari'a serves as the only and ultimate source of law. Nevertheless, influences of the Shari'a can be found in the judicial systems of all Arab/Muslim countries, especially in the areas of personal status, such as marriage, divorce, and inheritance. One striking example of the influence of Shari'a on contemporary Muslim society is in the fields of banking and finance, where there is an increasing emphasis on adhering to Islamic law and, thus, prohibiting the investment of money in business ventures that involve gambling or alcoholic consumption, which are considered illegal.

Zion Zohar

See also Islam; Islamic State; Jewish Diaspora; Judaism; Qur'an; Reform Judaism; Torah

Further Readings

- Goitein, S. D. (1974). Their contacts through the ages. New York: Schocken Books. Retrieved May 3, 2011, from <http://www.questia.com/PM.qst?a=o&d=98460287>
- Halacha. (2007). Encyclopedia of the Middle East. Retrieved May 29, 2008, from <http://www.mideastweb.org/Middle-East-Encyclopedia/halacha.htm>
- Halakha. (2008). Encyclopedia Britannica. Retrieved May 29, 2008, from <http://www.britannica.com/eb/article-9038847/Halakhah>
- Otterman, S. (2005). Islam: Governing under Sharia. Council on Foreign Relations. Retrieved May 28, 2008, from <http://www.cfr.org/publication/8034>

HALAL

In Arabic, halal means literally that which is permitted, authorized, or prescribed, as opposed to haram, which refers to that which is forbidden and not permitted. In contemporary Muslim societies, halal and haram primarily refer to dietary restrictions that Muslims are expected to follow. Muslims are not permitted to eat the meat of an animal that has not been ritually slaughtered according to certain rules and rituals. Halal dietary restrictions are similar to the Jewish practice of observing kosher rules regarding food and have a similar range of strictness regarding its observance. In the pluralistic societies of a globalized world, maintaining halal practices can be arduous, but it also provides a distinct marker between observant and nonobservant Muslims.

When North African immigrants first began to emigrate to Europe during the 1950s and 1960s, eating halal food was not a major issue. The first generation of Muslim migrants in Europe were poor or working class and were not in a position to insist on proper halal preparation of the meat that they purchased and prepared for consumption. Later generations of Muslims, however, are better educated and paid and have tended to stay in immigrant communities that are able to replicate the customs of their places of origin, and they have been more insistent about keeping halal food practices.

Since the 1990s, there has been an emerging demand for halal-approved food in public restaurants in Europe and America, especially in areas dominated by Muslim immigrant communities. The public debate about halal food in France began in 2002, when a food store in Paris limited its offerings to halal food and stopped carrying alcohol and pork, thereby becoming the first market to shift to le Tout Halal ("the full halal"). Several years later, Quick, a fast-food hamburger chain that competes in France with McDonalds, experimented in 14 of its restaurants by offering its customers the choice of having halal beef in their hamburgers and having the bacon in bacon burgers replaced by smoked turkey. The experiment was an overwhelming success, and the chain quickly expanded these offerings to dozens of other restaurants in its network. The marketing ploy was not without controversy, however; some politicians decried the move as being contrary to French secular values, and a local mayor accused the chain of funding Muslim clerics with the fees that it provided them for certifying that the meat used in their burgers was properly halal.

The social impact of the dietary laws and food customs in the immigrant Muslim communities is their ability to help provide their groups a cultural distinctiveness and shore up the communities' sense of identity. In a postmodern world, the need for expressing a sense of communitarian identity is acute, and for Muslims living in Europe and America, the practice of halal food consumption is one way these cultural and social ties are enhanced.

Mustapha Radji

See also Diaspora; Halakha and Shari'a; Islam

Further Readings

- Fischer, J. (2011). The halal frontier: Muslim consumers in a globalized market (Contemporary Anthropology of Religion). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Riaz, M., & Chaudry, M. (2003). Halal food production. London: CRC Press.

HALLELUJAH MOVEMENT

Hallelujah is a syncretistic religion that originated in (British) Guyana among the Carib-speaking Macushi Indians shortly before 1900. It combines elements of indigenous South American shamanism and beliefs in nature spirits with biblical teachings of the Anglican missionaries who worked among the Indians during the second half of the 19th century. Abel, its founder, had lived with the Anglican priests, who even took him to England for a short time. On his return, he had a vision in which he met God in heaven and was ordered to dance in his honor. Benjamin, an Indian of the related Patamona tribe, was converted by Abel and built the first Hallelujah church in his village, where the Indians began to dance in honor of God. Soon the movement spread to the Akawayos and the Venezuelan Pemons of the Gran Sabana. The religious leaders or prophets are inspired by revelations, which they supposedly received in dreams and visions. The teachings are propagated mainly by songs sung while dancing.

Hallelujah churches are found today in many native villages in Guyana and the Gran Sabana in Venezuela. The faithful meet in large native huts and, for several hours, dance in a circle in a monotonous way, singing in their own language about events from the Bible and about the history of Hallelujah. From time to time, they stop to take a drink of cachiri (native beer). Then the dance continues, until many participants reach an altered state of consciousness, during which they may talk about their spiritual experience with God and superior beings. Finally, they fall on their knees and pray to God. Sessions usually take place on weekends, and often the participants attend mass in a neighboring Catholic mission or in an Adventist church before the dance begins. They believe that God and the spirits of the universe are present in the ritual and will grant them what they wish. Dancing, singing, and prayers are important to achieve these ends. Protestant and Catholic missionaries are certainly not in favor of Hallelujah, but in the postcolonial era, they do not forbid the Indians from taking part in these rituals as long as they also participate in Christian ceremonies. According to the native tradition, life on earth has its source in the spirit world, which can be reached only by shamans, when they are under the influence of the hallucinogen yopo and have visions. Then they transmit the orders they received from the spirits to the community. In Hallelujah, similar rituals link the community with God.

In 1971, a related movement started in the Gran Sabana on Venezuelan territory, called the Movement of San Miguel. Prolonged dances, chants, and prayers are intended to provoke a vision of Saint Michel or of God. Self-purification of the believers, however, is necessary to be prepared for the end of the world, which will soon take place. In this new movement, shamanism, Catholic symbolism, and the traditions of the original Hallelujah movement are combined. This cult was started by an old Pemon woman, who had visions of God. Later, a young prophet educated in Ciudad Bolivar codified a cosmological scheme and distributed CDs to the believers, containing messages that the old woman had received from God.

Angelina Pollak-Eltz

See also Guyana; Latin America; New Religions; New Religions in South America; Postcolonialism; Venezuela

Further Reading

Williams, B. (1991). Stains on my name, war in my veins: Guyana and the politics of cultural struggle. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

HAMAS

The Arabic term hamas means “zeal” and is the acronym of the Harakat al-Muqawamat al-Islamiyyah (Islamic Resistance Movement), the largest Palestinian Islamic (Sunnī) resistance movement. While pursuing its main political objective—the establishment of a state based on the principles of Islamic law (or Shari’a) in all of pre-1948 Palestine—Hamas has resocialized the Palestinian public under Israeli occupation around an Islamic identity. Hamas’s political, social, and religious objectives are enshrined in both nationalistic and Islamic ideologies. These color the type of actions the movement promotes: jihad (or religious struggle) against Zionism and Israel, martyrdom as death for the sake of God, but also mundane involvement in party politics and the provision of welfare and charitable services to the Palestinian public.

Hamas first appeared under that name in the Gaza Strip at the beginning of the First Intifada (1987). Its founder, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, a long-time member of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood, called for military action against Israel, therefore breaking away from the traditional involvement of the West Bank branch of the Muslim Brotherhood in religious affairs, social work, and welfare. During the first Palestinian uprising (or Intifada) against Israeli occupation (1987–1993), Hamas members carried out several attacks against Palestinians suspected of collaborating with Israel and against Israeli military and civilian targets. The movement's recourse to violence led the Israeli authorities to arrest and imprison Ahmed Yassin in 1989. Hamas rejected the 1993 Oslo Peace Agreements signed between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization. At the time of the Agreements, however, Hamas offered the Israelis a truce if they would withdraw from the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

In the following years, Hamas claimed responsibility for several dozen suicide attacks against Israeli soldiers and civilians both inside the Occupied Territories and in Israel proper. Attacks multiplied after the outbreak of the Second Intifada (2000). Although Israel, the U.S. State Department, and the Council of the European Union, among others, list Hamas as a terrorist organization, several analysts have argued that the initial development of the movement was indirectly supported by the leaders of the Israeli right-wing Likud party in an attempt to sabotage the Oslo process and to weaken Fatah, the mainstream Palestinian movement led by Yasser Arafat. Ahmed Yassin, between his release from prison in 1997 and his assassination in 2004 by the Israeli military, resumed his role as the movement's spiritual leader, repeatedly calling for armed resistance against the "Zionist entity" and justifying suicide attacks—including those by women as of 2002—on religious grounds. As of 2005, Hamas shifted its strategy toward more involvement in party politics and won a majority of seats in the 2006 Palestinian parliamentary elections. This electoral victory precipitated a halt of international aid to the Palestinian Authority and heightened political and military tensions between Hamas and Fatah, especially in the Gaza Strip. In 2011, however, the two groups joined forces in an uneasy coalition.

Géraldine Chatelard

See also Islam; Islamism (Political Islam); Jihad; Muslim Brotherhood; Palestine; Terrorism

Further Reading

Levitt, M. (2006). Hamas: Politics, charity, and terrorism in the service of Jihad. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

HARE KRISHNA (INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS)

The International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), popularly known as the Hare Krishna movement, was founded by A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada (1896–1977), an Indian religious reformer. Prabhupada emigrated to the United States in 1965 and, a year later, founded his devotional movement for "the spiritual benefit of human society."

Now a worldwide confederation of Krishna devotees, ISKCON is essentially a monotheistic Hindu tradition in the Gaudiya Vaishnava tradition. Its connection to Gaudiya Vaishnavism comes through Prabhupada himself, who, as a primary disciple of Srila Bhaktisiddhanta Sarasvati Thakur, a renowned scholar and saint who founded an earlier ISKCON-like institution known as the Gaudiya Math, inherited the lineage mantle from his teacher.

Prabhupada founded ISKCON as a universalist institution, advocating sanatana dharma ("traditional religion," a term that the movement translates as "the eternal function of the soul") as opposed to sectarian concerns. Accordingly, he never identified his institution as a form of Hinduism. Instead, ISKCON teaches what Prabhupada called "the science of God consciousness." In other words, the institution eschews normal religious identification, such as Hindu, Jew, Christian, Buddhist, or Muslim, and, instead, focuses on the abiding truths and underlying threads that tie all religions together.

Along these lines, Prabhupada emphasized the general principle of glorifying God by chanting His holy name—"whatever that name might be according to one's respective religions tradition, whether Allah, Jehovah, Krishna or whatever." Similarly, he encouraged his followers to follow certain purifying principles that would be effective in any religious discipline, such as avoiding the consumption of meat, fish, or eggs; giving up illicit sex (sexual relations outside marriage); and doing away with lesser addictions, such as gambling and intoxication. These principles are followed by all ISKCON devotees.

Since ISKCON's founding, Srila Prabhupada and his disciples gradually attracted thousands of dedicated followers, with many more who casually consider ISKCON their religion. The exact numbers are not known. ISKCON boasts more than 100 temples and ashrams throughout the world, publishes scores of books through its Bhaktivedanta Book Trust, and manages numerous farms and vegetarian restaurants in most major cities. The organization soon began staging cultural festivals around the globe and serves millions of plates of vegetarian food offered to Krishna (known as prasadam). Along similar lines, ISKCON has branched out to include "Food for Life," an organization that feeds needy people around the world.

When Srila Prabhupada first incorporated ISKCON in 1966, he gave it seven purposes that define the institution to this day:

1. To systematically propagate spiritual knowledge to society at large and to educate all peoples in the techniques of spiritual life in order to check the imbalance of values in life and to achieve real unity and peace in the world
2. To propagate a consciousness of Krishna, as it is revealed in [India's ancient sacred texts, such as] the Bhagavad Gita and the Srimad Bhagavatam
3. To bring the members of the Society together with each other and nearer to Krishna, the prime entity, thus to develop the idea within the members, and humanity at large, that each soul is part and parcel of the quality of Godhead (Krishna)
4. To teach and encourage the sankirtan movement, congregational chanting of the holy names of God as revealed in the teachings of Lord Sri Chaitanya Mahaprabhu
5. To erect for the members, and for society at large, a holy place of transcendental pastimes, dedicated to the personality of Krishna
6. To bring the members closer together for the purpose of teaching a simpler and more natural way of life
7. With a view toward achieving the aforementioned purposes, to publish and distribute periodicals, magazines, books, and other writings

With these principles as its basis, ISKCON continues into the present day with new leaders trained by both Prabhupada and his disciples to carry on his mission.

Steven J. Rosen

See also Hinduism; New Religions; New Religions in the United States; Popular Religion

Further Readings

- Dwyer, G., & Cole, R. (Eds.). (2007). The Hare Krishna movement: Forty years of chant and change. London: I. B. Taurus.
- Rocheford, E. (2007). Hare Krishna transformed. New York: New York University Press.

HAWAI'I

Hawai'i, the 50th state in the United States, is located in the northeastern part of the Pacific Ocean and comprises eight islands: Hawai'i (Big Island), Maui, Lanai, Molokai, O'ahu, Kaua'i, Ni'ihau, and Kanaloa (Kaho'olawe), in addition to several atolls to the west. Hawai'i is significant because it occupies a strategic position situated between North America and Asia. Hawai'i is where East meets West.

Ancient Polynesians in outriggers embarked across the Pacific Ocean. Each wave of migration brought people to New Zealand, Tahiti, Rapa Nui, Hawai'i, and other islands of Oceania. Travel between the islands continued until it dwindled, and each island developed a separate culture.

The Kumulipo, the indigenous Hawaiian creation chant, tells the story of how each of the islands was created by the mating of Wākea (sky god) and Papa (earth mother). One or two high-ranking ali'i (chiefs) ruled each island independently. Ancient Hawaiian society was a complex hierarchical structure bound by a series of kapu (rules) that governed their religion, politics, and social interactions. In 1778, Kamehameha I, a high-ranking ali'i, finished uniting the islands under his rule, with the exception of Kaua'i, and established the kingdom of Hawai'i. He completed his conquest with cannons and weapons traded from European ships that made Hawai'i their port of call after Captain Cook's landing.

In one generation, the kingdom of Hawai'i underwent a massive societal and cultural shift. Indigenous Hawaiian society went from an agricultural, subsistence lifestyle to a global, capitalist society with Western politics, religion, and laws. The primary basis of this shift was disease. Diseases killed off 90% of the indigenous Hawaiian population while simultaneously lowering the birthrate of indigenous Hawaiian children.

A coalition of American businessmen, several of whom were descendants of the Protestant Congregationalist missionaries who arrived in 1820, supported by John L. Stevens, U.S. Minister to Hawai'i, and the U.S. Marines, overthrew Queen Lili'uokalani in 1893. The Republic of Hawai'i was established, and its government was annexed to the United States. In 1900, the U.S. Congress passed the Hawaiian Organic Act, establishing the Republic of Hawai'i as a territory of the United States. In 1959, Hawai'i became the 50th state.

The multiracial character of the Hawaiian population is a by-product of the need for cheap labor in the sugar plantations. Thus, the plantation owners imported a series of immigrant workers, including Chinese, Japanese, Korean, and Filipino laborers, to work in competition with each other and indigenous Hawaiians. While some of these laborers returned to their country of origin and others immigrated to California, many stayed back in Hawai'i.

Prior to 1819, the traditional kapu restrictions prohibited men and women from eating together and regulated the consumption of certain foods. Queen Ka'ahumanu, Kamehameha I's widow, and his successor, King Liholiho, abolished the kapu system at a symbolic meal in which men and women of the royal court ate together. After this, the ancient indigenous religion ceased to be the primary religion practiced in Hawai'i. Shortly afterward, other missionaries arrived, and Protestant Christianity became the dominant religion of the islands.

Niccole Leilanionapae'āina Coggins

See also Missions and Missionaries; Pacific Islands/Oceania; Postcolonialism; United States of America

Further Readings

- Kamakau, S. (1991). Tales and traditions of the people of old: Nā Mo'olelo a ka Po'e Kabiko. Honolulu, HI: Bishop Museum Press.
- Kuykendall, R. S., & Grove, D. A. (1961). Hawaii: A history from Polynesian kingdom to American State (Rev. ed.). Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

HEAVEN

Most cultures have beliefs and practices relating to the existence of another life or world other than the present one. Usually, it is a state of existence into which the individual enters at death, a state somewhere, sometime, or somehow in which the individual hopes to be free from pain and anxiety. Etymologically as well as historically, the word heaven has denoted the Christian heaven, though the Christian heaven is closely related to Jewish and, especially, Muslim ideas. These monotheistic concepts envision the individual fulfilled and perfected in the presence of God. The "heavens" of Indic religions, though bearing some resemblance to these concepts, are fundamentally different.

Judaism and Christianity

In early Hebrew thought, life with God was considered in community terms: Israel as a nation had its covenant with the Lord, and the welfare of the community depended on whether it was following the covenant. From the sixth century BCE, the focus gradually shifted to individuals. The ideas of life after death and of resurrection became a prevalent discourse, including the idea of divine judgment of individuals. Talmudic Judaism continues to proclaim resurrection and the justification of the faithful.

Perhaps under the influence of Zoroastrianism, many nonbiblical Jewish writings between 200 BCE and 150 CE emphasized a cosmic struggle between good and evil spirits, a struggle in which each human chooses sides and, thus, is brought into eternal light or sent into eternal darkness. About the same time, gnostic movements added to this spirit-spirit dualism the idea of a conflict between spirit (good) and matter (evil), where salvation depended on freeing oneself from matter. In contrast, although “soul” and “spirit” are often confused, both Jewish and Christian traditions tended to consider the soul as something integrated with the whole person, body and spirit. For Jews, Christians, and Muslims, heaven is, quite simply, God and those who are with God. Heaven is always theocentric, though the egocentrism of humans in practice often shifts the emphasis to me, with God as chiefly an aid to me.

In the Christian Bible and the Christian tradition, the Kingdom of Heaven or Kingdom of God is absolutely central. Whether heaven is a place, a state of being, or the state of the soul in the present life has never been settled, nor has the relationship between “afterlife” and “eternal life.” Heaven is now among us, it is an eternal state of being with the eternal God, or it is the “new heaven and new earth” at the end of the world. When viewed temporally, the Resurrection, followed by the Last Judgment, puts the eternal seal on the state of the individual’s soul. Heaven is the joyous fulfillment of the loving person in the company of the loving God. This is known as the Beatific Vision (Catholic), the Vision of God (Protestant), or theosis (becoming infused with the divine; Orthodox). Even when in the presence of God, even in the highest spiritual state, the individual does not lose his or her identity but rather feels the inexpressible joy of experiencing the filling, the perfection, of the self in the mutual love between Christ and humans. Christian images of heaven include a city of gold and jewels, lush meadows and fountains, music and dancing, and joyful interaction among the saints.

For Christians, there have been two dominant afterlife narratives: Either the person who dies passes immediately outside time into eternity or else spirit and body are separated until the Resurrection, which would reunite them in one soul. In the latter view, some way to describe the state of the dead between death and the Resurrection was needed. Either the spirit sees God immediately, incomplete only in that it temporarily lacks its body, or the spirit “sleeps” until the Resurrection. Another question was the means by which a person attained God. Does God know in eternity who is saved and who is lost, and if so, does He predestine the salvation or damnation of each? Or does Christ, who wishes to save everyone, allow each to construct his or her own character by free will? Or—a minority but perennial view—does Christ’s unlimited mercy mean that even the most wicked will ultimately be saved?

A historically marked question was the “location” of heaven. Until the 17th century, it was commonly believed that heaven was “up” in a literal as well as a metaphorical sense. Copernicus had challenged this view in the 16th century, and in the 17th century, the thinking about the direction of heaven began to shift. In the Ptolemaic model, the universe was thought to consist of a nest of concentric spheres, with the round globe of the earth at the center, extending upward through the moon, Mercury, Venus, the sun, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, and the fixed stars to the primum mobile, beyond which was nothing other than God and heaven. When the Copernican heliocentric system prevailed, the “upness” of heaven had to become metaphorical.

Islam

Islamic teachings hold that since God is eternal, it follows that He eternally knows who is faithful and who is an infidel (faithless). Moreover, God is active at every moment everywhere, and His will is present in every event that occurs. There is no cause or effect save that at each moment God wills what He wills, so that He is directly responsible for everything, including human actions. Yet infidels deserve damnation. Furthermore, there will be a resurrection and a last judgment in which evil deeds are weighed against good deeds. The tension between divine and human responsibility is thus fundamentally unresolved. Between death and resurrection, the individual is in an interim state; at the end of the world occur the Resurrection and the Last Judgment. Another tension is that at the judgment, God is both just and merciful; which quality He decides to exercise is His unpredictable and inexplicable choice. The human mind is wholly incapable of understanding God’s will or His works, so reason is inadequate, and the only proper way to heaven is complete submission to God at all times.

The Muslim heaven is often imagined as a place with lush gardens, parks, feasts, fruits, and beautiful virgins. As with Christian images, there is a tension between literal and metaphorical interpretation, but in fundamentalist Islam, as in conservative Christianity, the absolute power of God to do whatever He wishes reduces the tension between the “normal” and the “miraculous,” thus rendering literal interpretation more plausible.

Hinduism and Buddhism

Whereas monotheistic heavens are centered on God, in the Indic religious traditions of Hinduism and Buddhism, the notion of God is either absent or entirely different. Furthermore, whereas in monotheistic visions of heaven, individuals enjoy their rewards in the presence of God, many Asian religions teach that the “I” or “me” must be dissolved before there can be an experience of eternal joy.

Extraordinary diversity exists in Hindu views of heaven, as in the religion as a whole. In the period of the Vedas (ca. 1500–800 BCE), rituals, including sacrifice, ensured purification so that the dead could enter the heavenly world above, where many gods and Yama (the first human) preside. Later, in the period of the Upanishads (ca. 800–350 BCE), heaven became only a temporary state between the death of the individual and his or her next incarnation. All life, all the universe, is in a constant cycle, samsara, in which suffering, pain, and death are inevitable. Happiness consists of moksha, release from the cycle of suffering through yoga (disciplined meditation) and good deeds. A good life improves one’s karma, which improves one’s next reincarnation until, after untold eons, one’s individual personality is absorbed when one’s atman is dissolved in Brahman.

Buddhism, based in Indic religious culture, shares many basic beliefs with Hinduism. Again, the aim is not heaven but passage through many heavens and incarnations in the quest for the enlightened wisdom and compassion that are necessary to escape the cycle of birth, pain, and rebirth. Some Buddhists teach that there are as many as 14 or 18 heavens but these are transitory and not goals in themselves. For Buddhists, the Christian and Muslim idea of heaven is vain, since wishing for a future existence only binds us more to the cycle of pain. As in Hinduism, karma is the engine of moral cause and effect: A life of wise compassion and selflessness is good karma for a better reincarnation. Good karma is accumulated and accelerated over many lives, the ultimate result being nirvana, a total lack of attachment to this world and, thereby, dissolution of the self. In Pure Land Buddhism, the Buddha is almost like the Christian Jesus: Through Buddha’s inexhaustible merit and infinite compassion, He will save all creatures, especially those who call on Him in faith.

Evolution of Beliefs About Heaven

From the 18th century onward, secularization gradually shifted the hope for heaven to the belief in progress on earth. Though the vast majority of Americans believe in heaven, as do a smaller majority of Europeans, the meaning of “heaven” has changed. In contemporary Western countries, Asian religious ideas have influenced popular belief, and by the end of the 20th century, almost a quarter of Americans subscribed to some sort of notion of reincarnation.

Jeffrey Burton Russell

See also Christianity; Death Ritual; Hell; Hinduism; Islam; Judaism

Further Readings

- McDannell, C., & Lang, B. (1988). Heaven: A history. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Russell, J. B. (1997). A history of heaven. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Russell, J. B. (2006). Paradise mislaid. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Zaleski, C., & Zaleski, P. (2000). The book of heaven. New York: Oxford University Press.

HEAVEN'S GATE

Heaven's Gate was a small new religious movement that combined UFO (unidentified flying object) lore with metaphysical and Christian themes and advocated the ascetic rejection of all “mammalian ways,” such as sexual relationships and ties with family members outside Heaven's Gate. The founders, Marshall Applewhite (1931–1997) and Bonnie Nettles (1927–1985), met in Houston in 1972 and in the years thereafter developed and taught a shifting and highly combinative theology, intermingling popular science fiction themes about extraterrestrial beings and spaceships with strains of New Age spirituality, theosophy, spiritualism, and end-times Christianity. Applewhite and Nettles attracted significant media attention in 1975, after a lecture they gave in Oregon spurred some 30 audience members to abandon their worldly attachments and possessions as a precondition for conversion. Soon thereafter, the group essentially went underground, ceasing most proselytization efforts until the early 1990s and living in a series of isolated campgrounds, eventually settling in a rented mansion in the Rancho Santa Fe suburb of San Diego and running a successful web design business. Heaven's Gate gained national attention on March 26, 1997, when Applewhite and 38 group members were found dead in their Rancho Santa Fe headquarters (California), having committed suicide successively in groups by drinking vodka laced with phenobarbital. Each member wore a sleeve patch reading "Heaven's Gate Away Team."

Applewhite viewed himself as the second incarnation of Jesus Christ, come again to complete the project that Jesus left unfinished. He believed that he had been incarnated alongside his Heavenly Father in the guise of Nettles. Applewhite and Nettles believed that the Earth was on the brink of being "recycled" (refreshed through destruction), and consequently, their mission was to prepare as many people as possible to transition from the "Human Level" to the "Next Level Beyond Human." They viewed this transition as a physical rather than a spiritual process, which would come to pass when followers completed the necessary training and boarded a flying saucer or spacecraft bound for the Next Level, where Heaven's Gate members would spend eternity assisting beings on other planets to navigate similar evolutionary stages. While at the outset Heaven's Gate was somewhat loosely organized, after 1975 it became progressively more routinized, for instance, under the rubric "The Process," which involved a broad and changing set of practices such as working in pairs to renounce the manifold human traits and social ties anchoring members to the Human Level. The overall push toward androgyny paired with the rejection of sexuality eventually led Applewhite and several male members to undergo surgical castration. Many scholars have linked this process with Applewhite's prior struggles with his own homosexuality.

In the early years of Heaven's Gate, Applewhite and Nettles claimed to be the "two witnesses" referred to in chapter 11 of the Book of Revelation, who are said to arrive just before the end of days, counsel humanity through the use of tremendous prophetic powers, and be killed violently. Applewhite and Nettles expected to follow this trajectory and viewed their upcoming violent end as effecting a return (via spaceship) to the Kingdom of Heaven, from whence they came. However, this trajectory was interrupted by Nettles's unexpected death from cancer in 1985, which altered Heaven's Gate theology—Applewhite claimed that Nettles had "transitioned," but that the two remained in contact. By most scholarly accounts, Nettles's death also served to accelerate existent Heaven's Gate tendencies toward insularity and world rejection. The group's eventual mass suicide, which members viewed as the natural shedding of fleshly containers en route to the Next Level Beyond Human, was inspired by the arrival of the Hale-Bopp comet in 1997 and by rumors, widely reported in the media, that a spacecraft-shaped object was traveling in its wake.

Scholars of new religions attempting to analyze the causal scenario of the Heaven's Gate suicides have found it to be a fairly problematic case. The dominant explanatory models of violence/suicide in new religions have focused largely on opposition from the outside as a trigger, for instance, on anticult persecution or governmental pressure. While such theories of extrinsic causation appear to fit some of the most prominent cases of violent or self-destructive new religions—such as the Branch Davidians, the Solar Temple, Aum Shinrikyô, and, perhaps most notably, Jonestown—research on Heaven's Gate is also driving theory involving internal or intrinsic causal factors.

Steven Barrie-Anthony

See also Aum Shinrikyô; New Religions; New Religions in the United States

Further Readings

Balch, R. W. (1995). Waiting for the ships: Disillusionment and revitalization of faith in Bo and Peep's UFO cult. In J. R. Lewis (Ed.), The gods have landed: New religions from other worlds. Albany: State University of New York Press.

- Hall, J. R., Schuyler, P. D., & Trinh, S. (2000). Apocalypse observed: Religious movements and violence in North America, Europe and Japan. London: Routledge.
- Lewis, J. R. (Ed.). (2010). Violence and new religious movements. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Zeller, B. E. (2006). Scaling Heaven's Gate: Individualism and salvation in a new religious movement. Nova Religio, 10(2), 75–102.

HEBREW

The ancient Hebrew language is enshrined in the Hebrew Bible, known to Christians as the Old Testament. Modern Hebrew is a member of the Semitic language family and is spoken by approximately 13 million people worldwide, with most speakers living in Israel, where it is one of the two official languages of the country (the other being Arabic). One of the world's oldest living languages, it is the only surviving member of the Canaanite language subfamily that emerged in the second millennium BCE. It is often referred to as Leshon (also spelled Lashon) HaKodesh, or "The Holy Language," as the Bible and other religious texts are written in its classical or biblical form.

Hebrew is believed to have developed as an independent language in the 12th century BCE, when it branched off Phoenician, another Canaanite language. The earliest written evidence of Hebrew as a distinctive language comes from the Gezer calendar, which dates back to the 10th century BCE, around the time of David and Solomon's rule over the kingdom of Israel. From this time until the sixth century BCE and the Babylonian exile of the Jewish people from Israel, Hebrew flourished as both a written and a spoken language. While in exile, the Jews living in Babylonia and the few Jews who remained in Israel began to use Aramaic, another Semitic language, as their spoken language. Despite this, however, Hebrew remained as the language of prayer and writing for the Jewish people. It was not until the beginning of the Zionist movement at the end of the 19th century and the efforts of Eliezer Ben-Yehuda that Hebrew was revived as a spoken language among the Jewish people.

Hebrew is written from right to left. Its modern alphabet, or alefbet as it is called in Hebrew, was developed in the third century BCE from the Aramaic script and contains 22 letters, 5 of which change form if found at the end of a word. It is, along with the sparsely spoken Yiddish, Ladino, and Judeo-Arabic, the only language that uses this alphabet today. As with most other ancient Semitic languages, the alphabet does not contain any vowels. In the eighth century CE, when Hebrew was already in decline as a spoken language, a system of vowels, called niqqud, was developed to make it easier to read and write in Hebrew. Niqqud comprises dots and dashes written above or below the Hebrew letters and is not normally needed by speakers to read and write the language, but it does aid nonnative speakers and children in learning the language and can usually be found in prayer books and scripture.

Modern Hebrew is regulated by the Academy of the Hebrew Language, which is largely concerned with coining Hebrew words for loanwords, mostly in the areas of science and technology. Since Hebrew is spoken almost exclusively in the state of Israel, which is geographically a rather small country, there are considered to be only two dialects in the language, Standard Hebrew and Oriental Hebrew. The two varieties are not regional dialects but rather a result of the different countries of origin of Israelis today, and they differ primarily in pronunciation. Oriental Hebrew is spoken by Israelis who immigrated to Israel from Arab countries, while Standard Hebrew, a more Europeanized version, is spoken by the Ashkenazi community. Increasingly, however, these differences in pronunciation are diminishing, and Standard Hebrew is becoming the dominant style spoken.

Zion Zohar

See also Bible; Israel; Jewish Diaspora; Yiddish

Further Readings

- Hebrew. (n.d.). In Omniglot: Writing systems and languages of the world. Retrieved May 3, 2011, from <http://www.omniglot.com/writing/hebrew.htm>
- Hebrew alphabet. (n.d.). In Judaism 101. Retrieved May 3, 2011, from <http://www.jewfaq.org/alephbet.htm>
- Hoffman, J. (2006). In the beginning: A short history of the Hebrew language. New York: New York University Press.

HELL

Hell is envisioned in many religions as a state of being in the afterlife, one that is characterized by pain, suffering, deprivation, and separation. In most cultures, it has been imagined to be underground. In ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia, people who angered the gods and violated the cosmic order were believed to be tortured in darkness by scorching fire, serpents, and devouring demons. In other mythologies, the underworld was considered less negative than neutral. In Greco-Roman religions, for example, Hades was a realm of flitting shades who regretted not being alive but did not otherwise suffer. Still, Plato and other philosophers argued that cosmic justice required a moral basis for the assignment of rewards and punishments in an afterlife, and in later Greco-Roman religion, Hades was partly replaced by Tartarus, in which the wicked suffered fiery pains.

In the early Hebrew view, the shadowy dead dwelt under the earth in Sheol. Israelites faithful to the covenant with God would prosper on earth, while God's enemies would be annihilated. From the sixth century BCE, Hebrew thought moved in the direction of resurrection and judgment at the end of time. The judgment separated the faithful from the sinners, and sinners were punished below in a fiery hell called Gehenna. By the last two centuries BCE in Israel, the moral view had triumphed over the neutral view, and hell became "a divinely sanctioned place of eternal torment for the wicked." The view that all Jews would be resurrected in Jerusalem at the end of time has prevailed among Talmudic scholars and Orthodox Jews.

Hebrew religion is essentially monotheistic—there is but one God—but in the period 200 BCE to 150 CE, the imagery of hell was influenced by dualistic views deriving in part from Zoroastrianism (Mazdaism) and in part from reactions to the repeated devastation of the Israelite homeland, especially Jerusalem. Zoroastrians believed that there was a dramatic cosmic struggle between an absolute good god and an absolute evil god. Each community and individual had to choose which of these two gods to follow. For the Zoroastrians, the dead had to cross a bridge to get into heaven, and the wicked were thrust from the bridge into a hell of scorching heat, freezing cold, filth, stench, disgusting food, and devouring demons.

By the second century BCE, the Hebrew concept of hell had become eternal: Once one cast one's lot with God's enemies, one became a slave of the darkness. Satan and his demons became prominent in this period, and to the fires and darkness of Gehenna were added numerous specific torments inflicted on the damned by the evil spirits: boiling pitch, lakes of sulfur, piercing irons, grilling, and flesh rending. This satisfies justice: The wicked may prosper in this life, but the faithful prosper eternally with joys forever denied to the wicked.

Christianity, which arose in the midst of a period of persecution of the Israelites, followed the Hebrew Bible closely while also being somewhat influenced by dualism. As heaven is the kingdom of God and his dwelling place, so hell is the kingdom and abode of Satan and his angels. Christians held that at the beginning of the cosmos, the angels were asked to make their eternal choice to be with God or not; those who chose not were hurled out of heaven into hell, where they remained forever, tormented themselves and tormentors of sinners. At the resurrection, the soul (the reunited body and spirit) will be judged. Despite the images of hellfire and brimstone, Christian hell is essentially the agony of eternal separation from the loving joy of God and the community of saints (those who are saved). Since heaven is eternal, so necessarily is hell: There is no way out. The spiritual fire is the realization by the damned that they are forever lost; it is accompanied by the subsidiary but real bodily fire: torture by the Devil and his angels, wailing and gnashing of teeth, the lake of fiery sulfur, the devouring worm or birds of prey. The intensity of the suffering varies according to the gravity of the sins: Dante saw various levels in hell down to the frozen, motionless center where Satan is embedded in eternal and unyielding ice.

Christians distinguish between the death of the body, in which body is separated from spirit, and the death of the soul, in which the whole sinner, body and spirit, is ruined. The way a human being shapes his or her character in this life determines his or her place eternally. In this life, the world is a mixture of good and evil, but God knows the difference, and in eternity, there are only the two kingdoms—that of God and that of Satan. One of the perennial questions of Christianity is the relative emphasis on predestination or free will. God is eternal, so He knows all times and all souls in eternity, so it seemed to some theologians that God must at least know (if not actually choose) who is damned. On the other hand, Christ died to free all from bondage to sin. A vast number of solutions have been proposed over time, with the most influential leaning toward free will. God does not, it is argued, force anyone to love.

Another question is the time of judgment and the state of the spirit after bodily death. Some hold that at the moment of death, each individual is judged immediately (the doctrine of particular judgment) and passes immediately to heaven or hell; when body and spirit are reunited at the resurrection, the last judgment confirms the particular judgment. Another view is that the spirit “sleeps” in an interim state until it is reunited with the body.

Theologians of the first millennium, recognizing that everyone is flawed, argued that a moment of cleansing and burning away of faults must occur before a person could be in the presence of God. By the 11th century, the idea of a time frame for this purgation, and by extension a place for it—Purgatory—became dominant: Those with greater flaws had to spend more time there than those with lesser faults. Purgatory is not, however, an extension of hell but rather an extension of heaven, for everyone in purgatory is being cleansed to stand perfected with God in heaven. One gets out of purgatory, whereas one never gets out of hell. In most modern Christian theology, hell is a state of being rather than a place in the universe; one does not “go to” hell but constructs hell for oneself.

Muslim hell resembles that of Judaism and Christianity: It is a place of eternal separation from God and the community and a place of bodily torments, including burning winds, boiling waters, thorns, smoking fire, and agonizing food and drink including melted copper. Islam, which asserts the choice and action of God in every event, leans heavily toward predestination or, more properly, the uncaused and unfathomable action of God in every (apparent) human choice.

The hells of Eastern religions bear a limited similarity to Western hell. In the pre-Hindu period of the Vedas in India (ca. 1500–800 BCE), proper ritual was necessary to attain happiness: Those who were buried without full and proper ritual were excluded from the orderly cosmic heaven of the god Varuṇa. Later, in the period of the Upanishads (ca. 800–350 BCE), hell became a function of moral failure. Like reincarnation, hell was a recurrent state as the soul worked its way toward moksha, which is release from samsara, the endless cycle of birth, death, and rebirth. For Buddhism, hells are temporary states on the way to liberation from the cycle of suffering, desiring, and ignorance. Liberation involves the dissolution of the “me” or “I,” so concentration on the self increases the length and degree of suffering in hell. The number of hells varies: Theravada Buddhism has eight hells beneath the earth, places of suffering for those with bad karma. The hell of Pure Land Buddhism resembles that of Western religions more than those of other Buddhists: It is a place of fiery torment. In neither Hinduism nor Buddhism is hell a permanent state of being.

In the contemporary emphasis in Western culture on the pleasures of this world, the idea of hell is unpopular, and it is avoided by preachers who want to reassure their congregations. Still, the majority of Americans believe in hell, and it is real for those who believe in God’s justice in separating the good from the evil. In most religious traditions around the world, there persists a notion of eternal damnation after death as well as an eternal state of happiness.

Jeffrey Burton Russell

See also Christianity; Death Ritual; Heaven; Hinduism; Islam; Judaism

Further Readings

- Bernstein, A. (1993). The formation of hell. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
 Russell, J. B. (1977). The devil. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
 Russell, J. B. (1988). The prince of darkness. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

HENOTHEISM

The word henotheism is formed from the Greek roots henos—meaning one—and theos—meaning

god—and refers to the choice that an individual or a group makes to worship a single god within the context of a society that believes in and accepts the existence of a pantheon of gods. Henotheism differs from monotheism, however, in that monotheism describes a system of belief in which there is only a single god. Henotheism, in contrast, describes the decision to worship one particular god to the exclusion of worshipping any other god or gods that are thought to be part of a pantheon. The concept of henotheism is thus relevant to both ancient religious traditions and the modern global religious landscape, as it particularly describes a system of religious beliefs wherein other gods are acknowledged as not only existing but also being worthy of worship. The term has been used to describe the religion of the ancient Egyptians as well as modern Hinduism in India. The term refers to this acknowledgment of the existence of other gods even while an individual chooses to follow and worship one god, perhaps because an individual feels that this particular god deserves to be worshipped more than the other gods, or by larger groups of people, because the god in question is tied to a local or national identity.

The concept has its origins in ancient Egypt and Hermeticism and can still be found today in modern Hinduism and Daoism. Henotheism is perhaps the best term for the religious choice of the historical figure of Abraham; it was only later in their history that the ancient Hebrews shifted their henotheistic worldview to a monolatrous worldview; monolatry acknowledges other gods who oppose or challenge the ascendancy of the one true God and therefore should not be worshipped in kind. (Monotheism for the Hebrews did not come until after the period of Babylonian captivity.) Henotheism likewise typified the religions of the ancient Greeks and Romans and was a common religious philosophy in the pre-Christian Roman Empire.

The term henotheism was created by F. Max Müller, who was attempting both to explain the characterizations of the gods in the Vedas and to criticize Western religious exceptionalism, which had long taken for granted that monotheism as a concept was so well defined as to obviate the need for any other explanation of expressions of belief beyond the dichotomy of monotheism and polytheism. Müller conceived of henotheism as the practice of monotheism within the context of a polytheistic society. In particular, he used the concept to illustrate the different conceptions of gods in the Vedas, who spring from the same Divine Power and are expressions of that power but who are not coeternal and who each have their own divine domain.

Catherine L. Newell

See also God; Goddess; Monotheism

Further Readings

- Kirsch, J. (2004). God against the gods: The history of the war between monotheism and polytheism. New York: Penguin Books.
- Meyers, M. W. (1995). Let the cow wander: Modeling the metaphors in Veda and Vedanta. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
- Muller, F. M. (2001). Introduction to the science of religion: Four lectures delivered at the Royal Institution in February and May, 1870. London: Longmans.

HERESY

The word heresy—deviation from orthodox beliefs—comes from the Greek αἵρεσις, and its original meaning was connected with seizing, as in, for instance, seizing or taking a city—it was used in this sense by the Greek historians Herodotus and Thucydides. Metaphorically, it came to mean choice or preference, implying one's taking of a philosophical, political, or religious position that was different or separate from another—we find the word used in this sense by the ancient philosophers and historians Diogenes Laertius and Josephus. It is important to notice that the word as it was used by those ancient authors had no pejorative connotation; those writers did not imply that the preference being accorded was to a worse or erroneous position, only to a different one. The pejorative sense of heresy began to appear once it was used in the context of revealed religions, when the belief in only one true religion made all the different opinions not simply different but wrong.

The concept of heresy as both a theological category and a political strategy has been most fully developed and systematized within Christianity. In the Muslim world, the idea of the heretic or infidel has been of great historical and religious significance, notably in the Sunni/Shi'a divide. The religions of East Asia, such as Buddhism and Hinduism, have historically been less concerned with orthodoxy; thus, the term heresy is not as useful in discussions of Eastern religions.

Heresy in Christianity

In the New Testament, the word is used with a pejorative connotation nine times: For example, the sects of the Pharisees and Sadducees are termed $\alpha\rho\epsilon\sigma\iota\varsigma$ (Acts 15:5 and 26:5, and Acts 5:17, respectively). In Acts 24:14, we find the term used once again in the context of the relationship between Christianity and Judaism—the Jews defines the Christian church as a heresy, and St. Paul rejects this definition by reiterating the “catholic” or universal character of Christianity.

The concept of heresy has always been crucial for any religion that was invested in creating a coherent doctrinal body by which it could define its own identity in opposition to other, different religious phenomena within its confessional boundaries and that could count on a relatively functional institutional system in charge of preserving the orthodoxy of that doctrinal body and eliminating the heretical component. The process of constructing the categories of heresy and heretics as a means to build, refine, and defend a religion's doctrinal identity is perhaps most visible in the history of the Christian religion. The dialectic between orthodoxy and heterodoxy was and, to a certain extent, still is pivotal in helping Christianity build its identity as the only true church and in conceptualizing its relationship to other religions. In this respect, it is significant that St. Paul, who was the first significant figure to understand the importance of constructing a Christian identity in opposition to Judaism, explained rather at length the meaning of heresy and its difference from schism: While the first was a permanent dissent, the second was only temporary (1 Corinthians 11:19).

After Paul, the concept of heresy, far from being marginalized, was further refined, adapted, and conceptualized. By studying the different theoretical and pragmatic approaches that the Christian church took to the issue of heresy, one can see a series of snapshots of the most relevant developments of Christianity. For example, the construction and application of the category of heresy was of central importance for the Christian church at the beginning of its existence, when it needed to separate itself from Eastern Christianity and ally itself with the Western Roman Empire, as we can see in the manner in which the Christian church dealt with the question of Arianism, a complex set of beliefs regarding the nature of the Son and His relationship with the Father, which was condemned as a heresy at the Council of Nicaea in 325 CE. Before the condemnation at Nicaea, Arianism represented the prevalent doctrine on the Trinity in the East, where Christian theologians, steeped in Greek philosophy, sought to rationalize the relationship between Father and Son by claiming that they were not “consubstantial” (of the same nature) but that the Son was either a figure of speech—in the most radical version of Arianism—or of a “lesser dignity” of the Father—in the more Western-oriented forms of this doctrine. What was at stake was the relationship between Christianity and Greek philosophy; a school of Christian thinkers in the East believed that Christian doctrine should validate and perfect, not contradict, philosophical truths and propositions. In contrast, for the Western Christian theologians, eager to stress the diversity of Christianity with respect to both Greek philosophy and Judaism, it was pivotal to insist on the mystery of the Trinity even at the expense of a more logical rationalization of the relation between Father and Son. Moreover, the Western Christian church saw the need for and the possible advantages of a closer alliance with the Western Roman Empire after decades of persecution—one should remember that the Emperor Constantine, who was present at the Council of Nicaea and approved of its deliberations, had granted freedom of worship to the Christian in 313, with the famous Edict of Milan, or Edict of Toleration. The result of such a complex situation was precisely the condemnation of Arius as a heretic and of Arianism—in certain extreme forms—as a heresy. To be sure, the theological definition of orthodoxy and, by consequence, of heresy, cannot be reduced to a series of political or intellectual needs, since theology is not simply a product of political or social pressures.

Nevertheless, theological definitions do not simply imply the adoption of a certain language or doctrines, but they represent a key element of the process of identity formation of a religion, and as such, many different factors contribute to their elaboration and adoption.

The theological definition, however, is only the initial moment of the process that involves the construction of the category of heresy and its application for the strengthening of the orthodox religion. After defining what a heretic is, the subsequent step is to find means to eliminate him or her in order to ensure the preservation of the orthodoxy of the whole body of believers. In other words, the definition of heresy and the persecution of heresy are two moments of the same process of identity formation. Once again the history of the Christian church provides an example of how such dynamics of “forming a persecuting society”—to borrow the title of Robert Ian Moore’s influential book on heresy in medieval Europe—worked, as it could count on a relatively efficient institutional support rather early in its history, for reasons that scholars are still debating. Indeed, phenomena such as the creation of the tribunal of the Inquisition and the large-scale persecution of Jews, Muslims, and heretics throughout medieval and early-modern Europe can be considered as important components of the process of doctrinal, intellectual, political, and territorial consolidation of Christianity in the Western world. The tribunal of the Inquisition started out as a group of individual inquisitors, traditionally Dominicans or Franciscans, assigned usually by the local bishops to cover specific territories where some heretical beliefs were suspected to have spread. After the Council of Trent (1545–1563), it became a highly centralized organization headed by a congregation whose leader was the pope.

Even in the case of the persecution of heresy, as in that of the definition of heresy, one must not think that this was the simple result of decisions made by ecclesiastical leaders to consolidate their power. Rather, one should see this phenomenon as the result of the interaction between numerous factors, including the emergence and consolidations of opinions that either radically challenge or partially deviate from a given set of doctrines considered by a religious institution to be a fundamental part of its core set of beliefs, the doctrinal and political need of the institution to define itself by identifying its enemies, and the existence of a series of institutional, structural, and logistical tools that allow the institution to eliminate the enemies once it identifies them.

Of course, Christianity is not the only religion for which the concept of heresy applies: Because of the intrinsic logic of the concept of heresy—a deviation from orthodoxy, that is, the right doctrine—every religion with a relatively coherent doctrinal body and with a relatively structured institutional apparatus in charge of reinforcing that doctrinal body presents heretical phenomena. For example, the sects of the Sadducees and the Pharisees within Judaism can be said to have had heretical elements in their doctrines, even if neither the Sadducees nor the Pharisees ever formed a separate community and hence neither of them can be properly called a heresy within Judaism.

Heresy in Islam

In the Islamic world, the presence of heresy, especially in its political rather than strictly theological sense, is highly significant. It manifested itself from the beginning of Islam and produced, together with many other divisions, that between Sunnī and Shi’ite, which is the source of a series of dramatic religious, political, and social conflicts around the world today. The split between Sunnīs and Shi’i took place in the seventh century, following the death of Muhammad. Shi’ites believed that the Prophet’s successor should have been Ali, a member of Muhammad’s family. Sunnīs, in contrast, contended that the elite of the Muslim community was in charge of selecting the most suitable candidate as Muhammad’s successor, regardless of family ties. The conflict between Sunnīs and Shi’i, then, was less a matter of theological differences and more a question regarding the political leadership of the Muslim community. Moreover, even though the conflict between Sunnīs and Shi’i was violent at the beginning, the Sunnī and Shi’ite communities coexisted peacefully until the 20th century, when the conflict started to be radicalized both in the local Middle Eastern political context and in the process of redefining the relationship between Islam and the West. A theological definition of heresy does not imply solely a decision over specific doctrinal matters; rather, it is the result of a complex interaction of different factors.

The Concept of Heresy in Eastern Religions

When we come to the Far East, the category of heresy does not apply to most of the religious phenomena we encounter, for two reasons. The first reason has to do with the theoretical limitations that the concept of heresy presents when we try to use it to describe different doctrinal patterns, such as that of Hinduism or Buddhism. In those religions, the relative elasticity of the complex of orthodox beliefs allowed and still allows for a greater range of theological and philosophical debates within a religious tradition than within, for instance, Christianity. This means that in both Hinduism and Buddhism, we can see the proliferation of many sects and doctrinal schools, often in contrast with each other and at times violently and dramatically, but never completely, separated from the main tradition.

The second reason the use of the term heresy for these religious phenomena is improper has to do with the practical aspects of those traditions, in a liturgical as well as in a geopolitical and historical sense. The historical developments of the areas where those traditions flourished allowed a degree of tolerance between different religious traditions that we rarely see in the West. An important example of this is that of China, where Daoism and Confucianism, albeit different in terms of doctrinal elements and often engaged polemically with each other, nevertheless coexisted rather peacefully for most of their histories. This does not mean that in China there were never cases of persecution for religious reasons, but such episodes of persecution cannot be described in terms of a coherent and systematic persecution of heresy.

Stefania Tutino

See also China; Christianity; Hindu Orthopraxy; Hinduism; Islam; Monotheism

Further Readings

- Ching, J. (1993). Chinese religions. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
 Davies, W. D., Finkelstein, L., Horbury, W., Sturdy, J., & Katz, S. T. (1994–2006). The Cambridge history of

- Judaism, 1994–2006* (4 vols.). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
 Evans, G. R. (2003). A brief history of heresy. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.
 Flodd, G. (1996). An introduction to Hinduism. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
 Holt, P. M., Lambton, A. K. S., & Lewis, B. (Eds.). (1977). The Cambridge history of Islam. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
 Mitchell, M. M., & Young, F. M. (Eds.). (2005–2007). The Cambridge history of Christianity (9 vols.). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
 Moore, R. I. (1987). The formation of a persecuting society: Power and deviance in Western Europe, 950–1250. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.
 Prebish, C., & Keown, D. (2006). Introducing Buddhism. New York: Routledge.
 Wiles, M. F. (1996). Archetypal heresy: Arianism through the centuries. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

HEZBOLLAH

Hezbollah (lit. “Party of God”), is a Shi’a Islamist group that emerged in Lebanon in 1982 and gained the status of a cohesive organization when it formally stated its goals in 1985. While U.S. and Israeli policymakers consider Hezbollah a terrorist organization, in Lebanon it is known not only for its political and militant activities but also for providing charitable social services and operating hospitals and schools.

Led since 1992 by Hasan Nasrallah, its secretary-general, Hezbollah’s spiritual leader is the Supreme Leader of Iran, previously Ayatullah Khomeini, and currently Ayatullah Khamenei. The organization has two parts: the first composed of those playing an official governing role and the second of Lebanese Shi’i who are loosely affiliated with Hezbollah and support its causes. A legitimate political party in Lebanon, Hezbollah has participated in the Lebanese political system since 1992.

The Shi’i are only one of several religious communities in Lebanon. As minorities, the Lebanese Shi’i have struggled for political representation. Globally, the dominant Sunnī Muslim community, disapproving of Shi’a Islam, has discriminated against Arab Shi'i, contributing to Arab Shi'a poverty and political marginalization.

Several events mobilized the Shi'i in Lebanon, leading to the creation of Hezbollah. In 1978, Lebanon's leading Shi'a cleric, Musa al-Sadr, who had demanded greater political rights for the Lebanese Shi'i, disappeared in Libya under suspicious circumstances. The primary locus of inspiration for Hezbollah's foundation was the 1978 to 1979 Iranian Revolution, which inspired Shi'i everywhere to struggle against imperialism and oppression. Other factors include the 1982 Israeli invasion and occupation of southern Lebanon, in which thousands of Lebanese civilians were killed as a result of bombing raids.

Hezbollah's primary goal was to actively resist Israel's occupation of southern Lebanon, which ended in 2000. This group also opposes Israel's occupation of what it believes to be Palestinian territory. Hezbollah's primary enemies are the United States and Israel, which are believed by Hezbollah to have caused suffering to the Shi'i, the Palestinian people, and the broader Muslim community.

Hezbollah's violent tactics have divided (and at times polarized) Muslims as well as non-Muslims, provoking both support and condemnation. In the foundational period of Shi'a sacred history, key Shi'a leaders fought against Sunnī enemies and suffered a martyr's death. This collective Shi'a memory of struggle and martyrdom likely contributes to Hezbollah's insistence on active resistance, including its willingness to sponsor suicide missions.

In 1983, Hezbollah bombed the U.S. Embassy in Beirut, killing 63 people. That year, they also attacked U.S. Marine barracks in Beirut with truck bombs, killing more than 200 U.S. servicemen, and in another assault, 58 French paratroopers were killed. In 1985, they hijacked a TWA (Trans World Airlines) flight. Hezbollah has carried out many attacks against Israeli occupying forces, playing a part in Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon. In the summer of 2006, Hezbollah captured two Israeli soldiers, triggering a 34-day war between Lebanon and Israel, leaving more than 100 Israelis and more than 1,000 Lebanese dead.

Sophia Pandya

See also Islamism (Political Islam); Lebanon; Politics and Religion; Shi'a Islam; Terrorism

Further Readings

- Jaber, H. (1997). Hezbollah: Born with a vengeance. New York: Columbia University Press.
 Norton, A. R. (2007). Hezbollah: A short history. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

HIJAB

Hijab, within contemporary discourse, refers broadly to modest Islamic clothing and more particularly to the head-covering practice of Muslim women. Although there are a variety of styles of Islamic headscarves or veils, hijab most often refers to the style consisting of a cloth wrapped around the head and neck, covering the hair, neck, and ears but leaving the face visible. The use of the hijab has been on the rise since the 1970s and is an important expression of modesty and faith for many Muslims worldwide.

In Arabic, hijab literally means partition, curtain, or barrier. Traditionally, the word was used to denote the illusory nature of the world, where creation is "veiled" from God, or in reference to the physical partition that divided the public from the Prophet Muhammad's wives, allowing them greater privacy from Muhammad's many visitors. Thus, hijab retains the meaning of barrier in both usages, whether in the metaphysical or literal sense. The word khimar, rather than hijab, is used in the Qur'an to signify the headscarf. However, the etymology and meaning of hijab expanded in Islamic scholarship to include the concepts of modesty and morality manifested in particular styles of religious clothing, including various types of head coverings.

The importance of modesty is clear in the Qur'an, although the requirement of veiling is contested. The surha (chapter) often referenced in regard to the issue of veiling is the Surat an-Nur (Q 24:30–31), which calls on believing women to lower their gaze, guard their modesty, and draw their khimar over their bosoms in order to dissuade excessive displays of their beauty. The practice of veiling was common in the Near East and predates the revelation of this sura. It is unclear whether the Surat an-Nur should be understood as a call for obligatory observance of the hijab or whether it is referencing common social practices of the time to elaborate on the importance of modest social interactions.

The practice of veiling has taken on political importance in the modern era. The use of the hijab and what it represents has been highly debated. While some believe that it is a marker of cultural identity or religious adherence, a tool used to create and reinforce particular religious dispositions, or an act of religious freedom, others decry it as a patriarchal practice that discriminates against and subjugates women and as a sign of antimodern sentiments. Many countries have passed laws on the use of the hijab. For example, France, Turkey, and Tunisia have placed restrictions on the use of Islamic veiling in public, whereas head covering in public is mandatory in Iran. The public approaches to the Islamic veil can also be of political importance, especially when these interactions are in opposition to the social norm or governmental prescription. In Egypt, for example, the rise of the hijab on college campuses in the 1970s suggested discontent among Egyptian youth with respect to the overtly secular government and Western styles of dress in urban areas of the country. In contrast to Egypt, many women choosing to wear hijab in the United States argue that such a choice should be viewed along the lines of freedom of speech and religious pluralism promoted by the U.S. government. The complexity and diversity of the current hijab debate thus suggests that the practice must be understood in the particular location in which it occurs, with reference to the religious understanding it adheres to and the political and social environments that have produced the controversy.

Kendra Sarna

See also Burka; Gender; Iran; Islam; Islamism (Political Islam); Women's Roles

Further Readings

- Ahmed, L. (1992). Women and gender in Islam: Historical roots of a modern debate. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- El Guindi, F. (1999). Veil: Modesty, privacy, resistance. New York: Berg.
- Mahmood, S. (2005). Politics of piety: The Islamic revival and the feminist subject. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

- Mernissi, F. (1991). The veil and the male elite: A feminist interpretation of women's rights in Islam. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley.

HINDU LAW

In the Hindu cultural tradition, stretching over more than three millennia, dharma is the concept that is generally considered synonymous with law. Dharma is also more broadly and importantly rendered as moral obligation or righteousness, and more loosely as religion. As the moral foundation of the social order, dharma is an aspect of cosmological stability (rita), which in turn is comparable with natural law.

Traditionally, it was the king's duty (raja-dharma) to uphold the prevailing laws, to command, to protect, and, when necessary, to administer punishment (danda) for violations of established norms. The king had no legislative powers; his commands were divine commandments. He was guided by his advisers, who were Brahmans well versed in the laws available in the textual tradition comprising mainly the Dharma Sutras and the Dharma Shastras. The latter texts draw on the Vedas and ancient law books for appropriate behavior for each varna (social category) and for each stage of life (ashrama). They also provide guidance to "universal" laws (sādhārana dharma) that are binding on one and all. The most famous of the Dharma Shastra texts is the law book of Manu, Manusmriti (composed around the beginning of the Common Era).

The classical tradition of laws encountered a major challenge with the emergence of Muslim kingship in the subcontinent in the eighth century. Notwithstanding the pressure exerted on them by their advisers to apply Islamic laws to their non-Muslim subjects, Muslim kings generally refrained from doing so in civil matters. Various restrictions on the practice of their religion and nontraditional obligations toward the state (e.g., the payment of taxes, including the jizya in return for protection and exemption from military service) were, however, laid on them as the laws of the state.

Two hundred years of British rule (ending in 1947) saw significant developments in the scope and character of the laws under which the expanding category of Indian subjects were governed. To begin with, serious but misconceived attempts were made to codify Hindu (and Muslim) personal laws by disregarding a vast body of relatively fluid customary laws and going back to the Dharma Shastras, so that disputes pertaining to caste, family, property, and other civil and religious matters could be settled according to traditional norms. After 1858, when the British Crown assumed direct responsibility for governance in the subcontinent, the jurisdiction of traditional courts was rapidly narrowed, and a body of uniformly applicable commercial, criminal, and procedural laws was codified and applied. Personal laws were, however, left largely untouched.

Soon after independence, a series of enactments radically altered Hindu personal laws by discarding the shastric framework. Caste (varna, jati), sectarian, and regional distinctions were abolished; dissolution of marriage was permitted; and women (wives, widows, daughters) were granted rights of inheritance. Although much altered, the Hindu undivided family and its tax privileges remain intact. Local customs also are allowed some scope in contentious situations. A common personal law now prevails among all Hindus.

T. N. Madan

See also Hinduism; Politics and Religion; Religion and State

Further Readings

- Derrett, J. D. M. (1963). Introduction to modern Hindu law. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Gallanter, M. (1989). Law and society in modern India. New Delhi, India: Oxford University Press.
- Kane, P. V. (1930–1962). History of Dharmasāstra. Pune, India: Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute.
- Lingat, R. (1973). The classical law of India. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Manu. (2004). The law code of Manu (P. Olivelle, Trans.). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

HINDU NATIONALISM

Hindu nationalism is the notion that politics should be organized in accordance to Hindu doctrines and practices, including but not limited to the desire for a political state, specifically India, based on Hinduism.

The impulse for Hindu nationalism began as a response to British colonialism in the 19th century. As Western culture materialized in India, Hindus sought to affirm their identity as a religious and ethnic group. Many Hindus turned to religious revivals to “purify” Hinduism as a religion and India as a nation from perceived Western corruption. Hindu religious revivals were connected to regional and national pride as well as religious conviction. As a result of these revivals, Hindu nationalism emerged as a movement interested in ending foreign rule, reviving Hindu religious practice, and asserting a unified religious and political identity based on a shared Hindu heritage.

One of the most significant expressions of Hindu nationalism came from V. D. Savarkar’s 1924 book Essentials of Hindutva. Considering Hindutva as distinct from Hinduism, Savarkar defined a Hindu as one who considered India “Father and Holy land.” This definition included individuals who practiced religions other than Hinduism, notably Buddhism, Sikhism, and Jainism. As long as a religion’s origins began in the same geographical region as Hinduism, it too could be considered “Hindu.” Savarkar purposefully drew boundaries between those who “belonged to” India and those who did not. In their most militant interpretations, Hindu nationalists, with ideological roots in Savarkar’s work, believe that Christians and Muslims, whose holy lands are in the Middle East, are intruders who do not belong in India and cannot be fully loyal to it. Furthermore, individuals with “Hindu blood,” according to Savarkar, are superior to those lacking Hindu blood. This Hindu race and its common culture found in Hinduism amounted to a distinct Hindu civilization for Savarkar and his followers.

The organization that best represents the ideologies expressed by Hindu nationalists is the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), or National Volunteer Corps, founded in 1925. The RSS advocated a Hindu-centric Indian identity. For the RSS, India was a Hindu country with a shared religion, language, and ethnicity. This ideology was often expressed in the expression “Hindu, Hindi, Hindustan.” RSS, and Hindu nationalism more generally, emerged parallel to secular Indian nationalism and Mahatma Gandhi's Congress Party. The Congress Party, unlike the RSS, advocated a universal Pan-Indian identity and secular government. Hindu nationalists at the beginning of the 20th century framed their identity and ideology in opposition to the Congress Party in general and Gandhi in particular as they campaigned for a Hindu-based Indian identity and government. In 1936, Laxmi Kelkar established the women's auxiliary organization to RSS, the Rashtra Sevika Samiti. Rather than advocate for women's rights, this organization focused on sustaining women's devotion to their families and the greater Hindu family. Samiti members emphasized the importance of women personally sacrificing for Hindu civilization as a fulfillment of their national duty, ethnic heritage, and spiritual role.

After Indian independence in 1947, the RSS formed political organizations including the Bharatiya Jana Sangh (BJS) and the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP). Since the formation of the BJS and VHP, RSS-inspired political and social organizations continue to emerge on both local and national levels. The proliferation of these organizations has produced a multitude of Hindu nationalist ideologies inspired by, though not necessarily completely based on, Hindutva.

Cara Burnidge

See also Gandhi, Mohandas; India; Politics and Religion; Postcolonialism; Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh; Reform Hinduism; Religion and State; Religious Nationalism

Further Readings

- Bhatt, C. (2001). Hindu nationalism: Origins, ideologies, and modern myths. New York: Berg.
- Van der Veer, P. (1995). Religious nationalism: Hindus and Muslims in India. Berkeley: University of California Press.

HINDU ORTHOPRAXY

Orthopraxy, a term derived from Greek meaning "correct action/activity," is descriptive of religions that emphasize conduct, both ethical and liturgical,

as opposed to faith or grace. Hinduism is characterized more by what people do than by what they believe and is, therefore, often described as a way of life rather than a cosmology or theology. What people do is highly context specific, depending on who the actor is and in what place and time he or she is placed. Is the actor a man or woman, an adult or a child, a member of an upper or a lower caste? Is the actor at home, in a temple, or at a place of pilgrimage? Is it dawn or dusk, day or night, a normal time or an abnormal time (e.g., periods of personal ritual impurity or natural calamities)? Thus, an upper-caste woman may not cook or perform rituals during her menstruation, dietary restrictions are less stringent in the case of lower-caste people and during an acute famine, and the norms of righteous behavior are not the same for a child and an adult, a householder and a renouncer.

The religious life of Hindus involves the performance of life cycle rituals (samskara) and acts of piety. Important domestic rituals are centered on birth, initiation into adulthood, marriage, and death. These critical events are steps in a continuous process of the maturation of the body from a brute to a refined moral state. Both birth and death cause temporary pollution, and rites are performed for the restoration of normalcy. Initiations and marriages are highly auspicious events. Eventually, most Hindus cremate the dead body, and some consider this ritual (anteshti) a sacrificial offering to gods. The performance of domestic rituals requires the guidance of ritual specialists, the most notable among whom are Brahman priests, who offer their services to all upper-caste (or clean) families on a hereditary basis. Lower-caste people have their own ritual specialists.

Acts of piety have a wide range and may be exclusively personal or performed together with others, who may or may not be related to the performer by bonds of kinship. Periodic food offerings to one's ancestors (sraddha) are a common act of piety among upper-caste people. The most common expression of religious devotion is the puja, the ritual adoration of an idol or an anthropomorphic image of a god or goddess. A puja may be held at home, in a temple, or at a place of pilgrimage. Objects of nature, such as mountains, rivers, trees, animals, and the planets, among whom the sun is included, are also worshipped.

Throughout the history of Hinduism, temples and pilgrimages (yātra) have occupied a prominent place. Temples generally are exclusively sectarian and the “abode” of a Hindu god or goddess. Traditionally, lower-caste people were denied entry into upper-caste temples. One of the main planks of Mohandas K. (Mahatma) Gandhi’s campaign for religious reform was the throwing open of all Hindu temples. Pilgrimages to holy places have, however, always attracted Hindus of all castes from far and near. Thus, large numbers of Hindus gather periodically at the confluence of holy rivers at Haridwar, Nashik, Prayag, and Ujjain to celebrate the Kumbha Mela. While the great places of pilgrimage of course remain in India, Hindu temples, puja, and bhakti (deep personal devotion to a chosen deity or a holy person) have traveled with Hindu migrants to the far corners of the world.

T. N. Madan

See also Heresy; Hindu Law; Hinduism

Further Readings

- Bhardwaj, S. M. (1973). Hindu places of pilgrimage in India. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Dubois, J. A. (1959). Hindu manners, customs and ceremonies. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Eck, D. (1983). Benaras: City of light. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Fuller, C. J. (1992). The camphor flame. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Pandey, R. B. (1969). Hindu samskaras. Delhi, India: Motilal Banarasidass.

HINDU TRADITIONS IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

See Southeast Asia

HINDUISM

Hindus are today found virtually all over the world, as natives, as descendants of earlier migrants, or as relatively recent arrivals. South Asia is, however, where most Hindus have always lived, where their old and new sacred centers are located, and from where they have migrated elsewhere, carrying with them significant elements of their cultural heritage (including religion and languages). With an estimated population of more than 885 million (13% of the human mass), Hindus as the followers of a world religion occupy the third place, behind Christians and Muslims. Table 1 presents the 2010 estimates for 12 countries with a sizable number of Hindus.

It may be additionally noted here that, according to the U.S. Census Bureau data for 2007, there were 2.57 million Indians counted; it is reasonable to presume that the great majority of them, perhaps well over 1 million, are Hindus. Pakistan, all but 5% of whose population of 175 million consists of Muslims, would be another country with more than 1 million Hindus.

Table 1 Countrywise Distribution of Hindus: Total Number and Share of Total Population

Country	Hindus	Share of Hindus in Total Population (%)
India	895,688,213	80.5
Nepal	23,022,208	80.6
Bangladesh	14,980,881	9.6
Indonesia	4,324,887	1.8
Sri Lanka	1,620,604	7.6
Malaysia	1,620,015	6.3
Mauritius	616,447	48.0
United Kingdom	611,132	1.0
Trinidad and Tobago	276,739	22.5
Fiji	263,577	27.9
Guyana	206,166	28.4
Suriname	131,867	27.4

Source: CIA, The World Factbook (accessed September 14, 2010, <https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook>), which provides countrywise data on total population and the share of various religious groups in it. The number of Hindus in each country has been calculated from these data.

The character and antiquity of Hinduism have been subjects of scholarly debate, particularly in the recent past. It has been argued that Hinduism is not a religion in the sense in which Christianity or Islam is so. It does not have a founder, a revealed book, or a set of fundamentals of belief and practice. Given its subcontinental spread and the presence of regional, cultural, and linguistic diversities, people who are called Hindus by others, and who identify themselves as such in everyday life and at decennial census enumerations, usually display much diversity along regional, caste, and sectarian lines in matters of religious faith and practice. Hinduism is therefore more a family of religions rather than a single, homogeneous faith. The presence of common elements cannot, however, be denied.

Definitional features of particular religions (e.g., Christianity and Islam) should not, of course, set limits but may provide cues to what may be deemed to be the religious life of Hindus. Moreover, Hindu sects usually have the aforementioned characteristics of the Abrahamic religions. Actually, the Vedas too are regarded as revealed scripture by textual pundits, but the Brahmanical notion of revelation is different in the sense that “knowledge” (vidyā) is believed to have been recovered spiritually by the ancient sages rather than received externally by them through a messenger. More important, perhaps, is the fact that today Hindus generally have little acquaintance with the Vedas. If one were to abandon the narrow approach and adopt a more general criterion, such as the notion of the “sacred” or the “holy,” Hinduism is as much a religion as any other.

The internal plurality of Hinduism was conceptualized by the sociologist M. N. Srinivas in a three-tier model comprising local, regional, and all-India or Sanskritic Hinduism. The diversities are most prominent if one focuses on the local level, and the common elements, at the subcontinental level. Enough historical evidence is available about the upward and downward passage of elements of belief and practice to constitute a single but heterogeneous Hinduism.

Besides its character, there is also the question of the historicity of Hinduism. The terms themselves—Hinduism, Hinduismus, hindouisme, induismo, and so on—were coined by Westerners (missionaries, Orientalists) in the late 18th and 19th centuries. It does not follow, however, that the phenomenon that the term designates did not exist earlier. It is more accurate to recognize Hinduism as an evolving set of beliefs and practices going back to the religion of the Vedas (ca. 1500 BCE onward) and beginning to take a form that is today familiar as the Puranas (mythological tales and legends constructed around the theologies of the divinities Shiva, Vishnu, and Devi) came to be composed (300–600 CE). At the beginning of the 11th century, the Persian traveler-scholar al-Béruni observed that Hindus differed fundamentally from Muslims and Buddhists in matters of religion. Regional folklore and literatures throughout the medieval period also contain numerous references to Hindus and Muslims as religious categories.

By the early 19th century, educated Indians also had begun to use the term Hinduism alongside Hindu Dharma. During the struggle for the overthrow of colonial rule, religious identities (Hindu, Sikh, Muslim) were exploited for purposes of political mobilization. It was in this context that the term Hindutva (“Hindu-ness”) emerged to project Hindu claims of historical antiquity and cultural primacy. It was not a religious movement. Throughout the 19th and 20th centuries, however, Hinduism came in for many reformulations at the hands of social reformers, political leaders, and religious thinkers, attesting to its characteristically dynamic character. The migration of indentured labor, mostly Hindus, to various parts of the world under the auspices of colonialism gave Hinduism a global presence. The fascination in the West for the supposed emancipatory potential of devotional Hinduism during the heyday of the counterculture movement of the 1960s and the arrival there of significant numbers of educated Indians for work opportunities during the closing years of the 20th century gave a further fillip to this process.

Beliefs, Thought, and Practice

Beliefs and Rites

The beliefs that characterize Hinduism range from those that have implications for everyday life (practical religion) to those that constitute abstract metaphysics. We will first focus on the former. Thus, there is the fundamental notion that individual and collective life must be grounded in the twin notions of righteousness and moral duty. The term dharma describes both and is generally employed in modern writings to also stand for the notion of religion. Hinduism is Hindu Dharma. The individual is wholly embedded in the collectivity, which is part and parcel of the cosmic order (rita). The latter admits of no arbitrariness and is akin to the notion of natural law.

Dharma literally means that complex of values and relations that sustains or upholds the social order or, in other words, produces and maintains social coherence. It is not all that different from the Latin religio for “obligation,” which is regarded by many modern scholars as the root of the word religion. Dharma is the foundational value orientation, and dharmic action is the primary goal of individual and social pursuits. The pursuit of dharma is an exercise in moral refinement, and as such, it is a this-worldly ethic.

Concretely, it entails in the case of the young the pursuit of knowledge (the study of scriptures and other forms of knowledge) and the acquisition of practical skills, which become the means of livelihood. Encompassed by dharma, then, is artha, or the rational pursuit in adult life of economic and political goals, and encompassed by both dharma and artha is the pursuit of pleasures, or kaāma. Dharma, artha, and kaāma constitute a hierarchy of values as well as of goal-oriented activities (purushārtha). A fourth goal is often added to these three, namely, moksha, or release from worldly existence, through spiritual endeavor that may include renunciation.

According to traditional sources, humanity shares physical needs with animals, but its defining quality is the capacity for dharma. There is a universally shared substratum of dharmic obligations (sarva sādharan dharma); there is considerable variation from person to person according to his or her stage of life (or ashrama, of which four are recognized, viz., brahmacharya, studentship; grihasthya, householdership; vanaprastha, retirement; and sannyasa, renunciation) and social status, most broadly defined in terms of one’s varna (Brahman, Kshatriya, Vaishya, Shudra). The compound term varna-ashrama-dharma captures this context sensitivity. Thus, the king’s dharma (rāja dharma) is to ensure that all his subjects are able to follow their traditional dharmas. Hindu society comprises numerous castes (jati), which are ranked according to the varna scheme. General and specific obligations may be relaxed, however, in times of acute stress: For example, dietary taboos may not be enforced during a famine or epidemic. The fourth stage of life, renunciation, which entails withdrawal from social life, is governed by its own dharma or code of conduct.

Dharma is the value base for the performance of purposive actions (karma). In its most general connotation, karma is any action, but specifically it refers to the performance of life cycle rituals (karma kānda). Such rituals are many in number, beginning with those relating to conception and including birth, initiation (in the case of clean caste boys), marriage, and death rites. Postmortem food offerings (shraddha) are an important component of Hindu piety. The performance of these rituals is usually carried out under the supervision of Brahman priests, but lower-caste people who may not be served by them employ their own ritual specialists.

Related to the notion of karma as dharmic action is the idea of the fruits of action (karma phala). Inherent in the concept of karma, and of the actor as a moral agent, is the expectation that, besides its worldly consequences, every action carries a positive or negative moral load. It is one’s unalterable fate that the consequences of this accumulation (sanchit karma) must be enjoyed or suffered. It is rarely possible to fully discharge the obligation in one biological lifetime; one may have to be reborn to carry on this work, hence the notion of the endless cycle of birth, death, and rebirth, or transmigration of the soul (samsara). It is an ideal to obtain release (moksha) from this chain through spiritual endeavor, but this ultimately depends on divine grace (anugraha).

In an elaborate or simplified form, knowledge about the interrelated notions of dharma, karma, and samsara is widely distributed among Hindus generally. Indeed, these ideas find expression in all Indic religions. Foreigners also have noticed their prevalence. Al-Béruni (already quoted above) characterized the religion of the Hindus in terms of, among other features, belief in the divinity, soul, samsara or metempsychosis, and moksha. Some scholars of Indic religions have noted that the notion of karma is the closest that Hinduism comes to having a doctrinal foundation; indeed, karma and samsara have been said to together constitute the most complete theodicy in the history of religion.

The religious life of the Hindus is dominated by the performance of life cycle rituals but is not exhausted by it. Like the followers of any other faith, they also accord great importance to piety in the hope of receiving divine benediction. While philosophical (Upanishadic) Hinduism is constructed round the abstract notion of an indefinable transcendental reality (Brahman), which is the essence of every individual's inner self (atman), in the lives of people generally, a loving and forgiving god or goddess, if approached with true devotion, is expected to be the redeemer. In view of the multiplicity of divine beings in Hinduism, a devotee can choose his or her favorite deity (ishta deva/devī). Vishnu in his 9 (or 10) avatars, notably as Rama and Krishna the heroes of the epic Ramayana (composed in many languages over the centuries) and the Bhāgavata Purāna (ca. 10th–11th centuries), respectively; Shiva; and Devi (again in many incarnations, as Durga in West Bengal, Meenakshi in Tamil Nadu, and Sharika in Kashmir) are the most widely adored deities.

The most commonly observed form of Hindu worship is the puja. It may be offered at home or in a temple. The object of adoration is an idol or anthropomorphic image (mūrti), or set of images, representing a deity or deities. The image is “brought to life” by appropriate mantras and treated like a special guest—bathed, perfumed, fed, entertained, and put to bed. The key idea is darshan, seeing and being seen by the deity. Devotees who do not favor image worship read the scriptures (the Bhagavad Gita, ca. 200 BCE, is a favorite text) or engage in the silent repetition of mantras (japa). Fasting as an act of piety or in expectation of boons is also common. All these are, of course, activities for the individual.

Congregational worship is less common. The most common types are pilgrimages to holy places (tīrtha yātrā), such as the confluence of Ganga, Yamuna, and the unseen Sarasvati at Prayag, and sound and light rituals called ārti, which may be held in a temple or any holy place. Devotees chant sacred verses, offer flowers, wave ghee lamps, blow into conch shells, and beat drums, usually at nightfall.

Trans-regional pilgrimages have, for more than a millennium (if not longer), played a crucial part in producing a sense of common religious identity among Hindus of all castes and communities. While pilgrims are on the move everywhere and all the time, some destinations and certain auspicious occasions have special sanctity attached to them; going there, particularly on a very auspicious occasion, is therefore considered particularly meritorious. Beside Hardwar and Prayag in North India, Ujjain in central India and Nashik in the west also may be mentioned. All four are sacred places where rivers meet and where the periodic (astrologically determined) Kumbha Mela (special bathing festival) takes place, when ritual impurities and moral infirmities can be washed away.

Astrology plays a significant part in the religious life of the Hindus, particularly those belonging to the higher castes. The notion of ritual purity, a crucial element in the determination of status within the caste system, is supplemented by the concept of auspiciousness, which primarily is a quality of temporal events. Although a birth in the family causes ritual impurity, it is an auspicious event; a death too results in ritual impurity and is considered inauspicious; marriages are both pure and auspicious. Auspicious timings for important events (e.g., marriage) are determined by consulting an astrologer or an almanac. Astrologers also devise protective or curative rituals to ward off the evil influence of planetary movements on an individual's well-being.

Astrology and Ayurveda, or traditional Hindu (humoral) medicine, are mutually complementary bodies of sacred knowledge and practice. Their reach is generally confined to upper-caste people, who are served by Brahman priests. Lower-caste people have their own ritual specialists with distinctive methods of divination and the control of disease and misfortune. Expectedly, Brahmans look down on these specialists and their practices, but an outside observer would not find them all that different in their approach to situation management.

Systems of Thought

The highest forms of Brahmanical knowledge include grammar, logic, and metaphysics. Traditionally, six systems of philosophy (darshana) have been recognized, and they are concerned with ontological and epistemological questions. While the Sāmkhya is considered the foundational system—it posits a dualism between matter (prakṛiti) and the self (puruṣha)—it is Vedānta, the monist system, that is the best known. The Vedic corpus contains theological affirmations, ritual procedures, and philosophical speculations. The latter were elaborated and formalized in the body of texts known as the Upanishads (secret knowledge). The Vedānta is a body of commentarial texts within the Vaiṣṇava tradition of the Upanishads, the Bhagavad Gita, and the Brahma Sūtra (a theological work concerned with the nature of Brahman, or the Absolute).

Internally diverse, Vedānta philosophy-theology comprises the Advaita (nondualist), Vishishtadvaita (qualified nondualistic), and Dvaita (dualist) traditions. Shankara (ca. 788–820 CE), the principal proponent of Advaita, is generally considered the most outstanding Indian philosopher ever. He asserted the ontological identity of the self (atman) and the Brahman, dismissing their separation as illusion (māya). It is the qualified dualism of Ramanuja (ca. 1017–1137 CE), however, which has been more influential among Hindus generally: His theology valorized the ideas of bhakti and divine grace.

Although Hinduism does not have an externally revealed scripture, from the time of Shankara, the Bhagavad Gita (“The Lord’s Song”) has enjoyed the status of the key text. Placed in the Mahābhārata, it is a discourse on the nature of dharma, karma, and moksha and on the importance of true knowledge, which alone can end ignorance and illusion. The moral agent’s true self (atman) is said to be imperishable: This and the obligation to perform the duties required by one’s true nature (svabhāva), socially manifested through the varṇa scheme, without concern for the consequences, are presented as an ethic of responsibility. True knowledge (dhyāna), appropriate conduct (svadharma), and ultimately divine grace received by embracing the path of devotion (bhakti) together constitute the Gita’s theory of action.

Although located within the Vaiṣṇava tradition—the teacher (guru) of the doctrine is Krishna, an avatar of Vishnu—the Gita has been honored by all Brahmanical traditions. Not only Shankara, Ramanuja, and the dualist Madhava (12th to 13th centuries), all from South India, but also the outstanding Shaiva philosopher Abhinavagupta (ca.

960–1050 CE) of Kashmir wrote commentaries on it. In the 20th century, spiritualists like Sri Aurobindo, popular teachers like Swami Prabhupada, founder of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON; see below), and political leaders such as Mahatma Gandhi have offered their interpretations of the text. Gandhi acknowledged it as a source of enlightenment and comfort and read it as a discourse on the values of detachment and nonviolence or compassion in the discharge of one’s duties.

Medieval and Modern Developments

In the absence of a founder, a single foundational text, a minimal set of fundamentals, and a church-like organization, Hinduism as a body of belief, thought, and practice has been singularly nondoctrinaire and open. It has a history. The sources of its dynamics have been internal and external. Hinduism has grown through a ceaseless intercourse between regional Brahmanical traditions and local traditions. It even borrowed from Buddhism and Jainism, which grew out of and in significant respects in opposition to it. Historians have noted both the absorptive capacities of Hinduism and its syncretistic tendencies.

The foregoing characteristics of Hinduism are perhaps best illustrated by the ideals of bhakti or religious devotion. Some of the earliest Vedic hymns of praise or solicitation, addressed to the powers of nature anthropomorphized as gods, may well be considered the seeds of this perennial spirituality. These seeds germinated in the soil of Tamil Nadu, India, nearly 2,000 years ago, spread elsewhere, and enlivened both Vaiṣṇava and Shaiva traditions. Bhakti has produced some of the world’s most ecstatic religious poetry, with the human longing for union with the divine as its core theme. It considers all devotees equally worthy, irrespective of caste and gender. By medieval times, bhakti had become a subcontinental phenomenon, which had been enriched by the encounter with Sufi Islam. New sects that maintained an ambiguous relationship with Hinduism (e.g., the Kabir Panth) emerged. A syncretic sant (“seeker of truth”) tradition also took shape in North India between the 15th and 17th centuries, which derived its constitutive elements of faith and practice from Vaiṣṇava bhakti, Sufi Islam, and a yoga cult.

Indeed, a new religion was born in this setting of immense religious fervor. Nanak Dev (1469–1539 CE), an educated Punjabi Hindu of Khatri caste, who was familiar but largely dissatisfied with both Hinduism and Islam as practiced in his time, laid the foundations of a new religious tradition, which his followers called the Nanak Panth and is now known as Sikhism (from the word sikha, disciple). While the four major Indic religions—Hinduism, Buddhism, Jainism, and Sikhism—clearly are distinct from one another, they share some key ideas, such as dharma and karma, and practices, notably pilgrimage to holy places.

Modern developments in Hinduism had their origins in the impact throughout the 19th century of Western scholarship, political ideas, and Christianity. The emergence of interest in Sanskrit language and literature and Hindu philosophy followed the establishment of the colonial administration and went hand in hand with proselytization by Christian missionaries. Early appreciation of the benefits of British rule and admiration for certain aspects of the Christian faith gradually gave way to religious reform and revivalism and nationalist stirrings among educated Hindus.

The founding of the Arya Samaj by Dayananda Sarasvati (1824–1883) in western India and its successes in northern India represented the revivalist-reformist response to the challenge of the West; the projection of Vedantic Hinduism as the religion of humanity by Swami Vivekananda (1870–1902) was a modernist response. Confronted in Punjab with a situation in which missionary activity had the tacit support of the colonial administration, Dayananda adopted a two-pronged strategy. First, he called on Hindus to return to the “true” Vedic religion and to abandon later mythology and ritualism; second, he introduced the procedure for reconversion through a ritual of purification. Adopting a stance of total intolerance toward Islam and Christianity, he stressed the importance of solidarity among the followers of the Vedic religion, whom he called the Aryas, “noble people.” The Arya Samaj did not explicitly have political objectives, but it created an organizational framework that was later used by others for such purposes.

In Bengal, efforts to produce a syncretic religion from elements drawn from Vedanta and Unitarian Christianity did not long survive their initiator, Ram Mohan Roy (1772–1833). A more strident reassertion of Vedanta as the one true, complete, and universal religion, which was yet tolerant of other religions, was made by Vivekananda. His most urgent concern was to purify Hinduism of Puranic and other accretions and to rid Hindu society of internal divisions. More important, perhaps, he put forward the ideal of service to humanity as the highest form of spiritualism, claiming that it was rooted in the teachings of his spiritual master, Ramakrishna. The Ramakrishna Paramahansa Mission, founded in 1897, became a movement that today has a worldwide presence.

An honest, nonegoistic concern for the sufferings of others was identified as true religiousness by Mohandas Gandhi (1869–1948), better known as the Mahatma (“great soul”), a term of great respect generally applied to holy persons among Hindus and bestowed on Gandhi by the distinguished littérateur Rabindranath Tagore (1861–1941). Gandhi considered himself a Hindu, not merely by birth but by conviction. He rejected the authority of tradition and scriptural texts and subjected every belief, convention, and practice to the test of moral reason and, eventually, the conscience. It is thus that he came to reject the ritual of animal sacrifice and the practice of untouchability (avoidance of direct contact by upper-caste Hindus with lower-caste people).

Gandhi studied the scriptures of other major religions and acknowledged deep indebtedness to Jainism and Christianity. From the former, he adopted the doctrine of the “many-sidedness” of reality (anekāntavād), and from the Sermon on the Mount (in the New Testament), he derived the strategy of nonviolent passive resistance. He regarded all religions to be true, since the final objective—the search for Truth—was the same, and at the same time imperfect, because of the limitations of human understanding. Gandhi regarded religious plurality a human treasure, even a divine blessing, and stood for participatory pluralism. He considered conversion from one religion to another a matter of conscience but believed it unnecessary. The correct approach, he maintained, was to refine one’s religious sensibility within the framework of the tradition into which one was born.

Gandhi rejected the separation of religious and secular life. Politics was, he said, the form in which dharma presents itself in the modern age. His worldview was religious, but he supported the concept of the secular state and expected that it would completely refrain from interference in religious affairs. He deemed it as the moral responsibility of Hindus as the majority community of India (both before and after the partition of the subcontinent in 1947) to provide protection to all religious minorities. It was this that led to his assassination in 1948 at the hands of a Hindu bigot just before the commencement of a multireligious prayer meeting.

Hinduism, it seems, has been presented to its followers as a way of life by three kinds of exemplars, namely, those who focus on practice, like Gandhi did; those who stress on introspection, as Sri Aurobindo (1872–1950) did; and those who place personal experience above all other kinds of religiousness as Ramana Maharshi (1879–1950) did. Aurobindo maintained an evolutionary perspective both on external reality as an expression of the Absolute and on the maturation of spirituality. He thus opposed those elements of Advaitic thought that posit the notion of illusion in appearances. The Maharshi (“great seer”), however, remained firmly committed to the unity of Brahman and atman.

Among the religious teachers active in India in recent years was Sathya Sai Baba (1926–2011), who had a vast following at home and abroad. He was reputed to possess miraculous powers; it was his support to educational and health care institutions that perhaps is the more notable aspect of his mission. Other Hindu religious teachers also were active in the second half of the 20th century, but some of them chose to work abroad, where their appeal was greater among those not born as Hindus. Tradition does not, however, recognize formal conversion as legitimate.

Gurus apart, Hinduism’s vitality results from the activities of Hindus generally. Old divinities sometimes come alive again, as is illustrated by the emergence in recent years of Vaishnav Devi as a beneficent goddess. Hundreds of thousands of pilgrims visit her shrine near Jammu every year. Not so long ago, a new goddess, Santoshi Ma, was added to the pantheon, but her cult seems to have weakened. Big and small temples are coming up everywhere, pilgrimages attract millions, and all-night bhajan-singing neighborhood groups are common. In short, Hinduism is well and alive today at home and abroad.

Hinduism as a Global Religion

Traditionally, birth was the only way one could acquire Hindu identity, but one could lose it through many kinds of misconduct, one of which was the crossing of the seas. The Hindu way of life could be lived only in the sacred land of India, known to the ancients by names such as Jambu Dvipa and Bharatvarsha. Transgression of the rules was uncommon but not absent.

As early as the fifth century BCE, a Hindu prince is said to have settled in Sri Lanka. Later, in the first century CE, a Brahman adventurer founded a kingdom comprising Cambodia and the adjacent lands. Archaeological and cultural evidence testifies to the widespread presence of Hinduism and a rich civilizational synthesis in Southeast Asia. Its greatest monument is the world heritage site of Angkor Vat, a temple complex built by the Hindu king Suryavarman (1112–1152 CE).

Hinduism as a live religious tradition, which is traced back to the ninth century, survives among more than 3 million Hindus of the island of Bali (Indonesia), constituting 92% of its population. Among them, Brahman priests occupy a central place in society, but non-Brahman ritual specialists also exist. Temple rituals and ancestor worship are prominent features of Balinese Hinduism. Purā Besākih, a complex of 22 public temples, where Shiva-Rāditya, Brahma, and Vishnu are worshipped, is highly revered. Ancestor worship distinguishes between those ancestors who are in the process of being purified and those who have been fully purified and attained divine status as a deva.

In more recent times, from the early 19th century onward, European colonizers carried indentured Indian laborers, mostly Hindus, to faraway places such as the Caribbean Islands, South Africa, and Fiji. Voluntary migrations also occurred, for instance, to east and central Africa and Southeast Asia. As these migrant communities stabilized, their social and religious lives underwent changes marked by the effort to both preserve old Hindu elements and adopt local elements.

A most significant event in the globalization of Hinduism was the 2-year stay of Swami Vivekananda in the United States, where he went in 1892 to attend the first World Parliament of Religions. His inclusive message of religious pluralism aroused considerable interest in Hindu philosophy and yoga (techniques of physical self-discipline and mental concentration). He established the Vedanta society for the propagation of Advaita (humanity incarnates the divinity) and social service as the true religion.

Yoga has found wide appeal in the West. In 1959, Maharshi Mahesh Yogi (d. 2008), the originator of Transcendental Meditation (TM) arrived in the United States. Claiming Vedic inspiration, he asserted that TM was a scientifically validated method of self-improvement. Other gurus focused more on piety. The most successful of them was Bhaktivedanta Swami Prahbupada (1896–1977), who reached the United States in 1965 and established the ISKCON (also known as Hare Krishna), teaching theistic devotionalism constructed around a cult of the Vaishnava god Krishna. This is now an international movement. TM too found followers in Europe and the United Kingdom. The Swaminarayan sect (established in Gujarat in the early 19th century) reached Britain in the 1950s, where it now has a large following among Indian immigrants.

The closing decades of the 20th century witnessed the migration of relatively large numbers of highly educated and professionally competent Hindus to the West, particularly the United States. While regional community, caste, and linguistic divisions among them seem to be weakening, a rich, although abridged, religious life survives. Newly built temple complexes have become a crucial symbol of Hindu identity. Indeed, serious observers claim that Hinduism is being institutionalized as an American religion within the framework of multiculturalism. It is noteworthy that Hindu migrants who support right-wing politics in India are enthusiasts of globalization and proud of Hinduism as a world religion.

T. N. Madan

See also Dharma, Karma, and Samsara; Hare Krishna (International Society for Krishna Consciousness); Hindu Law; Hindu Nationalism; Hindu Orthodoxy; India

Further Readings

- Babb, L. A. (1986). Redemptive encounters: Three modern styles in the Hindu tradition. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Brockington, J. L. (1992). The sacred thread: A short history of Hinduism. New Delhi, India: Oxford University Press.
- Fuller, C. J. (1992). The camphor flame: Popular Hinduism and society in India. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Hiriyana, M. (1993). Outlines of Indian philosophy. New Delhi, India: Motilal Banarsidass.
- Kurien, P. A. (2007). A place at the multicultural table: The development of an American Hinduism. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Madan, T. N. (1987). Non-renunciation: Themes and interpretations of Hindu culture. New Delhi, India: Oxford University Press.
- Radhakrishnan, S. (1927). The Hindu view of life. London: Allen & Unwin.
- Srinivas, M. N. (1952). Religion and society among the Coorgs of South India. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Weber, M. (1958). The religion of India. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.
- Zaehner, R. C. (1962). Hinduism. London: Oxford University Press.

HIROSHIMA AND NAGASAKI

At the close of World War II, the United States conducted atomic bombings against the Japanese cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The events served as tests for nuclear technological experimentation and military action to end combat in the Pacific Rim. The sheer magnitude of these attacks has not only given rise to global and international peace movements but also acted as a symbol for religious movements geared toward pacifism and the safeguarding of life in general. In particular, the Buddhist organization Soka Gakkai International has made antinuclear proliferation a central feature of its religious objectives. Indeed the bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki elicited a variety of critical responses from religious leaders abroad, including the theologian and member of the Federal Council of Churches Reinhold Niebuhr, who called the events “morally indefensible.”

A technological development enterprise called the Manhattan Engineers District, also known as the “Manhattan Project,” was commissioned by the United States, the United Kingdom, and Canada to create the first nuclear bomb. Under the direction of General Leslie R. Groves and the physicist J. Robert Oppenheimer, the Manhattan Project continued for 5 years between 1941 and 1946. The output of the project was considered a viable option in ending World War II by dropping nuclear bombs on the Empire of Japan. In spite of extensive admonition about the development of nuclear weapons from prominent figures such as Albert Einstein and Leo Szilard, President Franklin D. Roosevelt allowed the project to continue.

In 1945, U.S. President Harry S. Truman authorized the use of nuclear weapons on Japan. At 8:15 a.m. on August 6, 1945, a U.S. B-29 bomber, dubbed the “Enola Gay,” released a uranium-based bomb over Hiroshima. The bomb, known as “Little Boy,” killed an estimated 140,000 people. The subsequent radiation and lack of immediate medical attention may have increased this toll by another 60,000 in the years that followed.

After the Hiroshima bombing, Emperor Hirohito had yet to react under the Potsdam Declaration, which outlined the conditions of Japan’s surrender. At 11:01 a.m. on August 9, 1945—just 3 days after the Hiroshima bombing—the United States released yet another bomb, this time over Nagasaki. This plutonium-core bomb, named “Fat Man,” killed an estimated 80,000 people from either the impact itself or the ensuing radiation.

On August 13, 1945, Emperor Hirohito accepted the terms of the Potsdam Declaration and formally surrendered on September 2, 1945. After the surrender, Japan was occupied from 1945 to 1952 by the Allied Powers, led by General Douglas MacArthur, the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers.

Today, the hypocenters (ground zero sites of the explosions) of both Hiroshima and Nagasaki have been designated as monuments that include museums full of artifacts and interactive educational material as well as parks and a variety of landmarks that memorialize the devastation caused by the events while reminding the world of the dangers of war and mass destruction. In addition to prayer vigils during each anniversary of the Hiroshima bombing, attendees practice Tōrō Nagashi, a spiritual ritual of floating illuminated lanterns in the water to honor the memory of the deceased.

Salvador Jiménez Murguía

See also Cosmic War and Cosmic Conflict; Japan

Further Readings

- Garrison, J. (1983). The darkness of God: Theology after Hiroshima. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.
- Groves, L. R. (1962). Now it can be told: The story of the Manhattan Project. New York: Da Capo Press.
- Takaki, R. (1996). Hiroshima: Why America dropped the atomic bomb. New York: Back Bay Books.
- Walker, J. S. (1997). Prompt and utter destruction: President Truman and the use of atomic bombs against Japan. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

HOA HAO

The Hoa Hao messianic sect emerged in Vietnam under the social, economic, and political conditions engendered by colonization and World War II. Hoa Hao was influenced by the peasant psychology of the pioneers in the Cochinchina region of South Vietnam, revealing a new form of popular nationalism clustered around the figure of a Vietnamese Buddhist messiah.

In 1939, while on a pilgrimage to heal persistent illnesses, the young peasant Huynh Phu So—native from the village named Hoa Hao—became enlightened. He then began preaching about the apocalypse to peasants and also offered his healing powers.

As a communitarian and considerably autarkical movement, Hoa Hao represents a semifossilized form of a local myth that presages a new millennium and the arrival of the “Future Buddha” (Maitreya). Hoa Hao Buddhism significantly maintains the millenarian tenets of the Maitreya myth, its way of dressing, and its very simplified social and ritual organization, with the messiah figure as a reference. Although clergy and the pagoda are absent, a committee of advisers operates in each hamlet, village, district, and province.

This messianism played an undeniably strategic role in the process of decolonization, particularly through the sect’s control of a large part of South Vietnam’s “rice basket.” Huynh Phu So was more or less consciously an instrument of the Indo-China policy pursued by the foreign powers. Indeed, proclaimed as the “living Buddha” by worshippers, his influence worried the French authorities, who placed him in jail and in a psychiatric hospital. The Japanese, however, set him free in exchange for his support. In 1945 and 1946, he used his religious charisma in the service of the Viet Minh but was murdered by this ally the following year. His death contributed to the expansion of the movement, which soon joined the camp opposed to the Viet Minh. The members of his family remained the guarantors of exegesis.

The Hoa Hao community underwent several periods of oppression as a result of the policy adopted by the Ngo Dinh Diem regime (1955–1963) and, subsequently, at the hands of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam beginning in 1975. The 2 million worshippers were legally recognized only in 1999. Rejecting the government takeover of the movement's religious (and economic) affairs, several followers committed self-immolation in 2001.

Hoa Hao activism is perennial not only in Vietnam but also among the boat people community settled in the United States, where followers, in conferences and on websites, demand respect for religious freedom and human rights in Vietnam. However, the original tenets of Hoa Hao Buddhism—particularly its attachment to the soil of the Mekong Delta and to the traditions of precolonial life—have been lost in the United States. In Vietnam, Hoa Hao is not very visible in public life and is usually confined to households. Only recently have followers in Vietnam created an online presence for the promotion of their messiah.

Jérémy Jammes

See also Cao Dai; New Religions; Politics and Religion; Theravada Buddhism; Vietnam

Further Readings

- Bourdeaux, P. (2003). Emergence and settling of the Hoa Hao Buddhism community. Doctoral dissertation, École Pratique des Hautes Études, Paris.
- Tai, H.-T. H. (1983). Millenarianism and peasant politics in Vietnam. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

HOLIDAYS

Almost every religion has special days that indicate important symbols of its belief or important events in its history. These days differ from one religion, or even from one culture, to another, but the English word holiday maintains its connection to “holy day.” Religious holidays symbolize major components of faiths and make people gather together under a “holy” mood.

Holidays in Islam

Islam has two holidays according to the Qur'an and Prophet Muhammad. One of them is Eid ul-Fitr. It is celebrated after Ramadan, the ninth month of Hicri, the lunar Islamic calendar. During Ramadan, Muslims fast from sunrise to sunset, with the exception of little children, travelers, and ill people. Eid ul-Fitr is celebrated for 3 days. Sadaka-i Fitr (charity) and Zekat (obligatory alms) are often given to the poor on Eid and before Eid.

The other holiday in Islam is Eid ul-Adha. It lasts 4 days beginning on the 10th day of the last month of the Islamic year, which is also the month of the hajj, the pilgrimage to Makkah (Mecca). Eid ul-Adha symbolizes for Muslims the faithfulness of Prophet Ibrahim in being ready to sacrifice his son Prophet Ismail to God. Thus, sacrificing a lamb, a sheep, or a camel is meant to show the faithfulness of Muslims to God. The meat is shared among the family, neighbors, and the poor according to the Qur'an.

As preparation for the Eids, Muslims clean their houses and get new clothes and gifts for their families and friends. The celebration begins with Eid prayers offered at large mosque gatherings. Mosque members wear their best clothes to give thanks to God.

Holidays in Christianity

Christmas is one of the most widely celebrated holidays of Christianity. It is a celebration of Jesus' birthday. The period of Advent (from the Latin word for “coming” or “arrival”), in which Christians prepare for the coming of Jesus, lasts between 3 weeks (if December 25 falls on Monday) and 4 weeks (if it falls on Sunday). This period also is a time of preparing the inner self to receive Jesus in spirit. Christians celebrate Christmas in their own homes with the family. They give presents to their families, relatives, and friends as a symbol of the personality of Jesus. Christmas trees are customary symbols of this holiday.

Easter is another holiday of Christianity. It celebrates the resurrection of Jesus after his crucifixion. Lent is the time of spiritual and physical preparation for Good Friday and Easter Day.

The holiday of Ascension celebrates the resurrected Christ's ascension into heaven. Pentecost commemorates the gift of the Holy Spirit to the disciples following the ascension. Also called Whitsunday (White Sunday), Pentecost traditionally was the day on which new members to the church were baptized and admitted to the church.

Thanksgiving is not a religious holiday of Christians but commemorates a meal shared between the Pilgrim Fathers and Native Americans in the 17th century, though it has subsequently become a time to thank God for the blessings of a prosperous life. It is also a holiday in American civil life. Halloween is another nonreligious (to most people) holiday with different myths about its origins, though the term comes from the "hallowed eve" before All Saints Day, a time to remember the Christian saints and, by extension, all revered ancestors. A longtime belief is that the spirits of death come out on Halloween. Nowadays, its celebration is marked by somewhat macabre fun.

Holidays in Judaism

Holidays in Judaism usually celebrate historical, traditional, or national events, except Yamim Nora'im (High Holy Days), which begin with Rosh Hashanah, the 1st day of Tishri (the 1st month of the Jewish lunar calendar), and end with Yom Kippur, the 10th day of Tishri. Holidays are celebrated by Jews generally with praying in the synagogue, fasting, burning candles, and being together for family meals. Work is forbidden on almost all holidays.

Apart from the minor festivals, Judaism has six main holidays. The first is Rosh Hashanah (Hebrew for "head of the year"). It is a celebration of the birthday of the world. Except when the holiday falls on the Sabbath, the shofar (a trumpet made from a ram's horn) is blown to signify "waking up" to God.

The second high holiday is Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement). It is perhaps the most important holiday in Judaism. It is a day for atonement, including fasting and confession of sins to God.

Pesach (Passover) celebrates the beginning of the harvest season and the deliverance of the Israelites from slavery in Egypt. The seder, which is both a meal and a religious service, is important in this holiday.

Sukkot (Hebrew for "shelters" or "booths") begins on the 15th day of Tishri and lasts 7 days. Jews build temporary structures outside their homes during the holiday to remember the hard days of the Israelites in the desert.

Hanukkah (the festival of lights) is not a major holiday, but it is widely known, perhaps because it comes near Christmas. It is celebrated for 8 days and 8 nights to commemorate the dedication of the second temple.

Purim celebrates the deliverance of the Jewish people from destruction planned by the Persian officer Haman, as told in the Book of Esther.

Holidays in Hinduism

Hinduism has different local and regional festivals all across India to honor deities related to a particular area or community, to celebrate a stage in the agricultural calendar, or to commemorate historical figures and events. Hindu holidays are celebrated with a wide variety of rituals, including worship, prayer, processions, bonfires, music, dancing, eating, drinking, feeding the poor, and giving presents.

Holi is a popular holiday celebrated throughout India on the full-moon day in the month of Phalgun of the lunar Hindu calendar. It is celebrated with bonfires, singing of devotional songs while following the pilgrimage routes, and throwing of colored water and powder on other people.

Divali is another Hindu holiday, commemorating the return of the god Ram to his home after the battles described in the Hindu epic Ramayana. It is a festival of lights and is celebrated traditionally for 5 days. The fourth day of Divali is a day of family celebrations, marked by giving gifts to one's children and wife.

Other major Hindu holidays include the following:

Dassera—the victory of Rama over the demon king Ravana

Ganesha Chaturthi (Ganesha Utsava)—the festival of Lord Ganesha

Krishna Jayanti—the birthday of Lord Krishna

Kumbh Mela—a pilgrimage made every 12 years to four sacred cities in India

Mahashivaratri (Shiva Ratri)—great festival of Lord Shiva

Navaratri—festival of Shakti (in Bengal) or Rama’s victory over Ravana

Raksābandhana—renewing bonds between brothers and sisters

Rama Navami—the birthday of Lord Rama

Holidays in Buddhism

Holidays in Buddhism are many, and they differ from one region to another, like the Buddhist calendar. Thus, there are different Buddhist holidays in southern, northern, and eastern Asian Buddhist countries.

Buddhist holidays begin with a visit to the local temple, where one offers food or other items to the monks and listens to a talk on dharma. Distributing food to the poor to earn merit, circumambulating (walking around) the temple three times in honor of the Three Jewels, chanting, and meditation are other holiday rituals.

The most important holiday of Buddhism is Vesakha Puja (also known as Wesak Puja), which celebrates the birth of Buddha as Prince Siddhartha, his enlightenment, and his passing into nirvana at death and falls on the full-moon day of the month of Vesakha (the first month of the southern Asian Buddhist lunar calendar). Vesakha Puja is celebrated in temples, where people gather to pay homage to the Buddha with flowers, incense, lamps, and food. Houses and temples are decorated with flowers and candles or strings of light as symbols of the Buddha’s enlightenment. It is a time to focus the mind on Buddhist doctrine.

Other major Buddhist holidays include the following:

Ancestor Day (Ullambana)—to honor ancestors and easing the suffering of unsettled spirits

Dhamma Day (Asalha Puja Day)—to commemorate the “turning of the wheel of the Dharma”

Kathina Ceremony (Robe Offering Ceremony)—to honor the role of the Sangha

Sangha Day (Magha Puja Day or Fourfold Assembly Day)—to commemorate the Buddha’s visit to Veruvana Monastery

Holidays and Globalization

Holidays are a significant means of socialization in a religious and cultural environment by remembering important events, being together, sharing food, gifts, and time, and so on. Many of them have the same rituals to provide social solidarity. Thus, holidays have importance in every society to carry religious and, consequently, cultural values from one generation to other.

Holidays are also concrete indicators of the effects of globalization on cultural life through changes in their celebration due to the process of globalization. To illustrate, some holidays are celebrated by different religious groups, such as Christmas. In Western countries, the main reason for this may be non-Christians wishing to be a part of the society they live in. But Christmas is also celebrated in some countries with non-Christian majorities, with its meaning changed or adapted to regional religious traditions. For example, in Japan, celebrating Christmas has become part of social life as a symbol of modernity; however, it was converted to natara or “Our Lord’s Birthday” when it came to Japan in the 16th century. Especially at the end of the 19th century, the celebration of Christmas became widespread, and today it is celebrated throughout Japan. Also today, in a consumption-oriented world, it is seen by many as an opportunity for shopping, having good food, spending leisure time with friends, and enjoyment. As another example, in Britain, schools celebrate the Chinese New Year and Divali as a result of the multicultural student population in the schools.

We can see interaction between major religious traditions such as Buddhism, Daoism, and Shinto. This interaction can be seen in the practice of Buddhism alongside Daoism in China and Shinto in Japan or in the celebration of holidays and some common festivals such as New Year or Ullambana with equal enthusiasm by these traditions.

Holidays also can be indicators of social reflection, such as Ganesha Chaturthi in India. According to Victor Barnouw, this holiday primarily focused on family worship until the 20th century. After that time, it appeared to have taken on a public character, giving rise to nationalist sentiments. Today, it has lost its political appeal.

Holidays are important occasions in social life, bringing people together. Studying holidays provides opportunities for understanding cultures, religions, and societies, particularly the ways in which meanings and rituals change over time and in increasingly globalized contexts.

Banu Gurer

See also Christmas; Easter; Festivals; Pilgrimage

Further Readings

- Barnouw, V. (1954). The changing character of a Hindu festival. American Anthropologist, 56(1), 74–86.
- Breuilly, E., O'Brien, J., & Palmer, M. (2002). Festivals of the world: The illustrated guide to celebrations, customs, events, and holidays (M. E. Marty, Consulting Ed.). New York: Checkmark Books.
- Plath, D. W. (1963). The Japanese popular Christmas: Coping with modernity. Journal of American Folklore, 76(302), 309–317.

HOLISTIC SPIRITUALITY

Holistic spirituality is an umbrella term encompassing a broad range of beliefs and practices that have grown in popularity in Western European countries and the United States since the counter-culture movements of the 1960s. These beliefs are primarily orientated toward the attainment of wholeness, health, and the well-being of “body, mind, and spirit.” Holistic spiritualities place an emphasis on self-realization, connectivity, and personal experiences of God, the supernatural, or the sacred. They explicitly reject the Neoplatonic/Cartesian mind-body dualism identifiable within some strands of Christian and Western philosophical traditions. For these reasons, the relationship of holistic spirituality to organized religion, and particularly to wider trends in Christian spirituality since the 19th century, remains an area of considerable debate. This has led some commentators to distinguish holistic spirituality as an “unchurched spirituality” or “lived religion,” while others treat it as coterminous with New Age, Eastern esoteric, and “subjective-life” spiritualities.

Embodiment is a primary preoccupation within a holistic spirituality, and the body is privileged as a site for access to the inner life of emotions, self-validation, and spiritual experiences. Holistic spiritualities have become pervasive within a variety of settings, including the New Age, neo-Paganism, and complementary and alternative health care practices. A common strand across these eclectic movements is a stress on the notion of “well-being,” which is realized by the attainment of harmony with one’s “authentic” or inner self through attention to feelings, intuitions, and bodily sensations or ailments. Self-expression and gradual self-realization are deemed overarching priorities. In some settings, an awareness of the unity between the body and spirit might also find extension in a relational connectedness between the individual and others, including nature and the cosmos. Recent scholarship has drawn attention to the markedly gendered popularity of holistic spiritualities in a post-Christian setting and has argued that women embrace these forms of an embodied, expressive spirituality as a mechanism for negotiating the “dilemmas of selfhood” and the conflicting demands of contemporary femininity.

In view of the diffusion of religious traditions, ideas, and practices grouped under this term, there is a tendency in some of the sociological literature to dismiss holistic spirituality as unduly fragmented, inherently consumerist, and incapable of transmission. Such studies characterize it as a “pick-and-mix,” syncretic movement with low salience and little to distinguish it from the individualistic, consumerist practices promoted by global capitalism. While there certainly is a propensity for a holistic, well-being culture to be annexed by consumerist narratives, recent studies have also identified a deeper strand within this spirituality and a common, core emphasis on immanentism and the “sacralization of the self.” There has been a marked growth in this form of spirituality in most Western European countries from the 1980s, as well as the emergence in North American “churched Christianity” of a form of spirituality that is questing, questioning, and attracted to embodied and expressive belief. As such, this is a transnational movement with implications for the study of mainstream religious affiliation as well as spiritual searching and meaning making outside institutional and traditional settings.

Alana Harris

See also Consumer Culture; Gender; Global Capitalism and Religion; New Age Movements; United States of America

Further Readings

- Flanagan, K., & Jupp, P. C. (Eds.). (2007). A sociology of spirituality. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate.
- Heelas, P., & Woodhead, L. (2005). The spiritual revolution: Why religion is giving way to spirituality. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.
- Houtman, D., & Aupers, S. (2007). The spiritual turn and the decline of tradition: The spread of post-Christian spirituality in 14 Western countries, 1981–2000. Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion, 46(3), 305–320.
- Roof, W. C. (1999). Spiritual marketplace: Baby boomers and the remaking of American religion. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Sointu, E., & Woodhead, L. (2008). Spirituality, gender and expressive selfhood. Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion, 47(2), 259–276.

HOLOCAUST

The Holocaust refers primarily to the effort to destroy the European Jewry under National Socialist German rule during World War II, an attempt that horrified the world, gave momentum to the ending of the war, and spurred the establishment of an independent state of Israel. The term stems from the Greek word holokau[s]ton, a translation of the Hebrew word olah, meaning a burnt sacrifice offered whole to God. Used before for other human catastrophes, after 1945 the word Holocaust began to be employed exclusively for the persecution and annihilation of the European Jews by National Socialist Germany after 1933 and is, nowadays, widely accepted as the global coin for these events. While some scholars include the millions of other victims, for example, gypsies or Soviet POWs (prisoners of war), for others, the Holocaust specifically denotes the systematic extermination of approximately 5.7 million Jews from 1941 to 1945.

The National Socialists defined Jews by the religion of their parents and grandparents. Therefore, many Christians of Jewish origin also became targets of the radical expulsion policies after 1933 at both the national and local levels in the German state. The Nazis attacked not only individual Jews but also their religious institutions and set ablaze more than 1,000 synagogues in Germany and in recently annexed Austria during the notorious Kristallnacht of 1938. The next radical steps of segregation, the ban on Jewish businesses, forced labor, and expropriation, were first introduced in greater Germany and later in all countries occupied by the Third Reich. When most emigration routes were blocked and Poland was brutally conquered in the fall of 1939, the Germans forced hundreds of thousands of Polish Jews to live in ghettos or labor camps. During World War II, an estimated 1 million Jewish forced laborers toiled for the German economy in Europe. The genocide started with mass shootings by SS (Shutzstaffel) and security police squads during the German invasion of the Soviet Union in the summer of 1941. Between 1942 and 1944, millions of Jews deported from all over Europe—even with the help of allies such as Slovakia and Vichy-France—were extinguished in the gas chambers in death camps at Auschwitz, Sobibór, and Treblinka.

Neither the Protestant nor the Catholic churches in Germany or other European countries spoke out effectively against the persecution and mass murder. Only a few Christians stood up and helped the Jews survive. Theologians of all religions continue to debate the horrible events and especially the question of how one can still believe in God after this terrible human catastrophe.

Wolf Gruner

See also Anti-Semitism; Germany; Human Rights; Israel; Judaism; Protestant Christianity; Roman Catholicism

Further Readings

- Ericksen, R., & Heschel, S. (1999). Betrayal: German churches and the Holocaust. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress.
- Hayes, P., & Roth, J. (2009). Handbook of the Holocaust. New York: Oxford University Press.

Phayer, M. (2001). The Catholic Church and the Holocaust, 1930–1965. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

HONDURAS

In the Central American country of Honduras, the population was predominantly Roman Catholic until the 20th century. In the 19th century, several Anglican, Methodist, Adventist, and Baptist missionary centers were established in the country, but their number and impact remained marginal. It was only in the 1980s, with the growth of the Protestant denominations, that the Honduran religious landscape began to change. According to local polls, in the 1970s, 96.3% of the population declared that they were Catholic, but by 2007, around 36% had embraced Protestantism. These numbers should, however, be used with caution as lack of research and accuracy makes quantification difficult.

Several analysts highlight the role played by the U.S. government in the initial expansion of Pentecostalism in Honduras, supposedly to support Nicaraguan contra revolutionaries and to undermine the influence of Liberation Theology among the rural poor. Others explain the high conversion rates as an effect of an aggressive proselytism involving the mass media, and some others stress Protestantism as an identity phenomenon allowing urban and rural poor to rebuild solidarity networks.

Nowadays, most Honduran Protestant churches are Pentecostal. The theological frontier between Pentecostalism and neo-Pentecostalism is not easy to define. Both embrace Spirit-filled worship and organize around principles such as direct personal experience of God and separation from community life. Neo-Pentecostals, however, are more inclined to embrace the “prosperity doctrine” and to develop specific practices such as “money contracts.”

Differences across social lines appear to be more significant. Pentecostals are mostly poor and uneducated preachers who minister among poor brethren. Their networks provide help with health and family problems and support young people seeking to avoid or escape gangs. Neo-Pentecostal churches, on the other hand, try to extend their influence to the economic elite and the middle class and to increase their influence through hundreds of primary schools, Bible schools, universities, clinics, and service centers throughout the country.

Since 1880, the year of effective religious disestablishment, the Honduran state defines itself as secular, and laws regulating the Church are no longer central to the political debate. Nevertheless, the Catholic Church has historically exerted a significant influence in the political process.

In recent years, evangelical leadership has become more involved in the political arena. In 2005, several Protestant preachers ran unsuccessfully for election as deputies to the National Congress. More recently, the evangelical Christian sector has expanded its traditional lobbying activities, against same-sex marriages and abortion, to join civil society in the fight against corruption.

However, the question remains whether the evangelical Christian sector will be able to exert its influence on the Honduran state as the Catholic Church had done in the past—for example, during the 1960s, when Catholic religious activity started to support radical reform in the Honduran countryside, well before its counterparts in Latin America.

Karen Bähr Caballero

See also Evangelical Movements; Latin America; Missions and Missionaries; New Religions in South America; Roman Catholicism

Further Readings

- Hoksbergen, R., & Espinoza, N. (1997). The Evangelical Church and the development of neoliberal society: A study of the role of Evangelical Church and its NGOs in Guatemala and Honduras. Journal of Developing Areas, 32(1), 37–52.
- Shepherd, F. (1993). Church and state in Honduras and Nicaragua prior to 1979. Sociology of Religion, 54, 277–293.

HONG KONG

Hong Kong, the former British port and colony has since 1997 been governed by China as a Special Administrative Region. It contains a greater diversity of religions and sects than any other Chinese city. All religious groups, including those banned in mainland China, operate freely. However about 60% of the population of 7 million people claim “no religion” on surveys.

Hong Kong’s people are known in Asia for their pragmatism, but below the surface of this pragmatism lies a deep and diverse milieu of religious hopes and fears. Many people who claim “no religion” on surveys also believe in supernatural retribution, fear ghosts, occasionally visit temples, and worship ancestors by burning paper goods for their use in the afterlife (including paper cars, houses, servants, computers, and even airplanes).

Much religious activity in Hong Kong has roots in Chinese “folk religion.” There are more than 300 temples dedicated to Daoist, Buddhist, or folk religion deities. Most are small, with only a handful of large “god palaces” scattered around the territory. Worshipers at these temples seek help and advice from the gods (some of whom are deified humans) for their problems in family, business, or education, using divination sticks to get the god’s answers. In some of these shrines, human spirit-writers channel messages from the deity to worshippers, holding a stick that writes the deity’s messages on a table.

Hong Kong’s rural villages still conduct periodic festivals every 8 or 10 years to cleanse the district of accumulated spirits and ghosts, calling the gods for that purpose and meanwhile entertaining them with Chinese opera performances, which can also be enjoyed by the villagers. (The gods’ statues are provided with good seats for these performances.)

Self-identified Protestants and Catholics constitute about 12%–15% of the population but are disproportionately represented among cosmopolitan portions of the Hong Kong elite, partly because schools run by Christian organizations, established before the rise of free, public high school education, were one of the main routes into universities and the professions. Evangelical Christian groups are growing, appealing particularly to educated young people. Some meet in schools or rented quarters in office buildings. In one urban district, there are five floors of small churches competing with each other in the same building.

Self-identified Buddhists constitute no more than 12%–15% of the population. Buddhist leaders are now sometimes vocal in public affairs. Buddha’s birthday has been added to Hong Kong’s public holidays, and an exhibition displaying a relic of Buddha (a finger bone) was a major event. Some Buddhist organizations benefit from elite patrons, and from good connections with the mainland Buddhist Association, but they are not as wealthy and active as Buddhist organizations in Taiwan.

For Muslims, local worship sites include a large mosque in Kowloon, which serves mainly South Asian residents. Other religious groups include Jews, Sikhs, and Zoroastrians. Some of these families have prospered in Hong Kong for more than 100 years as merchants and traders.

All these religious groups do business and worship without serious disputes. The rule of law, religious freedom, and a secular state with no religious agenda are key reasons for this harmony among Hong Kong’s diverse religions.

Graeme Lang

See also China; Chinese Popular Religion

Further Reading

Evans, G., & Tam, M. (Eds.). Hong Kong: The anthropology of a Chinese metropolis. Richmond, UK: Curzon Press.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Human rights law asserts that governments have an ethical and legal duty to ensure the necessary social conditions for human dignity. In international law, these rights are affirmed in the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in implementing treaties. Historically, religious traditions have taught duties, not rights. Now, however, many religious leaders support human rights law, and major religious organizations include human rights in their ethical teachings.

International Law

In the West, the commandments in Scripture and duties defined by social status ordered traditional societies, but these were challenged in the 18th century by those demanding civil rights. In 1775, the signatories to the American Declaration of Independence affirmed, “We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.” A decade later, French revolutionaries proclaimed that “the rights of man” were natural rights and are intrinsic to the humanity of each person.

In the 19th century, as Western societies became more diverse and secular, the claim that rights are God-given gave way to the notion that civil and political rights are rooted in our human nature as reasoning, autonomous persons. By the 20th century, legal rights were understood as the liberties guaranteed to citizens by their governments. This theory of positive law prevailed until after World War II, when the victorious Allies confronted the horrifying fact that Nazi Germany had acted legally, by German law, in committing what the Allies identified as “crimes against humanity.”

In 1948, the United Nations General Assembly approved the Universal Declaration of Human Rights without a dissenting vote. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR), which came into force in 1976, are the main treaties implementing this declaration.

The ICCPR and the ICESCR begin by affirming the right of self-determination of all peoples “to freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.” Both covenants also assert the right to non-discrimination, which the Universal Declaration defines as protecting and realizing human rights “without distinction of any kind, such as race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.” The civil and political rights asserted in the ICCPR include the rights to life, liberty, security, protection against torture and arbitrary arrest, equal protection of the law, freedom of movement, participation in government, religion, freedom of opinion and expression, freedom of assembly and association, and ownership of property.

The Universal Declaration also affirms economic, social, and cultural rights. Everyone “is entitled to realization, through national effort and international co-operation and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights indispensable for his dignity and the free development of his personality.” Also, every person has “the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favorable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment,” the rights to leisure time and education, and the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

The ICESCR asserts a standard of progressive realization to secure these human rights.

Religious Support

In 1945, O. Frederick Nolde, who represented the Protestant denominations forming the World Council of Churches (WCC), persuaded a reluctant U.S. secretary of state to endorse including human rights in the United Nations Charter, and leaders of the fledgling WCC rallied support in Europe and the United States for the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The American Jewish Committee backed these initiatives, but Catholic and Muslim leaders withheld support because the Universal Declaration did not affirm that human rights come from God.

Christians

The WCC, which includes Orthodox churches as well as Protestant denominations, has endorsed human rights campaigns around the world. More conservative Protestants, however, are critical of international human rights law because it does not affirm human rights as God-given. Since Vatican II (1962–1965), the Catholic Church has included the moral presumptions of human rights law in its ethical teachings, and Catholics in many places have risked their lives advocating for economic, social, and civil rights.

Jews

Jews embrace the human right of self-determination, which is affirmed in both the implementing covenants of the Universal Declaration. Yet many Jews also believe that God's "gift" of land to their ancestors, which is recorded in the Torah, gives the Jewish people a divine right outweighing the moral and legal claims of Palestinians for their land and human rights. Nonetheless, Rabbis for Human Rights, an Israeli organization of Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform Jews, argues that Jewish moral teaching supports recognizing universal human rights and, thus, requires supporting the political right of Palestinians to their own state.

Muslims

Muslims believe that all human rights come from Allah, so wherever Muslims who support human rights find a conflict between international law and their understanding of the Qur'an, they reject international law and support the Qur'an. Some Muslims believe that the Qur'an commands them to resist and fight non-Muslims in times of war, when Islam is threatened, which is how they see the danger posed today by secular Western culture. Other Muslims see the United Nations as creating a period of relative peace, which allows Muslims to struggle to protect Islam without engaging in war. Unlike international law, the Qur'an asserts separate and unequal rights for men and women, which is why some Muslims believe that the legal rights of women should not be equal to the rights of men.

Hindus

Traditional Hindu teaching explains why each person should accept the duties of one's caste to improve one's karma and, over many lifetimes, escape the cycle of rebirth. When India achieved independence, its new constitution established a secular government and guaranteed international human rights (including the right to religious freedom for the many religious minorities of India). The constitution also outlawed caste discrimination among Hindus. There is now a strong movement among Hindus to make their tradition the official religion of India, but thus far, democratic elections have confirmed the country's secular government and facilitated the largely peaceful transfer of power in a society with more than 1 billion people who speak more than 800 languages.

Buddhists

Traditional Buddhist teachings do not speak of rights, and many contemporary Buddhists oppose identifying the dharma with any specific set of moral and legal claims. Nonetheless, soon after Indian independence, 4 million Hindus of the Untouchable caste were persuaded by B. R. Ambedkar, an Untouchable who drafted the Indian constitution, to convert to Buddhism as a way of affirming their human rights. Countries with large Buddhist populations have ratified human rights treaties but often have not adequately enforced these moral presumptions of international law. This is, of course, also true of nations with populations that are largely Christian, Hindu, Jewish, or Muslim.

Chinese

In traditional Chinese society, acting in harmony with Dao did not involve asserting rights, in either Daoist or Confucian teachings. In the 20th century, however, war and revolutionary struggles led to a Chinese-controlled government in Taiwan, which proclaims civil and political rights, and to the People's Republic of China on the mainland, which asserts economic, social, and cultural rights. Also, some Chinese reformers have argued that human rights may be derived from the duties of Confucian ethics.

Others

Historic minority traditions and new religious movements generally endorse international human rights law and benefit wherever the right to freedom of religion or belief is enforced.

Summary

Traditional religious teachings do not recognize human rights, and until very recently, religious leaders have resisted the secularization of society, which has fostered human rights. But now that international law affirms universal standards for human dignity, there are leaders in every historic religious tradition who argue that at least some of these rights are implied by the duties and commandments of their ethical and spiritual teachings. Religious institutions, however, have given only limited support to political efforts to protect and progressively realize the civil, economic, and social rights asserted by international human rights law.

Robert Traer

See also Politics and Religion; Religion and State; Religious Freedom; Religious Minority-Majority Relations; Secularization; World Council of Churches

Further Readings

- Hollenbach, D. (1979). Claims in conflict: Retrieving and renewing the Catholic human rights tradition. New York: Paulist Press.
- Mayer, A. E. (2006). Islam and human rights: Tradition and politics. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Sharma, A. (2004). Hinduism and human rights: A conceptual approach (Law in India Series). New York: Oxford University Press.
- Swidler, A. (Ed.). (1982). Human rights in religious traditions. New York: Pilgrim Press.
- Traer, R. (1991). Faith in human rights: Support in religious traditions for a global struggle. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press.

HUNGARY

Known as “the final fortress of Western Christianity” by its citizens, the central European country of Hungary has understood itself as a Christian country since 997 CE. Today, many Hungarians have left off direct involvement in religious institutions but remain informally bound to their local churches through life cycle rituals. Though large portions of the population claim no religion (and approximately half of the Hungarians surveyed in 2005 claimed to not believe in God), nearly 85% of the populace assert allegiance to a religion. Fifty-two percent of Hungarians identified as Roman Catholics, 16% as Hungarian Reform (a Calvinist denomination), 3% as Lutheran, 3% as Greek Orthodox, and less than 1% as Jewish, a significant change from the historic number of Jews in Hungary. There are also small Buddhist and Islamic communities, and Hungarians are thought in general to be less devout than other European adherents. Roman Catholicism, the Reform Hungarian Church, Lutheranism, and Judaism constitute what are known as the “historic” Hungarian religions and garner between them 93% of the total state financial support to religious groups. Considering the small proportion of the population that Judaism now claims, surprisingly Hungary for many years housed the largest Jewish population in the world next to Russia, and many Jews persecuted in the 19th century found refuge in the country. Budapest has the largest synagogue in Europe, and the special place of the Jewish people in Hungary is still evidenced in its laws, even though the Jewish community was decimated by genocidal Nazi policies during World War II.

The kingdom founded in 997 CE by King István, who would later be canonized by the Roman Catholic Church as Saint Stephen, persevered over 900 years. Predominantly Catholic until the 16th century, Hungary was affected by the Protestant Reformation as well as the Counter-Reformation. During the 16th century, nearly all the populace of Hungary converted first to Lutheranism and then to Calvinism, but by the 17th century, the country predominantly returned to Catholicism. Hungarians were never unified under a religious banner again, however, and especially in Debrecen, known as the Calvinist Rome, significant Protestant communities still endure. One of the great cultural centers of the world, the Kingdom of Hungary ceased to exist in 1918 under the rule of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. After World War II, Hungary was occupied by the Soviet Union and witnessed the communist rule of János Kádár, under whom traditional national consciousness weakened, as well as religious worldviews and values. In 1989, Hungary became the first country to lift the Iron Curtain, and in 1999, it joined NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization), later becoming part of the European Union in 2004.

Though Hungary has a long history of Christianity, it is the short period of socialism that has shaped the state’s position on religion in the 21st century. Hungary financially supports churches and parochial schools in recompense for their dissolution during the campaign against religion in the socialist regime. Support fluctuates with the current economic status of the country, and the difficult financial straits Hungary found itself in the first decade of the 2000s resulted in the constriction of that aid, amid outcries from religious communities. The country is also engaged in an ongoing process of litigation seeking to return property that was seized from churches in the middle of the 20th century.

The government pursues a strong policy of religious toleration and criticism of extremism and intolerance, to the point of awarding prison time for denying the Holocaust. In spite of this program, the right-wing Jobbik Magyarországért Mozgalom nationalist party, known for its anti-Semitic and anti-Roma agenda, won 12% of the Hungarian parliament seats in 2010. Its rise coincided with the growth of extremist groups during a period of political friction and economic uncertainty, and while the conservative center-right Fidesz-KNDP party won approximately a two-thirds majority, the growing tide of extremism continues to worry the tolerant factions of the nation.

John Soboslai

See also Christianity; Eastern Orthodox Christianity; Economic Issues and Religion; European Union

Further Readings

- Berend, N. (2001). At the gate of Christendom: Jews, Muslims and "pagans" in medieval Hungary, 1000–1300. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Braham, R. L. (Ed.). (1998). The Nazi's last victims: The Holocaust in Hungary. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press.
- Hanebrink, P. A. (2006). In defense of Christian Hungary: Religion, nationalism and antisemitism, 1890–1944. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Herczl, M. Y. (1993). Christianity and the Holocaust of Hungarian Jewry. New York: New York University Press.
- Michel, P. (1991). Politics and religion in Eastern Europe: Catholicism in Hungary, Poland, Czechoslovakia. Oxford, UK: Polity Press.
- Ramet, P. (Ed.). (1984). Religion and nationalism in Soviet and East European politics. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Ramet, S. P. (1998). Nihil Obstat: Religion, politics, and social change in East-Central Europe and Russia. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

HYBRIDIZATION

Hybridization is the act, process, and outcome of multiple elements from diverse backgrounds combining and interacting to create something new. Religions, identities, peoples, social practices, cuisines, music, the arts, and styles of dress and speech can all be hybridized through the meeting and intermingling of various cultural practices and social products. Through hybridization, elements identifying a culture, practice, or people become fused, combined, or melded with other social elements and peoples. On a macrolevel, communities may embrace or deny impeding cultural influences based on social expectations, historical factors, and contemporary power relations; on a microlevel, individuals may face hybridization and expected assimilation of familial practices through processes of intermarriage, migration, intercultural adoption, living and traveling abroad, education, linguistic and social studies, or religious conversion. Colonization, transmigration, and globalization have all greatly influenced the ways in which individuals and cultures interrelate and transform.

Hybridization can occur by coercion or cooperation; it can serve as a vehicle of social collusion or integration—sometimes, it is both. For example, the demands of the transatlantic slave trade forced displaced west and central Africans to interact with Spanish, French, English, and Dutch colonizers of the Caribbean, who, following the ban on slavery, often shipped indentured servants from China and India to work the land. Because of this history, a person can find Chinese-Latin fusion cuisines in Dominican-neighborhood NYC (New York City) restaurants just as easily as passing by community botanicas catering to Caribbean practitioners of Vodou and Lukumí, hybrid religions intermingling African and Amerindian traditions with the pantheon of Catholic saints. When cultures meet, the interaction forces a re-identification of both communities; whether choosing to separate self-identity from the other culture or people or, instead, embracing newfound practices, self-definitions within a community are refashioned based on the intercultural relationship. As communities unite, exchange, or cross-pollinate ideas and materials, groups can become syncretized or, in clashed response, cleave to tradition in the face of perceived threats to cultural stability.

Discussions of societal hybridization spawn questions regarding the assimilation, appropriation, and acculturation of practices and peoples within and through the process of interrelationship. In cases where the empowered and disempowered, or the colonizing and colonized, are pitted against one another, some scholars view interactions from a top-down approach: Colonizers primarily influence the colonized because of their position of power. Other scholars recognize that cultural interactions are a two-way street, and despite disenfranchisement or minority status, the music, art, food, lingo, ideology, and ontology of the colonized can diffuse and engage the masses within both colony and metropolis. Either way, the impacts of cultural hybridity become ever present within a globalizing market that promotes the multinational exchange of goods and ideas through mass-market consumption. Hybrid uses of global products, locally interpreted and culturally integrated, become reflections of community struggles between cultural fluidity, commercial accessibility, and social stability.

Christi M. Dietrich

See also Assimilation; Bricolage; Diaspora; Global Religion; Multiple Modernities; Religious Identity; Syncretism; Translocalization

Further Readings

- Bhabha, H. K. (2004). The location of culture (2nd ed.). London: Routledge.
- Kraidy, M. M. (2005). Hybridity, or the cultural logic of globalization. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

IBN KHALDŪN (1332–1406)

Ibn Khaldūn, Abd al-Rahmān ibn Muhammad (born in Tunis in 1332 and died in Cairo in 1406), is recognized as one of the world's major thinkers and the most famous of Arab historians. His thought bridges the gap between cultures and the intellectual traditions they foster.

Early in his life, Ibn Khaldūn engaged actively in political affairs and showed deep interest in revolutionary changes in North Africa and Muslim Spain. He studied medieval structures that hindered political, economic, and social development.

For his time, Ibn Khaldūn was an exceptionally rational thinker, best known as the author of the Muqaddimah, where he describes the science of society and civilization as a prolegomenon to the study of history.

The Muqaddimah is the introduction to his masterpiece The Book of Exemplaries (Kitāb al-ʿIbar), a thesis on the history of the world. As its subtitle notes, it treats the historical narrative (Khabar) concerning Arabs and Berbers, in addition to those people contemporary with them, who gained historical significance by their assumption of power.

In his scientific study of history and society, Ibn Khaldūn integrated elements of traditional political philosophy. For this, he introduced a conceptual framework without which we would fail to understand the whole of his political and social theory. Examples include the concepts of ijtimāʿ insāni (“human society”), mulk (“power”), ʿumrān (“civilization”), and ʿasabiyya (“solidarity” or “social cohesion or force”).

His universalist approach is the earliest example of a systematic and complete study of human society as such. His general hypothesis about the evolution of civilization and history still represents one of the first attempts to provide a rational explanation for human history in its entirety.

He lived during a period of turmoil and stagnation. In his analysis, he emphasized social structures and provided an explanation for the sequence of political, social, and economic disasters that punctuated the history of North Africa over a period of several hundred years. After initial periods of growth, the history of countries in medieval North Africa (the Maghrib) is characterized by a downturn in economic and social development, or even by a phase of stagnation or outright decline. Of essential importance to Ibn Khaldūn's theory is his idea that the evolution of societies and civilizations is cyclical. The cyclical theory he viewed as concerned with the whole of civilizational change over time.

According to Ibn Khaldūn, religion plays a role in the foundation of power and states but only insofar as it makes social forces more powerful and only to the extent that it is a supplementary force. Ibn Khaldūn regards the ideal unification of politics and religion as a utopia.

His ideas remain a subject of contemporary interest and importance. They can be incorporated into a dynamic intellectual movement because they resonate with our understanding of the problems that we confront in the early 21st century. Ibn Khaldūn's science of culture ultimately functions to illuminate the science of good governance.

Majeda Omar

See also Islam; Islamic Modernism; Liberal Islam; Religion and State

Further Readings

Ibn Khaldūn, Abd al Rahman. (1958). The Muqaddimah: An introduction to history. New York: Columbia University Press.

Madhi, M. (1964). Ibn Khaldūn's philosophy of history: A study in the philosophic foundation of the science of cultures. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

ICELAND

Iceland is a relatively isolated country located on an island in the North Atlantic Ocean. It is one of Europe's smallest nations, with a population of only 290,000 inhabitants in 2005. More than 90% of the relatively homogeneous population are registered as members of the National Lutheran Church, and there is a widespread faith in a unique Icelandic spirituality. At the same time, Iceland is a highly secular society.

Icelanders tend to think of themselves as Christians. In a Nordic survey from the mid-1990s, 42% of Icelanders reported that they saw themselves as "a confessing Christian," 53% as "Christian in your own way," and only 5% as "not Christian." The people of Iceland are among those who score the highest in European surveys on faith in God and belief in heaven and life after death.

According to most Icelanders, religious faith is a private matter not necessarily demonstrated by going to church. Only 10% attend Sunday services once a month or more, whereas a much higher proportion participates in rites of passage arranged by the Church of Iceland, the state Lutheran church. Almost 95% of newborn children are baptized in the church, and the same number are confirmed at the age of 14. Most weddings and practically all funerals take place in the church. Thus, Christian rituals are important in family life.

A unique feature of Icelandic religious life is the relatively widespread faith in spiritualism, which was introduced in the early 20th century. It became popular among the growing bourgeoisie and intellectuals, including some theologians. According to spiritualism, the deceased live on as spirits that contact people on earth on special occasions. In contemporary Iceland, funerals are often accompanied by séances, where a medium will provide proofs that the spirit of the deceased is still alive. Icelandic theologians no longer harbor an interest in spiritual activity, but it constitutes a part of popular religion. Spiritualism of this sort may be related to Iceland's long tradition of concern for ancestors.

Iceland is also a modern and secular society where its citizens harbor a materialistic lifestyle. Science and technology helped raise Iceland from a poor, agricultural society to a prosperous nation in 50 years. Icelanders tend, therefore, to score high on faith in science and technology. Religion has never been the subject of political and cultural controversies due to several historic factors. In the early 20th century, the socialist movement refrained from critiquing religion and the church; no major evangelical movement propagating dogmatic Christianity emerged; and the Church of Iceland has been rather liberal. Contemporary Icelanders embrace modernism and traditional Christianity with a focus on bridging the past and future—common themes in Icelandic culture.

Inger Furseth

See also Ancestors; Nordic Countries; Protestant Christianity; Spiritualism

Further Readings

Pétursson, P. (1988). The relevance of secularization in Iceland. Social Compass, 35(1), 107–124.

Pétursson, P. (2005). Ancestors and destiny: Icelanders' approach to death and the afterlife. Tidsskrift for kirke, religion og samfunn, 18(1), 1–15.

Swatos, W. H., & Gissurason, L. R. (1996). Icelandic spiritualism: Mediumship and modernity in Iceland. London: Transaction Publishers.

IGREJA UNIVERSAL

The Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus (IURD) is a Latin American Pentecostal Christian movement (founded in 1977 by Edir Macedo) that by 2010 had more than 6 million adherents in most parts of the world. It is similar to some neo-Pentecostal churches in the sense that it is more interested in alleviating current human problems (e.g., poverty, unemployment, hunger, and illness) than in effecting the salvation of sinners, spiritual conversion, and moral purification. Demons and evil spirits, not the people themselves, are considered responsible for sins and crime. They are believed to possess human beings, who then become evildoers or get sick. They have to be exorcised by pastors because only they have the spiritual power for this task. This operation, however, comes with a price. The war against demons (their version of Liberation Theology) is all-important. The other aspect of neo-Pentecostalism is the “theology of prosperity,” stating that everyone has the right to enjoy life here and now rather than waiting for rewards after death. Happiness can only be achieved, however, by generous contributions to the church. The beliefs in magic and witchcraft, common in Latin America, are taken for granted.

Most adherents of the IURD are members of an urban lower middle class, who participate in emotive ceremonies, which help them to overcome stress and fear. They are active actors in these rituals: By order of the pastor, they raise their arms, move their body, sing, and shout; these movements have therapeutic effects on the faithful. After a session, a generous contribution is expected, which helps the IURD to finance radio and TV programs in order to attract more believers. Those who are cured tell their histories on radio and TV—how miracles happened that changed their way of life.

The church is directed by its founder from his headquarters in Brazil. Many young pastors all over the world are Brazilians who received a short intensive training at home, although in recent years, many native assistants in other countries also became “leaders.” The larger churches, often lavishly decorated former movie theaters, are open seven times a week, offering three daily services. In each meeting, a large number of pastors and their assistants, elegantly dressed and well-groomed, take part and pray over the faithful, touching their heads or embracing them. Each day a new topic is treated: problems in the family, lack of work, a fight in the family, and so on. On Tuesdays, the sick are cured, and on Fridays, evil spirits are exorcised. Those who are supposedly possessed by demons are manipulated by the pastors when they suddenly act wildly or when they enter in an altered state of consciousness. Supposedly, the spirits speak from the mouth of the possessed, entering into conversation with the pastors. They explain why they are present and where they come from. These shows are watched with great excitement by the audience. Finally, the “war” is over; the discussions end: “The spirits are burnt” (queima-queima).

Money is collected several times during each session. All kinds of activities are invented to raise money. For example, a bowl with water from the Jordan River is placed on the altar. Those who are willing to pay $50 can now wash their hands in the bowl. Afterward, others paying $20 have the same privilege, and at the end, those who pay $10 are also admitted, but of course, the spiritual power of the water has decreased. Blessed medals are given away, protecting the believers against evils, like amulets. At other times, pieces of cloth are distributed and should be placed on one’s body to cure a pain. The following week, the cloth has to be returned in an envelope, which also contains money.

The IURD is opposed to Umbanda, Candomblé, and other African Brazilian religions, perhaps because they offer similar rites and services to adherents. They also wage war against evil spirits, which have to be eliminated with the help of prayers, magic rites, and blood sacrifices. For neo-Pentecostals and Umbandistas, exorcisms and spirit possession are well-known rituals as many have participated in occult ceremonies before. The religious discourse is similar in Cuban Santería and the Cult of María Lionza.

The IURD founded the Asociación Benéfica Cristiana in most Latin-American countries; through this institution food, medical drugs, and clothing are distributed three or four times every year to the poor. These events receive wide publicity on TV and radio.

Over the years, the IURD adopted different names in Latin America, such as Oración fuerte al Espíritu Santo (“Strong Prayers to the Holy Spirit”), Pare de Sufrir (“Stop Suffering”), and Centro Mayor de Ayuda Espiritual (“Major Center of Spiritual Help”). The English name is Universal Church for the Kingdom of God.

In each country, the church is supervised by a Brazilian bishop, who is careful not to interfere in local politics. In contrast, the IURD in Brazil has an increasing influence in national politics. The most important Brazilian TV enterprise is in the hands of this church. It is said that Lula da Silva became president only with the help of the IURD.

The IURD is a multinational institution, with increasing economic power; it is a religious super-market that offers new ways to solve the multiple problems of our times and has become popular by offering a contemporary relevance and immediacy, which members found lacking in their churches of origin.

Angelina Pollak-Eltz

See also Brazil; Latin America; New Religions in South America; Pentecostal Movements; Pentecostal Movements in Latin America; Popular Religion

Further Readings

- Campos, L. S. (1997). Teatro, templo y Mercado. Petropolis, Brazil: Voces.
- Corten, A., Dozon, J.-P., & Oro, A. (2003). Les nouveaux conquérants de la foi, l'Eglise Universelle du Royaume de Dieu en Brésil [The new conquerors of the faith: The Universal Church of the Kingdom of God in Brazil]. Paris: Karthala.
- Edwards, C., & Steward-Gambino, H. (Eds.). (1997). Politics and Pentecostalism in Latin America. Boulder, CO: Westview.
- Pollak-Eltz, A. (2003). Las Iglesias neopentecostales brasileras en Venezuela y su traasfondo catolico popular y afroamericano. Buenos Aires, Argentina: Congreso sobre religiosidad popular.

IMMIGRATION

The legal and illegal, forced and voluntary migration of individuals, families, and whole communities across national borders and indeed across hemispheres has had a dramatic influence on the current shape of religion in both sending and receiving countries. While humans have always been mobile, contemporary migration is uniquely marked by economic, social, cultural, and religious globalization as well as highly efficient and relatively inexpensive travel and communications technologies.

Immigration to settler or predominately immigrant-receiving countries such as Canada, the United States, and Australia was once based on racially and religiously discriminatory practices that guaranteed that these states would remain almost exclusively White and Christian. However, since the late 1960s, most of these societies have moved toward relatively liberal, market-driven, and rights-oriented policies. While the United States is still one of the most common destinations for the world's immigrants, it also attracts large numbers of illegal immigrants (mostly from Latin America), a reality that has spawned major political debates around civil and conventional religion in the United States. In western Europe, post-World War II labor shortages and economic expansion led to an influx of former colonial subjects who were familiar with the language, legal framework, and political culture of their colonial masters; the long-term ramifications of this form of immigration has become a fraught topic throughout the West.

In general, these changes in immigration policies and practices in the West are related to three main changes in the religious and social spheres. First, at the political and legal levels, there is de-Christianization, as many states move (unevenly) toward the increased differentiation of "church" and "state." Second, de-Europeanization of Christianity occurs, as Christian immigration from Asia and Africa redefines Christianity in the West. Third, immigration increases the size and proportion of non-Christian communities in the West; as such, many scholars and policy makers now question whether Western institutions and laws are capable of adequately accommodating the religious diversity generated by post-1960s immigration patterns.

From the perspective of the source countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America, immigration to the West/North is associated with new transnational forms of religious, economic, political, and cultural identification in which notions of home, self, and religiosity are subject to constant negotiation. Finally, while the post-September 11 "securitization" of non-European and non-Christian immigration to the West reminds us to pay attention to political turmoil and changing immigration patterns when we reflect critically on contemporary religion, scholars of religion are just beginning to come to terms with the complex implications of increased human mobility.

Paul Bramadat

See also Global Religion; Pluralism; Refugees; Transnational

Further Readings

- Banchoff, T. (Ed.). (2007). Democracy and the new religious pluralism. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Beyer, P. (2006). Religions in global society. London: Routledge.
- Levitt, P. (2003). "You know, Abraham was really the first immigrant": Religion and transnational migration. International Migration Review, 37, 847–873.
- Michael, F., & Hoge, D. (2007). Religion and the new immigrants: How faith communities form our newest citizens. New York: Oxford University Press.

INCAS

The ancient South American religion of the Incas encompasses both political and spiritual elements as an integral part of the largest empire in the Americas, historically beginning in 1438 with the rise to power of Emperor Pachacuti Yupanqui. Governing more than 906,000 square miles of South America by the time of the Spanish conquest in 1532, the Inca Empire, or Tawantinsuyu, held a general belief system and series of religious practices that intertwined with the ideology of the ruling elite. While this ruling class called themselves Incas, the term was not a widespread cultural denotation; instead, individual descent groups retained the names that tied them to their region of origins. The religious beliefs and practices discussed here were spread by the Incas but without the need for active evangelization as the Incaic religion grew out of and accommodated the long-standing religious culture of the South American peoples they conquered.

Western South America was home to complex civilizations since at least 3000 BCE, referred to as Andean cultures. None of these cultures, including that of the Incas, developed a writing system, necessitating the scholar to seek information from extant material culture, archaeological investigations, the writings of Spanish missionaries and other chroniclers of the Colonial Period, and contemporary ethnographic comparisons. Ancient Andean societies were agriculture based, despite the environmental difficulties of life in the harsh coastal desert, the thin air of the mountains, and the recurring El Niño weather events.

With their capital in the central Peruvian highland Cuzco, the Incas developed systems to control, supervise, and organize their massive empire, much of which centered on management of religious symbols and rituals. Water scarcity was a consistent problem in the ancient Andean world, and water gods and goddesses were worshipped, mythologized, and given sacrifices in the hope of ensuring human survival. With elaborate canal systems, the Incas managed this crucial resource and the religious import it carried. A number of imperial holidays publicly placed the Inca emperor as the regulator of agricultural life, who ritually planted and harvested the first ears of corn every year.

The Inca emperor was more than just the singular man who controlled the vast empire and its subjects. The emperor embodied complementary spiritual and physical presences that were widely accepted as part of the Andean worldview. Male and female forces were one major aspect of the duality central to Andean understanding. The Inca emperor was balanced in this way by his wife, connected spiritually through ceremony and physically as his full-blooded sister. Furthermore, the Inca emperor's tacitly understood supernatural descent allowed him to embody the complementary corporeal and divine realms. With parentage claimed to be from the sun deity Inti, the Incas emphasized his role in agricultural welfare.

Inti was the patron deity of the Incas but was only one of the forces that made up the complex Incaic supernatural realm. The supernatural was a constant and very real presence in Andean life, consisting of two main categories: deities and animistic forces taking physical form or huacas. Notions of duality and complementarity were central to religious beliefs. All things, whether supernatural, mundane, political, or social, existed in a crucial balance of forces such as male and female, good and bad, civilization and disorder, upper and lower, dry and wet, highlands and lowlands. Maintenance of this balance was essential to life and the prevention of chaos. Each deity had a complement that checked his or her power. The principal deity of the Incas was Viracocha, a creator god who initiated life, according to differing accounts, on an island in Lake Titicaca in Bolivia or nearby. After creating life and instituting human civilization, Viracocha played a passive role in everyday occurrences and was worshipped for his act of origins. When conquering a new territory, the Incas established Viracocha as a central deity, requiring reverence to this symbolic presence of the Inca Empire. Other deities played a significantly active role in the lives of Inca subjects, wielding both destructive and beneficial powers over the agriculture-based society. The earth-mother goddess, Pachamama, was an active counterpart to Viracocha, receiving constant praise and gifts to ensure her beneficence. Mamaquilla, the moon, was the sister-wife of Inti, marking agricultural time as a necessary complement to the sun. A dualistic set of deities had jurisdiction over water: the male thunder and rain, Illapa, and the female ocean and streams, Mamacocha. These and other deities were added to the pantheons of conquered territories. If a particular region already worshipped gods similar to the Incaic deities, they would be renamed to comply with imperial consistency.

Perhaps the most complex aspect of the Incaic religion was the huaca, which, although physically and spiritually present, active, and having individual personalities, was not a deity. This term characterizes a spiritual essence that may inhabit a wide variety of inanimate objects or deceased beings. Elements of the landscape, particularly those that have unusual markings or physical developments, including specific mountains, streams, and rocks, among others, could be designated a huaca. Huacas were an important part of the complementary Incaic worldview, with many considered to be siblings of individuals in political power. As indelible parts of the natural landscape, the uprooting of huacas by Inca military forces, often as part of the conquest process, brought the land and the people of a specific territory under Inca rule, literally and metaphorically. The deliberate mistreatment of a huaca was a particularly harsh punishment. Huacas most likely existed in Andean religious belief and practice for thousands of years, as archaeological sites are often arranged around natural objects.

The deceased could also be a huaca, either as a mummy or as a part of an existing sacred place. Although there was an Incaic afterlife, the dead participated fully in life as mummies, huacas, or entombed individuals. Death was not an ending but a point of transition between life and residence with the ancestors. The Incaic spiritual realm was divided into the upper, lower, and living worlds, but the spirits of the dead never left the Earth. Ancestors were provided food, corn beer (chicha), utensils, and sacrifices. Mummies of past Incas took part in rituals, festivals, and feasts and were even brought on visits to other mummies and huacas. Incas held their lands after death, forcing each newly ascended Inca to gain new land tribute.

Deities and huacas were worshipped in similar manners, with prayer, sacrifice, and ritual taking place at the location of their residence. Deities and mummies resided in specially built temples, cared for by religious specialists. Religious specialists consisted of priests and priestesses, sorcerers, and the Inca themselves. Sorcerers, often the elderly or disabled, were sought by the public for all major life decisions. These individuals cast lots or performed other methods of divining to determine outcomes and omens of specific actions. A class of priests and cloistered women cared for deities and huacas, ensuring that they were properly fed and clothed, received adequate sacrifices, and honored with appropriate prayers. Sacrifices of food and chicha beer were shared between the religious specialists and the supernatural.

Sacrifice took a number of forms in Incaic religious practice. Frequent offerings to huacas and deities involved the provision of food, alcohol, coca leaves, domesticated animals, or people. Such provisions were set aside in all territories controlled by the Incas, consisting of approximately two thirds of a region's agricultural production. Each of these sacrificial items was integral to survival, and their donation to the spiritual realm was an act of surrender, sharing life with the supernatural to create a cyclical balance between worlds.

Equilibrium and order defined the Incaic worldview, since ages of time were ended by cataclysmic events, or pachakuti. The need for organization extended to space and time, exemplified by the ceque system, which emphasized the connection between politics, religion, and space. Ceques, or sight lines, originated at Cuzco and stretched to the limits of the empire. These lines related directly to the ritual calendar as each ceque had a huaca associated with it and a day of the year on which this huaca was honored. Other viewing points in Cuzco determined the solar calendar on which the agricultural cycle and associated rituals were based. A lunar calendar of 12 months determined annual celebrations, many of which related to the Incas' political and social role within the mundane and supernatural worlds.

Following the Spanish conquest, the Incas and their subjects retained a considerable degree of their indigenous religious beliefs and practices. The deep-rooted ties to ancestors, origins, and place continued to play a significant role in the agrarian lifestyle of the Andean peoples, who actively celebrated their land and history and both ancient and historic ancestors.

Deborah E. Spivak

See also Ancestors; Bolivia; Chile; Ecuador; Indigenous Religions; Latin America; Peru; Sacred Places

Further Readings

- Acosta, J. d., & Mangan, J. E. (2002). Natural and moral history of the Indies. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Cieza de León, P. d., & De Onís, H. (1959). The Incas. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.
- Cobo, B. (1990). Inca religion and customs. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Garcilaso de la Vega, E. I., & Livermore, H. V. (1966). Royal commentaries of the Incas, and general history of Peru. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Guamán Poma de Ayala, F., & Hamilton, D. R. (2009). The first new chronicle and good government: On the history of the world and the Incas up to 1615. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- McEwan, G. F. (2006). The Incas: New perspectives. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO.
- Moseley, M. E. (1992). The Incas and their ancestors: The archaeology of Peru. New York: Thames & Hudson.
- Zuidema, R. T. (1990). Inca civilization in Cuzco. Austin: University of Texas Press.

culture. The very term India and its cognate terms, Hindu and Hindi, are global words, since they were applied to the people, culture, and language of the Indian subcontinent by people viewing it and entering it from outside. For this reason it is hard to define exactly what Hinduism is, though the census figures confidently record some 80% of India's population of 1.2 billion people as Hindu. Another 13% are Muslims; 2.3% are Christians; and less than 2% are Sikhs. Smaller numbers are listed as Jains, Buddhists, and Jews.

By definition, the traditional religious culture of India is the one associated with its cognate term, Hinduism. The terms India, Hindu, and Hindi all come from the name of the Sindus (Indus) river. Foreigners entering the subcontinent from the northwest regarded the people in the region of the Indus and beyond as indus—the Hindus, who by extension, lived in the land of India. The word was used by the Greek historian Herodotus in the fourth century BCE. The Greek general Alexander the Great entered the subcontinent around 326 BCE.

Ancient India Influenced by Aryans

It can be claimed that the very origins of India's cultural history are due to the global transmission of peoples and their traditions. Though indigenous cultural elements in the Indian subcontinent can be traced back thousands of years—the relics of a civilization found at the sites of Harappa and Mohenjo Daro give evidence of a thriving civilization some 2,000–3,000 years BCE—the rise of a distinctive religious and linguistic tradition that identified with Hinduism and Sanskrit texts begins with the influx of people and ideas from the northwest passage into the subcontinent sometime after 2000 BCE.

These people and their culture came from what is modern-day Iran, and in fact, the name Iran is cognate with the name of these people, the Aryans. They provide a connection that links together the cultures of Europe, Central Asia, and South Asia, a connection that is implied in the term Indo-European to describe the ancient substratum of culture that lies beneath both Indian and European regions. The Aryan connection can be seen in the linguistic similarities that are found between many modern European languages and the languages of North India. The gods of the ancient Indian scriptures, the

INDIA

The religious life of India is both ancient and diverse and increasingly plays a role in global Vedas, bear striking resemblances to the Greek, Roman, and even Norse gods, providing another illustration of this ancient transregional connection.

Indian Origins of Global Buddhism

As trade routes developed between Europe and Asia, India was able to influence global cultural currents, as well as being influenced by them. By the sixth century BCE, land routes through Central Asia became established that brought both merchandise and cultural elements from one region to another. These various trails and transfer points were later collectively known as the Silk Road due to the popularity of Chinese silks, porcelains, spices, and other consumer goods that were transported overland to Europe. The Silk Road also connected to trade routes in India and Persia. The “road” was in fact a series of crisscrossing trails and roadbeds traversed by a series of local transporters who would hand off the goods to neighboring carriers and thus enable materials to traverse the entire distance.

These trade routes served political and cultural purposes as well as economic ones. Local military leaders would establish kingships that spread to conquering regions along the trade routes. Religious and other cultural ideas traveled as well, often intertwined with economic and military aspects of social expansion. It was along these routes—and linked with these political and trade patterns—that the religious tradition known as Buddhism flourished and spread from India throughout Asia. This is arguably India’s largest gift to global culture.

The Buddhist tradition begins with the teachings of Siddhartha Gautama, known as the “enlightened one”—the Buddha—in North India in the sixth century BCE. Within the Indian tradition, the Buddha’s teachings are regarded as a part of the sixth-century heterodox rebellion against Brahmanical Hinduism that also included the radical teaching of Mahavira, the prophetic founder of India’s Jain tradition. Like the Jain teachers, the Buddha instructed his followers to shun the ritual worship of anthropomorphic gods and the strict social discipline required by Brahman priests and instead concentrate on meditation practices aimed at a transforming the soul toward a state of existence where gods and rituals mattered little. Though many of the fundamental elements of Indian spirituality remained a part of Buddhist teachings—including the concept of the karmic cycles of existence and the dharmic requirements of ethical living—the Buddhist philosophy was one that could be accepted and practiced by anyone and anywhere, and not just the Hindus of India.

Because of the universality of its teaching, Buddhism became a portable form of Indian religiosity. Its ideas and teachings traveled both by sea and by land. It spread throughout the Indian subcontinent and then south to the island nation of Sri Lanka and east to Southeast Asia, including Borobudur in what is modern-day Indonesia. It traveled north along the Silk Road to Central Asia and then east to China, Korea, and Japan.

There are different strands of Buddhism. The Theravada Buddhism of Southeast Asia focuses more on the monastic tradition, the Mahayana Buddhism in China and Japan has developed notions of celestial Buddhas and saintlike Bodhisattvas, and the Vajrayana Buddhism of Tibet has features from Himalayan animism. Yet the varieties of Buddhism share a central reverence for the Buddha’s teachings, and one could argue that what culturally unites Asia—and by implication three fifths of the world’s population—is the Indic cultural values transmitted through Buddhist tradition.

Curiously, Buddhism—as an explicit religious tradition known by that name—died out within the Indian subcontinent within centuries after the first teachings. Some scholars claim that the central ideas of Buddhism—the focus on meditation practices and the reverence of spiritual masters—survived in other forms, in, for example, the teachings and practices of the Nath yogis. Buddhism as a religion was revived in postindependence India in a self-conscious way by the author of India’s constitution, Dr. Bhim Rao Ambedkar, who converted to Buddhism and urged those Indians who, like himself, had been born into the lowest “untouchable” castes to convert to Buddhism as a protest against the Hindu protection of India’s caste society.

India’s Christian and Jewish Communities

Though they account for only a few percentage points of India’s population, the communities of Indian Jews and Christians are testimonies to India’s role in ancient forms of cultural globalization. Jews came across the Indian Ocean from the Middle East as early as the first Jewish diaspora, the Babylonian captivity in the sixth century BCE. Although there were several pockets of Jewish culture in India from ancient times, the best known were the Cochin Jews of Kerala in the southern tip of the subcontinent.

Christians have been in India almost from the time of Christ. Legend has it that the apostle Thomas came to India in the first decades after the death of Jesus. Though it is impossible to historically verify the visit of Apostle Thomas, it is certain that the Christian community in Kerala dates from the first century. The Thomas connection is enshrined in the name of one of the oldest Christian communities in the region, the Mar Thoma Church. Much later, in the 17th century, Catholic priests arrived with Portuguese traders and created a thriving Christian community in the port colony of Goa, south of Mumbai. After India became a British colony, a small army of Protestant missionaries descended on the subcontinent, reaping a harvest of conversions in several parts of North India, especially among Brahmans in Bengal and lower-caste communities in the Punjab. Baptist missionaries began proselytizing in the mountainous areas of northeast India, which developed the highest proportion of Christians to the general population of any region in India. At the turn of the 21st century, tensions between Hindus and Christian converts in tribal areas in the state of Orissa led to attacks on the Christian communities.

India's Role in Global Islam

Another great cultural tradition to come to India from outside the subcontinent and become integrated into Indian society is Islam. Muslim traders came to the western shores of India as early as the seventh century, where some established permanent colonies. The great impact of Muslim culture, however, occurred during the Mughal rule from the 16th to the 19th centuries. Emperors from Persia set up vast imperial headquarters in Delhi, Agra, and elsewhere, and the great architecture of the Mughal period, including the Taj Mahal at Agra, is enduring evidence of the impact of Mughal political rule. It also had considerable impact on Indian society as the mass conversions to Islam undoubtedly took place during this period.

By the time of India's independence in 1947, 25% of the population of the subcontinent was Muslim. This created a problem for the British, who attempted to disengage from colonial rule and allow India to govern itself. The British were persuaded, however, that the Muslim minority within the country would not receive a fair status within Hindu-dominated India. Despite the protest of Mohandas Gandhi and other nationalist leaders, the British persisted with the idea, and on the eve of independence, they created two countries—a Hindu-dominated India and a Muslim-dominated Pakistan, which had both a Bengali and a Punjabi wing. The partition of the country into those two new areas of Pakistan created the largest migration of peoples in history—some 8 million people moved from one area to the other, and perhaps as many as 1 million were killed in the violence that ensued. Later, the Bengali section of Pakistan seceded and became an independent country—Bangladesh.

Despite the loss of millions of Muslim citizens who migrated to the newly created Pakistan areas of the subcontinent, India after independence still had a sizable Muslim minority—some 15% of its population. In 21st-century census returns, the number of Muslims in India was more than 160 million, which makes India the third largest Muslim country in the world, after Indonesia and Pakistan. Muslims in India are integrated into all regions of the country, with concentrations in Uttar Pradesh, Bihar, West Bengal, and Kashmir. Indian Muslims contribute to all aspects of Indian culture, politics, scholarship, and the arts. Reserved seats for Muslims in state legislatures and the national parliament ensure representation. Muslims have served in cabinet positions and have been elected president of India.

Global Spread of Sikhism

Though they are less than 2% of India's population, Sikhs have had a significant impact on India's political life in the last decades of the 20th century and have been a disproportionately large percentage of the Indian community living in diaspora around the world. The homeland of the Sikhs is the Punjab region of northern India where a series of teachers—a lineage of 10 founding gurus—developed a sizable group of disciples (sikhs) in the 16th and 17th centuries. The 10th guru, Gobind Singh, declared that after him there would be no more gurus; rather, the loyalties of the Sikhs were directed toward the community itself (whose members all took his own last name, Singh) and to the sacred book, the Guru Granth Sahib, which was a compilation of poems from medieval Indian saints in the Hindu and Muslim devotional traditions.

Sikh leaders honed their martial skills in skirmishes with Muslim Mughal forces, and Sikh kingdoms were the last to fall to British colonial rule in the 19th century. The British valued Sikh participation in the Indian army, and Sikhs posted in Singapore and other British military bases around the world began a pattern of overseas Sikh migration. In the last decades of the 20th century, a group of separatist Sikhs led by Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale came into confrontation with the Indian state over the idea of creating a new Sikh nation, Khalistan. The confrontation came to a head in 1984 with the invasion of the central Sikh pilgrimage center, the Golden Temple in Amritsar, by the Indian army; in retaliation, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi was assassinated later that year by Sikhs who were her own bodyguards. In the 21st century, the state has prospered economically, and India's dramatic industrial and technological development was orchestrated by a Sikh economist, Manmohan Singh, who was designated prime minister of the country.

Global Spread of Hindu Teachers and Fellowships

Since Hinduism is essentially the religious culture of India, it has been fairly landlocked, and the ideas associated with the offshoots of Hinduism, such as Buddhism, are the ones that most easily travel abroad. Yet some aspects of Hindu philosophy, culture, and religious practices have been admired and adopted in the West and elsewhere. In the 19th century, the American Transcendentalists Ralph Waldo Emerson and Henry David Thoreau had a deep appreciation for Vedantic ideas of ancient Hindu philosophy. At the World Parliament of Religions held in Chicago in 1893, Swami Vivekananda mesmerized the audience and helped stimulate a new interest in Hindu ideas in the United States. The Vedanta Society was soon established in the United States and Europe.

The radical culture of the 1960s kindled a new interest in Indian teachings in Europe and the United States. A succession of Hindu holy men and women began touring the West, giving initiations and developing a large international following. Among the better known were the Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, a teacher of Transcendental Meditation, who received support from the famous musical group, the Beatles; and Swami Bhaktivedanta Prabhupada, the founder of the International Society of Krishna Consciousness—better known as the “Hare Krishna” movement, from the names for God used in the members' familiar chant. Other famous and sometimes controversial holy men from India who had a large following abroad were Meher Baba, Bhagwan Sri Rajneesh, Satya Sai Baba, and Sri Sri Ravi Shankar.

India in the Era of Global Religion

In the 21st century and the global era of fast communications and easy mobility of peoples, Indian culture and ideas travel through the Internet and videos and are transported wherever Indians settle abroad. Outside India, Indian immigrant communities have become the majority in the Indian Ocean island nation of Mauritius, and constitute about half of the population of the Pacific island nation of Fiji and a sizable percentage of the Caribbean island nation of Trinidad. Large Indian immigrant communities have been established in Singapore, Australia, the United Kingdom, and the United States. Though many of these communities have built Hindu temples, Muslim mosques, and Sikh gurudwaras in the traditional styles, others have been attracted to forms of Hindu religiosity that seem particularly appropriate to expatriate societies. These are the congregational fellowships of groups such as the Radhasoami and Swaminarayana movements—the latter known as BAPS (Bochasanwasi, Shri Akshar Purushottam Swaminarayan Sanstha), which has built enormous temple complexes in London, Atlanta, and elsewhere around the world.

At the same time that Indian culture and society are reaching out, global forces have affected India. The rapid urbanization and middle-class growth due to new economic development, especially in information technologies, has created problems of social and cultural dislocation. New religious and political movements have arisen as a result. The global pattern of radical extreme religious politics that has developed within Christianity in Europe and the United States, in Islam in the Middle East, and in Buddhism in Japan has also been an element in Indian politics at the turn of the 21st century. Conservative Hindu religious movements such as the Vishva Hindu Parishad have bolstered a right-wing political movement, the Bharatiya Janata Party, which formed the ruling coalition in the Indian parliament from 1998 to 2004. The Bharatiya Janata Party received some of its financial backing from expatriate Indian communities located in New York, London, Toronto, Houston, and elsewhere around the world. In this way, some members of the global Indian community helped support a movement that, paradoxically, purported to protect India from the homogenizing forces of globalization.

Mark Juergensmeyer

See also Bangladesh; Hare Krishna (International Society for Krishna Consciousness); Hindu Law; Hindu Nationalism; Hindu Orthodoxy; Hinduism; Mahayana Buddhism; Pakistan; Radhasoami; Sikhism; Southeast Asia; Theravada Buddhism; 3HO (Sikh Dharma Fellowship)

Further readings

- Clothey, F. (2007). Religion in India: A historical introduction. London: Routledge.
- Embree, A. T. (1989). Imagining India: Essays on Indian history. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Hawley, J. S., & Narayanan, V. (Eds.). (2006). The life of Hinduism. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Juergensmeyer, M. (1995). Radhasoami reality: The logic of a modern faith. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Lopez, D. (Ed.). (1995). Religions of India in practice. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Madan, T. N. (1996). Non-renunciation: Themes and interpretations of Hindu culture. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Van der Veer, P. (1994). Religious nationalism: Hindus and Muslims in India. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Williams, R. B. (Ed.). (1996). A sacred thread. New York: Columbia University Press.

INDIGENOUS RELIGIONS

The term indigenous religions refers to the religious traditions of non-European peoples indigenous to Africa, Asia, Australia, and the Pacific Islands. Recently, for political reasons, both inside and outside the university, and because of the reality of globalization, some native populations of North America—that is, Mexico, the United States, and Canada—have begun identifying themselves and their religious traditions as indigenous as opposed to Indian, Aboriginal, Amerindian, Native American, or First Peoples. Although indigenous peoples throughout the world have little in common in regard to culture and language, many of these societies have had to contend with one form of western European colonialism or another. In most cases, European colonialism was anything but benevolent, and Christian missionaries—both Catholic and Protestant—sought out indigenous souls to save from their traditional ways, which were considered to be the product of either absurd superstitions at best or satanic influence at worst.

Though indigenous populations are different from one another and vary from locale to locale, the common legacy of early modern and modern colonization creates many similarities that allow for scholars who study them—most of whom are Europeans or neo-Europeans—to place native-born, non-European populations and their languages, cultures, and religions into a singular category called indigenous. Although scholars are not necessarily in agreement with what makes an indigenous population indigenous—that is, outside the history of colonization or the potential for being colonized—there is some agreement on what makes a religion indigenous. In general, indigenous religions are autochthonous; most are polytheistic, and sacred stories and histories are passed down orally or through verbal communication. This entry discusses indigenous religions within the context of geographic locations, deities, and orality and touches on the future of these religions.

Lands

Autochthonous means that these religious traditions originate from a particular geographic location, its climate, landscape, flora, and fauna. Ilocanos, for instance, of the northern Philippines inhabit a mountainous region filled with rivers and streams wherein the staple crop is rice. The Ilocano word for both “meaning” and “essence” is kababagas, the root word of which is bagas, “rice.” The word kababagas is used for mundane, religious, and spiritual purposes. For Ilocanos, then, given the region that they inhabit, there is no life either for the community or for an individual without rice. The same can be argued about Mesoamerican peoples—Mixtecs, Nahuas, and Otomis—about maize, before and after the Spanish conquest. Another example is the Aymara-speaking people of the Andes. They believe that the mountains and streams (Huacas) surrounding their respective communities or villages (Ayllu) are deities that formerly walked the earth before the existence of humans. The Huacas act as protectors of the communities, making certain that the rains replenish the soil and that the crops arrive on time. Each Ayllu, then, developed a relationship with its divine protectors. Religious specialists or leaders were expected to care for Huacas and interpret their messages. In this way, religious worldviews are linked to the lands that gave birth to them. If the tradition was removed from the land, in many cases, the religion and its myths, rituals, and rites would lose their meaning.

During Spanish colonial rule in the Philippines and the Americas, Catholic missionaries discovered early the connection between religion and land. As a result, the missionaries actively removed indigenous peoples from their villages to facilitate their conversion to Christianity. In some instances, this worked and only scant traces of the indigenous religious tradition remained, which was usually incorporated into Catholicism. This occurred especially with the Nahuas. However, many populations returned to their lands and continued their traditional religious practices. The Maya and Hopi, for instance, resisted removal—sometimes violently—and were able to retain many of their traditional practices.

Colonization and Removal Attempts

In the case of the Maya, in 1545, a year before Francisco de Montejo’s conquest, the Franciscans, a Catholic missionary order, arrived. In the early 1550s, the Spanish missionaries began to round up the children of the Maya nobility and place them into newly built Franciscan convents in order to convert them to Christianity. By 1555, the Franciscans decided to try another way to convert the Mayas. They decided to forcibly remove the Mayas from their respective cahs (“villages”) and place them near the convents to facilitate conversion. The Mayas were forced to move from their ancestral territory, give up their personal possessions, give up their milpas (“lands”), destroy their homes, and leave the burial grounds of their parents. The Franciscans would call these forced relocation areas congregations or reductions.

In this way, the missionaries had easier access to the Maya. In 1562, some Franciscans claimed to have found evidence that the people were still practicing their traditional religion in caves. When Diego de Landa, the Franciscan’s provincial in the Yucatan, heard of this, he immediately notified a number of Spanish land owners and crown authorities to seek and destroy any or all elements of the “idolatry.” Backed with the power of the Spanish Crown, Landa began to round Mayas up and ask them to identify those people who participated in “pagan” rituals. This was the start of the Episcopal Inquisition. He tortured Mayas in the thousands: men, women, and children. Many committed suicide while in Franciscan custody.

A common torture was the hanging of Mayas by their hands and the slow and deliberate placement of stones on their feet. The lash was a favorite torture employed by the missionaries. After having whipped a Maya, turpentine was poured onto his or her body. Some Mayas had converted to Christianity prior to these events. However, for Diego de Landa, all Mayas were in some way guilty of idolatry. By August—the campaign began in May—Landa and his Franciscans started receiving outlandish claims about Mayan religion. The most outrageous was that the Mayas were sacrificing their own children. This outraged the Franciscans, and the campaign intensified. Mayas were now being summarily executed. This continued until Archbishop Francisco de Toral arrived to take control of the Yucatan province. His first order of business was to put the campaign to an end. Landa was sent to Spain for a review by the Council of the Indies. He was cleared of all wrongdoing. Although a church council in Mexico City in 1539 declared that Indians could not be subjected to torture, it said that it could exercise parental discipline. The ruling was subject to interpretation. The Franciscan order in general supported Landa and the campaign of his Franciscans against idolatry. After Toral died in 1561, Landa was invited back to the peninsula by the Franciscans and was asked to take over the job left vacated by Toral. Landa became the bishop of the Yucatan.

As for the Hopi, the Franciscans arrived in 1629, and within a few years they had established a mission at Oraibi called San Miguel. Friar Francisco Porras, Andres Gutierrez, and Cristobal de la Concepcion were the first three missionaries to begin the conversion process in Hopi territory. The priests demanded tribute and fresh water from more than 50 miles away, and they assaulted Hopi women, young and old. Though Friar Porras was poisoned to death, the missionaries kept coming. In 1680, envoys from the Pueblos came and told the Hopis of planned assault on the Spanish missions, which successfully drove the Spanish out of New Mexico.

In 1700, the Spanish and the missionaries would return. This time, however, they set up camp in Awat'ovi and converted many Hopis. The Hopi elders asked the Franciscans to leave their territory, but they would not. Again, the missionaries started to abuse the women and to demand tribute. The Hopis asked the Christianized Hopis to rise against the Spanish, but they refused. In late 1700, all the Hopi villages together assaulted the Christian village of Awat'ovi, killing every Christian Hopi and Spanish missionary. Women and children who could sing the ritual songs were spared from slaughter. This was decisive; the Spanish would never seriously attempt to colonize the Hopi again.

Deities

Philippine Islands

The Tagalogs of the central Philippine Islands who still maintain their traditional beliefs have a number of deities. Their creator deity is called Bathalang Maykapál or Bathala. Although this deity is neither male nor female, Bathala is usually referred to as a male. He not only created the universe, but he looks over all that he has created. He is the most powerful deity in the Tagalog pantheon. There are other important deities: Idiyonale, Sidapa, and Balangáw. Idiyonale, usually represented as a female, is the deity of fertility, agriculture, and farming. Sidapa is the deity of death; he not only claims the dead but escorts the souls to the Tagalog afterlife. Balangáw is the deity of warfare. There are a number of other deities that guard, protect, and inhabit rivers, streams, lakes, ponds, caves, trees, hills, and mountains. These deities are not to be confused with the souls or spirits of ancestors.

The Igorots of the island of Luzon in the Philippines call their supreme deity Cabunian. This deity interacts less with human beings than the Tagalog deity. Cabunian is primarily associated with the sky and all that it contains. They believe in personal deities—that is, they believe that each person has his or her personal deity, much like a spirit guide. This personal deity can be an ancestor, an animal, or an inanimate object. Personal deities are usually assigned by an elder or religious leader after a young man or woman has successfully undertaken a rite of passage such as a puberty ceremony for women or a hunting expedition for men.

For the Tagalogs and the Igorots, as with many other indigenous peoples, the souls of ancestors are revered and, in more extreme cases, worshipped. The spirits of ancestors can be either beneficial for an individual or community or detrimental to the spiritual and physical well-being of an individual or community. Whether a particular spirit is beneficial, benign, or malevolent is usually determined by a religious leader. Interactions, ritually or otherwise, are governed by complex rules and mores, thereby requiring that a specialist interpret the intent and origins of a particular spirit. Religious leaders base their interpretations and judgments on weather conditions, the behaviors of insects and animals, and natural occurrences, such as earthquakes and volcanic eruptions.

West Africa

The Yoruba and the Ibo have creator deities not unlike the Tagalogs. The prime deity of the Yoruba is named Olorun; he is above all other deities and is considered the source of all life. He is a kind and loving deity who values human life. The Ibo's supreme deity is called Chukwu, "Great Creator." As with Olorun, all life, including the souls of human beings, comes from him. As with the Tagalog, there are numerous deities that are responsible for the guardianship of landscapes and natural occurrences. Ancestor spirits are both revered and feared, depending on the circumstances. Again, a religious leader is usually called upon to interpret the intent and origins of a particular spirit. Despite popular misconceptions, the creator or supreme deities of indigenous religions commonly bestow on mankind moral and ethical teachings. Although both Olorun and Chukwu, it is believed, are interested in the everyday lives of human beings, personal deities are important. As with the Igorots, these spirits act as guardians and protectors of humans throughout their adult life. This is common to West African religions.

West African indigenous religions were greatly affected not only by Western colonialism but also by the transatlantic slave trade. Indeed, many indigenous African religious traditions were violently transported to Europe and the Americas during the early modern period. Many of these religions took on new forms under the condition of slavery. Although some elements of these traditions died, other elements survive today in African American Christianity. Even more, in some areas of the Americas, indigenous or Native American traditions merged with African traditions.

Orality

Indigenous religions are largely dependent on orality—that is, the verbal communication of sacred stories, histories, myths, rites, and rituals. For many indigenous cultures, orality is privileged over literacy. In the Philippines, prior to the arrival of the Spanish, literacy was common among some of the indigenous populations, with these populations having created and maintained their own syllabary. In Mesoamerica, hieroglyphic writing was common. For many indigenous peoples, the landscape in itself acts as a sort of sacred text. The names of places, or place names, denote historical events or convey moral imperatives that can be translated or interpreted by religious leaders. In this way, language and land become interrelated. For the Western Apache, hills, valleys, and mountains all have place names that mean something religiously and historically. In many instances, an Apache elder simply needs to point to or mention a particular hill, valley, or mountain to convey a moral lesson to an errant youth. What that elder points to or mentions is not simply a landscape feature, but he or she may be referring to a story about an ancestor, a deity, or animal, or even an actual historical event that occurred either decades or centuries ago. For the Western Apache, then, sacred stories are contained within the land itself. According to the anthropologist Keith Basso, these stories are kept alive by elders who communicate them in the language of the people. To lose the language is to lose the stories.

Morality

Many indigenous stories are concerned with morality—that is, communicating the right and proper way to interact with fellow humans, nature, and deities. Moral laws are common to indigenous religions. The laws for Nahuas, Incas, Ilocanos, and Tagalogs regarding sexuality, for instance, were noted by early modern Catholic missionaries to be stricter than those of even medieval Christianity. Among the Nahuas, couples who refused to have children were executed or exiled from the community, which certainly meant death; for the Incas, adulterers were tortured to death by having heavy stones tied to the offending parts of their bodies; for Ilocanos, rapists were executed, and their corpses were displayed in front of their family home; and for the Tagalogs, lazy people were sold into slavery and only freed after having demonstrated a value for work. In most cases, however, the missionaries saw this as nothing more than a ruse perpetrated by Satan. Moral teachings and laws, as understood within indigenous religious traditions, emphasize balance and harmony. Within indigenous religions, deities are not angered or personally insulted if an individual or a community fails to obey a moral imperative; rather, a balance is upset, and disharmony is the consequence, thereby forcing a restoration of balance. In many indigenous religions, life and events are cyclical and even minor deviations from the norm or tradition can interrupt the natural cycle of life or events. This partly explains the harshness with which infractions of moral laws were punished. If a natural cycle is interrupted, then the whole community suffers.

Religious Leaders

Religious leaders are responsible for teaching and interpreting moral laws. Becoming a religious leader is a difficult task. Most individuals—both male and female—who become religious leaders are trained from childhood. Among the Coastal Chumash, for example, leaders begin apprenticeship at the age of 5, and it continues for 15–20 years. For some indigenous peoples, leadership is hereditary, but usually anyone who demonstrates a talent for a leadership role is given an opportunity to train. There are individuals who are strictly trained to be storytellers; some, healers; some, prophets; some, interpreters of the deities; and some, guardians of sacred sites or objects. Without the luxury of books, indigenous leaders are expected to memorize countless songs, dances, stories, myths, and rituals. Those leaders trained to be healers are expected to memorize all the names and uses of all the plant life within their respective territories. Indigenous leaders, then, are guardians of their respective languages, making certain that those of their words that contain knowledge about beliefs, rituals, and medicine are preserved. This partly explains why when missionaries sought to convert indigenous peoples, the destruction of the language was second only to the removal of the population from their lands.

The Future of Indigenous Religions

The future of indigenous religions looks bleak. The economic forces of globalization are seeking out new markets, new resources, and new lands. Missionaries are still searching out new souls to convert to Christianity, and developing nation-states are engaging in assimilation projects to strengthen their national unity. Many indigenous languages have become extinct and with them cultures and religions. In places such as Peru and Brazil, indigenous peoples are still being forced from their lands. Many indigenous peoples in South America and Asia are deracinated—that is, they are indigenous people who are not associated with any tribe or group. They are what the Spaniards during the colonial period used to call “wandering Indians.” Although some peoples, such as the Chamorros of Guam, have attempted to restore their language and the heritage that comes with it, most indigenous peoples have not had the opportunity to do the same.

Robert L. Green Jr.

See also Africa; Guam; Mexico; Native Latin American Religion; Native North American Religion; Philippines; Shamanism; Spain; Violence

Further Readings

- Achebe, C. (1959). Things fall apart. New York: Random House.
- Basso, K. H. (1996). Wisdom sits in places: Language and landscape among the Western Apache. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press.
- Crawford, S. J. (2007). Native American religious traditions. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Laurence King.
- Farriss, N. M. (1984). The Maya under colonial rule: The collective enterprise of survival. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- James, H. C. (1974). Pages from Hopi history. Tucson: University of Arizona Press.
- Raboteau, A. J. (1978). Slave religion: The “invisible institution” in the antebellum South. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Restall, M. (1997). The Maya world: Maya culture and society, 1550–1850. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Scott, W. H. (1974). The discovery of the Igorots: Spanish contacts with the pagans of northern Luzon. Quezon City, Philippines: New Day.
- Scott, W. H. (1994). Barangay: Sixteenth-century Philippine culture and society. Quezon City, Philippines: Ateneo de Manila University Press.
- Smith, L. T. (1999). Decolonizing methodologies: Research and indigenous people. New York: Zed Books.

INDO-EUROPEAN RELIGION

Originally a linguistic category, Indo-European (or Proto-Indo-European) has been employed by scholars to explain commonalities in linguistics, material culture, religion, and politics attested in various sources across Europe and Asia.

Historical and Geographical Parameters

The specific historical and geographical borders that circumscribe the category Indo-European remain contested and inconclusive. A vast number of works have been produced to reconstruct the lives of Indo-European peoples. Although linguists and archeologists are often at odds, there can be no doubt that striking similarities are attested in both language and material culture from diverse locations.

Indo-European peoples generally refers to pre-historic peoples who lived in geographic regions extending from western Europe to North India. The evolution of the classical 10 branches of Indo-European languages span a wide range of history—from approximately the 19th century BCE to the 14th century CE. However, the category usually refers to groups of people that lived during the ancient period (spanning approximately from the fifth to the third millennia BCE).

Indo-European can be distinguished from sub-categories, such as Indo-Iranian, which represents a more delimited category. Indo-Iranian generally refers to a family of languages (most notably Sanskrit and Avestan) and concepts that developed in Central Asia and North India beginning in approximately 2000 BCE. However, some argue that Indo-Iranian languages evolved, at least in part, from a preexisting Central Asian substratum and not directly from Indo-European migrations.

Though it is unlikely that they will ever reach an absolute consensus, linguists and archeologists alike continue to refine our understanding of Indo-European origins.

Historical Significance

Linguistically, approximately half the world's population speaks a language categorized as Indo-European. Likewise, contemporary religious traditions preserve certain deities, beliefs, and practices that can be traced to Indo-European culture. As such, Indo-European sources reveal perhaps the earliest known instance of global religion.

Indo-European elements found in art, historical, textual, and archeological sources from Mesopotamia, Greece, Egypt, Persia, India, the Middle East, and other regions depict common deities (most notably a sun deity), the use of ritual sacrifice as a means to preserve righteousness, narratives of an epic final battle, and, as noted most famously by Indo-European scholar Georges Dumézil, a tripartite organization of society. Many vestiges of these elements can be found in religions today, though they have been appropriated over time in theologically and culturally specific ways.

Regardless of the debates surrounding the historical and geographical parameters, the term Indo-European continues to serve a valuable purpose in academia. Scholars use the category to indicate that their subject matter under investigation does not represent an isolated instance but, rather, has parallels attested elsewhere, usually in multiple sources from diverse regions.

Holly Grether

See also Ancient Near Eastern Religions; Aryans; India; Iran

Further Readings

- Kuz'mina, E. E., & Mallory, J. P. (Eds.). (2008). The origin of the Indo-Iranians. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Lubotsky, A. (2001). The Indo-Iranian substratum. In C. Carpelan, A. Parpola, & P. Koskikallio (Eds.), Early contacts between Uralic and Indo-European (pp. 301-317). Helsinki, Finland: Suomalais-Ugrilainen Seura.
- Mallory, J. P. (1991). In search of the Indo-Europeans: Language, archaeology and myth. London: Thames & Hudson.
- Renfrew, C. (1988). Archaeology and language: The puzzle of Indo-European origins. New York: Cambridge University Press.

INDONESIA

Indonesia is the fourth most populous nation and the largest Muslim country in the world. Of the 245 million Indonesians (2008 figure) an estimated 86% or 211 million are Muslims, 6% Protestants, 3% Roman Catholics, 2% Hindus, and 3% other or nonspecified. There are about as many Muslims in Indonesia as in all Arab countries together. Most of the Muslims in Indonesia are Sunnīs. Indonesia has up to now resisted the introduction of Shari'a legislation, at least at the national level. State and religion are separated. This is enshrined in the constitution of 1945, and it also forms the basis of the national ideology known as Pancasila. The Indonesian national motto is Bhinneka tunggal ika, or "Unity in diversity." The census of 2000 determined that there were people of 1,072 ethnicities, living on more than 6,000 Southeast Asian islands, but there is also an enormous religious diversity. Every recognized religion has contributed one or more holidays to the national public holidays. In several areas of the archipelago, non-Muslims have a majority. The majority of Balinese are Hindu, while the majority of Bataks of west Sumatra, Dayaks of Kalimantan, Torajas of central Sulawesi, Minahassa of north Sulawesi, and Papuans of west Papua and Papua are Protestant. Flores has a majority that is Roman Catholic. In the Moluccas, the numbers of Christians and Muslims are more or less equal. The Minangkabau and the Acehnese of west Sumatra, the Sunda of west Java, the Madurese of Madura, and the Buginese of south Sulawesi are mostly Muslims.

Pancasila

Pancasila (Sanskrit, lit. “five principles”) is the state ideology of Indonesia, influenced by Hinduism and kejawen, the traditional religion of the Javanese. The Pancasila ideology is a compulsory subject at schools and universities. It is a crime to distort, undermine, or deviate from the ideology. The Army has to preserve the existing social order, including this ideology. Pancasila is supposed to guarantee peace, harmony, and national unity. It is a form of civic religion. In the period of the New Order government (Orde Baru, 1965–1998), all religions had to include it as their basis (azaz). The first sila or “moral precept” is the belief in the Lord, who is One (Ketuhanan Yang Maha Esa). This conflicts with the beliefs of nontheistic religions, such as Buddhism or Confucianism. Muslims doubt whether Tuhan Yang Maha Esa can be identified with Allah, revealed in the Qur’an. Since the fall of the Suharto regime, however, criticism has been allowed. Muslim organizations and churches abolished in their constitution the reference to Pancasila. Muslim militants have been using the new freedom of the press and of organization to press for changes in the law to accommodate Shari’a. In 1999, Shari’a was introduced in the Indonesian territory of Aceh. At the same time pela gandong, the peaceful coexistence of Christians and Muslims in the Maluku islands, broke down, leading to a bloody conflict between the adherents of the two religions.

Animism

The oldest religion of Indonesia is animism. It is characterized by a belief in a magical causation. It believes in the power and efficacy of witchcraft or sorcery (ngelmu or sibir), of the witchdoctor (dukun santet), black magic (guna guna), and amulets (azimat or jimat). Also, white magic is practiced, such as fortune telling, love magic, healing massage, and other forms. Rapuh is a sorcery designed to make victims suffer throughout their lifetime, while sibir is believed to have the power to kill persons from a distance. A more sophisticated version of this system of belief is kejawen or kebatinan (lit. “inwardness”). This is the mysticism of the Javanese higher class (priyayi). These beliefs and practices are still very much alive. The Slametan communal feast, for instance, is still the core ritual in Javanese society. It is celebrated at births, circumcisions, marriages, and deaths but also on Muslim holidays and on specific occasions such as in preparation for a long journey or at the opening of a new shop. The ceremony consists of speeches, prayers, Arabic chants, readings from the Qur’an, the burning of incense, and the eating of a meal consisting of rice cones and meat. The spirits are also supposed to take part in the meal. The ceremony aims at appeasing spirits and celebrates fellowship among the participants. In several areas, the tribal religion is still alive, such as with the Kombai and Korowai of southern Papua, the Punan of Kalimantan, the Sakkadei of the island of Siburut off western Sumatra, the Kubu of Sumatra, and the majority of the people of Sumba.

Hinduism

Hinduism came to Indonesia probably in the first century CE with traders, sailors, scholars, and priests from India. Through adaptation to the existing culture, a mixed Hindu-Javanese civilization emerged. The cult of Shiva, as protector of the state, became important. When Buddhism came to Indonesia in the 6th century it coexisted with Hinduism and sometimes merged with it. In the 13th century, the Majapahit kingdom in east Java brought central Java under its control under King Hayam Wuruk and his chancellor Gajah Mada. It fell around 1400 CE to attacks by Muslim kings from their coastal strongholds. The Hindu influence lasted for 16 centuries and left its traces till the present day. The Hindu epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, became ingrained in the culture and worldview of the Javanese through the wayang kulit (“leather puppets”) shadow shows and the dance shows (wayang orang). These are still played and are very popular. When Java was conquered by Muslim armies, the Hindu princes fled to Bali, where Hinduism has maintained itself till today. About 88% of the 3.5 million (2007 figure) inhabitants of Bali is Hindu. However, only the Tengger priests of Mount Bromo (east Java) remained Hindu. Their population is about 600,000. The Baduy of Bantam, west Java, still adhere to a form of Hinduism known as Agama Sunda Wiwitan.

Hindu influence on the Indonesian worldview and ideas about the role of the state and of the army has been pervasive. For instance, the Garuda bird in the coat of arms of Indonesia is the bird that is the vehicle of Vishnu, the protector of the state. For soldiers, on occasion, the Hindu caste term ksatriya is used. The Pancasila ideology has borrowed not only the Sanskrit terminology from Hinduism but also some of its ideas. The Hindu Mataram kingdom existed in central and east Java from the 8th to the 10th century CE. It left us the great temple complex of Prambanam near Yogyakarta. A recent feature in the spread of Hinduism is the construction of Hindu temples on ancient sacred places in Java, for example, on the slope of Mount Sumeru. This has led to a wave of conversions in villages surrounding the temple. In the 1970s the Torajas of central Sulawesi and the Taro-Batak of west Sumatra and in 1980 the Dayak of Kalimantan had their traditional tribal religion recognized as a form of Hinduism.

Buddhism

Mahayana Buddhism arrived in Indonesia in the 6th century and came directly by sea from the Indian subcontinent. The kingdom of Sriwijaya with Palembang as its center accepted Buddhism under the Sailendra rulers. It existed from the 7th to the 13th century, with the 9th century as its golden age. This kingdom, built around 780 CE, has the Borobudur, the largest Buddhist stupa (monument) in the world. It has 1,500 reliefs and 505 statues of the seated Buddha. In the middle of the 14th century, Buddhism flourished in Minangkabau of western Sumatra. After the 1965 anticommunist coup d'état of Suharto, the people of Indonesia had to adopt one of the then five official religions. Atheism was no longer allowed. This led to a growth in the number of Buddhist adherents. A large number of the present-day Buddhists in Indonesia are people of Chinese descent, who follow Theravada Buddhism.

Islam

Islam came to Indonesia in the beginning of the 13th century as part of the great wave of expansion to the East, which made the Indian Ocean a Muslim inner sea. The expansion was a side effect of trade. Muslim preachers were themselves sometimes traders, or they were Muslim teachers, doctors, blacksmiths, or interpreters. They mediated between the local princes and the traders, and in this way, they could influence them. Samudra in Aceh was one of the first cities to become Muslim. By the end of the 13th century, Islam had been established in north Sumatra. By the 14th century, Islam had established itself in northeast Malaya, Brunei, the southern Philippines, and among some courtiers of east Java. In the 15th century, Islam came to Malacca and other areas of the Malay Peninsula.

It is still unclear exactly when and how Islam spread over the archipelago, but it was a slow and relatively peaceful process. Islam came to Indonesia at a time when it had already undergone considerable development. The Muslim teachers came from India and did not find it difficult to connect to local forms of Hinduism and animism. Their Islam had an Indian character. Often, it was the rulers who were first converted and then the population. According to a myth, Java was converted by the Wali Songo, nine scholars, who were traders but also princes. The tradition calls them raja-pandita or priest-kings. They made conversions by allowing traditional customs. They built mosques with a three-layered roof, symbolizing the three layers of reality according to Javanese cosmology. Later, Muslims of high birth from Hadhramaut, in southern Arabia, entered Indonesia. They settled in Palembang and the trading ports of Java and Madura. They established the Muslim state of Siak on Sumatra and of Pontianak on Kalimantan. The ports of Tuban, Giri, Gresik (close to Surabaya), and Demak became the center of independent Muslim states. By the end of the 15th century, some 20 Muslim kingdoms existed. The ruler of Demak managed to defeat the ruler of the Hindu kingdom Majapahit in 1468. Demak expanded to west Java among the Sunda, and along with it Islam also expanded.

In the 20th century, several Muslim organizations were founded to uplift the masses, with projects in the area of education. NU (Nahdlatul Ulama or the “Awakening of Ulemas”) is the largest Muslim organization in Indonesia. It was established in 1926 in Surabaya. NU’s first president was the ulema Hasyim Asy’ari. It is, with a membership of 60 million, one of the largest independent Islamic organizations in the world. Most of the members are villagers with emotional ties with a local pesantren (“Muslim school”) and its teacher, or kiyay. It aims to conserve and preserve Islamic religious culture, and it organizes pesantren. NU preaches tolerance and moderation and accepts pluralism in the interpretation of the Qur’an. Its theological concepts derive from, inter alia, the Sufi tradition of al-Ghazali and Junaid Al-Baghdadi. It is opposed to Wahhabism and the Salafi form of Islam.

A second organization is the Persyarikatan Muhammadiyah, or Muhammadiyah, which means “followers of Muhammad.” It has 29 million members and represents mainly urban Muslims. It was founded in 1912 by Ahmad Dahlan in Yogyakarta. It rejects all innovations in religious worship that do not have an authority in the Qur’an. It rejects also all teachings based on superstition or fantasy, by which is meant the syncretism of Javanese Islam with its Hindu-Buddhist background. It encourages appreciation and mastery of science and technology. It also aims to foster greater unity and cooperation among members of the Muslim community at the level of individuals, groups, institutions, and law schools. It runs at present around 5,754 schools and several Muslim universities. It also has a social and medical program with hundreds of medical clinics and hospitals. In 2006, Din Syamsuddin, the head of Indonesia’s Council of Ulama, was elected as a chairman, steering the organization into a more conservative course.

Roman Catholicism

Roman Catholicism came to the Indonesian archipelago in the 16th century—with the coming of the Portuguese from their outposts in Goa, India, occupied in 1510, and Malacca, occupied in 1511. In 1546 to 1547, Francis Xavier traveled in the Moluccas, making many converts. By the end of the 16th century, there were an estimated 30,000 Catholics in Indonesia. In 1605, the Dutch conquered Ambon, and Catholics had to convert to Protestantism. Only in Flores and Timor, still under Portuguese protection, could Catholicism maintain itself. Catholic mission work was forbidden till the middle of the 19th century. Then, Jesuits entered to take on pastoral work and mission work. Later, other missionary societies also entered the mission field, especially in areas that had not yet been Islamized. Dutch Missionaries of the Sacred Heart began work on the Kei islands and south and west New Guinea at the turn of the 20th century. The Capuchins (OFM Cap) began later work in Kalimantan and Sumatra, while the Fathers of the Divine Word (Societas Verbi Divini, SVD) worked in Nusa Tenggara (Lombok, Sumba, Sumbawa, Flores, and Timor). Several orders were active in Java in the field of education, health, and pastoral work. Roman Catholicism has made little headway among the Javanese. Yogyakarta became the center, “the Indonesian Rome,” with many universities, colleges, convents, and publishing companies. Java produces now about 40% of all the priests. However, Flores remains its stronghold, with 40% of all the Catholics of Indonesia living there.

Protestantism

Protestantism came to the archipelago with the Dutch East India Company (VOC) in 1602. In 1605, Ambon, the center of the spice trade was conquered from the Portuguese, and the existing Catholics were asked to convert to Protestantism, the ruling religion of Holland. In the 17th century, the Bible was translated into Malay. Till the first decade of the 19th century, not much was done on mission work, though an Indian Church (Indische Kerk) emerged for the Dutch living in Indonesia and their servants and workers. Mission work started in the 19th century. Dutch missions concentrated exclusively on work in Indonesia. Protestant missions became the pioneers in the area of education, mission work, ethnography, and language research. By the end of 1938, there were 2,825 mission schools with 214,000 pupils in the territory. They concentrated on areas not yet reached by Islam. They were quite successful in the conversion of complete ethnic groups, where religion and ethnic identity fused. The Dutch Bible Society was from the beginning of the Dutch presence in the archipelago very active in the production of Bibles and religious literature in local languages.

Confucianism

Confucianism is confined to people of Chinese descent. In 1900, its followers set up the Kongfuzi Social Society Organization or Tiong Hoa Hwee Koan in Jakarta, which aimed at introducing the teaching of Kongzi (Confucius). In 1955, the society was renamed the Supreme Council for Confucianism in Indonesia or Majelis Tinggi Agama Khonghucu (MATAKIN). Confucianism was, however, declared illegal during the New Order period (1965–1998) with its many anti-Chinese measures. In 2000, Confucianism was again recognized, and it received the status of one of the official religions. In 2007, the Chinese New Year was officially celebrated for the first time, and this date has been added to the official list of public holidays.

Recent Developments

There is increased religious freedom in Indonesia since the fall of the Orde Baru regime in 1998. Soon after the fall, several extremist religious organizations emerged, which were prepared to realize their aims with the use of violence. Indonesia's Council of Ulama has condoned the use of violence in some of its fatwas. Some of the organizations that endorse violence are the Front for the Defence of Islam (Front Pembela Islam); the Holy War Army (Laskar Jihad), led by Ja'far Umar Thalib, which is strongly influenced by the most puritan form of Wahhabi Salafism; and the Majelis Mujahadeen and Jemaah Islamiyah, with its leaders Abdullah Sungkar and Abu Bakar Ba'asyir. The latter organization was implicated in the Bali bombings of 2003 and other terrorist attacks. The Laskar Jihad sent in 3,000 Muslim warriors from Java to Ambon, where it was responsible for most of the bloodshed in the period 2000 to 2001. The government is monitoring the activities of these movements closely. Ja'far Umar Thalib was arrested in 2002, and Abu Bakar Ba'asyir was sentenced to imprisonment. Since his release, he has not stopped demanding the introduction of Shari'a. There is now a risk of Shari'a legislation being introduced through the backdoor in the regencies, based on powers given to local governments in the regional autonomy legislation, even though matters of religion remain a national matter. From 2004 to 2007, 110 churches were closed in Indonesia as a result of attacks by radical Muslim groups or by local governments coerced by these groups. In June 2008, a law was passed to ban proselytizing by the small Ahmadiyya Islamic movement.

At Ipenburg

See also Christianity; Civil Religion; East Timor; Islam; Mahayana Buddhism; Religious Nationalism; Roman Catholicism; Southeast Asia; Theravada Buddhism; Vajrayana, Tibetan

Further Readings

- De Graaf, J. H., & Pigeaud, Th. (1976). Islamic states in Java 1500–1700. The Hague, Netherlands: Nijhoff.
- Ferzacca, S. (2005). A friendship, some mediated imaginations, and religiosity in Java/elsewhere. Kyoto Review of Southeast Asia, 6.
- Geertz, C. (1960). The religion of Java. Glencoe, IL: Free Press.
- Hefner, R. W. (2000). Civil Islam: Muslims and democratization in Indonesia. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Hooikaas, C. (1973). Cosmogony and creation in Balinese tradition. The Hague, Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff.
- Howell, J. D. (2005). Muslims, the new age and marginal religions in Indonesia: Changing meanings of religious pluralism. Social Compass, 52(4), 473–493.
- Morfit, M. (1981). Pancasila: The Indonesian state ideology according to the new order government. Asian Survey, 21(8), 838–851.
- Mulder, N. (1978). Mysticism and everyday life in contemporary Java: Cultural persistence and change. Singapore: Singapore University Press.
- Noer, D. (1973). The modernist Muslim movement in Indonesia 1900–1942. Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia: Oxford University Press.
- Steenbrink, K. (2007). Catholics in Indonesia, 1808–1942: A documented history. Leiden, Netherlands: KITLV Press.
- Steenbrink, K., & Aritonong, J. (Eds.). (2008). A history of the Church in Indonesia and East Timor. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Suryadinata, L., Arifin, E. N., & Ananata, A. (2003). Indonesia's population: Ethnicity and religion in a changing political landscape. Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies.

Websites

Nahdlatul Ulama, NU Online: <http://www.nu.or.id>

INDUS VALLEY CIVILIZATION

The well-developed ancient urban civilization of the Indian subcontinent, the Indus Valley civilization or Harappan culture dominated parts of Afghanistan, India, and Pakistan between 2600 and 1900 BCE. Mohenjo Daro and Harappa were the two largest cities. The archaeological findings had given a fairly good picture of the urban planning, economy, society, and religion of the people belonging to the largest Bronze Age civilization of Asia. Information about religion and religious life were deduced from seals of burnt clay, figurines, images of stone, and other artifacts. These exquisitely constructed material objects provided proof of the existence of religious life in the Indus Valley civilization.

The engravings on seals depicting animals, flowers, and other symbols had not only artistic value but were also a pointer toward religious beliefs. These helped reconstruct the religion of the civilization, even though the writing system was still undeciphered. One common animal on the square seals was a mythical unicorn. Bulls, elephants, rhinoceroses, doves, rams, dogs, and snakes were also present on some seals. Some of the animals were three headed; there were tigers with horns and a bull's head with a human torso, all of which suggested specific religious beliefs. The trees, particularly the pippal tree, were sacred symbols. Some of the clay figurines of men and women that were found might have been used in rituals. Phalli and female sex organs made of stone were also discovered, which suggested that these were objects of worship. Serpent worship was prevalent, as could be seen from the figure of a deity with a hooded cobra. There was a picture of a nude female with a plant emerging from the womb on one of the Harappan seals. On the reverse, there was a male holding a sickle-shaped knife and a female with raised hand. This suggested that human sacrifice as well as worship of an earth goddess was prevalent. The most striking deity of the Indus Valley culture was the horned God sitting in a Yogic posture surrounded by animals such as elephants, tigers, buffalos, rhinoceroses, and deer. This was taken to be a proto-Siva image. There were some similarities to religious beliefs of the Sumerian civilization. A seal from Mohenjo Daro depicted an attack on a horned tiger by a figure that was half woman and half bull figure. This was suggestive of the mythology of Goddess Aruru. A seal found in Chanhudaro showed a bull and a woman in a sexual position. The former represented the heaven and the latter earth. This duality was similar to the creation myths of the Rig Veda and Atharva Veda.

That the Indus Valley people believed in life after death was evident from burial sites. Some of the graves contained pottery, ornaments, and mirrors intended for use in the afterlife. The practice of burial of the dead body was replaced by cremation in the late Harappan period. Burial urns containing ashes were also found. In the Rig Veda, it had been mentioned that the ancestors performed both anagnidagdha ("burial") and agnidagdha ("cremation"). A wide range of Hindu beliefs are thought to have Harappan origins, including the proto-Siva form, serpent worship, the practice of painting dots on the female forehead, and the swastika symbol. There is a clear link between the religious tradition of the Indus Valley and the development of Hinduism.

Patit Paban Mishra

See also Aryans; Hinduism; India; Indo-European Religion; Pakistan

Further Readings

- Aronovsky, I., & Gopinath, S. (2005). The Indus Valley. Chicago: Heinemann.
- Buddha, P. (1966). Rgveda and the Indus Valley civilization. Hoshiarpur, India: Vishveshvaranand Institute.
- Kenoyer, J. M. (1998). Ancient cities of the Indus Valley civilization. Karachi, Pakistan: Oxford University Press.
- Kumar, R. (1999). Glimpses of Indus Valley civilization. New Delhi, India: Anmol.
- Possel, G. I. (1999). Indus age: The beginnings. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Sharma, R. (1991). Indus Valley civilization: Circa 3000 B.C. Berkeley, CA: Vidya Books.

INQUISITION

The term Inquisition refers to a development in European Christianity (particularly in the Middle Ages) during which both secular authorities and members of the Roman Catholic hierarchy cooperated to suppress heresy and punish heretics.

The Inquisition developed within the context of the various cultures with which Christianity came into contact as it spread throughout the western part of the Roman Empire. Beginning as a small and persecuted sect within the Roman Empire, Christianity grew as a result of persuasion by word and example. The role of Christianity changed dramatically in the fourth century as the church began to merge with the state after Constantine legalized Christianity (ca. 314) and, later, Theodosius made it the official religion of the empire (380). The church absorbed much of the Roman legal tradition as well as the customs of Germanic tribes as these formalized during the Middle Ages. The notion of the church as societas perfecta (“perfect society”) served as the sacred canopy under which people lived, recognizing little distinction between the sacred and secular authorities. As a result, challenges to the faith were also seen as grave threats to what was perceived as universal order.

Beginning as early as the 11th century, Catharism and Waldensianism were two early, prominent heretical movements that challenged the societas perfecta and that were variously challenged by ecclesiastical and secular authorities. Drawing on a variety of sources, including Roman law and other legal traditions in the areas of what would become France and England, Alexander III at the Council of Tours in 1163 issued the first general legislation against heresy by the Holy See.

The term inquisition itself comes from the Latin verb inquirere (“to inquire”) and inquisitio, which referred to a legal procedure in classical Roman law. Pope Innocent III (1198–1216) formalized the procedure of the Inquisition by drawing on this Roman legal tradition. Especially important was his decretal Vergentis in senium, issued in 1199, in which he equated heresy with the doctrine of treason in Roman law, arguing that treason against God was a far greater offense than treason against the emperor, which was punishable by death. Those convicted of heresy, he later decreed, were to be turned over to secular authority for punishment. Eventually, torture was ruled to be an acceptable means for extracting confessions. Varying according to place and time, punishment could include excommunication, loss of property, and even death.

There was no universal, centrally organized Inquisition; inquisitions took shape in particular places at particular times, extending into France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, and Italy. The brutal Spanish Inquisition is perhaps the most famous, extending as it did to their territory in the Americas. Ferdinand and Isabella, with the approval of Pope Sixtus IV, sought out and persecuted Jewish converts, or conversos, who were the principal target, and later Muslim and eventually Protestant inhabitants of Spain. Both groups were ultimately driven out of Ferdinand’s domain. The Spanish Inquisition was not abolished until 1834. The Inquisition started in Italy in 1542 and was formalized in 1588 as the Congregation of the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition, or Holy Office, in response to the Protestant Reformation and the rise of modern science, famously trying and convicting Galileo Galilei. The Roman Inquisition underwent several modifications over the centuries, most recently in 1965 when Pope Paul VI renamed the office The Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

Nicholas Rademacher

See also Authority; Christianity; Encyclicals; Heresy; Human Rights; Judaism; Religious Freedom; Roman Catholicism; Spain; Tolerance; Torture; Vatican City State and the Holy See; Vatican Council, Second

Further readings

- Kamen, H. (1998). The Spanish Inquisition: A historical revision. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
 Peters, E. (1988). Inquisition. New York: Free Press.

INTERMARRIAGE

Intermarriage, also known as interfaith marriage, interreligious marriage, or mixed marriage, is a civil or religious union of two persons who individually adhere to different religions, faiths, or belief systems. Possible tensions arise relating to issues of premarital sexual relations; the wedding ceremony; observing religious celebrations, rites, and rituals; and the spectrum of religiosity within the joint household that can include extended family members and children. As most marriages are performed with a blend of civil and religious ceremonies, there are various ways in which religion is negotiated postmarriage, especially as the religious laws of one partner's faith may forbid such a marriage. These options include the following: conversion to the religion of the spouse, two distinctly different religions practiced within the same household, a civil ceremony held in lieu of a religious one, or an amalgamation of various practices specified according to the couple.

Global religious pluralism has created new possibilities for intermarriage between diverse traditions, such as Hinduism and Judaism, or Christianity and Islam. However, against this trend, there is concurrent disaggregation of religious identities and systems, creating in turn global conflict and contention between faiths. From birth until death, the rites and passages observed within a human's life cycle all become points of potential contestation. Within certain traditional religious establishments, the view is held that intermarriage is detrimental to the values, identity, and overall continuity of the religion. Some religious leaders, however, welcome the expansion of their faith and view intermarriage as a natural expression of their beliefs and as an opportunity for spiritual growth.

The faith in which children are raised often becomes a source of conflict. For example, even though all three Abrahamic religions arguably recognize intermarriage within the bounds of their doctrine, each also has strict rules regarding children and which parent's religion the child will follow. While different movements within Judaism have differing views regarding children and who can be considered Jewish, traditionally, Jewish status passes through the mother. A child is considered Jewish as long as the mother is Jewish. In Islam, all children must be raised as Muslims regardless of which spouse is Muslim.

A Jewish marriage is considered to be a contract between two Jews and as such, intermarriage as well as sexual intercourse with a member of a different faith is forbidden and technically illegal under Jewish law. Denominations within Christianity vary on this issue. Some churches forbid intermarriage, although interchurch marriage, or a marriage between Christians adhering to the principles of different Christian denominations, is allowed. The Roman Catholic Church, however, deems all unions between Catholics and baptized non-Catholics as mixed marriages for which special permission is required. In both Orthodox Christianity and Judaism, marriage is limited to members of the respective religions as rabbis and ministers are not allowed to officiate a marriage between partners of different religions. While the biblical passage most often cited for this stance is 2 Corinthians 6:14, most Christian churches support members who take part in intermarriage, citing 1 Corinthians 7:12–14. In contrast with the Orthodox branch of Judaism, Reform, Progressive, and Liberal rabbinical associations do not forbid members of their congregation from marrying people of different faiths, even though there is an absence of a common perspective within these movements.

Because Islam presents a nuanced perspective as to what constitutes a nonbeliever, there is debate about whether intermarriage is allowed. While intermarriage between believers and nonbelievers, who are termed as Kuffar/Kuwaffir and Mushrikeen/Mushrikat, is explicitly prohibited for both men and women (Qur'an 2:221), some adherents of Islam believe that Muslim men are allowed to marry non-Muslim women, specifically chaste or pious Jewish and Christian women, as the Qur'an refers to Muslims, Jews, Sabians, and Christians collectively as the "People of the Book" (Qur'an 5:5). The People of the Book are in their own category of non-Muslims but may also be considered believers by God. As an extension of this reasoning, intermarriage is denied to Muslim women. However, some adherents do point out some of the Qur'anic passages on pluralism that address the People of the Book as believers for evidence that the Qur'an allows both genders to participate in interfaith marriage; specifically, these passages are Qur'an 2:62, 3:110, 3:113, 5:69, and 5:82.

Within the dharmic traditions, Buddhism and Hinduism allow interfaith marriage. This is because Buddhism is not a family-centered religion, and marriage is not viewed as a religious act, duty, or obligation. Some of the reasons why Buddhism does not possess doctrinal standards or institutionalized models of the family are the role of renunciation, detachment, and the individual's pursuit of enlightenment. Hinduism teaches that the Ultimate Reality can be worshipped in many forms and thus allows interfaith marriage. Because the Abrahamic faiths do not allow worship of iconography, however, complications in an interfaith marriage may arise with forms of worship involving puja, or offering prayers to an image or other symbol of the god serving as a means of gaining access to the Divine.

Due to heightened globalization in the 21st century, the world of today and the future is becoming not only more homogenized but also more fragmented, as identities and values are perceived to be threatened. The phenomenon of intermarriage is becoming more commonplace and is thus challenging embedded cultural and social norms and traditional taboos.

Sara Kamali

See also Christianity; Diaspora; Global Religion; Islam; Judaism; Multiculturalism; Multiple Faiths; Pluralism; Tolerance

Further Readings

- An-Na'im, A. A., & Chopra, R. (2005). Inter-religious marriages among Muslims: Negotiating religious and social identity in family and community. New Delhi, India: Global Media.
- Macomb, S. S., & Thompson, A. (2003). Joining hands and hearts: Interfaith, intercultural wedding celebrations: A practical guide for couples. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- McCarthy, K. (2007). Interfaith encounters in America. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Speelman, G. M. (2001). Keeping faith: Muslim-Christian couples and interreligious dialogue. Groningen, Netherlands: University of Groningen.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

The International Monetary Fund (IMF) is an organization headquartered in Washington, D.C., whose purpose is to ensure international monetary cooperation, promote the growth of international trade, ensure the stability of financial exchange, provide assistance for countries in debt, and ultimately advance global financial stability. It monitors the economic progress of countries and provides technological assistance and training. In 2010, 187 nations belonged to this organization. The ways in which people practice and understand religion can transform as a result of changing economic circumstances. The policies of the IMF, which have a deep impact on the developing world, should also be understood as a causal force of religious change.

In 1944, delegates from 44 nations convened in Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, to put together agreements that would finance Europe's reconstruction and prevent future global economic depressions. The United States and most of the world had been ravaged by the Great Depression of the 1930s. Europe had recently suffered two world wars. Those present felt that global collective action was necessary to safeguard the world's economies. Both the IMF and the World Bank were founded at this conference with that aim.

Critics of the IMF have argued that its policies further Western corporate interests and elites of the developing world at the expense of the poor. Despite the fact that most member countries are from the developing world, the United States and Europe wield the most voting power at the IMF, pointing to a power imbalance inherent in its structure. While earlier IMF policies reflected the view that expansionist government policies would encourage economic growth, currently, IMF policies reflect neoliberal ideology. The IMF's lending policies have been widely criticized as creating and sustaining relationships of dependency, in which developing countries, in no position to protest against IMF policies, have to accept belt-tightening austerity measures in order to qualify for aid.

In the global era, IMF policies and the speedy pace of globalization have created rapid social change and instability in many parts of the developing world. Contemporary movements of religious revivalism can be understood, in part, as a response to these changes. From the 1990s onward, the IMF's policies in the Middle East have been blamed for the higher levels of unemployment, worsening poverty, and ensuing anti-Western sentiment. Islamic political groups have consolidated around these issues. Theologian Rosemary Radford Ruether has argued that the rise of religious revivalism, corresponding to widening poverty, has also led to neopatriarchy movements in which women's roles and rights are limited.

Sophia Pandya

See also Economic Issues and Religion; Global Religion; Globalization; Religion and State

Further Readings

- Harrigan, J., Wang, C., & El-Said, H. (2006). The politics of IMF and World Bank lending: Will it backfire in the Middle East and North Africa? In A. Paloni & M. Zanardi (Eds.), The IMF, World Bank and policy reform (pp. 64–99). New York: Routledge.
- Ruether, R. R. (2005). Integrating ecofeminism, globalization, and world religions. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Stiglitz, J. E. (2002). Globalization and its discontents. New York: W. W. Norton.

Website

International Monetary Fund: <http://www.imf.org>

INTERNATIONAL NGOS

International nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have emerged as major players on the international scene in the post–Cold War global era. By 2010, estimates put the number of NGOs that work internationally at more than 50,000. They come in all shapes and sizes, but two major categories (which overlap) are advocacy and operational. Advocacy-focused groups address many social justice issues—for example, global integrity, rights of indigenous peoples, and gender rights. The more operationally focused groups work on a vast array of activities, ranging from HIV/AIDS programs to education, global health, and protecting the environment. NGOs with a religious character are often termed faith-based organizations (FBOs) or faith-inspired organizations (FIOs), the latter defined to capture a wider group of organizations. FIOs are also advocates and service providers. This entry highlights definitional issues; the path of their evolution; key roles played by international NGOs, with a particular focus on FIOs; and some debates that surround them.

Contending definitions highlight this topic's complexity. A vast literature exists about civil society and the multitude of institutions involved. The term NGO highlights what NGOs are not: Above all, they are not governments. The word organization suggests that they have some form of legal foundation, and international highlights their transnational roles. Other commonly used terms include CSOs (civil society organizations), highlighting, by stressing civil society, their civic, social purposes and citizen roles in their creation and management; PVOs (private voluntary organizations), a term often used by the U.S. government, which highlights the significance of voluntary engagement and of volunteers; and not-for-profit organizations, which underscores a broad financial character distinct from private business. Each of these definitions has drawbacks, but they all underscore the great variety in the types of organizations and their capacity for innovation and adaptation to differing circumstances and social needs.

There are definitional debates surrounding FIOs, some similar to those involving secular civic organizations and others more specifically tied to the link to religion. The fundamental question of how FIOs differ from other NGOs (Is there some kind of “faith DNA”?) is much debated. Many FIOs function much like other NGOs, while others present their religious dimensions in a more overt, leading role, including evangelizing as an intrinsic goal. Relationships between FIOs and religious organizations vary, from organizations formally linked to a specific religious body (Lutheran World Service), international interfaith organizations that bring together different faith traditions, and less formally affiliated organizations (e.g., Habitat for Humanity International) to organizations that look more like federations or movements. By some measures and definitions, religion is itself a NGO; the terms FBO and FIO highlight that some more organized, generally legally constituted entity is involved, albeit in very different ways; faith or religious beliefs are intrinsic to the inspiration and character of these organizations.

Private organizations whose primary purposes are social, not business, have existed for centuries, but the explosion in numbers and activities of international NGOs dates from the post–World War II period. An important marker is explicit recognition of civil society organizations in the U.N. Charter. Important antecedents were the International Red Cross and Red Crescent movements and networks that mobilized and integrated antislavery and women's rights campaigns. Globalization has contributed to NGO growth, with information technologies propelling new international links, but NGOs also are factors in globalization trends. The quantitative dimensions of what is a revolutionary increase in the numbers of organizations are difficult to pin down, in part because of disputed definitions but also because the diversity of organizations makes counting problematic. As an indicator, some 3,500 CSOs/NGOs are accredited formally to the United Nations. This stands in contrast to the related but different numbers of national CSOs/NGOs: the United States counts 2 million in this category and India, 1.2 million.

Relationships among governments and international organizations, private companies, churches and religious bodies, and international NGOs take us to the heart of what NGOs are, and are not, about. The U.N. website definition is telling: “The United Nations is both a participant in and a witness to an increasingly global civil society.” But beyond a general appreciation that organizations without formal government links bind societies and carry out many social and cultural functions, there is no clarity. Most international NGOs do not rely exclusively on volunteers; many in practice receive substantial funding from governments and private companies. While profit motivation is rarely an explicit NGO purpose, many (notably microfinance and “patient capital” organizations) see business principles and private sector disciplines as drivers of both creativity and efficiency. Partnerships linking many different types of organizations are promoted actively, bridging traditional or notional divides among sectors. An array of often tongue-in-cheek nicknames for different NGO types highlights the complexity of relationships: GONGOs are government-organized NGOs; QUANGOs are quasi-government NGOs; BINGOs are big NGOs; and DANGOs are donor-organized NGOs. The list can and does go on indefinitely. In short, relationships take every imaginable form.

NGOs are part of the accepted international scene, increasingly present in forums where global issues are discussed. That said, their roles and perceptions about them vary quite widely. Civil society is seen rather differently in Europe than in North America. Asia, Latin America, and Africa are seeing rapid changes in NGO roles and considerable controversy around how far governments can and should be regulating them. International NGOs can be a blessing, bringing resources, creativity, and, often, a flexibility to respond more quickly and creatively than governments. But their legitimacy and the core questions—whom they represent and to whom they are accountable—are often present, explicitly or in underlying, often unspoken attitudes.

International NGOs have important strengths and assets. The most significant may be in ensuring that poor and marginalized people—the stakeholders—are indeed heard and represented in policy decisions because NGOs can be more agile than governments and more altruistic than most businesses. They play roles in promoting public sector accountability, transparency, and participatory approaches that aim to empower local people. International NGOs can help break down the barriers of national borders. Sometimes (not always) international NGOs offer less costly operations. They play critical roles where governments are weak or failing, stepping into the breaches of missing services. FIOs play particularly a critical role because they often have deep roots in communities, are highly trusted by people, and have the capacity to mobilize voluntary efforts for a wide range of people.

Less positive views on international NGOs include an image of “self-appointed altruists” whose voice far exceeds both the merits of arguments and their right to represent, for example, the wishes and interests of the poor communities. The balance of power and resources between “Northern NGOs,” that is, NGOs largely fueled by citizens in richer nations, are contrasted with those of “Southern NGOs,” which often see themselves as shoved aside when resources and decisions are at issue. Some international NGOs are seen as motivated as much by a quest for contracts as by the welfare of the people they claim to represent.

The leading issue for international NGOs is accountability. It is the topic of active work, as all concerned—the NGOs themselves and those who support them—recognize the need for clear mechanisms to judge results and especially for financial accountability. Some international NGOs have world-class management and accounting standards, but that is by no means universal. Another issue is the fragmentation that is to an extent in the nature of civil society organizations. At issue is how far their contributions “add up” to lasting and equitable change.

Major international NGOs are household words: CARE, born after World War II to distribute “care packages” to war-weary Europe, is a prime example, as are Médecins Sans Frontières (“Doctors Without Borders”), Human Rights Watch, World Vision, Catholic Relief Services, the Salvation Army, Islamic Relief, and Save the Children. After the 2004 Indonesian tsunami and the 2010 Haiti earthquake, NGOs were at the forefront of the humanitarian effort. Many are stalwart participants in every facet of international development and advocacy, arguing for increased aid and debt relief and providing on-the-ground support for orphans, housing construction, and women’s empowerment. But these well-known entities represent only the tip of the iceberg of the array of organizations working across borders, engaging citizens in global issues and linking compassion and caring with today’s rich understanding of the obligations of global citizenship.

Katherine Marshall

See also Catholic Charities; Church World Service; Civil Society; Global Religion; Globalization; Human Rights; Social Justice

Further Readings

- Benthall, J. (2009). The charitable crescent: Politics of aid in the Muslim world. London: I. B. Taurus.
- Clark, J. D. (2003). Worlds apart: Civil society and the battle for ethical globalization. West Hartford, CT: Kumarian Press.
- Clarke, G. (2006). Faith matters: Faith-based organisations, civil society and international development. Journal of International Development, 18(6), 835–848.
- Edwards, M. (2009). Civil society. Cambridge, UK: Polity.
- Florini, A. M. (2000). The third force: The rise of transnational civil society. Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
- McLeary, R. M. (2009). Global compassion: Private voluntary organizations and U.S. foreign policy since 1939. New York: Oxford University Press.
- World Bank. (2010). Defining civil society. Retrieved March 18, 2011, from <http://web.worldbank.org/WBSITE/EXTERNAL/TOPICS/CSO/0,,contentMDK:20101499~menuPK:244752~pagePK:220503~piPK:220476~theSitePK:228717,00.html>

Website

Berkeley Center for Religion, Peace, and World Affairs, Georgetown University, Global Mapping of Faith

Inspired Organizations and Development: <http://berkeleycenter.georgetown.edu/projects/global-mapping-of-faith-inspired-organizations-and-development>

INTERNET

The phenomenon known as globalization is made possible by advances in technology, communication, and information services. Perhaps the most important of these developments is the Internet, which began as a small network of computers in the late 1960s and rapidly expanded into a global communications network, which links not only computers but an ever-expanding number of electronic instruments. The Internet was first used primarily for military purposes, but its use soon expanded throughout the professional world and then into the privacy of homes, cell phones, and increasingly minute and mobile devices. As the Internet has colonized the daily lives of individuals, so have the concerns of individuals colonized the Internet. Although the dispersed, amorphous, and virtual character of the Internet makes it difficult to quantify, all indicators show that religion has a tremendous presence online. What this means is another question, as the Internet offers both opportunities and challenges to individuals and their religious traditions.

By most accounts, there are millions of Internet pages devoted to religious content, and evidence suggests that use of the Internet for religious purposes concentrates around the communication of information about events happening offline. At this level, the Internet acts as a fairly traditional medium, which reproduces the “real” in a symbolic medium, with the difference that communication is nearly instantaneous and relatively decentralized. Websites devoted to communicating information include the following types of sites: community hubs hosted by particular congregations (e.g., the website of the Order of Buddhist Contemplatives at <http://www.obcon.org>); establishment hubs organized by the governing body of a tradition (see the Vatican’s site at <http://www.vatican.va>); multi-purpose portals offering a sampling of educational materials, chat rooms, commerce, media, and other tools (e.g., <http://crosswalk.com>); evangelical sites (True Jesus Church at www.tjc.org and <http://www.outreachjudaism.org>); international religious-based NGOs addressing world hunger (<http://www.bread.org>); commemorative sites (<http://www.virtual-memorials.com>); and myriad others. The sites listed here are only a minute sampling of a vast range of material online, and as the examples suggest, the Internet is host to a multiplicity of religious traditions and religious-inspired causes as well as their critics.

In addition to communication venues, the Internet provides unique opportunities for technology-assisted interaction, whether individually or in groups. One of the more interesting adaptations of the Internet's potential for interactivity is online ritual. The first online ritual was a memorial service for the NASA (National Aeronautics and Space Administration) Challenger in 1986, and currently, users can participate in individual and group rituals at will. Users can enter virtual temples online, download meditative sound files, view images of a god or icon, and make credit card offerings to communities of their choice. Users can organize and attend funerals online, perform weddings (albeit with dubious legal consequences), offer prayers, stream real-time religious services, burn virtual incense, visit memorial sites, and even perform virtual sacrifices at spoof sites. Scholars are divided as to how these and other adaptations affect religious experience, however. Early studies of religion online were alternatively utopian and dystopian about the ways in which the Internet would transform religious experience, but a second generation of scholarship argues that religious ritual merely recreates offline life. This "doubling" effect generates questions about the reality of virtuality, but such questions are misleading. The real and the virtual are difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish, and they often have feedback effects on each other. More tractable questions about the nature of religion online concern how the Internet affects authority structures, identity formation, and the structure of sacred time and space.

The formation of authority structures and group identities often go hand in hand, and the Internet can transform both. On the one hand, it can be a medium for the consolidation of authority and group identity, especially where communication among the faithful would otherwise be impossible. For example, the Internet can help sustain diaspora communities, and it can create solidarity among sects or cults that are otherwise subject to hostility and criticism. The online presence of the Heaven's Gate group of 1997, which actively recruited adherents online, is one example. Another is the cluster of Branch Davidian websites that originated after the destruction of the Mt. Carmel compound in 1993. For survivors of the Waco tragedy, the Internet offers a virtual space for the community to reconstruct itself after having lost its leader and its physically "real" sacred space. This development is an example of how the Internet can transform religious networks, since the original Waco community did not have an online presence or seek converts online. In general, research shows that the Internet is a more effective vehicle for criticism and defamation of religion than for religious identity construction or conversion.

The Internet's destructive potential is perhaps most challenging for new religious movements because it increases communication between followers and the outside world, erodes boundaries, and can diminish the plausibility structures of new religions. More established religions are also subject to attack and criticism online; the negative Internet press surrounding Scientology is one example. Because of its anonymity, accessibility, and pervasiveness, the Internet has proven to be a convenient tool for antireligious and anticult groups. And even where it is not a question of overt hostilities, the Internet enables strangers to meet online and communicate anonymously about sensitive or taboo topics. Some of the simplest applications of online technology include live chat rooms, where users can discuss religious topics without the supervision of religious authorities. Hence, scholars have remarked that the Internet offers truly "democratic" possibilities, although social hierarchies are often reconstructed online as well. What is more certain is that the Internet has a flattening effect because it enables instant and mass communication between practitioners and central religious authorities.

The flattening effect of the Internet can also be compared to its delocalizing effects. Because the Internet enables communication at a distance, it can foster a certain grassroots rapprochement across people of different faiths. Some scholars have even seen the Internet as a powerful tool for combating xenophobia since it can connect people from different places and faith traditions in a non-threatening way. Optimism about the Internet must be combined with realism about the accessibility of the Internet, however. Use of the Internet correlates highly with wealth, and its global expansion is marked by what is known as the “digital divide.” While wealthy parts of the world have near-ubiquitous web access, there are large parts of the world that do not have the infrastructure to support computer networks. In this way, the Internet actually reconstitutes the racial, ethnic, gendered, and class hierarchies, which it might otherwise destabilize. It should also be emphasized that religious traditions display different attitudes toward online life. Judaism, Christianity, Buddhism, and Hinduism tend to be friendly toward the Internet; Islam is both web adaptive and web averse; and groups such as Scientology have been actively hostile to the Internet. Finally, the overwhelming tendency is for offline religions to go online as the creation of new religions or new religious experiences online is rare or nonexistent. Although the Internet can support offline communities, it has not yet been able to act as a complete substitute for offline life. Scholars suggest that this is because online communities lack longevity, they are inherently transient and decentralized, and a user can repudiate their membership (or begin a new one) with a single mouse click.

Going forward, it seems that the expansion of the Internet will generate two responses from religious groups and individuals. On the one hand, religious faithful will find increasingly complex ways to integrate religion, technology, and daily life. As Internet usage tends toward seamless integration in other spheres of life, it is likely that religious groups will find ways to use the Internet to increase solidarity, encourage religious practice, and contribute to the religious disciplining of everyday life. On the other hand, perhaps the more striking responses will come from groups who experience the Internet as part of an unwanted process of modernization or “Westernization.” For example, in 2001, the foreign minister of the Taliban stated that the Taliban was not against the Internet itself, but it objected to the obscene and immoral content available there. The Internet does make potentially offensive material such as pornography readily available for consumption around the globe, and this makes it a challenging medium for religions that encourage modesty, restraint, and bodily discipline. It is already well-known that modernization can generate a backlash of localism, traditionalism, and antimodern sentiment, and the Internet may exacerbate this phenomenon. For this reason, places and events in “real” time and space will continue to be hotly contested, even as the Internet acts as an alternative “reality” for religious life.

A. R. Bjerke

See also Global Religion; Globalization; Google; Modernization

Further Readings

- Ciolek, T., & Mathew, T. M. (2004). Online religion. In H. Bidgoli (Ed.), The Internet encyclopedia (pp. 798–809). Hoboken, NJ: Wiley.
- Dawson, L., & Cowan, D. (2004). Religion online: Finding faith on the Internet. New York: Routledge.
- Højsgaard, T., & Warburg, M. (Ed.). (2005). Religion and cyberspace. New York: Routledge.

IRAN

For most of history, the geographical area now called Iran was known as Persia. Early Persia was a grand empire, which was invaded by outside forces. Iran has been the center of global interests due to its political and geostrategic location and its rich oil and natural gas reserves. In the past century, Iran has experienced major revolutions, which include the Constitutional Revolution of 1906 and the Islamic Revolution of 1979. It is currently undergoing a Green Movement, which refers to a series of events after the 2009 presidential election in which protesters have demanded the removal of the president of Iran from office. What we are witnessing now in Iran was made possible by decades of activism by Iranian women and men.

Historical Iran

Iran is home to one of the world’s ancient civilizations. Throughout history, Iran has witnessed notable achievements in literature, philosophy, science, and art. In 632 CE, Arabs attacked Iran and paved the way for the Islamic conquest of Persia. In time, Iranians converted to Islam, but the country's scholars worked hard to protect and revive the Persian language and culture. Historians such as Richard Frye believe that it was Iranian culture that helped give birth to the great Islamic civilization during its golden years. Like most great civilizations, the trials and tribulations of history began to take a toll on the Persian Empire. In 1219, the Mongols attacked Iran, but after years of ruling Iran, they failed to have an impact on the Iranian culture. In fact, it was the conquerors who began to take to the Iranian way of life.

At the start of the 16th century, the Safavid Dynasty triumphed in reunifying the country as an independent state. Another historic decision by the Safavids at that time was to make Shi'a Islam the official religion of the country. From that point on, Iranians openly practiced the teachings of Shi'a Islam. However, Iranian intellectuals, particularly sociologist Ali Shariati, have harshly criticized the Safavids for their political use of religion. Shariati believes that this move dealt a devastating blow to Shi'i in terms of its originality and consistency with real Islam, which was practiced by the first imam of the Shi'i, Ali. The Safavids used force to compel the masses into practicing the new form of Shi'a, and Shi'ite credos were exploited to justify political ambitions.

By 1906, the rule of the corrupt and weakened Mozaffar-al-Din Shah led to protests, which ultimately resulted in the country's Constitutional Revolution and the establishment of the first parliament. When Mohammad Reza Pahlavi came to power in 1925, Iran was ready for a transition to democracy. Nevertheless, the new Shah proved to be little improvement over his predecessors, and his rule became increasingly autocratic. Reza Shah crushed all forms of political opposition with the help of his infamous intelligence agency, SAVAK (Sazamane Etelaat Va Amniate Kechvar, "Iranian Security and Intelligence Service"). It was during the reign of his son Mohammad Reza Pahlavi that Iran's first democratically elected Prime Minister, Mohammad Mossadegh, was deposed in a coup with the support of the British Secret Intelligence Service and the CIA. Ayutollah Ruhallah Khomeini seized the moment and invested in people's discontent with the Shah, publicly denouncing the monarchy. His criticism was not tolerated, and 2 days after a fiery speech on the Ashura of 1963, Khomeini was arrested and ultimately exiled. Following his exile, strikes and demonstrations literally paralyzed the country. The Shah fled Iran in January 1979, and Khomeini returned from exile to Tehran. On April 1, 1979, Iran became an Islamic Republic, and for the second time in history, Shi'a became the official religion of Iran with its teachings taking center stage. Today, Khomeini's teachings and precedents have evolved into a system of government that combines elements of Islamic theocracy with bits of democracy.

Iran's Unleashed Youth Power

Postrevolution Iran witnessed a baby boom that changed the country's demographics. With close to 60% of Iran's population under the age of 30 in 2009, the nation's youths have turned into a force to be reckoned with. Despite young people's interest in Western culture, 90% of Iranians still identify with their Muslim roots (Salehi-Isfahani, 2010). As such, the potentially positive impact that Islam may have on the current opposition movement, also known as the Green Movement, should neither be ignored nor taken too lightly.

Although Iran holds 10% of the world's proven oil reserves and 15% of the world's gas, which put it in second place on the global scale, it still faces a high rate of unemployment (U.S. Energy Information Administration, 2010). According to Esfandiari (2004), approximately 4 million Iranians are now living abroad. Every year, more than 150,000 young educated Iranians leave their homeland for countries such as the United States and Canada in the hopes of finding a better life.

Women in Iran

However, the exodus of these Iranians should not be grounds for overlooking improvements in health and education in the past 30 years, especially concerning women. At the time of the Islamic Revolution in 1979, rural Iranian women were mostly illiterate and were married by the age of 18, and the average birth rate was high. Iran in 2010 is quite a different place for women. Primary health care programs have considerably improved, with the government building about 15,000 rural health clinics between 1985 and 2005. The average age at marriage for a rural woman is 23, and a couple is expected to have no more than two children (Salehi-Isfahani, 2010). Women make up more than half of university students. Female MPs have been a part of the country's political system for most of the past 30 years. The people of Iran have come to accept women's public role and their right to participate in any realm of society. Women have emerged ever more strongly as a force to be reckoned with in the country's politics.

The Commemoration of Ashura

The Shi'a community has revered one day as its source of inspiration, awakening, and practice, and that day is Ashura. The literal meaning of Ashura is "10th" in Arabic, and it is the day on which the grandson of Prophet Muhammad, Hussain, along with his family and supporters were murdered in the battle of Karbala in 680 CE. The ordeal started when Caliph Yazid, who was in power at the time, ordered Hussain to prove his allegiance to him. But Hussain refused because Yazid openly went against the teachings of Prophet Muhammad.

According to historical reports, it was at that time that people in the Iraqi city of Kufa, who were fed up with their ruler, wrote to Hussain in the thousands asking the Prophet's grandson to come to their help. Hussain, along with 72 male supporters and their families, moved in the direction of Kufa. But the more politically influential Yazid won over the Kufan leadership and forced Hussain and his followers to camp outside the city in the desert of Karbala. The army of Yazid encircled the camp, cutting off its access to the waters of the Euphrates River. The siege lasted 10 days. On the 10th day of Muharram (October 10, 680 CE), commemorated by the Shi'i as the mournful Ashura Day, Yazid's army massacred Hussain and his followers. The women and children were sold into captivity. Yazid then assumed power as the caliph in Damascus.

The events that unfolded on the day of Ashura became the building block of the teachings of Shi'i. Since then, Shi'a Muslims remember Ashura in ways that are consistent with their culture and heritage. The new ways of mourning the martyrdom of Hussain were influenced by a Spanish tradition of mourning for Jesus. The mourning ritual is traced to ancient Mesopotamian rituals, which helped give birth to similar traditions in Manichaeism, Judaism, and Christianity. Ritual lamentation, wailing, and self-flagellation have been practiced in all of these religions as a means of purifying the body and the whole community (Beeman, 1979).

Shi'i cry out "Ya Hussain" ("Oh Hussain") when remembering the events of Ashura. The suffering endured by Hussain and his family are widely seen as a symbol of resistance and fight against injustice and oppression, and gatherings in the name of Hussain are increasingly taking on a political form. People who are becoming more aware of the purported underlying meanings of Ashura use it as a pretext to express their dissent. Ashura has time and again been the launching ground for a number of reform-seeking movements. For example, this day proved to be rather significant for the 1979 Iranian Revolution and three decades later for the 2009 election aftermaths. Protests broke out on a wide scale in Iran during Ashura before the Islamic Revolution of 1979, and this, according to many historians, was the driving force needed by the people to turn their anger at the Shah into a nonstoppable form of resistance. Some of the biggest anti-Shah protests took place on religious holidays, including Ashura, when people felt protected.

The more recent example of how Ashura was used as a platform to express dissent is the postelection events in Iran. Just days before Christmas of 2010, Iranians took to the streets in the tens of thousands to protest against what they believed to be electoral fraud. There was a crackdown on opposition protesters during the 6 months that followed the controversial June 2009 presidential polls. The protests that took place on the day of Ashura raised the stakes for both the government and the opposition in Iran. Most of the opposition protesters who came to the streets felt that they were safe from the government's wrath because of the holy nature of Ashura. The opposition chanted "Ya Hussain Mir Hussain" to indicate that, like Hussain, they too had been alienated and oppressed. The name of Hussain, the symbol of a person whose rights had been violated, was now used together with Mir Hussain Mousavi, one of the opposition leaders in Iran who had challenged the election results. But a crackdown on demonstrators left at least eight people dead, and the opposition's fight for what they believed was their inalienable right reached a turning point. Hussain's famous quote, "Every day is Ashura, every land is Karbala," resonated with many opposition supporters who justified their resistance as their way of standing up against injustice. The new generation of Iranian youth is no longer divided along the ideological lines of that revolution. They are demanding rights mandated by the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Samaneh Oladi Ghadikolaei

See also Aryans; Indo-European Religion; Islam; Islamic State; Islamism (Political Islam); Politics and Religion; Religion and State; Shi'a Islam

Further Readings

- Beeman, W. (1979). Cultural dimensions of performance conventions in Iranian Ta'ziyeh. In P. J. Chelkowski (Ed.), Ta'ziyeh: Ritual and drama in Iran (pp. 24–31). New York: New York University Press.
- Berson, C. (2009). The Iranian baby boom: Why the Islamic republic has such a youthful population. Retrieved March 12, 2010, from <http://www.slate.com/id/2220390>
- Chapin Metz, H. (Ed.). (1987). Iran: A country study. Washington, DC: GPO for the Library of Congress.
- Dabashi, H. (2008). Iran: A people interrupted. New York: New Press.
- Esfandiari, G. (2004). Iran: Coping with the world's highest rate of brain drain. Retrieved March 13, 2010, from <http://www.rferl.org/content/article/1051803.html>
- Frye, R. N. (2000). The golden age of Persia. London: Phoenix Press.
- Salehi-Isfahani, D. J. (2010). Iran's contested election: Populism and youth power. Virginia Tech Research Magazine. Retrieved March 14, 2010, from <http://www.research.vt.edu/resmag/2010winter/iran.html>
- Shariati, A. (1980). Alavi Shiism and Safavi Shiism. Tehran, Iran: Intesharate Tashayou.
- U.S. Energy Information Administration. (2010). Iran: Oil. Retrieved March 15, 2010, from <http://www.eia.doe.gov/emeu/cabs/Iran/Oil.html>

is a 20th-century invention, the ancient Mesopotamian region that it occupies has been host to—and often the origin of—many religious traditions over the past several millennia. According to estimates in 2003, approximately 97% of the Iraqi population of 22–28 million was Muslim. Shi'a Muslims—predominantly Arab but also including Turkoman, Faily Kurds, and other groups—constituted a 60%–65% majority. Sunnīs made up 32%–37% of the population (approximately 18%–20% were Sunnī Kurds, 12%–15% Sunnī Arabs, and the rest were Sunnī Turkomen). The remaining 3% of the overall population consisted of Christians (Assyrians, Chaldeans, Roman Catholics, and Armenians), Yazidis, Mandaeans, and a small contingent of Jews (the religious and ethnic makeup of Iraq at the time of the overthrow of Saddam Hussein's regime is described in the U.S. Department of State document Iraq, International Religious Freedom Report, 2003).

The country's Shi'a Arabs live primarily in the south of Iraq; however, they also constitute a majority in Baghdad and other communities throughout the country. Sunnī Arabs are a majority in the center of Iraq and Sunnī Kurds in the north. Many Arabs consider the Assyrians and Chaldeans as ethnic groups distinct from Arabs since they are descendants of some of the early Christian communities. These Christians are concentrated in Baghdad and in the north. The Yazidis are a syncretistic religious group, many of whom consider themselves ethnically Kurdish. Some Yazidis consider themselves ethnically and religiously distinct from Muslim Kurds. Yazidis predominantly reside in the north of Iraq. The small sect of Mandaeans is mostly in southern Iraq, with small communities in Kirkuk, Baghdad, and elsewhere. These are the same Mandaeans who have been present in the region since pre-Christian or early Christian times.

The Iraq region has never been monolithic in its religious or social makeup. The territory that is present-day Iraq has been a seat for pagan religious communities, Gnostic communities (including Manicheans, Marcionites, and proto-Mandaeans), Magians (Zoroastrians), Jews, Christians, and Muslims. Often the different communities came into contact and were, in varying capacities, subsumed, assimilated, altered, autotomized, or augmented according to the tides and currents of global history. The remainder of this entry will explore Iraq's long religious history.

IRAQ

Iraq is a religiously diverse country, and although the modern Middle Eastern nation-state of Iraq

Sumerians, Akkadians, and Babylonians

The nation of Iraq is included within the ancient geographical region known as Mesopotamia. People settled in Mesopotamia more than 100,000 years ago when Paleolithic humans gathered in the fertile Mesopotamian plain. Three civilizations rich in religious import originated from those early Mesopotamian peoples: the Sumerians (approximately 4000 BCE), the Akkadians (approximately 2300 BCE), and the Babylonians (2000 BCE). The legacy of religious myths and epics left by these ancient civilizations provides an idea of early Mesopotamian religious belief.

Three noteworthy ancient religious narratives grew out of Mesopotamia: the Epic of Gilgamesh, the story of Atrahasis, and the Enuma Elish. The most complete version of the Epic of Gilgamesh comes from Nineveh in the seventh century BCE, though the epic's development can be traced over a millennium. This epic is a reflection on human mortality and includes references to gods, explanations of creation, and a flood story (similar in places to the Jewish and Christian stories of Noah and the ark). The best preserved story of Atrahasis comes from the Babylonian version of 1700 BCE. Some noteworthy elements to this story are the relating of humankind's creation; a great flood, again; and a hierarchical, anthropomorphic conception of the gods. The Enuma Elish was probably composed during the reign of Nebuchadnezzar I of Babylon (1125–1104 BCE) As Collins (2004, pp. 25–38) notes, the Enuma Elish is also concerned with a hierarchy of gods, though Marduk emerges to occupy a monarchical kingship, which must be seen as a strong step in the direction of monotheism. All of these religious stories offer complex and rich contributions to the religious history of Iraq and, further, are considered to be heavy influences on the more organized monotheistic religions extant in later Near East traditions.

Paganism and Gnosticism

There was a pagan tradition present in Iraq that survived (and was colored by) Alexander the Great's conquest of Babylon in 331 BCE and the Parthian conquest of the Tigris-Euphrates river valley ending in 126 BCE; paganism could even be found late into the Sasanian's rule, which ended in 651 CE. Nearing the terminus of the Sasanian period, the pagan tradition in Iraq was characterized by sacrifice, magic, and astrology. Paganism was greatly diluted by the time of the (651 CE) Islamic conquest (many pagans had converted to Christianity). Moreover, many Christian edicts were specifically directed in opposition to pagan practice. Thus, paganism helped shape Christian doctrine.

Elements of paganism survived in Gnosticism. Gnostics conceived of existence as a divide between good and evil, spiritual light and material darkness. According to Morony (1984, p. 401), broader Gnosticism was a primarily dualistic religious tradition that considered the material world, including the human body, to be sinful and corrupt; anything that perpetuated material existence, such as human procreation, was perverted. The Marcionites and Daisanites brought gnostic dualism to Iraq, and the Manicheans, of Iraqi origin, helped spread it.

Magianism

Magians were a ruling minority in Sasanian Iraq (224–651 CE) but were not totally representative of the elite Persian demographic; indeed, not all Magians were Persian. Though there was little doctrinal unity among the Magians, cult and custom were the most important expressions. Magianism was dualistic by nature. Magians tried to live in a state of ritual purity. They ablated themselves by washing faces and hands with bull urine, then water before worship and after the "acts of nature." Household worship involved ceremonies at the hearth fire five times each day when the fire was fed, just as the fire in temples.

According to Morony (1984), the Magian cult did not include a congregational worship, though there was popular participation in public seasonal feasts, dances, fire festivals, and in the revering of trees. At the end of the Sasanian period, the Magians could be described as an incipient religious community in Iraq. They were united among themselves and differentiated from the members of other religions by an organized priesthood, a distinctive cult and liturgy, a form of religious education, law, and religiously sanctioned social customs. The most significant losses of Magianism were through conversion to Christianity and Islam.

Judaism and Christianity

The Jewish population in Iraq originated from both resettlement and conversion. Ultimately, the descendants of the Judean exiles who were taken to Babylon in the sixth century BCE displaced the native pagans there. The Jewish population reached its peak in the fifth century BCE and then began to decline. Jewish congregational worship and the realization of Talmudic requirements led to the engendering of a definite community that was isolated from the various contemporaneous religions. The Jewish community's synagogues, schools, and court system, with its exilarch and its rabbinate, were preserved well into the Islamic period.

There were two prominent Christian traditions present in the Sasanian period: the Nestorians and the Monophysites. The Nestorians were a vast majority, while the Monophysites constituted a robust minority. The Monophysites served as a foil for the Nestorians as various doctrines were being worked through. Though these two churches were disrupted by the initial conquest of Iraq by the Muslims, they were allowed by the conquerors to survive. The ecclesiastical structure, schools, churches, and monasteries of both communities afforded them unique and systematic religious identities, which aided their internal perpetuation as well as their proselytizing efforts throughout Iraq's history.

In contemporary Iraq, there live almost 1 million Christians. According to Ghareeb (2004), in 2003, the coalition invasion and occupation led by the United States, directed against Saddam Hussein and his leadership, sparked an outburst of persecution against Iraqi Christians by radical Islamic groups. The Islamist groups sometimes associated the invading armies of the coalition with Christianity. These Christian groups had lived in relative peace for hundreds of years prior to the conflict.

Islam

A major religious change happened in Iraq in the seventh century, when Arab Muslim forces under Sa'd ibn Abi Waqqas won what one scholar has called "a historic victory" against Persian Sassanids at al-Qadissiya (Ghareeb, 2004). The Sassanids (Sasanians) suffered a final defeat at Nahawand near the Zagros Mountains in 642 CE. Thenceforth, a Muslim ruling class replaced the previous minority power of Magians in Iraq, and Muslims carried into Iraq convictions in regard to their own religious doctrine and law. They already possessed concepts of congregational worship and of an architectural place for that worship, which proved to be indispensable in unifying elements within the Iraqi Muslim community. This sense of religious community displaced the old bonds of kinship and replaced it with a new bond of faith.

From 636 CE until 1258 CE, Muslim rulers were in control of Iraq. There was much internal turmoil during this time, however. In 656, Alī ibn Abī Ṭalīb was installed as caliph. His installation was immediately challenged. Mu'awiya ibn Abi Sufyan emerged as Ali's worthy adversary. Those who came to support Ali, the blood relative (cousin and son-in-law) of Mohammed, were known as Shi'i. Those who followed Mu'awiya, the eventual unifier of the Muslims, became known as the Sunnī. The Shi'a and Sunnī categories endured throughout all of Iraq's ensuing history; they endured through the Mongol invasion, the oppression of the Safavids, and centuries of Ottoman rule, and the Sunnī/Shi'a distinction persists even in contemporary times where it has become part of the political dynamics of Iraq's post-Saddam era.

Stephen P. Register

See also Ancient Near Eastern Religions; Christianity; Iran; Islam; Jewish Diaspora; Gilgamesh Epic; Kurdistan; Manichaeism; Middle East; Monotheism; Muhammad; Myth; Scripture; Shi'a Islam; Sunnī Islam; War on Terrorism; Zoroastrianism (and Parsis)

Further Readings

- Abdullah, T. (2003). A short history of Iraq. London: Pearson/Longman.
- Collins, J. (2004). Introduction to the Hebrew Bible. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.
- Ghareeb, E. (1981). The Kurdish question in Iraq. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.
- Ghareeb, E. (2004, August 1). History of Iraq's religious community [Radio broadcast]. In B. Naylor (Interviewer), All things considered. Washington, DC: NPR.

- Ghareeb, E., & Dougherty, B. K. (2004). Historical dictionary of Iraq. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press.
- Lapidus, I. (1988). A history of Islamic societies. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Morony, M. (1984). Iraq after the Muslim conquest. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- U.S. Department of State. (2003). Iraq: International religious freedom report 2003. Washington, DC: Author.

IRELAND, REPUBLIC OF

The prominent role of religion in the social life and structures of the Republic of Ireland has been a salient feature of the state ever since its creation. Ireland historically has had ambivalent relations with England and the United Kingdom, and developments in the 19th and early 20th centuries led to the identification of Irish nationalism with Catholicism. As a result of the partition of the island in 1921, the new state comprised an overwhelming Catholic majority. At that time, 26 counties were granted dominion status as the Irish Free State, while the 6 Protestant-majority ones in Northern Ireland elected to remain within the United Kingdom. Catholicism thus came to be closely associated with the dominant sense of Irish identity and with the state itself, despite the presence of small Protestant minorities. The Catholic influence could be felt most powerfully in the 1937 constitution, which established the state as a largely denominational one, as it granted a “special position” to the Catholic Church and included articles, notably on the family and on the role of women, which were informed by traditional Catholic values.

Although successive amendments have watered down the specifically Catholic dimension of the constitution, with the removal of the reference to the special position of the church in 1972 and the legalization of divorce after the 1995 referendum, the Preamble still explicitly identifies “the people of Éire” as Christian and the State “acknowledges that the homage of public worship is due to Almighty God” in Article 44. The prominent institutional role still played by the Catholic Church (and to a much lesser extent by the Church of Ireland, a province of the Anglican Communion) today in the spheres of health, education, and social services also distinguishes the Republic of Ireland within the European Union. The Church and its congregations own and control the vast majority of schools as well as many of the country’s hospitals and social institutions, whether public or private.

Beyond even this very strong institutional presence, the Catholic Church has been described as having a “moral monopoly” in Ireland, at least up to the 1960s. Since then, however, various social developments, spurred on by the opening up of Ireland to international influences, have led to a measure of secularization within Irish society. Many Catholic Irish people have distanced themselves from the moral teachings of the Church, with the development of so-called à la carte Catholicism and forms of individual spiritualities, and there has been a significant rise in the number of people who describe themselves as having no religion (now a larger minority at 6% of the population than the members of the Church of Ireland, according to the 2006 Census).

Since the mid-1990s, the influx of immigrants has led to a diversification of the religious makeup of the population—Muslims are now the third largest religious group, behind Catholics and members of the Church of Ireland, and represent 0.8% of the population; there has also been an influx of Orthodox Christians from eastern Europe. This phenomenon, combined with the relative secularization, is putting into question the overall influence of the Catholic Church in Irish society and loosening the cultural ties between Irish identity and Catholicism, while it still appears too early to describe the Republic as a post-Catholic or even a post-Christian state.

Karin Fischer

See also Abortion; England; Ethnic Nationalism; Northern Ireland; Protestant Christianity; Religion and State; Roman Catholicism; Secularization; United Kingdom

Further Readings

- Inglis, T. (1998). Moral monopoly: The rise and fall of the Catholic Church in modern Ireland. Dublin, Ireland: University College Dublin Press.
- Mackey, J. P., & McDonagh, E. (Eds.). (2003). Religion and politics in Ireland at the turn of the millennium. Dublin, Ireland: Columba Press.

ISKCON

See Hare Krishna

ISLAM

Islam is the name for the faith and the community of Muslims around the world who are adherents of the teachings of the Qur'an as revealed to Prophet Muhammad. It is the second largest religion in the world after Christianity. The majority of Muslims are Sunnī, and the second largest portion of adherents belongs to the Shi'a branch of the tradition. While history dates Islam as originating in Arabia in 610 CE at the time of the revelation of the Qur'an to Prophet Muhammad, Muslims believe their religion to be the completed and universal version of a primordial and monotheistic faith revealed many times before—from the first person to be created, Adam, who is also regarded as a Prophet, to Muhammad, considered by Muslims to be the Last of the Prophets. Muslims believe that previously revealed scriptures, including the Hebrew Scriptures and the Christian New Testament, became distorted in text or interpretation. There are 25 prophets mentioned in the Qur'an, the holy book of Islam, including Noah, Abraham, Moses, Joseph, and Jesus, although Muslims believe that a messenger was sent for every nation at various times.

Globally, there are an estimated 1.5 billion Muslims, making up about one fourth of the entire world population. Even though some people may associate the Middle East and North Africa with Islam, only 20% of the world's Muslims live there. The two distinct identities of Muslim and Arab are sometimes conflated because the majority of the population in the Middle East and North Africa is becoming increasingly Muslim, most of whom speak Arabic and regional dialects. The most populous Muslim country in the world is Indonesia, with more than 203 million Muslims. The countries with the largest Muslim populations after Indonesia are Pakistan, India, and Bangladesh. There are smaller but growing communities of Muslims in Central Asia, Europe, and the Americas.

The word Islam is based on the Arabic root s-l-m. These consonants form the verbal noun

Islam connoting both peace and submission. One of the Islamic names of Heaven is Dar al-Salaam, meaning "House of Peace." The word Muslim, an active participle using the same root consonants, means "one who surrenders or submits" and "one who enters a state of peace." Islam describes the relationship between humans and one all-knowing God as well as the relationship between God and Creation.

Sources of Knowledge in Islam

The Qur'an

Muslims believe that the Qur'an—like the scriptures before it—is the revealed Word of God transmitted orally to Muhammad via the Angel Gabriel over a period of 23 years, from 610 to 632 CE. One of its miracles is that it will never change and contains the exact words of God. While the primary theme of the Qur'an is the oneness of God and His omnipotence and mercy, it also discusses history, economics, ethics, and morality; issues of family life, such as marriage, inheritance, and divorce; and the environment. Muslims believe that there have been prophets sent to every nation and time, and this includes belief in the previous scriptures before the Qur'an, which is the last scripture to be revealed. Muslims also believe that Muhammad was also mentioned in the previous scriptures, which foretold his existence as the last messenger of God.

The Hadith

The Hadith record the sayings and actions of the last prophet of Islam, Muhammad (570–632 CE). These reports also recorded what Muhammad did not say or do. A hadith is made up of a chain of transmitters and the main text of the report, of which the first part can be traced to the companions of Muhammad who were the initial transcribers. Just as the Qur'an was written on pieces of parchment, stones, and leaves, so too were the texts of the Hadith before being compiled into books in the 9th and 10th centuries in authenticated Hadith collections. The Hadith follows the entire prophethood of Muhammad, whose life is viewed by Muslims as embodying the Qur'an and is thus seen to support the Qur'an, offering real-life experiences of how to be a Muslim.

Basis of Shari'a

The Qur'an and the Hadith also comprise Shari'a (lit. "path" or "way") or Islamic law, prescribing Muslim behavior in every aspect of life and social relations, from private matters between the individual and God to relationships with others from the family or the widest community. The Shari'a contains categories and subjects of Islamic law called the branches of fiqh (lit. "understanding"), including, but not limited to, inheritance, commerce, property law, worship, family relations, civil (tort) law, criminal law, administration, taxation, governance, international relations, and the laws of war and ethics.

Why Arabic?

As Arabic-speaking nations compose only 20% of the Muslim world, why is Arabic such an important language to Islam? Not every Muslim knows how to speak Arabic or understands the language, although many learn how to read the Qur'an in Arabic with diacritical marks. Muslims believe that the Qur'an is directly God's Word, unchanged by man, unlike the other previously revealed scriptures—even though Muslims believe in these, too. Arabic is the language in which the Qur'an was revealed by God to Muhammad via the Angel Gabriel. It for this reason that words in the Qur'an represent the most eloquent form of Arabic, known as Qur'anic Arabic. Qur'anic Arabic is not the Arabic that is spoken on the street or even by a diplomatic delegation, but an elevated, layered Arabic, befitting the words of God.

If God speaks all languages, then why was the Qur'an revealed in Arabic? The Qur'an answers with the following: "We have sent it down as an Arabic Qur'an, in order that ye may learn wisdom" (Qur'an 12:2). This is supported with another verse, mentioning, "By the Qur'an, full of Wisdom . . ." (Qur'an 36:2). According to these ayats ("verses of the Qur'an"), Arabic is the language chosen by God for the last of the scriptures. Arabic was also the language Muhammad spoke, and it continues to be a language rich in meaning, nuance, and clarity and consisting of layers of meaning for all forms of discussion.

The Sunnī/Shi'a Divide

Though the majority of Muslims are Sunnī, Shi'a Muslims constitute 20% of the overall Muslim population globally. Shi'a is the umbrella term given to several sectarian movements that have appeared in Islamic history. The Shi'i are concentrated in Iran, southern Iraq, and southern Lebanon. There are significant Shi'ite communities in Saudi Arabia and Syria, Afghanistan, Pakistan, and India as well. The full term Shi'at-Ali, or "party of Ali," refers to Prophet Muhammad's paternal cousin and the third Caliph of Islam.

The differences between these two main sub-groups within Islam initially stemmed not from spiritual differences but political ones. Out of these political differences, varying practices and theological positions that have come to carry a spiritual significance have been born over the centuries. There are great disparities between the accepted practices and theology of Sunnīs and Shi'i, such as self-flagellation, temporary marriage, and visiting of tombs, all of which Shi'i allow and Sunnīs do not consider part of Islam. Also, many of the figures that Sunnīs accept as valid, such as the first three Rightly Guided Caliphs (al-Khulafā 'u r-Rāshidūn), are not accepted by Shi'i, who only accept the fourth and the last—Ali, the nephew of Muhammad. In contrast, Shi'i accept imams after Muhammad to have spiritual powers from God, but Sunnīs do not adhere to these beliefs.

The Five Pillars of Islam

Traditionally, Islam has five pillars of faith, also known as the Five Pillars of Islam. The Five Pillars of Islam are incumbent on every Muslim and comprise inward belief manifested as outward action as Islam not only teaches what to believe in but also how to behave. These aspects of Islam are referred to as pillars because if one of these is weak, the rest crumble, as they are all equally dependent on each other for support.

The Pillars of Islam

1. Belief (Iman/Faith)—comprising the seven articles of faith
2. Prayer (Salaat)
3. Sharing wealth/charity (Zakaat)
4. Fasting during the month of Ramadan (Sawm)
5. Pilgrimage (Hajj)

Belief (Iman)

Belief means to believe in the Seven Articles of Faith, which will be discussed. Belief is also encompassed by the Declaration of Faith (or Shahadat, lit. “Witness”) and is stated as follows: There is no God but God and Muhammad is His (final) prophet and messenger.

Prayer (Salaat)

There is a difference between prayer and supplication. The Arabic terminology makes this distinction. Prayer (salaat) is the ritualized prayer Muslims perform five times a day. Supplications (du'aa) are entreaties to God made from the heart, which can be made anytime, anywhere, in any state, and in any direction, whereas prayer (salaat) requires that a Muslim be clean, having performed ablution (wudu'), and for women, this also means not menstruating. The place of prayer must also be clean, and the Muslim must face the Qibla, which is in the direction of the Kaabah in Saudi Arabia.

Appointed Prayer Times

1. Before sunrise (Fajr)
2. After high noon (Dhuhr)
3. Early evening ('Asr)
4. After the sun sets a little (Maghreb)
5. At night (Isha')

There is a prescribed sequence of actions and words, including set readings out of the Qur'an, to complete one sequence (rakaat) or unit of prayer. The number of rakaat varies according to the prayer and thus the time of day. Salaat can be as short as 5 minutes to however long one wants to perform it, depending on the verses of the Qur'an one chooses to recite. While praying, Muslims are encouraged to gaze on a fixed point on their prayer mats, creating a place of outer focus to sharpen inner focus. The merging of certain physical actions, breath, and spiritual reflections when praying makes it a very meditative experience.

The qibla, or “direction of prayer,” is the direction toward the Kaabah in Mecca (Makkah), Saudi Arabia. Muslims all over the world are facing together in the same direction, adding to the spirit of community. As day turns into night around the world at different times, there are Muslims constantly praying in this direction at all times.

Sharing Wealth/Charity (Zakaat)

The primary type of almsgiving is associated with the word zakaat and occurs at the end of Ramadan, or the ninth month of the Islamic lunar calendar. The charity tax (zakaat), or 2.5% of one's wealth, is mandatory on all who are able to afford it, which is then to be redistributed by the Islamic state fairly. Muslims living in countries where the Islamic state does not perform this function will often donate the money to a charity they support or give it to someone they know who is in need. This promotes complete socioeconomic equality and serves as a reminder to be grateful.

Fasting During the Month of Ramadan (Sawm)

Before Muhammad became a prophet, Ramadan, the ninth month of the Islamic calendar, was the month during which he would contemplate and meditate on life and existence in what is now known as Jabal an-Noor, the Cave of Divine Light. It was here that Muslims believe that the Qur'an was first revealed to Muhammad via the Angel Gabriel during this month. From sunrise to sunset during this month, Muslims abstain from food, drink, sex, lying, stealing, becoming angry, and other activities deemed to be spiritually corrosive. Between sunset and sunrise, however, Muslims are allowed to eat and have sex. Ramadan is the month to sincerely focus on one's inner self and consciously contribute to one's community, as personal conduct is an essential aspect of being Muslim.

Pilgrimage (Haji)

From the 3rd to the 9th of the month of the Dhu al-Hijja, which is the 12th month of the Islamic lunar calendar, pilgrims descend on Mecca in Saudi Arabia to perform certain rituals, such as circumambulating the Kaabah. Pilgrims perform certain rituals in the tradition of some of the prophets, from Adam to Muhammad, including Abraham's second wife, Hagar. Muslims believe that the Kaabah, also referred to as the House of God, was first built by Adam but was washed away by the flood during Noah's time and then rebuilt by Abraham. The Kaabah was then used as a shrine for paganism during Muhammad's time until Muhammad reclaimed the Kaabah after the bloodless takeover of Mecca.

The Seven Articles of Faith

Within the first pillar of Islam, belief (Iman), there are seven articles of faith. Despite various interpretations being given for each of the articles, they form the framework of Islamic belief.

Articles of Faith

1. The Oneness of God (Tauheed)
2. Angels
3. Scriptures, including the ones sent before the Qur'an
4. All of the prophets, not limited to the 25 mentioned in the Qur'an
5. The Day of Judgment
6. Fate
7. Life after death/Heaven and Hell

The Oneness of God (Tauheed)

Islam is a monotheistic religion centered on the oneness of God. This concept of oneness is called Tauheed in Arabic. In Islam, there is one God, referred to as Allah in Arabic, who is completely unique and the source of everything. God (Allah) in Islam transcends gender, race, and language. The Qur'an teaches Muslims that there is nothing comparable to God. Muslims also know God through how he describes himself in the Qur'an. There are certain verses (ayats), one complete chapter (sura), and 99 characteristics listed throughout the Qur'an by which God has declared his attributes.

In Islam, every creature—animate and inanimate—has a special relationship, completely unique between itself and God. Nothing is created without purpose, and the origin of everything is God. Muslims believe that God created humans to act as his vicegerents on Earth and also as a test to demonstrate who would go to Heaven or Hell.

As Muslims believe that the Qur'an is the final scripture to be revealed by God through the Angel Gabriel and has and will remain unchanged for all time, it is important to examine the Qur'anic description of God in the following important passage:

God (Allah) is the light of the heavens and the earth. The parable of his light is as if there were a niche and within it a lamp: the lamp enclosed in glass: the glass as it were a brilliant star: lit from a blessed tree, an olive, neither of the East nor of the West, whose oil is well-nigh luminous, though fire scarce touched it: light upon light! God (Allah) doth guide whom he will to his light: God (Allah) doth set forth parables for men: and God (Allah) doth know all things. (Qur'an 24:35)

Angels

Angels, the number of which Muslims believe to be unknown, are made of Divine Light (Noor) and were created without gender and without free will. Their job is to fulfill whatever tasks God sets for them and to worship him. According to the Qur'an, the number of wings an angel has varies. Even though humans do not become angels at any point nor receive wings immediately after death, each person (Muslim and non-Muslim) has with him or her two angels, one on each shoulder, taking note of each deed, bad and good, which has been committed. These angels are described as "kind and honorable" in the Qur'an also acting as one's protectors and one's conscience (Qur'an 82:10–12).

With the same hereditary makeup as their Judeo-Christian lineage, there are four main angels in Islam:

1. Jibreel (Judeo-Christian Gabriel), who has sent scriptures to various messengers, including Muhammad, on God's command: Gabriel is also referred to as the Holy Spirit in several verses (ayats) of the Qur'an.
2. Israfeel (Judeo-Christian Raphael), who will blow the trumpet twice at the end of time: The first blow will cause everyone and everything except God and whatever he wishes to keep alive to die and the second blow will bring everyone back to life to meet God for the Day of Judgment.
3. Mika'eel (Judeo-Christian Michael), who is in charge of the weather as per God's commands
4. 'Isra'eel (Judeo-Christian Azrael), who is the Angel of Death

Scriptures

Muslims believe in all of the scriptures, known and unknown, that have been revealed before the Qur'an. Muslims also believe that humans changed these previous scriptures over time, which is why there were others that were revealed. The last of these is the Qur'an. Muslims believe that all religions taught the same message of the Oneness of God (Tauheed) and submission to him; thus, all religions share the same origin and are, in fact, the same religion—whether they were explicitly called Islam or not. Therefore, Muslims also believe that Islam is the religion of all prophets. Not every prophet was a messenger with a scripture, but they all served to reify the central message of Islam, which is the Oneness of God (Tauheed).

There are many verses (ayats) in the Qur'an that reference different messengers and different scriptures, validating their sanctity and legitimacy. Several of these scriptures are mentioned in the Qur'an as follows:

1. Scrolls (Suhuf)—Abraham (Qur'an 87:19)
2. Torah (Taurat)—Moses (Qur'an 87:19)
3. Psalms (Zabur)—David (Qur'an 21:105)
4. Gospel (Injeel)—Jesus (Qur'an 5:46)
5. Qur'an—Muhammad

Prophets

In the Qur'an, Chapter (surat) 21 is entirely dedicated to the prophets and is titled "The Prophets" (Al-Anbiya). There have been numerous prophets and messengers for every time and nation; even though there are 25 named throughout the Qur'an, the exact number is unknown. Adam is both the first prophet and first man, and Muhammad is the last of the messengers, which is why he is often referred to as the Seal of the Prophets. Each prophet has taught the same message of the Oneness of God (Tauheed), the importance of God consciousness, the transient nature of this earthly life, and the eternity of Heaven and Hell.

Even though it is Muhammad who is the most likely prophet to be equated with Islam, the Qur'an teaches that no distinction is to be made between them. Again, while not every prophet had a scripture, each prophet is to be regarded in equal esteem.

The Day of Judgment

Islam is predicated on the belief of God as one (Tauheed) and the justice of God. One of the 99 characteristics (Asmaa ul-Husnaa) of God is the Just (al-'Adl). Islamic belief also centers on the idea of death and embracing life through the knowledge that one is going to die. One must always be prepared to die, in the sense that one must always be at peace with others, have one's grievances put at rest, one's debts settled, and be on good terms with everyone so as to be remembered well and prayed for. The seeming ambiguities of life, then, are completely resolved after death. Death in Islamic belief is one phase of life that brings one closer to God. Life is to be cherished as it is a gift from God, and death is not to be feared as it, too, is from God.

Fate (Qadar)

Even though Muslims believe in free will and each person's accountability for his or her actions alone, the concept of destiny encourages positive thinking while also preventing the corrosive "What if?" question. Rather than linger over a past event with a series of "I should have" or "What ifs?" Muslims are encouraged to learn lessons from their experiences and apply these lessons to the present, constructively moving forward in the knowledge that God is the best of planners, wanting the best for his creation. Instead of worrying or focusing on what has passed one by or what might come, Muslims are taught that whatever has befallen a person could never have missed that person and that which missed someone could never have befallen him or her. Muslims are also taught that what people really want may not always be the most beneficial, whereas what people may always like actually is.

Each individual is morally accountable for his or her actions and intentions, so fate and kismet could be distinguished by the following analogy: Someone watches a movie for the second time, knowing what has happened and will happen (God's perspective) instead of for the first time where every action is unknown (humanity's perspective). Along these lines, God states in the Qur'an, "We shall question, every one, of what they used to do" (Qur'an 15:92–93), meaning people are accountable for their actions and do not have fate (qadar) to blame.

Life After Death/Heaven and Hell

Throughout the Qur'an, death and life after death are mentioned repeatedly, not as macabre subjects but as focal points to give meaning to life. Because in Islamic belief all humans will have to give an account to God for their actions, death and the finality of life on Earth gives people's lives meaning and purpose and makes them accountable for it. Without death, life would have no meaning as there would be no underlying purpose for existence. Life on Earth is also to be enjoyed fully in the present because every moment matters given the transitory nature of life on Earth. Because of this temporality, life after death is considered by Muslims to be the life that is real and everlasting.

Muslims believe that not only will one's soul be in Heaven or Hell but so will one's corporal body, as Heaven and Hell are sensory experiences. The experiences in Heaven and Hell parallel those on Earth, except that in the former they are magnified significantly.

Festivals and Ceremonies

At the end of the ninth month of the Islamic lunar calendar, which is the month of Ramadan, Muslims celebrate Eid ul-Fitr, or the "Festival of the End of the Fast." In Islam, one day is set aside to celebrate, but this practice differs among families, cultures, and countries, highlighting how culture becomes diffused in religion. A special prayer is said on this day, and money and gifts are given to little children and exchanged between families, which is a common cultural practice.

The other holiday is Eid al-Adha, or the "Festival of the Sacrifice," occurring after hajj, when the pilgrims return from Mecca in Saudi Arabia. This is a 3-day holiday, often termed the "greater festival," and is also spent among family and friends, commemorating Abraham's trial of God's command to sacrifice his son Ishmael.

Halal and Haram

Halal (lawful, permissible) and haram (unlawful, forbidden) are Arabic terms applied to food and drink and also matters of daily life. For example, halal and haram apply not only to how animals that are to be consumed are raised and killed but also to personal choices one makes and what one does. Halal and haram are dictated by God in the Qur'an and in the Hadith of Muhammad—both texts that make up Islamic law (Shari'a)—and are the basis of Islamic knowledge.

Islam and Violence

The word jihad is often mistranslated as "Holy War." The Arabic equivalent of "Holy War," however, is harb-u-muqadasah. This term is not found in any verse of the Qur'an. There is nothing in the Islamic sources that permits a Muslim to fight against non-Muslims solely on the basis that they are not Muslim.

The word jihad comes from the root word jahada, which means "to struggle" or "to strive." Other words derived from this root include effort, labor, and fatigue. Essentially at the individual level, jihad primarily refers to the inner struggle of being a person of virtue and submission to God in all aspects of life. It is this jihad that is considered the most difficult type of struggle because it involves refining one's character and habits.

Islam never tolerates unprovoked aggression from its own side; Muslims are commanded in the Qur'an not to begin hostilities, embark on any act of aggression, violate the rights of others, or harm the innocent. Even hurting or destroying animals or trees is forbidden. War is waged only to defend the religious community against oppression and persecution, because the Qur'an says that "persecution is worse than slaughter" and "let there be no hostility except to those who practice oppression" (Qur'an 2:190–193). Therefore, war is only justified out of self-protection when the community is being attacked.

The Qur'an describes those people who are permitted to fight:

(They are) those who have been expelled from their homes in defiance of right, (for no cause) except that they say, "Our Lord is God." Did not Allah check one set of people by means of another, there would surely have been pulled down monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques, in which the name of Allah is commemorated in abundant measure. God will certainly aid those who aid his (cause); for verily God is full of Strength, Exalted in Might (able to enforce His Will). (Qur'an 22:40)

Note that the verse specifically commands the protection of all houses of worship. This verse (ayat) also supports the Islamic point of view that all prophets and revealed scriptures are to be respected, as different houses of worship are part of God's design to "check one set of people by means of another."

Islam and Women

Islam is a religion that supports women, and many have argued that Prophet Muhammad was a feminist. The doctrine he laid out as the revealed word of God considerably improved the status of women in seventh-century Arabia. While in local pagan society it was the custom to bury alive unwanted female newborns and women had been treated as possessions of their husbands, Islam prohibited these practices. Islamic law made the education of girls a sacred duty and gave women the right to own and inherit property. Muhammad even decreed that sexual satisfaction was a woman's entitlement. He was a liberal at home as well as in the pulpit. Prophet Muhammad darned his own garments, and due to the Hadith—or his sayings, actions, and tacit approval—it became religious duty for every Muslim, male or female, to honor women and treat sons and daughters justly and for males to provide support, not obstacles, for women and their achievements.

Social and Political Rights of Women

In the history of Islam, the fact that men and women, equally, could take part in social, political, and military affairs promoted human rights and also encouraged individuals to stand up for their own rights. From voting and choosing regional leaders to participating in military battles, rights and equality among men and women were shared. Both sexes were accorded equal access to education, respect, and honor. In Prophet Muhammad's Farewell Sermon, he stated that men and women have equal rights and obligations toward each other. Also, according to the Hadith, Prophet Muhammad also declared that Paradise is to be found at the feet of one's mother, so by serving her one can gain entry to Heaven.

Property Rights of Women in Islam

Under the laws of Islam, women have the right to sell and buy properties, own a business, take legal actions, vote, and participate in political affairs.

According to Islam, a woman inherits half the share of her brother because a daughter is not obligated to support her parents or her children, whereas a man has a great financial responsibility as outlined by Islamic law (Shari'a). It is the responsibility of the father of the woman's child or children to take care of them, and it is the son's responsibility to take care of his parents. A man who has reached the age of puberty has the obligation, by the rules of Islam, to support his mother, wife, children, sisters, and the children of his sisters if necessary. If a man's mother or sister does not have the wealth or the desire to support her children, it would become the duty of the son or brother to support her. Under Islamic law (Shari'a), women also have control not only over their property but also dowry claims. Once she is married, she may demand her dowry from her husband at any time, and in the case of divorce, she would receive her share of the property.

Marriage and the Right to Divorce in Islam

According to the laws of Islam, a man and a woman have the right to choose their partner, and they should not be forced into marriage. Divorce is permitted in Islam under specific terms and conditions. According to the laws of Islam, a man or woman may end a marriage by divorce if there is a definite cause for such an action.

Polygamy

Polygamy is a tradition practiced in many cultures, yet Islam restricted it by setting regulations. These regulations are very severe, and very few can practice it (see Qur'an 4:1–4). The particular historical context of polygamy in Islam followed one of the harshest wars, where many men were killed, leaving a multitude of women widowed, fatherless, and without support. Also, a Muslim man cannot marry a second wife without the permission of the first wife. With all these restricted regulations, according to the Islamic law, polygamy is possible but rare in practice.

Sara Kamali

See also 'Abbāsid Caliphate; Ahmaddiya; al Qaeda; Al-Azhar; al-Banna, Hasan; Arabic; Ghazali; Hijab; Ibn Khaldūn; Islam in China; Islam in Latin America;

Islamic Modernism; Islamic Reform; Islamic State; Islamism (Political Islam); Ismailis; Jihad; Monotheism; Muhammad; Muslim Brotherhood; Prayer Beads; Shi'a Islam; Sunnī Islam

Further Readings

- Badcott, N. (2009). Pocket timeline of Islamic civilizations. Northampton, MA: Interlink Books.
- Barlas, A. (2002). "Believing women" in Islam: Unreading patriarchal interpretations of the Qur'ān. Austin, TX: University of Texas Press.
- Carboni, S., Institut du monde arabe (France), & Metropolitan Museum of Art (New York, N.Y.). (2007). Venice and the Islamic world, 828–1797. New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art.
- Chebel, M. (2000). Symbols of Islam. Singapore: Assouline.
- Cooper, A. (2004). The facts about Islam. London: Hodder Children's Books.
- Graham, M. (2006). How Islam created the modern world. Beltsville, MD: Amana.
- Morgan, M. H. (2007). Lost history: The enduring legacy of Muslim scientists, thinkers, and artists. Washington, DC: National Geographic.
- Yahya, E. (2002). The life and work of Muhammad: Critical lives. Indianapolis, IN: Alpha.

ISLAM IN CHINA

Though diverse, the Muslim community in China is quite large. According to reasonably accurate estimates based on the 2000 national census of China, the Muslims of China total 20.3 million, or 2% of the population. Since the census registered people by nationality and ethnicity, not religious affiliation, the exact number of Muslims in China is still unknown. Ties to global Islam were truncated by half a century of self-imposed isolation under Mao, but this abruptly changed with Mao's death in 1976 and Deng Xiaoping's "open door" policy in the 1980s. Non-Uyghur Muslims travel fairly freely on the hajj to Mecca (Makkah) and engage in cross-border trade with coreligionists in Central Asia, the Middle East, and increasingly, Southeast Asia. There are few Han converts to Islam in China, yet the Muslim population has continued to increase, and there are more mosques in the 21st century than before the beginning of the Communist regime in 1949.

Many of the challenges that these Muslim communities confront remain the same as they have for the past 1,300 years of continuous interaction with Chinese society, but many are new as a result of China's transformed and increasingly globalized society and especially the watershed events of the September 11 terrorist attacks with the subsequent War on Terror. Islam in China has primarily been propagated over the past 1,300 years among the people now known as Hui. Hui jiao ("Hui teaching") was the local Chinese term once used to refer to the religion of Islam in general and probably derives from an early Chinese rendering of the term for the modern Uyghur people (Hui he); yet since the early 1950s, Muslims in China have been divided into ethnic national groups, and all believe in yi si lan jiao ("the teaching of Islam"). Although the 2010 census should reveal some population increases overall, the official figures report the following mostly Muslim groups: Hui (9,816,805), Uyghur (8,399,393), Kazakh (1,250,458), Dongxiang (513,805), Kyrgyz (160,823), Salar (104,503), Tajik (41,028), Uzbek (14,502), Bonan (16,505), and Tatar (4,890). The Hui speak mainly Sino-Tibetan languages; the Uyghur, Kazakh, Kyrgyz, Uzbek, Salar and Tatar are Turkic speakers; those who speak a combination of Turkic and Mongolian languages include the Dongxiang and Bonan, concentrated in Gansu's mountainous Hexi corridor; the Tajik speak a variety of Indo-Persian dialects.

With the exception of the Tajik minority, who follow Ismaili Shi'ism, Muslims in China are Sunnīs, but they are divided by regional, linguistic, and ethnic differences. The Hui are generally the closest to the Han Chinese in terms of geography and culture, adapting many of their Islamic practices to Han ways of life. This accommodation to majority culture often invited criticism from Muslim reformers influenced by Islamic ideals originating in the Middle East. Islamic factional struggles have begun to reemerge among China's Hui Muslims, however, dividing them internally, especially as increased travel to the Middle East and the pervasiveness of global Islam prompts criticism of local Muslim practices at home and exposes China's Muslims to new, often politically radical, Islamic ideals.

The Muslim communities of northwestern China, notably the Uyghur, were incorporated into Chinese society more recently as a result of Chinese expansion westward since the early 19th century. The Uyghur are perhaps the least integrated into Chinese society. Diverse Uyghur political groups have organized to further nationalist, Pan-Turkic, or Pan-Islamic causes. The Chinese government has reported more than 160 incidents of Uyghur-related violence since 1980, related primarily to political activities mostly in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region. In July 2009, the largest and bloodiest civil riots in modern Chinese history took place in Urumqi, pitting Uyghur Muslims against Han Chinese citizens. Supported by a global diaspora, Uyghur sovereignty organizations are now based in many international cities, including Istanbul, Ankara, Almaty, Munich, Amsterdam, Melbourne, Toronto, London, and Washington, D.C. The fact that the former Soviet Central Asian Republics became independent in 1991 as well as the increase in access to the Internet and other global media has done much to encourage the hopes of local Uyghur for an independent “East Turkestan,” though the new, mainly Muslim Central Asian governments signed protocols with China in the spring of 1996 that they would not harbor or support separatist groups.

Despite their resistance to Chinese rule, the Uyghur continue to be divided internally by religious conflicts (between the Sufi and non-Sufi factions), territorial loyalties, linguistic discrepancies, commoner-elite alienation, and competing political loyalties. Few Muslims from other ethnic groups, including the Hui, support an independent Xinjiang, and 1 million Kazakh in Xinjiang would have very little say in an independent “Uyghuristan.” It is clear, however, that Uyghur separatism and global Muslim interest in China’s treatment of its many Islamic minorities will have important consequences for the economic development of China’s mostly Muslim west and increasingly important ties to the Middle East.

Dru C. Gladney

See also China; Islam; Multiple Faiths; Religion and State

Further readings

Benite, Z. B. (2005). The Dao of Muhammad: A cultural history of Muslims in late imperial China (Harvard East Asian Monographs, No. 248). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Asia Center.

Fletcher, J. (1995). Studies on Chinese and Islamic inner Asia (B. F. Manz, Ed.). Hampshire, UK: Variorum.

Gladney, D. C. (2004). Dislocating China: Muslims, minorities, and other subaltern subjects. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Millward, J. A. (2007). Eurasian crossroads: A history of Xinjiang. New York: Columbia University Press.

Murata, S. (2000). Chinese gleams of Sufi light. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Starr, F. S. (Ed.). (2004). Xinjiang: China’s Muslim borderland. Armonk, NY: M. E. Sharpe.

ISLAM IN LATIN AMERICA

Although Islam is a minority religion in Latin America, its relevance lies in the integration and organization of the Muslim communities and their participation in the development of several Latin American regions and cities. The first Muslims came to America during the colonial period, when many Muslim slaves arrived at the Caribbean coast. However, they were forced to convert, and any trace of Islam that might have remained in the region was erased. That is why the arrival of Islam to this region is attributed by many authors to the several migratory waves of Arabs that occurred since the 19th century, each with different characteristics. The main Arab migration to the American continent happened at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century. These immigrants, most of Syrian and Lebanese origin, settled in countries such as Argentina, Brazil, Venezuela, Mexico, and Colombia. Migration was intensive during this period and started decreasing in the 1930s. The second wave took place between 1949 and 1950 and the third during the 1970s. Afterward, a large flood of immigrants came to Brazil and Venezuela only. The main goal of these immigrants was to reach “America,” that is, the United States, fleeing from the Turkish domination in the Middle East (in the first period) and from the economic crises and the wars (in subsequent periods). Nevertheless, some arrived in Latin America as a first port but then settled in these territories.

Migration From the Near East to Latin America (1880–1930)

Beginning in the 19th century, Latin America received a great inflow of migrants, mainly of European origin, but their favorite destinations were Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay. About 1880, a large migratory wave of Arabs arrived, mostly Maronite, Orthodox, or Catholic Christians from the Great Syria of the Ottoman Empire, first, and later from Syria, Lebanon, and Palestine during the British and French rule. Nevertheless, not all the immigrants from the Middle East were Christians. Muslims came along with them and succeeded in integrating socially in spite of the long periods during which there was no true religious freedom; thus, they had to give up their religion and language in order to integrate, and they adopted the local language and religion instead. This normally happened with second-generation immigrants because the Arab language was regarded as of low social status. Also, educational institutions were under the control of the Catholic Church, and there was no other support such as mosques or Spanish translations of the Qur'an for parents to be able to teach their children the basics of their faith. Muslim communities did not have teachers; therefore, children and young people had to go to Catholic schools and integrate. Therefore, during the first migratory wave, the Muslims who arrived in Latin America gradually disappeared as a religious minority because they could not freely practice their religion. Furthermore, since Muslims were a minority among the group of (mostly Christian) Lebanese, Syrian, and Palestinian immigrants, their scattering also contributed to their disappearance. Although they were not subject to religious persecution, as during the colonial period, Latin America was a Catholic region by default, and the difficulties associated with the development and practice of other religions were substantial.

This situation reflects what happens in a modern, incipient nation-state. Fundamental liberties, though they were partly guaranteed by the legal system, could not be protected in practice because some sectors of major cultural relevance, such as education, remained in the hands of the Catholic Church, and to some extent, being a Latin American was synonymous with being a Catholic. This period was one of acculturation, in which Muslim immigrants did not find any legal or political spaces that allowed them to maintain their own religious identity. So their second generation was inclined to adopt the prevailing religion.

The emergence and later consolidation of the Muslim minority started indeed during a historical period in which there were significant worldwide changes, which led to the development of tolerance toward minorities in Latin America. Modernization and further laicization of several Latin American states in addition to the changes within the Catholic Church arising from the Second Vatican Council promoted a framework in which the Muslim immigrants who arrived after 1936 found legal and social spaces to preserve their religion and culture and were able to consolidate as a minority with full rights.

Construction of a Muslim Minority

The inflow of Muslim immigrants decreased from 1930 onward, but there was a new migratory wave when the State of Israel was created, which led to the large Palestine diaspora in the 1950s. Most of these migrants came through the seaports and settled in the region, where they became engaged in trade by selling fabric and other merchandise from town to town and from door to door. They sold their fabrics on credit and little by little, they built a fixed customer base and made friends, thus learning Spanish and gradually adapting to the life of several Latin American countries.

Given that this migratory wave of the 1950s included Muslim immigrants mainly, the communities integrated by them were able to preserve their cultural values more easily, in particular their religious values, which led to the consolidation of a true Islamic community. In turn, these migrants attracted other relatives and friends who, once they arrived, obtained support from their predecessors. They gradually settled on a definite basis and built strong and organized communities in several Latin American cities such as Maicao, Cartagena, Santa Marta, Barranquilla, San Andres, Caracas, Sao Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, Buenos Aires, Veracruz, and Mexico City. Community creation and stabilization allowed the preservation of not only their religion but also the original language, that is, Arabic and other cultural elements associated with their eating habits, music, and celebrations, among others.

The other major inflow of Muslim immigrants occurred in the 1970s. Most of them were Lebanese forced to leave by the civil war in their country and Palestinians who fled the Six-Day War of 1967 and the Yom-Kippur/Ramadan War in 1973. However, there are allegations that the reasons for migration were mainly financial rather than due to the war, since the region from which most of the Lebanese migrants came in the 1970s was not affected by the civil war. From then onward, Islamic centers and associations, Muslim schools, husainis, and mosques began to spread and contributed to consolidate both Sunnī and Shi'a Muslim minorities across Latin America. There are no accurate statistics about the number of Muslims in the region, but the estimate is around 6 million, most of whom are in Brazil (1,500,000), Argentina (700,000), Venezuela (700,000), and Mexico (250,000). These data include an increasingly larger population of Latin Americans who have converted to Islam.

Although any generalization may be misleading, for purposes of analysis, one may speak of three Muslim categories in Latin America. The first category includes those immigrants who were already Muslims when they came to the region and brought along their own cultural load. They easily integrated into the economy and found their social place, but they still maintained a distinct minority character, insofar as they kept not only their religion but also their language and their culture, reproducing customs and values from their original country. This also means that the practice of a more conservative Islam is maintained: for example, women must use the veil and mixed marriages are forbidden. The second category of Muslims is children of immigrants, born in Latin America and integrated in a deeper sense with the receiving culture but maintaining their religious identity. These Muslims tend to keep their religion private, interact with people of other religions more often, and feel that they are Latin Americans, even if their being Muslim makes them a distinct minority. The third category comprises Latin Americans converted to Islam. This community is more open as it is trying to bring Islam closer to the Latin American context and seek an interreligious dialogue.

Maria del Rosario Garcia

See also Argentina; Brazil; Islam; Latin America; Mexico; Shi'a Islam; Sunnī Islam; Venezuela

Further Readings

Fawcett de Posada, L., & Posada Carbo, E. (1998). En la Tierra de las oportunidades: los sirio-libaneses en Colombia [In the land of opportunities: The Sirio-Lebanese in Colombia]. Boletín Cultural y Bibliográfico, 35, 3–29.

García, M. del R. (2007). Identidad y minorías musulmanas en Colombia [Identity and Muslim minorities in Colombia]. Bogota, Colombia: Universidad del Rosario.

Kabshi, R. (Ed.). (1997). El mundo árabe y América Latina [The Arab world and Latin America]. Madrid, Spain: UNESCO, Libertarias Prodhufi.

Restrepo Mejía, I. (2003, September). La Migración Árabe en Colombia: Un Encuentro entre dos mundos [The Arab migration to Colombia: A meeting of two worlds]. Speech presented at the I Civilizations Dialog Conference, Bogota, Colombia.

ISLAMIC MODERNISM

Islamic modernism is a term used to describe a major social, intellectual, and political movement arising in the 19th and 20th centuries, formulated in response to Western colonial projects and hegemonies throughout the globe and reflective of attempts to address modern questions of democracy, liberal human rights, and nationalism through a reformation of Islamic ideas and concepts. The Islamic modernist movement was unlike the Islamic revivalist movements—which called for a return to an authentic divine mandate and a society based on the examples of Muhammad, his companions, and followers—and also the movement of the nationalistic secularists—many of whom felt that the historical moment had arrived for minimizing the role of Islam in the construction of society. This entry discusses the origins of Islamic modernism and several key reformers of the movement: Rifa'a al-Tahtawi, Khayr al-Din, Jamal al-Din al-Afghani, Muhammad Abduh, Rida, Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khan, and Muhammad Iqbal.

Origins

As an intellectual pursuit, Islamic modernism arose from reformist movements scattered throughout the Middle and Near East. Entire classes of intelligentsia, such as French-educated intellectuals in Egypt and British-educated intellectuals in British India, gradually gained political positions under their colonial administrators and began calling for broad reforms of the social and political order. These pressures for reformation were answered by rulers such as Ottoman Sultan Abdulhamid II (r. 1876–1909), who authorized the Ottoman constitution of 1876, and Muzaffar al-Din Shah (r. 1896–1907) in Iran, who signed a new constitution in 1906. The role of Islamic thought in shaping democratic political authorities was addressed by Rifa'a al-Tahtawi (1801–1873) in Egypt and Khayr al-Din (ca. 1820/1830–1870) in Tunisia. Both men attempted to preserve an Islamic identity within the new democratic and political systems authorized by the Ottoman sultan while simultaneously legitimating these new systems to Muslims of various ethnicities and social beliefs. Tensions soon emerged as officials of these new political, legal, and economic systems demanded bureaucracies trained by educational institutions, which replaced traditional Islamic educational authorities with Western-educated faculty; also, the curriculum changed to emphasize the sciences.

Reformers

Tahtawi and Khayr al-Din

Reformers like Tahtawi and Khayr al-Din framed their political and social projects as necessary to answering emergent Western colonial authority and economic dominance. For Tahtawi and Khayr al-Din, Western political authority, which threatened the Islamic umma—a religious concept denoting the universal, global, community of Muslims—presented an opportunity for reconciling Islamic law, the Shari'a, with the exercise of human reason. Tahtawi offered the concept of human welfare as a fundamental concern of both a successful political state and the Islamic tradition and therefore felt that it offered a useful means of reconciling an individual's identity as a Muslim with that of a citizen possessing rights within the legal frameworks of the state. For Khayr al-Din, the umma, not the state, was the central element of political authority, and the upholding of the Shari'a was essential to preserving an Islamic society. Unlike Tahtawi, Khayr al-Din demanded a reform of legal institutions to maintain a just society predicated on Islamic law.

By the midpoint of the 19th century, Muslim intellectuals proposed various responses to address the emergent and overwhelming European political and economic interference. The opening of the Suez Canal in 1869 and the British bombardment of Alexandria in 1882 demonstrated the necessity of an urgent response to increasing European technological and military superiority. Though this superiority was predicated on controversial economic measures, intellectuals of Islamic modernism turned their critiques toward perceived internal causes to explain the failure of their societies to answer European challenges. Turning to the history of Islamic thought, the intellectuals divided contemporary Islamic societies into those confined to the blind and irrational imitation of past precedent—taqlid—and those liberated by the exercise of ijtihad—a term derived from the same Arabic root as jihad, signifying the usage of independent human reason in legal affairs. Ijtihad was used both as a challenge to traditional political authorities and as a basis for new reforming educational institutions. Traditional authorities were displaced by a generation of intellectuals who gained the ability to converse with traditional sources of thought—the Qur'an, the Hadith, and political tradition—without the need of those authorities who had for so long delineated their interpretation and usage.

Afghani

Following the work of Tahtawi and Khayr al-Din, Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1838–1897) and his interlocutors, Muhammad Abduh (1849–1905) and Rashid Rida (1865–1935), advanced numerous programs of modernist reform. Afghani, who was not born in Afghanistan but rather in Asadabad, Iran, was educated at Iranian and Iraqi schools in an Islamic philosophic tradition highly influenced by Platonic, Aristotelian, and neo-Platonic thought. In an introductory work written during his travels from India to Egypt, Afghani revealed the influences of Ibn Sina (Avicenna), a Muslim philosopher who postulated two forms of knowledge: (1) that reserved for intellectual elites and (2) that reserved for the greater population. A skilled orator, writer, and journalist, Afghani would frequently implore audiences to political action while simultaneously critiquing Muslim and European political authorities. Though Afghani often used Pan-Islamic and constitutionalist tendencies against, what he considered, the growing atheistic and social Darwinist philosophies of the West, he was often dismissed by local authorities because he called for a new Islamic civilization founded on unity and rational thought against the blind acceptance of tradition (taqlid).

Afghani was highly critical of those Islamic traditions that he contended had strangled the development and progress of human rationality and the natural sciences. In a famous series of debates in Paris with Ernst Renan—who had maintained that Islam and modern civilization were incompatible—Afghani maintained that while no particular civilization can permit itself to be ruled by reason alone, prior Muslim successes in the sciences indicated that reason and religion had once flourished within Islamic civilization. Afghani concluded that if the global community of Muslims (the umma) was to advance as a superior force against the Western powers, it required a new reformation of Islamic tradition that would return reason and philosophy to their rightful places within Islamic thought.

To realize this newly reformed umma, Afghani agitated for social and political activism. Following the 1857 Indian rebellion, Afghani formed a strong resentment against British colonialism. From India, Afghani travelled to Turkey and was appointed to the Ottoman Council of Education while lecturing at the Dar al-Funun, where he was criticized for favoring rationalism by the Ottoman shaykh al-Islam, Hasan Fehmi. During an 8-year stay in Cairo from 1871 to 1879 at the invitation of Riyad Pasha and the Egyptian government, Afghani gained a broad circle of followers. Lecturing on literature, the natural sciences, politics, and Muslim philosophy, Afghani demanded constitutionalist political reforms and cultural independence from European and Ottoman norms that drew on traditional Islamic thought. Though his growing influence led to his expulsion from Egypt by the Khedive Tawfiq, an action that reflected the Khedive's British sympathies, it is unclear to what extent Afghani influenced the 'Urabi revolts in 1882 against British and French political authority. Afghani's travels continued to Europe, where he formed a society, al-'Urwa al-Wuthqa ("The Strongest Link"), together with his pupil, Muhammad Abduh.

Abduh

Abduh, who was first introduced to Afghani during the latter's residence in Cairo, was born in the village of Mahallat Nasr on the Nile Delta in 1849. During his formative years, Abduh received a traditional Qur'anic education, which culminated in his studies at the Ahmadi mosque in Tanta, at that time an institution of higher learning in Egypt second to Al-Azhar in Cairo. Abduh subsequently enrolled in Al-Azhar in 1866, after leaving his wife and family in the hope of pursuing a more rigorous method of education. Quickly disenchanted by his studies at Al-Azhar, Abduh quit the traditional instruction of the university and joined a group of students studying under the tutelage of Afghani. Following a short stay in Beirut, Abduh later followed Afghani to Paris after their exile from Egypt in 1882. Under Afghani, Abduh developed intellectual and social theses that continued Afghani's political reformist message.

Departing from France, Abduh moved to Beirut, where he lectured at a Muslim school. These lectures later led to the publication of his theological work, Risalat al-Tawhid ("The Theology of Unity"), which advanced his view of the necessity of the Islamic revelation to human progress. Within this work and al-Islam wa al-Nasraniyyah ma' al-'Ilm wa al-Madaniyyah ("Islam and Christianity in Relation to Science and Civilization"), his journal al-Manar ("The Beacon"), and his tafsir ("Qur'anic exegesis"), Abduh established his belief in the superiority of Islam to Christianity by maintaining that it truly fulfilled human wants. For Abduh, who maintained a number of close Christian friends throughout his life, modern Christian civilization represented an inauthentic pursuit of wealth and power concealed by an otherworldly ethic of love that demanded an abandonment of this material world. Islam, on the contrary, as God's revelation to Muhammad and the community of Muslims, was an answer to immanent human social and political difficulties because it commanded the removal of false religious authorities, demanded proof of the rational efficacy of all revelations, and surpassed all other earthly religions by connecting social justice with religious recompense both in the material and in the spiritual worlds. Contemporary Muslims, Abduh suggested, had failed to understand the truths of Islamic superiority and had therefore been unable to answer the contemporary challenges of modernity.

To reform Islamic society and faith, Abduh sought to displace the traditional authority of the ulema (religious scholars) and restore religious authority and interpretation to the rational intellect of the individual. Abduh called for a return to the Qur'an as the sole source of textual authority for Muslim societies, and he realigned educational priorities to reflect this necessity. On his appointment as Mufti of Egypt in 1899 and his later appointment to the faculty of Al-Azhar, Abduh implemented curricular reforms intended to promote education in the Islamic sciences (tafsir, Hadith studies, and studies in the foundations of Islamic law and theology) in order to discourage social and cultural borrowing from the Western, Christian tradition. Abduh sought to make elementary education and literacy, at a minimum, compulsory for all Egyptians.

In addition to education, Abduh also sought to reform gender relations. Though he recognized the early importance of polygamy to the Islamic community—for reasons of political and social unity—Abduh reinterpreted Qur'anic passages addressing polygamy, such as those found within the fourth sura of the Qur'an where provision is made for up to four wives, provided all women are treated with impartiality and equality. For Abduh, this passage indicated the impossibility of polygamy in the modern era due to the practical unfeasibility of such an arrangement. Although Abduh maintained, citing Qur'anic evidence, that men were to retain authority over women, he felt that institutions such as monogamy were intended to strengthen human relationships by ensuring social stability.

The position of Abduh on gender roles proved largely influential both during and after his life. Qasim al-Amin (1863–1908), an Egyptian jurist and former student of Abduh, disagreed with his mentor about the unsuitability of women for political leadership. In two works, Tahrir al-Mar'a (“The Emancipation of Women”) and al-Mar'a al-Jadidah (“The New Woman”), al-Amin initiated a movement for women's liberation meant to rectify the social order. Agreeing with Abduh that women deserved increased social, political, and educational rights, al-Amin furthered Abduh's call for a reformation of the practice of female veiling. Later female leaders, such as the Egyptian activist Huda al-Sha'arawi (1879–1947), who was famous for her publicized lifting of her veil, were in part motivated by al-Amin's critiques. al-Amin's work became controversial, with several critics arguing that his perception of women was an extension of European colonial politics.

Rida

Though many of Abduh's students advanced secularist and nationalist political tendencies, another student of his, Rashid Rida, maintained his Islamic modernist project. Rida, who cowrote for al-Manar and later completed Abduh's exegesis after his death, was born to a Lebanese family in a village near Tripoli. Educated in Qur'anic schools, Rida later travelled to Cairo where he joined Abduh's study group. He accepted the necessity of nation-states but articulated that the Islamic umma was, in reality, a transnational identity that necessitated fostering a broad sense of global solidarity. Unlike Abduh, Rida balanced his rational translation and exegesis of the Qur'an and Hadith with a measure of interpretative literalism. Rida accepted slavery and a militant jihad as necessary both for the proliferation and defense of Islam in modernity by maintaining that both institutions could be rationalized from the Islamic tradition.

Throughout his career, Rida developed an affinity for the Saudi state and its Wahhabi theology established from the thought of Muhammad Ibn Abd al-Wahhab (1703–1792), Ahmad Ibn Hanbal (780–855), and Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328). Rida synthesized the call of Abduh for a return to the Qur'anic text predicated on the precedent of Muhammad and his community—an intellectual movement known as al-salafiyyah—with the strict, conservative Hanbali and Wahhabi interpretations favored by the Saudi state. Rida added to this synthesis a new reading of the concept of maslahah (“public utility”) that elevated a concept that was once subordinated to analogical reasoning (qiyas) within Islamic law. This synthesis and addition is particularly apparent in his discussion of the just Muslim state.

The concept of maslahah outlined the importance of forming laws and governing society on the basis of the preservation and protection of the public interest. Though Abduh used the concept for minor juridical rulings, Rida used it as a guide for shaping a new Islamic system of state. Rida identified two manifestations of the Caliphate in Islamic history: the ideal caliphate of the rashidun (the four caliphs after Muhammad) and the actual caliphate predominant throughout most of Muslim history. The actual caliphate, established by either necessity or force, led to a neglect of the consultation (shura) of the governed. The threat of injustice and tyrannical rule often led to public discourses about the legitimacy of overthrowing particular political authorities. Historically, religious scholars determined this pivotal moment of abrogation. In a departure from Ibn Taymiyya's open call to overthrow unjust rulers, Rida argued that the responsibility of the shura be given to those who "have the power to bind and loose" (Hourani, 1983) or those intellectuals who are trained with the ability to apply ijtihad ("independent legal rationality") toward contemporary issues.

This council of reformed religious scholars was not to rule Islamic society alone. To return to a just Islamic society, Rida sought for a sovereign to make a central decision on legal matters. As the head of state, this sovereign, the Caliph, was intended to be the elected leader of the entirety of the global Muslim community—both Sunnī and Shi'a—and was to rule in the interest of the public welfare. The conditions for the selection of this new caliph and new community of religious scholars were drawn neither from Islamic states under colonial European authority nor from traditional centers of Islamic scholarship such as Al-Azhar. Rida demanded the formation of a new class of Muslim progressives, well educated in the foundations of Islamic thought, who would establish a new Muslim political order. This idea later influenced movements such as the Muslim Brotherhood founded by Hasan al-Banna (1906–1949) in 1928 and the contemporary global salafi movement.

Khan and Iqbal

Islamic modernist discourses were a global phenomenon. Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khan (1817–1898) and Muhammad Iqbal (1875–1938), who disputed much of Khan's work, articulated their respective responses within the context of British India. Khan, who had authored a number of pamphlets in defense of Sunnī Islam, was profoundly affected by the mutiny of 1857—the same mutiny witnessed by Afghani—and began agitating for a reconciled Muslim community to reassert itself as a political force alongside British authority. Much of this reconciliation was to arise from a cultural realignment that would integrate Muslim communities into British society. Khan founded both the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College at Aligarh in 1878 on the model of Oxford and Cambridge and the Muhammadan Education Conference in 1886, with the intent of fostering a reformist dialogue establishing Muslims as loyal citizens of the state. The religious scholars of British India were vociferous in their rejection of Khan, whom they viewed as a loyalist to British governance. The influence of Khan on the history of British India, and later Pakistan, is reflected in the notable graduates of his university, which include the first two prime ministers of Pakistan: Liaqat Ali Khan and Khawaja Nazimuddin.

Muhammad Iqbal, born in the Punjab, was a Western-educated intellectual whose work demonstrates his attempts to unite the Western philosophies of Hegel and Nietzsche, among others, with Islamic thought. Iqbal articulated a position quite similar to that of Afghani and his followers. Islam, suggested Iqbal, is a peaceful religion that requires intellectuals to formulate Islamic concepts to assist independent Muslim communities with self-governance. Agreeing with Mustafa Kemal Atatürk's abolition of the Ottoman caliphate, Iqbal contended that the republican form of government was both in agreement with and necessary to the establishment of a Muslim society in the modern world.

The cessation of the global intellectual movement known as Islamic modernism continues to be a subject of debate. Many scholars suggest that sympathies for the movement dissipated by the middle of the 20th century and were replaced by emergent regional nationalisms and reforms. The broad questions of the movement remain relevant. Systems of thought addressing the role of Islam in modern society are found throughout Islamic intellectual history of the 20th century. The projects of sociopolitical reform debated in Iran by Ayatullah Ruhullah Khomeini and Ali Shariati, the revolutionary calls for active jihad discussed by Sayyid Qutb and Ayman al-Zawahiri, the liberal projects of religious and democratic reform of Abdolkarim Soroush and Abdullahi Ahmed al-Na'im, and the studies of Muslim identity in Europe of Tariq Ramadan all address the central question of Islamic modernist projects—the necessity and nature of Islam in a modern globalized society.

Nathan S. French

See also Egypt; Islam; Islamic Reform; Islamic State; Islamism (Political Islam); Liberal Islam; Ottoman Empire

Further Readings

- Hourani, A. (1983). Arabic thought in the liberal age 1798–1939. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Keddie, N. (1968). An Islamic response to imperialism: Political and religious writings of Sayyid Jamal ad-Din “al-Afghani.” Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Keddie, N. (1972). Sayyid Jamal al-Din “al-Afghani”: A political biography. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Kedouri, E. (1966). Afghani and ‘Abdub: An essay on religious unbelief and political activism in modern Islam. London: Cass.
- Kurzman, C. (Ed.). (2002). Modernist Islam 1840–1939: A sourcebook. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Malik, H. (1980). Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khan and Muslim modernization in India and Pakistan. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Moaddel, M. (2005). Islamic modernism, nationalism, and fundamentalism: Episode and discourse. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Moaddel, M., & Talattof, K. (2002). Modernist and fundamentalist debates in Islam: A reader. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Naim, C. M. (Ed.). (1979). Iqbal, Jinnah, and Pakistan. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University, Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs.
- Schimmel, A. (1963). Gabriel’s wing: A study into the religious ideas of Sir Muhammad Iqbal. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill.
- Sedgwick, M. J. (2010). Muhammad Abdub. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

ISLAMIC REFORM

Islamic reform refers to a broad and diverse movement, beginning in the 18th and continuing into the 19th and 20th centuries, that was interested in renewing devotion and adherence to the major principles of Islam (itijihad). Renewal (tajdid) and reform (islah) took many forms as individual Muslims and Islamic organizations within several countries interpreted doctrine and practice differently. Though the manifestations of reform varied, two principle concerns exist in all: religious authority and the role of faith in society.

The impulse for Islamic reform began in the 18th century as European colonialism emerged and intensified in the Middle East, northern Africa, and Southeast Asia. As European powers expanded their economic and military powers, Muslim movements initially focused on reforms within their own religious organizations. The motivation behind these inward reforms lay in the assumption that a decline in faith and piety fostered European imperialism. These internal religious reforms later transitioned to external social and political reforms throughout the Middle East by the 19th century. Influenced by European scholarship and history, 19th-century reformers called for Muslims to return to the Qur’an and the principles of the first Islamic community, as defined by Muhammad’s leadership in Medina. Within this broad interest of returning to the “true” Islam of the seventh century, there are conservative and liberal strains.

Saudi Arabia

The most conservative manifestation of Islamic reform was and is the Wahhabi movement. Wahhabism emerged in the 18th century through the reform ideas of Muhammad Ibn Abd-al-Wahhab (1703–1792). Though the Wahhabi movement emerged prior to a strong European presence in the Middle East, it is a part of Islamic reform because it emerged and continues to serve as a response to European influences in the region. Abd-al-Wahhab wanted to simplify Islam’s traditions and complicated legal codes, to eliminate mystical practice, and to limit religious interpretation within Islam. Like other reformist leaders, Abd-al-Wahhab wanted Islam to reflect the ideas and practices found in the first and second generation of Muslim converts. To do so, Abd-al-Wahhab focused on a return to Islam’s call of strict monotheism or divine unity known as tahwid. Accordingly, Wahhabists prefer the name Ahl al-Tahwid, “the asserters of the divine unity.” In their application of tahwid, Wahhabists strictly interpret shirk—that is, associating an object with or assigning an object a status equal to God’s. Abd-al-Wahhab’s interpretations of scripture remained relatively isolated until a member of the Saudi family was converted in the 1740s. After the 1740s, the Saud family provided military and political support to Abd-al-Wahhab's conservative religious appeals. Consequently, when the Saudis conquered the Arabian peninsula in the 19th century, the Saudi state implemented Wahhab's vision for an ideal Islamic community, fulfilling his interpretation of Islamic reform.

Egypt

Unlike the Saudi Wahhabi model that reformed Islam internally, Egyptian Islamic reforms were inspired by interaction with European thought. Beginning with Rifa'a al-Tahtawi, Egyptian Islamic reformers challenged the role of the ulema as the elite, educated social, political, and religious authority. Tahtawi argued that society had two purposes: doing the will of God and promoting the welfare of all. To reach these two purposes, Tahtawi revolutionized Egypt's education system. Tahtawi understood Islamic law and tradition to be similar to, rather than in conflict with, Western political thought. Tahtawi is a pivotal figure because he set the precedence for considering, above all else, the responsibilities of national leaders and citizens, the purpose of government, and the role nations play in relation to the umma. Furthermore, Tahtawi advanced a certain type of Islamic reform that linked a Muslim identity with Egyptian nationalism. In Tahtawi's mind, Egypt held a special place in Islamic history because it could represent the transition from the ancient world to the modern.

After Tahtawi, another branch of Islamic reform emerged that is most often referred to as the Salafiyya movement. This group of reformers sought to incorporate Western notions of modernity with Islamic reform. The principal figures of this movement include Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1838–1897), Muhammad Abduh (1849–1905), and Rashid Rida (1865–1935). Afghani argued that predominantly Muslim countries were weak because Muslim society was not at its best. To return Muslim countries, and Islam by extension, to their proper place in the world, Afghani asserted the need to unify Muslims across national boundaries. Afghani wanted to build a cohesive umma that reflected the strength not only of Muslim countries but also of a Muslim civilization. Influenced by Afghani, Muhammad Abduh wanted to see Islam enter a reformation period in which Muslims experienced an inner revival. The greatest danger for Abduh was the secularization of Muslim society as a result of interaction with the West. Consequently, Abduh sought to reconcile modernity and Islam by restating the purpose of Islam and by applying Shari'a law to modern life. Abduh's student Rashid Rida followed Abduh's line of thought up to World War I, when he became increasingly anti-Western. As a whole, the Salafiyya thinkers sought to reform Islam by modernizing Shari'a law to resemble Western legal codes. As a middle ground between those who preferred Western secularized law and those who supported a return to premodern praxis of Shari'a law, Salafiyya efforts spread beyond Egypt, most notably to Morocco.

South Asia

As in the Arabian Peninsula and Egypt, Islamic reform thrived in South Asia. Sayyid Abu'l-a'la' Mawdudi (1903–1979), for example, formed a vision for Islamic revolution and an Islamic state that manifested itself in the organization Jamaat-e-Islami, or the "Islamic Party." Mawdudi promoted political activism through Islam, reappropriating the piety and faith of Islam to social action. He placed his interpretation of Islam's purpose in conversation with capitalism and socialism, arguing that neither economic system fully applied to Muslims. Instead, Mawdudi argued that the ideal economic, social, and political system could be found within the principles of Islam. For Mawdudi, an Islamic state was superior to any other form of government. To reach an Islamic state, however, Mawdudi insisted that first society must be reformed, beginning with education. Mawdudi feared that if an Islamic state emerged before society reformed, then the state would be autocratic rather than democratic. The true Islamic state would be a democracy in which the people demanded implementation and application of Shari'a law rather than the state requiring and enforcing obedience. Though he received criticism for it, Mawdudi insisted that the Islamic state did not need to incorporate women and minorities because Shari'a law was clear on these issues. Furthermore, limiting the rights of minorities and women, Mawdudi asserted, protected the Islamic state by preventing any efforts to undermine its ideological purity. Mawdudi's thought came to fruition in South Asia, but his influence shaped revivalist movements and thinkers in Algeria, Morocco, Iran, Malaysia, Sudan, India, and Pakistan. The clearest expression of Mawdudi's thought can be found in the Jamaat-e-Islami. Established in 1941, the Jamaat advocates Islamic revivalism around the world with particular focus on South Asia. Understanding itself as the umma, the Jamaat asserts Islamic culture and values in India and pursues the establishment of Mawdudi's vision for an Islamic state in Pakistan.

Iraq, Iran, and Shi'a Reforms

Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr (1935–1980) provided the intellectual core of politicized Shi'a Islam and the Islamic state. Sadr came into his own intellectually at a time of turmoil within Iraqi society, as Iraqis attempted to move beyond their connection to Great Britain. Shi'ite leaders were divided between remaining outside or participating in national politics. Al-Sadr effectively ended this divide when he published Our Philosophy and Our Economics in 1959 and 1961, respectively. Sadr not only criticized both capitalism and communism but also established Islamic philosophies of society and economics. Above all else, Sadr used a religious framework to assert that human welfare was central to Islam. Following the popular reception of these works, Sadr and others founded the Da'wa political party to establish an Islamic state. Sadr maintained that the legitimacy of government, particularly an Islamic state, came from the people and not from established religious leaders.

As al-Sadr gained support in Iraq, Ayatullah Ruhallah Khomeini (1902–1989) garnered support for his vision of Islamic reform in Iran. Of the Islamic reformers, Khomeini was the first to develop and implement his vision for an ideal Islamic state. In 1978, Khomeini became the leader of the Islamic revolution in Iran and, perhaps, a leader of an Islamic reformation. With a background in law and jurisprudence, Khomeini also studied the mystical ideas of erfan and hekmat. Khomeini saw Islam as in a state of decay, asserting the need for government to implement Shari'a law in order to be legitimate. After several street demonstrations, deaths, and protests, the Shah fled Iran, leaving Khomeini to fill the void in leadership. As the leader of the Islamic state, Khomeini executed public officials from the previous regime and appointed religious officials in their place. With this design for the state, Khomeini preferred political institutions resembling a more Sunnī model for religious authority. Furthermore, Khomeini, as cleric and head of state, positioned himself as the ultimate authority on political and religious issues. After his death in 1989, followers disagreed over who had the greater authority—religious leaders or politicians. In an effort to push Iran toward a perfect Islamic state, Khomeini may have left more questions than solutions to modern quandaries about the relationship between religion and politics.

Women

Women's place in the umma and the Islamic state continues to be debated among Islamic reformers. The underlying issue for gender reform in Islam pertains to khilafah, or women's full agency before Allah. In common usage, khilafah often refers to women's rights. The application of this concept includes reforms in religious practice, in the application of Shari'a law, and in public policy. Controversy and discord arise because reformers do not agree on the status and agency of women within Islamic reform. Mawdudi, for example, insisted that the Islamic state does not need to incorporate women because Shari'a law remains clear on the place of women. Other thinkers affirm women's status within Islam but remain ambiguous about women's status in an Islamic state. Still others assert women's equality within religious, social, and political affairs. Debates about women's status often revolve around clothing, particularly women's need to wear or not to wear a hijab, or "head scarf." In Turkey, for example, women are prohibited from wearing a hijab in public spaces, including schools, libraries, and government buildings. In Iran, however, women are required to wear a hijab in public. Since there is no consensus on the role and status of women among Islamic thinkers and states, the issue and potential reforms remains open to interpretation.

Cara Burnidge

See also Abduh, Muhammad; al-Banna, Hasan; Hijab; Islam; Islamic Modernism; Islamic State; Islamism (Political Islam); Jihad; Khomeini, Ruhallah Ayatullah;

Liberal Islam; Mawdudi, Abu'l-a'la'; Postcolonialism; Qutb, Sayyid; Wahhabis

Further Readings

- Cleveland, W. L. (2004). A history of the modern Middle East. Boulder, CO: Westview.
- Espisito, J. (2004). The Oxford history of Islam. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Hourani, A. (1983). Arabic thought in the liberal age, 1798–1939. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Rahnama, A. (Ed.). (2008). Pioneers of Islamic revival. New York: Zed Books.

ISLAMIC STATE

Historically, the form of government established in Muslim regions by the successors of Prophet Muhammad was the caliphate. The 'Abbāsid Caliphate was overthrown by the Mongols in the mid-13th century. Long before then, however, monarchy or the Sultanate had become the actual form of government in Muslim countries, albeit mostly under the suzerainty of the caliph. After the overthrow of the caliphate, monarchy became the general form of government in the Muslim world. The legitimacy of monarchy was primarily based on justice rather than the Shari'a (Islamic law), though the ruler obviously had to observe the latter. Neither the caliphate nor the sultanate was specifically designated as Islamic, even though they were historic forms taken by Muslim states.

The idea of the Islamic state emerged with the Islamic political ideologies of the third quarter of the 20th century and as the core concept of political Islam. It was adopted in the Persian form of hukumat-e islāmi as the slogan of the Islamic revolutionary movement in Iran in 1978 to 1979. The preamble to the 1979 Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran defined it as an ideological (maktabi) state based on the theory of the vilāyat-e faqih ("mandate of the religious jurist") as formulated by the leader of the Islamic revolutionary movement, Imam Khomeini. Elsewhere in the Muslim world, the Islamic state was defined by its main projected function of the application of the Shari'a and became the common demand of a variety of Islamist movements in the closing decades of the 20th century.

The origins of the idea can be traced to the mobilization of the Muslims of the Indian subcontinent in anticipation of independence. The foremost Islamic ideologue among the Muslims of India who migrated to Pakistan after its creation in 1947, Abu'l-a'la' Mawdudi (d. 1979), conceived the Islamic state as an ideological state and a theocracy (hukumati ilāhiyah) based on the sovereignty of God, declaring at one point "that the acceptance and admission of the de jure sovereignty of God is Islam and its denial is kufr (infidelity)" (Mawdudi, 1960, pp. 213). Under Mawdudi's influence, the declaration of the sovereignty of God was made in an Objectives Resolution in 1949 and incorporated into the 1956 Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, the first state to be so designated in history.

Writing in Nasser's prison in Egypt in the years prior to his execution in 1966, the ideologue of the Muslim Brothers, Sayyid Qutb, adopted Mawdudi's idea, coining the Arabic neologism hākimiyya ("sovereignty") of God. Qutb introduced the new conception of God's government on the basis of the Shari'a into the Arab Middle East and North Africa as the antithesis of the secular state. According to him, the community of believers (umma) was now crushed under the weight of false laws and man-made traditions and customs that were contrary to Islamic teachings. This was the result of the mixing of the fundamental source of Islam with various alien sources. Rejection of foreign accretions in search of authenticity led Qutb to the fundamentals of Islam as the exclusive basis for political order and normative regulation of politics, with some surprising results. He argued that the profession of faith according to the canonical formula, bearing witness to the unity of God and the prophethood of Muhammad, and the belief in the Five Pillars were not the defining mark of a Muslim believer. The believer in addition had to reject all man-made laws and governments, which were the foundations of the new paganism spread by the secular states.

Just as had been the case with Mawdudi, Qutb's influence reached far beyond the circle of Islamic radicals who accepted his Qur'anic justification of revolutionary violence, and various Islamist movements throughout the world accepted the notion of the Islamic state defined by its main function of the application of God's law, the Shari'a. The constitutional structure and practical meaning of the application of God's law have remained unexplored by the Islamist movements that have not attained political power. Contradictions and paradoxes abound where these movements have gained political power and captured the state permanently or temporarily, as in Iran, Pakistan, and Sudan. Nevertheless, the global impact of the idea of the Islamic state beyond the Islamist movements is broadly noticeable in the declaration, by one Muslim state after another, of the Shari'a, or the principles thereof, as "the" or "a" main source of the law of the land.

Saïd Amir Arjomand

See also Islam; Islamic Modernism; Islamic Reform; Islamism (Political Islam); Liberal Islam; Mawdudi, Abu'l-a'la'; Qutb, Sayyid

Further Readings

Mawdudi, A.-A. (1960). Islamic law and constitution (2nd ed., K. Ahmad, Trans.). Lahore, Pakistan: Islamic Publications.

Qutb, S. (1990). Milestones (J. Hardie, Trans.). Indianapolis, IN: American Trust.

ISLAMISM (POLITICAL ISLAM)

The term political Islam gained currency in the 1980s, followed by Islamism in the 1990s, to designate the use of Muslim concepts and organizations to legitimate new political movements. Political Islam notably appears as the title of a short book by an Egyptian critic of the movement, Muḥammad Sa'id al-'Ashmāwi, al-Islām al-siyāsi in 1987. Islamism was first used in French (Islamisme), as in the title of the translation of Judge 'Ashmāwi's book 2 years later. This French-initiated term gradually gained currency in English as Islamism. Both terms are used to describe contemporary Islamic movements in which the political dimension predominates over the devotional and ritual concerns. In other words, political Islam denotes a politicized reading of Islam with a pronounced ideological character, which accounts for its novelty within the Islamic tradition.

The emergence of Islamic political ideologies dates back to the mobilization of the Muslims of India prior to its partition and creation of the state of Pakistan in 1947. It was pioneered in the work of Abu'l-a'la' Mawdudi (d. 1979). Mawdudi conceived the modern world as the arena of conflict between Islam and un-Islam, the latter term being equated with pre-Islamic polytheism or ignorance (jābiliyya) and comprising modern creeds and political philosophies whose predominance necessitated the revival of Islam. He considered Islamic modernists to be a fifth column determined to corrupt Islam from within and was alarmed that Muslims would be seduced away from Islam by nationalism, a false philosophy and a Western phenomenon. Mawdudi was equally hostile to communism and fascism but admired the ability of these movements to instill enthusiasm and commitment in their members and did find in them an instrument that could be adopted by the Islamic revivalist movement. This instrument was ideology, and Mawdudi set out to create a coherent and consistently Islamic ideology.

Mawdudi's Islamic ideology, as propounded in the works that he refers to as the "Manifesto" of the Islamic movement, was pervaded by "Allah's absolute sovereignty," inferred from Qur'anic verses such as "Verily His is the creation and His is the command" (7:45), and diametrically opposed to the spirit of "un-Godly civilizations"—namely, humans' unbridled autonomy. The most novel feature of this ideology was the contention that Islamic revival is impossible without the creation of an Islamic state based on the sovereignty of God. Mawdudi searched for Islamic answers to about a dozen constitutional questions considered essential as the organizational principles of the Islamic state, which he described as a "theo-democracy."

Mawdudi's Islamic ideology became a major social force in the Muslim world only a quarter of a century after its initial formulation. The transformation of his influential ideas into an Islamic revolutionary ideology was especially conditioned by the monolithic secular state of Nasser's Egypt (president from 1954 to 1970). The Utopia of the Islamic state was central to the Islamic ideology, which was taking a revolutionary direction under state repression. The new conception of God's government on the basis of the Shari'a was elaborated by the ideologue of the Muslim Brother, Sayyid Qutb, who was executed by Nasser in 1966, and espoused by the Islamic radicals who followed him. The new conception of God was wedded to a new Qur'anic justification of revolutionary violence, which had no counterpart in medieval Islam or in the Islamic fundamentalism of the Salafi reformists in the early 20th century. In sharp contrast to the staunch conservatism of Muslim medieval thought, which abhorred anarchy and enjoined obedience to the traditional ruler, Sayyid Qutb's justification of revolutionary violence was born in reaction to Nasser's monolithic, modern secular state. To reestablish God's sovereignty, the example of the Prophet who migrated from Mecca (Makkah) to Medina to organize jihad was to be followed. Qutb thus preached withdrawal/migration on the prophetic model followed by revolutionary warfare to reconquer the lapsed, pagan society of ignorance.

Qutb's spirit of revolutionary asceticism spread among the Islamic militants who formed a few so-called Takfir ("excommunication") organizations in the mid-1970s. This earliest manifestation of Islamic revolutionary radicalism was coupled with the excommunication of the society of ignorance with an agenda that replicated the prophetic sequence of call (da'wah), emigration (hijra), and jihad. The new Islamic revolutionary radicalism found its most forceful expression in a tract by the engineer M. A. S. Faraj, The Neglected Duty, which stated the creed of President Sadat's assassins. In this remarkable justification of tyrannicide, which was apparently influential among young clerics and lay activists alike, Faraj offered a Qutbist view of the contemporary Muslim world as one of ignorance where the believers were constantly forced to submit to earthly idols. Faraj argued that the Muslim rulers had suppressed the Islamic law since the abolition of the caliphate by Mustafa Kemal Atatürk in 1924, replacing it with the laws of the infidels, as the Mongols had done. These secularizing rulers, who were Muslims only in name, had forced the believers to live under the laws of the infidels. They were indeed apostates and had to be killed, as the punishment for apostasy in Islamic law is death. The absent, neglected duty of contemporary Muslims was to wage jihad against these internal enemies of Islam. Departing from the definition given to the category by Muslim jurists, Faraj thus adopted jihad to justify revolutionary violence.

Muslim clerics, who saw their status and traditional institutional power seriously eroded by the modernizing states, also moved into the market for political ideologies created by the expansion of the public sphere in the 1960s and 1970s. A new breed of Muslim clerics began to compete with predominantly lay Islamic ideologues. Muslim clerics as public intellectuals made their first significant appearance in the more clericalist Shi'ite Islam with the writings of Sayyid Mahmud Taliqani and Murtada Mutahhari, who led the Islamic publicistic movement in Iran. This paved the way for the assumption of the leadership of the revolution against the Shah of Iran by Ayatullah Ruhallah Khomeini and his clerical students for whom he had expounded his ideas on Islamic government (hukumat-e islāmi) on the basis of the vilāyat-e faqih (mandate of the religious jurist) in a series of lectures while in exile in Najaf in 1970. It should be noted, however, that the spectacular success of the Islamic revolutionary movement in overthrowing the Shah in Iran owed little to this belated development of Islamic ideology. Khomeini's immense institutional asset, which has no counterpart in Sunnī Islam, was the existence of a Shi'ite religious hierarchy independent of the state. Without a similar institutional asset, the Shi'ite clerics of Lebanon followed the example of their Iranian colleagues and founded the Hezbollah ("Party of God") in 1982.

The history of Muslim Brotherhood in Sudan presents a very different pattern. Dr. Hasan al-Turabi, the leader, first, of the Sudanese Muslim Brotherhood and, since 1986, of the National Islamic Front, was a pragmatic politician, adept at operating under alternating military and democratic regimes. In 1989, he traded junior partnership in the democratic government of Sadiq al-Mahdi for unencumbered dominance under the Islamicized military regime of General 'Umar al-Bashir. The new partnership originally resembled the relationship between Zia ul-Haq and Mawdudi's Jamaat-e-Islami in Pakistan until Turabi began the unsavory experiment of turning his organization into the mobilizational arm of Bashir's Islamicized military regime. He also moved in the direction of Islamic internationalism, considering Colonel Qaddafi's military-mobilizational "republic" (jamāhiriyya) an alternative to Western democracy, and invited Osama bin Laden (d. 2011) to move to the Sudan, which the latter did in 1991.

The mark of the era of the nation-state on political Islam is perhaps nowhere more visible than in the internalist orientation of the movement for Islamic revolution in the 1970s and 1980s and in the Islamic radicals' definition of the object of jihad as revolutionary struggle. As defined by Faraj and the Qutbist revolutionaries, the individually incumbent "neglected duty" was jihad against "the near enemy"—namely, the modern idol of the secular state and its head. Global concerns—foremost among them the liberation of Jerusalem—were secondary to the overthrow of that monolithic idol (tāqut) within each Muslim nation-state. It was with this internalist orientation that Ayman al-Zawahiri, still in his teens, was personally inspired by Sayyid Qutb to form a jihad cell in 1967 for his high school friends. The organization he thus set up for the new "Islamic vanguard" grew to become Egypt's most deadly—the Tanzim al-Jihad. Throughout this period, Zawahiri affirmed that the road to Jerusalem goes through Cairo. With the declaration of jihad against the Soviet Union and the Soviet-backed regime in Afghanistan in the 1980s, however, and the recruitment of Muslims from South Asia, the Middle East, and the West to fight it, the international use of violence was widely legitimized. The globalization of political violence and Islamic transnational terrorism gathered momentum with the disintegration of Yugoslavia, which drew the jihad militants from Afghanistan and elsewhere to Bosnia from 1992 to 1996 and the anti-Russian rebellion in Chechnya after the breakup of the Soviet Union, which continued into the new century. In the latter half of the 1990s, Osama bin Laden returned to Afghanistan and formed the World Islamic Front for jihad against Jews and Crusaders, in which he was joined by Zawahiri, and applied Sayyid Qutb's idea of the "vanguard" of the Islamic movement to a global counterelite who would be methodical and follow a set of rules or "the principle" (al-qa'ida) in waging jihad—now a global jihad against "the far enemy," the United States.

Islamism or political Islam gathered momentum in the last quarter of the 20th century, reaching its peak in the 1990s and culminating with the attack on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon on September 11, 2001. It is less salient in many parts of the Muslim world in the new century, and some pronounced the end of the movement after the killing of Osama bin Laden in 2011. This apparent decline has prompted some observers to speak of "post-Islamism" in reference to reformist movements and trends aiming at reconciliation of Islam and democracy that have emerged out of the political Islam of the 1980s and 1990s.

Saïd Amir Arjomand

See also al Qaeda; Islam; Islamic Modernism; Islamic Reform; Islamic State; Jihad; September 11, 2001; Violence; War on Terrorism

Further Readings

- Arjomand, S. A. (2011). Islamic resurgence and its aftermath. In R. Heffner (Ed.), The new Cambridge history of Islam (Vol. 6). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Gerges, F. A. (2005). The far enemy: Why Jihad went global. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Jansen, J. G. (1986). The neglected duty: The creed of Sadat's assassins and Islamic resurgence in the Middle East. New York: Macmillan.
- Maududi, A.-A. (1960). Islamic law and constitution (2nd ed., K. Ahmad, Trans.). Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Nasr, S. V. R. (1996). Mawdudi and the making of Islamic revivalism. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Ramadan, A. A. (1993). Fundamentalist influence in Egypt: The strategies of the Muslim Brotherhood and the Takfir groups. In M. Marty & R. S. Appleby (Eds.), Fundamentalisms and the state (pp. 152–183). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

ISMAILIS

Ismailis constitute a minority branch of Shi'a Islam that has become a transnational and global religious group. Ismailis can be found in numerous countries around the world, but the majority of the population is located in the Middle East, India, and North Africa. As a religious group, they have been historically misunderstood and maligned; most commonly, they are associated with mysterious assassins and concealed mystic knowledge. Over the course of the last couple of centuries, under the guidance of their Agha Khan imams, a concerted effort has been made to disentangle the largely fictitious from the actual history of the Ismailis and to provide a space in modernity for them. Much of the misunderstanding concerning Ismailis stems from limited sources documenting their history combined with the fact that most of the existing information consists of propaganda pieces written against them. Recent literary discoveries have allowed scholarship to make significant strides in this respect.

Ismailis, as a faction of Shi'a Islam, subscribe to many of the traditional Shi'a doctrines. They differ over the historical succession of imams, though they maintain the Shi'a tradition of nass ("designation") for selecting their imams. For much of their history they adopted the practice of taqiyya ("dissimulation to avoid persecution"), which allowed their dissimulation into the cultures around them. This resulted in a blending of Sufi traditions, Hindu ideologies, and Sunnī thought with Ismaili practices. Ismailis also practice the Shi'a doctrine of ta'lim ("teaching of the imam"). Historically, Ismailis undertook al-da'wah ("the mission"), which developed into a highly structured system for proselytizing. There is a distinct "mystic" tradition, dealing with hidden (batin) and revealed knowledge (zahir); however, in more recent years, the more mystical Ismaili elements along with missionary efforts have diminished relative to the modernization efforts of the Agha Khan imams.

The Formative Years (ca. 7th to 9th Centuries CE)

The Ismailis disagreed with the majority of Shi'i in a dispute over the proper succession of the imams, during the eighth century. The imam Ja'far al-Sadiq designated his son Isma'il Muhammad bin Ja'far (from whom Ismailis derive their name) as his successor. However, Isma'il died before his father, which resulted in complications in the succession. After Ja'far's death, the majority of Shi'i, later known as Twelver Shi'i (ithna'asharis) due to their belief in 12 divine leaders, eventually agreed to support Musa al-Kazim as imam. Concurrently, two other Shi'a factions supported Isma'il and his son Muhammad, forming the protonucleus of what would become Ismaili Shi'ism. These two groups were the Mubarakiiyya, who believed in Isma'il's death, and the Isma'ili al-Khalisa, who denied the death and insisted that he would return as Mahdi (an eschatological designation for one who will reinstate "true" religion). The former group supported Muhammad, who they designated as the seventh imam accordingly. Shortly after this, Muhammad entered into hiding to avoid 'Abbāsid persecution. Thus began a phase of Ismaili history referred to as dawr al-satr ("period of concealment").

The Fātimids and Qarmatis (ca. 9th to 12th Centuries CE)

Though historical documentation is limited, after roughly a century, a unified Ismaili movement arose in the middle of the ninth century, largely through the efforts of hidden Ismaili leaders. During this time, particular emphasis was placed on al-daw'ah, the missionary effort of the Ismailis, which spread throughout the Middle East and into North Africa. The Fātimid caliphate in northern Africa was the first successful Ismaili state. There were some disputes over the designation of the imams during this hidden phase that led to the formation of a dissident Ismaili faction called Qarmatis. The Qarmatis did not recognize the Fātimid rulers as their imams. Despite this dissidence, the Fātimid Dynasty is typically considered the "golden age" of Ismaili history. For instance, it was during this period that the famous Al-Azhar institution was founded. Even as the state declined, the Ismaili missionary efforts continued to yield significant conversions. Throughout the course of the Fātimid era, most of the Qarmatis outside Bahrain converted to Fātimid Ismailism.

Nizari, Tayibbi, and Hafizi Ismailis (ca. 12th to 13th Centuries CE)

Another schism occurred among Ismailis during the Fātimid era. After the death of the Fātimid caliph-imam al-Mustansir, dispute arose over his rightful successor, which resulted in two rival factions: Nizari and Musta'li, derived from the respective names of Mustansir's sons. Shortly after this division, the Musta'lis further divided into Tayyibi and Hafizi factions. From the Tayyibi branch, a further schism led to the formation of Daudi and Suleymani factions. The former, the Daudi branch, established a significant presence in India, which developed into the Bohra Tayibbi community there. The Hafizi Tayibbis faded out at the end of the Fātimid period. The Nizaris became the dominant branch of Ismailis. The bulk of their influence was centered in Persia. In northern Persia, they revolted against the Saljuk rulers and established a Nizari state at the fortress of Alamut. The Alamut imams focused heavily on military affairs, but still, a significant amount of literature was also composed during the time. Da'wah efforts continued and spread into India during this period. The Alamut kingdom lasted for roughly 150 years before it fell to the Mongol invasion in 1256.

The Nizaris (ca. 13th to 18th Centuries CE)

Following the fall of Alamut, the Nizari Ismailis entered a period of subjugation and were separated from their imams. This led to the development of individualized, isolated Ismaili communities, which, coupled with the practice of taqiyya, allowed for the infusion of various other traditions into these disenfranchised communities. During this period, Ismaili beliefs blended with dominant regional influences such as Sufism, Twelver Shi'ism, Sunnism, and Hinduism. After approximately two centuries of hiding, the institution of the imam reappeared and established itself at Anjudan, located in central Persia. Da'wah activities were revitalized in an effort to bring new converts and to reestablish connection with the scattered Ismaili communities. The establishment of the Safavid Dynasty in Persia and their proclamation of Twelver Shi'ism as the state religion initially seemed favorable for Ismailis. However, this was short-lived, as the Safavid ulema (religious leaders) quickly targeted what they deemed "unorthodox" groups. Though there were periods of intermission and even favorable relations between Ismailis and the Safavid state, eventually the tensions in Persia combined with the burgeoning Khoja Nizari community in India necessitated the migration of the Imam from Persia to India.

The Agha Khan Imams (ca. 18th to 20th Centuries CE)

The first of the imams to be regarded with the title Agha Khan, Hasan Ali Shah, became imam at a young age after the murder of his father by a mob. His mother appealed for justice from the Qajar

Shah, who dealt with the murderers and granted the young imam governorship of Qum, along with the honorific title Agha Khan. However, the government's favor did not last the course of his lifetime; under the next Qajar Shah, tensions grew between Ismailis and Qajar forces, eventually fomenting into conflict. The Ismailis suffered a military defeat and Agha Khan I was forced to flee to Afghanistan. In Afghanistan, the Imam fostered close ties with the British, and due to British failure in the region, he left as well and settled in Bombay. In India, he shored up relations with the Indian Nizari Khoja Ismaili communities and, after a few troubled years, was mostly successful in his efforts. His son Aqa Ali Shah Agha Khan II succeeded him in 1881 and made a concerted effort to encourage education among his followers. However, he died shortly after his succession in 1885 and was in turn succeeded by his son, Sultan Muhammad Shah Agha Khan III. Agha Khan III was the first Ismaili imam to travel to Europe and maintained cordial relations with the British government. He took a particular interest in his followers in eastern Africa and also worked to clearly distinguish Twelver Shi'ism from Ismaili Shi'ism. At the same time, he also embarked on numerous programs for the benefit of Muslims in general. He promoted the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College in Aligarh, was a founder of the All-India Muslim League, and served briefly as the president of the League of Nations in 1937 in Geneva, where he remained until he died in 1957.

The imamate passed to Agha Khan III's grandson, Karim al-Husayni Agha Khan IV, who remains the current imam. Agha Khan IV has endorsed numerous projects to help develop the Ismaili community into a global one. With the formation of organizations such as the Agha Khan Foundation and the Institute for Ismaili Studies, the modern Ismaili movement has taken particular effort to improve understanding of not only Ismaili Shi'a Islam but Islam as a whole. Beyond merely promoting understanding, these Ismaili organizations also strongly endorse humanitarian, social, and educational aid and enterprises. Agha Khan IV, in the tradition of his fathers, is actively involved in fostering and maintaining a globally oriented Ismaili community.

Caleb McCarthy

See also Al-Azhar; Islam; Mahdi; Middle East; Shi'a Islam; Sufism

Further Readings

- Daftary, F. (1990). The Ismailis: Their history and doctrines. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Daftary, F. (1998). A short history of the Ismailis. Princeton, NJ: Markus Wiener.
- Virani, S. N. (2007). The Ismailis in the Middle Ages. New York: Oxford University Press.

ISRAEL

The state of Israel was born on May 14, 1948, when the British Mandate on Palestine was terminated and political authority was transferred to a new Israeli government. Britain had been granted authority over the Palestinian region in the Middle East by the League of Nations in the aftermath of World War I and commenced its term as the governing power in September 1923. In the quarter-century of the mandatory regime, the Jewish population in Palestine grew due to consistent waves of immigration since the late 19th century to 650,000. During that period, which is called the Yishuv (Hebrew for “settlement”) in the Israeli historical chronology, the infrastructure for the future independent state had been built. It had a functioning government (Va'ad Leumi) and a vibrant parliament (Asefat Haniivharim), along with health, taxation, and banking systems; a national labor union; a paramilitary defense organization; and a foreign relations committee. This effective infrastructure was able to transform itself into an independent state virtually overnight once the British forces had left the country. It guaranteed a smooth transition to political sovereignty though it could not prevent the challenges and hardships accrued due to Israel's unique historical and geopolitical circumstances of inception.

The new state had to face tremendous tasks from the moment of its inception. First, there was the immediate concern of survival; Arab forces invaded the country the morning after the declaration of independence, resulting in the 1948 war. Second, there was the challenge of nation building in the midst of a hostile and uncooperative environment.

The economy had to be reconstructed and revitalized in the face of a harsh climate, paucity of resources, and perennial insecurity. Third, the young state of Israel endeavored to realize the major goal of Zionism: the gathering in of Jews from all corners of the world. This moral obligation was a daunting and unprecedented undertaking for a fragile social and economic system, which had to absorb in a relatively short period three times the amount of its original population. Fourth, the influx of Jews of different cultures and languages, dissimilar political traditions and norms, and diverse preferences necessitated a complex and delicate process of assimilation and identity formation—the melting pot. This was not easy for a new state. Tensions and conflicts abound when the development of group cohesion pits contending ideologies, associations, and loyalties against each other to gain influence by forming a collective identity. Fifth, since Zionism's bases of recruitment consist of both secular and religious Jews from various diasporas, incompatibilities and disagreements between these two worlds were imported to Israel, which emphasized and extended the fault lines between them to the Israeli political agenda.

Secularism and Orthodoxy in Israeli Judaism

It can be said with a fair amount of certainty that among all the internal rifts in Israel—the national (Jews and Arabs), the economic (rich and poor), the ethnic-communal (Ashkenazi Jews and Sephardic Jews), gender, geopolitical (center-periphery), and religious—the secular one is the most irresolvable and, thus, will outlast all others. This seemingly unbridgeable abyss between the two worldviews stems from the fact that the religious Israeli camp (with all their internal differentiations and denominations) and the secular Israelis, who compose the majority of Israeli society, find it difficult to envision a common future for them in a future Israel. The religious seek a Jewish state that promotes and perpetuates spiritual precepts. They would rather have a state that prioritizes Jewish education and tradition—a regime that would benefit Jews to the detriment of other nation-ethnic group of citizens. The secular Jews insist on a modern state, established on the principles of the Declaration of Independence, which emphasizes equality for all citizens of Israel, including non-Jews. These differences are almost impossible to bridge. It is not only that they do not complement each other, but in many cases, they are utterly opposed to one another.

Israel's population consists of 74.7% Jews, 20.8% Muslims, and 4.5% others out of 7.6 million people. Among the Jewish majority, roughly 20% are secular, 55% traditionalist, and 25% religious. The religious quarter among the Jews is divided between religious Zionists (17%) and Orthodox Jews (Haredi) 8%. Traditionalist Jews do not follow all religious precepts and they do not consistently practice their faith. They do, however, feel a deep spiritual and cultural affinity to their religious heritage. Their living style is closer to that of the secular than the religious, but they feel comfortable with Judaism on the emotional level. People who define themselves as traditionalists habitually identify themselves as Jews rather than as Israelis. Seculars would identify themselves, in most cases, as Israelis first and as Jews, if at all, later. In the religious camp, Jewish identity precedes all other affiliation, though there is a major difference between the national religious and the various denominations of Jewish Orthodoxy: While the former emphasize their Zionist commitment, the latter deny and reject Zionism as a modern, nonpious, and antitheological ideology. Radical Orthodox Jews totally ignore Zionism or rebuke it as heresy, since it preempts the advent of the House of David Messiah and, as such, obstructs the divine plan and God's intervention to salvage his people.

As a result of these diametrically disparate attitudes toward Jewish nationalism and the Zionist effort, two opposing orientations toward the Israeli state and the idea of citizenship have developed inside the religious bloc. The religious Zionists take pride in their "Israeliness" and their attempt to shoulder the security and economic burden with the rest of the nation. They speak modern Hebrew, participate in the job market, and enlist in the obligatory military service as any other Israeli. They seek vehemently to modify the state and its character to resemble more the Jewish Kingdom of old with regard to administration, politics, and the judicial code. Religious Zionists sanctify the Israeli state and see in its success and prosperity a sign of God's loyalty to His people and a portent of the approaching redemption. To precipitate and expedite this process, religious Zionists became very active in politics, primarily with settling the West Bank—the territories occupied in 1967, which they perceive as their forefathers' legacy and the cradle of their faith.

Orthodox Jews, in contrast, do not revere the state of Israel. Some of them respect it as a haven, but others despise the state and everything it represents as dangerous and as sacrilege. The vast majority of Orthodox Jews do not participate in the social and economic life in Israel. Orthodox Jews study the Torah and do not work outside the religious community. They do not serve in the military, and they have their own, completely separate educational system. These conditions were not arbitrarily introduced to the Israeli reality but arose as a result of an agreement signed between David Ben Gurion, the first prime minister of Israel, and the leaders of Agudat Israel, the leading political party of Orthodox Jews in Israel. Ben Gurion had made such concessions to the political representatives of the Orthodoxy in the year prior to the declaration of independence and the inception of the state because he wanted all Jews in Israel regardless of their practices or creeds to be as one on the eve of the establishment of the state to demonstrate unity, both internally and externally, and through this, the viability and inevitability of the new Israeli state. He also believed that with time, anachronistic Orthodoxy would diminish and the sacrifice he had made to solidify the new state would not be relevant anymore. Most Orthodox Jews are politically inactive and rather indifferent to the issue of settling the territories taken in the 1967 war. Their political leadership, which is guided and controlled by the spiritual rabbis, is mainly concerned with state-religion issues, and activists are mobilized primarily when such matters occupy the public agenda. Salient state-religion contentions in Israel dealt with topics such as preserving the Sabbath, keeping Kashrut (Jewish dietary laws) in public places, upholding the exclusive authority of religious courts in personal and interpersonal matters (conversion, marriage, divorce, and burial), and maintaining the autonomy of religious education. Another contention that developed in recent years was the legitimacy of the Israeli Supreme Court. The religious Orthodox, resenting what they deemed the court's secular and progressive bias, rejected the authority of the court to adjudicate by claiming that for them God is the only judge who can give a ruling and pass judgment.

Since independence, Orthodoxy has been the only Jewish movement or denomination formally and legally recognized in the state of Israel. The Chief Rabbinate and the regional religious councils were all assigned to Orthodox Jews. Only in recent years has the Supreme Court ruled to allow non-Orthodox Jews to be elected for religious council positions, a decision that has become a major bone of contention between the court and the Orthodox establishment. The lingering prominence of the Orthodox branch in Israel is remarkable considering the fact that it is demonstrably disproportionate to the relative sizes of Jewish denominations worldwide. In North America, for example, which has the largest concentration of Jews in the world, only 7% of Jews are Orthodox, while 42% regard themselves as Reform Jews. In Israel, Conservative and Reform Jews, the two other main movements in Judaism today, are marginalized and outmatched by the Orthodoxy in the public arena. This imbalance has historical and political roots that originated in the decision of European Haredi leaders to order their disciples to immigrate en masse to the Land of Israel along with the Zionist immigration waves in case Zionism turned out to be the harbinger of the Messiah, whereas Progressive, Conservative, and later Reform Jews, mainly from North America, did not share the urgency of leaving their countries. Consequently, disparity was created in which Orthodox Jews formed a lopsided majority only in the state of Israel. As an expanding constituency, the Haredi population became an invaluable political commodity to the secular ruling elite of the new state, who wished to acquire their consent and legitimacy. In 1947, an accord was reached between David Ben Gurion, Israel's patriarchic founder and leader, and the Rabbis of Agudat Israel (Union of Israel), prior to the establishment of independent Israel called the status quo agreement, which settled the state-religion relationships in the future state.

Muslims and Christians

The Arab population in Israel consists of Muslims and Christians: 83% of Israeli Arabs are Muslims (mostly Sunnīs), 8.5% are Christians, and the rest are Druze and Bedouins, who unlike the former, are permitted to serve in the Israeli army because they are perceived as more loyal and less of a security risk to the state. As individuals, Israeli Arabs are full citizens and enjoy all rights the state provides to its Jewish citizenry. They are allowed to vote for the Knesset (the Israeli parliament), they have an Israeli passport, and they can work and reside wherever they wish, although in reality, Arabs and Jews dwell in separate communities except for a few mixed towns, such as Haifa, Jaffa, Ramleh, and Lod, which keep Jewish and Arab neighborhoods apart. Collectively, Israeli Arabs practice religious and cultural autonomy, in which they maintain their tradition, language, holidays, and customs. There is an autonomous Arab educational system, which is a branch of the formal Israeli governmental system. Muslims and Christians inhabit distinct settlements and villages as well, in which each religious community maintains its own faith and operates its religious institutions and places of worship.

In a state defined a priori as Jewish, Muslims and Christians are minorities who maintain their religious and cultural identity, but national aspirations, for those who have any, are held at bay. The flag, anthem, national holidays, and other characteristic symbols of the state of Israel are derived from the Jewish tradition and heritage, but significant efforts have been made to accommodate the non-Jewish population and render it an indivisible part of the country. The Declaration of Independence read by David Ben Gurion on May 14, 1948, was the formative document the young sovereign state of Israel attempted to live by. Among other things, it proclaimed that it will “foster the development of the country for the benefit of all its inhabitants; it will be based on freedom, justice and peace as envisaged by the prophets of Israel; it will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex; it will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture; it will safeguard the holy places of all religions; and it will be faithful to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.” In reality, only some of these promises were kept, and the others still leave a lot to be desired. The delicate geopolitical environment, economic and political instability, and strategic insecurity inhibit a full implementation of the declaration, but at least a keen and genuine yearning for normalization and participation of all citizens in the building of a new society was clearly expressed.

The Legacy of the Diaspora

Because of its unique history, in the sense that it had not been a Jewish state for two millennia, and the dispersion of Jews in various countries, Israel, which was created for the Jews, finds itself in the exceptional position of having most of its prospective citizens living outside its borders. There are roughly 13.5 million Jews in the world, but only 42% of them live in Israel. (Ironically, another nation in a similar position is the Palestinian nation, Israel's bitter rival in the Middle East conflict.) This creates a moral as well as practical dilemma for the Israeli government: Do they treat Jews elsewhere in the world as Israeli citizens or not? Legally, Israel cannot extend its jurisdiction beyond its territory into other countries, but should Israel help individual Jewish communities or citizens in need? Should Jews who reside outside Israel and who have families there support its policies and contribute money to various social causes or be allowed to participate in Israeli elections? Another corollary of this condition relates to Jews who wish to make an Aliya (Hebrew, lit. "to ascend") or to immigrate to Israel. According to the Law of Return, they immediately gain Israeli citizenship and a packet of entitlements to help them relocate and facilitate their absorption in the new country. The law was accepted in the Knesset in July 1950, and it was one of the first laws to be enacted in the Israeli parliament. It is an exclusive law that privileged Jews and not others who desire to become citizens. The Israeli court defended the law against claims that it was discriminatory by saying that it does not pertain to Israeli citizens but to noncitizens who wish to become Israeli, and as such, there was no obligation to maintain equity among noncitizens.

Israel is essentially a secular country, and it was initially inspired by socialist ideas. Almost all the Zionist leaders and the pioneers who inhabited the land since its beginning in the late 19th century were modern and secular idealists remote from Judaism and the Torah. However, the Jewish tradition and heritage are inexorably woven into the fabric of life. The secular education system annually commemorates religious and spiritual holidays by ceremonies, celebrations, and re-enactments. The Bible is taught as literature in every elementary school starting from second grade. Biblical fasts and atonement days are recognized as national holy dates, and religious leaders are courted by all political parties. Even a constitution for the state of Israel was never written partially because of the refusal of religious parties to abide by an overarching secular law when they had God's constitution—the Bible—at their disposal. Yet the differences between the two orientations are profound and growing. Eventually, the collision will become unavoidable. The resilient status quo agreement covers the deep schism between religious and seculars for the time being, but serious discussions on the future direction of the entire community together were never held. The all-consuming Palestinian-Israeli conflict was often the pretext for not addressing any fundamental issues pertaining to identity, unity, community building, and a shared vision of the future.

There are numerous internal rifts in the Israeli population, which are typical of an immigrant society. Cutting across all of them is the tension between old-timers and newcomers, in which those who came to Palestine earlier wanted to maintain their senior position and the prerogatives they were able to accumulate vis-à-vis the newcomers, who seemingly jeopardize their status and benefits. However, there are strong and persisting tenets that constitute the common denominator for all the Jews assembled (born or migrate) in the country of Israel: the unshaken conviction that Jews deserve their own state, that rivaling factions within Judaism must patch up their rivalries and unite as one, and that Judaism should remain a viable component of the state's spiritual and cultural makeup, short of the political and judicial dimensions, where secular democratic presence remains dominant.

The future requires a decisive shift in policy, a paradigmatic change of orientation in order for the state of Israel to prevail. The eminence of one culture or one religion over others in a single political entity is hard to endure in light of rapid individualization processes and self-determination, on the one hand, and on the other, the growing impact of globalization. Israelis have already realized that the melting pot model is obsolete and dysfunctional. Its hierarchical nature has been gradually replaced by the more considerate and fairer multicultural model. But in order for this ambitious model to work, Israel must cultivate some principles that were left untended over the years: Dignity, tolerance, and caring toward the other are imperative for a plural and heterogeneous society such as Israel in order to survive.

Samuel Peleg

See also Ashkanaz; Halakha and Shari'a; Hamas; Hezbollah; Jewish Diaspora; Jordan; Judaism; Lebanon; Middle East; Palestine; Syrian Arab Republic

Further readings

- Arian, A. (2005). Politics in Israel: The second republic (2nd ed.). Washington, DC: CQ Press.
- Cohen, M. (1992). Zion and state: Nation, class and the shaping of modern Israel. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Dowty, A. (Ed.). (2004). Critical issues in Israeli society. Westport, CT: Praeger.
- Garfinkle, A. (2000). Politics and society in modern Israel: Myths and realities (2nd ed.). London: M. E. Sharpe.
- O'Brien, C.-C. (1986). The siege: The saga of Israel and Zionism. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Segev, T. (1986). 1949: The first Israelis. New York: Free Press.

ISRAELI-PALESTINIAN PEACE NEGOTIATIONS

See Israel; Palestine

ITALY

The southern European country of Italy continues to be overwhelmingly Catholic, and the Roman Church—which has its global headquarters located at the Vatican in Rome—plays a major cultural, social, and political role in Italian life. Yet global trends affecting society and culture, such as increased immigration, cultural pluralism, and a growing individualism have altered this century-old relationship in many ways.

Increased Religious Diversification

According to the latest statistics, Catholicism has preserved its monopolistic hold over the population, with 90% of Italians having been baptized in the Roman Church. Yet a major element of diversification has come from the recent wave of immigration. Of the 2.6 million immigrants, 50.3% are Christians (18.5% Orthodox; 25.6% Catholics, 4.5% Protestants, and 1.7% other Christians), 32.4% (824,342) of the recent immigrants are Muslims, and 17.4% belong to other religions, mostly Buddhists and Hindus, or have no religion (about 11%). The most striking novelty is the presence of Islam, which is now the second religion in Italy and is rapidly developing an important institutional network. There are now more than 200 mosques in the peninsula and four Muslim associations catering to the religious, educational, cultural, and social needs of the community. And in 2005, the Council for Italian Islam was formed in agreement with the state authorities.

A factor of diversification within Christianity has come from the increasing number of Protestants and new religious movements. After the merger with the 6,000 Methodists in 1981, the Waldensian Church now has 30,000 members, which together with other small groups (Baptists, Brethren) puts the number of “historic Protestants” at about 60,000. Their numbers are dwarfed by those of the “new Protestants,” which have developed thanks to the intense missionary work of evangelical and Pentecostal denominations. More than 0.5 million Italians belong to these groups, with the Assemblies of God being the largest with 400,000 members. As for the Jehovah's Witnesses, they are the largest “new” religious group, with nearly 500,000 members.

While the Jewish religion remains a small presence with about 30,000 members, the growth of Buddhism among Italian-born believers (95,000 members) and the development of various New Age and Human Potential groups (100,000 members) have also contributed to the growing religious pluralism of Italian society.

Despite the strong hold of Catholicism over the Italian population, for the first time in its history, the Roman Church is confronted with the presence in the country of more than 2.5 million “other Christians” and more than 1 million non-Christians according to the survey carried out by the Catholic Charity Caritas/Migrantes in 2004.

“Do-It-Yourself” Catholicism

The diversification of the religious landscape is also the result of changes within the dominant faith. Indeed, following similar trends at work in most advanced Western countries, from the 1960s onward, Italians have tended to exercise a more individualized and autonomous judgment as far as their religious beliefs and practice are concerned. Indeed, observers such as Arnaldo Nesti have stressed the Italian paradox of a strong cultural attachment to Catholicism combined with an almost generalized refusal to conform to official Church teaching and discipline.

Only 30% of Catholics consider themselves regular practitioners, and 50% think that theirs is not the only true religion. Disagreeing with the Church hierarchy, 45% of Catholics think that clergy celibacy should be abolished, 51% support women's ordination, and 80% do not agree with the fact that people who have been divorced and remarried cannot receive the Holy Communion; 65.6% of Catholics are in favor of divorce, and 68.7% support some form of civil union for same-sex couples. While abortion as choice is supported by only 26.4% of Catholics, 84% support abortion if the mother's life is at risk and 74.6% if the fetus is severely deformed; 58.7% of Catholics are in favor of assisted procreation according to the survey carried out by Marco Ricceri. These findings are confirmed by John Francis Pollard's conclusions that the legalization of contraception in 1970, divorce in 1974, and abortion in 1981 testified to the declining adherence of Italians to the Church's traditional moral values regarding personal behavior.

Strong but Changing Social and Political Presence

The institutional presence of the Roman Church in Italian society remains strong, although it has undergone some important changes, the most significant being the renegotiation, in 1984, of the concordat regulating the relationships between the Church and the state since the Lateran Pact of 1929, which was incorporated in the 1948 republican constitution. While in the revised Concordat Roman Catholicism is no longer the sole religion of the Italian state, its principles are acknowledged as forming part of the cultural heritage of the Italian people. In many ways, the Roman Church preserves its privileged status since it is the only one to be present—at the state's expense—in public institutions such as schools, hospitals, the military, the police, and prisons. A system of “church tax” has been introduced through which Italians may choose to have 0.8% of their taxes assigned to a particular charity. A majority tend to choose a Catholic charity, but the system was extended to other religious groups in the 1990s. The hour of religion has been maintained in public schools, but parents now choose to opt in instead of opting out. Likewise, the crucifix is affixed in classrooms and all public buildings. Despite a 2009 European ruling stating that the presence of the crucifix violates the freedom of conscience clause of the European Convention, a majority of Italians and political leaders support it as a cultural symbol.

Isabelle M. Richet

See also Christian Democratic Parties; Comunione e Liberazione; Evangelical Movements; Roman Catholicism; Rome; Vatican City State and the Holy See

Further Readings

- Cipriani, R. (2003). Invisible religion or diffused religion in Italy? Social Compass, 50, 311–320.
- Garelli, F. (2007). L'Italia cattolica nell'epoca del pluralismo [Catholic Italy in the age of pluralism]. Bologna, Italy: Il Mulino.
- Giovannelli, M. (2000). The 1984 covenant between the republic of Italy and the Vatican: A retrospective analysis after fifteen years. Journal of Church and State, 42, 529–559.
- Nesti, A. (2006). Qual'è la religione degli Italiani? Religioni civili, mondo cattolico, ateismo devoto, fede, laicità [What is the religion of Italians? Civil religions, Catholic world, devout atheism, faith, secularism]. Florence, Italy: Firenze University Press.
- Pollard, J. (2008). Catholicism in modern Italy. London: Routledge.
- Ricceri, M. (2006). Italians and the Church: Faith and disobedience. In Rapporto Italia 2006 (pp. 1–19). Rome: Eurus.

IVORY COAST

The Republic of Côte d'Ivoire (Ivory Coast), located on the Atlantic coast of Africa between Liberia and Ghana, received its independence in 1960, after almost 70 years of French colonial occupation. In 2010, it had an estimated population of about 20 million, but its recent official figures, including those of religious denominations of the Ivorian population, date back to the census of 1998. Censuses are sensitive in Côte d'Ivoire as two decades of political strife and popular antagonism revolve around issues of citizenship sometimes articulated in terms of religious opposition between Christians and Muslims.

With almost 40% of the population identifying itself as Muslim, Islam is the largest religious group in Côte d'Ivoire, followed by Christians (30%), non-religious people (17%), and “animists” (12%)—that is, practitioners of traditional or neotraditional rites and belief systems. Although no hard figures are available, it is widely believed that since the 1990s, the new religious movements are booming. Whether these churches—variously called evangelical, Pentecostal, or charismatic—are gaining terrain on the other Christian religions or recruiting among nonreligious or animist people is not known due to lack of reliable survey data.

Historically, Islam is the oldest religion of the book to have found its way to the region now called Côte d'Ivoire. First introduced in the 14th century, by the 18th century, Islam was firmly established in the northern part of the country and in the urban centers along the southern coastline. By the end of the 19th century, the first Catholic presence can be noted, followed by Methodist missionaries in the 1920s. Christianity flourished throughout the 20th century, mainly in the southern part of the country, but it also had an important following in the central and eastern parts of the north. A massive north-south labor migration due to a thriving plantation economy brought about the dissemination of Islam in both the urban and rural areas of southern Côte d'Ivoire.

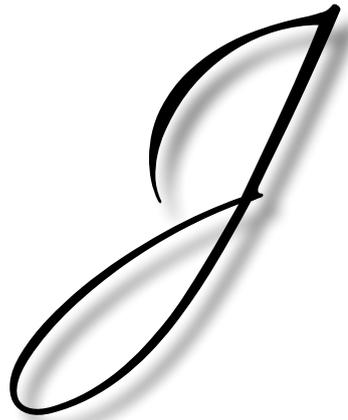

A religious phenomenon that traverses the diverse religious denominations and that has been giving rise to various syncretic movements is that of prophets and healers. The Liberian prophet William Harris Wadé, who held sway in coastal Côte d'Ivoire in the early 20th century, is emblematic of the success of prophetism during the colonial period. After independence, new types of prophet-healers have emerged with changing but sometimes considerable impact both on the general public and on economic and political elites.

Karel Arnaut and Gadou Dakouri

See also Africa; France; Ghana; Liberia; Prophecy

Further Readings

- Dozon, J.-P. (1995). La cause des prophètes. Politiques et religion en Afrique contemporaine [The cause of the prophets. Politics and religion in contemporary Africa]. Paris: Ed. du Seuil.
- Memel-Foté. (1967). Un guérisseur de la basse côte d'Ivoire: Josué Edjro [A healer from the Lower Ivory Coast: Josue Edjro]. Cahiers d'Etudes africaines, 7(28), 547–605.
- Perrot, C.-H. (1993). Prophétisme et modernité en Côte d'Ivoire: Un village éotilé et le culte de Gbahié [Prophecy and modernity in Côte d'Ivoire: An éotilé village and the worship of Gbah]. In J.-F. Bayart (Ed.), Religion et modernisation politique en Afrique noire: Dieu pour tous et chacun pour soi (pp. 215–275). Paris: Karthala.
- Petrarca, V. (2008). Un prophète noir en Côte d'Ivoire: Sorcellerie, christianisme et religions africaines [A Black Prophet in Ivory Coast: Witchcraft, Christianity, and African religions]. (M.-J. Hoyet, Trans.). Paris: Karthala.

JAINISM

A tradition that has less than 6 million adherents worldwide, Jainism is overwhelmingly found in one geographic location (India). These facts, and because it is ethnically homogeneous, nonproselytizing, and world renouncing, would seem to disqualify itself on many counts from a “global religion” status. Jainism, however, over the latter half of the 20th century, has successfully adapted its message of world renunciation to fit the dictates of a global religion.

Background

The tradition of Jainism gets its name from great spiritual masters called Jinas, meaning “conquerors.” They have taught that life, in all its myriad expressions (human, animal, insect, plant, water, earth, air, and fire), possesses an eternal quality that is noble and worthy of respect. Each eternal quality embodied in persons, animals, and things is called a jiva, a perfect entity endowed with a capacity for omniscience and bliss. But in its worldliness, it remains in a state of suffering. Jainism shows the way to self-realization, an idyllic state envisioned as a total and final release for the jiva weary from the world.

The path to liberation is that of unconditional nonviolence. Any encroachment on the life of another is a form of violence for Jains. Cruelty and killing of any sort is violence, but so too is desire, lust, and greed. Any kind of activity in the world amounts to an imposition on another life, and harming others draws in destructive karma, harming the self. Nonviolence for the renouncers of the early sect was tantamount to worldly withdrawal, since existence itself was condemned for its violence. The ideal life is one lived in a state of vigilance, no word spoken or gesture made without consideration of the impact it might have on the multitude of co-dwellers of this world—the living beings, many of which are invisible, that occupy the world with us. One eats only to sustain the human form only so long as it serves the purpose of liberation; if it becomes an encumbrance, then abandoning it is the proper action. Jain nonviolence, as it was originally expressed, was motivated by a sense of radical alienation from the world and a desire to transcend it. It was also motivated by a sense of camaraderie with other life forms, which too are in the condition of alienation.

But Jainism so defined could never have existed as more than a tiny sect. Instead, from the start, the fledgling sect accommodated itself to the realities of the world and to those who were attracted by the tradition but unwilling or unable to commit to it wholly. Historical record reveals the early existence of a “fourfold community” (caturvidyasangha) made up of monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen, among which the laity far outnumbered the renouncers. The overwhelming dominance of lay or “householder” Jains has always been the norm, though their practice is modeled after, and therefore derivative of, the path of renunciation.

This needs to be qualified, since lay Jainism is much more than an imitation of renouncer Jainism; while it valorizes the path of renunciation above all else, it is in no way sheepish about its worldly accommodations. For instance, in the early centuries of Jainism's recorded history, Jains forged alliances with governing dynasties, securing the royal patronage that enabled the tradition to prosper. And from an early period, Jains became established as highly successful trading communities, a characteristic that they still retain today. Jainism's doctrine of nonviolence, though rooted in a world-renouncing impetus, has done nothing to hinder its this-worldly successes. Instead, lay Jains have always been able to interpret the rigorously ascetic message of the Jinas in such a way as to make it a dynamic, culturally sophisticated, artistically rich, and meaningful tradition.

Having said this, it is nevertheless important to keep in mind that Jainism has always been soteriologically oriented—that is, strongly motivated by the promise of other-worldly salvation—and that this orientation cuts across the mendicant-householder divide. As such, the ideological framework governing both renouncer and householder religiosity alike has, until recently, been expressed in terms of withdrawal. Jain identity, both lay and renouncer, is firmly rooted in values and practices opposed to the worldly life.

Something new has developed in recent decades that has allowed this salvific dimension to be stretched to encompass, for some, an emphasis on this-worldly sanctification rather than moksha. Global Jainism, a phenomenon of the late 20th century, goes well beyond this-worldly accommodation of an other-worldly ideological framework in its advocacy of a strongly affirmative, world-participatory ethos. Engagement with the world for its betterment and in the hope of fostering a nonviolent existence has become, for many, the grounds on which one erects the religious life.

Global Jainism

Global Jainism focuses on three core concepts: nonviolence (ahimsa), nonpossession (aparigraha), and nondogmatism (anekantavada). These three principles are presented as unique to Jainism and as correctives to the problems of the contemporary world, plagued as it is by war, environmental decay, anxiety, and greed.

The concepts of ahimsa, aparigraha, and anekantavada, as they were originally developed within the ancient tradition of Jainism, were anchored within the ideological framework of world renunciation and transcendence. As such, they were inseparably linked to a soteriology that saw escape from the world as its ultimate goal. Global Jainism has been successful at broadening these concepts beyond a renouncer orientation and outside of a soteriological framework. They are now offered as a means to make life meaningful and authentic, here and now. Severed from their renouncer-ascetic moorings, they are interpreted as germane for all humanity.

Ahimsa

Ahimsa is commonly translated as “nonviolence” or “nonharm.” All known human groups valorize some form and practice of nonviolence, even if history does not bear this out. Traditional Jain understandings of nonviolence are distinctive in that they are inseparably linked to a notion of nonattachment. Since, for Jains, the true home of the eternal soul (jiva) is unequivocally other-worldly or “trans-cosmic,” all relations that bind the soul to the cosmos are unavoidably damaging. Attachments of any kind are detrimental to the soul on its journey toward liberation and are therefore conceived as a form of violence (himsa). From this, the entire edifice of Jain ideology and practice follows. Jainism is commonly referred to as a moksha marg—a path of renunciation that seeks to disengage the self from worldly entanglements. It rejects as misguided the early Vedic and later Hindu emphasis on worldly obligations (e.g., to ancestors, one's guru, God), arguing instead that the only obligation one has is to self-realization.

The Jain path of renunciation, described by James Laidlaw as one of “quarantine,” seeks to extricate the true self (jiva) from the quagmire of existence. This is done through the meticulous disengagement from specific worldly attachments (to family, possessions, ego, the body, etc.) and through fostering respect for all other life forms that are similarly caught up in the “predicament” that is life. This is the essence of ahimsa.

Ahimsa is understood as the paramount vow through which to sever all attachment and disengage from the world. It is the first of the five “Great Vows” (Maha Vratas) that renunciators adopt on renunciation. It is said that ahimsa encompasses all subsequent vows, serving as their foundation. Although the vow of ahimsa is more leniently applied to householders, it remains the central defining vow of lay religiosity as well. Householders accept that their application of the vow of nonviolence will inevitably be partial: Living as householders “in” the world necessitates unavoidable violence. Nevertheless, their aim is to limit violence to the greatest extent possible with the aim of purifying the soul of karma.

In modern global Jainism, the meaning of ahimsa has been broadened to include not just different degrees of commitment to renunciation (from lay to renouncer) but a different orientation to the world. Within global Jainism, ahimsa is commonly understood in terms of our obligations to the world in which we live and expressed in terms of refraining from activities that are harmful to other beings.

While a concept of nonviolence is clearly broad enough to include both renunciatory and participatory orientations to the world, their distinctiveness should not be overlooked. Ahimsa of global Jainism continues to place an emphasis on the notion of restraint but does so with an altogether distinct ideological underpinning. Rather than advancing a soteriology of moksha, ahimsa here uses a language of obligation to, and care for, nature and animals and promotes environmental action and animal rights.

The contemporary movement within Jainism to define ahimsa as participatory is innovative. It is also a necessary development if the concept is to have universal appeal, as the traditional renunciatory understanding of ahimsa would likely always have limited appeal.

Aparigraha

Jainism is a tradition anchored around vows that limit involvement in the world. After ahimsa, the vow of aparigraha is the most significant (the remaining include truthfulness, nonstealing, and chastity). Aparigraha has dual significance, referring to both nonpossession and nonattachment. The two meanings are not sharply demarcated among the renouncer community, for whom the vow is all-inclusive and unconditional. A truly non-violent (detached) life necessitates complete non-attachment and nonpossession: One can neither own anything nor remain attached to any thing or person. For householders, however, the two meanings of the vow are distinguished, and their difference is important. Total nonpossession is impossible and undesirable for householders: Living a worldly life, having a family, and engaging in the workaday world require possessions of many things. Householders may seek to limit possessions, but they principally aim to not become attached to those that they have. Jain teachings stress the estrangement of the self in the cosmos and the ultimate vanity of all attachments to the world. So one may have a family, a home, a job, and so on, but one may strive nevertheless to maintain a degree of detachment in relation to these “possessions.”

We see that, as with the case of ahimsa, the differences between renouncer and householder interpretations of the vow of aparigraha are primarily concerned with degrees of applicability. Both interpretations are informed by a renunciatory ethos.

In global Jainism, aparigraha loses this renunciatory orientation. As a key concept in the global teachings of Jainism, it has been extended to permit an ethos of worldly concern. Nonpossession and nonattachment are presented as obvious and necessary solutions to the problem of human greed, anxiety, consumerism, and wastefulness. Through a discourse of responsibility to nature, and to future generations (more than to the soul), global Jainism stresses self-discipline and asserts the need to limit the number of possessions we have and, through detachment, discipline our compulsive desire to consume. Through the concept of aparigraha, global Jainism easily becomes allied with contemporary environmental thought, though retaining the Jain focus on individual discipline (as opposed to, e.g., collective political action).

Anekantavada

Anekantavada (lit. “not one-sidedness”) is an important philosophical concept in traditional Jainism but one that has never had wide circulation outside the province of scholars and renunciators. Nevertheless, it has become an important concept for contemporary global Jainism, presented as a remedy against dogmatic thinking. Jains commonly treat anekantavada as an expression of nonviolence in the realm of epistemology: Since all human understanding is partial, shaped by our way of being in the world, none of us can claim a monopoly on truth. The most we ever can know, it is argued, is incomplete truth. The acceptance of the partiality of knowledge is an expression of nonviolence, and a commitment to nonviolence mandates nondogmatic ways of knowing.

If probed, however, anekantavada cannot be and never was a relativist philosophy. While human claims to possess absolute truth are denied, the idea of truth is not. Instead, the omniscient Jinas are believed to have possessed absolute truth and, on their attainment of it, to have proclaimed it widely. Those who did not listen or follow the path of the Jina were in no way seen as equal to those who did. Jainism's "relativism," if it exists, is focused on the limits of human knowing and not on a problematizing of metaphysics. Indeed, in the medieval philosophical debates between Jain acharyas and leaders of other traditions, Jains labeled other sects as ekantavada (one-sided traditions) that possessed only partial truth, thereby using the concept of anekantavada rhetorically to establish the rightness of their own philosophy.

Nevertheless, the contemporary Jain community, reflecting the postmodern concern with, and celebration of, plurality, has effectively emphasized those aspects of the doctrine that convey a meaning of tolerance and a valorization of nondogmatic thinking. Jains advance the concept of anekantavada as a tool for interreligious understanding, arguing that accepting the limitations of knowledge should help foster tolerance toward others, as much as it should thwart dogmatic thinking and judgmentalism.

Ideology and Practice

Global Jainism is not just, or even primarily, about the reinterpretation of concepts or the shift from soteriology to sanctification. Instead, this ideological shift forms part and parcel of sociopolitical and geographical shifts taking place within the Jain community and within the world in general. Global Jainism is the outcome of all these factors.

Although Jains have always had their own texts, distinctive practices, and religious leaders, their religious identity was until the 20th century largely fluid or polytropic, overlapping to a large degree with their Hindu neighbors. Few efforts were made to tease apart Jain from non-Jain religious practices. Certainly "Jain" did not carry the oppositional signification of "not Hindu" that it does for many today. Instead, it appears as though one's identification with Jainism was one among many identity markers that were not in conflict with a more general, fluid identity of the broader culture.

The move from a nondiscursive and inclusive religio-sociocultural identity to that of a delimited, ideological, and exclusive one is a phenomenon of modern religious movements, as each seeks to define itself as a unique and self-sufficient entity, distinct from each other as well as from other human institutions such as politics, society, or culture. The two form part of the pattern of universalism and exclusivism that characterize global religions as a whole.

In recent years, efforts to have Jainism recognized as a distinctive tradition have become pronounced and high profile, reaching the level of Supreme Court arbitration. In 2006, the Indian National Minorities Commission recommended to the national government that Jains be declared a minority religious community and that they be accorded the benefits accruing to that status. These developments (of what we might describe as a "containing" nature) have coincided with efforts of an expansive sort, as evidenced by Jain outreach efforts among non-Jains. For instance, the Anuvrat movement, first launched in 1949 by the late Jain renouncer Acharya Ganadipatti Tulsi, was a social activist movement based on Jain principles of nonviolence and self-discipline. It sought to spread nonviolence and sobriety throughout Indian society by having people adopt small vows (anuvrat). In a like manner, the Ahimsa Yatra (or pilgrimage of nonviolence), launched by the Jain renouncer Acharya Mahaprejna in 2001, similarly seeks to spread nonviolence throughout India's religious communities. Both movements emerged out of a particular sect of Jainism called the Terapanthis. This group has been very engaged in activities of a reformist and activist nature.

In the mid-1980s, they made innovative and controversial changes to the institution of mendicancy when they created a new category of "semi"renouncer. Unlike full renouncers, the semirenouncers (samans/samanis) can travel by car, train, or bus and can have food prepared expressly for them. These changes paved the way for the creation of a group of renouncer-ambassadors (most of whom are women) who can spread Jain teachings far and wide. In addition to extensive travel within India, the samanis have traveled to Jain communities around the world (mainly in the United Kingdom, the United States, and Canada) to reinvigorate diaspora Jain communities and to spread the message of nonviolence to non-Jains as well.

Jains do not seek converts, and there is effectively no recognized process within the tradition through which one can undergo conversion. Nevertheless, efforts to spread the message of nonviolence through the idiom of Jainism are of a quasi-proselytizing nature. So, for instance, global Jainism strongly advocates the adoption of the “Jain way of life,” by which is meant, in large part, a vegetarian diet.

The simultaneous efforts of outreach and containment are in keeping with the demands of global religions for universality and particularity, which characterize all world religions. We see that the ecumenical message of Jainism is emerging at the same time as a sophisticated and articulate Jain voice that seeks to define Jainism with clear-cut borders from all other traditions. The universality of the Jain message is being proclaimed in the midst of robust identity politics that make use of an exclusionary ideological discourse with the aim of producing a rational, delimited portrait of itself.

It would be a mistake to present all Jains as now speaking the discourse of global religion. Indeed, perhaps most continue to understand and live their Jainism as a habitus, that is, as a nonreflexive way of life and as inseparable from their sectarian and caste allegiances. Teasing apart the Jain from the non-Jain dimensions of their lives would be impossible, since Jainism informs an aspect of all social alliances, marriage partners, dietary practices, holiday observances, work, devotional practices, and so on—in other words, all things meaningful. In addition, many who self-identify as Jain continue to do so in a nonexclusive way: They may also choose to define themselves as “Hindu” by nationality and may participate in “Hindu” worship without seeing these activities as antithetical to their identity as Jains.

But the lived expression of any religion is always messier and broader than the self-contained portraits we hold up as representatives. Nevertheless, the fact that a self-contained account of Jainism is available is what makes Jainism eligible for consideration as a global religion. Religious portraits are self-conscious, rationalized, and ideologically informed sets of beliefs and practices. And while the portrait of global Jainism naturally overlaps with the nonreflexive habitus of Jainism, the two are not synonymous. Indeed, as we saw above, certain aspects of global Jainism constitute a break with its more traditional renouncer-ascetic focus. Global Jainism is not so much a tradition as an interpretative dimension within contemporary Jainism that has emerged alongside Jainism’s geographical spread outside India and is coextensive with its outreach activities and its socio-political efforts to gain recognition as distinct tradition.

Conclusion

At the turn of the 21st century, Jainism has taken root in many lands beyond that of its birth: Sizable Jain communities can be found in England, Belgium, the United States, and Canada, and small communities of Jains can be found in most of the world’s metropolises.

The geographical spread of Jains is coinciding with growing and concerted efforts to define the tradition as a distinctive expression of ancient Indian religiosity and as a unique voice among the world’s religions. As Jain religious identity is becoming more marked, delimited, and exclusive, the wisdom of its claims is being offered as important, universalizable, and inclusive. Equipped with the concepts of ahimsa, anekantavada, and aparigraha, Jainism appears well placed to claim its originality and its ability to communicate a universal message for all humanity. In other words, it appears ready to take its seat at the table of global religions and enter into the dialogue among the religions of the world, communicating in an idiom familiar to all.

Anne Vallely

See also Hinduism; India; Nonviolence; Theravada Buddhism

Further Readings

- Carrithers, M., & Humphrey, C. (Eds.). (1991). The assembly of listeners: Jains in society. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Cort, J. (2001). Jains in the world: Religious values and ideology in India. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Jaini, P. S. (1979). The Jaina path of purification. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Laidlaw, J. (1995). Riches and renunciation: Religion, economy, and society among the Jains. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Laidlaw, J. (2005). A life worth leaving: Fasting to death as telos of a Jain religious life. Economy and Society, 34(2), 178–199.
- Mahias, M.-C. (1985). Délivrance et convivialité: Le système culinaire des Jaina. Paris: Maison des Sciences de l'Homme.
- Vallely, A. (2002a). From liberation to ecology: Ethical discourses among orthodox and diaspora Jains. In C. K. Chapple (Ed.), Jainism and ecology: Nonviolence in the web of life (pp. 193–216). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Vallely, A. (2002b). Guardians of the transcendent: An ethnography of a Jain ascetic community. Toronto, Ontario, Canada: University of Toronto Press.
- Vallely, A. (2004). The Jain plate: The semiotics of the diaspora diet. In K. A. Jacobsen & P. P. Kumar (Eds.), South Asians in the diaspora (pp. 3–22). Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Wiley, K. L. (2002). The nature of nature: Jain perspectives on the natural world. In C. K. Chapple (Ed.), Jainism and ecology: Nonviolence in the web of life (pp. 35–59). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Wiley, K. L. (2006). Ahimsa and compassion in Jainism. In P. Flügel (Ed.), Studies in Jaina history and culture: Disputes and dialogues (pp. 439–455). London: Routledge.

JAMAAT-E-ISLAMI

The Jamaat-e-Islami (JI; lit. “Islamic congregation” or “Islamic party”) is Pakistan’s oldest religious-political party and is also among the most influential Islamic revivalist movements in the world. Sayyid Abu’l-a’la’ Mawdudi (often designated Maulana Mawdudi) founded JI on August 26, 1941, in British India as an alternative to the Muslim League and its vision of an Islamic state. After the partition of India in 1947, the JI moved its headquarters to Lahore and thus became part of the newly created Islamic Republic of Pakistan from the very beginning. Here, the Mawdudi-led JI promoted Islam as a holistic ideology, which the founder believed ought to be the basis of a true Islamic state and society. JI was critical toward the secular policies of the nascent state and berated its political leaders for failing to create an authentic Islamic state, which according to the founder was ideologically and administratively superior to the secular “Western model.”

The JI members who remained in India formed an independent organization, the Jamaat-e-Islami Hind. JI also developed an autonomous existence in the Indian-held Kashmir, Bangladesh, and Sri Lanka. Other movements with a similar name exist in other countries also (e.g., the Egyptian al-Gama’a al Islamiyah or the Indonesian Jemaah Islamiyah), but they have no direct relation to the Pakistani JI or its ideology. However, there is a family resemblance between JI and other movements such as the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood (Ikhwan-al-Muslimeen), the Palestinian Hamas, and the Turkish Rifah party.

Besides the global ideological ties, the particular JI model of a political party—which is simultaneously an activist and an intellectual movement—has inspired various revivalist movements around the world, especially in South Asia and the Arab world. The party’s holistic approach to religion/politics/civil society is reflected in its broad organizational umbrella, which embraces different areas/functions besides parliamentary politics: charity (khidmat), missionary activities (da’wah), education (tarbiyyat), and youth activities offered through its youth wings/student organizations. Furthermore, various labor organizations are affiliated with JI, for example, medical associations and farmer boards. The party also has its own governing body (Rabita-ul-Madaris al-Islamia) for a large number of religious seminaries (madaris) inspired by the JI school of thought.

The succeeding leaders of the party, Mian Tufayl Muhammad (1972–1987) and Qazi Hussain Ahmad (1987–), have also been influential, but their global reach has been limited. Some of Mawdudi’s ideas can be rediscovered in the articulations of the Egyptian Sayyid Qutb, who is widely considered to be the other founding father of the global Islamic revival movements. The two main components of the global Islamic revivalism that accelerated in South Asia, North Africa, and the Middle East throughout the 1970s are (a) a critique of Western hegemony, especially in defining global politics and culture and (b) a quest for authenticity in the organization of an Islamic state and society. This implies that proponents of global Islamic revival movements such as the JI are typically also critical toward the powerful elite among Muslims, be they politicians/rulers or influential clergy who are accused of blindly imitating tradition and thus unable to distinguish between un-Islamic cultural influences on their actions and “pure Islam.”

In Pakistan, the JI has promoted its viewpoints by participating through parliamentary processes (until 1977 as the opposition party only). It has influenced Pakistani politics by, for example, lobbying for giving Islam a constitutional status, pushing through a bill that declared the Ahmadiyya minority community a non-Muslim sect, supporting the massive “Islamization” program under the regime of general Zia ul-Haq in the 1970s and the enforcement of a controversial Shari’a bill, and most recently by leading the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA, United Council of Action), which was one of the major religio-political alliances in contemporary Pakistan, winning a sweeping victory at the provincial elections in 2002 and taking over the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (former North West Frontier Province) and Baluchistan.

The Pakistani JI has been criticized for its alleged links to regionally operating militant groups, such as the Hizb-e-Islami during the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan and the Hizbul Mujahideen (HM). The last mentioned is typically referred to as the military wing of JI, though the JI leadership denies any organizational links. These ties are regarded as an “open secret” and have been suspected partly due to the fact that HM offices have been located in JI buildings and JI during the 1980s played an active role in facilitating recruitment of mujahideen for the Cold War battle against the Red Army in Afghanistan.

Mona Kamwal Sheikh

See also Islam; Islamic Reform; Islamic State; Islamism (Political Islam); Mawdudi, Abu'l-a'la'; Muslim Brotherhood; Pakistan

Further Readings

- Ahmad, I. (2009). Islam and democracy in India: The transformation of the Jamaat-e-Islami. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Ahmad, K. (1989). The movement of Jama'at-e-Islami, Pakistan. Lahore, Pakistan: Jamaat-e-Islami Pakistan.
- Nasr, S. V. R. (1994a). Mawdudi and the Jama'at-i-Islami: The origins, theory, and practice of Islamic revivalism. In A. Rahnema (Ed.), The pioneers of Islamic revival. London: Zed Books.
- Nasr, S. V. R. (1994b). The vanguard of the Islamic revolution: The Jama'at-i-Islami of Pakistan. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Nasr, S. V. R. (1996). Mawdudi and the making of Islamic revivalism. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

JAMAICA

The island nation of Jamaica is the third largest island in the Caribbean, located directly south of Cuba and west of the island of Hispaniola. A former British colony, its population of more than 2.5 million consists mostly of descendants of slaves from Africa, but there are also 19th- and 20th-century migrants from India, China, Europe, North America, the Middle East, and other West Indian islands. These groups, too, have greatly influenced Jamaican religious life.

As on other Caribbean islands, religion is central to daily life in Jamaica. Religion plays a major role in Jamaican society, politics, and expressive culture; for example, the islandwide festival of Jonkanoo (John Canoe) incorporates Christian and African religious traditions. Jamaica has more churches per square kilometer than any other nation in the Americas.

More than 80% of Jamaicans identify themselves as Christians. An overwhelming majority of Jamaicans belong to conservative (fundamentalist and/or evangelical) Protestant groups. Major Protestant denominations include Seventh-Day Adventists (10.8%), Pentecostals (9.5%), Church of God (8.3%), Baptists (7.2%), the New Testament Church of God (6.3%), the Church of God in Jamaica (4.8%), the Church of God of Prophecy (4.3%), Anglicans (3.6%), United Methodists (2.1%), Jehovah's Witnesses (1.6%), Brethren (1.1%), and Moravians

(1.1%). Four percent of the population is Roman Catholic. There is a long-standing Jewish presence; Jamaica boasts one of the first synagogues to be established in the Caribbean. Church-sponsored surveys report a total of 1,639,099 Protestants; 218,546 Roman Catholics; 209,189 Seventh-Day Adventists; 11,174 Jehovah's Witnesses; 300 Jews; and 5,463 Muslims. According to the 2006 CIA World Factbook, 34% of the Jamaican population reported themselves as belonging to "no religion" or "other religions." "Other" religions included Spiritualism, Revivalism, and Rastafarianism. Religious pluralism abounds. Many Jamaicans attend their own churches and the services of other religious organizations as well.

Membership in Christian churches has remained stable. In some respects, Jamaican religious life has changed little since the mid-20th century. Major changes include the decline of Jamaican folk religion (Myalism) and transformations within the Pukumina and Revival groups, the rise and growth of Pentecostalism, and—most notably—the advent of Rastafarianism.

Revivalism constitutes Jamaica's most widespread African-derived religion. Its focus is on possession by both African and Christian spirits. Revivalism was an extremely powerful political and religious force between 1890 and 1920 under the leadership of Alexander Bedward. Following World War II, a number of Revival groups merged with North American Pentecostals. Other Revival groups remained independent.

Jamaican Pentecostals include bodies affiliated with North American denominations as well as indigenous congregations such as the Church of God in Jamaica and the New Testament Church of God. Jamaican Pentecostal churches are united by their emphasis on ecstatic experience and the gifts of the Holy Spirit: healing, prophecy, and speaking in tongues.

Jamaica is the birthplace of a worldwide religious movement known as Rastafarianism. More than 100,000 Jamaicans identify Rastafarianism as their primary religion, while many more Jamaicans accept the ideas of Rasta and other similar religious groups. Rastafarianism has become not so much a religion as a way of life. Rastas derive their teachings from the King James Bible (with an emphasis on the Old Testament) but read the Bible from a distinctively African point of view. Their religion is highly Protestant in outlook.

Rastafarianism began in the slums of Kingston in the 1930s, but its roots may be traced to 19th-century slave revolts such as the Morant Bay Rebellion of 1865 as well as 20th-century movements such as the United Negro Improvement Association founded by Marcus Garvey. Rastafarian beliefs vary greatly. Early Rastafarians professed that the one true God was Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie (known by his title, Ras Tafari). Ethiopia was the true Zion, and many early Rastas sought a physical return to Africa. Contemporary Rastas no longer seek a physical return to Africa, preferring a spiritual return instead. Rasta practices vary greatly, but most emphasize the ritual use of ganja (marijuana), reggae music, and the wearing of braids known as dreadlocks.

Stephen D. Glazier

See also Cuba; Haiti; Latin America; New Religions in South America; Pentecostal Movements

Further Readings

- Austin-Bross, D. J. (1997). Jamaica genesis: Religion and the politics of moral orders. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Chevannes, B. (Ed.). (1995). Rastafari and other African-Caribbean worldviews. London: Macmillan.
- Hogg, D. (1964). Jamaican religions: A study in variations. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Yale University, CT.
- Stewart, R. J. (1992). Religion and society in post-emancipation Jamaica. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press.
- Wedenoja, W. (1980). Modernization and the Pentecostal movement in Jamaica. In S. D. Glazier (Ed.), Perspectives on Pentecostalism: Case studies from the Caribbean and Latin America (pp. 27–48). Lanham, MD: University Press of America.

JAPAN

Though Japan has traditionally been a very closed society, increasingly it has become open to global influences, has seen a large number of Japanese living elsewhere in the world, and has become the home of waves of non-Japanese workers living on its shores. Since other entries in this encyclopedia cover the Japanese religions of Shinto, Pure Land Buddhism, Zen, Soka Gakkai, and new religions in Japan, this entry will focus on the religious culture of Japanese abroad and on non-ethnic Japanese living in Japan.

According to official statistics by the Japan Immigration Association, as of the end of 2006 there are 2,084,919 registered foreigners living in Japan, which is 1.63% of the total population of 128 million. Among them, the Koreans (approximately 598,000, 28.7%), Chinese (561,000, 26.9%), and Brazilians (313,000, 15.0%) are the three biggest groups, followed by Filipinos (9.3%), Peruvians (2.8%), and Americans (2.6%).

The changing population of Japan has resulted in the presence of diverse religious practices and affiliations. Of particular significance to the history of Japanese religious life are the presence of Koreans and Chinese, religious expansion under and after the Japanese imperialism and colonialism, Japanese emigration to the United States and Brazil, and the presence of Brazilian immigrants in Japan.

Chinese and Korean Migration

Although the concept of diaspora needs further clarification when applied to ethnicities other than Jews, it has recently been used to refer to Chinese and Korean migration as well. A scholar on migration studies, Chen Tien-Shi, estimates that of the 34.9 million people in the Chinese diaspora, a great majority live in Southeast Asian countries (notably 7.4 million in Indonesia, 6.5 million in Thailand, and 5.6 million in Malaysia), whereas 960,000 live in Canada, 2,830,000 in the United States, 1,000,000 in Peru, 1,000,000 in Russia, and 380,000 in Australia. The sociologist Koh Chung Hesung regards Koreans as the fourth biggest diaspora group, following Chinese, Jews, and Italians, and estimates that 7 million Koreans live abroad, 90% of them in the United States, Japan, China, or the former USSR.

The Korean and Chinese impact on Japanese societies related to its imperialist and colonialist past, beginning with the First Sino-Japanese War (1894–1895), followed by the cession of Taiwan to Japan in 1895, and the annexation of Korea in 1910. The defeat of Japan in World War II in 1945 destroyed this regime, depriving Japan of territories outside the Japanese archipelago. A number of Koreans and Chinese had lived in the archipelago until then and decided to remain. It is estimated that at the end of the war, more than 2 million Koreans lived in Japan, including around 700,000 laborers who had been forced to go, and 90,000 Chinese (56,000 from the mainland, among them 40,000 forced laborers, and 34,000 from Taiwan). Among the Chinese, 68,000 left Japan by 1950 (44,000 to the Chinese mainland and 24,000 to Taiwan). Although the Koreans and Chinese who chose to remain lost their Japanese citizenship in 1952, postwar legislation guaranteed that they could live in Japan with the status of “special permanent residence.” As of the end of 2006, the special permanent residence status applied to around 439,000 Koreans and 3,000 Chinese, while the ordinary permanent residence applied to 117,000 Chinese and 79,000 Brazilians.

Religions of Koreans in Japan

Among 598,000 Koreans, 140,000 live in Osaka and 108,000 in Tokyo. Scholars around Osaka have accumulated sociological research on Korean religions in the area in the past 20 years or so.

In the hilly area called Ikoma is a dense array of more than 60 Korean temples. These temples show features distinct from those of other Buddhist temples in Japan and have caught the attention of a number of researchers. Their precinct usually comprises a main Buddhist hall, another hall for natural deities that reflect a syncretic tradition from Korea, and a site for shamanic séances. Calendrical rituals are performed in the Korean temples, and on request by a client, a special séance is conducted for specific purposes such as healing, soul consolation for the vengeful dead, or giving thanks to one's ancestors.

Takafumi Iida, a sociologist, identifies other religious activities of Koreans in Japan, including Confucian rituals for ancestors and the ethnic Protestant churches. For Korean residents who have lived in Japan for more than one generation, concern about cemeteries and ancestral rituals naturally grows stronger. Besides having a grave in the local cemeteries, Koreans have developed their own cemeteries since the 1960s. Their tombstones usually have a detailed familial genealogy engraved. The occasional visit to their grave, as well as other regular activities by extended family members, contributes to a revival of their family tradition and maintains the Confucian customs.

As for Korean Christians, Iida presents the assumption that since in an area in Osaka there are 2.2 times as many Christians as members of a major Korean Protestant church, the Korean Christian Church in Japan (KCCJ), there will probably be 2.2 times as many Korean Christians in Japan as the total membership of KCCJ (6,300 at the time of his research), that is, approximately 14,000. Iida thinks that half of them are permanent residents and the other half newcomers; thus, he estimated that the percentage of Christians among the permanent Korean residents was 1.3% (at the time of his research). Compared with the percentage of Christians in the Republic of Korea (around 25%), or among Korean Americans (70% or more), this percentage is surprisingly small.

KCCJ started its missionary work in 1908, supported by the Korean Presbyterian Church. Then the Korean Methodist Church joined them in 1912, and the Canadian Presbyterian Church also has been supporting the missionary work since 1927. From 1940 through 1945, KCCJ was forced to be incorporated as a Japanese church, but after the war it became independent, keeping its ecumenical character. According to the governmental official statistics published annually by the Agency for Cultural Affairs, KCCJ has 4,767 members in Japan as of the end of 2005.

Also active among Koreans in Japan are the branch churches of the Yoido Full Gospel Church of Korea. This Pentecostal church has 830,000 members worldwide and is said to be the biggest Pentecostal church in the world. According to Mark R. Mullins, a sociologist, its mission to Japan started in 1976 with the organization of a church in Osaka, and now it has a membership of more than 5,000.

Religions in Chinatowns in Japan

There are three main Chinatowns in Japan. The oldest is the one in Nagasaki, where the Chinese came to start trade in the 16th century; today, there are around 1,600 Chinese living there (of the total population of 450,000 in 2005). After Japan opened the ports of Kobe and Yokohama internationally in the late 19th century, Chinese migrated there as well; in 2007, approximately 28,000 Chinese lived in Yokohama (total population 3,630,000) and 13,000 in Kobe (total population 1,530,000).

In Nagasaki, the Chinese established four Buddhist temples in the 17th century, each serving persons from the same area of China. This was partly because they needed to identify themselves as non-Christian, because Christianity was forbidden by the Tokugawa shogunate. These temples include mausoleums for Emperor Guān (a historical figure who became a god of war) and Māzū (a goddess who protects sailors) and reveal some sort of syncretism. These temples have fulfilled both religious and communal functions. In 1647, a mausoleum for Confucius was established. After many vicissitudes, it was renovated in 1967, and the Confucian ritual was resumed in 1986 by the Chinese community. A number of Chinese cultural elements have merged into the local culture and festivity of Nagasaki in the past four centuries.

In Kobe, the Chinese community established their temple with mausoleums for Emperor Guān and Māzū in 1888, following the earlier establishment of the Chinese temple in Osaka, where they performed their yearly rituals and festivals. In 1893, they established a Chinese Hall, which signifies both the building itself and the institution. It fulfilled functions of administration, commerce, culture, social welfare, and cultural exchange with Japanese for the Chinese community in Kobe and Osaka, which was composed of those who originally came from different areas of China and Taiwan. People gathered at the mausoleum for Emperor Guān to celebrate New Year and other yearly rituals, and also for ancestral rituals and funerals.

During the war from 1931 through 1945, the Chinese living in Japan experienced a harsh period of surveillance, oppression, and control, and a great number of them chose to leave Japan. In 1945, the U.S. bombing destroyed the Chinese Hall and the Mausoleum for Emperor Guān in Kobe. After the war, the Mausoleum was reconstructed in 1948, and it additionally functioned as an orphanage until the 1970s. Side by side with the postwar recovery of Japan, the Chinese community also recovered, and in 1998, the China Hall was reconstructed after its destruction more than 50 years ago. The Chinatown in Kobe, called Nanjin Town, grew into a fashionable commercial area around 1980.

In Yokohama, a Chinese Hall and a mausoleum for Emperor Guān were originally established around 1870, where the yearly rituals and festivals have been conducted, although the mausoleum was destroyed a few times by earthquake, war, and fire. The present mausoleum was reconstructed in 1990, and it is located in the center of Yokohama Chinatown. This Chinatown has grown into a big cultural and commercial area since around 1953, when the mayor and the head of the chamber of commerce were inspired by visiting the Chinatown in San Francisco.

Religions During and After Japanese Imperialism

The presence of Koreans and Chinese in Japan is more or less related to the past imperialism and colonialism of Japan. During the imperialist and colonialist period, the two main Japanese religions, Shinto and Buddhism, expanded to the Japanese colonies, Taiwan, Korea, and other areas. Shinto shrines were established there, and their number outside the Japanese archipelago as of 1945 is summarized by Kōji Suga as follows: 995 in Korea, 243 in Manchuria, 200 in Taiwan, 128 in Sakhalin, and 90 in China and other areas. But the basic intention of the Shinto expansion was not to convert the local people of each area, even though visits to Shinto shrines were forced on them, as well as on Japanese residents overseas. On the other hand, Japanese Buddhist groups engaged in propagation activities, especially through education, but they had Japanese residents as their main target, providing them with ritual opportunities. Thus, after World War II, as Japan and the Japanese receded, Japanese religions also disappeared in Taiwan and Korea, except for converts to some religious groups that had made efforts for propagation in those colonies.

This exception applies especially to the case of Tenrikyō, a religious movement founded in 1838 by Nakayama Miki (1798–1887). Tenrikyō expanded outside the Japanese archipelago just as other Japanese religions accompanied the Japanese expansion, but it was also the most active of Japanese religions, being propagated vigorously among the local people in Korea, Taiwan, and other areas. Around the same period in the 1920s, Tenrikyō also expanded in the United States, as well as in Hawai'i, Canada, and Brazil, though its propagation was focused mainly on Japanese immigrants. Tenrikyō had more than 60 churches in North America and Hawai'i in 1934 and 9 in Brazil in 1937, whereas as of 1945, it had 211 churches in Korea, 124 in Manchuria, 46 in China, 39 in Taiwan, and 6 in the Pacific regions. After the war, it maintained religious activities among Japanese immigrants in the Americas, while it lost Japanese followers in the Asian and Pacific regions. At some places in Asia, however, the local followers have reestablished their religious communities. As of 1996, Tenrikyō had 275 churches overseas, among which 78 were in Korea, 16 in Taiwan, 58 in the United States (mainland), 36 in Hawai'i, and 74 in Brazil. Starting under some influence of Japanese colonialism, the overseas propagation of Tenrikyō went beyond the influence of Japanese colonialism and continued successfully after the war.

Religion and Japanese Immigration

Recent findings of the International Nikkei Research Project reveal that people of Japanese descent are spread densely over North and South America and that around the mid-1990s, among 165 million Japanese immigrants abroad, approximately 760,000 lived in the United States, 620,000 in Brazil, and 60,000 in Peru and Canada. There are more than 300,000 Brazilians of Japanese descent living in Japan. Brazilians of Japanese descent constitute the largest number of Japanese living outside Japan. A great number of Japanese emigrated to Hawai'i and California from the mid-1880s until 1924, when the Immigration Act restricted their immigration. Japanese emigration to Brazil started in 1908 and to other Latin American countries around the turn of the century.

David Yoo, a historian of Asian Americans, takes a clue about religious affiliation among Japanese Americans in the formative period before 1924 from a Stanford University survey in the early 1930s. This survey found that among Issei (first generation), 78% claimed affiliation with Buddhism and 18% with Christianity. Among Buddhists of Japanese Americans, Jodo Shin

Buddhism (also called “Shin Buddhism”) has been the most influential as their ethnic religion. This branch of Pure Land Buddhism traces back to the 13th-century Japanese monk Shinran (1173–1262) and has affiliation with the Japanese Buddhist school Jodo Shinshu Hongwanji-ha (also known as Nishi Hongwanji), which has approximately 7 million followers in Japan. Their mission to Japanese Americans began in 1899, and in 1914, they established their missionary organization, the North American Buddhist Mission, in San Francisco, incorporating 25 churches and branches. In 1944, they reorganized this Mission into the Buddhist Churches of America (BCA). Around the centennial of the history of Shin Buddhism in the United States, Kenneth K. Tanaka (a specialist on Shin Buddhism) noticed attrition in the number of general members and priests of the BCA. Its membership declined from 21,600 in 1977 to 16,902 in 1996, while the number of priests declined from its peak of 123 in 1930 to 71 in 1981 and to 61 in 1997. Although the BCA may well function as the preservation of the Japanese culture and ethnicity, with the current high percentage of out-marriages among Japanese Americans (around 50%), and with cultural transitions over generations among them, the BCA needs a general restructuring of its organization and its way of teaching. Besides the BCA, Zen Buddhism and Soka Gakkai deserve special attention as the other streams of Buddhism in the United States and other parts of the world. These are treated in separate entries in this encyclopedia.

The official missions of Japanese religions in Brazil started only after World War II, although some Japanese emigrants may have brought their own faith with them, either traditional Buddhism or a new religion, from the beginning of their migration, which began in 1908. This was because the Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs prohibited missionaries from visiting Brazil until the end of the war for fear that it would raise anti-Japanese sentiments among the Catholic Brazilians. Since the 1950s, major Buddhist schools and new religious groups have been active in their mission activities, and a survey in the mid-1980s shows that among Japanese Brazilians, 60% are Catholics while 25% belong to some kind of Japanese religion. A couple of new religious groups are successful outside the Japanese Brazilian community.

According to Hideaki Matsuoka, an anthropologist, the following groups have around 1 million members in total, 95% of them being Brazilians of non-Japanese descent: Igreja Seichô-no-Ie do Brasil, Instituição Religiosa Perfect Liberty, and Igreja Messiânica Mundial do Brasil. The details of Japanese religions in Latin America and new religions from Japan are discussed in the entries under their respective headings.

Japanese Brazilians in Japan

The Japanese government introduced a new immigration control in 1990 that promotes the entry of foreigners of Japanese descent (the first through the third generations) to make up for the lack of labor force in the manufacturing and construction industries. The Brazilian workers in Japan are sometimes called Dekasegi in Japanese or Dekassegui in Portuguese, using an original Japanese word meaning “workers away from home.” In 1990, approximately 56,000 Brazilians lived in Japan, while there were 120,000 in 1991, 202,000 in 1996, and 302,000 in 2005. As of the end of 2006, there were 313,000 Brazilians, of whom 76,000 live in Aichi, 51,000 in Shizuoka, 21,000 in Mie, and 20,000 in Gifu. These are areas in central Japan well-known for automobile and other manufacturing industries.

Recently, the presence of Japanese Brazilians in Japan has received increasing attention not only among scholars but also in the society in general, but thus far, there has been no research specifically focusing on their religions. Even in the Catholic Church, apparently the foreign Catholics who live in Japan have not been studied. The Catholic Commission of Japan for Migrants, Refugees, and People on the Move (J-CARM) only presents an estimate about Catholics from abroad through calculation by multiplying the officially registered number of foreign residents by the percentage of Catholics in their native country that is issued by the Vatican. Thus, they estimated in 2005 that in the Yokohama diocese that covers Shizuoka, there were 54,000 Japanese and 119,000 foreign Catholics; in the Nagoya diocese that covers Aichi and Gifu, 25,000 Japanese and 107,000 foreign Catholics; and in the Kyoto diocese that covers Mie, 19,000 Japanese and 43,000 foreign Catholics. In this estimation, 73% of Catholics in these three dioceses are foreign residents.

Most Recent Newcomers: Muslims

Besides the case of Catholic newcomers, a brief mention should be made of Muslim newcomers. (The backdrop of their influx is reviewed in the entry on “Tokyo” in this encyclopedia.) Akiko Onishi, a clinical psychologist, estimates that there are between 70,000 and 100,000 Muslims in Japan, with perhaps 10% being Japanese citizens who profess Islam; they include migrants from South Asia, Southeast Asia, the Middle East, Africa, and China. The number of these foreign Muslims is expected to increase due to the impending labor shortage in Japan. This will make it necessary for a better understanding of Islam and Muslims among the Japanese people.

Michiaki Okuyama

See also Diaspora; Japanese Religions in Latin America; New Religions in Japan; Pentecostal Movements; Pure Land Buddhism; Shinto; Soka Gakkai; Tokyo; Zen Buddhism

Further Readings

- Chukakaikan. (Ed.). (2000). Roots in a new homeland: A hundred years of Chinese in Kobe-Osaka and their association. Tokyo: Kenbun Shuppan.
- Hesung, K. C. (Ed.). (2007). Koreans as diaspora: North America, East Asia, and Central Asia. Tokyo: Shinkansha.
- Hirabayashi, L. R., Kikumura-Yano, A., & Hirabayashi, J. A. (Eds.). (2002). New worlds, new lives: Globalization and people of Japanese descent in the Americas and from Latin America in Japan. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Iida, T. (2002). Religions and festivals of Koreans in Japan. Kyoto, Japan: Sekaishisō-sha.
- Matsuoka, H. (2004). Brazilians and a Japanese religion. Tokyo: Kōbundō.
- Mullins, M. R. (1998). Christianity made in Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
- Onishi, A. (2008). Becoming a better Muslim: Identity narratives of Muslim foreign workers in Japan. In D. B. Willis & S. Murphy-Shigematsu (Eds.), Transcultural Japan: At the borderlands of race, gender, and identity (pp. 217–236). Oxon, UK: Routledge.
- Suga, K. (2004). Shinto shrines overseas under the rule of Japan: Chōsen Jingū and Taiwan Jinja and their enshrined deities. Tokyo: Kōbundō.

- Tanaka, K. K. (1999). Issues of ethnicity in the Buddhist churches of America. In D. R. Williams & C. S. Queen (Eds.), American Buddhism: Methods and findings in recent scholarship (pp. 3–19). Surrey, UK: Curzon Press.
- Tien-Shi, C. (2001). Chinese diaspora: The networks and identities of Chinese entrepreneurs. Tokyo: Akashi Shoten.
- Wei, W. (2001). Reorganization of tradition and ethnicity among Chinese in Japan: Festivals and cultural entertainment. Tokyo: Fūkyōsha.
- Yoo, D. (2002). A religious history of Japanese Americans in California. In P. G. Min & J. H. Kim (Eds.), Religions in Asian America: Building faith communities (pp. 121–142). Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira Press.

JAPANESE RELIGIONS IN LATIN AMERICA

Japanese religions both old and new are to be found throughout Latin America but mainly in Brazil, where traditions such as that of Shingon and Japanese versions of the Jodo Shinshu and Jodo Shu Pure Traditions have a relatively long presence. Here, the focus is on Brazil, where the Latin American headquarters and the holy grounds of most Japanese religions, including new religions (shinshukyo) such as Seicho no Ie (House of Growth), Sekai Kyūseikyō (Church of World Messianity), and Soka Gakkai (Value Creation Society), are situated.

Prohibited from entering Hawai'i and Peru a few years earlier, large-scale Japanese emigration to Brazil began in 1908 with the arrival of 791 Japanese emigrants at the port of Santos in São Paulo on the passenger liner the Kosatu-Maru to work on the coffee plantations of São Paulo. The teaching and propagation of Japanese religion was prohibited by the joint agreement made between the Brazilian government and the Japanese Imperial Company for Immigration, which forbade emigrants from traveling as a priest or a monk. This notwithstanding, one Japanese new religion—the Nichiren shoshu, derived from the Honmon Butsuryu Shu movement—did contrive to send one missionary to Brazil in the person of Tomojiro Ibaragui, born in Kyoto in 1886. Religion was to play little part in most of the emigrants' lives until the post–World War II era. Important rituals such as death rituals were not seen as necessary in pre–World War II Brazil, where dying was regarded as death in a “foreign land”; it was believed that the soul of the deceased returned home to Japan for the appropriate funeral rites.

A dramatic change occurred after World War II as increasing numbers of the older Japanese emigrants committed themselves to remaining in Brazil, to have their bones interred in the country where their children would be living, since their children will identify more with Brazil than with Japan. While some Japanese new religions including Tenrikyō (Heavenly Wisdom), Omoto (Great Origin), and the previously mentioned Honmon Butsuryu Shu had entered Brazil earlier, the majority of the more than 30 now present in Brazil began to establish themselves there in the mid-1950s. Initially, most were ethnic churches with a mission exclusive to the Japanese community.

With the slowing down of emigration and the rise in the rate of intermarriage among Japanese emigrants, these new religions came to the realization that their ethnic character was a serious barrier to growth and that they were failing to take account of the changing aspirations and outlook of the Japanese community as it sought closer involvement in the wider Brazilian society. By the mid-1960s, most of the Japanese new religions had begun to reinvent themselves as universal religions, albeit with special Japanese features. The first and most important reform was the introduction of the Portuguese language alongside Japanese as the main language of communication and ritual. The process of adaptation has, in a number of cases, brought success in the form of numerical growth. The estimated current membership of Seicho no Ie and the Church of World Messianity is 2 million and 350,000, respectively. From the mid-1990s, growth in membership size generally—but not its influence on the wider society—has begun to stall. One response has been to use Brazil as a launching pad for expansion to Africa, in particular Portuguese-speaking Africa, and Europe.

Peter B. Clarke

See also Brazil; Japan; New Religions; New Religions in Japan; New Religions in South America

Further Reading

Clarke, P. B. (2006). New religions in global perspective. London: Routledge.

JEMAAH ISLAMIYAH

Jemaah Islamiyah (JI; lit. “Islamic Community”) is a radical Islamic movement based in Indonesia with the goal of establishing an Islamic state uniting Muslims in Southeast Asia under an Islamic caliphate. JI emerged in the late 1970s as networks behind the Darul Islam rebellions of the 1950s and 1960s were revived. The Indonesian military initially cultivated relations with movement leaders to broaden support for the ruling party as well as build a bulwark against communism after the fall of Saigon. Those leaders who could not co-opt were arrested and accused of involvement in a dubious extremist organization known as Komando Jihad. Abu Bakar Ba’asyir and Abdullah Sungkar were identified as key leaders of Komando Jihad. They were also founders in 1971 of Pesantren al-Mukmin, later known as Pondok Ngruki, an Islamic boarding school on the outskirts of Solo in central Java, where JI was born. Ba’asyir and Sungkar were tried in 1982 and sentenced to 9 years in prison; however, these sentences were overturned on appeal, and they were released in 1985. They returned to Pondok Ngruki, where, inspired by the Iranian Revolution of 1979, they again revived the network of supporters of Darul Islam, now referred to as Jemaah Islamiyah. In 1985, when the Suharto government threatened to return Sungkar and Ba’asyir to jail, they fled to Malaysia.

JI drew inspiration from the writings of Ali Shariati and Murtaza Mutahhari of Iran, Hassan al-Banna and Sayyid Qutb of Egypt’s Muslim Brotherhood, and Abu’l-a’la’ Mawdudi of Pakistan. The bloody repression of a demonstration by Muslims in Tanjung Priok, Jakarta’s port, in 1984 and an Indonesian army attack on a JI community in Lampung, Sumatra, in 1989 contributed to radicalizing JI. In Malaysia, Sungkar and Ba’asyir began to recruit mujahideen to join the struggle against the Soviets in Afghanistan.

This led to contacts with al-Gama'a al Islamiyah, the radical faction of the Muslim Brotherhood of Egypt, which was closely linked to al Qaeda. In Afghanistan, JI established links with radical Islamists from Malaysia and the southern Philippines. Between 1985 and 1995, most of JI's senior leadership fought and trained in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

After the fall of Suharto in 1998, Sungkar and Ba'asyir returned to Pondok Ngruki, where Sungkar died of natural causes. Ba'asyir became the emir (spiritual leader) of JI. In 2000, Ba'asyir established the Indonesian Mujahidin Council (Majelis Mujahidin Indonesia, MMI), bringing together all the Islamist groups in Indonesia to work for the application of Shari'a law.

JI came to public attention in November 2002 with the arrest of Amrozi, a suspect in the October 12 bombing of a Balinese night club that killed 202 people. Indonesian and Australian police traced the bombers back to Pondok Ngruki. The arrest of Imam Samudra, who had planned the operation in Bali, confirmed the Ngruki connection and revealed that JI was responsible for a series of bombings, including coordinated bombings of churches that killed 19 people and injured dozens in nine Indonesian cities on Christmas Eve 2000. In 2003, JI successfully carried out the bombing of the JW Marriott Hotel in Jakarta, killing 12 people and injuring more than 150. JI was also responsible for a bombing of the Australian Embassy in 2004. In 2003, Ba'asyir was sentenced to 4 years in prison for involvement with JI, a charge he claims is a fabrication of the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency) to discredit Islam. He was released in 2006.

Elizabeth Fuller Collins

See also al Qaeda; Indonesia; Islamism (Political Islam); Malaysia; Terrorism; Violence

Further Readings

- Abuza, Z. (2003). Funding terrorism in Southeast Asia: The financial network of al Qaeda and Jemaah Islamiyah. National Bureau of Asian Research Analysis, 14(5).
- Barton, G. (2005). Jemaah Islamiyah: Radical Islamism in Indonesia. Singapore: Ridge Books.

Website

International Crisis Group Asia Briefing Papers: <http://www.crisisgroup.org/home/index.cfm>

JERUSALEM

See Israel

JESUS

More than a billion Christians around the world revere Jesus in a special way. Most regard him as the Son of God and consider him divine as well as human. No other person has had such claims made for him by so many. Most Christians believe that he lived, died, rose from the dead, and is an eternal presence. This entry cannot evaluate the validity of these beliefs but acknowledges that the influence of these beliefs on human society is profound.

More is known about the life of Jesus than about most other prominent figures of his time. Though it is occasionally suggested that Jesus is a mythical character, no serious scholar takes that view. Although no original manuscripts of the New Testament exist, that is true of all ancient writings: Save for the occasional inscription in stone or metal, the originals have all decayed, so that ancient works owe their transmission to medieval scribes. The written sources for the life of Jesus are both more numerous and older than those for other ancients. For example, of ancient classics, the eight manuscripts of Thucydides' Peloponnesian War date from 1,300 years after Thucydides' death (a few fragments are earlier); the oldest manuscript of Caesar's Gallic Wars dates from 900 years after Caesar's death. In comparison, in addition to fragments from about 100 years after Jesus' death, there are two manuscripts of the (almost) entire New Testament dating from about 300 years after his death and thousands of manuscripts from 400 years after his death. The canon (the list of the approved books) of the New Testament was first set in the second century and was fully established, with only a few changes, in its present form, in the period 367 to 382 CE.

The canonical books include the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; 21 letters by disciples (mostly by Paul); and the Book of Revelation. The Gospels seem to have roots in oral tradition. The original manuscripts of the New Testament have all decayed but are generally thought to date from about 40 CE to about 90 CE. In addition to the canonical sources, many other gospels and epistles originated from about 150 CE onward; these have received much attention lately, for example, the Gospel of Judas and the Gospel of Thomas. A “Secret Gospel of Mark” appears to have been forged in the 20th century. Non-Christian sources for the life of Jesus include the Jewish historian Josephus and the Roman scholars Pliny, Tacitus, and Suetonius, though none provide more than a snippet of information.

Controversies about Jesus have been intense since the first century and remain intense in the 21st century, whereas the same could scarcely be said for Caesar or Thucydides. The only plausible reason that this should be so is that Jesus is presented as a character like no other—as the Son of God. Without that claim, his story would be like that of Claudius or Plato—of some interest but little concern. His followers also referred to him as the Christos or Messiah (Hebrew mashiach: “anointed one” or “king”). His most common title for himself was the mysterious “Son of Man,” or in nonsexist and accurate translation, “The Son of Humanity.”

Jesus was born about 4 BCE in Nazareth to a Galilean woman named Mary, who raised him with her husband Joseph, a carpenter. Jesus worked at his father’s trade and must have been accustomed to skilled labor. Very little is reliably known—speculations have abounded for nearly two millennia—about his childhood or youth. About the age of 30, he began to travel and preach in the land then ruled by an Israelite tetrarch (official), Herod Antipas or Herod the Younger, under the authority of the Roman emperor Tiberius and his prefect Pontius Pilate. He is reported to have performed many miracles and to have created deep divisions in the Jewish community between those who accepted his claims to uniqueness and those who considered them blasphemy. The Sadducees (the Jerusalem temple priesthood) secured his condemnation and crucifixion at the hands of the Roman authorities about 30 CE, when Jesus was about 34 years old.

The above history is generally accepted. For Christians, the story goes on, for he is believed to have risen from the dead 3 days after his crucifixion. Theology on this point remains divided and fractionated. The philosophically prior question is, of course, whether the resurrection is possible or impossible, dividing scholars who affirm the traditional belief and those who deny it. Among the latter, numerous suggestions have been made—the apostles stole the body, the Jews or Romans stole it, the apostles hallucinated his resurrection, the story was simply made up soon after his death, and so on. A number of people from the second century onward have claimed that he never died at all because he was pure spirit and had only the appearance of a man; recently, lurid and factually unfounded speculations have appeared that he had offspring and a line of heirs down to the present. Most such views were known in one form or another to early Christians and were rejected. The creeds promulgated in the fourth and fifth centuries set the standards for future Christian belief: one God, whose only human son is Jesus, who is himself eternally God and who also became fully human for the sake of humanity. He was crucified, died, was buried, and rose from the dead; he will come again at the time when the human race perishes, judge all, and establish his eternal reign on earth.

Such beliefs, codified in the creeds, have their roots in the Gospels and Epistles of earliest Christianity. Their social effects quickly widened the difference between the Jews who accepted Jesus and those who did not, and between Jews and Gentiles. Acceptance of Jesus spread first mostly among the Jewish communities, especially in the Diaspora, and then among the Gentiles, until the latter outnumbered the former. By the second century, an organization of Christian communities under the leadership of bishops (overseers) was established. By the end of the fourth century, Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire. From that time onward (although the theory was vastly larger than the social reality), it was believed that a single Christian community existed, ruled by bishops, emperors, and popes under the authority of Christ.

Since the 16th century, and especially since the 19th, the fragmentation of the Christian community has allowed extremely diverse views of Jesus. The traditional view, preserved most fully in the Eastern Orthodox Church, is that he is the creator and ruler of the entire universe, the kosmokrator. He has also been considered a warrior leading his faithful in battle against evil; a kindly friend, meek and mild; a Gnostic dispensing secret truths; a sage who learned his ideas from Buddhists in Tibet; a democrat; a social revolutionary; a libertarian; a blasphemer; an entrepreneur; a fraudulent magician; a hallucination caused by psychedelic drugs; a socialist or communist; a lunatic; a liberal; the embodiment of the Platonic logos; a superhero or superstar; a moral philosopher; an esthete; a Zealot; an Essene; a liar; a nice guy executed for being nice; the son of a prostitute and a Roman soldier; a manifestation of the archetypal dying and rising god; and much more. In art and literature, he is variously portrayed as European, Middle Eastern, African, Latino, Korean, Chinese, and more.

The social effects of a figure so diversely construed will doubtless continue to be diverse. Elements in society have variously regarded him as the divine authority behind hereditary monarchy or the infallibility of the pope or, on the other hand, the divine authority behind revolutionary liberation movements. Today, Jews do not accept Jesus as the messiah. Jesus is recognized in Islam as one of the three great prophets, but Muslims absolutely deny his resurrection and divinity and regard Christianity as heresy. Many Hindus regard him as a sage while rejecting Christian interpretations of him. Conservatives everywhere tend to regard him as guarantor of their traditions, while liberals tend to regard him as a challenge to tradition. The adaptation of this figure to so many radically different views has made Jesus the most recognized and most influential person of all time. Frequent and constant efforts to discover “the real Jesus” will continue, and answers will continue to be molded by society as well as helping to mold it. There is, of course, a real Jesus, but it seems unlikely that agreement as to what that reality is, and what role it should play in society, will be reached.

Jeffrey Burton Russell

See also Christianity

Further Readings

- Ehrman, B. (1999). Jesus: Apocalyptic prophet of the new millennium. New York: Oxford University Press.
 Pelikan, J. (1985). Jesus through the centuries. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
 Strobel, L. (2007). The case for the real Jesus. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan.

JEWISH DIASPORA

The word diaspora, Greek for “dispersion,” applies to the cultural scattering of a group of people as an outcome of voluntary migration or forced expulsion. Although the term is used to describe the cultural dispersions of many groups of people, particularly in recent times, Diaspora (capitalized) in the past has usually referred to the phenomenon of Jews or Jewish communities living outside the historic land of Israel, including the modern state of Israel after it was established in the mid-20th century. In Hebrew, the term t’futsa (“diaspora”) first appears in the Hebrew Bible (the Old Testament) in Jeremiah 25:34; it comes from the root “to scatter” or “to disperse,” but this particular term is not applied to the larger dispersion of Jews from their land prior to the early 20th century.

The more ancient Hebrew term used for the dispersion of the Jews, galut or golah, meaning “exile” or “captivity,” is found throughout the later books of the Bible. Initially, it referred to the forced relocation of the 10 tribes from the northern part of the land of Israel by Assyria in 722 BCE (2 Kings 17:23). Subsequently and more widely, it applies to the exile of most of the Judeans (later known as Jews) from the southern part the land of Israel to Babylon in 586 BCE. From its historical context relating specifically to the Babylonian Exile, the terms galut/golah in the rabbinic era (post 70 CE) began to refer to any community of Jews living outside the Holy Land wherever they may reside (Mishnah, Rosh Hashanah 2:4).

The Concept of Diaspora Versus Exile

It is no accident that until modern times, Jewish and Gentile sources used the term exile in reference to the Jewish dispersion throughout the world. Diaspora is a more value-neutral term—either an involuntary expulsion or a voluntary migration. Exile, in contrast, clearly implies that wherever Jews live, their rightful place, their home, is in the land of Israel and thus, every other place is, by definition, not truly home. Moreover, exile indicates that Jews have been forced to live elsewhere—by God, based on historical circumstance, or for some other reason. It implies that given the opportunity, Jews would leave that place and return to their homeland. In all cases, exile was seen as a provisional form of existence that could or should be terminated.

Conceptually, Jewish dispersion took on many meanings throughout the ages. In the Bible, exile is portrayed as a punishment for the Israelites' sinfulness that led to a breach of the covenant with God. On their repentance, God would gather them from among the nations where they had been scattered and bring them into the land (see Deuteronomy 28:64, 30:3–5). The rabbis continue this pattern of thought by attributing the exile of the Jews to their commission of the three cardinal sins of idolatry, sexual immorality, and bloodshed.

However, in rabbinic thought, galut and the entire notion of Jewish dispersion additionally took on profoundly new and complex meanings. For the rabbis, galut transcended time and place to become a metaphysical condition that would lead to eventual redemption, as continually iterated by Jewish liturgy. They incorporated into key prayers a profound longing for the ingathering of the exiles (qibbuts galuyyot) from “the four corners of the earth,” an allusion to the messianic future when ultimately God “will assemble the outcast of Israel and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth” (Isaiah 11:12). Thus, exile is likened to Jewish homelessness, alienation, and imperfection, whereas restoration to the land denotes Jewish security, messianic redemption, and finally utopia. Even the afterlife, known as “the world to come,” is contrasted with exile and envisioned within the aforementioned paradigm.

Two distinct approaches to the dispersion of the Jews can be discerned in rabbinic and medieval Jewish thinking. While the rabbis accepted God's perceived judgment and sought a deliverance from the suffering and ignominy associated with exile, they paradoxically recognized positive outcomes to it at one and the same time. They noted that discrimination and threat from without often served to bond Jews together and strengthen their identity (B. Meg. 14a). In addition, living among non-Jews gave Jews the opportunity to spread their monotheistic message to the nations of the world (B. Pes. 87b).

With the advent of the Enlightenment in the 17th and 18th centuries and the Emancipation for Jews process in the 18th and 19th centuries, the notion of exile underwent further development. Certain philosophers universalized the meaning of exile, such that it had nothing to do with the actual land of Israel or to the Jews specifically but, instead, suggested the imperfection of the human condition as a whole. Reform Jewish thinkers reinterpreted dispersion as a blessing (rather than a curse) that enabled the notion of ethical monotheism to be spread across the globe and the dispersed Jews to serve as a light unto their neighbors, helping correct social injustices. One thing is certain—the Jewish Diaspora made Judaism a world religion.

Closely associated with the idea of exile is the notion of the Jewish people's eventual and desired return to Eretz Israel (the Land of Israel). However, today a large percentage of Jews do not perceive themselves as living in exile, nor do they long to return to Israel. Many Jews at present feel equally, if not more, at home in the countries in which they live, and they would not characterize their residence there as exilic in any way. This is especially true in North America, where Jews have enjoyed unparalleled acceptance as well as political and economic advancement. Indeed, the majority call their host countries their permanent homes and, thus, consider themselves as living in the Diaspora rather than in exile. Nonetheless, there are multiple organizations within nearly every Diaspora Jewish community that support and maintain relations with Israel, the historic homeland of the Jewish people, a place where Jewish cultural and religious life thrives in unique ways and where today the largest Jewish community in the world resides.

A Diaspora Like No Other

The distinguishing feature between members of a diaspora and regular migrants is the communal organization that preserves their ethnic/national identity and communal solidarity. While preservation of cultural identity can complement and contribute to the host countries of diasporic groups, sometimes it leads to severe hostility against those in the diasporic communities. At the same time, dual allegiance to both the former and the newly attained culture can cause tension within the dispersed community as well. These multiple relationships—both cooperative and conflicting—that arise between the Diaspora, its homeland, and its host country have influenced and continue to influence international politics and contribute to cultural growth and change.

A variety of factors make the Jewish Diaspora unique from other diasporas. First and foremost, the Jewish Diaspora has proven its extraordinary cultural resilience even while being subjected to sociopolitical and economic adversity and oppression throughout its history. Even after tragic conflicts, including prosecutions and expulsions, Jewish diasporic communities reemerged and revived in these same areas of past conflict. For Jews, exile from the land of Israel lasted almost 2,000 years—an amount of time no other cultural group in history has survived almost entirely apart from its physical homeland. Although the Jewish diasporic community spread out widely throughout this period of time and often was the subject of forces seeking their cultural and religious assimilation, Jews managed to remain a cohesive group that encompassed multiple continents, scores of cultures, and countless languages. Furthermore, the Jewish Diaspora has made unrivaled contributions to global civilization. These contributions are seen within diverse fields such as literature, the arts, and the sciences, as well as in other traditions, such as Christianity and Islam, whose cores emanate from Jewish monotheism.

Ever since the destruction of the First Temple more than 2,500 years ago, the Jewish people spread to all parts of the world. Not all migrations were due to forced exile; escape from famine, pursuit of prosperity, and the desire for greater sociopolitical freedoms were among the many reasons for emigration throughout the ages. There are two major results from this dispersion. First, Jews have influenced the host countries and cultures that surrounded them. Second, the countries and cultures in which the Jews resided influenced them, creating distinct and often extremely diverse Jewish communities within the Diaspora. Correspondingly, as the world community becomes more united via modern political, economic, and social systems, so too the uniqueness of many Diaspora communities has been lost or diminished.

Scholars debate the issue of Jewish Diaspora and exile. Some, like Shaul Magid, argue that the Diaspora exists and allows for the development of Jews outside the state of Israel and apart from Zionist ideals. Others separate the concepts of exile and Diaspora entirely, stating that the Diaspora is not an exile but the result of it. The first prime minister of Israel, David Ben-Gurion, was among the many early Zionists who claimed that the Diaspora would inevitably vanish due to assimilation and acculturation, on the one hand, and emigration from the Diaspora to Israel, on the other. Although many Israelis are pessimistic about the continued existence of Jewish life in the Diaspora, particularly due to high rates of intermarriage and apathy regarding Jewish life and culture, not all Israelis share the Zionist ideal of a centralized national sovereignty and the negation or elimination of all Jewish life in the Diaspora. Indeed, anti-, non-, and post-Zionist views challenge the ideals that paved the way toward the creation of the state of Israel.

The Historical Diaspora in Ancient Times

Jewish communities have dispersed beyond the land of Canaan/Israel, beginning with the Assyrian exile in 722 BCE. Although there are some who claim to have discovered evidence of the modern existence of the Lost Tribes of Israel (see, e.g., www.britam.org or www.kulanu.org), most scholars agree that only those who lived in or escaped to Judah/Judea in the south were able to withstand the seeming total cultural assimilation of their northern brethren. A living diasporic community did not form until after the initial Babylonian deportations that took place in 597 BCE, which reached their peak with the destruction of the First Temple in 586 BCE and the enslavement of a large part of the Jewish population. In 538 BCE, Cyrus the Great allowed the Jews to return to their land, resulting in the revival of Jerusalem and the rebuilding of the Second Temple.

Following the Babylonian Exile, Jewish life and settlement outside the land of Israel continued to increase during the subsequent Hellenistic and Roman periods. Jewish settlements were found in Egypt and Syria, and significant populations were documented in Pergamum, Parthia, Cappadocia, Persia, Media, and Elam, among other areas. At this time, Jews constituted between 10% and 12% of the total population of Babylonia. Ranging occupationally from farmers to traders, they became an integral component of the Babylonian economy. Under Parthian rule, Babylonian Jewry enjoyed a moderate amount of freedom from the ruling government, which allowed them to worship freely as well as govern various aspects of their communities.

During the Second Temple period, Judaism became a scripture-centered religion. Jews embraced the viewpoint that the exile from their homeland was attributable to divine will and idealized the Jewish role among other nations. A system of material support, generally consisting of half-shekel donations, was established in which the Jewish Diaspora supported the Temple and its priests in Jerusalem. Spanning both the Roman and the Parthian regions, this system of transport was protected under Augustus Caesar and Marcus Agrippa, who instituted penalties for sacrilege in cases of attacks on the caravans. During this period, many Babylonian Jewish scholars settled in Eretz Israel after enrolling in its academies; others, however, brought their newly acquired knowledge back to Babylonia—the result of these endeavors being the eventual creation of the Babylonian Talmud.

The proselytizing movement within Judaism reached its height around the first century CE with the conversion of the rulers of Adiabene (present-day northern Iraq) to Judaism, which led to an increase in the Jewish population along the Euphrates. Similarly, according to the Jewish philosopher Philo of Alexandria (20 BCE to 50 CE), the Jewish population in Egypt spanned well over 1 million people during his time, with the city of Alexandria constituting one of the largest Jewish settlements in the world, with synagogues located in all five districts of the city. Toward the end of the century, conflicts and hostility began to arise between the Diaspora and its host countries.

Hostilities reached their peak in 66 CE, when the Jewish communities stopped dedicating sacrifices for their Roman rulers. Although Romans tolerated religious minorities, the refusal to honor the emperors triggered resentment, suspicion, and fear (Grabbe, 2000, pp. 309–310). As riots broke out in areas of Jewish settlement such as Alexandria and parts of Syria, many Jews were massacred by the ruling armies. Relations only worsened after the Roman destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE and the newly imposed tax on the Jewish populace, which lasted until the fourth century.

Nevertheless, even after the destruction of the Temple, Jews within the Diaspora continued to financially support the religious patriarchate in the Land of Israel and to travel to Jerusalem for pilgrimage, worship, and study. Furthermore, a significant portion of the Jewish Diaspora at the time was located in Babylonia and was thus safe from Roman oppression. When Emperor Trajan threatened Jewry in Eretz Israel, however, antagonism brewed, escalating into the Bar Kokhba Revolt (132–135 CE) against Trajan's successor, Hadrian. This 3-year-long battle ended with the destruction of the Jewish population in Jerusalem and the south, forcing Jewish life to largely relocate to the Galilee—the remaining Jewish stronghold.

Ultimately, the Bar Kokhba Revolt further strengthened the Diaspora, particularly throughout the Mediterranean and Asia Minor, via the sale of Jewish captives from the war as slaves and the flight of many Jews from their war-torn homeland. The period between the third and fourth centuries saw a decline in relations between the large and powerful Babylonian community and the declining population in Eretz Israel, relations that came to an end with Hillel II's (fourth century) adaptation of the Hebrew calendar, formerly a provenance denied rabbinic leaders in the Diaspora.

The Emergence of Different Cultural Groups Within Jewry

From perhaps as early as the destruction of the Second Temple (70 CE) and subsequent exile and enslavement of a large number of Jews from their homeland, Jewish populations existed in Europe, especially within the Roman Empire. It is thought that Jewish merchants established themselves in towns and cities along the main routes of commerce. The first evidence of Jews along the Rhine in Germany is found in a letter dated 321 CE from Emperor Constantine to the prefect of Cologne regarding special taxes on the Jews. There are also records of Jewish communities in Gaul (modern France). There, the diasporic communities were given legal recognition as well as religious, economic, and sociopolitical autonomy. Throughout this period, Christian missionary activity surpassed Jewish proselytism and laid the groundwork for future conflict.

It was during the early medieval period that scholars believe that diasporic Jewish communities began to differentiate themselves into distinctly different cultural groups, albeit all within Jewry. Prior to that time, Jews lived in many different lands but had not developed the distinctly different customs and differentiated self-perception that would later emerge. The Jewish cultural group tracing its existence back the farthest is known as Mizrahi or Oriental (Eastern) Jews. Among them are classed the Musta'rabs, Arabic-speaking Jews thought to be indigenous to the Middle East (mainly in Syria, Iraq, Egypt, and Eretz Israel), and the Ma'aravis or Maghrebis, living in North Africa and speaking North African Arabic dialects. Also ancient but not included within Mizrahi Jewry are Romaniot Jews, Greek-speaking Jews living around the eastern Mediterranean, and Italian Jews, whose communities date back to the early Roman empire.

In the early fourth century, two other distinctly Jewish groups began to emerge—Sephardic or Spanish Jewry and Ashkenazi or German Jewry. As a result of their distance from the main centers of Jewish life in Eretz Israel and in Babylonia, Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews slowly began to develop their own distinctive customs, educational institutions, and rabbinical leadership. By contemporary times, Ashkenazi Jewry, which for the next 1,000 years was the smallest of these groups, had become the biggest, numbering approximately 80% of world Jewry.

Early Medieval Diaspora Under Islam

By the seventh century, the Jewish Diaspora was located mainly in Egypt, Syria, and Babylonia. Smaller communities were dispersed throughout the Middle East, North Africa, and along the Mediterranean Coast. Between 571 and 632 CE, Islam, a new religion based on Jewish and Christian teachings, was founded. Emerging out of Arabia, Islam spread rapidly throughout the Middle East and North Africa. Under Islamic rule, Babylonian Jews gained protection, flourished economically, and from 700 to 900 CE, functioned as an almost entirely autonomous community. During this period, yeshivas or learning academies flourished from Babylonia to North Africa, prompting some scholars to trace the emergence of Islamic madrasas (religious schools) and the development of Shari'a (Islamic law) to influence from their Jewish counterparts.

In 711, Arabic armies completed their invasion of the Iberian Peninsula and established their rule over Spain. Once again, Jewish communities were given greater freedom and autonomy under Islamic rule than they had been granted under Christendom. By the year 900, Spanish Jews not only caught up in scholarship but in many aspects surpassed their Eastern counterparts, entering into what would become known as the Golden Age of Sephardic Jewry (Gerber, 1992, p. 28). Toward the end of the 10th century, Spain's Jewish community established a strong cultural identity that was manifested in the creation of official Hebrew grammar, Hebrew poetry, and the translation of important Greek and Arabic texts into Hebrew. As Spain increasingly became the center of Jewish scholarship, mystical traditions coalesced into the creation of the Kabbalah. Meanwhile, the Jewish community of Babylon slowly declined as Jews increasingly moved out of the Middle East and into Spain and Italy from approximately 1050 onward (Johnson, 1987, p. 183). With the destruction of the 'Abbāsid Caliphate in Baghdad in 1258, Babylonian Jewry lost its preeminence in the Jewish world as Jewish population centers shifted elsewhere.

After nearly three centuries of cultural flourishing, many Spanish Jews were forced to migrate north to Christian lands or south and east to Muslim lands in order to escape the intolerance of non-Muslims exhibited by the Almohades conquest of Cordoba in 1148. Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon (Maimonides), the famous Jewish philosopher and physician, experienced anti-Jewish persecution firsthand when the Jewish community was given the choice of conversion to Islam, death, or exile. His family, along with most of the Jewish community, chose exile, fleeing Spain—his birthplace—and ultimately settling in Egypt (Seltzer, 1980, p. 393).

Medieval Diasporas Under Christianity

Rome's religious toleration of the Jews ended when it became Christian around 350 CE. While ecclesiastical legislation against Jews steadily increased throughout the centuries, early medieval Christian society was relatively tolerant while the church was distracted by internal heresies and challenges of its own. It is estimated that between 800 and 1100 CE, 1.5 million Jews made their home in Christian Europe. They occupied a unique place outside the feudal system that ruled Christians, and thus, they were at first spared many of the feudal disadvantages that made life miserable for most Christians. For centuries, they were protected by royal and ecclesiastical powers because of the vital role they played in the fields of medicine, finance, and administration (Ben-Sasson, 1976, pp. 400–401, 409–413).

All this began to change when in 1096 Pope Urban II initiated the first Crusade against the Muslims in the Holy Land, during which entire communities of Jews in the Rhineland were slaughtered by Christians marching eastward. Faced with the choice of conversion, many European Jews opted for martyrdom instead. The Crusades that followed also resulted in continued loss of Jewish lives throughout western and eastern Europe, but none of the subsequent Crusades were as damaging and tragic as the first. As a result, Jewish-Christian relations only worsened. The large-scale movements between western and eastern Europe, triggered in part by the Crusades, eventually led to increased trade and, consequently, increased cultural exchange. In this respect, the contributions of the Jewish Diaspora were priceless. The Hebrew translations of Greek and Arabic scholarship in philosophy, medicine, and math spread throughout Europe and were in turn translated into Latin, transforming knowledge in every field in which this took place (Taitz, Henry, & Tallan, 2003).

As Christianity gained momentum and the Roman Catholic Church was able to consolidate its power, anti-Semitism spread. This coincided with the creation and rise of the Christian middle class, who felt threatened by economic competition from the Jews and sought to eliminate them from towns and cities across Europe. By the 12th and 14th centuries, Dominican and Franciscan friars were publicly preaching sermons against Jews, and local ecclesiastical authorities were using religious art, plays, and sermons to incite the general populace toward greater and greater anti-Semitism. As a result, massacres of Jews erupted all over Europe, some of the worst taking place in the Rhineland, England, Franconia, and France. Additionally, beginning in 1290, when the Jews of England were formally expelled from the country en masse, a wave of expulsions against Jews took place for the next 200 years in various provinces and kingdoms in western Europe, often as a result of struggles between various powerbrokers within Christian secular and ecclesiastical bodies.

In Spain, conflicts arose as Christians attempted to convert Jews in the 1390s and 1490s—resulting in Christian hostility against conversos (“new Christians”). When Christians gained control of Spain in 1492, King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella forcibly exiled the Jews (as well as any remaining Muslims) who would not convert to Christianity. It is estimated that between 400,000 and 800,000 Spanish Jews migrated out of Spain northward into Navarre and Provence, south into North Africa, east to countries around the Mediterranean basin that were part of the Ottoman Empire, and west to Portugal, where they were forced to convert less than a decade later.

Between Anti-Semitism and Enlightenment

The Jews who left the Middle East but settled in central and northern Europe instead of Spain created autonomous communities run by religious leaders. Prior to the 14th century, these communities were able to steer clear of the Christian government as long as they met its tax requirements. However, European Jews' economic success was soon frowned on—mainly due to their exclusive ability to charge interest on loans, which was forbidden to Christians by canon law. Encouraged by church authorities, violence against Jews was commonplace—the perpetrators justifying their actions by citing false rumors and blaming Jewry for occurrences such as the Black Death. The cycle of accusation, violence, cancellation of debt, and the following expulsions pushed European Jewry eastward and south to Poland, Bohemia, Italy, the Balkans, and what would become Russia.

The Balkan Jewish populations, at the time part of the Ottoman Empire, experienced forced migrations into newly acquired territories whenever the Ottomans conquered new areas, such as Salonika in 1430, Constantinople in 1453, and Rhodes in 1522. The Spanish and Portuguese Jews, too, migrated to these territories when turned away from other destinations after the initial expulsion and throughout the 1500s. Records show that the Ottoman sultans were quite pleased with the trades and skills the Jewish immigrants brought with them (Lewis, 1984, pp. 123–139).

The Jewish population under the Ottoman Empire not only grew more massive with the empire's annexation of Iraq, Syria, and Eretz Israel but also represented several distinct groups with their own languages and traditions, indicating just how heterogeneous the Diaspora had become since 597 BCE. The Spanish Jews, known as Sephardim, were especially successful in preserving their languages and traditions in the Ottoman lands. Within three generations, their ritual observances were adopted in the majority of the synagogues, even by those Jews who were native to the area and did not trace their roots to Spain.

Beginning in the mid-14th century, Jews expelled from various German cities had begun to migrate to northern Italy. When the Count of Milan issued a charter permitting German and Italian Jewry to trade, the Jews were assigned designated land in which to live and thereafter engaged in trade and banking occupations. Spanish and Portuguese Jews also fled the persecutions taking place in their homelands and settled in Italy. Ashkenazim, Sephardim, and Levantine Jews all sought refuge in Italy, each group bringing their own synagogues into their new country. Although experiencing temporary expulsion from various cities throughout Italy, Italian Jews, for the most part, enjoyed religious and economic freedom (Abrahams, 1985, pp. 400–401).

The period of the Italian Renaissance was a positive one for Italian Jews, who took part in its cultural and intellectual growth via contributions to art, literature, and music. As Italian women during this period inched forward toward equality with men, so too did Jewish women—in some instances even being educated as well as men (Taitz, Henry, & Tallan, 2003, p. 105). However, as the Renaissance concluded, Jewish conditions took a turn for the worse once more, as manifested in the creation of the first Jewish ghetto, a walled-in quarter specifically to separate the Jewish community from others, in 1516 in Venice. About 50 years later, Jews were prohibited from all monetary occupations other than selling used clothing. In the following decades, Italian Jews migrated north, where they were again restricted to living in ghettos under oppressive legislation.

In the 16th and 17th centuries, a privileged few among the most wealthy segment of Ashkenazi Jewry were given the opportunity to serve in royal courts as “court Jews”—creditors who, in exchange for greater privileges, offered a variety of financial services to the rulers of various localities throughout central and eastern Europe. Most court Jews received the benefits of living outside the ghetto and to their credit worked on multiple occasions to gain favors for their Jewish communities (Ben-Sasson, 1976, pp. 736–738).

As the Ottoman Empire began to decline in the late 16th century, so too did the Jewish communities—both economically and in terms of status—a situation compounded by the harsher discriminatory laws promulgated by the Ottoman sultan Murad III subjugating the empire's Jews. Jewish communities fell into poverty and in turn experienced a decline in both secular and religious education. A new interest in mysticism sprang up, where the persecutions that the Jews were experiencing throughout the Diaspora were interpreted as confirmations that the End of Days was approaching. Thus, when the Ottoman-born Jew Shabbetai Zvi of Izmir traveled throughout the Middle East in the 17th century claiming that he was the Messiah, he gained a large following, not only in the regions he visited but among Ashkenazi Jewry, who themselves were in dire straits and sought relief from persecution and poverty. When he converted to Islam on pain of death by the Turkish authorities, he left many Jews disillusioned and crushed in spirit throughout the world (Lewis, 1984, pp. 140–147).

Concurrently, despite the order of expulsion in 1492, many Jews had decided to stay in Spain and Portugal as crypto-Jews (Jews disguised as Christians), while others boarded ships to recently discovered lands in the New World, where they were able to practice Judaism openly from 1541 through 1571, when the Inquisition unfortunately reached the Americas as well. The Inquisition continued well into the 1600s, spreading throughout both Central and South America. Yet because economic opportunity for everyone was so favorable in New Spain and travel was so hazardous and costly, many crypto-Jews chose to assimilate completely instead of moving to lands beyond the Inquisition's reach (Seltzer, 1980, pp. 502–505).

Having been pushed eastward from their ancestral homes, Jews began to find a more tolerant home in Poland from the mid-14th century onward. By the 17th century, the Ashkenazi Jewish Diaspora (those who traced their origins to Germany and spoke a German Jewish dialect known as Yiddish) was mainly located east of the Rhine River valley, with a minority still living in western Europe. Jews were found in both rural and urban areas and had unique roles in their host countries. Polish Jews were spread out among all classes, while Ukrainian Jews mainly occupied the middle classes. The 16th and early 17th centuries were known as the Golden Age of Polish Jewry, when Jews were allowed more economic freedoms than they had known in their former habitations, and internally, they established great academies of higher learning, which led to a thriving intellectual society (Ben-Sasson, 1976, pp. 639–644, 654–656).

In the New World, the Jewish community of Brazil grew prosperous under the newly established Dutch rule. When the colony was granted freedom to trade, Jews from all parts of Europe migrated to Brazil. Their occupations involved everything from managing sugar plantations to trading precious stones. However, when the Dutch lost the colony to the Portuguese, the Inquisition was reinstated with full force once more. Consequently, a small group of Jewish refugees managed to escape the oppression and, after a string of unlucky incidents, ended up in New Amsterdam, today's New York City (Gerber, 1992, p. 206).

By the mid-18th century, Jewish congregations had been established in the colonies of New York, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina. By 1776, Jews were living side by side with Christians and by and large shared equal rights. With the advent of equal rights came the struggle against acculturation that their European brethren faced as the Jews in the New World tried to maintain their cultural and religious identity. Furthermore, as part of an amalgamation of a variety of Jewish communities coming from various parts of Europe and Asia, they had to come to terms with the differences among themselves and their traditions and establish a united community. Despite their myriad differences, American Jews were able to establish and maintain functional and prosperous communities. Nevertheless, the Jewish communities still lacked the unity they had experienced in Europe (Johnson, 1987, pp. 279–280).

In the 18th and 19th centuries, as anti-Jewish pogroms (government-sponsored massacres of Jews) spread throughout the East, the Ashkenazi Jewish Diaspora began shifting westward once more to countries where the Enlightenment intellectually and the Industrial Revolution economically were changing worldviews. Jews were now accepted in societies where new philosophies such as humanism and deism were being explored. Within the Jewish community, this cultural flowering was known as the Haskalah. In this new climate of religious tolerance, Jews across the Western Diaspora were slowly given more rights (Ben-Sasson, 1976, pp. 780–789).

In the 1750s, a new religious movement in Judaism was born in eastern Poland, known as Hasidism (based on the Hebrew word for “piety”). Abandoning the stress placed on scholarship, Hasidism focused on simple devotion to God, acts of loving kindness, and a merging of mysticism, exclusively the provenance of the Jewish elites, into everyday life. Although several great rabbinical leaders were at odds with Hasidic Jews at its start, the two groups eventually saw past their differences to discourage what they saw as even more of a threat from the negative influences of the Enlightenment movement. In the enlightened German Diaspora, some Jewish women had achieved quite a high public status as “salon Jewesses,” or hostesses who would set up their living rooms to entertain guests from a wide variety of backgrounds for intellectual conversations spanning a range of topics such as art, politics, science, and philosophy (Taitz, Henry, & Tallan, 2003).

After approximately 400 years, Jews were allowed to migrate back to England. Though their immigration was approached with mistrust by the English, their skill in trade was appreciated as it significantly improved the economy. In Germany, the relationship between Jews and their host governments was quite different from what it was in other places in western Europe. In Prussia, Jews experienced relatively good living conditions under the leadership of the Jewish philosopher Moses Mendelssohn. Mendelssohn not only represented but played a significant role in shaping the “New Jew,” one who was both religiously observant and well educated in secular studies. In contrast, other parts of the Austro-Hungarian Empire held a large population of uneducated Jews to whom Emperor Joseph II offered free education and citizenship rights in an attempt to assimilate them into the general, non-Jewish culture.

As the 18th and 19th centuries progressed and Jews were accepted as citizens in more and more countries within western Europe, the Jewish religious leadership began to lose its power over the community to the secular governments of the host countries. Within the Jewish communities of England, France, and Germany, a number of different responses arose to the challenges posed by Enlightenment thinking; the decline in rabbinic power; greater economic, political, and social freedoms; and greater exposure to non-Jewish culture.

One such response was the Reform movement within Judaism, which developed in Germany in the early part of the 19th century. While tentative in its attitude toward change at first, in time Reform Judaism advocated granting women more equality within Jewish religious life, decreasing elements in Jewish law and culture that emphasized Jewish distinctiveness from non-Jews, and using secular scholarship of religious literature, particularly regarding the Bible, to change religious customs and practices as well as thinking. These changes were met with fierce resistance by many, both within and outside Germany, spawning the creation of further branches within Judaism, which are known today as Ultra-Orthodoxy, Modern Orthodoxy, and Conservative Judaism (Ben-Sasson, 1976, pp. 834–846).

As Taitz, Henry, and Tallan (2003) have described, the Jewish Enlightenment movement in eastern Europe incorporated religious ideals, and in addition to encouraging assimilation into Russian culture, it promoted a focus on Hebrew and Yiddish literature and gave birth to philosophies such as Jewish Socialism and Zionism.

Ironically, although in 1791 French Jewry was granted citizenship rights by the revolutionary assembly and Italian ghettos were temporarily opened, anti-Semitism in western Europe seemed only to grow as the 19th century progressed. However, the bulk of the European Jewish Diaspora lived by then in eastern Europe, in what are now contemporary Hungary, Poland, Ukraine, Russia, and the Baltic States. There Jews were restricted in many ways economically, politically, and socially, but internally, their culture thrived. However, by the 1880s, the political situation once again turned bleak with the government’s enactment of further anti-Semitic legislation and its support of pogroms that led to the widespread killing of Jews in various locales. As a result, when they were able, many Jews, particularly the young and adventurous, left for North America, where from 1882 to 1914 approximately 2 million eastern European Jews emigrated. Some also chose to emigrate to the Land of Israel, then known as Palestine, to rebuild Jewish life in their ancestral homeland.

Modern Diaspora

Today, the Jewish Diaspora, numbering around 15 million, is concentrated primarily in North America, France, the Former Soviet Union, Latin America, and Israel, representing far fewer countries and more distinctive cultural communities than even a century ago. This is due to a variety of historical factors, two of which stand out. First, the Holocaust perpetrated by Nazi Germany in collaboration with local governments and populations led to the murder of 6 million Jews throughout western and eastern Europe as well as the Balkan countries around the Mediterranean (one third of world Jewry at that time). Within 12 years (1933–1939, when Jews sought to escape from Nazi persecution, and then 1939–1945, when they were slaughtered en masse), Jewish Diaspora communities and their rich cultural heritage, some of which had existed for well over a millennium, were completely wiped out. Refugees and survivors of the Holocaust, who migrated mainly to North and South America, were able to bring some of their culture with them. However, they could not reestablish the breadth and depth of what had existed before. Another consequence of the Holocaust was the decimation of the two main languages of European Jewish culture—Yiddish (a German Jewish dialect) and Ladino (a Spanish Jewish dialect)—in which much literature and poetry had been produced.

The second event that altered modern Jewish Diaspora life was the emergence of the state of Israel in 1948 as a result of the 1947 United Nations (UN) resolution dividing Palestine into two separate countries for Jews and Arabs. The Arab nations surrounding Palestine did not accept the UN resolution and, on withdrawal of British troops, attacked the country, seeking to place all of it under Arab control. After fierce fighting, the Arab armies were vanquished, and Jews controlled more territory than they had been originally granted. Egypt controlled the Gaza Strip and Jordan, the West Bank, preventing Palestinian Arabs from establishing their own country.

As a result of the Arab defeat, waves of anti-Semitism—some purely mob violence and some government sponsored—arose in Muslim countries, such as Iraq, Syria, Egypt, and other North African nations. Jews there felt their lives were in peril and sought to leave en masse to the relative safety of Israel, often the only country willing to welcome them. In addition, although protected from large-scale violence, Jews from Morocco were nevertheless inspired by the possibility of returning to their ancient homeland after 2,000 years in exile and emigrated in waves throughout the decades following the establishment of the Jewish state. Thus, from 1948 to the 1980s, Jewish Diaspora communities that had existed for 2,000–3,000 years or more (in Iraq, as a primary example) were emptied of Jews in just a few short decades as approximately 1 million Levantine or Eastern Jews emigrated to Israel. While their distinctive cultures still exist there, like the Ashkenazi Jews in North and South America, they too are slowly losing their particular heritage as younger generations assimilate into mainstream modern Israeli culture.

Today the preeminent Diaspora culture is American Jewry due to its size, 2.5–3 million, and its prosperity. Following World War II, as America on the whole became a more open and progressive society vis-à-vis its minority populations, American Jews thrived in an era of full equal rights and unfettered access to higher education and economic opportunity. American Jews are prominently represented in every significant field of economic and cultural endeavor and increasingly in American politics as well. However, with an intermarriage rate between Jews and non-Jews of 52%, some wonder how much longer distinctive Jewish life and culture will thrive given this challenge.

Zion Zohar

See also Ashkanaz; Christianity; Halakha and Shari'a; Hebrew; Islam; Israel; Judaism

Further Readings

- Abrahams, I. (1985). Jewish life in the Middle Ages. Morristown, NJ: Temple Books.
- Ben-Sasson, H. H. (1976). A history of the Jewish people. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Gerber, J. S. (1992). The Jews of Spain: A history of the Sephardic experience. New York: Free Press.
- Grabbe, L. L. (2000). Judaic religion in the Second Temple period: Belief and practice from the exile to Yavneh. London: Routledge. Retrieved May 18, 2011, from <http://www.questia.com/PM.qst?a=o&d=102710426>
- Johnson, P. (1987). A history of the Jews. New York: Harper & Row.
- Lewis, B. (1984). The Jews of Islam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Seltzer, R. M. (1980). Jewish people, Jewish thought: The Jewish experience in history. New York: Macmillan.
- Taitz, E., Henry, S., & Tallan, C. (2003). The JPS guide to Jewish women: 600 B.C.E. to 1900 C.E. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society. Retrieved May 18, 2011, from <http://www.questia.com/PM.qst?a=o&d=111789038>

JIHAD

Jihad in contemporary usage is a contested term, often translated in quite different ways as either an Islamic “holy war” conducted against any “infidel” broadly conceived of as a “non-Muslim,” or as a peaceful striving against the self as a form of spiritual reformation toward personal and communal peace in opposition to more bellicose motives. Themes of self-sacrifice, or martyrdom in the path of God, are often associated with these interpretations.

These interpretations are narrow dimensions of the full etymological and historical signification of the word, derived from the Arabic trilateral root j-h-d, signifying a striving toward a specific objective. The semantic field of the root indicates its broader usages within Arabic social, political, and legal discourse. Terms such as ijtihād (the work of scholars and independent jurists for solutions to legal problems) and jahd (strain, endeavor, attempt) suggest that popular conceptualizations of jihad as either a political or a spiritual enterprise are artificial binaries that obscure the historical formations of the concept as an instrument of legal thought, social doctrine, and political duty. As a legal concept, jihad is drawn from Islamic textual authorities such as the Qur'an, the Hadith, and the Sunna (the sayings and actions of Prophet Muhammad) by scholars, commentators, and jurists-prudents to form regulations and strategies for four types of sociopolitical activity, often related to warfare: (1) the expansion of territory, (2) the consolidation of hegemony, (3) the protection of property, (4) and the sustenance of the community. Prior to the revelation of the Qur'an beginning in 610 CE, jihad does not appear to have had any specific belligerent meanings, and of the 36 relevant Qur'anic references to the term, less than one third have any particular reference to warfare. The most cited of these, in both historical and contemporary contexts, is the "Verse of the Sword," from the fifth aya (verse) of the ninth sura (al-Tawbah, Repentance). Verses discussing warfare, such as the "Verse of the Sword," required substantial textual interpretation to be formed as authoritative legal doctrine.

The Qur'anic conceptualization of jihad constructs a complex tension between violent exercises against a foe and spiritual exercises focused on the self, all of which are directed for the sake of God toward God's cause. It is an incumbent duty that the struggle (jihad) of the believer must always be in alignment with the will of God whether in combat or in spiritual matters. This jihad occurs as both a gift of the believer to God—a freely given self to God's cause—and a form of commercial transaction between the believer and God. Prior to any specifically belligerent understandings, jihad, as a struggle, is a gift performed for God that generates a particular recompense available to all believing Muslims insofar as the jihad is appropriately practiced.

In the lifetime of Prophet Muhammad, following early persecutions, there were several open conflicts and battles waged between the emerging Muslim community and local tribes of pagan Arabs, Jews, and Christians. Though these battles were often minor skirmishes and raids, major engagements, such as those of Badr (624 CE), Uhud (625 CE), Khandaq (627 CE), Mecca (630 CE), and Hunayn (630 CE), indicated the emergence of combat as a legitimate behavior for adherents of the faith. Sections of the Qur'an such as those found within the 2nd (al-Baqarah), 8th (al-Anfal), 9th (al-Tawbah), and 22nd (al-Hajj) suras discuss the legitimacy of killing those who present a threat to the believing community.

The tradition of the sayings and actions of the Prophet demonstrate a nuanced understanding of this combat. A tradition narrated on the authority of Abu Hurayra, one of the companions of the Prophet, and compiled by al-Bukhari indicates that according to Muhammad, jihad in the cause of God was second only to personal belief in God and his messenger, in religious practice. The death of a mujahid, one who participates in jihad, is considered to bestow a reward for martyrdom in the path of God. There were, however, particular rules to be obeyed. Among these rules were prohibitions against the murder of women and children, the necessity of an open invitation to non-Muslims to embrace Islam, and the opportunity for peoples of the Book (e.g., Jews, Christians, and Zoroastrians) to pay the jizya (poll tax) in lieu of fighting. The discussions of the jihad within the Qur'an seem to indicate that jihad itself was a religious practice that during times of social and political conflict might also feature a distinctly martial purpose.

Within the broad corpus of Sunnī legal thought, most succinctly expressed by the four madhāhib (schools) of Hanafi, Mālikī, Shafi'i, and Hanbali jurisprudence, the doctrine of jihad is discussed as a form of warfare. In his influential ninth-century thesis on Islamic law, al-Shafi'i (d. 820 CE) systematized readings of the Qur'an and Hadith to form a method of legal theory. Although concerned with jihad, the focus of al-Shafi'i contextualized the theory of warfare as one instrument toward preserving a greater social order. For several centuries following the revelation of the Qur'an, legal scholars viewed jihad as a means of propagating the faith through legitimated and structured methods of combat and governance. Such structures were often discussed in manuals of jihad (kitab al-jihad).

Through Islamic history, and into the present moment, the question of jihad has often dealt with issues of personal duty (fard'ayn) contrasted with collective duty (fard kifaya), proper Islamic governance, and issues of declaring Muslims of unbelief (takfir). General understandings of jihad express it as a communal obligation, incumbent on the individual only when an extraordinary situation exists. This is the opinion of many Shi'a communities that view jihad as communally obligatory. However, since within these communities only the imam may call for offensive jihad against the non-Muslim world, and the imam has gone into occultation, only defensive jihad remains acceptable. The Shi'i, however, share the Sunnī understanding of jihad as a personal struggle against inner desires and impurities regardless of external threat.

Muslim responses to the crusading Christian armies (ca. 1096–1291) from the West and the invading Mongol hordes (ca. 1200–1300) from the East influenced new interpretations and applications of theories of jihad. Theorists from Andalus (Islamic Spain) such as Ibn Hazm (d. 1064) and Ibn Qudama al-Maqdisi (d. 1223) revised prior theories of jihad to address the changing political conditions. Most notable of this period, however, was Taqi al-Din Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), who, though often labeled a cynical critic of Muslim governments, issued a number of influential fatwas (legal rulings) detailing the process of takfir—a proclamation of the illegitimate status of Mongols who had converted to Islam. For Ibn Taymiyya, any individual proclaiming loyalty to the faith must demonstrate this loyalty by engaging in jihad in the path of God. Those who were unwilling to fight, including government officials, were considered to be in a state of disbelief and open to violent action.

This ability to pronounce Muslims as unbelievers (kafirun) through the process of takfir remained highly influential in the colonial and postcolonial period. The Egyptian Muslim intellectual Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966), in his influential work Ma'alim fi al-Tariq (Milestones), describes jihad as a method used to abrogate all authorities, organizations, and ideologies—Muslim or non-Muslim—deemed to be in a state of ignorance (jahiliyyah) of the Qur'an and its message. For Qutb, jihad has no relationship to modern forms of warfare but is rather bound to the nature of Islam and its role in the world. This is a statement readily accepted by Osama bin Laden (d. 2011), who, under the tutelage of spiritual advisors Abdullah Azzam and Ayman al-Zawahiri, had cited both Ibn Taymiyya and Sayyid Qutb in his frequent expositions for his al Qaeda organization on the necessity of jihad against Saudi Arabia, the United States, both the state of Israel and the Jewish people, and the broader Western world.

Within Shi'i political organizations such as Hezbollah (the Party of God), which originated in Lebanon between 1982 and 1985 CE, jihad is not envisioned as a global war against the enemies of Islam but rather as a struggle, exceeding military conflict, undertaken as both a defensive resistance against specific threats and an edifying act meant to ameliorate and control harmful human desire. Naim Qassem, Deputy Secretary-General of Hezbollah, suggests that as a personal duty it is impossible to differentiate the act of jihad in terms of religion or politics. The act might have political objectives, such as Hezbollah's stated aim of resisting Israeli political objectives, or religious objectives, such as the objective of martyrdom and its recompense sought by a mujahid.

Interpretations of jihad as a violent act, and its practice as such, have often resulted in debates over the definition of suicide, martyrdom, terrorism, and legitimate violence. Contemporary jurists such as Egyptian Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi (b. 1926 CE) have warned of the illegitimacy of religious extremism—in the form of bigotry, commitment to excessiveness, and the overburdening of others (including non-Muslims)—and have sought to reclaim the authority of the jurist from those considered extremist.

Nathan S. French

See also Cosmic War and Cosmic Conflict; Halakha and Shari'a; Islam; Islamism (Political Islam); War on Terrorism

Further Readings

Abou El Fadl, K. (2006). Rebellion and violence in Islamic law. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

- Bonner, M. (2006). Jihād in Islamic history: Doctrines and practice. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Brachmann, J. M. (2008). Global jihadism: Theory and practice. New York: Routledge.
- Cook, D. (2005). Understanding Jihād. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hegghammer, T. (2010). Jihad in Saudi Arabia: Violence and Pan-Islamism since 1979. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Lia, B. (2008). Architect of global jihad: The life of al-Qaida strategist Abu Mus'ab al-Suri. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Peters, R. (2005). Jihad in classical and modern Islam. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

JOHN PAUL II (1920–2005)

John Paul II was the 262nd pope of the Roman Catholic Church (1978–2005). He was the first Polish pope and the first non-Italian to be elected Bishop of Rome in 455 years (since the Dutch pope Hadrian VI, 1522–1523). At age 58, he was the youngest man to be elected to the office and had the second longest pontificate after Pius IX in 1846. He was born Karol Wojtyła on May 18, 1920, in the small working-class town of Wadowice. As a student, he was both a poet and an actor, a talent he used to his advantage in his time as a media figure on the world stage. A devout young Catholic, he worked as a laborer during World War II. By 1942, Wojtyła began concentrating on priestly studies in a clandestine seminary, forced underground during the Nazi occupation of Poland. He had hoped to become a solitary monastic but was ordained a diocesan priest in 1946 in a country marked by years of war and then domination as a satellite of Soviet communism. After study in Rome, he returned to Poland for pastoral duties and seminary teaching. Fiercely opposed to totalitarianism, he diplomatically worked with the communists in Poland, determined to eradicate their power. He worked up the hierarchical ranks and became Archbishop of Krakow in January 1964. He particularly used his influence as pope to support workers' democratic rights as well as civil and religious liberties in his native Poland. Given his public support for Eastern European pleas for freedom from Soviet domination, he was an essential catalyst in the chain of events leading to the collapse of the Soviet Empire.

Elected pope after the short reign of John Paul I, he took the name John Paul II, ostensibly to indicate his interest in maintaining the spirit of reform begun by his predecessors, John XXIII and Paul VI, who called and carried out the Second Vatican Council. Although committed to the spirit of Vatican II, much of his papacy contained or halted the ideas and practices of progressive Catholics who worked for the renewal of the Church that the Council inspired. For this reason, while seen as a spiritual leader and social reformer who advocated the rights of people to live without fear, to work freely, and to practice their religion without opposition, John Paul II's papal legacy is conservative and restorationist. He was a man of contradictions: publicly warm and charismatic but in matters of faith, doctrine, and obedience to central authority, rigid and unyielding. For example, he ordered that various contemporary theological matters, such as the ordination of women to the priesthood or permission for male priests to marry, not be considered or even discussed by Roman Catholics. The worldwide scandal of child sexual abuse by priests, abetted by a hierarchy of enabler bishops, came to light publicly during his administration. John Paul II's response to the scandal has been criticized by some Catholics as ineffectual.

John Paul II became the most traveled pope in history. He visited 129 foreign countries as an international figure supporting human rights, political freedom, and the sanctity of life from conception through debilitating illness to death, a point he exemplified in his own painful and public struggles with Parkinson's disease. He also survived assassination attempts in 1981 and 1982.

This pontiff made important strides for dialogue with other world religious traditions, becoming the first pope to visit a synagogue (Rome, 1986) and a mosque (Damascus, 2001). His lengthy papacy made him a powerful and influential figure for several generations of Catholics. His successor, Benedict XVI, quickly moved John Paul II into consideration for Roman Catholic sainthood.

Leonard Norman Primiano

See also Benedict XVI; Christianity; Encyclicals; Liberation Theology; Poland; Politics and Religion; Religious Dialogue; Roman Catholicism; Vatican City State and the Holy See; Vatican Council, Second

Further Readings

- O'Collins, G., & Hayes, M. (Eds.). (2008). The legacy of John Paul II. New York: Continuum.
- Weigel, G. (2005). Witness to hope: The biography of Pope John Paul II. New York: Harper Perennial.
- Weigel, G. (2010). The end and the beginning: Pope John Paul II—the struggle for freedom, the last years, the legacy. New York: Doubleday Religion.

JORDAN

In Jordan, a landlocked Middle Eastern kingdom bordered by Israel/Palestine, Syria, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia, Sunnī Islam is the official religion of the monarch and the state; however, legal existence is granted to a dozen Christian denominations. Officially, 96% of the population is Sunnī Muslim, while Christians amount to 4%. Religious affiliation is a compulsory element of the civil status of all Jordanian citizens, but freedom of belief and religious practice are guaranteed by law. Jordan constitutes an interesting example where, under an Islamic order of religious coexistence and pluralism, the state has carved a communal space for the expression of several faiths and the performance of their respective religious duties, while a relatively neutral space is maintained for political participation. Islam is regulated by state institutions that exert control over the building and management of mosques and the appointment of imams (preachers) through a specialized ministry—the Ministry of Awqaf or public religious endowments). Recognized Christian denominations have full rights to build churches and maintain educational, social, and charitable institutions. They are autonomous with respect to internal matters and the personal status and family affairs of their members.

Political participation is guaranteed to all citizens on equal terms, and representation of Christians is ensured through quotas for parliamentary elections.

From the 1950s to the 1970s, the Hashemite monarchy supported the social and religious activities of the Muslim Brotherhood to contain the development of opposition political ideologies with a secular or atheistic orientation. On the other hand, Jerusalem's Muslim and Christian sites, under Hashemite rule between 1948 and 1967, were a major aspect of Jordan's official national identity and religious pluralism. After these sites fell under Israeli occupation following the 1967 war, Jordan maintained an official role vis-à-vis Muslim sites, a role contested by the Palestinian National Authority. As of the 1980s, and following internal and regional dynamics, the public sphere and space in Jordan experienced Islamization through an increase in the proportion of mosques, the development of media and educational programs with a religious content, enforcement of the fast of Ramadan in public places, and the activities of Islamic charitable societies and political parties. However, the political inclusion of the mainstream Islamist party, the Islamic Action Front, and its ability to articulate agendas on religious terms have produced ideological moderation rather than the radicalization witnessed in other national contexts. To balance the public tokens of Islamization, the regime has developed its own conception of moderate Islam that it promotes inside and outside the Islamic world. The monarchy is actively engaged in interfaith dialogue with Christians and Jews worldwide and defends religious pluralism at home under the guardianship of its version of modernized Islam.

Géraldine Chatelard

See also Islamism (Political Islam); Israel; Middle East; Muslim Brotherhood; Palestine; Politics and Religion; Religion and State; Sunnī Islam

Further Readings

- Messara, A. (1993). La régulation étatique de la religion dans le monde arabe: le cas de la Jordanie [The official regulation of the religious field: The case of Jordan]. Social Compass, 4, 581–588.
- Schwedler, J. (2006). Faith in moderation: Islamic parties in Jordan and Yemen. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

JUDAISM

Judaism has become a global religion, though some might say that it is the only religion of the three Abrahamic faiths to become global unwillingly and against its nature. While Christianity and Islam expanded their boundaries from their humble beginnings to mighty empires and from a restricted locale to worldwide expansion, Judaism was forcefully expelled from its place of origin, dispersed to all four corners of the world by the Roman conquerors of Judea, and reluctantly turned into a wide-reaching universal religion. Judaism was cultivated and maintained wherever Jewish exiles settled and made their home. Their religion went with them wherever they wandered in their global quest for autonomy and tranquility to practice their own community life. Unlike the proselytizing and missionary character of Christianity and Islam, Judaism characteristically is an exclusive faith that does not seek converts and does not aspire for endless expansion. Its rules of admitting new believers (the process of giyur) are deliberately strict and unattractive to repel prospective disciples from joining. If permitted, conversion must be for its own sake or due to a genuine change of beliefs and not out of convenience.

The Diaspora

The enforced dispersion of the Jews after the botched insurrection against the Romans and the burning of Jerusalem and the Holy Temple in 70 CE, entailed many enormous changes for the expelled survivors. One major ramification was the imposed transformation of the character of the Jewish community in exile with regard to members' affiliation and the basis of attachment to the collective. Due to the termination of Jewish independence or self-rule, Jews were compelled to follow the directives of the local authorities within each location they settled. Instead of natural and, later, voluntary communities in which Jews cultivated their religious and cultural unique identity from birth and then continued and perpetuated their association by free choice, in the Diaspora, the belonging to the community became enforced and compulsory. The rulers of ancient Mesopotamia, Catholic Spain, or Medieval Ukraine, as examples of large concentrations of exiled Jewry, had a similar political preference: to designate and isolate "their" Jews in separate and segregated social enclaves amenable to rigorous control and manipulation. This situation meant that the Jew as an individual citizen did not exist and his or her sole reality was expressed as a component of the community. The personal identity was submerged and taken over by the collective identity. Furthermore, since out of expediency, the hosting authorities usually empowered the Jewish governance to levy taxes on their people, these local community elites accumulated a tremendous amount of power and command over their constituencies, rendering the Jewish community all-inclusive and self-sustaining in every possible walk of life. Hence, while the globalization of Christianity and Islam meant dispatching individual believers to personally expand the horizons of their religion and encounter new worlds and faiths to be subdued, the globalization of Judaism was a humbling experience with introverted and reclusive consequences that made the Jewish communities ever more pestilent and alien in the eyes of their host nations.

However, these dismal conditions of loss of political sovereignty and jurisdiction and total economic dependency created the necessity to adjust and generated new types of Jewish community life, institutions, and leadership. Adaptation yielded innovative approaches and an emphasis on community building and self-sustenance. Due to the absence of a unified political center and a single hierarchical system, decentralization of authority and multiplicity of autonomous communities became the central feature of Jewish reorganization and readjustment to the postexilic world. First, still in Palestine and its immediate vicinity, Syria, Egypt, Babylon, and Mesopotamia, next in expanding concentric circles to the Near East and the Mediterranean, and then with the Islamic expansion between the 7th and 12th centuries to North Africa and Spain, these structures and principles of Jewish existence prevailed. After the expulsion from Spain in 1492, the contours of the Jewish Diaspora were extended even further to central and eastern Europe. Yet through these tribulations, and perhaps because of them, Jewish communities managed to preserve and cultivate their updated exilic existence, which was composed of four unique and newfound main tenets: (1) communal organizations and communal bases of power, (2) spiritual and educational leadership, (3) an emphasis on oral law, and (4) Messianic dreams of redemption. The communal structure was an inevitability spawned by the historical developments that pulverized the Jewish commonwealth into small and underprivileged entities reliant on the mercy of local authorities. Under such circumstances, Jewish collective existence became reticent, introverted, and inwardly oriented. Assimilation with the host population was unfeasible, impractical, and undesired, while assuming sovereignty and political independence was also a far-fetched and deceptive dream. Hence, the only plausible option left to maintain their unity and unique identity was for Jews to invest their energy and skills in regrouping and upholding their distinct way of life from within. Since political and economic existence was totally dependent on external powers, building an internal infrastructure of subsistence and retaining their inimitable character really meant concentrating on education and spiritual conservation. Communal leadership committees such as the Council of the Four Lands (Vaad Arba Aratzot) in Poland, Lithuania, and other eastern European territories of the 16th and 17th centuries were typical examples of such local leadership arrangements. The leaders of such bodies managed and supervised the administrative affairs of their respective communities in addition to being the liaisons between their societies and the state authorities. This crucial responsibility of mediating between the official government of the land and the Jewish constituency was mainly expressed in the assessment and collection of taxes for the central establishment.

Leadership in Diaspora Communities

Alongside the clerical and administrative leadership, another category of leaders gained legitimacy and respectability among the Diaspora communities: the spiritual leadership of rabbis, sages, and mystics. The spiritual and clerical elites found themselves frequently at odds with one another as they were vying for ascendancy and influence among their Kahal (Hebrew for “audience” or “potential followers”). The spiritual leadership was in charge of religious, judicial, and educational issues. In the crystallization of the exilic Jewish identity devoid of political, economic, military, industrial, or commercial viability, the spiritual type of leadership quickly gained prominence, and managing religious practices including the application of religious law and education became the centerpiece of being Jewish in exile. In the times of Jewish independence in Eretz Israel (the Land of Israel), prior to the enforced dispersion and globalization of Judaism, three foci of power coexisted in delicate balance: kings, priests, and rabbis. In the Diaspora, without a kingdom to lead or protect and without a holy temple to administer and maintain, the first two elites were unnecessary, while the third achieved an unprecedented status of reverence and prestige. Unlike the managerial and secretarial elites, the rabbis and sages were admired, and they inspired loyalty and devotion in their adherents. They were also the main stimulation and driving force behind the preeminence and popularity of the oral law of Judaism, the Halakha, as opposed to the written law or the scriptures. According to the rabbinic tradition, when in Israel, the Torah (Bible) was transmitted from generation to generation by word of mouth and memorizing techniques. The Holy Scripture, the original written law bequeathed by Moses to the people of Israel, was too sacred to be added on or amended. Thus, the only way to ensure continuity and heritage was to verbally pass the ideas and values of the Torah to the new generation of believers. This tradition was feasible as long as the Jews lived together, free and independent, in their own land. When that reality was shattered and the remnants of the Jewish nation were scattered all over the globe, an urgent and genuine need to document and record the oral law had emerged. Rabbis and sages promptly began the daunting task of writing the spoken tradition, a task that was finally completed according to tradition by Rabbi Yehuda haNasi, the head of the Sanhedrin, the Jewish parliament. His work was called Mishnah (“repetition”), and it contained a redaction of all oral traditions. Through the years, it was coalesced together with three centuries’ compilation of commentaries and interpretations on the Mishnah, termed Gemara (“culmination”). Together, the Mishnah and Gemara created the Talmud (“learning”), the ultimate anthology of Jewish oral law.

Written and Oral Law

In the postexilic situation, when Jewish communities were under constant pressure of despotic and oppressive regimes and ever-present hostile public moods, occasional outbursts of violence, and impending threats of deportation and banishment, faithfulness to the written law or the original unchanged version of the Torah limited and inhibited the attempts to survive under such conditions of uncertainty and imminent calamity. For these precarious and volatile circumstances, flexibility, adaptability, and creativity were of an essence to carry on and endure the overbearing angst of insecurity. By emphasizing and encouraging the oral law (or in the original Hebrew Torah, She-beal pe), the religious leaders were accommodating the concerns and fears of their followers that rigid and unyielding interpretation of the Bible would cripple their ability to tolerate and cope with the woes of exile. Being attentive to their audiences' distress, the rabbis in many dispersed Jewish communities without coordination or collaboration promoted the use of the memorized tradition, the repeated storytelling, and a broader, pluralistic, and forbearing perception of the scripture. This resilience and accommodativeness helped in attenuating and smoothing the transition from the previous state of affairs, whereby sovereignty, independence, and self-determination guaranteed familiar and secured compliance with an invariable written law, to the current situation in which Jews lived under tentative and unstable conditions, where maneuvering and improvisation became prerequisites for survival and inventiveness the key for perseverance. Oral law, with its emphasis on interpretation and analysis, granted that essential space or leeway for such creativeness to get by. Consequently, it can be said that the gradual and excruciating transformation of Judaism into its globalized form bore some constructive consequences as well by rendering it relatively more tolerant and open-minded, at least in the initial difficult period of adjustment to an itinerant and disjointed existence.

Messianism

A fourth new distinguishing feature to emerge since Judaism turned unwillingly global was the messianic dimension, a strong expectation of metaphysical or miraculous salvation. As long as they lived in their own land and under their own king, free to practice their religion and secure in their independence, Jews felt no need to seek redemption or to anticipate a liberating messiah. The eschatological element in their life was tenable and accessible: The holy temple existed; the Davidic line of kings was right there, functioning and thriving; and the end-of-days was waiting unabated and assured in the ultimate future. It wasn't a fantasy or a hallucination but a natural and forthcoming evolution provided that the believers remain pious and observing of their religious commitments. The brutal abolition of the Jewish kingdom, the destruction of the temple, and the heartbreaking, seemingly unbounded, and infinite exile wreaked havoc on the protected and solid continuity of existence of the Jews. To survive their new insufferable fortune and to get by with their unbearable affliction, a growing number of believers in various communities at different and remote locations began to develop a profound and overwhelmingly consuming inclination toward the mystical, supernatural, and numinous. The distance from the land of Israel and the remoteness from their promised inheritance produced a split between the immediate, realistic level of being and the imagined, out-of-this-world level of being. While in the former, many Jews carried on experiencing their predicament in the Diaspora in a passive, docile, and acquiescent fashion, in the latter, they became active, enthusiastic, and vigorously involved. Eschatological redemption became, for many Jews, destitute and desperate to make sense of their catastrophe, an escape hatch or a magical getaway for an all-embracing alternative reality. This vacillation between daily concrete anxieties and the eschatological option of breaking away became commonplace among Jewish expatriates wherever they dwelled. Since the messianic trend was proven to be an effective and powerful therapeutic approach and a consequential salutary procedure, many took after the new penchant, consolidating and invigorating the messianic facet of postexilic Judaism to a considerable size. The hopes and expectations of messianic redemption caught like fire among Jewish refugees all over the world and awarded them with at least some consolation and support.

The idea of guaranteed redemption, regardless of how long it should take, presented the Diaspora as an impermanent phase, a transient calamity that eventually will be overcome. Unlike a score of other minorities forcefully dispersed by conquerors of the ancient world, Jews never accepted their new locations of domicile as normative. Consistently and adamantly, exile is portrayed as negative, harmful, and debilitating. In many prayers and religious verses, the stay in the Diaspora is described as an extended punishment for moral sins and unfaithfulness. The eschatological orientation reaffirmed the spiritual nexus Jews kept with their legacy and homeland. Distinct from other vanquished nations, which have accepted their defeat and deportation and for the most part availed themselves of a new beginning either by convergence or by assimilation with their immediate surroundings, the Jewish communities remained defiant and apart from the hosting milieu, hoping that the warranted deliverance would justify their voluntary insulation and reward them for their long-term sacrifice. Messianism, the belief in a messiah from the House of David who would salvage his people and lead them back home, was accompanied by another escapist concept that prospered in the initial harsh days of the Diaspora, the idea of martyrdom or dying for the sanctification of God's name (Kiddush Hashem). This ritual of self-immolation in times of persecutions and pogroms or forced conversion and imposed apostasy demonstrated the absolute commitment of Jews to their faith. Favoring death to the renunciation of their faith was an inspirational choice that glorified those who took it and made them hallowed role models to the following generations. It also underlined Jewish solidarity and feelings of shared destiny, which further stimulated their closing of ranks and insulated commonality in the face of external challenges and threats.

Both orientations, the unearthly salvation and the deliberate and willing sacrifice for the preservation of one's faith, underlined the attitude to the Diaspora as temporary and provisional. It stressed the belief that the entire exilic experience is a test of will for the chosen people to endure and to purify themselves in order to be ready and qualified for regeneration in their primordial land. This widespread frame of mind among Jews in their scattered Diaspora communities made them apolitical and ahistorical: They did not participate in politics and refrained from shaping or contributing to the world around them. They lived in quiet desperation, observing their religious precepts in their secluded and familiar surroundings, with only the shimmering anticipation of a messiah to help them carry on through their daily hardships and ephemeral existence. These trans-historical tendencies fraught with millenary and utopian undertones further alienated Jews from their host societies, and it was a major concern for sages and community leaders that such a detachment from the here-and-now might be disadvantageous to the endeavor of community building and the protracted and Sisyphean process of revitalizing the Jewish way of life in their diverse places of sojourn. In short, an immanent conflict was fermenting between responsible and realistic leaders, civil and religious, who feared false expectations and antinomian outbursts against the constraining Halakha laws, and escapist visionaries or self-proclaimed redeemers, who insisted on intermittently rekindling a surge of hope for messianic redemption. Such surges of aspirations typically erupted in the wake of persecutions, turmoil, and distress. Some of them, namely, the Molkhonian and Sabbatean movements, were immensely popular and intensely challenging to the rabbinical institutional hierarchy.

Diversity and Heterodoxy

Beyond these intermittent flares of power confrontations, various lifestyles, priorities, and interpretations of the Jewish experience in exile coexisted in relative tranquility. The heterogeneity within Jewish communities in the Diaspora was another consequence of a globalized religion that had lost its territorial and jurisdictional concentration. Under a central commanding hierarchy, which operates within a coherent, single political setting, goals, regulations, and main concerns are clearly defined and effectively implemented. The volatile and capricious circumstances in exile did not approximate the provisions of organized control and effective administration attained in sovereignty and independence. Consequently, the mainstream rabbinic tradition had to ultimately tolerate factions and movements it knew little about and hence found difficult to cope with at first. Mystical, escapist, and ascetic propensities shared the Jewish communities' public space and members' commitment with the leading predisposition of unrelenting and devoted religious and legal study. Rabbis and legal scholars vied with mystics, shamans, and seers for the attention and approbation of the crowds. This benevolent disparateness was born out of the necessity to maintain Jewish subsistence and survival under any situation. For that sacred cause and with the passage of time, any eccentric or unconventional denomination within the Jewish postexilic world became endurable due to the vital duty of keeping the community integrated and protected. Leaders of Jewish communities in their disparate locations equally endeavored not to supply their host governments with incentives to intervene in their internal affairs. Interior divisions and intrafactional strife would have been an excellent occasion for the authorities to intercede and devastate the community's spirit of solidarity and unity. Accordingly, the impending peril of an injurious intrusion to their carefully preserved universe steadily transformed the Jewish communal and political ethos in their disseminated global existence into a more pluralistic and considerate form than it ever was when they were concentrated in their ancient homeland.

Until the modern era, this heterodoxy within the rabbinic preeminence did not overwhelmingly shake the fundamentals of the internal traditional order. There were challenges and controversies that kept the guardians of the faith vigilant and concerned, but there was no irrevocable impairment of the close-knit community. Even the harshest times, both externally and internally, that Jewish communities in exile went through did not manage to destroy their long-established spiritual legacy or to rupture their strong bond to their cultural and religious heritage. But modernity, especially from the 16th century onward, rocked the foundations of Jewish communities and threatened for the first time to sever significant portions of Jews from their long-standing identity and venerable inheritance. The new era ushered in copious incentives and stimuli from the outside world that could not be bluntly and manifestly staved off as in previous generations. It became more arduous to preserve distinctiveness and unity in the face of such abundant challenges. Every traditional society was put to the test by emerging ideas and concepts of association and commitment, let alone secluded and ahistorical social groupings such as Jewish Diasporas, in which leaders attempted to shield their adherents from any possible vicissitude and safeguard them from the outside world until the arrival of the messiah. The most daring challenge to the viability and survivability of Judaism since the beginning of its transnational state arrived with the wake of the Sabbatean movement in the 17th century. A self-proclaimed redeemer called Sabbatai Zevi, a rabbi and a Kabbalist from the city of Smyrna in Anatolia, announced that he was the long-awaited Jewish messiah. The Jewish masses from the Balkan region and then the Mediterranean, who were craving redemption, were inundated by millenarian dreams prevalent around the significant year of 1666. They heeded his call as part of the global anticipation of religious awakening and founded the Sabbatean movement to promulgate Sabbatai's messages and to publicize his arrival. This heartrending experience tore apart the Jewish exilic world with unprecedented intensities and passions. It also set a model for later movements and groups to openly defy customary rules of the Jewish way of life and to claim alternatives. More and more factions got accustomed to disobeying or contravening the habitual Jewish religious and cultural routine and lifestyle, and the global facet of Jewish existence grew more cumbersome and more intricate to keep together.

Yet what kept the Jewish tradition and indeed Judaism as a distinct and unique religion or culture despite all the dire ordeals and adversities along history was the continuous viability and adaptable ingenuity of the Jewish oral law, the Halakha. Across borders and eras, the capacity of the halakhic norms, values, and regulations to maintain common bounds and supply a framework for all Jews regardless of their location and disconnected mundane realities, was absolutely stupendous. The Halakha became the backbone that sustained the Jewish people in their separate places of exile as one coherent entity with a shared worldwide identity and its rabbis, the implementers and protectors of this spiritual and symbolic unity. The nature of the Halakha as an evolving and accumulative text, which was constantly and relentlessly enriched and cultivated by ongoing events, developments, and crises, played a decisive role in the resilience and pliability of Judaism away from its homeland. The spiritual leaders endeavored to weave their religious creeds and practices into the fabric of daily life so that Jews would be able to live and savor in their culture. Only through tolerance and compassion for other views could the Jewish Law accommodate such strange and frequently antagonistic bedfellows as the legalistic tradition and the learning tradition, the ritualistic mystics and the erudite philosophers, the scholars and the prayers, and Ashkenazi and Sephardic Jews. Paradoxically, the abnormal and shattering exilic experience had consolidated the Jewish faith and enhanced its durability. Against all odds and in the face of perennial feebleness, the Jews struggled to remain a part of the family of man, participating in and contributing to the cultural progress of human civilization around them. Despite the willful seclusion of their communities, they nevertheless continued to be cognizant of their environment and keep abreast with contemporary development. Although, in most cases, Jews were politically and economically inactive and disobliging, they resisted their pariah status by playing a part, at times a major part, in the world's cultural and intellectual discourse, enriching and edifying their immediate vicinities as well as more remote regions in numerous ways. From this all-encompassing perspective, the 2,000 years of exile were certainly not a waste.

Jewish Contributions to Culture

The Jewish influence among the nations owing to their historical dispersion has been recognized and appreciated in many fields. This influence was promulgated in implicit and explicit ways, through direct interactions between Jews and Gentiles and by osmotic or diffuse circulation of ideas and values. Some Jewish contributions to Western culture were never properly credited, while others were endorsed and emulated as such. Some influence was disseminated through literature, other through people. Had Judaism been eradicated with the Roman destruction of Jerusalem, Jewish literature would have left a mark on global culture, but since the Jews survived, in addition to the power of Hebrew scriptures, the actual existence of Jewish communities among their Muslim and Christian hosts facilitated and expedited the spread of knowledge and the dissemination of values and ideas in a direct, unabated fashion. Overall, the impact of Jewish presence on the host nations and cultures East and West cannot be denied or exaggerated: At some point around the ninth century, Jews had become known as the intellectual intermediaries of the world or, as the famous French historian Ernest Renan called them, "the traveling salesmen of philosophy." This honorable title was conferred not only symbolically, as bridging the ancient and the modern, but literally as well since many translators of classic texts from their original Arabic to Latin and other European languages were Jews. Another way Jews gained their special position as intermediaries between cultures or spheres of influence in medieval times was as merchants and traders in the trans-Eurasian path from East to West. Carrying with them not only artifacts and material goods but also customs, beliefs, norms, ideas, habits, fables, folk stories, and poetry, Jews constantly nurtured and enticed the communities that absorbed them. Such a fortuitous status rendered itself possible to Jews because they were allowed to move about and travel back and forth in both the Islamic and the Christian spheres of influence. Due to their condition as deportees, itinerants, and perpetual travelers, the Arab rulers who aspired to disseminate westward their heritage and what they deemed as their superior culture, including Greek classicism, preserved and translated into Arabic, saw the wandering Jews as the ultimate transporters for that mission. Jews were also instrumental in the expansion of Arab domination westward via North Africa and into Spain as they were the assistants and advisors to the great Islamic spiritual leaders such as Ibn Bajjah and Ibn Rushd, who were aided by their Jewish wasirs Ibn Chaprout and Ibn Nagdela, respectively. However, the most salient impact on Christian thought in medieval Europe was imprinted by the poet Ibn Gabirol, or Avicbron in Christian references, and the philosopher Moses ben Maimon, or Maimonides. They both had a widespread and profound effect on philosophical thought in general and on the chief Christian scholastics of the 13th century, including Thomas Aquinas, who mentions both Maimonides and Avicbron several times in his writings, especially in his popular Commentary on the Sentences. Similar influences, perhaps in lesser degrees of scope and volume, were felt in the fields of medicine, astronomy, mathematics, theology, and poetry by erudite scholars and translators such as Tibbonides, Kalonymus, Immanuel of Rome, and Jacob Anatoli, who have all enjoyed the privilege of being able to purvey knowledge and wisdom from one world to another or from one epoch to a new one. It is intriguing to wonder about whether Maimonides and the other Jewish thinkers and scholars in the Diaspora would have achieved such a worldwide influence and recognition had they been confined geographically and geopolitically to the boundaries of old Eretz Israel or Judea and had Jews never been deported from their homeland.

There is one domain that stands apart from all others with regard to Jewish influence on their host, especially European, countries. Though politically and socially Jews were generally totally dispossessed of rights, treated as outcasts, and loathed, they still fulfilled an indispensable role in all the sociopolitical systems around them: They were the seismographs or the indicators of political tolerance in general and the attitude toward minorities and dissenters in particular. It is historically well documented that surges in violent riots against Jews were instigated and sometimes organized and sponsored by authorities in times of internal disarray and political turmoil. The age-old mechanism of distraction or scapegoating, whereby attention and dissatisfaction from policies or policymakers is diverted elsewhere, preferably toward foreigners, came into full force during times of persecutions and pogroms. In times of political leniency and social forbearance, the political atmosphere in relation to minorities, and Jews specifically, became bearable. However, once circumstances changed and intolerance returned, it was accompanied by bigotry, prejudice, and fanaticism. Jews, who were notoriously nonconformist with a built-in aversion to authority and a long history of rebellious mavericks, were chosen as instant and convenient culprits of political disobedience and dissidence, which together with social eccentricity and an oddball culture and religion rendered them the eternal victims. This inclination became even more conspicuous when reform movements rose against the obduracy and conservatism of mainstream Christianity. At times of broad political reforms, such as those launched in southern France by the Languedoc rulers, the host societies had a positive, even cordial, outlook toward Jews, and some of them even took on themselves to promote the political and economic situation of their Jewish communities. But once they secured power or their reforms were endorsed and implemented, their attitude would change again to being hostile and antagonistic. Consequently, Jews found themselves oscillating tumultuously between political acceptance and discrimination, between being cajoled and being harassed. As such, the Jewish existence as an estranged political constituency within a Gentile sociopolitical establishment became an acid test for the open-mindedness and patience of the regime.

In light of these ongoing reciprocal influences and mutual interaction between the Jewish communities in exile and their immediate surroundings, the achievement of Jewish survival and perseverance through persecutions, pogroms, expulsions, and conversions through the ages is even more remarkable than if Jews had successfully maintained total segregation and avoided any contact with the outside world. Protecting their particular nature and group cohesion while allowing selective communication with external stimuli was a prudent and delicate balancing act masterminded by sensible and farsighted leadership. The achievement was even greater as it wasn't just a question of survival but of winning respect, admiration, and even converts from other religions. Through the dissemination of knowledge and wisdom, Jewish sages and erudite scholars reached out to and touched people's lives in the non-Jewish world, a corollary that would probably have been far-fetched had history taken another course and Judaism not transformed to a globalized religion. The most obvious indication of these outstanding developments was the harsh reaction by leaders of the Christian church. Alarmed and anxious that Jewish heresy would take root and lure true believers away, they resorted to papal bulls and religious decrees of church councils to initiate and promote pretexts for hounding and harrying Jews wherever they resided.

The advent of modernity—which some analysts place in the year 1700, others in the latter half of that century, or, more accurately, the years of the American and French revolutions, and yet others in the middle of the 18th century, the Age of Enlightenment—was the threshold with regard to Jewish existence in exile. The global aspect of Judaism was about to transform again from inferior and shadowy to autonomous and proud. The two revolutions ushered in fresh and novel ideas such as liberalism, democracy, and human and civil rights. These along with the quest for emancipation—the political empowerment of the disenfranchised—have liberated Jews from discriminatory and subjugated laws and allowed them to become equal citizens. Consequently, at least in the countries that experienced the democratic turn and the ascendancy of citizenship, alien lands became new homelands for many Jews, and the meaning of exile was altered forever from enforced to one of choice.

Samuel Peleg

See also Ashkanaz; Bible; Diaspora; Halakha and Shari'a; Israel; Jewish Diaspora

Further Readings

- Berger, A. (1994). Judaism in the modern world. New York: New York University Press.
- Eisensdadt, S. N. (1992). Jewish civilization: The Jewish historical experience in a comparative perspective. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Gordis, R. (1955). Judaism for the modern age. New York: Farrar, Straus, & Cudahy.
- Lehrman, C. (1976). Jewish influences on European thought. Teaneck, NJ: Farleigh Dickinson University Press.
- Newman, L. (1966). Jewish influence on Christian movements. New York: AMS Press.
- Vital, D. (1999). A people apart: A political history of the Jews in Europe 1789–1939. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Weiss, M. (2004). A brief history of the Jewish people. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.

JUNG, CARL GUSTAV (1875–1961)

Carl Gustav Jung, a Swiss psychiatrist and psychologist, founded his own school of analytical psychology. Unlike many of his contemporaries, most famously Sigmund Freud, Jung was sympathetic to the healing, integrative power of religion.

Born in Kesswil, Switzerland, in 1875, Carl Gustav Jung was the son of a disenchanted pastor in the Swiss Reformed tradition. His mother struggled with depression and what she described as visitations from spirits. Rather than follow his father into a life of ministry, Jung earned a medical degree from the University of Basel in 1902. After graduation, he worked under Eugen Bleuler at the Burgholzi psychiatric clinic of the University of Zurich. There, through his successful application of association tests, Jung began to formulate his earliest insights into what would become his distinctive analytical psychology. He later studied at Paris with the pioneering French psychologist Pierre Janet. In 1907, Jung met Sigmund Freud, with whom he subsequently enjoyed a mutually enriching intellectual friendship. Famously, they traveled together in 1909 to Clark University in Worcester, Massachusetts, to deliver lectures on their groundbreaking work in psychology. With Freud's endorsement, Jung was the first president of the International Psychoanalytic Society, which he held from its founding in 1911 until 1914.

Around 1914, Jung began to differentiate his thought from Freud's, a development that led to a rupture in their friendship and professional collaboration. Two significant points that Jung disagreed with were, first, what he viewed as Freud's limited view of the unconscious as a storehouse for repressed elements from the individual's personal history and, second, Freud's emphasis on the libido understood exclusively as sexual in nature.

During the period after his break with Freud, Jung underwent a period of discernment that, in spite of its emotional and psychological duress, proved to be exceptionally fruitful. Jung developed a theory of the personality and the unconscious by building on his studies in psychiatry and psychology as well as his wide-ranging, interdisciplinary study of philosophy, mythology, archaeology, and world religions.

Jung's theory of the unconscious is most pertinent to the study of religion. He differentiated between the personal unconscious, which consists of memories, thoughts, and feelings derived from personal experience, and the collective unconscious, which consists of inherited material that dates back to the earliest recesses of history and that is shared by all people. The collective unconscious is communicated through archetypes, which are represented to the consciousness through symbols or images that appear in dreams, myths, and religious systems. Examples of archetypes include, but are not limited to, the earth mother, the hero, and the old wise man. Jung's insight into this phenomenon dates back to his work at the Burgholzi and his later dream analysis work, wherein patients would associate with symbols and themes that correlate to symbols and mythological themes from different historical periods and cultures that would otherwise be outside the patients' awareness and experience.

According to Jung, religion could not be proven to be either true or false. He affirmed its usefulness as an authentic avenue to personal integration of the psyche, which he described as individuation and which he believed to be the sine qua non condition for achieving world peace.

Nicholas Rademacher

See also Campbell, Joseph; Freud, Sigmund; Mysticism

Further Readings

- Jung, C. G. (1938). Psychology and religion: Based on the Terry Lectures delivered at Yale University. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Jung, C. G. (1963). Memories, dreams, reflections. New York: Pantheon Books.

JUREMA OF THE BRAZILIAN NORTH

Jurema relates to certain indigenous spiritual practices of Afro-Brazilian people. In Brazil, the word jurema has the following meanings:

1. Bushes thought sacred by indigenous populations and caboclas (mestiças, people of mixed European and indigenous Indian ancestry), mainly in the northeast: the Mimosa hostilis Benth [black jurema] and the Mimosa verrucosa Benth [white jurema])
2. A drink prepared with the bark and leaves of the plant, with hallucinogenic properties, ritually consumed
3. Religious and therapeutic manifestations (toré, catimbó) that integrate elements of indigenous culture, popular Catholicism, and Afro-Brazilian religions, where mediums enter into a trance, mainly with masters (old curers) and caboclos (Indians, representatives of the first habitants of Brazil)
4. Spiritual entities that live in jurema (the plant) or where it grows: "jurema people"
5. Feminine spiritual entity represented as Indian, popularized in umbanda, well known in many Afro-Brazilian religious manifestations: the Cabocla Jurema

The jurema plant is important in indigenous rituals for ancestors and in catimbó—the religious and therapeutic system found mainly in urban peripheries of the northeast alongside caboclo populations, of rural origin and low income. The drink prepared with jurema leaves and bark is found at rituals and celebrations of umbanda and Afro-Brazilian religions for non-African entities: boiadeiros (cattle workers) and caboclos.

In some caboclo and umbanda Candomblé worship centers, the boiadeiros, "negro ancestors" of northeastern populations, constitute the black-jurema category. The caboclos de pena ("Indian"), who usually presented in those worship centers as donos da terra, or "indigenous ancestors" of the Brazilian population, make up the white-jurema category. These black and white categories, also found in botany, attest to the importance of the jurema plant in that religious context.

In the north of Brazil, the caboclos de pena (of jurema) are more linked to pajelança than to catimbó and integrate a system of non-African spiritual entities where the boiadeiros are almost non-existent and the majority of the entities are classified as caboclo da mata (neither Indian nor boiadeiro). Pajelança is a syncretic religious and therapeutic system considered to be of indigenous origin and, like catimbó, is found mainly on the peripheries of cities and rural areas of the north and of Maranhão (Northeast Occidental), where since the middle of the 19th century it has been found in black populations.

The Cabocla Jurema is a cabocla de pena represented as a great hunter ("never having aimed and missed"), received and honored in Afro-Brazilian rituals and of indigenous origin. As well as having the name of the sacred bush, of the drink that enables communication with the ancestors, and of a category of caboclo entities, it is also the name of a religious and therapeutic system of indigenous northeastern origin; the Afro-Brazilian religions have a lot in common with pajelança of the north. It can be seen as a link in the chain connecting many different Brazilian religious manifestations.

Mundicarmo Ferretti

See also Africa; Brazil; Candomblé; New Religions in South America; Santería; Vodou

Further Reading

Da Mota, C. N. (1997). Jurema's children in the forest of spirits: Healing and ritual among two Brazilian indigenous groups. New York: Practical Action.

JUST WAR

Just war is an ethical theory that may be spoken of in two ways. The first designates a particular set of notions that may be described as the “political-military doctrine” of the Western world. From its inception in ancient Rome, the idea of bellum iustum (just war) may be traced through the teaching of the Christian churches, in the development of international law, in military manuals, and in the writings of contemporary publicists.

In a second sense, just war conveys a more widespread set of notions. A survey of world civilizations indicates that human beings have developed ways of distinguishing right from wrong in matters of war. Given the fact of international integration, it is important to compare the just war idea with political and military traditions across the globe.

Cicero

The writings of Cicero depict the Roman way of war as connected with notions of honor and religious practice. With respect to the former, this statesman considers it important to keep one's word, even to enemies; he relates paradigmatic stories of those who do so even when an enemy is cruel and keeping one's word may cost one's life.

There are also limits on military action against one's enemies. Once an adversary is defeated, there is no need for further destruction, though one may take measures to deter further attacks. There are wars of defense, in which the national interest is threatened. There are also wars fought to enhance national power and glory. With respect to the latter, behavior toward an enemy should be more lenient. And, in either case, wars must be initiated by the priestly caste. As Cicero has it, all the norms of bellum iustum are ancient and embedded in religious practice. For this reason, wars must begin with members of the fetiales (Roman priests) offering an enemy the choice: Accept the terms of peace or deal with the Roman might.

Cicero's account of just war occurs primarily in De Officiis, his treatise on the duties of Roman officials. It is worth noting that the first extended account of bellum iustum by a Christian author occurs in Ambrose of Milan's account of the duties of the clergy (also titled De Officiis and clearly modeled after Cicero's). As Bishop of Milan, Ambrose wielded considerable authority. One might even say that, in Ambrose's view, the Christian priesthood had succeeded the fetiales of ancient Rome. Thus, Ambrose thought it his duty to deny communion to Emperor Theodosius following the massacre of 7,000 men, women, and children in Thessalonica in 394, on the grounds that such behavior violated the standards of just war.

Augustine and Aquinas

Ambrose's treatise marks a critical stage in the development of the just war idea. It would fall to his disciple Augustine to provide a fuller account. Throughout his long career as Bishop of Hippo (in North Africa), Augustine counseled magistrates, wrote treatises, and preached to the faithful about the responsibilities of rulers and citizens in these matters. The outcome of Augustine's efforts was an account of history in which war represented both a result of and a remedy for sin. As with other human endeavors, Augustine set war in the context of the Christian story of creation, fall, preservation, and redemption. Human beings are made by God; they have potential for good and for evil. As such, war was not inevitable. But human beings turned from their creator, and thus, their existence is colored by sin. Envy, rage, and, above all, the will to power lend themselves to violence, and Augustine writes that these are the real evils present in war. There will come a time when God will eliminate such evils; indeed, the existence of the Christian church is a kind of promissory note, signifying the coming redemption of the world. In the meantime, however, sin remains powerful. Good people must use the means provided by God to resist and contain evil. One of these means is the idea of just war.

In this overarching account of the place of war in human history, Augustine says numerous things about the substance of just war. The most important of these would be summarized some centuries later, when Thomas Aquinas noted that a just war must meet three criteria. First, just wars are authorized by a competent public authority. War is not a matter of private vengeance or dueling. It is fought at the behest of those who exercise leadership for the common good. Second, just wars are fought for just causes. These include defense of territory, recovery of things wrongly taken, and punishment of wrongdoing. Third, just wars are fought with the right intention—a term that suggests avoidance of envy and the will to dominate, about which Augustine warned but which also connects with notions of just conduct in war. For example, soldiers fighting a just war must make efforts to distinguish between civilian and military targets. Wanton destruction cannot be a part of just war, nor can deceit or treachery, in the sense of violation of agreements with an enemy.

Early Modern Period

Thomas's three criteria set the context for the early modern discussions associated with the development of international law. For example, theologians like Francisco de Vitoria and Francisco Suarez debated the merits of Spanish exploits in the New World. Military action against the indigenous population of the Americas could not be justified by their lack of Christian faith; their theological position made it clear that a difference between the religious beliefs of the adversaries was not in itself a just cause of war. Spanish armies might have reason for action if the natives denied travelers right of passage or interfered with legitimate Spanish interests in exploration and trade.

Even then, however, military action should be governed by standards of just war conduct. In particular, civilians ought never to become direct targets, and all tactics and weapons should be evaluated to the rule that only the amount of force could be employed that was necessary to attain a legitimate military goal. On the Protestant side, the Dutch lawyer Hugo Grotius spoke about the military aspects of exploration and colonization in terms of a law of nations, meaning a set of practices endorsed by treaties, custom, and religion going back to ancient Rome. For Grotius, Christianity played an important role in the development of these practices, particularly by bringing considerations of charity into the treatment of enemies.

By the end of the 17th century, the just war idea took its characteristic modern shape, in which the justice of particular military actions may be judged with respect to two sets of criteria. In the first, ius ad bellum, the justice of resorting to war is at stake, and military action is or may be just if it is (a) authorized by legitimate public authorities, who commit troops to fighting for (b) just causes, including but not limited to national defense; in other words, military action to secure trade routes or access to valuable resources or to defend the rights of oppressed people might also constitute just causes. The next criterion is (c) having the right intention, which requires that those authorizing war show good faith with respect to (d) the overall proportionality between the costs and benefits of a particular military action—including costs and benefits to the enemy and to the international political system, (e) the likelihood that military action will succeed in attaining just goals, (f) estimating whether military action is “timely”—in the sense that diplomacy and other nonmilitary means of action will not work, and (g) determining whether military action will, in the end, serve to restore or enhance peace. Similarly, with respect to justice in the conduct of war (ius in bello), military action is or may be just when there is a good faith effort (a) to distinguish between combatants and noncombatants or military and civilian targets and (b) to avoid the use of tactics or weapons that involve levels of destruction that are disproportionate or excessive with respect to particular military objectives. Throughout the 18th, 19th, and early 20th centuries, these criteria provided a framework for discussions by religious and political leaders, military strategists, and lawyers in evaluating a variety of types of military action. In Europe, Antoine-Henri Jomini spoke about the justification and conduct of war in relation to balance-of-power considerations. In the United States, the lawyer Francis Lieber tried to relate international standards of justice in war to the Union Army's campaign against the Confederacy.

Twentieth Century

Disenchantment with the conduct and costs of World War I led to a reduction of interest in the just war idea, as the 1928 Kellogg-Briand pact attempted to outlaw war as a means of settling international disputes. By the late 1930s, the expansionist policies of Germany, Italy, and Japan fostered renewed interest in the old tradition; theologians like the Jesuit John C. Ford debated the morality of allied policies of aerial bombardment in the European and Pacific theaters, and following the allied victory in 1945, the United Nations Charter built notions of just war into the provisions for collective security outlined in Chapter 7. During the Cold War, debates over nuclear deterrence and the war in Vietnam drove discussions of just war. Since 1988 and the end of the Cold War, issues of humanitarian intervention and, more recently, the military action against terrorist groups received a great deal of attention. In these more recent debates, the various pronouncements of the U.S. National Conference of Catholic Bishops provide important examples of just war thinking, particularly if one reads them in connection with the criticisms offered by just war thinkers like Michael Walzer and James Turner Johnson.

Present and Future of Just War Theory

With respect to the broader sense of just war, one may turn to a variety of studies of Muslim, Jewish, and Buddhist analogs to the Christian-Western idea of just war. The Muslim ahkam al-jihad, or “judgments pertaining to armed struggle,” provides one example and is important in understanding contemporary Muslim evaluations of al Qaeda and other militant groups. The Jewish distinction between “obligatory” and “permitted” war (milhemet mitvah and milhemet rashut) is similarly important with respect to Israel's conflict with Palestinians and other Arab groups. Finally, a Buddhist version of the just war idea deserves mention in connection with the conflict between Sinhalese Buddhists and Tamil groups in Sri Lanka. In each case, one finds an articulation of and argument about criteria of justice in relation to particular military actions. While many more studies such as these are needed, it seems clear that the notion of just fighting, given certain conditions, is a global phenomenon and, thus, that the ancient Roman practices Cicero associated with bellum iustum have a broad resonance in quite diverse linguistic, cultural, and religious settings.

John Kelsay

See also Christianity; Cosmic War and Cosmic Conflict; Ethics; Politics and Religion; Religion and State

Further Readings

- Bartholomeusz, T. (2002). In defense of dharma. London: Routledge Curzon.
- Firestone, R. (2006). Holy war in modern Judaism? “Mitzvah War” and the problem of the “Three Vows.” Journal of the American Academy of Religion, 74(4), 954–982.
- Helgeland, J., Robert, J. D., & Burns, J. P. (1985). Christians and the military: The early experience. Philadelphia: Fortress Press.
- Johnson, J. T. (1999). Morality and contemporary warfare. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Kelsay, J. (2007). Arguing the just war in Islam. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Walzer, M. (2006). Just and unjust wars (4th ed.). New York: Basic Books.
- Wilkes, G. (2003). Judaism and justice in war. In P. Robinson (Ed.), Just war in comparative perspective (pp. 9–23). Hampshire, UK: Ashgate.

KABIR (CA. 1398–CA. 1448)

Kabir was the preeminent figure of the sant tradition of North India, a devotional school of poet-saints who stressed such features as the formless (nirguna) quality of God and a doctrine of deliverance that attached no significance to caste or external modes of worship. There is a great deal of legendary material about him, but little is known concerning the historical facts of his life. The occasional references that he makes in his works provide only glimpses of the actual details. He was born in Banaras and belonged to a family of weavers that had recently been converted to Islam. However, to be a Muslim in North India in the 15th century would mean to be still half Hindu, because low-caste Hindus who converted to the religion of the conquerors to improve their social status did not necessarily forsake their former gods and practices. In his own sayings, Kabir does not seem to identify himself as either a Hindu or a Muslim; instead, he refers to his Julaha (weaver) caste and the family craft of weaving, which he followed in his life. His social background as a low-caste weaver makes it likely that he was more or less illiterate. It is, however, possible that he may have learned meditative and devotional practices in the company of the saints in Banaras, a widely recognized center of Hindu religion, learning, and culture.

The earliest collection of Kabir's utterances is found in the Sikh scripture, the Adi Granth, going back to the third quarter of the 16th century. There are two other major collections of Kabir's works, the Kabir Granthavali and the Bijak, revered by the Dadu Panthi and Kabir Panthi traditions, respectively. The dates of origin of these two collections are uncertain, but both can be assumed to have taken shape in the 17th and 18th centuries, somewhat later than the Adi Granth. Although there are a number of verses common to the three collections, each one taken as a whole presents a different image of Kabir. Notably, Winand M. Callewaert has put together in The Millennium Kabir Vani (2000) all the works attributed to Kabir in the three collections based on various manuscripts.

Throughout his poetic utterances in different genres, Kabir drew from the many religious traditions around him—Sufi, Vaishnava, Nath, Tantric, Buddhist, and others. Interestingly, both Hindus and Muslims were ready to assault him physically during his lifetime because of his vigorous attack on the ritual and excesses of outward observance in both Hindu tradition and Islam. Since his death, however, they have been ready to assault each other over the privilege of claiming him as their own. The very fact that his sayings were included in the Adi Granth along with the utterances of the Sikh Gurus and other medieval poet-saints and that at least two panthic traditions trace their origin to Kabir points to a reputation of high spiritual attainment that he may have enjoyed already during his lifetime.

Pashaura Singh

See also Bhakti; Sufism

Further Readings

- Callewaert, W. M. (Ed.). (2000). The millenium Kabir Vani. New Delhi, India: Manohar.
- Hawley, J. S., & Juergensmeyer, M. (2004). Songs of the saints of India. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Hess, L., & Singh, S. (1979). The Bijak of Kabir. San Francisco: North Point Press.
- Lorenzen, D. N. (1991). Kabir legends and Anant-Das's Kabir parachai. New Delhi, India: Sri Satguru.
- Vaudeville, C. (1993). A weaver named Kabir. New Delhi, India: Oxford University Press.

KALI

The Hindu goddess Kali (in Sanskrit, “she who is black”), well known for her terrifying iconography and general association with death and destruction, is one of the most widely worshipped goddesses in all of India and also one of the most globally recognizable deities of Hinduism.

Kali is typically portrayed as a dark, half-naked, bloodthirsty goddess with a lolling tongue. She has long disheveled hair, multiple arms, a skirt of severed arms, and a necklace of severed heads.

Kali's early history indicates that she was likely a fierce tribal deity on the periphery of Sanskrit Hindu culture. Over time, however, Kali was appropriated by Hindu civilization and transformed, at least partially, to fit its moods and motivations, thus moving beyond her earlier marginal identity and attaining a Pan-Indian and even global importance.

Kali first appears prominently in Sanskrit literature in the roughly sixth-century CE work, the Devi-Mahatmya (Greatness of the Goddess). Though Kali is not the primary goddess of this text (Durga is), she does make several important appearances in it, the most prominent being her confrontation with the demon Raktabija. Raktabija has the uncanny ability of replicating himself whenever a drop of his blood falls to the ground. Durga succeeds in wounding him, but with every drop of blood he sheds, another demon appears, until a veritable army results. This so infuriates Durga that Kali springs forth as a concentrated manifestation of her rage. Kali then wins the day by devouring the demon army with her gaping mouth and sucking Raktabija's blood dry—thus rendering him lifeless and helping to save the cosmos.

Though Kali would go on to assume greater significance after her portrayal in the Devi-Mahatmya, her basic character is clearly articulated in this text. She is ferocious, terrifying, and hungry for blood—a violent agent of death. Such characteristics would figure prominently, for example, in her association with Tantrism, a tradition that often places great value on one's ability to confront and eventually overcome the forbidden or polluting aspects of existence. Due to her association with death and blood (two profoundly polluting realities according to normative Hindu culture), Kali came to be seen as the exemplar of the forbidden and polluting aspects of life. She, therefore, acted as a deity that the tantric practitioner could heroically confront and, through her, overcome the socially constructed forbidden aspects of life. Kali thus helped the tantric practitioner to transcend a duality that was artificially, socially imposed on reality and break through to an underlying primordial unity. It is in such contexts that one begins to see a softer side to Kali—as, here, where she is revealed as an ultimately gracious and benevolent granter of liberating insight.

This somewhat softer side achieves greater importance in bhakti, or Hindu devotional traditions, where, perhaps surprisingly, Kali is viewed as a mother figure. This devotional approach to Kali was exemplified by Ramprasad Sen, an 18th-century poet from Bengal. To this day, in part due to Ramprasad, Kali worship is especially prominent in this region of India. Unlike the tantric practitioner who heroically confronts Kali, the approach of the devotee is typically that of supplication—as a child to a mother. Kali's frightening character persists, but the hope of the devotee is that Kali will, despite her harsh exterior or “tough love,” ultimately respond to her children's needs and show them a more complete vision of reality.

Feminist and New Age groups, especially outside India, eager to move beyond patriarchy and traditional, typically masculine, Western theologies, see Kali as a valuable “Eastern” symbol of female empowerment. Such an interpretation is based largely on Kali's boundless sexual energy, an energy she has by virtue of remaining aloof from the more domestic or passive roles that many cultures associate with femininity. Kali challenges such norms, even flipping them, when, for example, the Hindu god Siva (sometimes viewed as her consort) must, through his own subjugation, come to tame Kali after she threatens the cosmos with a dance of destruction (hence a popular representation of Kali has her standing on Siva's supine body). These groups have therefore appropriated the power of Kali's raw femininity to fit a Western context, seeing her as a divine model of female strength, or even dominance, that can act as an example for individual empowerment.

David Fowler

See also Brahmanical Hinduism; Goddess; Hinduism; Shaivism

Further Readings

- Kinsley, D. (1975). The sword and the flute. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- McDermott, R. F., & Kripal, J. J. (Eds.). (2003). Encountering Kali. Berkeley: University of California Press.

KANT, IMMANUEL (1724–1804)

The philosopher Immanuel Kant, born in 1724, in the Prussian city of Königsberg, is recognized as one of the most important figures of the 16th-century Enlightenment. In reaction to the ritual and disciplined pietistic atmosphere that prevailed where he grew up, Kant developed a theory of duty based on human autonomy.

According to Kant, human will is fair—a good will—only if actions are motivated by duty itself. The idea of God is necessary from the practical point of view—as the idea of the supreme moral ruler of the world and the source of moral norms. Thus, the fundamental reason for religion is practical because, over and above particular doctrines, its ultimate function is to guide individual moral life and lead humanity to the moral destiny of peace. The establishment of an ethical commonwealth, the way to universal and eternal peace, is only possible as the organization of the people of God under laws of virtue, as an invisible church that gathers every just person in the world. The visible church must evidence that invisible one as the presence of God's moral kingdom on earth through its unity, purity, freedom, and immutability.

Only a pure rational faith makes it possible for the universal visible church to practice the religion of reason, natural religion; but this pure moral religion needs the help of a religion of God's service and worship to attract believers from a historical faith to the rational faith. Any true historical religion must perform this function for the human species.

For Kant, there are three essential questions to assess what ought to be done in human life: (1) the existence of God, (2) the possibility of a future life, and (3) the freedom of human will. Paradoxically, these important questions cannot be answered by human reason because they are not a subject of knowledge and all attempts to explain them are only speculation. The affirmation of the existence of God is a regulative principle accepted by moral faith, and people must act as if God and future life really exist, because, just like freedom, these two statements are postulates of practical reason. If they do not exist, moral law is just a fiction.

Kant interpreted the Bible from a moral point of view and subordinated the message of the sacred texts to practical reason, from where the sense of the biblical texts comes. In 1794, after the publication of Religion Within the Boundaries of Mere Reason, Kant was accused by King Friedrich Wilhelm II of changing the original sense of some basic faith elements and also of altering the biblical message. Kant rejected the accusation but did not publish any text on religion until the king's death in 1797.

Kant died in 1804 in Königsberg. His writings on religion were to have a profound influence on the secularization project of modernity.

Edgar Antonio López

See also Enlightenment; Modernism; Secularization

Further Reading

- Wood, A., & Di Giovanni, G. (Trans. & Ed.). (1996). Religion and rational theology. New York: Cambridge University Press.

KARBALA

Karbala is a modern city located in central Iraq. However, Karbala as a legendary space is best known as the site of a historic conflict that took place on the plains there in 680 CE. Husayn, the third Imam by Shi'i Muslim accounts, revolted against the Umayyad caliph Yazid. Yazid's much larger force brutally crushed Husayn's contingent and proceeded to round up the noncombatants and parade them in defeat around the capital at Damascus. Husayn's death at Karbala and subsequent events are viewed as a defining moment in collective Shi'i memory. In more recent years, the battle of Karbala has been largely reinterpreted as strictly an occasion for mourning. Modern retellings of the battle have transformed the traditional emotionally charged mourning of the battle into sermons of resistance; the martyrdom of Husayn is often used as a rallying cry to sacrifice in order to resist any disenfranchisement of the Shi'i, as symbolized in Yazid and his army. Husayn and Karbala have to a degree become the symbols of a modern Pan-Shi'i identity, which transcend national borders. Karbala has even extended beyond just Shi'i discourse and has been adapted by Sufi and Sunnī Muslims as well.

The religious experience of Karbala is intimately connected with Ashura, the festival commemorating the incident, during the month of Muharram (the 1st month in the Islamic calendar). The Ashura festival has traditionally been observed as a mourning process where the Shi'i take part in reenactments and retell particularly graphic accounts of the battle. In more recent years, there has been a shift toward viewing Ashura not merely as a lamenting of Husayn's fate but also as a visible and vicarious affiliation with Husayn in his sacrificial resistance to oppression. In urban and more "modernized" Shi'i communities, many of the perceived less "civilized" elements of Ashura, such as self-flagellation, have been abandoned or reinterpreted.

These more recent reinterpretations of the events of Karbala begin largely in the 20th century among numerous Shi'i revivalist/activist clerics, particularly those educated in the schools in Najaf, Iraq. Influential clerics such as Khomeini, Musa al-Sadr, and Ali Shariati were some of the first to insist that Karbala was not only a historical occurrence to be mourned but further a transcendent symbol of the necessity of martyrdom as a means of resistance to oppression. In this transfiguration of meaning, Karbala moved beyond a merely religious observance to an occasion uniting Shi'i across social and economic classes. This is not to say that Karbala has not retained a religious meaning, just that belief and social responsibility have become linked through the retellings of Husayn at Karbala.

The events at Karbala have not been confined just to the Shi'i. For instance, Muhammad Iqbal, a 20th-century Sunnī reformer, drew on references to the events at Karbala in his attempts toward a Pan-Islamic ideology that bridged sectarian divisions. The meaning of Karbala has often been signified in universal terms as a call to resistance and hope in the midst of despair and oppression, and in this way, it has been incorporated in both Shi'a and non-Shi'a circles for various purposes.

Caleb McCarthy

See also Iraq; Khomeini, Ruhallah Ayatullah; Martyrdom; Najaf; Shi'a Islam

Further Readings

- Deeb, L. (2006). Ashura: Authentication and sacrifice. In L. Deeb (Ed.), An enchanted modern (pp. 129–164). Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Hyder, S. E. (2006). Reliving Karbala. New York: Oxford University Press.

KARMA

Karma (also karman, kamma) has been a foundational concept in Indian religions since the Vedic period (1500 BCE), appearing in various Hindu schools of thought as well as in Buddhism and Jainism. The term shifts in meaning between these traditions (and, indeed, between various streams of Hinduism). As a result, understanding karma requires situating it in specific historical, cultural, and philosophical contexts.

There is no clear origination to the concept of karma. The term comes from the Sanskrit root kr

(“to do or make”). In the Vedic context (1500–500 BCE), karma refers specifically to sacrificial action, ritual work. An individual performs ritual action, and the consequences are automatic, governed by cosmic laws of cause and effect. It is important to note that the laws governing karma are impersonal. The gods themselves are subservient to the rules governing ritual action and the results of that action. Specific actions generate specific consequences, quite apart from the intention or sincerity of the ritual practitioners. Within the Vedic system, this applies to consequences that influence one’s daily life (children, cattle, prosperity, long life, etc.) as well as the attainment of heaven. Thus, karma was understood in terms of the correct (or incorrect) performance of sacrificial rites, thereby generating wanted (or unwanted) results. A key element that laid the groundwork for future understandings of karma was the notion that consequences of actions may be deferred—that is, consequences do not always appear immediately. In the Vedic texts, deferred karmic consequences manifest later in one’s lifetime or in a heavenly reward. Only after the Vedic period do we find the notion of multiple lifetimes.

In the Upanishads (ca. 800–400 BCE), karma takes on a broader meaning, inextricably linked to notions of cyclical reincarnation (samsara) and liberation from this cycle (moksha). In Upanishadic thought, karma refers to the consequences of one’s actions in general, beyond the ritual sphere. These consequences follow an individual from one lifetime to another, affecting the conditions into which one is born as well as certain events one experiences. For example, the fact that someone is born a man or a woman, in a high jati or a low jati, is a direct result of one’s actions in a previous lifetime. The Chandogya Upaniṣad (ChUp) 5.10.7 states that for those who are of pleasant conduct here—the prospect is, indeed, that they will enter a pleasant womb, either the womb of a brāhmin or the womb of a kṣatriya, or the womb of a vaiśya. But those who are of stinking conduct here—the prospect is, indeed, that they will enter a stinking womb, either the womb of a dog, or the womb of a swine, or the womb of an outcast. (Radhakrishnan & Moore, 1957, pp. 66–67)

An oft-repeated passage states succinctly that “one becomes good by good action, bad by bad action” (Bṛihadaranyaka Upaniṣad, BrhUp, 3.2.13). The goal for the individual is release from the cycle of birth, death, and rebirth, which is generated by the karma generated in each lifetime. In this context, karma is understood in terms of virtuous or evil acts that, in turn, generate positive or negative consequences in the next life. Ultimately, one desires mokṣa, liberation from samsara, which ultimately means release from karmic consequences.

The Bhagavad Gita (400 BCE–400 CE) is important to this discussion for two reasons. First, the Gita (BhGita, 4:19–21) teaches the renunciation of the fruits of one’s action:

He whose undertakings are all free from the will of desire, whose works are burned up in the fire of wisdom—him the wise call a man of learning. Having abandoned attachment to the fruit of works, ever content, without any kind of dependence, he does nothing though he is ever engaged in work. Having no desires, with his heart and self under control, giving up all possessions, performing action by the body alone, he commits no wrong. (Radhakrishnan & Moore, 1957, p. 117)

In the narrative, Krishna teaches that one should act in accordance with one’s prescribed duty (dharma), without thought for the fruits of one’s actions. In this way, one is liberated from samsara. Note that in this context, karma refers to one’s everyday actions, not just ritual activity. In addition, the Gita outlines three religious yogas or “disciplines” that one may practice to attain liberation: (1) karma yoga (the discipline of action, specifically detachment from the fruits of action), (2) dhyana yoga (the discipline of knowledge, specifically knowledge of the absolute Brahman), and (3) bhakti yoga (the discipline of devotion, specifically devotion to Krishna).

Over time, other means for being freed from karma developed. Pilgrimage, for example, offers individuals the means to travel to sacred places where their accumulated karma can be eradicated. Pilgrimage sites include cities, rivers, and tirthas, or “sacred crossings” where the deities are believed to have been. In addition, yoga developed as a means of liberation from karmic consequences.

Classical yoga teaches that one may break free from samsara through ascetic practices. Various strategies were developed for this (meditation, ascetic disciplines), and both Buddhism and Jainism originate in these renunciate streams.

The concept of karma spread beyond Hindu thought. Buddhism (in the late sixth century BCE) built on early-Upanishadic notions that desire leads to action (in Pāli, kamma, referring to physical or mental actions), which generates consequences. The nature of these consequences depends on whether the original desires were good or bad, which determines whether the actions are good or bad. A widely known saying summarizes this process:

According to the seed that is sown, so is the fruit from which you reap. The one who does good will gather good, the one who does evil will reap evil. Sown is the seed, and you shall taste the fruit therefrom. (Samyutta Nikāya)

Only the desire for “existence” generates good kamma, because this is action with awareness. As a result, the conditions one experiences in the present life are ultimately the result of one’s character and desires from a previous life. This has far-reaching implications: One’s individual physical characteristics and social and economic status are all the result of past choices and desires. However, within this lifetime, one is free to choose how to respond to these conditions, thus generating good or bad kamma for this and the next life. Scholars debate where the bonds of past kamma end and individual choice begins, but they agree on the need to distinguish kamma from fatalism here. One always acts freely—the conditions to which one has to respond may have been determined in a past life, but individuals always have free choice over their actions in any current situation.

Note that in this context, kamma is helpful in two ways: (1) it explains conditions that otherwise seem to have no cause or explanation (e.g., seemingly undeserved suffering) and (2) it provides a foundation for ethical conduct. However, kamma does not solve the problem of endless birth, death, and rebirth. Rather, kamma keeps the cycle going. Ultimately, the goal is release from kamma’s effects, which in Buddhism takes the form of nirvaṇa.

In the Jain tradition (sixth century BCE), the understanding of karma is closely linked to the understanding of the nature of the soul. Jainism teaches that the soul, which is eternal, takes on distinct embodied forms. These forms include, but are not limited to, human, animal, and plant forms (thus, Jainism teaches nonviolence to any sentient being that may possess a soul). The body one takes up is determined by one’s karma. In Jain thought, this karma is a substance. At death, the soul, “stained” by the accumulated karma of the present life, is channeled to its new embodiment. Ultimate release occurs only when the individual eradicates old karma and stops generating new karma. This is accomplished through ascetic living and right understanding.

The cause of the soul’s embodiment is the presence in it of what is called karmic matter. The self is never separated from matter until its final release. The way to deliverance is through the three “jewels” of right faith, right knowledge, and right conduct. (Radhakrishnan & Moore, 1957, p. 251)

The monastic life is ideal for pursuing liberation, but lay people practice modified forms of asceticism as well.

All of these traditions link their understandings of karma to their understanding of the soul, cyclic existence, and liberation from samsara. However, while karma provides an explanation for the suffering in this life and the potential for an improved life in the future, the ultimate goal of the Indian-based religions is complete liberation from the bonds of karma.

Kathryn McClymond

See also Hinduism; Jainism; Mahayana Buddhism; Radhakrishnan, Sarvepalli; Veda

Further Readings

- Keyes, C. F., & Daniel, E. V. (1983). Karma: An anthropological inquiry. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Obeyesekere, G. (2002). Imagining karma: Ethical transformation in Amerindian, Buddhist, and Greek rebirth (Comparative Studies in Religion and Society). Berkeley: University of California Press.

O'Flaherty, W. D. (Ed.). (1980). Karma and rebirth in classical Indian traditions. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Radhakrishnan, S., & Moore, C. A. (Eds.). (1957). A sourcebook in Indian philosophy. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

KASHMIR

Kashmir, the mountainous region divided between India and Pakistan, continues to be one of the most contested areas between these two countries. Part of the conflict is due to religion: While a large percentage of the population is Muslim, Kashmir is also home to a large and important Hindu community and was formerly ruled by a Hindu maharaja.

At the time of British colonial withdrawal from the subcontinent, there were two classes of states in the British Indian Empire. The first were the states of British India, which were ruled directly from London, with the Viceroy in New Delhi serving as the representative of the British Crown. The second were the "princely states," which enjoyed national autonomy as long as they accepted the Crown as the paramount power in the region. The Crown, under this doctrine, controlled three crucial policy domains of the princely states—defense, foreign affairs, and communications.

As British rule drew to a close, the last Viceroy, Lord Mountbatten, decreed that the princely states faced a choice: They could join one of the two emergent self-governing states, India or Pakistan. He also asserted that predominantly Muslim states that abutted either of the two wings of Pakistan would be part of Pakistan. The state of Jammu and Kashmir, however, posed a conundrum. It had a predominantly Muslim population but a Hindu monarch, and it shared borders with both Pakistan and India. Furthermore, Maharaja Hari Singh, the monarch, was averse to joining either state. Despite Lord Mountbatten's entreaties, he failed to accede to either state even after their formal declaration of independence on August 14 and 15, 1947, respectively. In the event, his hand was forced when rebellious tribesmen with the assistance of the Pakistan Army threatened his realm in late October 1947. With his forces facing imminent defeat, he appealed to India for assistance. India promptly offered military assistance, and the Maharaja acceded to India, but not before the invading forces seized a third of the state. On the advice of Lord Mountbatten, India referred the case to the United Nations Security Council, which brought about a cease-fire on January 1, 1948. United Nations peacekeeping forces have continued to patrol the cease-fire line ever since.

Subsequently, India and Pakistan have fought two wars over Kashmir, in 1965 and 1999. The dispute over this state has proven to be so intractable because its origins can be traced to competing conceptions of state construction in South Asia. Pakistan, which was created as a homeland for the Muslims of the British Indian Empire, claimed Kashmir on the basis of the state's Muslim-majority population. India, on the other hand, claimed Kashmir to demonstrate that Muslims can thrive under the aegis of a predominantly Hindu but secular state.

Over the years, both India and Pakistan's ideological claims over Kashmir have been undermined. Pakistan's religious basis for asserting authority over Kashmir collapsed in the wake of its breakup in 1971 and the emergence of Bangladesh. Since religious affiliation alone could not keep its two wings together, its irredentist claim to Kashmir was now bereft of meaning. Similarly, given the recrudescence of Hindu nationalism in India and the erosion of its secular commitments, India's secular claim to Kashmir is now based mostly on political exigency.

In 1989, owing to institutional decay and rapid political mobilization, an indigenous ethnoreligious insurgency erupted in the Indian-controlled portion of Kashmir. Thousands of Kashmiri Hindus fled to other parts of India for safety. Sensing an opportunity to exploit India's difficulties, Pakistan entered the fray on behalf of the insurgents. Since then, the region has been the site of an ongoing and sanguinary insurgency, exacerbated by the rhetoric of Islamic militancy on the rebel side.

Sumit Ganguly

See also Bharatiya Janata Party; India; Islamism (Political Islam); Pakistan

Further Readings

- Bhattacharjea, A. (1994). The wounded valley. Columbia, MO: South Asia Books.
- Ganguly, S. (1997). The crisis in Kashmir: Portents of war, hopes of peace. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Schofield, V. (1996). Kashmir in the crossfire. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Widmalm, S. (2006). Kashmir in comparative perspective: Democracy and violent separatism in India. New Delhi, India: Oxford University Press.

KAZAKHSTAN

Since 1991, following the dissolution of the former Soviet Union, the central Asian country of Kazakhstan has undergone significant growth in religious institutions and in people's religious consciousness. The number of largely Muslim religious communities has increased, and many religious facilities have been built. From the mid-1980s, the number of declared believers has increased more than two-fold: from 20%–25% to 60%–65%. Muslims and Orthodox Christians together constitute more than 90% of all religious adherents. According to the national census of 2009, the population of Kazakhstan is 16,004,800. More than 70% are Muslims, 26% are Christians, 2.8% are atheists, and 1.2% of the population have other religious views. (The first census, in 1999, did not ask about religious beliefs.)

Of the religious communities in Kazakhstan, 2,488 are Islamic, 292 are Orthodox Christian, 84 are Roman Catholic, 1,267 are Protestant, and 46 are followers of new or nontraditional religions. Charitable foundations and other societies number 47. There are 2,270 mosques, 262 Orthodox churches, 93 Roman Catholic churches, 6 synagogues, and more than 500 churches attended by Protestant and other denominations.

There are eight religious universities (two Islamic, one Roman Catholic, five Protestant), six secondary special schools, and three comprehensive religious schools in Kazakhstan. Also, some mosques and Christian churches have permanent educational courses and Sunday schools. Currently, close to 400 missionaries from 20 countries live and work in Kazakhstan.

Islam in Kazakhstan

Islam disseminated into central Asia and Kazakhstan in the seventh and eighth centuries from the southern areas. It became the state religion in 960, during the period when the Karakhanids governed the territory of what would later become modern Kazakhstan. In the early 13th century, the spread of Islam was slowed under Mongolian conquest, but later Mongolian conquerors turned to Islam and adopted the Turkic language.

Sunnī Islam was approved as the official ideology of the Kazakh Khanate in the 15th century. Islam also influenced the political and cultural lives of the different Kazakh tribes that would form the basis of Kazakh ethnicity and statehood.

The Russian Tsarist administration tried and failed to turn Kazakhs to Orthodox Christianity. Later, Christian politics was replaced by support of Islam. The Tsarist administration supported Tatar mullahs with salaries and provided finances for building mosques and Muslim schools (Medrese). The migration of Uighurs and Dungans from China (east Turkestan) influenced the growth of Islam in southeastern Kazakhstan during the 1870s and 1880s.

After 1917, the adherents of Islam were severely persecuted by Soviet authorities. In 1929, the teaching of Islam was prohibited in Kazakh schools. Thousands of mosques were closed in the Soviet Union, including Kazakhstan, in the 1930s. Under the official policy of atheism, the Soviet bureaucracy controlled Islamic institutions: During the period from 1960 to the late 1980s, the number of mosques in Kazakhstan was only 22–28.

Since then, Kazakhstan has witnessed a significant growth of Islamic institutions. Muslim communities from 1991 to 2009 increased from 68 to 2,488. The number of mosques increased from 296 in 1993 to 2,441 in 2008.

The Kazakh-Egypt Islamic University Nur Mubarak was opened in Almaty (the former capital of Kazakhstan). The number of pilgrims to Mecca increased from 228 in 2001 to 4,300 in 2007.

Kazakhstan is a member of the Islamic Conference Organization. The Spiritual Administration of Muslims of Kazakhstan was founded in 1990 and presently unites the majority of Muslim communities. Since 2000, the head of this organization is the Supreme Mufti Absattar-Qazhy Derbissali. Most of the Muslims of Kazakhstan practice the Sunnī of Khanaphi Mazkhab; Chechens and Ingushes practice Sunnī of Shaphii Mazkhab. There are also some Muslims who practice the Sunnī of Khanbali Mazkhab.

Christianity in Kazakhstan

According to the medieval historian Biruni, the first Christians came to the central Asian city of Merve in the third century CE.

Orthodox

Since 1991, Orthodox Christians have become the second largest faith community in Kazakhstan. There were 55 parishes of the Russian Orthodox Church in Kazakhstan in 1956. In 1999, the number of parishes increased to 212, and 8 monasteries were built. As of 2009, there were 281 Orthodox communities, 255 churches, and 9 monasteries in Kazakhstan.

In May 2003, the Sacred Synod of the Russian Orthodox Church made a decision to found the Metropole district, a specific united form of archdioceses, which the Russian Orthodox Church founded only in Kazakhstan. The district's aims are the coordination of religious, educational, publishing, social, and other public activities of the archdioceses in Kazakhstan. The district's head is the Metropolitan of Astana and Almaty Mefody (Nemtsov). The Metropole district consists of three archdioceses: (1) the Astana and Almaty Archdiocese, with the center in Astana; (2) the Uralsk and Guryev Archdiocese, with the center in Uralsk; and (3) the Shymkent and Akmola Archdiocese, with the center in Shymkent.

Roman Catholic

The first Catholic missionaries to come to Kazakhstan were the Franciscan friars in 1245. In the 18th and 19th centuries, Catholicism grew with the arrival of Polish exiles, military, and migrants. Between the 1930s and 1950s, deportations of Germans, Poles, Ukrainians, and the Baltic peoples to Kazakhstan fostered the growth of Catholic settlements. Kazakhstan established a formal relationship with the Vatican in 1992.

The present structure of the Catholic Church in Kazakhstan was created in 2003. The Catholic Metropole of Kazakhstan consists of an archdiocese with the center in Astana, two dioceses in Almaty and Qaraghandy, and the apostolic administration in Atyrau.

Currently, there are 80 Catholic and 4 Greco-Catholic communities in Kazakhstan, where two archbishops, three bishops, and more than 60 priests work. Nearly 300,000 Catholics live in Kazakhstan. The services in the Catholic churches are conducted in the Russian, Ukrainian, German, English, and Polish languages.

Protestant

Protestantism arrived in Kazakhstan with the migration from Russia in the 1880s, when some Lutheran, Baptist, and Mennonite communities moved to Kazakhstan. The mass migration of Protestants is linked with the deportation by the Stalin regime of some ethnic groups to Kazakhstan between the 1930s and 1940s. From the mid-1950s, communities of the Lutheran church, Gospel Christian Baptists, Adventists, and Mennonites appeared in the country.

There were 109 communities of Gospel Christian Baptists in Kazakhstan in 1991. Later, the number of Baptist communities increased to 129 in 1993, 281 in 2002, and 290 in 2007. There were 358 Baptist communities in Kazakhstan in 2009.

Also, in 2009, Kazakhstan registered 64 Pentecostal churches, 248 Presbyterian churches, and 351 Charismatic churches. The most known Christian communities are Grace, Emmanuel, New Life, Agape, Sun Bok Ym, and the Church of Complete Gospel. Many Pentecostal and Presbyterian churches were founded by missionaries from South Korea and the United States of America. Presently, the number of Protestant communities in Kazakhstan is more than 1,200.

New Religious Movements in Kazakhstan

Kazakhstan has some religious confessions that are new to the country. The spread of new religious movements began during the Soviet period with the missionary activities of the Society for Krishna Consciousness, Baha'i, charismatic branches of Protestantism, Jehovah's Witnesses, Dianetics, and others. Some of them began to appear in the early 1990s. The most active are communities such as the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, the Church of Vissarion, Transcendental Meditation, and the Church of Unification (Church of Union).

Nazgul A. Mingisheva and Yesbossyn M. Smagulov

See also Christianity; Islam; Russian Federation

Further Readings

Kazakhstan: Reality and perspectives of independent development. (1995). Moscow, Russia: Russian Institute of Strategic Researches.

Malashenko, A., & Olcott, M. B. (Eds.). (2001). Islam na postsovetskoy prostranstve: Vzgliadiznutri [Islam in post-Soviet space: The view from within]. Moscow: Carnegie Center

Smailov, A. (2010, November). Census in Kazakhstan. Retrieved April 22, 2011, from <http://news.mail.ru/inworld/kazakhstan/society/4773987>

KENYA

Kenya is one of the most important countries in East Africa. Religious belief and active engagement play important roles in Kenya's cultural, political, and economic arenas. Most Kenyans claim adherence to either Christianity or Islam, with the remaining population professing adherence to indigenous or traditional beliefs. Forty-five percent of Kenyans are Protestant Christian, 33% are Roman Catholic, 10% roughly identify with Islam, 10% profess adherence to indigenous beliefs, and the final 2% claim belief in some other form of religious identity or activity (a large majority of Kenyans are Christian, but estimates for the percentage of the population that adheres to Islam or indigenous beliefs vary widely depending on the study measuring religious identity in the country). Furthermore, Kenyans are very committed to their religious identities through active religiosity. Kenyans are regular attendees at religious services. Most Kenyans attend church or mosque service at least once a week or more (82%). Economic and political variations exist across religious identities, especially between Muslims and Christians, in Kenya. The Supreme Council of Kenyan Muslims acknowledges the economically as well as socially and politically disadvantaged position in which most Kenyan Muslims find themselves. Yet these differences have yet to play out in destabilizing or in public interactions.

These high levels of religiosity have translated into positive political engagement in Kenya. Civil society organizations, of which faith-based organizations are key front-runners, maintained opposition to autocratic practices in Kenya during colonial and postcolonial times. Civic organizations such as the Supreme Council of Kenyan Muslims, the National Council of Churches in Kenya, and the Catholic Justice and Peace Commission worked alongside opposition political parties to fight against the autocracy of the 1970s and 1980s in Kenya. After the reintroduction of multiparty elections in 1992, however, they stepped up the fight for democratic transition with a vengeance. Post-Cold War economic struggles, political liberalization, and the faltering capacity of the Kenyan state to provide social welfare goods to its citizens all created space for these nonstate actors to intervene in previously state-monopolized activities. Religious organizations led the fight for further democratic changes and the effective challenge to the stronghold of President Daniel Arap Moi and the Kenya African National Union party. These organizations offered inroads to political activism that was missing under the repressive, personalistic dictatorships that dominated the first 30 years of Kenya's independence. Religious groups across specific creeds have led the way in civic education and election monitoring, vocally opposing human rights abuses, such as those against women and ethnic minorities, and political corruption and functioning as training grounds for Kenyan public engagement. A Muslim, Christian, and Hindu interfaith collaborative worked together and in contest regarding the 2005 and 2010 constitutional referenda, passing out literature, holding training sessions, and conducting public forums to promote positive political development in Kenya. Finally, faith-based organizations and religious leaders have been the primary actors working on reconciliation following the postelectoral violence in 2008, working on the symptoms and root causes of this aggression.

Thus, Kenya is a society highly infused with religious identity and engagement. And the prominent role of religion has served Kenya well in fostering democratic political growth and efforts toward stable democratic consolidation.

Virginia Parish Beard

See also Africa; Christianity; Churches; Civil Society; International NGOs; Islam; Politics and Religion

Further Readings

- AIDS Education and Training Centers National Resource Center. (2006). Faith-based initiatives. Retrieved May 5, 2011, from <http://www.aids-ed.org/aidsetc?page=et-07-60>
- Ellis, S., & ter Haar, E. (1998). Religion and politics in sub-Saharan Africa. Journal of Modern African Studies, 36(2), 175–201.
- Ellis, S., & ter Haar, G. (2004). Worlds of power: Religious thought and political practice in Africa. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Freedom House. (2009). Kenya: Country report. Retrieved March 25, 2009, from <http://www.freedomhouse.org/template.cfm?page=22&year=2009&country=2960>
- Gifford, P. (1995). The Christian churches and the democratization of Africa. New York: Brill.
- Haynes, J. (1996). Religion and politics in Africa. Nairobi, Kenya: East African Educational Publishers.
- Kihoro, W. (1992). Politics and democracy in Kenya today (Politics of Kenya, Occasional Paper, No. 37, 7). Edinburgh, UK: Edinburgh University, Centre of African Studies.
- Masime, K., & Kibara, G. (2003). Regime transitions and the institutionalization of democracy in Kenya: The December 2002 elections and beyond. The East African Human Rights Institute, 1(1), 13–29.
- Mitullah, W., Odhiambo, M., & Ambani, O. (Eds.). (2005). Kenya's democratisation: Gains or losses? Nairobi, Kenya: Claripress.
- National Muslim Council of Kenya, with U.S. Agency for International Development & POLICY Project. (2005). Breaking the silence: Behind the veil. Nairobi, Kenya: Author.

- Nzomo, M. (2003). Civil society in the Kenyan political transition: 1992–2002. In W. Ouma Oyugi, P. Wanyande, & C. Odhiambo-Mbai (Eds.), The politics of transition in Kenya (pp. 180–211). Nairobi, Kenya: Heinrich Boll Foundation.
- Oded, A. (2000). Islam and politics in Kenya. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.
- Odhiambo-Mbai, C. (2003). The rise and fall of the autocratic state in Kenya. In W. Ouma Oyugi, P. Wanyande, & C. Odhiambo-Mbai (Eds.), The politics of transition in Kenya (pp. 51–95). Nairobi, Kenya: Heinrich Boll Foundation.
- Wanjala, S., Akivaga, K., & Kibwana, K. (Eds.). (2002). Yearning for democracy: Kenya at the dawn of a new century. Nairobi, Kenya: Claripress.

KHALISTAN MOVEMENT

The Sikh separatist agitation for a sovereign homeland in Punjab, India, found its ultimate expression in the Khalistan movement of the 1980s and 1990s. The Sikhs, a religious minority constituting approximately 2% of Indian society but a majority in the border state of Punjab in the northwest, nursed grievances centering on religious identity, economic and political discrimination, and social and cultural harassment. A Sikh diasporan community in North America, Europe, Africa, and Southeast Asia played an increasingly significant role as the ideology of Sikh self-determination, calls for assertion of human rights, and underground support for the violent Khalistani insurgency developed. Indeed, even as Punjab itself quieted by the turn of the millennium, the global Sikh community continued to uphold sovereigntist claims.

The year 1984 was a pivotal date for the Khalistan movement. After nonviolent protests for years over the array of grievances the Sikhs had with the central government of India, a small minority had stepped up their campaign to include violent action. In June 1984, the Indian Army assaulted the Golden Temple Complex at Amritsar, Sikhism's holiest site, in ostensible response to an array of crimes committed by the militants who had taken refuge there. In the assault, occurring on a major holiday, "Sant" Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale, a prominent Sikh preacher and leader of the Khalistan movement, was "martyred" at the Golden Temple, along with at least hundreds (by government account) and probably thousands (by human rights accounts) of entirely innocent visitors. Many of the sacred buildings were defaced or destroyed. Later in the year, after two Sikhs assassinated Prime Minister Indira Gandhi in retaliation, thousands of Sikhs were brutally murdered in pogroms coordinated by Indian political workers across several Indian cities. Suddenly, the sympathies of all Sikhs were turned toward the separatist agitators and away from India. A declaration of independence was signed in April 1986, and guerilla forces were organized.

The decade from 1984 to 1994 can be considered the height of the Khalistan movement. Villagers and townspeople across Punjab dared not go out at night for fear of their lives. Police organized “Village Defense Forces,” a sort of civilian vigilante scheme, arming people to fight against the increasingly well-armed Khalistani insurgents. It was suspected that the Khalistani guerillas were receiving weapons and training from within Pakistan, although the Pakistani government has always denied this. They were divided into several main organizations, such as the Khalistan Liberation Force, the Khalistan Commando Force, the Babbar Khalsa, the Bhindranwale Tiger Force, and the Sikh Students Federation. A Panthic Committee unified the whole of the movement, and it maintained liaisons in the diasporan communities—always central to the effort, particularly as human rights abuses increased and refugees swelled the ranks of British, Canadian, and U.S. Sikh populations.

The last major violent event of the Khalistan movement was the 1995 assassination, by a suicide car bomb, of Punjab’s chief minister in Chandigarh. Since then, the claim has been that Punjab has been “normalized,” though tensions continue and Khalistani sympathies remain high in the diaspora. The grievances that sparked the movement have not been resolved. It should also be noted that the Khalistan movement played a key role in sparking the Kashmiri independence movement starting in 1989 and also other minority autonomy movements now current in India.

Cynthia Keppley Mahmood

See also India; Kashmir; Politics and Religion; Sikhism; Terrorism; Violence

Further Readings

- Mahmood, C. K. (1996). Fighting for faith and nation: Dialogues with Sikh militants. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Pettigrew, J. (1996). The Sikhs of the Punjab: Unheard voices of state and guerilla violence. London: Zed Books.

KHARIJI

A derogatory name used in modern Muslim societies to designate a radical Islamist who attacks fellow Muslims, Khariji, along with terms such as jihadi and takfiri (one who excommunicates fellow Muslims), became part of the discourse associated with national and transnational Islamist violence and the global war on terror.

Khariji is the Arabic singular form of the plural Khawarij (typically rendered in English as Kharijites), the name of a seventh-century sectarian movement that defined itself over and against what became the two dominant sects in Islamic tradition, Sunnī and Shi’a. The Kharijites rebelled in 657 against the then leader of the nascent Islamic empire, Ali b. Abi Talib. They were infamous for judging fellow Muslims as nonbelievers (pronouncing the takfir on them), thus rendering them apostates from the faith and subject to death. Islamic historical sources are replete with bloody and seemingly random paroxysms of Khariji violence. Ali was himself killed by a Khariji in 661.

The Kharijites were also known for their egalitarian customs, which allowed any Muslim man to become the leader of the community. The Sunnī and Shi’i had specific qualifications for this position. As an actual movement, the Kharijites were active until the mid-10th century, by which time their uprisings had been quelled. But the name Kharijite, in the Islamic literary tradition, came to symbolize anyone who rebelled against legitimate Muslim political authority.

It is this symbol that was reawakened in modern countries such as Egypt and Syria to anathematize Islamists who took up arms against the government and fellow Muslims or whose activities seemed to threaten state interests and the political status quo. In Egypt, discussions about the Kharijites have been prominent—starting in the 1950s and continuing into the 1990s—in newspapers, magazines, and television; in book-length studies of Islamists, comparisons with Kharijites became common. One of the earliest accusations of being a Khariji was directed at Hassan al-Banna, the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood. Sayyid Qutb, the ideological successor to al-Banna in the brotherhood, had the label attached to him extensively after he was implicated in a plot to assassinate Nasser; his militant treatise Maalim fi'l-Tariq (Milestones) was thought to be a Khariji-inspired work because it accused fellow Muslims of the kind of sinfulness (jabiliyyah) that required either (re)conversion to Islam or death. The label Khariji in Egypt has been attached to every militant Islamist group that has emerged after or as an offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood, such as Takfir wa al-Hijra, al-Gamm'a al-Islamiyah, and Jihad.

Since the September 11 attacks, Muslim moderates around the world have engaged in debates about neo-Khariji activities and have used the label to condemn radical Muslim behavior, including the terrorist acts carried out by al Qaeda. The name Khariji has also received attention in the West as governments, militaries, and the media try to understand and counter the threat posed by Muslim radicals.

The global surge in Khariji references and discourse attests to both the growth in acts of Muslim violence that are religiously justified and the desire among moderate Muslims to counter this violence with an alternate vision of Islam. It also attests to modern society's continuing dependence on religion to legitimize and safeguard otherwise secular political values.

Jeffrey T. Kenney

See also Egypt; Islamism (Political Islam); Muslim Brotherhood; Shi'a Islam; Sunnī Islam

Further Readings

- Kenney, J. T. (2006). Muslim rebels: Kharijites and the politics of extremism in modern Egypt. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Salem, E. A. (1956). Political theory and institutions of the Khawarij. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Sivan, E. (1990). Radical Islam (Rev. ed.). New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Timani, H. S. (2008). Modern intellectual readings of the Kharijites. New York: Peter Lang.

KHOMEINI, RUHALLAH AYATULLAH (1902–1989)

The charismatic leader of the Islamic Revolution of 1979 in Iran, Sayyid Ruhallah began his political career as a revolutionary leader quite late in his life, when he had already attained the highest Shi'ite clerical rank of marja'-e taqlid (Source of Emulation) and bore the title of Grand Ayatullah (lit. "Sign of God"). His political campaign culminated in the overthrow of the monarchy on February 11, 1979. He was called Imam Khomeini by his followers during the revolution and was designated the Leader of the Islamic Republic of Iran in its 1979 constitution.

Ruhallah was born into a clerical family that traced its descent to the seventh Imam of the Twelver Shi'a, Musa al-Kazim, in the arid town of Khomein in central Iran, a few years before the Constitutional Revolution (1906–1911) opened the era of modern politics in Iran. His father was murdered before he was 1 year old, and his mother died when he was in his teens. The reign of Reza Shah (1925–1941), whose policies of centralization and secularization greatly weakened the Shi'ite religious establishment, encompasses Khomeini's formative years. He was atypical in his studies and chose to specialize in mystical philosophy, which was highly suspect in the legalistic scholarly community of Qom. In the 1930s, while teaching mystical philosophy to a small number of students, he also began teaching courses in ethics for a much larger audience. The popularity of these lectures made the police apprehensive. Khomeini never forgot the loss of clerical power and the humiliation of clerics by Reza Shah; he transferred his visceral hostility to the latter's son, Mohammad Reza Shah (1941–1979), whom he contemptuously referred to as "the son of Reza Khan" throughout the revolutionary struggle.

Khomeini's entry into the public arena began in 1944, a few years after Reza Shah's departure from Iran, with an anonymous book written against an anticlerical pamphleteer and a clerical advocate of reform of Shi'ism, in which he vigorously defended the religious establishment and traditional Shi'ite practices. He first appeared on the national political scene in 1963 as an outspoken critic of the Shah and his reform program. He was imprisoned and, after violent suppression of demonstrations by his supporters, exiled to Turkey. He then moved on to the Shi'ite holy city of Najaf in Iraq. By the late 1970s, he had enlisted the loyalty of many of the ablest and most energetic Shi'ite clerics. The militant clerics rallied behind in opposition to Western cultural domination, which they found to be threatening Islam with corruption, and to the Shah's policies, which they considered a threat to the existence of religious institutions.

In his 1944 book, Kashf-e asrār (Revelation of Secrets), Khomeini maintained that religious jurists (mujtahids) had the authority to supervise parliamentary legislation and the deeds of the monarch. In the following decade, he took a radical position in a tract on independent law finding (ijtihad), which he had apparently written in the early 1950s but not published until 1964 to 1965. He used the term hākim not only in the Arabic, technical sense of (religious) judge but also in the Persian everyday sense of governor, to extend the judiciary authority of the mujtahid to the political sphere as the right to rule. While in exile in Najaf, Khomeini developed this idea further into his theory of the mandate of the religious jurist to rule, both in a series of lectures in Persian that were published in Beirut in 1970 under the title of Vilāyat-e faqih (Mandate of the Jurist) and in a work of jurisprudence on transactions, Kitāb al-bay', published in 1971. According to the traditional Shi'ite theory, the political authority of the infallible imams fell into abeyance after the occultation or disappearance of the 12th Imam, the Mahdi, in the ninth century. The authority of the imams as teachers of religion and the Sacred Law, however, was transferred to the Shi'ite jurists. The scope of clerical authority gradually expanded over the centuries. Khomeini was the first Shi'ite jurist to open the discussion of the "Islamic state" (hukumat-e islāmi) in a work of jurisprudence, and he took the radical step of claiming that the imams' right to rule also devolved on the jurists during the occultation of the 12th Imam. Not only did the mandate to rule devolve on the religious jurists, but if one of them succeeded in setting up a government, it was the duty of the other jurists to follow him.

With his theory of theocratic government made known in clerical circles, Khomeini began to prepare a beleaguered Shi'ite establishment for the takeover of a hostile, secularizing state, though without any general public discussion of the Mandate of the Jurist, for which the time was not considered ripe. The vaguer but more emotive phrase Islamic state was used as the slogan of the Islamic Revolution. Khomeini mobilized many younger clerics from humbler rural and small-town backgrounds who preached his revolutionary message in mosques and religious gatherings, and his former students supplied the leadership of the militant clergy and later occupied the highest positions of power in the Islamic Republic. Other groups, too, became vocal in their opposition to the Shah when he tried to liberalize his regime in 1977. As massive demonstrations and strikes paralyzed the government in 1978, all political groups who formed the revolutionary coalition against the Shah enthusiastically accepted the leadership of Khomeini.

On the victory of the Islamic Revolution, Imam Khomeini insisted that he was setting up a government based on Islamic law (hokumat-e shar'iyya) and appointing a prime minister "by the general and the sacred mandate" (velāyat-e shar'i va velāyat-e 'āmm). He treated the property confiscated from the Pahlavi family and other industrialists of the old regime as war booty according to religious law and constituted them into a number of foundations, the most notable being the Foundation for the Disinherited. Most of the foundations were put under the direction of clerics. Khomeini also appointed Mehdi Bazargan, the leading member of the liberal and nationalist elements in the revolutionary coalition, as the prime minister of a provisional government. Nevertheless, a clerically dominated Assembly of Experts, elected in place of a constituent assembly, bypassed the draft constitution prepared by the provisional government and proposed a theocratic government based on Khomeini's Mandate of the Jurist, now designated the Leader of the Islamic Republic, with a Guardian Council whose clerical jurists were appointed by the Leader and had veto power over legislation not conforming to Islamic standards, an elected parliament (Majlis), and an elected president. This was approved by a referendum in December 1979, shortly after the occupation of the American embassy and the taking of its staff as hostages resulted in the resignation of the provisional government of Bazargan. By backing the taking of hostages, Khomeini also caused a major international crisis.

In the course of the ensuing power struggle of the early 1980s among the partners in the revolutionary coalition, Khomeini sanctioned the violent suppression of the leftist and secular elements. The most important group eliminated in the process in street and house-to-house fighting was the Islamic radical group the Mujahidin-e Khalq. The Iranian state and the revolutionary structures were brought under clerical control. Once the revolutionary power struggle ended with the complete victory of his supporters, Khomeini sought to maintain unity between the conservative and the radical clerics and their respective allies. He also oversaw the constitutional development of the Islamic theocratic republic he had founded, endorsing what came to be called the “governmental commandment” (hokm hukumati) of the ruling jurist (vali-ye faqih). He established a Council for the Determination of the Interest of the Islamic Regime (majma’-e tashkhis-e maslahat-e nizām-e islāmi) to resolve the differences between the Majlis and the Guardian Council in 1988 and ordered the revision of the 1979 constitution on a number of specific points in April 1989, shortly before his death. The amended constitution, incorporating Khomeini’s new idea of the “absolute (mutlaqa) mandate of the jurist,” was ratified by a referendum in July 1989, the month following his death.

Khomeini opposed the ending of the increasingly unpopular war with Iraq (1980–1988) until he was finally persuaded to accept a cease-fire in view of the gravity of the military situation on July 18, 1988. Doing this was, he said, like “drinking a cup of poison.” In the following weeks, he ordered the execution of some 3,000 members of the Mujahidin-e Khalq who had served or were serving sentences given them by revolutionary courts. The incipient collapse of communism in the last year of his life renewed Khomeini’s optimism, and he told the Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev in January 1989 that he needed to learn about Islam as communism now belonged to the museum of history. Khomeini caused one final international crisis by issuing, on February 14, 1989, an injunction (fatwa) that sanctioned the death of the writer Salman Rushdie, who lived in England, for allegedly insulting Prophet Muhammad in his novel The Satanic Verses.

Khomeini died on June 3, 1989. He was a charismatic leader of immense popularity. Millions of Iranians massed to welcome him when he returned as the Imam from exile in 1979, and a million or more joined his funeral procession after he died 10 years later.

Saïd Amir Arjomand

See also Iran; Islamic Reform; Islamic State; Shi’a Islam

Further Readings

- Algar, H. (1988). Imam Khomeini, 1902–1962: The pre-revolutionary years. In E. Burke III & I. M. Lapidus (Eds.), Islam, politics and social movements (pp. 263–288). London: University of California Press.
- Arjomand, S. A. (1988). The turban for the crown: The Islamic Revolution in Iran. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Arjomand, S. A. (2009). After Khomeini: Iran under his successors (chap. 1). New York: Oxford University Press.
- Moin, B. (1999). Khomeini: Life of the Ayatollah. London: St. Martin’s Press.

KIERKEGAARD, SØREN (1813–1855)

Søren Kierkegaard was a 19th-century Danish philosopher and theologian who produced some of the most influential works in existential philosophy and modern Protestant Christian theology. He combined these two discourses to articulate three hierarchical modes of existence that incite Christians to live a radically religious life. He offers Abraham, with his total devotion to his faith in God, as one exemplar of such a life in his famed reading of Abraham’s near sacrifice of his son Isaac in Genesis 22.

Kierkegaard’s youth was spent attending parties, operas, and the theater and spending money freely on clothes and drink, but he became more serious following his father’s death in 1838 and eventually wrote his academic thesis, The Concept of Irony. He studied philosophy in Berlin, where he encountered and was critical of Hegel's concept of dialectic, which achieves resolution following the synthesis of two contradictory movements. Kierkegaard's own concept of dialectic had two components, not three, so that it results in the tension of an either/or that can be resolved only by an individual act of decision. He articulates this dialectic in Either/Or, published pseudonymously in 1843.

That same year, his essay Fear and Trembling was published under the pseudonym Johannes de Silentio. Both texts undertake examinations of the modes of existence that Kierkegaard outlines: the aesthetic, the ethical, and the religious. The aesthetic is concerned with individuality and sensuous immediacy, taking a passive attitude and allowing life to happen. Hence, the aesthetic lacks any permanent commitment, any stability or responsibility, and any sense of interiority. The ethical is marked by interiority and self-reflection, self-determination, and self-transformation in keeping with the principles of duty and responsibility. The ethical expresses the universal, as does a tragic hero or heroine who sacrifices for a moral principle. The religious, however, is singular: Having received a divine call, the religious responds in an unmediated relation to the absolute, namely, God. Either/Or explores the relation of the aesthetic and the ethical, while Fear and Trembling explores the relation of the ethical and the religious. This it does by creatively interpreting Abraham's near sacrifice of his son Isaac. For Kierkegaard, Abraham exemplifies the religious because he answers God's call to sacrifice his son—a call requiring him to do something that the ethical judges as wrong. Abraham engages in a teleological suspension of the ethical through a movement of faith, where faith names the paradoxical situation in which the singular (the religious) is higher than the universal (the ethical). Abraham realizes this paradox through a leap of faith, a concept that Kierkegaard inaugurates in this text, as he leaps from the ethical to the religious, which means that he leaps into a paradox. This makes Abraham the knight of faith, but it also reduces him to silence, for he cannot explain this paradox. Kierkegaard's subsequent texts expound on this radical faith in their attacks on Christendom.

William Robert

Further Readings

- Gardiner, P. (2002). Kierkegaard: A very short introduction. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Kierkegaard, S. (1985a). The concept of irony (H. V. Hong & E. H. Hong, Trans.). Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Kierkegaard, S. (1985b). Fear and trembling (A. Hannay, Trans.). New York: Penguin.
- Kierkegaard, S. (1992). Either/or (A. Hannay, Trans.). London: Penguin.

KILLING FIELDS (CAMBODIA)

In April 1975, the Khmer Rouge (KR), a communist guerilla force, was victorious in Cambodia's 5-year-long civil war under the leadership of a former schoolteacher using the pseudonym Pol Pot. Almost at once, and without explaining their rationale, the KR forcibly emptied Cambodia's towns and cities; abolished money, schools, private property, courts of law, and markets; forbade religious practices; expelled foreigners and closed embassies; and set almost everybody to work in the countryside growing food. The country's entire population was forced to relocate to agricultural labor camps, a process of resettlement and political retribution in which many died in what are today referred to as the "killing fields." Everyone was forced to work 12 to 14 hours a day, every day. Children were separated from their parents to work in mobile groups or as soldiers and were encouraged to spy on adults. Buddhist monks and nuns were not allowed to practice their religion and were forced into labor brigades. Workers were fed one watery bowl of soup with a few grains of rice daily. Babies, children, adults, nonethnic Khmers, the educated urban elites, the handicapped, and the elderly were systematically killed. This was the central part of the KR plan—to preside over an extreme version of a radical Marxist-Leninist-Maoist revolution.

Between April 1975 and the 1st week of 1979, at least 14,000 men, women, and children had been held at a location in Phnom Penh designated S-21, a high school converted into a secret prison. Many of them were KR soldiers or followers who had refused to obey the extreme orders of their leaders. Tortured or threatened with torture, few prisoners maintained their innocence for long. Considered guilty from the moment they arrived, thousands of men, women, and children were expected to confess their guilt in writing before they were taken off to be murdered. The KR had a paranoid fear of imagined enemies, and the search for them was a crucial ingredient of its bureaucratic practice. Because Cambodia's leaders subscribed to the Maoist doctrine of permanent revolution, counterrevolutionary "enemies" were continuously imagined, and purges were continuously needed to ensure the safety of the party center and to maintain the revolution's purity and momentum. Everyone held at S-21 was eventually killed; it was the regime's intent that their confessions would testify not only to their "crimes" but also to the party's omniscience and clairvoyance.

During the 3 years, 8 months, and 20 days of Pol Pot's rule, Cambodia faced its darkest days; an estimated 1.5–3 million Cambodians, some 20%–30% of the country's population, died by starvation, torture, or execution. Almost every Cambodian family lost at least one relative during this gruesome holocaust. The KR state of Democratic Kampuchea was toppled on December 25, 1978, after Vietnamese forces entered Phnom Penh to address the KR murder of hundreds of ethnic Vietnamese along the Vietnam-Cambodia border region. This, however, did not mean freedom for the people of Cambodia; instead, it set the stage for a two-decade-long war in Cambodia. The Vietnamese finally withdrew from Cambodia in 1989, leaving their client regime, the People's Republic of Kampuchea, to fend for itself against the KR and its allies. For 30 years, the KR haunted the Cambodian landscape and people through attempts to identify old KR leaders and charge them with war crimes and crimes against humanity.

The KR displaced many Cambodians. Neighboring Southeast Asian countries, especially Thailand, became a safe haven from oppression. Cambodian refugees emigrated abroad as well, to the United States, France, Australia, and New Zealand. Today, one of the largest Cambodian diasporic communities is in Long Beach, California.

Cambodians and Cambodia are still struggling to understand and heal from the dark days of the KR era. In August 2010, the United Nations-backed tribunal convicted Kaing Guek Eav, known as Duch, for war crimes against humanity in what was the first trial of a major KR figure. Duch's sentence was reduced to no more than 19 years in prison. Cambodians all over the world reacted negatively to this and viewed it as justice being denied.

The collective trauma of the Killing Fields has yet to be healed. Many Cambodian refugees have battled posttraumatic stress syndrome, which has hindered their ability to acculturate into their host countries. In refugee communities, the lack of financial resources to construct Buddhist temples resulted in the creation of Buddhist shrines in private dwellings, which became important sites for children's moral education and socialization.

Jonathan H. X. Lee

See also Cambodia; Marxism; Southeast Asia; Vietnam

Further Readings

- Chan, S. (2004). Survivors: Cambodian refugees in the United States. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Chan, S., & Kim, A. U. (2003). Not just victims: Conversations with Cambodian community leaders in the United States. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Chandler, D. (1999). Brother number one: A political biography of Pol Pot. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Lee, J. H. X. (Ed.). (2010). Cambodian American experiences: Histories, communities, cultures, and identities. Dubuque, IA: Kendall Hunt.

KING, CORETTA SCOTT (1927–2006)

Though she was well known as the wife of Martin Luther King Jr., Coretta Scott King became a human rights activist and leader of international stature in her own right in the decades following her husband's assassination in 1968. Most notably, she founded and served as the first president and CEO of the King Center for Nonviolent Social Change in Atlanta, led the more than 15-year-long campaign that established Martin Luther King Jr. Day as a U.S. national holiday, and played a prominent role in the Free South Africa movement. Scott King also stood for an expansive interpretation of her husband's legacy by emphasizing gender justice; supporting LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender) rights; lending her name to the Coretta Scott King Book Awards for children's literature; and bringing attention to proper dietary practices by becoming a vegan.

Mrs. King had come to activism before meeting her husband, and the Kings' marital partnership was always understood by the couple as also a political partnership for social justice. Even while courting, they actively discussed their mutual commitment to devoting themselves to social change. In a 1967 interview, Dr. King explained, "I wish I could say, to satisfy my masculine ego, that I led her down this path but I must say we went down together" (Applebome, 2006).

While Coretta gave her primary energies to raising the couple's four children, her marriage was unconventional in its other-centeredness and the degree to which Scott King willingly risked her own safety for the movement. As she herself put it, "I did not just marry a man, I married a destiny" (Vivian, 2006, p. 109).

When whites bombed our home in Montgomery, Alabama, I was in the home with my infant daughter. We could have been killed, but I refused to give in to fear. . . . I never saw my own life as personal, outside of the collective good. I never separated my love of family, church and community. (Reynolds, 2006, p. 4)

Coretta Scott King also anticipated the increasing attention her husband would give to the international stage toward the end of his life when in 1962 she served as a Women's Strike for Peace delegate to the 17-nation Disarmament Conference in Geneva, Switzerland. Scott King had previously witnessed the independence of Ghana with her husband in 1957. Later in life, Scott King's activism led her to speaking engagements throughout Africa, Asia, Europe, and Latin America. She became the first woman to deliver Harvard's Class Day address and the first woman to preach at a statutory service at London's iconic St. Paul's Cathedral, witnessed the historic 1993 handshake between Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Chairman Yasser Arafat, lobbied for peace in the administration of U.S. presidents from John F. Kennedy to George W. Bush, stood with Nelson Mandela as he was sworn in as president of South Africa, and held audiences with Pope John Paul II, the 14th Dalai Lama, and Archbishop Desmond Tutu. By the end of her life, Martin Luther King Jr. Day was being celebrated in 100 nations, and Coretta Scott King herself had become a global icon for peace and justice.

Aaron S. Gross

See also Equality; Human Rights; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Nonviolence; Politics and Religion

Further Readings

- Applebome, P. (2006, January 1). Coretta Scott King, 78, widow of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., dies. New York Times. Retrieved May 5, 2011, from <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/01/31/national/31cnd-coretta.html>
- Baldwin, L. V. (1992). To make the wounded whole. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.
- King, C. S. (1994). My life with Martin Luther King, Jr. (Rev. ed.). New York: Puffin Books.
- Reynolds, B. A. (2006, February 4). The real Coretta Scott King. The Washington Post, p. 4.
- Vivian, O. B. (2006). Coretta. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

Website

The King Center: www.thekingcenter.org

KING, MARTIN LUTHER, JR. (1929–1968)

Martin Luther King Jr. was born in 1929 in Atlanta, Georgia, where his father was the pastor of Ebenezer Baptist Church. King earned his bachelor of arts degree from Morehouse College, his bachelor of divinity degree from Crozer Theological Seminary, and his doctorate of philosophy from Boston University. King spent his adult life as a Baptist pastor and highly influential civil rights leader. He was assassinated on April 4, 1968, in Memphis, Tennessee.

King is recognized nationally and internationally for his work as a leader in the U.S. civil rights movement and for his advocacy of nonviolence.

He was instrumental in organizing nonviolent boycotts, direct-action protests, sit-ins, and marches against racial segregation and discrimination. King framed racial segregation and racism as sinful and immoral, and he argued that ending segregation and racial inequality was a moral imperative. As a nationally recognized spokesperson for the civil rights movement, King pushed the U.S. government to pass laws ensuring equal rights for all U.S. citizens (including the Civil Rights Act) and to enforce newly passed laws that made racial segregation illegal.

King is known worldwide for his belief in, and advocacy of, nonviolence. He based his belief in nonviolence on the Christian concept of agape, or Christian love. While he viewed nonviolence as an expression of Christian love, his understanding of nonviolence was also influenced by a number of other sources, including Henry David Thoreau's Essay on Civil Disobedience, Mohandas Gandhi's work and thought, and Black nonviolent activists such as Baynard Rustin and Glenn Smiley.

King received international recognition in 1964, when he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for his leadership in the civil rights movement and his practice of nonviolent protest and resistance in the fight against racism, poverty, and inequality. In addition to his work for racial equality in the United States, King spoke out against poverty, colonialism, and war, especially the Vietnam War. "Beyond Vietnam," a speech King gave on the Vietnam War in 1967, is often seen as a prime example of how he viewed nonviolence as an important philosophy and practice both nationally and internationally.

Emily Linthicum

See also Equality; Gandhi, Mohandas; Human Rights; King, Coretta Scott; Nonviolence; Politics and Religion; Racism

Further Readings

- Carson, C. (Ed.). (1998). The autobiography of Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Warner Books.
- Carson, C., & Shepard, K. (Eds.). (2001). A call to conscience: The landmark speeches of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. New York: Warner Books.

- Jackson, T. (2008). Becoming King: Martin Luther King, Jr. and the making of a national leader. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press.

KINGSHIP

The institution of kingship has been fairly widespread globally from ancient times, through the medieval period, and into the contemporary era. The biblical and Greco-Roman worlds and the great dynasties of Egypt were characterized by a succession of kings, emperors, and queens who made their mark in history. Many of these monarchies were sacral in character.

Indeed, the link between religion and governance has a long history, and the link is especially evident when governance is perceived as leadership, as illustrated by the concept of the "divine right" of kings, which was to gain currency in the history of Europe. Thus, some previous and existing forms of political power are dependent on structured belief systems. The institution of divine kingship is one extreme manifestation of the intersection of religion and governance. There is now a tendency in the West, particularly in Europe and the United States, to distinguish between religion and society or to make a separation between church and state; these relationships, which have become contentious, are in actual fact less distinct in many other parts of the world. A striking example is the case of Africa.

Ever since James Frazer delineated divine kinship in 1890 with his theories on the pattern of myths and ritual, the focus of investigation has been largely on Africa. The notion of divine kingship was closely related to Ancient Egypt, where kings ruled at least since about 3000 BCE, when the Pharaohs, the early Egyptian kings, came to power. Other kingdoms developed in North Africa and large areas south of the Sahara, such as the Yoruba and Benin kingdoms (Nigeria), the Asante kingdom (Ghana), and the Zulu, Sotho, and Swazi kingdoms (southern Africa). Edward Evans-Pritchard's socio-anthropological study on the divine kingship of the Shilluk (Sudan) espouses the place of the institution against the backdrop that the kingship, not the king, is divine, that divine kingship is as much a political as a ritual phenomenon, and that the office must be viewed in the total context of the social structure. Mary Douglas demonstrates the significance of institutions in shaping the minds of individuals in society and their influence on collective action.

The institution of kinship in Africa is pervasive, a phenomenon that is deeply ingrained in the sociopolitical fabric and the religio-cultural experience of virtually all African societies. Not all African societies have had traditional rulers in the form of kings, queens, or chiefs. In other contexts, communities are governed by elders, the clan, or village heads. But where kings and chiefs existed, their office is usually regarded as having been divinely instituted or maintained. The ritualization of the office does not only make the king stand out among all others in society, it also keeps him in constant touch with the source of power. The traditional rulers hold a significant place in African life and concepts by virtue of their office. The institution of kingship embraces political, ritual, and cosmological aspects. According to John Mbiti, these kings and chiefs are looked on both as political heads and as sacred personages who symbolize the prosperity and welfare of their nations. Kings are political and economic role models, mystical and religious heads, and the divine symbol of their people's health and welfare. They are significant for their ritual and constitutional aspects, which tend to form a common pattern.

As a sacred and divine institution, kings were also considered to be sacred and divine, and the progeny of the Supreme Being whose duty it was to establish and maintain cosmic balance and social order. In several African societies, one of the several attributes bestowed on the Supreme Deity is as the Great King and Ruler of the universe. This indicates that the people consider the deity to rule not only in human affairs but also over nature. The deity's portrait as king, conveying supreme authority and absolute power, is very much colored by that of human rulers, the institution of kingship. The king acts as the intermediary between the royal ancestors and the whole nation. Some mythical narratives indicate that some divinities were deified ancestors who were previously earthly kings. The Obi, king of Benin (Edo-speaking peoples of Nigeria), represents the tradition of kingship where monarchs are viewed as sacred and living deities participating with the gods and ancestors in a sacred divine community.

Historically, the kingship institution is indispensable and fundamental to African social, cultural, political, economic, and religious life. A people's worldview is central for understanding their institution of kingship as a traditional system of governance.

The institution of kingship and chieftainship could be viewed from the perspective of its place in the center of the traditional political system and as it relates to the generation of the political values that are cherished and practiced in traditional politics. In the traditional African political practice, the will of the people plays a significant and crucial role, for the king or chief has to rule with the consent of the people. This people's will is usually expressed formally in the kingmakers' council of chiefs and in other constituted assemblies. Royal lineages are significant stakeholders in indigenous governance. Among the Ashanti of Ghana, kingmakers are responsible for the nomination and election of the king. The king is chosen from the royal lineage, and the crowning is done by the queen mother.

Kingship as an institution is not simply a system of traditional governance; there are crucial elements with cosmological and epistemological underpinnings. African cosmological formulations of sacred kingship are anchored on myths. Myths surround the origin and person of the king. Among the Yoruba peoples of West Africa, sacred kingship is an ancient institution where the Oduduwa (the emperor of the Yoruba people) is conceived in myths as the progenitor of the original crowned kings. Rulers are therefore treated as special persons with special roles, venerated, and well respected by their subjects. They occupy a special office and symbolize the link between the human and the supersensible world. Cosmological and cosmogonic myths legitimize the kingship institution and imbue them with a huge dose of sacrality. The king's role in African cosmological systems was to exercise his authority as the earthly viceroy of the Supreme Deity and of divine power and to perpetuate cosmic order by maintaining justice and fulfilling ritual obligations. Thus, their power and strength lies in the religious myths, traditions, and taboos that eclipse them.

In modern-day Africa, kings or chiefs are still to be found performing ritual functions. The Asantehene, king of the Asante (Ghana), continues to observe ancestral rites such as the Adae ceremonies. It is the Asantehene who enters the sacred shrine of the ancestors and makes food offerings to the sacred stools of royal ancestors on behalf of the kingdom. Other religious rites that demand the king's presence and patronage are the annual purification ceremonies, the harvest offering, and rituals to appease particular divinities. Such communal rituals celebrate and reinforce the intimate link between humanity and the spirit world.

The power and sacrosanctity of indigenous kingship systems in Africa was adversely affected during the colonial and postindependent era. The administrative, social, and religious changes that took place weakened the indigenous kingship institution. The expansion of Christianity and Islam in several African countries has affected the institution by sapping the spiritual authority of the king. The power and the religious significance of the kings and chiefs have also been undermined by new forms of governance and under modern conditions. There was progressive secularization of the king's or chief's office not only by erstwhile colonial governments but also by some national governments.

Nonetheless, the resilience of sacral kinship is evident in how independent African states are constantly and consciously negotiating the office of kingship, the status and roles, within the purview of modern democratic governance. Several African countries have maintained or transformed the traditional structures of "kingmakers," the "house of chiefs," for installing and upholding the checks and power balances of kings or even for dethroning or destooling them. "Councils of traditional rulers" and "ministries of chieftaincy affairs" have acted as advisory bodies to national parliaments to function with consultative power. For instance, in postindependent Ghana, as in other parts of Africa, governments have continued to ensure the sociopolitical, ritual, and constitutional relevance of kings/chiefs, culminating in the Chieftaincy Act of 1971. This act was strengthened in 1992 and subsequently to create an interface between traditional and Western democratic governance structures. This reinforces the centrality of kingship in several African societies in the face of modernity and globalization. Although the rise of modern nation-states has diminished the power and influence of kings, the institution of kingship still holds crucial meaning and relevance for many Africans. Kings, chiefs, and other traditional rulers remain living symbols of ethnic identity, sociopolitical cohesion, and cultural history.

Afe Adogame

See also Africa; Divine Law; Politics and Religion; Religion and State

Further Readings

- Busia, K. A. (1957). The position of the chief in the modern political system of the Ashanti. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Douglas, M. (1987). How institutions think. London: Routledge & Kegan.
- Evans-Pritchard, E. E. (1948). The divine kingship of the Shilluk of the Nilotic Sudan (Frazer Lecture). New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Faraji, S. (2009). Kings. In M. K. Asante & A. Mazama (Eds.), Encyclopedia of African religions (pp. 364–366). Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Gyekye, K. (1996). African cultural values: An introduction. Accra, Ghana: Sankofa.
- Mbiti, J. (1969). African religions and philosophy. Oxford, UK: Heinemann.

KIRIBATI

Known as Tungaru in the indigenous language, the South Pacific island nation of Kiribati was previously known as the Gilbert Islands (from the local word for "Gilbert's") and is composed of 33 islands inhabited largely by Christians. Located at the intersection of Micronesian and Polynesian cultural areas, nearly all the citizens are indigenous, living in the Tungaru chain of islands, with more than one third of the total population residing in urban south Tarawa. Fifty-five percent of the residents adhere to Roman Catholic Christianity, with the indigenous Kiribati Protestant Church claiming another 36%. Smaller religious communities include the Church of the Latter-Day Saints (2%, though the church the independently claimed 11% of the population in 2009), the Baha'i (2%), and the Seventh-Day Adventists (2%). Christian missionary activity has greatly influenced traditional beliefs, but spirits (known as anti) remain important figures and enjoy wide respect into the 21st century. In traditional Kiribati mythology, the world was created by the giant spider Nareau, who was followed by anti, half-anti, and finally humans. Traditional deities were thought to take the form of animals or natural phenomena and had great symbolic importance as totems for communities; a Kiribatian's island of origin remains an important marker of identity that predates colonization.

Most westerly islands have had residents for more than 3,000 years, while other islands in the archipelago have only been inhabited since the 20th century. Colonials from Great Britain arrived on the islands in 1837, soon followed by Protestant missionaries from the Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions and the London Missionary Society in 1857 and 1870, respectively. Catholic missionaries from the Order of the Sacred Heart arrived in 1888, and the resulting rivalry still resounds in the demographics of Kiribati, with mostly Catholic northern islands and a largely Protestant south. In 1870, the British replaced the clan system that had been operative on the islands since the 1400s, and they would later abolish the monarchic structure in 1963 to give governance to councils of elders (unimane), which governed daily local activities into the 21st century. After it officially became a British protectorate in 1892, the history of Kiribati was dramatically shaped by World War II; several islands were occupied by Japanese forces, and the battle of Tarawa in 1943 remains one of the bloodiest in the history of the U.S. Marine Corps. Kiribati gained full self-governance on July 12, 1979, and established the central national government, which was still extant at the time of this writing. The United States had claimed rights to some of the Phoenix and Line islands and had used them for early nuclear tests but relinquished all rights in 1983.

At the beginning of the 21st century, the nation was ideologically divided into a conservative south and a more progressive northern and central region, which follows the introduction of the varied Christianities active in Kiribati. Where a largely French and English clergy previously held sway over the population, they now have been replaced by more indigenous religious officials. Kiribati's plurality cannot be spoken of monolithically; where some spirit mediums and other practitioners from the nation's precolonial past are still active, they are often regarded with a degree of ambivalence by the extant communities. Some locales allow preaching and missionizing from foreign sources, while the traditional leadership of others has repelled non-Christian preachers. All religious life in Kiribati has its greatest threat from the consequences of global warming, as a great many of the atolls in the nation rise a little over 13 feet above sea level, putting the people at risk from the rising seas.

John Soboslai

See also Missions and Missionaries; Pacific Islands/Oceania; Postcolonialism; Religion and State

Further Readings

- Bataua, B. T. (1985). Kiribati: A changing atoll culture. Suva, Fiji: University of the South Pacific.
- Grimble, A. F., & Maude, H. E. (Eds.). (1989). Tungaru traditions: Writings on the atoll culture of the Gilbert Islands. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
- Macdonald, B. (1982). Cinderellas of Empire: Toward a history of Kiribati and Tuvalu. Suva, Fiji: University of the South Pacific.
- Sabatier, E. (1977). Astride the equator: An account of the Gilbert Islands. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Von Daniken, E. (1982). Pathways to the gods: The stones of Kiribati. New York: Putnam.

KOREA, DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF (NORTH KOREA)

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK, North Korea) is located between China and South Korea and is one of the last communist states in the world. The state is operated by one party, the Korean Workers' Party. The governing ideology of the state is Juche-Sasang (the idea of self-reliance developed by Kim Il Sung). Owing to its severe centralized political regime and the eradication of religion in its history, it is believed that no religious groups remain in North Korea. Since 1988, however, North Korea has changed its religious policy and allowed religious groups to have their places and practices of worship. Even after this change of religious policy, there is no consensus of opinion on the existence of religion in North Korea: Some say the change is mere political propaganda to gain international economic support; others recognize the shift as an open door to a more fully actualized religious freedom in North Korea. This entry reviews the nation's establishment of religion and the changes in religious policy throughout its history; it also discusses the foundational national ideology, Juche-Sasang, that buttresses North Korean society, providing a worldview that includes the nation's view on religion.

Establishment of the Nation and the Change of Religious Policy

Even though Korea went through Japanese occupation from 1910 to 1945, it had been one nation until it was divided into North Korea and South Korea in 1945 at the Yalta Conference at the end of World War II. Under the agreement of the conference concerning the temporal trusteeship over Korea until a joint election of the northern and southern parts of Korea, North Korea was subject to the influence of the Soviet Union and South Korea to that of the United States. A joint election, however, did not take place, and North and South Korea established two different political regimes: North Korea established a communist regime called the Democratic People's Republic of Korea in 1948; South Korea founded a democratic regime named the Republic of Korea in the same year.

In the establishment and development of North Korea, religion played a politically significant role: There were times when religion or religious groups were used to help stabilize the regime; at other times, religion was the target of eradication efforts for the sake of the proletarian revolution in North Korea.

1945 to 1953

According to Chosun, the Central News Agency of North Korea, at the time of liberation from Japan, there were 1,500,000 followers of Cheondogyo, 375,000 Buddhists, 200,000 Protestants, and 57,000 Catholics in North Korea. Thus, almost 22% of the entire North Korean population were religious adherents at that time. To establish and stabilize its political power, the communist group in North Korea had to have the support of religious groups. Therefore, the communist group initiated religious organizations within the major religions: (a) the Cheong-woo Party in Cheondogyo, (b) the Chosun Buddhist league and three other Buddhist organizations, and (c) the Chosun Christian league. While the communist regime received political support from these centralized organizations, the regime persecuted other groups of religious believers who wanted to have a north-south unified government and did not agree with the establishment of the communist regime in North Korea. Clerics and religious leaders were arrested and executed, and religious sanctuaries were closed. The land owned by religious groups was forfeited. Citizens were required to carry an identification card that states one's religion, and as a result, discrimination followed in the workplace.

1953 to 1972

After the Korean War (1950–1953), religious persecution continued and became more severe as the government gained power and began to build a communist society. People of religious faith were considered reactionaries and anticommunists. Religious leaders were executed, and all adherents who did not recant were held in concentration camps, where harsh labor and brainwashing were enforced. Religious sanctuaries were converted to nurseries or classrooms. Religious symbols in buildings were removed. There was reregistration of citizens from 1966 to 1967, which made it possible to classify citizens into 51 subcategories, giving each group a rank: a follower of Cheondogyo was ranked at 32, a Christian at 37, a Buddhist at 38, a Catholic at 39, and a Confucianist at 40. Even though religious freedom was ensured under the constitution of North Korea, religious practice in reality was banished through this harsh eradication process.

1972 to the Present

Until the early 1970s, Kim Il Sung and other North Korean leaders claimed that there were no religious adherents in North Korea. From 1972, however, North Korea reactivated the centralized religious organizations that had been dormant for 20 years: (a) the Chosun Christian League, (b) the Chosun Buddhist league, and (c) the Chosun Cheondogyo Central Guidance Committee. Through these organizations, the North Koreans also sought to join international religious groups such as the World Council of Churches and the Christian Peace Conference. House churches were introduced and opened to international visitors and journalists. Religious scriptures and hymnals were published.

More changes in religious policies have come about since 1988. Under Article 68 of the 1992 constitution, which approves religious ceremonies and the construction of religious buildings, Bongsu Church and Jangchoong Cathedral were built in Pyongyang in 1988. Another Protestant Chilgol church and an Orthodox Jungbaik church were built in 1992 and 2006, respectively. Kim Il Sung University opened a religious department in 1989 for the first time in the nation's history. As these changes took place, the changing attitude toward religion was reflected in the way religion was described in both the Chosunmal Daesajeon (Unabridged Korean Dictionary) and the Chosun Daebaekwasajeon (Encyclopedia). Religion and superstition, which had been equated and criticized, were differentiated, and a neutral tone was adopted toward religion.

These enormous changes in religious policy do not necessarily mean that there is actual religious freedom in North Korea. Both the 1972 and 1992 constitutions contain specific clauses that can be used as a justification for the suppression of religious freedom: Antireligious propaganda was ensured in the 1972 constitution for guaranteeing the state's right to educate people about the negativity of religion; the 1992 constitution also clarifies that no one may use religion to attract foreign influences that would harm the social order. The religious freedom stated in the constitution is only about having religious buildings and ceremonies with the state's permission. Religious freedom can always be limited by the central authority to preserve the safety of the state, and religious practices in private are still prohibited. Testimonies of defectors from 2000 to 2008 support the contention that there is still no religious freedom in North Korea.

Juche-Sasang (The Idea of Self-Reliance) and Religion

Ever since Kim Il Sung promoted the idea of Juche (self-reliance) in a speech in 1955, Juche-Sasang has been established as the nation's governing ideology, emphasizing ideological and political independence, economic self-sustenance, and self-defense as a means of national defense. After 35 years of Japanese occupation and 3 years of the Korean War, the North Korean regime has held on to Juche—self-reliance in every aspect of the life of the nation and its people. For this reason, Juche-Sasang sustains North Korea's profound nationalism and is also deeply embedded in the nation's consciousness as the exclusive standard to scrutinize other ideologies and religions.

Juche-Sasang's views of religion have often been used as an instrument of foreign encroachment and as justification for capitalist exploitation. Juche-Sasang acrimoniously criticizes such religions as antirevolutionary and antinationalistic. Religion can only be condoned when it is used for a nationalistic goal such as the unification of Korea or for upholding state order.

There are several major religions in North Korea: (a) Cheondogyo, (b) Buddhism, (c) Christianity (Protestant and Catholic), (d) Confucianism, and (e) other indigenous religions. Shamanism is regarded as a superstition and is strictly prohibited. Among these religions, Christianity comes under the harshest criticism, since the government believes that it was used by Western imperialists to penetrate the Korean Peninsula. Juche-Sasang acknowledges the uncorrupt and populist nature of ancient Christianity and of Liberation Theology, which serves the needs of the people. However, it is against the belief in God and the afterlife, which weakens the communist goal of Juche-Sasang. Therefore, Christian evangelism in any form is strictly prohibited. Cheondogyo is an indigenous religion, meaning a "belief of the heavenly way." It asserts that God, the Lord of heaven, is in every person. Therefore, they cherish human rights and human equality. Due to the socialist and nationalist vision of Cheondogyo, Juche-Sasang positively assesses its religious values but does not exempt it from Juche criticism. Buddhism is also under criticism because it was used by the ruling classes during the feudal period. The artistic and architectural values of the Buddhist temples are more appreciated than the religion itself. And the maintenance of these national treasures is regarded as the major role of the Buddhist monks. Confucianism is regarded as philosophy rather than religion. Juche-Sasang finds valuable essence in Confucian teachings such as Samgangoryoon (the three bonds and the five moral rules in human relations), even though it criticizes its use during the feudal periods by the ruling classes.

Juche-Sasang does not acknowledge the need of any deity or belief systems other than Juche-Sasang in the lives of North Koreans. Juche-Sasang is proclaimed to fulfill all the defects of the existing religions and enables the actualization of the paradise of communist society in North Korea. Juche-Sasang is the superior religion: Those religions that collaborate with Juche-Sasang are excused; those that oppose it are prohibited.

JuneHee Yoon

See also Communism; Confucianism; Indigenous Religions; Korea, Republic of (South Korea); Liberation Theology; Mahayana Buddhism; Shamanism

Further Readings

- Belke, T. J. (1999). Juche: A Christian study of North Korea's state religion. Bartlesville, OK: Living Sacrifice. Center for North Korean Human Rights Studies. (2008). White paper on human rights in North Korea. Seoul, South Korea: Korea Institute for National Unification.
- Chosun Central News Agency. (1950). The Chosun Central Annual 1950. Pyongyang, North Korea: Author.
- Ha, J. P. (2003). Bukhanewi JonggyoMunwaha [Religious culture in North Korea]. Seoul, South Korea: SunIn.
- Kim, H. S., & Ryu, D. Y. (2002). Bukhan Jonggyoewi Seroun Ihae [Religion in North Korea: A new understanding]. Seoul, South Korea: Dasangeulbang.
- Ko, T.-W. (1988). Religion in North Korea. Seoul, South Korea: Institute of Korean Religions.
- Park, H. S. (2002). North Korea: The politics of unconventional wisdom. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.

KOREA, REPUBLIC OF (SOUTH KOREA)

The Republic of Korea is an East Asian country located in the southern part of the Korean Peninsula. To the north is the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (North Korea), which has been separated from South Korea since 1945. Its west coast meets the Yellow Sea, across which lies China; its landmass extends out from the Asian continent into the East Sea, toward Japan.

Korea has a long history, beginning with the legendary founder, Dangun, dating back to 2333 BCE, and continuing over several dynasties such as the Gojoseon, the Goguryeo, the Baekje, the Shilla, the Goryeo, and the Joseon. The modern Republic of Korea was established after its liberation from Japanese colonial rule (1910–1945) and founded as a Western-style democratic government. It has been recognized as one of the fastest developing countries in the world since the late 20th century. Its economic development has resulted from advanced technological successes in the areas of semiconductor devices, mobile phones, steel production, automobile manufacturing, shipbuilding, and other industries.

This entry reviews the historical development of religion in Korea and the unique dynamics of contemporary Korean religious life.

Historical Development of Korean Religion and Its Characteristics

In Korea, there have been many religions such as indigenous shamanism (Musok), folk religions, Buddhism, Confucianism, Daoism, Christianity (Protestantism and Catholicism), and new religions. The historical development of such Korean religions is quite separate from the secular and political histories of the dynasties. The “age of native belief systems,” reflecting mainly shamanistic patterns, was the first framework of Korean religion. Then, new religious transformations emerged through two cultural contacts: The first of these occurred when the Asian religions of Confucianism, Daoism, and Buddhism were introduced with the influx of Chinese culture in about first century BCE, and this began “the age of traditional religions,” transforming the existing primordial religious symbolism. The second contact was derived when Western Christianity was introduced with the influx of Western culture in the 19th century, and this brought about “the age of multireligions.” In other words, archetypal Korean religion can be said to have become cosmopolitan in a cross-cultural dimension that included religions of both the East and the West.

Although most Korean religious traditions have been imported from outside the Korean peninsula, it is important to note that these religions have included their own Korean peculiarities. For example, the phenomena of “possession” in Korean and Siberian shamanism are different. Siberian shamans generally use fire, undertaking “soul journeys,” but Korean shamans use bells and mirrors to cure illnesses and practice “stepping on sharp blades” (jakdutagi) to prove their spiritual powers. In the case of Confucianism, whereas the Confucian classics and rituals were imported from China, classical Confucian traditions such as “rituals in honor of Confucius’s birth” (Seokjeonje) are today better preserved in Korea than in China. Another example of Korean peculiarity is the symbol of “ten longevities” (sipjangsaeng) in Korean Daoism, which is not found in Chinese Daoism. Furthermore, the “Shrine of Mountain Gods” (sansingak) and the “Shrine of the Big Dipper” (chilseonggak) in Korean Buddhist temples, which uniquely demonstrate the syncretism between Buddhism and popular beliefs, are not found in China. Korean Catholicism has taken pride in its unparalleled history of mission that was first brought into Korea not by any Western missionary but by Koreans themselves from China. Also, Korean Protestantism has developed distinctive religious practices such as “dawn prayer meetings” (saebyeokgidohoe), “public scripture reading ritual” (sagyeonghoe), and “paying regular visits to members” (simbang).

However, it might be more important to understand that a Korean may hold multilayered religious beliefs simultaneously because “Korean religion” is essentially pluralistic, manifesting one’s inherent religiosity or religious mind through many different experiences. Confronted with life crises, for instance, a Korean may try to solve problems with concrete and practical methods (shamanistic approach), respect and follow a set of ideal virtues (the Confucian approach), or dismiss them as a mere illusion (Buddhist approach). Sometimes Koreans put up with the harsh realities of life by accepting them as temporary conditions of life with an eschatological vision (the Christian approach).

Today’s Religious Situation in Korea

According to the census carried out by the Korean National Statistical Office, in 2005, the population of the Republic of Korea was about 47 million and about 53% (almost 25 million) of the whole reported to have a religion. Considering the previous figures, the religious population has increased quite rapidly (31.4% during the 10 years from 1985, 10.5% during the 10 years from 1995) every 10 years. The distribution of the religious population is also worth noting: 10,726,463 (22.8%) were Buddhists, 8,616,438 (18.3%) were Protestants, 5,146,147 (10.9%) were Catholics, 129,907 were Won Buddhists, 104,575 (0.2%) were Confucians, and the other religious population was insignificantly small. Above all, the number of Christians (Protestants and Catholics) exceeded that of Buddhists. Similar tendencies have been noted in terms of religious organizations. According to a government report, there were 22,072 Buddhist temples, 60,785 Protestant churches, 2,386 Catholic cathedrals, 730 Confucian shrines, and 548 Won Buddhist temples. Alternatively, there were 41,362 Buddhist priests, 124,310 Protestant ministers, 13,704 Catholic priests, and 11,190 Won Buddhist priests in 2005.

The Korea World Mission Association reported that about 14,000 members of the Korean Protestant missionaries were delegated to more than 170 foreign countries in 2005. It was only 120 years ago that Protestantism was transmitted to Korea. Now, however, the Yoido Full Gospel Church, the biggest Pentecostal church in the world, with 800,000 members, is located in Seoul. Catholicism was transmitted to Korea about 220 years ago and was severely persecuted in earlier times; today, it is widely practiced, and the number of Catholics in Korea has increased by no less than 74% during the past decade (1995–2005). The pope visited Korea twice in 1984 and held a Mass to canonize 103 martyrs all at once. Korea has become one of the most influential countries in the world of Catholicism.

On the other hand, Buddhism remained limited in its effort to revive the religious life of lay Buddhists, ever since it was restricted to remote mountain temples during the Confucianism-dominated Joseon Dynasty. However, the chances of growth increased in the 1980s as Buddhist broadcasting stations became more numerous and “urban Buddhist missionary centers” started to emerge. Although very few people identify themselves as Confucians, large numbers of people return home to visit their ancestral graves or hold Confucian memorial services for ancestors during folk holidays such as the Lunar New Year or the Full Moon Harvest Day. Arguably, Confucianism is still influential in the daily life of the Korean people. There are also many shamanistic shrines, where shamans worship images of the General Spirit and Child Spirit placed on both sides of the Buddha and use the Buddhist emblem as their insignia. Most daily newspapers have sections of fortune tellers’ predictions for the day, and fate consulting through the telephone or the Internet has become a big business. Some new religions such as the Unification Church or Daesoonjinrihoe, currently the representative order of Jeungsangyo, have become powerful in terms of the physical size of their headquarters and the numbers who participate in their religious activities. In addition, the real “felt effect” of new religions in Korea is greater when seen from the outside, because they are often reported through the media despite the small number of their members.

Because various religions are coexisting, inter-religious conflicts have been often reported in contemporary Korean society. There are Protestants who cut off the heads of traditional Korean “totem” poles (Jangseung), which have long been the symbols of tutelary deities of towns. There have been conflicts between new folk religions supporting the construction of sanctuaries dedicated to the legendary founder of Korea, Dangun, and Protestant groups objecting to it. There have also been cases of fanatical Protestants damaging statues of the Buddha with axes or drawing the sign of the cross on the foreheads of the statues.

In this context, it might be said that Korea, hidden away as a country of “morning calm,” has changed into a country of religious fervor since the beginning of the modern period. In particular, Koreans have come to experience a strong religious innovation unprecedented in any other country, as the country witnesses the clash of traditional religions with the completely alien, but powerful, Western Christianity.

Chongsuh Kim

See also China; Clash of Civilizations Thesis; Japan; Korea, Democratic People’s Republic of (North Korea); Pluralism; Religious Dialogue; Syncretism

Further Readings

- Grayson, J. H. (1989). Korea: A religious history. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Kim, C. (Ed.). (1993). Reader in Korean religion. Gyeonggi Do, South Korea: Academy of Korean Studies.
- Kim, C. (2006). Seoyangin ui Hanguk Jonggyo Yeongu [Westerners’ studies of Korean religion]. Seoul, South Korea: Seoul National University Press.
- Lee, P. H. (Ed.). (1993–1996). Sourcebook of Korean civilization (2 vols.). New York: Columbia University Press.
- Vos, F. (1977). Die religionen Koreas [The Korean religions]. Stuttgart, Germany: Kohlhammer.

KOSOVO

Kosovo refers to the region in the central Balkans situated southwest of Serbia, north of Macedonia, and west of Albania. Kosovo declared independence from Serbia in 2008, where it was previously an autonomous province in the Serbian federation. It has been largely recognized internationally as an independent state, with Serbia and its ally Russia dissenting. Ethnically, Kosovo has traditionally been occupied by Albanians, Serbs, and Roma people, but in the past two centuries it has consisted of an overwhelming majority of Albanians.

The relationship between the Serbs and Albanians has been decidedly contentious over their respective histories. In 1999, Yugoslavian President Slobodan Milošević launched an assault to remove the threat of the Kosovo Liberation Army and to restore the Serbian “heartland” by cleansing the area of its non-Serbian residents. The Serbian police and military forces were resisted by the Kosovo Liberation Army, which equally sought to drive out Serbian citizens from the province’s borders (especially the recent Serbian immigrants from the Krajina region of Croatia). Atrocities were extensive, numbering around 11,000 by U.S. State Department estimates (10,000 by Serbs, 1,000 by Albanians), with almost 4,000 persons missing by Red Cross estimates in the year 2000. NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization) sought to end the violence by launching a bombing campaign on Serbian targets from March 24 through June 11, 1999. The bombing, coupled with Milošević's resurrected indictment at The Hague, effectively ended the conflict. The region was subsequently administered by the United Nations and NATO until 2008, when Kosovo declared independence.

In Kosovo, ethnic and religious identities have been forged in the fires of competition for power and legitimacy. Albanians in Kosovo are almost entirely Sunnī Muslim, and Serbs are almost entirely Serbian Orthodox. Serbians revere Kosovo for specifically religious reasons. Kosovo was the area of the founding of the Serbian Orthodox Church; many of the most important monasteries and shrines in the Serbian Orthodoxy are in Kosovo. For Albanians, the significance of Kosovo is strictly as a traditional place of habitation. Albanians are one of the most ancient ethnic groups on the Balkan Peninsula, tracing their heritage to the ancient Illyrians. Serbs revere Kosovo not only for its religious importance but also as the birthplace of the Serbian state. Serbs trace a majority presence in this city from the 9th century until the 14th century. Considerable amounts of money have been spent, and a floodtide of publications issued, in an effort to prove the residential legitimacy of both groups, usually in service to the deep ethnic mythology surrounding Kosovo. There are several things, however, that are generally agreed on by more neutral scholars. First, the basic ethnic makeup of Serbs and Albanians has been in place since the seventh century CE, when the arrival of the Slavs from the north established the structure we see now. Second, after the battle of Kosovo in 1389, many Serbs abandoned the area of Kosovo for refuge beyond the grasp of the encroaching Ottoman power. Third, the Ottomans encouraged immigration to Kosovo by Albanian Muslims to supplant the indigenous population as a reward for adherence to Islam. And finally, the nationalist revival of the 19th century reignited concern over the ethnic makeup of Kosovo, which led in turn to many of the conflicts of the 20th and 21st centuries.

Christopher M. B. Allison

See also Albania; Macedonia; Serbia; Yugoslavia

Further Readings

- Judah, T. (2002). Kosovo: War and revenge. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Vickers, M. (1998). Between Serb and Albanian: A history of Kosovo. London: Hurst.

KUMBHA MELA

The Hindu festival, Kumbha Mela, which occurs every 12 years primarily at the confluence of the Ganges and Jumna rivers in North India, attracts millions of pilgrims to the site, which is regarded as the largest regular gathering of humans for any reason anywhere in the world. Religious melas, or festivals, are a fundamental part of every major religious tradition, and arguably, no other religion celebrates more festivals than does Hinduism. From the small village mela to large national events, melas are an integral part of the lives of Hindus. Of all the melas that occur in India, the largest by far is the Kumbha Mela.

Origins

Hindu Puranic literature tells of a time when, early in the current cycle of ages, the demonic forces in the spirit world, known as asuras, had grown in might, while that of the spirits of good, known as devatas, had greatly waned. Vishnu, the preserving aspect of the Divine in Hinduism, informed the devatas that they could regain power and attain various precious treasures in the process by churning the divine ocean of milk. Most important of these treasures was amrita, the nectar of immortality. However, because of their weakened state, the devatas would need to secure the assistance of the asuras to accomplish the feat. This they did by promising the demons a share of the amrita, a promise they did not intend to keep. The great Mount Mandara was put into the ocean of milk to serve as a churning rod, while a giant serpent named Vasuki was wrapped around the mountain and used as the churning rope, with the devatas and the asuras each holding one end of the serpent. As the churning began, various items emerged from the ocean, including a wish-yielding cow, a sacred white elephant, jewels, apsaras (divine dancing girls), wisdom, and also deadly poison.

However, the one item that both groups sought the most to obtain was the amrita.

When the nectar finally came forth in a kumbha, or pitcher, an asura immediately grabbed it and was about to take a drink when Vishnu, disguised as an attractive young female, seduced the demon into giving up the container. As soon as he did so, one of the devatas, Jayanta, grabbed the pitcher and fled, with the demons in hot pursuit. During the chase through the three worlds, the nether realms, earth, and the heavens, Jayanta stopped at several places to rest, four of these on earth. Each time he set the kumbha down, a few drops of nectar spilled, thereby sanctifying four places: Prayag, Haridwar, Nasik, and Ujjain. Jayanta was pursued for 12 days before he was able to escape the asuras and give the devatas final possession of the nectar for themselves. Since it is the Hindu belief that 1 day of the devatas is equal to 1 human year, the Kumbha Mela takes place every 12 years to celebrate the spilling of the nectar on earth.

The Mela, Past and Present

The earliest historical account of the Kumbha Mela comes from Hiuen-Tsang, a Chinese Buddhist pilgrim who visited India in the seventh century. He describes a month-long event that occurred on a 5-year cycle that was attended and financed by King Harshavardhan. At that mela, an estimated half a million people participated, including countless ascetics and mendicants and people of other religious faiths. Over the centuries, participation by members of the various ascetic and monastic orders has become an integral and pivotal part of the festival. The presence of fighting mendicant orders is also mentioned in later medieval accounts, and their development may have been in reaction to Muslim rulers of the time and their harsh and often brutal treatment of Hindus. Periodic reference to the mela over the centuries suggests that it has continued throughout its history to be a consistently important gathering for Hindu commoners, ascetics, and religious teachers.

Although four locations are mentioned in the mythology of the mela, early historical accounts of its occurrence refer only to Prayag and Haridwar. Today, however, each of the four sites has its own version of the Kumbha Mela and its own 12-year cycle. As a consequence, the festival rotates among the places every 3 years. All of the melas occur on the banks of sacred rivers, and the main ritual performed is bathing in the waters at those pilgrimage sites, for it is believed that at a certain astrologically determined moment during each Kumbha Mela, the nectar of immortality reappears in the waters. Because of the size and popularity of the festivals at Prayag and Haridwar, each of these also hosts a “half-mela” (Ardha Kumbha Mela) in the intervening 6th year. By far, the most popular of the four sites is Prayag. During the most recent Kumbha Mela there, held in 2001, an estimated 15–25 million people attended on or near the new moon, which is the main bathing day. Over the period of the entire month, festival officials estimated the overall attendance of more than 70 million people. By comparison, the 1998 festival at Haridwar attracted between 7 and 10 million, while the 2004 mela at Nasik was attended by no more than a few million. The one at Ujjain is even smaller.

Participants

Pilgrims from all over India attend the Kumbha Mela. The vast majority of participants come from two groups: ascetics and rural householders. At the larger festivals, there is also an increasing presence of pilgrims from neighboring countries such as Nepal, Bangladesh, and Sri Lanka, as well as sightseers, photographers, and journalists from all over the world. The householders who attend may do so in the hope of having prayers fulfilled, as part of a religious vow that was taken, because of the desire to visit and bathe in the sacred Ganges (both Haridwar and Prayag are on her banks), to deposit the ashes of a deceased family member in the sacred waters, or with the goal of finding and receiving religious instructions from a guru. Their daily activities may include ritual baths and purifications, praying and chanting, performing a variety of other rituals, and wandering around the mela to get darshan (holy vision) of the various ascetics and religious teachers who have set up camps. Although the vast majority of pilgrims who visit the melas do so only for a few days during the month, several hundred thousand who attend the festival at Prayag take a vow to leave behind their worldly lives and homes and remain at the mela for an entire month. They set up makeshift homes in tents, temporary sheds, lean-tos, or even under trees. Known as kalpavasis, such individuals are seen as the mainstay of the festival, and many of the ritual activities, talks, and other events that occur are for their benefit.

The Kumbha Melas are important to the lives of ascetics as well. Because many of them live relatively secluded or solitary lives, they often do not have much regular contact with householders or most other members of their own renunciant orders. Thus, festivals, especially the Kumbha Melas, are a time when many such orders come together, hold organizational meetings, make decisions regarding important issues that have arisen, and so forth. Ascetics also have the opportunity to interact with large numbers of householders who are interested in meeting and/or receiving teachings from renunciant gurus. Some of these may be householder disciples who only ever see their gurus at such festivals.

With the rapid increase of urbanization and Westernization that is occurring in India, many have suggested that religious belief and participation are waning. However, attendance at melas all over India is on the increase, and this is surely the case with respect to the Kumbha Mela. Many who attend feel that in the increasingly urbanized and secularized Indian society, festivals such as the Kumbha provide them a needed respite from the material world and an opportunity to focus on their religious lives and practices. Such melas also offer them the opportunity to participate in an ancient expression of their religious tradition and culture.

Ramdas Lamb

See also Hinduism; India; Pilgrimage

Further Readings

- Beal, S. (Trans.). (1911). Travels of Hiuen Tsiang. London: Kegan Paul.
- Darian, S. G. (1978). The Ganges in myth and history. Honolulu: University Press of Hawai'i.
- Hebner, J., & Osborn, D. (1991). Kumbha Mela: The world's largest act of faith. San Rafael, CA: Mandala.

- Lamb, R. (1999). The Magh Mela: Prayag's "other" holy festival. Journal of Vaishnava Studies, 7(2), 195–206.
- Roy, D. K., & Devi, I. (1955). Kumbha: India's ageless festival. Bombay, India: Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan.
- Singh, R. (1980). Kumbha Mela. Hong Kong: Perennial Press.

KÜNG, HANS (B. 1928)

Hans Küng is a Swiss theologian and Roman Catholic priest and the author of numerous books on Christianity, world religions, and global ethics. He was a professor in the Catholic faculty at the University of Tübingen from 1960 until 1979, when his license to teach Catholic theology was rescinded by the Vatican. He continued as professor of Ecumenical Theology and director of the Institute for Ecumenical Research at the University of Tübingen until his retirement in 1996. He is currently the president of the Global Ethics Foundation, which seeks to contribute to global peace by encouraging the religions of the world to recognize and reflect on the ethical values that they share in common.

Küng received his licentiate in theology from the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome, and he then completed his doctorate in theology at the Institut Catholique in Paris, where he was encouraged to write a dissertation on the theology of the Protestant theologian Karl Barth. The dissertation, published in English as Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection, set the direction of his career. Three theological themes, identified by Hermann Häring and repeated by Küng in his memoirs, emerged in this early work and continue to characterize his theology: (1) an interest in promoting dialogue, (2) breaking through barriers, and (3) effecting reconciliation and peace between confessions, religions, and believers and nonbelievers.

His early theological writings were framed with an eye toward healing the divisions between Catholics and Protestants. Appointed at Tübingen just prior to the Second Vatican Council, he published two works (The Council and Reunion [1960] and Structures of the Church [1962]) intended to encourage the Council toward greater Christian unity. As a theological consultant (peritus) at the Second Vatican Council, Küng consistently advocated for great attention to historical critical scholarship, which he viewed as a means of breaking through long-standing barriers between confessions. His work on justification, published in 1957, laid the foundation for the Malta Report, issued in 1973 by the Lutheran World Federation and the Roman Catholic Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, which came to a common understanding of the doctrine of justification that had originally precipitated the 16th-century split between Protestants and Catholics.

His difficulties with the Vatican enlarged his horizons beyond Christian theology, leading to studies of other traditions (Judaism [1991], Tracing the Way [1999], Islam [2004]) alongside Christianity (Christianity [1994], The Catholic Church [2001]). In his pioneering work, Global Responsibility (1990), he argued that the religions of the world as well as those who profess no religion could make a contribution to the peace of humankind by building a consensus on common values and standards. His ideas led to the drafting of a “Declaration Toward a Global Ethic,” which was endorsed by the Parliament of the World’s Religions in Chicago in 1993, and the establishment of the Global Ethic Foundation. In 2001, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan appointed him to a committee of 20 “eminent persons” invited to speak to the UN General Assembly during the “International Year of the Dialogue Among Civilizations.”

Ann Taves

See also Ethics; Religious Dialogue; Roman Catholicism; Vatican Council, Second

Further Readings

- Häring, H. (1998). Hans Küng: Breaking through. New York: Continuum.
- Küng, H. (1991). Global responsibility: In search of a new world ethic. New York: Crossroad.
- Küng, H. (1997). A global ethic for global politics and economics. London: SCM.
- Küng, H. (2003). My struggle for freedom: Memoirs. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.

KURDISTAN

Kurdistan is literally the “land of the Kurds,” a territory without an official state that is usually described as being located in southeastern Turkey, northern Iraq, western Iran, and northeastern Syria, along with smaller swathes of territory in Azerbaijan and Armenia. The majority of the terrain is characterized by the steep plateaus and austere mountains of the Zagros and eastern Taurus Mountains. The actual territories that constitute Kurdistan have fluctuated over centuries, contracting and expanding in response to pressures from outside powers, including the Persians, the Arabs, and the Ottomans. The designation Kurdistan was first introduced by the Seljuks in the 12th century as a geographical term. Today, Kurdistan is the self-proclaimed nation-state of the Kurds, although not a recognized sovereign entity.

The Kurds are the descendants of various Indo-European tribes that migrated to the region as early as the second millennium BCE and eventually mixed with nomadic Semitic, Arab, Turkic, Persian, and native tribes. Their language belongs to the Iranian branch of the Indo-European language family. There is no single, unified Kurdish dialect, with Kurmanji generally spoken in northern Kurdistan and Sorani spoken in southern Kurdistan. Within the two dialects, there is further subdivision into various, lesser spoken Kurdish dialects.

Current Kurdish population estimates vary due to state attempts at suppressing Kurdish nationalism and possible exaggeration of such numbers by nationalist-leaning intellectuals. A common estimate, however, is that there are approximately 25 million Kurds in the Middle East, with approximately 13 million in Turkey, 7 million in Iraq, 6 million in Iran, and 2 million in Syria. There is also a sizable Kurdish diaspora in the West.

The Kurdish people are divided along numerous clan and tribal lines, though most adhere to a common religion—that of Sunnī Islam. A small percentage are Shi’ite, while an even smaller number are members of other faiths, including Christianity.

The introduction of Islam into tribal Kurdish society in the 13th century further diversified and complicated tribal relations while also merging with the common practices of the time to produce a hybrid society based on tribalism and Islam.

Sufism, a form of Sunnī mystical Islam, was first introduced into Kurdistan in the 14th century in the form of the Qadiri order. Sufism denied materialism and was against the complex, rigid religious teachings of the time. Followers of the Qadiri order stressed piety and demonstrated the power of religion through self-mutilation and ecstatic trances. Another order of Sufism, that of the Naqshbandiya order, began to enjoy increasing popularity beginning around 1811, though it had already by that time established a presence in the region. Followers of the Naqshbandiya order believed in piety as best expressed through social activity and meditation.

Coinciding with the decline of the Ottoman Empire, Sufism as expressed by the Naqshbandiya order began to play a vital role in the proliferation of nationalist ideas, but it was the disintegration of the Ottoman Empire that provided the conditions for religion to be the primary means of early nationalist expressions among Kurds. It was this movement that evolved into the contemporary Kurdish nationalist movement, which has counted among its leaders notable figures such as Mullah Mustafa Barzani and Jalal Talibani.

Christopher Marsh

See also Azerbaijan; Iraq; Politics and Religion; Turkey

Further Readings

- McDowall, D. (2004). A modern history of the Kurds (3rd ed.). London: I. B. Tauris.
- Van Bruinessen, M. (1992). Aga, shaikh, and state: The social and political structures of Kurdistan. London: Zed Books.

KUWAIT

Kuwait is a small Arab country located in the northeastern part of the Arabian Peninsula, between Iraq, Saudi Arabia, and the Persian Gulf. It is a constitutional monarchy and one of the richest countries in the world, due to its huge oil reserves.

The overwhelming majority of the population—roughly 1 million citizens—is Muslim. The majority of them are Sunnī, while 15%–30% of the population are Shi'a.

Beside the local citizens, Kuwait hosts an important community of immigrants—around 2.4 million, which is to say more than twice the indigenous population! The large majority of them come from Asia—Pakistan, India, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, Philippines—while many Arab and European expatriates also work there. Most of these immigrants are Muslims, though the Christians—among the Europeans and the Philippine workers, for instance—are numerous too. Hindus and adherents of other religions—Baha'is, Buddhists, Sikhs, and others—are also present among the Asian immigrants. In theory, non-Muslims enjoy freedom of belief, and they can practice their own religions; the country hosts several Christian churches, a Roman Catholic cathedral, and other places of worship. In practice, some cases of religious discrimination have been reported by external observers, including against the indigenous Shi'a minority, who, for instance, have encountered problems in the construction of new mosques.

Specific initiatives have been undertaken for Muslim immigrants as well as for non-Muslims who would like to convert to Islam: for instance, the use of various target languages such as English, Urdu, Tamil, Tagalog, Malayalam, or Telugu in religious books, courses, and even Friday sermons.

Though Kuwait has a parliamentary system, religion plays an important role in the political life of the country. The constitution states that the religion of the state is Islam and that the Shari'a, the Islamic law, is the main source of legislation. Many political parties are related to religious opinions: The Islamic Constitutional movement and the Islamic Salafi Alliance target the Sunnī citizens, while the national Islamic Alliance and the Justice and Peace Alliance are considered to be Shi'a parties.

Islam also plays an important role in the economy, since business, banking, and insurance must be practiced according to the Shari'a, which prohibits, for instance, the charging of interest on money lent.

Along with Saudi Arabia and Libya, Kuwait is a major actor in Islamic proselytism (da'wah) all over the world, through institutions and Islamic nongovernmental organizations such as the African Muslim Agency (AMA), by funding various development projects and by the building and restoration of mosques, by the distribution of Ramadan meals, and so on.

Xavier Luffin

See also Iraq; Islam; Saudi Arabia; Shi'a Islam; Sunnī Islam

Further Readings

- Abdullah Al-Mdaires, F. (2010). Extremism in Kuwait: From the Muslim Brotherhood to al-Qaeda and other Islamic political groups (Durham Modern Middle East and Islamic World Series). London: Routledge.
- Rizzo, H. M. (2008). Islam, democracy and the status of women: The case of Kuwait (Middle East Studies: History, Politics and Law). London: Routledge.

KYRGYZSTAN

Kyrgyzstan is a predominantly mountainous central Asian country bordered by Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and China. Two thirds of the 5.5 million population are ethnic Kyrgyz, with Uzbeks and Russians constituting the largest ethnic minorities; more than three quarters of the population identify with Sunnī Islam of the Hanafi school. After independence was declared in 1991, much of the sizable Russian population emigrated; the remaining Russians concentrate in the cities and identify with Russian Orthodox Christianity. Uzbeks constitute the largest ethnic minority and live primarily in the southern part of the country, along the Uzbek border in the fertile Fergana Valley.

The Kyrgyz are associated with a nomadic past—where seasonal migrations link sacred places (mazars) with ancestors and Islam—that remains an active part of the contemporary imagination. While Kyrgyz traders and merchants have interacted with the Islamic world since the 10th century, conversions to Islam continued until the 18th century. Despite identification with Islam, cultural customs remained more influential in regulating social behavior than Shari'a.

Annexed to Russia in 1876, Kyrgyzstan became a Soviet Socialist Republic in 1936. The Soviet experience significantly affected Kyrgyz culture through forced collectivization, mandatory education, and the creation of a new Kyrgyz political elite. Religion was institutionalized, regulated, and discouraged, and in turn, it became increasingly privatized and relegated to tradition. Religious expression became associated more with traditional life cycle rituals rather than with religion itself. Nonetheless, Islam continued to be a relevant aspect of Kyrgyz life, increasingly used as an aspect of culture that distinguished central Asians from Russians and other non-central Asian ethnic groups.

Since Kyrgyzstan gained its independence, Islam has been promoted as an aspect of Kyrgyz national identity, and in some instances, this has been contested by differing visions of what constitutes proper Islamic practice. With Islamic groups from abroad—such as Tablighi Jama'at, Hizb ut-Tahrir al-Islami, and followers of M. Fettulah Güllen—encouraging different paths for the religious life, there has arisen both a revitalized traditionalist movement advocating a more orthopraxic understanding of Islam, which has a knowledge base centered on the Arabian peninsula, and a smaller, re-culturalist movement privileging Kyrgyz culture and the role of ancestors and mazars, which fosters a locally relevant interpretation of Islam. Also, since independence, there has been a rise of Protestant missionary activity, resulting in not only an increase of religious diversity but also creating tensions and bringing together the Russian Orthodox and the Kyrgyz Muslims who see these missionaries as threats to the unwritten agreement that Russians belong to Orthodoxy and central Asians belong to Islam. These dynamics of religious diversity and multiple interpretations of religious practice challenge the emergence of religion in the public sphere.

David W. Montgomery

See also China; Islam; Kazakhstan; Russian Federation; Tajikistan; Uzbekistan

Further Readings

- Aitpaeva, G., Egemberdieva, A., & Toktogulova, M. (Eds.). (2007). Mazar worship in Kyrgyzstan: Rituals and practitioners in Talas. Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan: Aigine Research Center.
- Khalid, A. (2007). Islam after communism: Religion and politics in Central Asia. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Sahadeo, J., & Zanca, R. (Eds.). (2007). Everyday life in Central Asia: Past and present. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

LA LUZ DEL MUNDO CHURCH

La Luz del Mundo Church (The Light of the World Church) does not belong to any mainstream Christian church; instead, it is a minority religious movement that has become a global church that claims to be “the restoration of the primitive Christian church of Jesus Christ” in modern times. Its international headquarters are located in the city of Guadalajara, Jalisco, Mexico, which means it is to be found at the very heart of the most traditional Catholic region of the country. Catholicism has acted as a powerful political force within the region since colonial times, until quite recently.

A large number of studies done on Mexican migration and religion at the end of the 20th century and the beginning of the 21st century have been based on rural communities where most of the inhabitants practice popular Catholicism. For instance, the return of immigrants who attend the fiesta del Santo Patrono every year in their communities of origin has been widely explored. Most people probably still associate Mexican immigrants with Catholicism. However, from the 1980s onward, even in Mexico, the religious scenario has been transformed. Though Catholics are still the largest contingent of believers, accounting for 89% of the total population, they are not distributed evenly across the country. In the southern states, about 30% of the people claim to belong to a Christian religion other than Catholicism, and some northern states follow a similar pattern, whereas in the western and central regions of the country, most states have the lowest percentages of non-Catholics (less than 2%). Therefore, today, the religious map of the country portrays a mosaic of beliefs and practices, which can travel fast and freely across the Mexican-U.S. border just as the flow of capital and consumer goods.

Origin and Doctrine of La Luz del Mundo

One of the Christian faiths shaping the new sacred mosaic in Mexico is La Luz del Mundo Church. At present, it is the second largest religious body after the Roman Catholic Church, with approximately 1.5 million adherents. It has grown worldwide, accounting for at least 5 million believers. Its international headquarters is in the Hermosa Provincia (Beautiful Province), situated in the far east of the city of Guadalajara. Members from Latin American countries and mostly from the United States return every August to attend the Santa Cena (Holy Supper) at Hermosa Provincia, in the same way as thousands of Catholics return to their towns to attend the rituals of their Santo Patron (patron saint).

Aaron Joaquin Gonzalez, a man of peasant origin, founded the church in the late 1920s. After the Revolution (1910–1920), and during the Great Depression, many poor Mexican migrants left the United States and returned to Mexico. Gonzalez recruited his first followers from among such poor displaced people. The rise of the Luz del Mundo movement also coincided with the revival of Pentecostalism in the United States (1920s–1930s), which in turn was exported to Mexico via the returning migrants. Gonzalez died in 1964, and his son, Samuel Joaquin Flores, succeeded him as head of the church.

The Luz del Mundo doctrine is a combination of Pentecostal theology and regional Catholic culture. The church has also appropriated some symbols from the Jewish tradition; members see themselves as the “chosen people,” and outsiders are called Gentiles. According to the Luz del Mundo theology, God elected the apostles Aaron Gonzalez and Samuel Flores to keep His church alive in the modern world. Followers believe that Jesus was a prophet and savior, but they do not consider him God. The highest authority of the religious community is embedded in the dual nature of Samuel Flores: Within the sacred sphere, he is called The Apostle, and in the secular sphere, the International President of the Luz del Mundo Church. Women are excluded from priesthood, which is composed of bishops, pastors, deacons, and encargados (persons in charge of congregations), all of whom are anointed in a special ceremony. While the subordination of women in the church does not differ greatly from the position that the system of male domination has assigned them in Latin American societies as a whole, the doctrine of La Luz del Mundo Church provides a religious framework that legitimizes subordination. Even so, many educated women in the Luz del Mundo have become the main cultural brokers between their church and “the world.”

La Luz del Mundo in the United States

The founder, Aaron Gonzalez, initiated missionary work beyond Mexico’s borders around the mid-1950s, when he visited Los Angeles. In the early 1960s, he also traveled to San Antonio, Texas, to evangelize. The geographical proximity between Jalisco and Texas can only partly explain this choice; we must also remember that migration of Mexicans from the western states to the United States had been a traditional pattern since the 19th century. Religion followed the stream of migrants.

To spread the doctrine to foreign countries, the church takes advantage of members living outside Mexico, and automatically those believers become missionaries wherever they are, as has happened not only in the United States but also in countries such as Great Britain, Spain, France, Italy, Australia, and many others. Today, La Luz del Mundo Church has open congregations and missions in at least 19 states and in Washington, D.C. The states of California and Texas not only have the highest rate of Mexican immigrants but also the highest number of Luz del Mundo believers. California has at least 30 congregations plus their missions, whereas Texas has 19 congregations plus their corresponding missions. According to official sources, there are around 75 established congregations as well as some 150 missions. Altogether, these numbers give us a conservative estimate of almost 50,000 believers in the United States.

In the U.S. context, this community functions as an “ethnic church” since it is composed of mainly Mexican mestizos, émigrés, and a very small percentage of Central American people (from El Salvador). It plays the role of an ethnic enclave as it encourages the believers to speak, read, and sing in their native language, Spanish, thus reinforcing national and transnational cultural ties. Through its multiple activities, such as the daily religious services, gatherings, and above all the annual Santa Cena (Holy Supper) at Hermosa Provincia, the church provides the ideal social space for second-generation migrants to both maintain and improve their native language. This is possible to some extent thanks to the ministers or spiritual leaders, all of whom are of Mexican or at least of Latin American origin.

A Mexican Diaspora

The discourse of diaspora has become the voice of “displaced peoples who feel (maintain, revive, invent) a connection with a prior home” (Clifford, 1994, p. 310). Luz del Mundo migrant believers claim the right to return to a “mythical homeland,” represented by Hermosa Provincia. They share a history of dispersal and can be alienated as well from the social and economic advantages in the receiving country. The church gives them the opportunity to construct an identity group that transcends national or regional identities; it provides its followers a discourse of a shared history, memory, longing, dreams, and meaningful narratives, and a place to return, a place where everybody can feel at home. The U.S. congregations are connected at multiple levels as well as with other congregations located in Mexico, El Salvador, Costa Rica, Colombia, Spain, and many more. Luz del Mundo migrant believers are loyal to and identify with not only members in their sending country but also comembers located in these other countries. With its utopian discourse, the Luz del Mundo religion succeeds in unifying dispersed populations and social minorities from diverse parts of the world into one religious community, whose members see themselves as the “chosen people” who have been redeemed in modern times through their two apostles.

Patricia Fortuny-Loret de Mola

See also Evangelical Movements; Mexico; Pentecostal Movements

Further Readings

- Clifford, J. (1994). Diasporas. Cultural Anthropology, 9, 302–338.
- Fortuny, P. (1995a). On the road to Damascus: Pentecostals, Mormons, and Jehovah's Witnesses in Mexico. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, University College London, London.
- Fortuny, P. (1995b). Origins, development and perspectives of La Luz del Mundo Church. Religion, 25, 147–162.
- Fortuny, P. (2002). The Santa Cena of the Luz del Mundo Church: A case of contemporary transnationalism. In H. R. Ebaugh & J. Chafetz (Eds.), Religion across borders: Transnational religious networks (pp. 15–50). Walnut Creek, CA: Altamira Press.

LAICIZATION

Laicization is a recent term practically unknown in the English language and commonly used in Latin countries roughly as a synonym of the concept of “secularization.” However, even though its semantic contents and history are diverse, it can be said that both the terms are related in many ways. While secularization has to do with social differentiation, worldliness, privatization of religion, and reconfiguration of beliefs, laicization concerns the process of separation of religion from public affairs to protect freedom of conscience beyond everyone’s particular beliefs. In short, it could be said that laicization is the secularization of the state and, in certain ways, of cultural, scientific, and educational institutions insofar as the state extends to those realms.

The term laicization comes from the word lay originating in the Greek laikós, which means “of the people.” It was originally used in reference to the common faithful Christians, not members of the clergy. It was not until the second part of the 19th century that the term lay (laïque in French, laico in Spanish) began to describe the person, sphere, or activity different, detached, or autonomous from the religious. Until that moment, even in Latin countries such as France, Italy, and Spain, the word used for that purpose was secularization. For example, the secularization of the cemeteries removed the control of burials from the church and placed it in the hands of civil government.

The use of the word lay and its derived words (laicity, laicization), in the sense of the secularization of political institutions, took place in the context of the Latin continental European countries and in other latitudes such as Canada, Latin America, and the Caribbean. Due to the hegemonic presence of the Catholic Church in those countries and its reluctance in the 19th century to accept the principle of separation and the loss of influence in public affairs, the laicization of the state became a political combat of anticlerical content. This was called laicism. Although this conflict decreased in intensity in the past century, due to different stances concerning the role of the churches in the shaping of legislation and public affairs, the question still has an impact on the political debate as well as on the understanding and definition of the concepts of lay, laicity, laicism, and laicization.

The process of laicization of the state, which began with the religious wars of the 16th century, intensified in the second part of the 19th century with the establishment of the free, public, and nonreligious school. In France, the école laïque developed in the Third Republic. In 1871, after a decision concerning the establishment of nonreligious or confessional public education, the French created the neologism laicity (laïcité), which began to be used as a synonym of secularity—for example, the laicity of education, meaning the establishment of a public school without religious instruction, or the laicity of the state, meaning the creation of legislation and public policies based on secular arguments, not on religious bases.

In sum, it can be said that the term laicization is mainly used in the context of Latin countries and applied mainly to the domain of the state, although it was extended to other areas, such as education or medicine, that were previously controlled or were in the hands of religious institutions and, being institutionalized under the influence of the state, became a sphere autonomous from religion. For the same reason, the experience of laicization of the public sphere goes beyond Latin countries and can be applied to other cultural areas.

In the past few years, several scholars have tried to define laicity detached from its Western or Christian origins and from its French definition or use in other Latin countries, where the hegemonic presence of the Catholic Church and its continuous political influence has marked recent public debates. Laicity, from this perspective, has three central elements:

1. Respect for the freedom of conscience
2. Autonomy of politics before religion
3. Nondiscrimination and equality for all

In fact, it can be said that the laicization process of the state began when the need to protect the individual conscience against any intrusion coming from either religious or civil institutions became clear. The so-called privatization of religion, often related to the secularization process, became the mechanism used to protect the individual conscience, formally “separating” the private and the public, confining religion to the individual conscience, where nobody could interfere, and leaving politics for the public interest, beyond personal beliefs. Although absolute separation does not exist in reality, a formal distinction of politics and religion, of public and private, and of the state from the church became then a way to protect freedom of conscience (and other freedoms, including religious freedom) and a key value of liberalism. It was not until the 20th century that the social role of religion was enhanced, questioning, although not eliminating, the former distinction that secluded religion to the individual sphere.

The expression of the “autonomy of politics before religion” allows scholars to go beyond the idea of separation as a key element of laicity and a measure for laicization. Because the term laicity was coined by the Third Republic, for many years, the French experience was taken as the model and even as a singular example of this social phenomenon. But this broad definition, which focuses on the autonomy of the state more than on its formal separation from religion, leads to the understanding that there are many forms of laicity (and therefore laicization) beyond the formal relation between religion and state. We can find a process of laicization—that is, of increasing autonomy of the state before churches or religions—in countries where there is no formal separation, such as England, Norway, Denmark, or even Japan or Morocco. For the same reason, the form of government adopted is not crucial. The laicization process can take place not only in a republic but also in a monarchy, as in the above-mentioned countries.

The third element of laicity has evolved alongside the modern constitutional state, to protect not only the rights of the individual and the majority but also those of communities and minorities. The convergence between the new legal institutional framework and the laicization process lies in the fact that the lay state must ensure the freedom of conscience of all and the actions deriving from it. Therefore, laws and public policies must conform to the general idea of the public moral and ethical concerns of the population. In consequence, pluralism of religions and of philosophical doctrines forces the state to design an equitable and nondiscriminatory set of rules for everyone, beyond particular religions or philosophical stands. That is the reason for the importance of the lay state in many contemporary debates, concerning issues such as abortion, the use of embryonic stem cells, euthanasia, gay rights, religious and sexual education, contraceptive methods, and many other crucial matters. The laicization of the state becomes the guarantee of equal rights for all, assuring everyone, democratically and in the respect of freedoms, the opportunity to live according to their conscience and beliefs.

The lay state is then a political-judicial instrument used to ensure liberties in a society that recognizes itself as plural and diverse. Laicity can be defined then as a social regime of coexistence whose political institutions are mainly legitimated by the peoples' sovereignty and no longer by sacred or religious elements. This definition allows us to understand that laicity is a changing phenomenon that evolves as a process (laicization) consisting of the transition in the sources of legitimacy of political authority. The transition is never complete because, in the same way that democratization is never absolute, the lay state also tends to sacralize itself, and in every country of the world there are remnants of the public presence of religion. Moreover, because this definition allows us to understand that "laicity" is different from "separation," we can also recognize the complexity of the process of laicization in many countries, particularly those where the Catholic Church and some evangelical churches are still politically influential. This is true for many other countries whose regimes either ignore the idea of separation between religion and politics or disdain the concept of the autonomy of the state ahead of a particular religion or philosophical doctrine.

In any case, due to the increasing centrality of human rights, the broadening of democratic institutions, and the social recognition of plurality and diversity, it is very likely that in the near future we will see the appearance of laicity and laicization as crucial elements in expanded social and political debates in many developed countries in the world.

Roberto J. Blancarte

See also Pluralism; Politics and Religion; Public and Private Religion; Religion and State; Religious Freedom; Secularization; Tolerance

Further Readings

- Baubérot, J. (2009). Les laïcités dans le monde [World secularism]. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France.
- Blancarte, R. J. (2008). Para entender el Estado laico [Understanding the lay state]. Coyoacán, Mexico: Nostra Ediciones.
- Calhoun, C., Juergensmeyer, M., & VanAntwerpen, J. (Eds.). (2011). Rethinking secularism. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Flint, J. T. (1990). Historical role analysis in the study of religious change: Mass education in Norway, 1740–1881. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

Pena-Ruiz, H. (2003). Qu'est-ce que la laïcité [What is laicity?]. Paris: Gallimard.

Taylor, C. (2007). A secular age. Cambridge MA: Harvard University Press.

LAOS

The nation of Laos is located in the northern part of the Indo-Chinese peninsula in mainland Southeast Asia. The majority of people (6,677,534, July 2008 estimate) in the Lao People's Democratic Republic are Theravada Buddhists. They constitute 65% of the population, and about 33% practice animism. But there is no clear-cut demarcation, since Buddhism has been blended with elements of indigenous religious practices, Hinduism, and traditions from neighboring countries. About 2% of Laotian people profess Christianity, Islam, and other religions. According to tradition, Buddhism was introduced in Laos during the reign of the Indian Emperor Asoka (ca. 273–226 BCE). A Buddhist that or wat (shrine) was built. Buddhism in Laos has been influenced by neighboring countries such as Myanmar, Cambodia, and Thailand as well as Sri Lanka. Interaction with the Khmers, Thais, Sri Lankans, and Indians has enriched the indigenous culture and religion of Laos. Hinduism has also exerted a strong impact on daily life, ritual, custom, and public ceremony. Names of Hindu gods are invoked in daily prayer to Buddha. The Lao version of the Ramayana, the Phra Lak Pha Lam, dominates the religious and cultural life of Laos. Along with Theravada Buddhism, the cult of phi (spirit) worship is prevalent among all segments of population, indigenous as well as ethnic. Lao religious life is also marked by belief in wandering spirits and the souls of departed ones. In the corner of some Buddhist wats, there is a small enclosure set aside for spirits. Certain monks are venerated for their special power of exorcising evil spirits.

The people of Laos celebrate important festivals connected with religion. The Boun Pimai marks the Lao New Year and is observed for several days in April. In Luang Prabang, Boun Pimai celebrations include ablutions of Buddhist icons. The festival of Boun Bang Fai inaugurates the rainy season in May. Giant homemade bamboo rockets are launched skyward to summon the rains. The August festival of Haw Khao Padap Din is observed to pay homage to the dead. The month of November is marked by a festival at the temple of That Luang in Vientiane. The small minorities of Laotian Christians and Muslims celebrate their own respective festivals. For most Laotians, religious life revolves round the wats—places of worship as well as festivities. Luang Prabang boasts of superb Buddhist monuments. That Luang of Vientiane is an architectural marvel; the Buddhist and Hindu icons of Laos have a uniqueness of their own.

With the triumph of communism in 1975, doctrinaire Marxism prevailed for several decades in Laos. Within the framework of a socialist government, Buddhism was relegated to the background; reports emerged of persecution of Buddhist monks and Christian missionaries. The advent of a market economy in the 1990s witnessed the subsequent dilution of Marxism, and once again Buddhism predominates in daily life; the government's tolerance and encouragement of Buddhist religious life also confers legitimacy on the government itself, which now manages the famous That Luang festival. In the religious crucible of Laos, where there is a blending of different religious traditions, Marxian ideals are amalgamated with Buddhist rituals.

Patit Paban Mishra

See also Marxism; Southeast Asia; Theravada Buddhism

Further Readings

- Mishra, P. P. (1999). A contemporary history of Laos. New Delhi, India: National Book Organization.
- Mishra, P. P. (2005). Cultural rapprochement between India and Southeast Asia. New Delhi, India: National Book Organization.
- Pholsena, V. (2006). Post-war Laos: The politics of culture, history and identity. Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies.
- Rasdavong, M. K. (2006). The history of Buddhism in Laos. Vientiane, Laos: Lao Front for National Construction.
- Stuart-Fox, M. (1996). Buddhist kingdom, Marxist state: The making of modern Laos. Bangkok, Thailand: White Lotus.
- Suksamran, S. (1993). Buddhism and political legitimacy. Bangkok, Thailand: Chulalongkorn University Press.

LATIN AMERICA

Latin America covers approximately 21 million square kilometers, has a population of more than 570 million people, and consists of more than 30 countries and assorted territorial units. It is also home to some of the fastest growing and most innovative religious movements of modern times. An inheritance of Iberian conquest, Latin America's main languages are Spanish and Portuguese, while the presence of French, English, and Dutch likewise has colonial origins. The most widely spoken of the continent's numerous prequest languages and dialects are Aymara, Guaraní, and Quechua. A relative mixture of colonial, indigenous, and African ingredients, Creole languages serve various inhabitants of the Latin Caribbean. As is to be expected from a continent born of social-cultural miscegenation, mixed-race inhabitants form the largest racial constituency, with almost half of the total population. Black Latin Americans represent the smallest racial unit (5.4%), with assorted indigenous groups (10%) and the remaining White population (35%) completing the picture. The racial topography of Latin America is, of course, by no means even. Whereas the population of Argentina is almost completely White (90%), that of Haiti is virtually all Black (94%), that of Brazil is nearly all mixed race (92%), and that of Bolivia is predominantly indigenous (65%). Allowing for national variations, the pattern of wealth distribution across the continent is of a more uniform character. The overwhelming majority of Latin America's wealth is held by a small minority of its population. As a result, the gap between rich and poor is a stark one, and social-economic security is a scarce and precarious phenomenon for those not among the affluent elite.

In contrast to its geographic, linguistic, and ethnic diversity, Latin America's religious profile appears relatively homogeneous. With more than 92% of the continent's population acknowledging some form of adherence, Christianity is by far the largest religion in the region. Indeed, the next biggest quantitative unit of religious adherence is the 3.3% of the population who are either nonreligious (2.8%) or atheist (0.5%). Of the remaining categories, Spiritism enjoys 2.7% adherence, traditional non-Christian religions (i.e., Buddhism, Hinduism, Islam, and Judaism) amount to no more than 0.8%, indigenous religiosity records 0.6% of religious adherents, new religious phenomena total less than 0.5%, and other religions (e.g., African derived) constitute 0.2%. Although, as aggregated statistics, these figures mask a degree of both national and regional variation, their overall profile is fairly representative of conditions on the ground. What they do not show, however, is that cities tend to have higher rates of nonreligiosity than rural areas. In some of the most urbanized parts of Brazil, for example, census returns of non-religious (sem religião) have been recorded at more than 25%. At the same time, the historical association of Catholicism with national identity, traditional stigmatization of non-Christian religious expression, and refusal by some to identify with the established category of “religion” combine to influence statistical representations of religious adherence. As a result, the numbers of those engaged in religious activity beyond traditional mainstream arenas tend to be underrepresented, while the figures for Christian adherence (especially for Catholicism) are grossly overrepresentative of those who actually participate in formal ritual practices.

The sheer size and diversity of Latin America means that a short essay as this will inevitably be quite general. Consequently, here we engage in broad brushstrokes. It is hoped, however, that what follows does justice to both the religions it describes and the particular contexts in which they are lived. To this end, our treatment of religion in Latin America is organized into four substantive sections, the first of which deals with Christianity in its Catholic and Protestant forms. The second section provides a schematic overview of contemporary indigenous religiosity, while the third treats African-derived religions. The fourth section looks at both home-grown and imported modern religious traditions.

Christianity

An integral part of the European colonial project, Christianity arrived in Latin America in the last decade of the 15th century and spread initially through coerced proselytization and enforced baptism of indigenous peoples and imported African slaves. Diplomatic arrangements between a weakened papacy and powerful Iberian monarchs subjected religious functionaries to direct political control and made the Christian religion an ideological extension of nascent Latin American political structures. Despite the sporadic and short-lived existence of Protestant settlements (e.g., German Lutherans in Venezuela between 1529 and 1546 and Dutch Calvinists in Brazil from 1624 to 1654), Catholicism enjoyed a virtual religious monopoly on the Latin American mainland for more than 300 years. This monopoly ended in the 19th century as a result of continent-wide political and demographic change.

Wresting control from Spain and Portugal, the forces of national independence viewed with suspicion an ecclesiastical institution that had been such a bulwark of the colonial enterprise. No longer integral to political aspirations, and thereby released from wholesale state control, the Catholic Church was progressively “Romanized” as it came increasingly under the sway of its European “Mother Church.” As a result, traditional Catholicism was modernized through the eradication of what were considered superstitious excesses (e.g., thaumaturgy, possession, and exorcism), the integration of once semiautonomous lay movements within formal parish and diocesan structures, and the imposition of clerical and institutional authority underwritten by a priest-centered and sacramentally oriented piety. At the same time, successive waves of north European, non-Catholic immigrants added to the continent’s religious mix. No longer legally inferior to Roman Catholicism, and buoyed by increasing numbers of non-Catholic immigrants, traditional Protestantism made steady inroads within Latin America. In Chile, for example, the Anglican (1836), Lutheran (1846), Presbyterian (1872), Methodist (1877), and Baptist (1908) Protestant denominations established themselves successfully. The two world wars of the past century did much to reconfigure the internal and external influences shaping the Latin American continent. Postwar rebuilding programs in Europe afforded opportunities for Latin American industrial development. At first incipient, Latin American industrialization soon escalated, giving rise to large-scale urbanization, population growth, and regional migration (not the least from rural to urban contexts). In breaking old allegiances and established behavioral patterns, the social and cultural flux engendered by this rapid demographic change prepared the way for new ideas and practices to take root. Finding most success among the urban lower middle classes, traditional Protestantism today represents approximately 3% of the Latin American population.

Although established for more than 100 years, the nature of the Protestant presence in Latin America began to change substantially from the 1950s. Encouraged by North and Latin American political authorities alike, and empowered by southern U.S. missionary funding and training, indigenous Pentecostal denominations increasingly made their evangelistic presence felt in the burgeoning Latin American conurbations. Latin American Pentecostalism had emerged in the first decades of the 20th century from transcontinental spiritual revival movements within traditional Protestant denominations. It was at this time, for example, that Latin America's two largest national Pentecostal churches (the Assemblies of God and the Christian Congregation in Brazil) were founded in Brazil. Initially bearing fruit in Argentina, Brazil, and Chile, Pentecostalism soon spread throughout the continent. Originally finding most success among the poorer sectors of Latin America, Pentecostal discourse and practice is now establishing a foothold among the continent's professional classes. Today, Pentecostalism represents approximately 75% of Protestants in Latin America and is the fastest growing sector of Christianity across the whole of the continent. Although it remains a relatively small movement in some Latin American countries (e.g., Colombia, Mexico, Peru, and Venezuela), Pentecostalism continues to expand in a growing number of others (e.g., Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Haiti, and Nicaragua).

Like its European and North American cousins, Latin American Pentecostalism is conservative in matters of biblical interpretation and theological reflection. Articulating a Spirit-based discipleship founded on the charismatic gifts (e.g., speaking in tongues, prophecy, the casting out of unclean spirits), Latin American Pentecostalism worships a miracle-working, demon-exorcising Christ, who, along with the Holy Spirit, supports believers in their daily battles with the "principalities and powers of darkness." Emphasis on the pragmatic consequences of faith, especially that of divine healing through deliverance and the material benefits of spiritual practice, is particularly pronounced within the more recent and fastest growing neo-Pentecostal churches, such as Brazil's God Is Love Pentecostal Church and the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, traditionally reticent in matters political. Protestant Christians are increasingly being mobilized through a variety of national parties (e.g., Venezuela's Authentic Renewal Organization and the Independent Christian movement of Argentina), collective forums (e.g., the Brazilian Evangelical Association and Evangelical Progressive movement of Brazil), and high-profile political successes through the elections of Protestant presidents such as Alberto Fujimori (Peru) and Jorge Serrano Elias (Guatemala). While programmatic participation in the formal political arena has in the past predominantly been undertaken by members of Latin America's traditional Protestant denominations, there is increasing Pentecostal engagement in both national and localized political campaigns.

Protestant representation on the Latin American continent is not the only sector of the Christian community to have undergone dramatic change. The results of the rapid demographic shift, escalating Protestant growth, a growing shortage of priests, and the findings of religious-sociological surveys alerted the Catholic hierarchy to the radically altered nature of its once central position as one of the three pillars (along with the land-owning oligarchies and the military) of traditional Latin American society. The growing realization that things had to change was further complemented by emerging theological emphases on the status of the laity and their ecclesial rights to a fuller participation in the formal liturgical arena and decision-making processes of church life. Embracing each of these challenges in the reformist spirit of the Second Vatican Council (Rome, 1962–1965), Roman Catholic authorities in Latin America set about implementing a wide-ranging program of institutional renewal and pastoral innovation.

The most influential pastoral phenomenon to emerge from this period of Roman Catholic renewal is the "base ecclesial community." Varied in kind, base ecclesial communities constitute anything between 15 and 40 committed members and exist mainly among the poorest sectors of the continent. Although centered on the worshipping life of the local parish, base communities serve principally as arenas of support throughout the whole week, providing opportunity for Bible study, catechesis, leadership training, and other means of Christian celebration. Offering physical space, material support, personal commitment, and spiritual encouragement, base ecclesial communities are often involved in food and clothing cooperatives, workers' unions, youth groups, parent associations, and local campaigns in pursuit of health clinics, sanitation facilities, educational ventures, and public transport provision. Although not as numerous as they were in the early 1980s, base ecclesial communities continue to represent an important means of religious expression and mobilizing for many Latin American Catholics.

Emerging under similar conditions as the base ecclesial community, and maturing through the prolonged periods of military rule in many Latin American countries, liberation theology flourished in one of the most influential expressions of late-20th-century theological reflection in the global Christian community. Central to liberation theology's approach is an understanding of Jesus as the self-proclaimed herald of the Kingdom of God, who believed that there is no individual righteousness in the absence of meaningful and just relations with one's neighbors. Among the many contributions made by liberation theology are the theoretical justifications offered in support of Christian engagement with social, economic, and political affairs. Antithetical to the reign of justice preached by Jesus, it is argued, social structures perpetuating marginalization, economic mechanisms generating poverty, and political processes limiting participation should be subjected to concerted critique and transformation.

Perhaps the most prominent form of contemporary Catholic Christianity in Latin America is the Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) movement. Although actual figures are likely to be lower than the estimates, which posit as many as 73 million Latin Americans active in the CCR, the movement is certainly gaining strength and today represents the principal component of the Catholic Church's evangelistic strategy for Latin America. Emerging in late-1960s North America, the CCR was adopted by the ecclesiastical hierarchy of Latin America as a key means of halting Catholic decline and combating Pentecostal growth. At the same time, the CCR model was adapted through the combination of insights gained from the base community experience and strategies appropriated from Pentecostalism. In effect, the CCR model offers an expressive environment in which the gifts of the Holy Spirit can be both nurtured and celebrated and shown to be relevant for dealing with the daily challenges (not the least, health, happiness, and material success) of contemporary life.

The state-sponsored growth of health, education, and social infrastructures, in addition to the post-1970s development of independent networks of civil society, has resulted in a diminishing institutional presence of Roman Catholicism within the everyday lives of successive generations of Latin Americans. The historical association of national identity with Catholicism (and atheism with sedition) has traditionally been reflected in census returns of "Catholic" well in excess of 95%. Processes unleashed by the rapid urban industrialization of the mid-20th century, along with the creeping pluralization of Latin American society, however, have progressively affected Catholic returns, with the continental average now dropping below 85%. Indeed, the number of those actively involved with Catholicism on a regular basis is, in reality, unlikely to exceed 20% of the current Latin American population. Allowing for the consequences of increasing pluralization, the growth of Pentecostalism, and the rise in those self-designating as "without religion," the number of those either declaring themselves "Catholic" or participating in Catholic rituals is likely to decline much further still.

Indigenous Religiosity

The vast majority of the indigenous peoples who make up 10% of Latin America's population reside in regions that were part of the Aztec, Inca, and Maya pre-conquest civilizations, for example, Bolivia, Ecuador, Guatemala, Mexico, and Peru. Of these approximately 57 million indigenes, more than 53 million are classified or self-designate as Christian. Particularly in the Aymara- and Quechua-speaking parts of the northern Andes and the Maya-speaking rural regions of the Central American isthmus, indigenous peoples practice forms of Catholic Christianity shaped by their mixing with vestigial elements of preconquest religions. Here, the popular Catholic pantheon of Jesus, Mary, and the saints is worshipped alongside, if not identified with, assorted pre-Christian divinities. Celestial deities (e.g., the Andean Earth Mother, Pachamama; the sun god, Inti; and the Mayan moon goddess), climatic forces (e.g., gods of rain and lightning), and topological features (e.g., deities of the mountains, rivers, and valleys) are regularly venerated. It is, however, the gods and spirits who regulate the seasons governing livestock and agricultural production (e.g., the Mayan maize god) that receive the most ritual attention by way of maintaining levels of fertility and encouraging favorable harvests. Although animal sacrifice plays a small part in some festivals and rituals, the majority of cultic activity revolves around making offerings and libations of cultivated goods.

The remaining 3.5 million members of the indigenous Latin American population are scattered throughout the continent among otherwise disparate communities with their own distinctive languages and dialects and religious-cultural worldviews. The remainder of this section deals with those communities whose tribal practices and geographical remoteness have until relatively recently helped preserve much of a cultural heritage that predates European conquest by a substantial margin. Allowing for the linguistic and cultural diversity of these indigenous communities, what follows can only be formal in nature, offering little more than a structural overview interspersed with specific examples from particular contexts.

Indigenous worldviews commonly situate the earth between the heavenly realm of the gods above and the subterranean world below. For the Baniwa of Brazil, the heavenly realm is composed of the lower "Other World," immediately adjacent to the earth, and the higher, more distant, "Other Sky." The underworld can also be layered, as with the Peruvian Campa's partition of it into two subterranean tiers. Although any particular stratum may be divided laterally, the earthly tier is most commonly subjected to such treatment, with prominent environmental features (e.g., mountains, lakes, and particularly dense parts of the forest) and mythical places (e.g., the Paraguayan Avá-Chiripá's "land without evil") accorded extra-special status.

Inhabiting the higher strata are (for some tribes) uncreated/preexistent deities, such as Kóoch of the Argentinean Tehuelche and Ñanderuvusú of the Guaraní peoples, who straddle the Argentine-Brazil border. Often remote from everyday human activity, these divine beings are accompanied by a pantheon of lesser deities whose origins and characteristics are usually connected with celestial (e.g., the Bolivian Ayoreo moon goddess, Gidosíde), climatic (e.g., the Tehuelche god of thunder, Karuten), totemic (e.g., the black monkey of the Surinamese Arawak), and otherwise routine (e.g., Pel'ek, "Owner of the Night," of the Paraguayan Toba) phenomena.

Although indigenous deities involve themselves in the general ordering of human affairs and are at times difficult to differentiate from the more numerous category of "spirits," it is the latter who most directly influence the day-to-day lives of indigenous peoples. More commonly occupying the lower strata of the indigenous cosmos, the spirits of animals, plants, and elementals (e.g., of water), along with those of deceased human beings, are regarded as the primary causal forces potentially influencing every facet of personal well-being, interpersonal relations, and social reproduction. While benevolent and malevolent forms exist, within the indigenous mind-set, spirits are, by and large, morally ambivalent in their dealings with humans.

The prevalence of widespread supernatural causality demands constant and careful handling, and it is to ritualized activity managed by the local shaman that most indigenous peoples turn to help limit and coordinate the impact of the spiritual on the material. Whether induced at the behest of other (usually shamanic) human beings or resulting from the breaking of any number of food, hygiene, and social taboos, for example, an attack by spirits can only be properly dealt with through recourse to one trained in the arts of the supernatural spheres. In addition to the almost daily routine of preventing, diagnosing, or curing serious illness, the shaman is a focal point of communal festivals (e.g., the harvest festival), rites de passage (e.g., female menarche and male coming of age), social-economic reproduction (e.g., successful hunting), and political processes (e.g., assuaging internal discord or intertribal dispute).

The shaman executes his responsibilities by drawing on a vast range of practical knowledge

(not the least, plant lore, diagnostic skills, and curative techniques) acquired through initiation and apprenticeship. In addition to memorizing the structures of the numerous cosmic realms of the indigenous worldview, the shaman must also master the techniques of ecstasy, dream, and vision, through which he visits other worlds and engages the services of their supernatural inhabitants. The supernatural alliances forged by the shaman with spiritual forces from other worlds are central to his success. Generally occupying the higher strata of the indigenous cosmos, "guardian spirits" serve as powerful allies to the shaman, offering protection from supernatural assault and information as to the probable causes of individual malady and social disturbance. Shamans visit their guardian spirits by way of transporting their souls through the media of naturally occurring, ritually induced, and narcotically stimulated dreams, trances, and visions. Often complementing the overarching support of a particular shaman's set of guardian spirits are any number of "auxiliary spirits" (principally of animals and plants). Resident within the shaman himself, auxiliary spirits also play a diagnostic role but come into their own as active agents in the curative techniques called on in shamanic practice. The principal relationship between a shaman and his auxiliary spirits is one of mutually beneficial exchange. In return for their aid in resolving the problems with which the shaman is faced, resident spirits get to enjoy the trappings of material existence as mediated through their host. Integral to the indigenous worldview, shamanic practice exemplifies indigenous existence as a nodal point through which a multiple configuration of mythico-religious forces write themselves on human space-time.

In combination, the secularization of state institutions, weakening of Catholic influence, and post-1980s rise of indigenous identity politics (e.g., Maya movement and Confederation of Indigenous Nationalities of Ecuador) have done much to encourage the appropriation and assertion of preconquest themes and practices as legitimate components of a contemporary, non-Christian religious worldview. Although indigenous populations are subject to intense Pentecostal missionary activity, pockets of Andean and Mesoamerican religiosity inspired by preconquest religious-cultural themes are now relatively well established and a source of intense pride for their practitioners. For the many tribal communities scattered about the continent, however, there is less cause for celebration. Together, the ravages of Western diseases; economic encroachment through logging, mining, and farming; missionary activity; and pressures toward social-political integration continue to erode practical-symbolic means of reproduction long established among indigenous cultures.

African-Derived Religions

The decimation of the indigenous population wrought by the Iberian conquest resulted in the forced transportation of millions of African slaves to provide the manual labor central to the economic success of the colonial, plantation-based enterprise. Snatched predominantly from western and central Africa (e.g., modern-day Nigeria, Ghana, Benin, Togo, and Congo), those enslaved brought with them their religious beliefs and practices. Although outlawed by colonial authorities and disrupted by ethnic disaggregation, these beliefs and practices survived in clandestine form and were, over time, reformulated and mixed with indigenous and Catholic components. Today, found in many parts of Latin America, the most vibrant African-derived religions are those of Haitian Vodou (known also as sèvis lwa), Cuban Santería (known also as Regla de Ocha/Lukumí), and Brazilian Candomblé (whose regional variations are Xangô, Tambor de Mina, and Batuque). Although each of these religions differs relative to its originative African ethnicity, respective indigenous ingredients, and degree of Catholic influence, sufficient formal similarity exists to allow their collective representation.

Cosmologically speaking, African-derived religions believe the physical terrain of the earth to be surrounded by a spiritual realm whose outermost region is inhabited by a remote Creator deity (often associated with the Christian God). Other regions are populated by foundational spiritual agents, many of whom are respectively associated with Jesus, Mary, and assorted Catholic saints. The souls of the dead are likewise dispersed throughout the spiritual realm, with their place in the cosmological hierarchy determined relative to their spiritual development when alive on earth. As the supernatural spheres nearest the earth share a similar level of cosmic energy with it, the spiritual entities inhabiting them are able to pass to the physical realm. Passage to the material sphere is enacted by way of ritualized possession of trained mediums whose physical mediation allows the possessing entities to enjoy temporarily the trappings of earthly existence. These trappings come chiefly in the form of food (including sacrificed animals), song and dance, decorative clothing and jewelry, and adoration relative to the possessing agent's status and individual tastes. The most important supernatural agents have designated days and festivals, and a range of powers that corresponds with particular domains (e.g., forest, sea, and land), natural elements (e.g., sunshine, rain, and thunder), and life-course events (e.g., relationships, health, and employment). Complemented by an assortment of divinatory and curative techniques mastered by their mediums, possessing entities both radiate cosmic energy to those in need and provide material benefits and emotional support to supplicants in exchange for stipulated offerings.

The relatively recent liberalization of traditional sanctions and restrictions regulating nonmainstream religious practice across Latin America has influenced African-derived religiosity in a number of ways. Historically, religions of poor Black communities, the likes of Vodou, Santería, and Candomblé, are finding increasing favor among the White urban middle classes. In the same vein, the growing professionalization of mediumistic practices is leading to both the increased availability of written sources (where only oral traditions once existed) and the spread of market dynamics. On both counts, secret teachings and restricted practices formerly reserved for the initiated are becoming readily available to the general public. At the same time, the collective pursuit of newfound rights and the desire to offer an orchestrated response to ongoing attacks by unsympathetic Christian organizations has resulted in the creeping federalization of once fiercely independent and mutually suspicious "houses" and "temples." Along with every other sector of Latin America's religious landscape, African-derived religions are subject to the transformative dynamics of global modernity. Large-scale economic migration has encouraged the international spread of African-derived religions beyond their traditional geographical homelands and ethnic-linguistic strongholds. The relative ease of travel and exchange of information have likewise combined with late-20th-century identity politics to encourage growing numbers to pursue the progressive Africanization of their religions by way of their cleansing of purportedly syncretic tendencies and Catholic influences. Others, however, are moving in a different direction, as the appropriation of New Age practices and Asian beliefs results in ever more hybrid religious repertoires.

Modern Religions

After Christianity, Spiritism is the most prominent feature of the Latin American religious landscape. Although approximately 14 million adherents are registered by official databases (e.g., www.thearda.com), Spiritism enjoys a much wider following in its popular hybrid forms and diffuse, extra-institutional manifestations. Institutionally, Spiritism is most practiced in Latin America by followers of the tradition established in mid-19th-century France by Allan Kardec (1804–1869). Initially adopted in Latin America by the upper middle classes, Spiritism (also known as Kardecism) soon gained popularity among the poorer sections of society. The centerpiece of Spiritist practice is spirit mediumship through which interaction with disembodied spirits is enabled. Among middle-class Spiritist communities, mediumship tends to concentrate on the communication of morally uplifting and spiritually edifying messages from the supernatural realm. Here, emphasis rests on individual morality, which is underwritten by beliefs in reincarnation and karma. While not eschewing morally oriented discourse, poorer Spiritist communities tend to emphasize the practical-therapeutic elements of spirit mediumship. As a result, Spiritist rituals among the poor revolve around possession as a site of contestation with "inferior" spirits responsible for the likes of ill health, unemployment, and relationship breakdown. In its extra-institutional and diffuse manifestations, Spiritism mixes with elements inherited from both popular Catholic and indigenous worldviews and appropriated from African-derived religiosity. Present in virtually every Latin American country, popular Spiritism represents a pragmatic, magical-religious worldview that engages the supernatural realm with a thorough practical-therapeutic intent.

Imported by way of inward migration, international missionary endeavor, or the cultural exchange networks of globalized modernity, neo-Christian traditions (e.g., Mormons, Seventh-Day Adventists, and Jehovah's Witnesses), New Age spiritualities (e.g., Krishna Consciousness, Scientology, and the Baha'i Faith), and Japanese new religions (e.g., Church of World Messianity and Perfect Liberty) contribute to the ongoing pluralization of Latin America's religious landscape. At the same time, the emergence and spread of modern homegrown movements such as Umbanda, Christian Gnosticism, and the ayahuasca religions of Brazil (i.e., Barquinha, Vegetable Union, and Santo Daime) indicate a contemporary autochthonous vibrancy that stands to complement both long-established traditions and newly arrived religious repertoires. As with so many new religious phenomena taking root in Latin America, these homegrown religions are typically hybrid in character. Whereas Umbanda unites Spiritism, indigenous, and African-derived elements, for example, Christian Gnosticism fuses European esoteric (e.g., Theosophy) with Spiritist, Catholic, and Oriental (e.g., Tibetan Buddhism) components. In the same vein, and perhaps par excellence, Santo Daime combines indigenous, popular Catholic, Afro-Brazilian, Spiritist, esoteric, and miscellaneous New Age ingredients.

The continued strength of Pentecostalism and activism of CCR movements, combined with the inertial weight of historical association, mean that Christianity will remain Latin America's dominant religious force for some time to come. If the past 30 years are anything to go by, however, this dominance will be progressively challenged and vigorously so. For example, the pattern of Christianity's decline in successive surveys across the continent is paralleled by the rising profile of those quantified as nonreligious or atheist. In some pockets of the most urbanized parts of Latin America, nonparticipation in the religious sphere readily exceeds the numbers of those engaged in religious practice. At the same time, the progressive liberalization of traditional legal-economic restrictions is allowing previously marginalized and oppressed sectors of the nonmainstream religious arena to assert their presence and make increasingly effective use of resources previously denied to them. Energized by the confluence of newfound freedoms and newly available materials mediated through global exchange networks, indigenous movements, African-derived religions, and modern spiritualities from home and abroad are contributing to the ongoing diversification of Latin America's religious landscape.

Andrew Dawson

See also Autochthonous Christians in Latin America; Base Communities in Latin America; Islam in Latin America; Japanese Religions in Latin America; Mesoamerican Religions; Native Latin American Religion; New Religions in South America

Further Readings

- Carozzi, M. J. (Ed.). (1999). A Nova Era no Mercosul [The New Age in the Mercosul]. Rio de Janeiro, Brazil: Editora Vozes.
- Chesnut, R. A. (2003). Competitive spirits: Latin America's new religious Economy. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Cipriani, R., Eleta, P., & Nesti, A. (Eds.). (2000). Identidade e Mudança na Religiosidade Latino-Americana [Identity and change in Latin-American religiosity]. Rio de Janeiro, Brazil: Editora Vozes.
- Dawson, A. (1998). The birth and impact of the base ecclesial community and liberative theological discourse in Brazil. Lanham, MD: International Scholars.
- Dawson, A. (2007). New era—new religions: Religious transformation in contemporary Brazil. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate.
- Freston, P. (2008). Evangelical Christianity and democracy in Latin America. New York: Oxford University Press.
- González, J. L., & González, O. E. (2007). Christianity in Latin America: A history. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Langon, E. J. M., & Baer, G. (Eds.). (1992). Portals of power: Shamanism in South America. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press.
- Oro, A. P., & Steil, C. A. (Eds.). (1997). Globalização e Religião [Globalization and religion]. Rio de Janeiro, Brazil: Editora Vozes.
- Parker, Cristián G. (1996). Popular religion and modernization in Latin America: A different logic. New York: Orbis.

- Peterson, A., & Vásquez, M. (Eds.). (2008). Latin American religions: Histories and documents in context. New York: New York University Press.
- Skidmore, T. E., & Smith, P. H. (2005). Modern Latin America (5th ed.). New York: Oxford University Press.
- Smith, C., & Prokopy, J. (Eds.). (1999). Latin American religion in motion. New York: Routledge.
- Sullivan, L. E. (Ed.). (2002). Native religions and cultures of Central and South America: Anthropology of the sacred. New York: Continuum.
- Wilson, R. (1995). Maya resurgence in Guatemala: Q'eqchi' experiences. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.

LATVIA

Despite being a captive nation under the rule of the officially atheistic Soviet regime for nearly half of the 20th century, the northern European Baltic country of Latvia (population 2.2 million) has historically been a multiconfessional and largely Christian nation. Since the 16th century, the regions that comprise modern Latvia were largely under Lutheran religious influence. Lutheranism, however, cannot be considered a national church in Latvia, as the faith, like Catholicism beginning in the 13th century, was introduced by the German minority, who dominated the region from the late Middle Ages to the early decades of the past century. Polish influence also played a significant role in Latvia's religious history; as a result of Polish clerical efforts, much of eastern Latvia (Latgale) today is Roman Catholic.

Perhaps the most significant force shaping religious life in Latvia today is the experience of Soviet rule. For half a century, religious life in Latvia was harshly suppressed by the Soviet regime, which authorized the arrest, exile, and outright murder of many priests and pastors. During World War II, many clerics, including more than half of Latvia's pastors, fled the Baltic states to continue their religious mission abroad. Partly as a result of the Soviet regime's harsh policies, church membership declined in the Baltic states. Despite a brief surge in popular interest in religion that coincided with Latvia's realization of independence in the early 1990s, most Latvians today demonstrate little interest in organized religion.

The trend toward secularization among the population has had the greatest impact on the once dominant Evangelical Lutheran Church of Latvia (ELCL): Its population today is about 20%, down from the 55% who professed Lutheranism in the 1930s. The difficulties faced by the ELCL have been exacerbated by fragmentation within the church. In recent years, several congregations have split off from the main church, including eight congregations of the Augsburg Confession, whose members criticize the ELCL for what it claims is the latter's equivocal attitude toward the Holy Scripture.

Catholicism, benefiting from institutional contacts abroad and being less compromised than the Lutheran Church during the period of Soviet rule, appears to have better weathered the communist experience. Today, an estimated 22% of the Latvian population belong to the Catholic Church, whose popular allegiance now challenges (if not surpasses) that of the Lutheran Church.

After Lutheranism and Catholicism, the next largest religious confession in Latvia is Orthodoxy, the principal faith of the country's nearly 800,000 Russian speakers. While the ancestors of some of Latvia's Russians first settled in the Baltic provinces when the region was under tsarist rule beginning in the 18th century, the Russification of Latvia (and neighboring Estonia) sharply accelerated during the Soviet era. Since most Russian speakers are concentrated in the cities, this makes Orthodoxy the main religion of Latvia's urban population, while Catholicism is the principal faith of the rural populations of the east.

Jews once constituted the fourth major religious group in Latvia (there were 93,479 Jews residing in Latvia according to the 1935 census). Most, however, were killed in the Holocaust of the 1940s; thus, only a few hundred Jews remain in the country today. Other sizable religious minorities include Old Believers, Baptists, Pentecostals, Seventh-Day Adventists, Muslims, and Mormons. While the Latvian constitution provides for freedom of religion and the state generally respects religious practices, some minority religious groups—in particular newer, “nontraditional” religious groups—have occasionally faced discrimination.

Kevin O'Connor

See also Baltic Countries; Communism; Europe; Protestant Christianity; Roman Catholicism; Russian Federation

Further Readings

- Ketola, M. (2009). The Baltic churches and the challenges of the post-communist world. International Journal for the Study of the Christian Church, 9(3), 225–239.
- O'Connor, K. (2006). Culture and customs of the Baltic states. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Plakans, A. (1995). The Latvians. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution Press.

LEBANON

A country of 10,452 square kilometers, located on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, bordered by Syria on the north and east and Israel on the south, Lebanon has 18 religious confessions officially recognized by the Lebanese constitution. Some of these religious groups joined the indigenous people of Lebanon in their endeavor to find a refuge in its mountainous terrain away from persecution, where they could freely practice their political and religious beliefs. They preferred a harsh life in the mountains to the comfort of city life so as to be able to preserve and defend their religious beliefs and their cherished freedom. Over the years, due to the religious freedom that distinguished the country, Lebanon became a “mosaic of religions.” But, as is well known, a mosaic is fragile by definition.

Accordingly, confessional diversity and different ways of worshipping God have long been the main features of the Lebanese scene. While traveling through Lebanon in the 14th century, Ibn Battuta remarked on the exceptionally large number of people devoted to worshipping God. He was struck by their faith and their piety. Christianity and Islam, from the first appearance of the latter (i.e., in the seventh century), have been at home together in Lebanon.

The Ottoman Empire (1516–1917) respected the existing confessional distribution of the population and accorded Mount Lebanon, inhabited mostly by Christians, a certain level of autonomy. It was the Maronite Patriarch, Elias Hoyek (1843–1931), who represented the various Lebanese religious confessions in 1919 at the Paris Peace Conference in Versailles and articulated their aspiration for a free and independent Lebanon.

In the Lebanese religio-political system, the top posts of government are distributed along confessional lines. This distribution has existed since 1943, when after abolition of the French Mandate, independence was attained and the National Pact was concluded between leaders of the religious groups. It became formally part of the written constitution by the Ta'ef Agreement in 1989. This pact is based on confessional power sharing. It has also been the basis of efforts to establish a consensual confessional democracy in a permanent and final Lebanese nation-state with a special mission: freedom of religion and coexistence among religious groups.

So far, it has not been a practical proposition for the Lebanese political state to abolish the confessional system. In fact, it has become an essential part of the fabric of the “modern” state. To this day, the Lebanese president is a Maronite Christian (Lebanon is the only Arab country with a Christian president), the House speaker is a Shi'ite Muslim, and the prime minister is a Sunnī Muslim. Most other posts in parliament, government, and public service, and even in the syndicates and other such bodies, are distributed on a confessional basis. In some cases, religious groups are licensed as political parties, which means that Lebanese politics are also subject to the mosaic of these different Lebanese communities.

While Arabic is the official language of the Republic of Lebanon, many Lebanese are fluent in French and English as well. Syriac, Armenian, and Kurdish are also languages spoken by some of the communities that make up the Lebanese mosaic.

Due to political sensitivity over the ratio of confessional distribution, no official census has been taken since 1932. According to that census, the population was 52% Christian and 48% Muslim. However, unofficial estimates published by the Lebanese newspaper An-Nahar on November 13, 2006, claimed that Muslims constitute 64% and Christians 35%. The remainder includes numerous small minorities, for example, the Jews. Non-Muslim minority groups are experiencing extensive migration outflow.

According to the Lebanese Emigration Research Center at Notre Dame University, Lebanon, between 4 and 6 million people of Lebanese descent are spread around the world, especially in Brazil, the United States, Australia, Europe, and Africa. The 1975 to 1976 war on Lebanese soil, with various outside military interferences, drove many thousands of Lebanese, especially Christians, to emigrate with the intention of finding a home and making a living in some peaceful place abroad.

It is almost impossible to find a Lebanese family that has not been affected by emigration, and there is hardly a country in the world where Lebanese emigrants and their descendants are not to be found. While from a certain point of view this is a drawback for Lebanon, it is also of certain economic advantage. During the major crises that Lebanon has endured, the country's economy would have folded up had it not been for the remittances sent by Lebanese abroad to their families or relatives. In fact, Lebanon was already participating in the global village experience long before the term was coined and long before it was embraced by the rest of the world. In this respect, the Lebanese appear to be following in the footsteps of their ancient sea-faring ancestors, the Phoenicians.

Ziad Fahed

See also Christianity; Islam; Israel; Ottoman Empire; Syrian Arab Republic

Further Readings

- Ammoun, D. (2004). Histoire du Liban contemporain, 1943–1990 [History of contemporary Lebanon]. Paris: Fayard.
- Chami, J. (1983). Lebanon. Piscataway, NJ: Transaction Publishers.
- Corm, G. (2005). Le Liban contemporain: Histoire et société [Contemporary Lebanon: History and society]. Paris: La Découverte.
- Hanf, T. (1993). Coexistence in wartime Lebanon. London: I. B. Tauris/Centre for Lebanese Studies.
- Hourani, A., & Shehadi, N. (1992). The Lebanese in the world: A century of emigration. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Kanan, C. (2005). Lebanon, 1860–1960: A century of myth and politics. London: Saqi Books.
- Salibi, K. (1998). A house of many mansions: The history of Lebanon reconsidered. Berkeley: University of California Press.

LEFT BEHIND SERIES

The Left Behind series came to national prominence in the United States in the late 1990s. A sequence of 12 books written by Timothy LaHaye and Jerry Jenkins, two popular evangelical writers, it traces the events of the biblical “end times” as they have been interpreted by certain Protestant groups in the United States and England. The story begins with the “rapture,” an event in which Jesus secretly takes all true believers to heaven. For those left behind, the world quickly falls into chaos, and the novels trace the 7 years of a period of suffering, called the “tribulation,” ending with an apocalyptic battle between Satan and Jesus. None of this story is original to LaHaye and Jenkins but instead stems from an approximately 100-year-old tradition of biblical interpretation.

Over the 9 years of the series' publication, it sold 60 million copies, including audiobooks, graphic novels, and a distinct children's series. Its presence on the New York Times bestseller list and its extensive sales in mainstream retail outlets such as Barnes & Noble, Wal-Mart, and Costco made the series remarkable. While the series was experiencing success in the United States, it was also being translated into several other languages. The first language was Afrikaans, the second Spanish. The series has sold best in Spanish and Chinese. At present, the first book in the series has been translated into 12 languages, with another 16 languages in some stage of preparation. Tyndale House reports sales of more than 1 million copies internationally.

For many evangelical Christians, the international spread of the series is an encouraging sign of church growth. For some critics, it is a cause for concern. The first reason is that the series is accused of American chauvinism. Although converts to Christianity in the series come from every corner of the globe, their leaders are always Americans. Characters from everywhere speak in an American idiom, and the authors have low sensitivity for cultural difference. The other cause for concern is the image of global violence. The series becomes increasingly bloody as it reaches the battle at Armageddon, and the authors have been dismissive of concerns, arguing that the images they are working with are biblical. The question is whether the series has the capacity to incite violence. Some critics have said that reading about global conflict between Christians and all others resonates in one way in Iowa, but it resonates quite differently in international conflict zones between Christians and Muslims.

As Christianity experiences what many scholars have called a global revival, particularly in its charismatic and Pentecostal forms, it will be interesting to see what role, if any, the Left Behind series will play. The rapture is not particularly important in the prosperity gospel theology, but as popular religion, the rapture and tribulation have proven resilient and adaptable.

Amy Frykholm

See also Evangelical Movements; North America; Pentecostal Movements

Further Readings

- Frykholm, A. (2009). Rapture culture: Left behind in evangelical America. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Gribben, C. (2009). Writing the rapture: Prophecy fiction in evangelical America. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Rossing, B. (2004). The rapture exposed: The message of hope in the Book of Revelation. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Shuck, G. W. (2004). Marks of the beast: The Left Behind novels and the struggle for evangelical identity. New York: New York University Press.

LESOTHO

Lesotho, officially the “Kingdom of Lesotho,” is a small country of 2 million inhabitants totally surrounded by the Republic of South Africa. The reception of Christian missionaries by King Moshoeshoe of the BaSotho in the mid-1800s gave Sotho religious practices a global dimension they have never lost. Moshoeshoe welcomed evangelical missionaries from Paris in the hope that they would help him protect his kingdom. He had good reason to fear. Not long thereafter, the kingdom lost much of its arable land to Afrikaners from the adjacent Orange Free State.

Although Moshoeshoe never officially became a Christian, much of his elite entourage did. The missionaries’ purveyance of literacy, ploughs, stone houses, and wagons bolstered his authority. Under missionary influence, he reformed burial rites, abolished youths’ initiation rituals, divorced two of his wives who had converted to Christianity, condemned witchcraft killings, and banned alcohol, although he never abjured polygyny or the practice of appropriating the children of his debtors after their deaths. His reforms caused popular dissent, exacerbated by the missionaries’ calls for pacifism in the face of enemy attacks. As a result, Moshoeshoe and his retinue temporarily returned to their previous practices. But after the French Catholics and Anglicans arrived, Moshoeshoe took a renewed interest in Christianity, claiming to be a Christian before his death but dying before he could be baptized. Gradually, Sotho Christians acquired equal control over the Paris Evangelical Mission as the Kereke ea Lesotho, and in 1964, they initiated the independent Lesotho Evangelical Church.

Ironically, the very wave of global influence that brought Christianity and threatened Sotho rituals also challenged Christian ideas about marriage and gender and gave Sotho rites a new meaning. When migrations to South African mines began in the early 1870s—and continued into the 20th century to urban areas in South Africa and Lesotho—men moved in as laborers and women as providers of illicit beer, food, and sex for cash. Many wives who stayed at home took lovers, and Basotho girls’ initiation rites featured songs describing how to keep adultery a secret. In the 1940s and 1950s, as Sotho chiefs feared being marginalized by British colonial administrative changes and possible incorporation into racist South Africa, they altered the nature of the protective medicines (diretlo) prepared by ngaka ritualists to include the body parts of clan members as opposed to those of clan strangers, prompting the terror of the so-called medicine murders. Among the chiefs implicated were Catholics and Protestants. But today, BaSotho make pilgrimages to ancestral shrines in the South African lands that Afrikaners stole more than two centuries ago, reclaiming through the synthesis of Christianity and Sotho ritual what they lost through colonial conquest.

Joseph R. Hellweg

See also Africa; Postcolonial Theology; Postcolonialism; South Africa

Further Readings

- Ashton, H. (1952). The Basuto. London: Oxford University Press.
- Coplan, D. (2001). You have left me wandering about. In D. Hodgson & S. McCurdy (Eds.), “Wicked” women and the reconfiguration of gender in Africa (pp. 188–211). Portsmouth, UK: Heinemann.
- Coplan, D. (2003). Land of the ancestors. Journal of Southern African Studies, 29(4), 976–993.
- Eldredge, E. (2007). Power in colonial Africa. Madison: University of Wisconsin.
- Nthunya, M. M. (1996). Singing away the hunger (K. Kendall, Ed.). Bloomington: Indiana University.
- Thompson, L. (1975). Survival in two worlds: Moshoeshoe of Lesotho, 1786–1870. Oxford, UK: Clarendon.

LÉVI-STRAUSS, CLAUDE (1908–2009)

Claude Lévi-Strauss, an anthropologist and ethnologist, was one of the most important social scientists of the 20th century. His concept of structuralism continues to exert a widespread influence not only in anthropology but also in fields as diverse as philosophy, history, sociology, and literary theory.

Lévi-Strauss studied law and philosophy at the Paris-Sorbonne University. He accepted a position as a professor of anthropology at the University of Sao Paulo, Brazil, for 5 years (1934–1939). During his stay in this South American country, he conducted fieldwork in the Amazonian region, where he studied the native tribes: the Bororo, Guaycuru, Tupi-Kawahib, and Nambikwara. At the New School for Social Research (United States), he became interested in structural linguistics—a field he was introduced to by the phonologist Roman Jakobson. The influence of American anthropologists was also important to his work. In 1950, he was named chair of comparative religions at the École Pratique des Hautes Etudes in Paris. He held the chair of social anthropology at the Collège de France from 1959 to 1982.

His book The Elementary Structures of Kinship (1947) introduced the concept of “structure” in ethnology. He understood kinship as systems whose nomenclature allows determining a circle of relatives. These structures are systems that prescribe marriage with a certain type of relative: those of the social groups who are possible spouses and those who are taboo. Lévi-Strauss described the distinction between nature and culture in relation to the taboo of incest. The prohibition of marriage to certain types of relatives—the problem of incest—is the foundation of human society, indeed, constitutive of society itself. He considered the prohibition of incest as universal: All human societies have a certain type of this proscription. In Structural Anthropology (1958), he established that the object of social anthropology has a symbolic nature. He considered that its field belonged to the study of the life of signs in the bosom of society: mythical languages, oral and gestural signs that are part of ritual, marriage rules, kinship systems, consuetudinary law, and certain types of economic interchange.

Gabriela Irrazábal

See also Brazil; Douglas, Mary; Dumont, Louis

Further Readings

- Lévi-Strauss, C. (1947). Les Structures élémentaires de la parenté [The elementary structures of kinship]. Berlin, Germany: Gmbh.
- Lévi-Strauss, C. (1948). La Vie familiale et sociale des Indiens Nambikwara [Family and social life of the Nambikwara Indians]. Paris: Société des américanistes.
- Lévi-Strauss, C. (1963). Anthropologie structurale [Structural anthropology] (M. Layton, Trans.). London: Allen Lane. (Original work published 1958)
- Lévi-Strauss, C. (1969). Le Totémisme aujourd’hui [Totemism] (R. Needham, Trans.). Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin Books. (Original work published 1962)
- Lévi-Strauss, C. (1983a). Mythologiques I: Le Cru et le cuit [The raw and the cooked] (J. Weightman & D. Weightman, Trans.). Chicago: University of Chicago Press. (Original work published 1964)
- Lévi-Strauss, C. (1983b). Mythologiques II: Du miel aux cendres [From honey to ashes] (J. Weightman & D. Weightman, Trans.). Chicago: University of Chicago Press. (Original work published 1966)

- Lévi-Strauss, C. (1990a). Mythologiques III: L'Origine des manières de table [The origin of table manners] (J. Weightman & D. Weightman, Trans.). Chicago: University of Chicago Press. (Original work published 1968)
- Lévi-Strauss, C. (1990b). Mythologiques IV: L'Homme nu [The naked man] (J. Weightman & D. Weightman, Trans.). Chicago: University of Chicago Press. (Original work published 1971)
- Lévi-Strauss, C. (1992). Tristes Tropiques (J. Weightman & D. Weightman, Trans.). New York: Penguin Books. (Original work published 1955)
- Lévi-Strauss, C. (2008). Oeuvres [Works] (V. Debaene, F. Keck, M. Mauzé, & M. Rueff, Eds.). Paris: Gallimard.

LI

Li is a key concept in Confucian thought and is variously translated as “ritual,” “rites,” “custom,” or “propriety.” It refers at the collective level to the time-honored code of ritual conduct that was to govern all social interaction in the ideal Confucian society. As an individual virtue, li is the ability to follow that code and to enter into each and every human relationship with a full awareness of one’s position, rights, and duties toward the others involved and with a full recognition and acceptance of them as moral beings. Mastery of li was part and parcel of the formation of the noble person (junzi) and key to the full realization of his humanity—a humanity that could only be practiced and perfected in social interactions with others, as the Confucian tradition regards the human being as fundamentally social in nature. Thus, ritualized relationships served to learn and exercise virtue and to transmit it to others, as all parties in any relationship will be affected by the moral power emanating from authentically performed ritual. The noble person’s leadership and authority thus acted upon others by ritual, a form of social interaction that does not enforce compliance but inspires allegiance by moral example.

The Confucian Classics contain three canonical works with a focus on ritual codes and discourses on li: the Record of Rites (Liji), the Ceremonies and Rites (Yili), and the Rites of Zhou (Zhouli). As part of the text corpus whose mastery was required for the civil service examinations in Imperial China, their notions of li deeply influenced the Chinese ruling elite throughout much of recorded Chinese history.

Contemporary philosophers have rediscovered li as central to an alternative philosophical approach to human rights. Instead of basing human rights on the individual’s intrinsic entitlement, it has been proposed that we need to pay more attention to the social nature of humanity. Viewed from this perspective, an oppositional definition of the relationship of the group and the individual and of human rights as needing to be protected and enforced against the group does not adequately take into account that the individual can only realize his or her humanity within the group. Li as moral and humanizing social interaction provides an alternative basis for human rights as basic elements of human dignity that are recognized and respected as such by all members of a moral community. As humanity can only be realized socially, human rights can also only be construed within human connectedness, for which li in turn provides the standard. Combining Confucian and communitarian approaches, this perspective seeks to remedy what it regards as an overemphasis on individual rights in contemporary discourse.

Philip Clart

See also Confucianism; Ethics; Human Rights

Further Readings

- De Bary, W. T. (1998). Asian values and human rights: A Confucian communitarian perspective. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- De Bary, W. T., & Weiming, T. (Eds.). (1998). Confucianism and human rights. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Fingarette, H. (1972). Confucius: The secular as sacred. New York: Harper & Row.

LIBERAL ISLAM

According to liberal Muslims, there is no clash between Islam and liberalism: individual freedom, democracy, cultural and religious pluralism, human rights, and gender equality are all sharable values. They legitimize the “reopening” of the gates of ijtihad (which means “effort to reason independently”), to interpret sacred scriptures in modern ways. Today, their main challenge is to extend their thoughts to popular audiences.

The expression liberal Islam has different interpretations, but it is possible to distinguish two main meanings related to its adjective. The first one refers to the value of liberty, and it is generally characterized by an academic approach and a full appreciation of Western liberalism. The second one refers to the process of liberation from symbolic and material oppressions, and it is characterized by a more militant approach and a double criticism, with respect to both “Islamic tradition” and “Western modernity.” Today, there are intellectuals following this second interpretation who define themselves as progressive Muslims.

Actually, liberal Islam is about not only reformed religious discourses but also political struggle.

Liberal Islam Today

Liberal Islam is not a new phenomenon because within Islamic history we can find intellectual traditions that can be considered liberal, such as the Mu'tazilah movement (eighth century). Contemporary liberal voices use the tools of modern social sciences and study Qur'an through historical and literary analysis. These intellectuals are emerging in every part of the Muslim world, but a significant number of them are experiencing exile in Western countries. They shift boundaries of “us versus them,” both in Muslim and Western societies, often claiming to be “at home” everywhere, as global citizens. Examples include Mohamed Talbi (Tunisia), Abu Zayd Nasr (Egypt/Netherlands), Abdullai An-Na'im (Sudan/United States), AbdolKarim Soroush (Iran/United States), Leila Ahmed (Egypt/United States), Farid Esack (South Africa/Pakistan/United Kingdom/Germany), and Chandra Muzaffar (Malaysia), among others. In the following sections, we will consider some of their main ideas.

Ijtihad as a Right

In liberal Islam, religious knowledge is no longer a monopoly of ulema, the experts in theology and jurisprudence. Every Muslim has the right to read the Qur'an within a dynamic and context-driven approach. Literalist reading is refused; liberal Muslims call for an interpretation of the spirit of the text. The Qur'an speaks personally to every Muslim.

Shari'a as a Human Interpretation of the Voice of Allah

Muslims are required to believe that the Qur'an is divine and the words of the Prophet Mohammed are inspired by Allah, but the Shari'a is a normative code, which is the product of human interpretations. This human translation of the voice of God should change according to new historical, political, and social contexts, and it should not be imposed at an institutional level. The coercive enforcement of Shari'a by the state betrays the Qur'an's insistence on voluntary acceptance of Islam. Just as the state should be secure from the misuse of religious authority, Shari'a should be freed from the control of the state. The idea of an “Islamic state” is based on European ideas of state and law and not on Islamic tradition.

Human Rights Can Also Have a Religious Foundation

There is nothing in the language of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights that precludes religious as well as secular foundations of the legitimacy of human rights. To develop a genuine universality and a sustainability of human rights, it is necessary to use multiple, local, and indigenous perspectives. Why can't Muslims quote Ibn Rushd instead of Kant to defend freedom of thought? Human rights are not Western; they are not confined to any specific people, culture, or religion. The conflict is not between Islam and human rights, but the real problem is related to specific historical understandings of Shari'a, for example, regarding the rights of women.

Gender Equality Within Islam

This issue is very often marked by stereotypes, essentialist discourses, and orientalism. For instance, as a part of her critical re-reading of Islamic history from a gender perspective, Leila Ahmed (Egypt/United States) shows that both the narrative of the veil as oppression and the counternarrative of the veil as resistance are misperceptions grounded on and reinforcing the basis of Western, colonial discourse. Through a reinterpretation of Islamic traditions, historical interpretations based on patriarchal societies are challenged. According to those scholars who are emerging at a global level, feminism and Islam are not contradictory terms. Qur'an, if properly understood and interpreted with a context-driven approach, is highly liberating, for both women and men.

Progressive Muslims

Social Justice

Social justice lies at the heart of Islamic social ethics. Progressive Muslims engage this strong tradition within Islam to translate it in modern times. Connecting discourses and practices, scholars/activists as Farid Esack (South Africa/Pakistan/United Kingdom/Germany) and Chandra Muzaffar (Malaysia) strive toward a humanism based on the Qur'an and stand behind the mustad'afun (the oppressed), wherever and everywhere they are. In this way, Islam becomes a type of "liberation theology."

Pluralism Inside and Outside the Umma

Secularism is the guarantee for pluralism, but it must be understood in a dynamic and deeply contextual sense for each society, rather than as preconceived notions to be "exported." Moreover, the engagement with democracy implies not only the recognition of the freedom of belief and faith but also the struggle to develop Islamic interpretations in order to create rooms for intrafaith and interfaith dialogues. Anyway, the goal is not only "to understand the Other," but above all to build solidarity networks that can cross cultural and religious borders.

Regarding the link between religion and politics, progressive Muslims state that Islamic tradition is an important inspirational source that clearly influences their private and public lives. But it is not the only source.

Liberal and progressive Islam are contested categories. The main criticism is related to their difficulty in enlarging their audience (going outside academic circles) and engaging in dialogue with people "inside the mosques." The challenge for the future is how to translate these democratic interpretations of Islam in order to integrate them into popular consciousness.

Annalisa Frisina

See also Gender; Human Rights; Islam; Modernism; Pluralism; Religious Freedom; Social Justice

Further Readings

- Abu Zayd, N. (2004). Rethinking the Qur'an: Towards a humanistic hermeneutics. Utrecht, Netherlands: Humanistic University Press.
- Abu Zayd, N. (2006). Reformation of Islamic thought: A critical historical analysis. Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press.
- Ahmed, L. (1992). Women and gender in Islam: Historical roots of a modern debate. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- An-Na'im, A. (1990). Toward an Islamic reformation: Civil liberties, human rights and international law. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.
- An-Na'im, A. (2008). Islam and the secular state: Negotiating the future of Shari'a. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Esack, F. (1997). Qur'an, liberation and pluralism: An Islamic perspective of interreligious solidarity against oppression. Oxford, UK: Oneworld.
- Kurzman, C. (Ed.). (1998). Liberal Islam: A source-book. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Muzaffar, C. (2002). Rights, religion and reform: Enhancing human dignity through spiritual and moral transformation. London: Routledge-Curton.
- Soroush, A. (2000). Reason, freedom and democracy. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Talbi, M. (1998). Plaidoyer pour un islam moderne [A plea for a modern Islam]. Paris: Desclée de Brouwer.
- Wadud, A. (2006). Inside the gender jihad: Women's reform in Islam. Oxford, UK: Oneworld.

LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM

Liberal Protestantism refers to a modern movement that seeks to formulate a form of Christianity contoured to the critical demands of modernity—one that works in consonance with, rather than in opposition to, Enlightenment philosophy, science, historical research, and culture as a whole. In regard to social issues, liberal Protestantism, or mainline Protestantism as it is sometimes referred to in distinction from evangelicalism, developed a “Social Gospel” that understands social responsibility and democratic ideals to stand at the forefront of religious life. If the Reformation shifted the emphasis of religious life from the church to the individual, liberal Protestantism seeks to shift the emphasis from the individual to society. Furthermore, liberal Protestantism came of age in Europe and the North America during the 19th century, when Western interest in the history of religions was born. Due to its liberal theological method and emphasis on cultural engagement, liberal Protestantism represents Christianity’s most significant attempt to recognize and appreciate non-Christian religious traditions. While the liberal Protestant tradition is Christocentric through and through, it is the foremost example of a form of Christianity that has actively engaged the academic study of religions. Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834) is the father of liberal Protestantism’s theological method. Schleiermacher constructed his understanding of religion and theological framework in response to the criticisms leveled at Christianity by German Romanticism, the critical epistemology of Immanuel Kant, and the pantheism of Baruch (Benedict) de Spinoza. Schleiermacher is thoroughly Protestant in that his theology is not founded on the authority of church tradition or teaching. He is thoroughly modern in that for him theology’s primary data come from the experience of the individual rather than from the Bible. For example, in The Christian Faith (1820–1821), Schleiermacher reinterprets the Christian notion of sin as the resistance of God consciousness or dependence on the infinite. Jesus exhibited perfect absolute dependence and thus enables the rest of humanity to be reconciled into such a God-conscious state. Thus, Schleiermacher did not discard the traditional doctrines of Christian theology; he instead argued that they must not be understood literally as metaphysical statements regarding existence but as linguistic expressions of Christian religious experience. Finally, Schleiermacher’s emphasis on experience over dogma resulted in an appreciative, rather than critical or exclusive, tone with regard to other religious traditions.

Despite appropriations of Schleiermacher’s work by Hegelians such as F. C. Baur (1792–1860), the most influential 19th-century heir of Schleiermacher was Baur’s temporary disciple Albrecht Ritschl (1822–1889). Ritschl agreed with Schleiermacher that Christian theology should begin with experience rather than dogma. However, Ritschl argued that objective historical data should be the fulcrum guiding Christian experience, rather than subjective feeling of the individual, as posited by Schleiermacher. For Ritschl, the goal was to discover the original and unique aspects of the historical founding of Christianity—that new aspect of religious consciousness created by the redeeming work of the historical Jesus. Furthermore, Ritschl understood ethics and social responsibility to stand at the helm of religious life. It is in Ritschl’s influential work that liberal Protestant theological method began to be translated into an optimistic form of social critique and progression.

Near the turn of the century, Adolph Harnack (1851–1930) and Ernst Troeltsch (1865–1923) took Ritschl’s method a step further. In What Is Christianity? Harnack (1990) set out to clear away the external authority of church dogma in order to pinpoint the original kernel of Christianity. He saw no worth in retaining the arbitrary teaching of the churches if it meant Christianity’s excommunication from culture as a whole. Troeltsch wanted to apply the historical method to Christian doctrine completely, thereby dissolving Christian dogma into the discipline of the history of religion. For Troeltsch, it is in the study of religion that we might be able to discern a common spiritual goal related to the absolute value of human existence.

Troeltsch’s view of Christianity’s place in the history of religions is an exemplary case of how the liberal Protestant tradition’s engagement with non-Christian religions evolved over time. In his early writings, Troeltsch asserted that Christianity was the highest form of human religious life and that it must be determined as such by an absolute value judgment—a theoretical framework, based on historical data, that would make such a claim evident. Over time, Troeltsch’s position changed. In his later work, Troeltsch is clear that he understands other religious traditions as capable of leading humanity to its objective spiritual goal. Christianity is not true in that sense that it is exclusively superior to other religions. But it must remain the centerpiece of Western life and thus true from the perspective of the Western mind. Its social and ethical impetus must remain at the core of Western life.

This social mission was carried out in the United States by Troeltsch's contemporary Walter Rauschenbusch, who combined a strong commitment to the spiritual dimension of human existence with a vision for radical social change. His Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907), Christianizing the Social Order (1912), and Theology and the Social Gospel (1915) spoke of the Kingdom of God as the social ideal of Christianity and turned to progressive politics to inaugurate such an ideal. In the 1920s and 1930s, Harry Emerson Fosdick (1878–1969) contributed to the vision of the Social Gospel by spreading the liberal Protestant message of social equality through the pulpit, eventually becoming the first pastor of New York City's Riverside Church in 1931. Fosdick consistently preached a message that posited the church as the community through which social change could and would take place. He criticized William Jennings Bryan's opposition to evolutionary theory at the Scopes monkey trial as a misuse of Scripture, converted to pacifism after World War I, and called Christians to remain loyal to the revolutionary social vision of Jesus' Kingdom of God rather than the corrupt economic system of society.

During the interwar and World War II periods, liberal Protestantism's theological method took an existential turn through the work of figures such as Rudolph Bultmann (1884–1976) in Germany and Paul Tillich (1886–1965; a German war immigrant) in the United States. In the correlationist spirit of Schleiermacher, Tillich attempted to translate the traditional theological language of Christian doctrine into terms used by existential philosophy. In terms of the Social Gospel during this period, Reinhold Niebuhr (1892–1971) was a frequent critic of what he understood to be liberal Protestantism's naive approach to social ethics (including pacifism). Niebuhr called for a "Christian realism" that employed a more critical and realistic approach to social ethics but one that continued to emphasize liberal Protestantism's overarching emphasis on social responsibility. Both Rauschenbusch and Niebuhr were theological influences on the young Martin Luther King Jr.'s (1929–1968) understanding of the social vision of Christianity during his time at Crozer Seminary and Boston University. King was raised in the tradition of the Social Gospel and later became an acquaintance of Reinhold Niebuhr, who admired King as a religious leader.

However, despite the loud reverberations of the Social Gospel in the civil rights movement led by King, liberal Protestantism's theological and social prominence had already begun to decline after World War I. In terms of theological method, the correlationist impulses of liberal Protestantism were forcefully opposed in the 1920s and 1930s by the dialectical theology of Karl Barth and other neo-orthodox theologians. In terms of Christianity's social vision, liberal Protestantism was slowly overshadowed by the rise of a fundamentalist neo-evangelical movement with Billy Graham as its most visible public figure. In the contemporary political context, the so-called Religious Right has taken center stage in terms of Christianity's political influence and social agenda in the United States. During the last half of the 20th century, liberal Protestant denominations experienced widespread decline in church membership. Yet liberal Protestantism continues to develop across the globe through the work of myriad figures, such as the New Testament scholar John Dominic Crossan, the minister and professor Peter J. Gomes, the scholarly and popular works of Marcus Borg, the theology and social vision of Professor Gary Dorrien and Episcopal Bishop John Shelby Spong, and the work of the philosopher John Hick. Contrary to widespread belief, some would argue that liberal Protestantism is experiencing a nearly unnoticed theological renaissance and even a resurgence in church growth.

Bradley Binn Onishi

See also Christianity; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Niebuhr, Reinhold; Protestant Christianity; Schleiermacher, Friedrich; Tillich, Paul

Further Readings

- Borg, M. J. (1998). The God we never knew: Beyond dogmatic religion to a more authentic contemporary faith. San Francisco: HarperOne.
- Dorrien, G. (2008). Soul in society. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress.

- Schleiermacher, F. (2008). On religion: Speeches to its cultured despisers (J. Oman, Trans.). Whitefish, MT: Kessinger.
- Welch, C. (2003). Protestant thought in the nineteenth century (Vol. 1: 1799–1870, Vol. 2: 1870–1914). Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock.

LIBERATION THEOLOGY

Liberation theology (LT) is a philosophical and theological movement that originated at the end of the 1960s and reached the height of activity in Latin America during the following two decades. It has had a huge influence in galvanizing liberationist movements generally, such as Black liberation theology and radical feminist theology, although here attention is given to its earlier and more formative phase in the Latin American context. In Latin America, the movement was principally confined to the Catholic Church, although it included a Protestant minority. The most important representatives include the Peruvian Gustavo Gutierrez, the Uruguayan Juan Luis Segundo, the Brazilians Hugo Assmann and Leonardo Boff, the Argentinean Enrique Dussel, the Chilean Pablo Richard, and the Spanish missionary from San Salvador, Jon Sobrino. These theologians believed that in the Latin American context of poverty and social injustice, Christianity should accept a political commitment in favor of social change. They claim to have thereby rediscovered the fundamentally political meaning of liberation in the biblical tradition, a tradition, they recall, that does not separate the eschatological promise of eternal salvation from the historical process of liberation of oppressed peoples. From this perspective, they defended the convergence of the Marxist philosophy of history and original Christianity's prophetic vocation of social criticism.

The Religious Context

LT emerged from a context distinguished by contemporary Christian renovation—the political-ideological effects of Latin American Cold War bipolarization and the global ferment of a generational culture of emancipation. Within Catholicism, the renovation movement culminated in Vatican Council II (1962–1965) and, in Latin America, the Second Latin American Episcopal Conference in Medellín, Colombia (1968). The Council invited Catholics to read the “signs of the times” and proposed a modernization or aggiornamento of the Catholic Church in the sense of the rationalization of doctrine and its greater compatibility with the modern world. The axis of renovation consisted of incorporating into the Catholic doctrine the modern values of progress and liberty, the challenges of social justice, and the latest developments of the human sciences. Nevertheless, this movement did not renounce placing the spiritual and communitarian principles of their ideal Christian society in opposition to the materialism and individualism of modern rationalism. On the Protestant side, in addition to the dynamism of theological thought, the renovation was characterized by the creation of the international ecumenical movement as institutionalized by the World Council of Churches (WCC) in 1948. The Catholic renovation movement worked closely with the WCC to promote the progress of developing nations within the framework of a more just international order, which was considered a necessary condition for world peace. The most important document of the Catholic developing-nation policy was the encyclical Populorum Progreso, published in 1967 by Pope Paul VI, which was inspired by Louis Lebert, the French Dominican founder of the Economy and Humanism movement, influential in South America.

The Sociopolitical Context

LT was mostly a product of the aforementioned Catholic renovation but was opposed to developmental reform. For LT's authors, except the “populist” faction in Argentina (Juan Carlos Scannone and Lucio Gera), the sociopolitical challenges of Latin America left no choice but to opt for revolutionary socialism. At that time, the Latin American context was characterized by the crises of development projects aimed at modernization and national integration as well as the multiplication of insurgencies and revolutionary movements inspired by the Cuban Revolution of 1959. The national-populist governments, often supported by the Catholic Church and reformist Catholic parties (e.g., Christian Democrats [CD]), had promoted the search for a third path to development as an alternative to both capitalist and socialist industrialization. The goal was to forge an alliance between social classes by invoking the defense of the national culture against the imposition of external models of modernization. The revolutionary radicalization process sought to develop, from a Marxist-Leninist perspective, the struggle against imperialism and class capitalism. The socialist option did not exclude nationalist ambitions of promoting a Latin American alternative to development in opposition to Western models of modernity; in fact, the intention was to deepen and establish the two paths of social progress and national identity in Latin American nations. From this perspective, the decisive influence of dependency theory in the social sciences exercised on LT during its formative years must be highlighted. Dependency theory did not analyze Latin America's underdevelopment as a lack of modernization but, rather, as a product of a dependent type of capitalism whose attempts at modernization fostered the very underdevelopment it was supposed to alleviate. LT's radical elements defended the path of revolutionary socialism, presenting it as the way to overcome the illusory attempts to reconcile the defense of national culture with self-sustaining capitalist modernization, condemned as accomplices to the imperialism of foreign capital and the conservative social order, respectively.

Liberation Theology and Social Change in Latin America

LT integrated antirationalist Catholic renovation with Marxist-inspired Latin American anticapitalism. In Europe, Catholicism had converted to modernity, seeking to better adapt it to its Christian ideal of society, thereby preserving the ideology of a "third path" qualitatively superior to liberalism and communism. Accordingly, the CD defended a societal project founded on Christian values but with an apparently nonconfessional perspective, which assumed the separation of religion and politics. LT identified with the revolutionary path to socialism from a Latin American perspective, in opposition to the models of Western modernity and the Catholic power structure's defense of faith as well as the attempt to combine the two. Hence, LT could retain the ideological elements of the Catholic opposition to modern rationalism, albeit integrated with revolutionary socialism, thereby diverging from the ideology of the "third way." The singularity of Latin American socialism justified the integration of the singularity of its religious and theological viewpoint with the historical project of socialism. Consequently, LT rejected the separation of politics and religion, proposing the imperative that the Catholic Church politically commit to social change. From LT's Latin American perspective, rejection of the principle of separation of politics and religion acquired a sense of "modernity" irreducible to the Western model of secularization. The Catholic religion, still decisive in the context of scant secularization in Latin America, became an agent of transformation and social progress in contrast to its traditional role of preserving the social order. Nevertheless, LT also rejected the reciprocal reduction of its revolutionary commitment and its religious vision. The movement was not defined as the expression of a Christian-inspired political movement but, rather, as the expression of the politicization of Christian sectors that combined to form a plurality of secular movements. Similarly, from the perspective of LT, individual Christians should assess the specific consequences of their political commitments in relation to their faith as well as consider the extent of religious contributions to revolutionary movements. During the Popular Unity (PU) Chilean government of Salvador Allende (1970–1973), the Christians for Socialism movement defended the compatibility of evangelical and socialist values and sought to involve the Catholic Church in the Chilean "transition to socialism" process. Members were active in different political areas of the PU without losing sight of the unity of their Christian identity or of the reciprocal implications of that identity and their revolutionary commitment.

LT was self-defined from the "Latin American perspective" that articulated Marxist language with its theological-religious axis of reflection. Gustavo Gutierrez (1971) affirmed that he did not offer a new subject for theological reflection but, rather a "new way of doing theology" as "critical reflection on historical praxis" (p. 33). He defined LT as a theology and, more amply, as an expression of Latin American Christian sociopolitical and pastoral experiences preceding the theological texts. The notions of a popular and progressive church underlined LT's concrete and dialectical option for the poor against oppressive structures, an option that was qualified as "preferential" after the intense debates at the 1979 Latin American Episcopal Conference in Puebla, Mexico. In this sense, a new ecclesial model was proposed and erected from local bases, in opposition to the centralized and vertical power structure of the Catholic Church. The basic ecclesial communities (BECs), conceived as local Bible study and popular "conscientization" groups, were presented as the principal concretization of the new model. Through the BECs, LT gave testimony to the mission and the fundamental significance of Christianity from the singular context of social violence.

Ambivalences of Liberation Theology

Of course, LT was not in any way a homogeneous movement. Its thought was conditioned by the diversity of national contexts and political movements in Latin America in addition to the diversity of social experience and the intellectual background of its exponents. Therefore, political positions and visions of politics were noticeably varied at both the ideological and practical levels. Nevertheless, affinity with Marxism was fundamental and constituted the framework for LT thought, although there was never a strict identification between the two. On this point, as with the relation between faith and politics, their positions oscillated but always remained within the established framework. At first, the founding texts appeared to identify with a Marxist vision of history without renouncing the originality of the Christian point of view. Later, when faced with negative reactions from the Catholic world, a philosophical distinction was made between Christianity's ethical option in favor of liberation and Marxism's scientific approach to "understand the causes of social injustice" without eliminating the convergence of the two. Even within its Latin American perspective, LT did not escape the contradictions between its theological-religious position and its philosophical-political option.

LT's contradictions are symptomatic of the ambivalence of its social dynamics. The liberation theologians correctly affirmed that their thinking was inseparable from those dynamics, but their observation also required a distancing from their discourse of justification. While LT integrated the social sciences into their theological thought, the theological-religious axis of that thinking extended beyond the field of theology toward other disciplines such as philosophy (Enrique Dussel and Ignacio Ellacuria), political economics (Franz Hinkelammert), pedagogy (Paulo Freire), psychology (Ignacio Martin Baro), and history through the work of the Latin American Commission on Studies of Church History. The social space of their thought also extended beyond academia, developing in parallel intellectual spaces of pastoral training and social activism. These were first located in the Latin American Episcopal Conference, national episcopal conferences, religious orders, international lay movements, and missionary dynamics of Latin American developing-world Catholicism, oscillating between the center and the periphery of the Catholic Church. A sector of the episcopate supported LT, which constituted a transversal minority school of thought within the institution. On the Protestant side, LT emerged more specifically from the Church and Society in Latin America movement, started in 1961, which was supported by the WCC with Rubem Alves, José Miguez Bonino, and Julio de Santa Ana. Subsequently, the proponents of LT moved to ecumenical and civic organizations in response to their increasing marginalization from official spaces within the Catholic Church. However, they were able to maintain positions in some national episcopal conferences, especially in Brazil; in religious organizations, particularly the Jesuits; and even in some dioceses, with support from the local bishop. LT, despite its ecumenism, was dominated by the Catholic worldview.

Based on these observations, and despite the scope of their social networks, LT should be specifically related to a transnational theological elite belonging to the Catholic clergy and the middle-class sectors of Latin American societies. These elites opposed the strict regulations of the academic and religious fields without ceasing to be conditioned by them. Their social commitment produced certain practical effects, although limited, in popular mobilization and legitimized the interests of their intellectual activism, which were ideologically involved with revolutionary radicalization. The heterodoxy of these elites should not obscure the fact that their members were agents of the ecclesial power structure. Their militant dynamics situated them in contradiction with the established status quo, but they never broke away from it, obligating these dynamics, beginning with the BECs, to comply with regulations. Finally, LT's Latin American dimension should not be analyzed in the simplistic framework of a binary opposition between the oppressed periphery and the Western center; their ideas circulated within transnational networks encompassing Latin America, North America, and Europe, which permitted these elites to benefit from important external support. LT was presented as a populist, progressive, and Latin American theology of social and religious dissent in the context of social poverty; in reality, LT represented more ambivalent social interests, which was precisely reflected in its sociopolitical impact. Although critical of the Catholic Church's traditional role, LT's exponents nonetheless depended on its social control structures, a constitutive part of the order they were attempting to transform. In this sense, the preservation of the faith's political positions in the context of limited, yet growing, secularization conflicted with the proclaimed modernity of their revolutionary commitment.

The Sociopolitical Impact of Liberation Theology

The sociopolitical impact of LT was important in the revolutionary movements and the guerilla wars of Central America, particularly in Nicaragua, where three priests (Ernesto Cardenal, Fernando Cardenal, and Miguel d'Escoto) held the office of minister in the Sandinista government of 1979. In many other countries of the region, Christian political participation tended to be less direct, principally due to the installation of military dictatorships, the intensification of political repression of leftists in South America during the 1970s, and the reaction LT's ideas provoked in the Catholic Church. The 1980s in particular were marked by the polemic between the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, which published two instructions on the subject in 1984 and 1986, and the principal liberation theologians, such as Gustavo Gutierrez and Leonardo Boff, who were condemned by the Congregation. Facing resistance on two fronts, LT sought to contribute to the formation of social and populist movements without losing sight of the political dimensions of the struggle, a stance that had a significant impact in Brazil.

Liberation Theology Today

Today, LT appears to have disappeared from contemporary Latin American affairs; the end of the Cold War and the historical crisis of the Marxist left, the progressive marginalization from official spaces within the Catholic Church, and the erosion of Catholic hegemony in Latin American societies explain the decline. Nonetheless, LT's legacy is still visible in Latin American Christianity, and its ideas continue to have a notable impact on social movements and in several sectors of civil society throughout the region, such as the Landless Workers' movement in Brazil and the Zapatista Army of National Liberation in Mexico. Current intellectual activity is marked by a process of pluralization of thought toward new areas of concern such as culture, ecology, and gender. The cause of pluralization is the crisis of the notion of a unifying subject of collective liberation expounded in exclusively socioeconomic terms, such as the people or the poor. Nevertheless, LT has never lost sight of the unity of the social struggle proclaimed against a common capitalist and imperialist adversary assimilated today under the rubric of neoliberalism.

Malik Tahar Chaouch

See also Christianity; Human Rights; Marxism; Postcolonial Theology

Further Readings

- Alves, R. (1968). Towards a theology of liberation. Princeton, NJ: Princeton Theological Seminary.
- Assmann, H. (1976). Theology for a nomad church. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Berryman, P. (1987). Liberation theology: The essential facts about the revolutionary movement in Latin America and beyond. New York: Pantheon Books.
- Boff, L. (1978). Jesus Christ, liberator: A critical Christology of our time. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.

- Ellacuria, I., & Sobrino, J. (1993). Mysterium Liberationis: Fundamental concepts of liberation theology. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Gutierrez, G. (1971). A theology of liberation: History, politics and salvation. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Hewitt, W., & Burdick, J. (Eds.). (2000). The church at the grassroots in Latin America: Perspectives on thirty years of activism. London: Praeger.
- Levine, D. (1992). Popular voices in Latin American Catholicism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Löwy, M. (1996). The war of the gods: Religion and politics in Latin America. London: Verso Books.
- Mainwaring, S., & Wilde, A. (Eds.). (1988). The progressive church in Latin America. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Smith, C. (1991). The emergence of liberation theology: Radical religion and the social movement theory. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Tahar Chaouch, M. (2007). The liberation theology in Latin America: A sociological re-interpretation. Revista Mexicana de Sociología, 69(3), 427–456.

LIBERIA

The Republic of Liberia adjoins the Atlantic Ocean on the west coast of Africa and shares borders with Sierra Leone, Guinea, and Cote d'Ivoire (Ivory Coast). Liberia was founded in 1841 by freed American slaves as a refuge from the racism and discrimination they faced in the United States, and in 2005, the country elected an American-educated woman as the first female African head of state. Since the first American Christians arrived in 1822, the history of this country has been shaped by American influences.

The slaves who immigrated to Liberia were primarily born and raised in the culture of the antebellum American South. As such, they brought with them Christianity as well as the belief that anything natively African was necessarily primitive and inferior to what the West had to offer. This disposition would lead to recurring tensions between the Americo-Liberian settlers and the native African population, some of which still exist. Despite their minority status (2%–3% of the population), the former slaves who immigrated to Liberia became that society's elite, and their descendants held all the highest government posts until 1980. The churches they started are some of the most prestigious in the nation, none more so than the Providence Baptist Church, dubbed "The Cornerstone of the Nation." Located in the capital city of Monrovia, it was established in 1822 by free Blacks sent as missionaries by the Richmond African Baptist Missionary Society of Richmond, Virginia. The signing of the declaration of independence and the meeting of the first legislative assembly for the new nation of Liberia were held inside the church. This and other settler churches continue to have strong ties with the United States through cross-cultural partnerships and pastor exchanges.

According to the 2008 national census, 85.5% of Liberians self-identify as Christians. However, there is some controversy among Christian groups as to whether the percentage is that high since some of the more conservative groups do not consider the syncretic incorporation of African traditional religion or secret societies (such as the Freemasons) into Christian practices to be legitimate forms of Christianity. In terms of non-Christian religions, the census reported that 0.5% of Liberians practice indigenous religions, 1.5% have no religion, and very small percentages (0.1%) practice other religions such as Baha'i, Hinduism, and Buddhism.

Practicing Muslims compose 12.2% of the population, most of whom are a part of the Vai and Mandingo ethnic groups. The 22nd president of Liberia, Charles Taylor, was an ally of Muammar Gaddafi, had trained in Libya, and was favorably disposed toward Muslims during his term. However, recently some Muslims have expressed frustration that the government does not officially recognize Muslim holy days in the same way that it does Christian ones. They are petitioning the current president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, to make the end of Ramadan a national holiday.

Kimberly Eberhardt Casteline

See also Africa; Christianity; Indigenous Religions

LIBYA

Libya is the fourth largest country in Africa and the 17th largest in the world. Its area is 694,983 square miles (1 mile = 1.609344 kilometers), all but 10% of which is desert.

An overwhelming number of Libyans are Sunnī Muslims. Overall, 97% are Muslims of one type or the other. Other religions are represented, including Christianity, Judaism, and Buddhism. Christians are present from many other countries, although the majority of are Coptic Christians from Egypt (about 60,000 people). About 40,000 Roman Catholics bring with them a European background. There is a small population of Buddhists in Libya. There are about 38,000 Jews left, a number greatly reduced from the pre-1945 numbers. From 1945 until 1948, there was a concentrated attempt to kill the Jews or drive them out. Thus, what was once a large, perhaps the largest, population of Jews in North Africa was greatly reduced.

Islam came to Libya in the seventh century and was firmly established in urban centers in the next century. It took another few hundred years for it to become established in the rural areas, largely through the efforts of Arab and Syrian Bedouins. There is no official policy of religious freedom, but the dictatorship generally does not harass people because of their religious beliefs. It is not tolerant, however, of any religious movement it deems to be a political threat, which means radical or fundamental Islam.

In 644, Uqba ibn Nafi conquered the territory that constitutes present-day Libya, and in 655, the region became part of the Ummayyad Caliphate. In 750, it became part of the Abbasid area and was subsequently governed as part of the Ottoman Empire. As a result of its victory in a war against Turkey in the early 20th century, Italy ruled the three North African areas of Cyrenaica, Tripolitania, and Fezzan, uniting them in 1934 as Libya. Italian rule was harsh, and an estimated one third of indigenous Bedouins died in concentration camps. After World War II, the United Nations moved to free Libya and make it independent; a resolution was signed on November 21, 1949, that Libya should be independent before 1952. On Christmas Eve in 1951, Libya declared its independence. King Idris, who had led the resistance to Italian rule, became the sovereign.

The discovery in 1959 of enormous oil reserves in Libya changed its history; almost overnight, Libya transformed from one of the poorer nations into one of the richer ones. Despite his heroic status, Idris later lost favor with the people because of his failure to share oil revenues with them in a manner they deemed equitable. In 1969, Muammar Gaddafi, a Bedouin, led a military coup, which led to his assumption of power and a change in the Libyan government and in its official name to The Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, a name coined by Gaddafi in keeping with his claim to have combined socialism and Islam into a Third International Theory. After years of foreign rule and monarchy, Libya was declared a people's republic.

Disillusioned by government corruption and the exploitation of the people, Gaddafi, then 27 years old, led the September 1, 1969, military coup that overthrew Idris. Shortly after, all vestiges of monarchy ended. Gaddafi, as "Brother, Leader, and Guide of the Revolution," has had a long career during which he has gone from being considered a terrorist in the West to attempting to change his image and having economic sanctions lifted against him. In 2011, protests against Gaddafi's power led to civil war and UN authorization of international military intervention to protect civilian lives.

Frank A. Salamone

See also Middle East; Muslim Brotherhood; North Africa; Religion and State

Further Readings

- Amal, O. (2002). Political culture in Libya. Richmond, UK: Curzon Press.
- El-Kikhia, M. O. (1998). Libya's Qaddafi: The politics of contradiction. Gainesville: University Press of Florida.
- St. John, R. B. (2002). Libya and the United States: Two centuries of strife. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Vandewalle, D. (2006). A history of modern Libya. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

LIECHTENSTEIN

The principality of Liechtenstein, a small, landlocked country in central Europe located between Switzerland and Austria, was founded in 1342. By 1434, the territory of the principality had reached its current boundaries. The Holy Roman Emperor

Charles VI granted the counties of Vanduz and Schellenberg, which constitute the present-day Liechtenstein, the status of a principality in 1719. Under the constitution adopted in 1921, the people of the principality were granted sovereign political rights.

The majority of the population of Liechtenstein is of ethnic Germanic origin, while resident aliens, such as Turks, Iranians, and others, constitute one third of the country's population. The official language of the principality is German; however, approximately 87.5% of the Liechtenstein nationals speak Alemannish, which is a south German dialect.

According to official statistics in 2000, the religious spectrum of the principality is composed as follows: Roman Catholic 78.4%, Protestant 8.3%, Muslim 4.8%, Christian Orthodox 1.1%, Jewish 0.1%, and other religions 0.4%. No formal religious affiliation was declared by 2.8% of the population; also for 4.1% of the population, indication of religious affiliation was not available.

In 2007, a representative survey was conducted, which demonstrated that a vast majority (two thirds) of the Liechtenstein population considered themselves very religious. Although the answers varied by different religious groups, more Muslims tended to consider themselves very religious (30%) than Catholics (15%). Also, according to the survey results, one in three respondents believed in God and in the existence of heaven.

Freedom of religion is endorsed by the Constitution of Liechtenstein and is generally respected by the government. Even though according to the constitution, the Roman Catholic Church is the national church of Liechtenstein and is fully protected by the state, the government undertakes necessary measures to protect the right to freedom of religion. The government funds the operations of religious institutions according to their membership size determined in a census count. Smaller religious groups can also apply for grants.

Since 1997, the government of Liechtenstein has started a process of disentangling religion and the state. In 2007, Prime Minister Otmar Hasler introduced a proposal on separation of church and state, which requires amendments to the constitution and the Religious Act, as well as revision of funding models for religious communities. According to the 2007 survey, a majority of the population of Liechtenstein supported the idea of respecting other religions and opposed the privileged position of the Roman Catholic Church by calling on the government to treat all religions equally. The survey respondents were very open toward Islam and the Muslim population of Liechtenstein. More than half the Christian respondents (53% Catholics and 54% other Christians) supported the idea of constructing a mosque.

Tigran Tshorokhyan

See also Austria; Germany; Roman Catholicism; Switzerland

Further Readings

- Bucher, A. (2001). Modern youth: Traditional God? Concepts of God among school youth in Liechtenstein. In H.-G. Zieberts, F. Schweitzer, H. Haring, & D. Browning (Eds.), The human image of God (pp. 313–328). Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Eccardt, T. (2005). Secret of the seven smallest states of Europe. New York: Hippocrene.
- Fox, J., & Sandler, S. (2005). Separation of religion and state in the twenty-first century: Comparing the Middle East and Western democracies. New York: City University of New York Press.

LITHUANIA

Lithuania, one of the Baltic states of northern Europe, has a religious life today marked by both a revival of traditional religious practices and increased secularization. At one time the last pagan country of Europe, Lithuania became an important center for Catholic and Jewish life in the region. Religiously motivated resistance to 20th-century Nazi and Soviet occupations helped galvanize Lithuanian national identity, even while that same foreign rule had devastating effects on Lithuania's religious life. The recent movement from Soviet rule to independence, and finally to incorporation into the European Union, has allowed Lithuanians to worship freely and at the same time has facilitated the marginalization of religion.

Religion has long played a significant role in Lithuanian cultural and national identity. The paganism of Lithuanians in the late Middle Ages was a uniting factor against the political advances of Christian Europe, and a 19th-century cultural rediscovery of Lithuania's pagan folklore was integral to the solidification of Lithuanian national identity. After Lithuania's incorporation into the Latin Church, Catholicism defined Lithuania against its Orthodox and Protestant neighbors and helped identify Lithuania with Poland and western Europe. In the 20th century, the Catholic Church was at the forefront of Lithuanian nationalism and the movement for independence from the Soviet Union.

The religious life of Lithuania since the mid-20th century has been marked by significant upheaval. Vilnius, Lithuania's political and cultural capital, was home to a vibrant Jewish community of more than 200,000 people, who were almost completely annihilated in the Holocaust. Furthermore, the Catholic Church was severely persecuted during Soviet rule, so that Lithuania's once vibrant Catholic culture moved underground and lost much of its influence. Independence from the Soviet Union brought new religious freedom, yet the religious infrastructure had to be revitalized and retooled for the challenges of independence.

In 2004, Lithuania entered the European Union, furthering its break with Russia and solidifying its Western orientation. Unlike much of Europe, however, Lithuania and Lithuanian religious life have been relatively unaffected by immigration. Nearly 80% of Lithuanians continue to identify as Roman Catholics, while the rest are Russian Orthodox, Protestant, or not affiliated with any religion. The Muslim population of Lithuania continues to be very small. Internal factors, however, point toward significant changes to Lithuania's religious life in the near future. Today's young Lithuanians never experienced the religious culture and religious persecution of their grandparents and parents, and so they tend not to associate religious practices with national identity. Furthermore, Soviet occupation left behind a very private and muted religious life, so that young people are less likely to be raised in communities centered on religious practices. As a result, there is good reason to think that Lithuania will see an increase in secularization in the coming years.

Joshua Evans

See also Baltic Countries; Communism; European Union; Roman Catholicism; Russian Federation

Further Readings

- Lane, T. (2001). Lithuania: Stepping westward. New York: Routledge.
- Sedaitas, J. B., & Vardys, V. S. (1997). Lithuania: The rebel nation. Boulder, CO: Westview.

LOCAL RELIGION

In popular usage, the term local religion denotes a religious belief or practice unique to a particular region, geographic location, or specific community. The concept of local religion, however, is commonly confused with folk religion—that is, religious beliefs and/or practices of regular or common people that are usually at odds with the “official” or regulated belief systems in a given area. In most instances, the “folk” in folk religion refers to uneducated peasants and superstitious villagers who go on pilgrimages, maintain certain superstitions, and are fascinated with rituals or the externals of religion. Sometimes folk religion is used interchangeably with the term vernacular religion. At least as it pertains to western Europe, vernacular means a language spoken in a particular region by both elites and nonelites, though the elites may privilege a “universal” language such as Latin. As an academic concept, local religion does not distinguish between those who practice a religion and those who officially regulate the religion in a particular region.

In the Philippines, many indigenous religious practices such as ancestor veneration and puberty ceremonies exist despite the people's acceptance of one form of Christianity or another. These beliefs and rituals vary from village to village, making one village's religious beliefs and practices different from others. Historically, although in the pre-Hispanic era, the Tagalogs had no religious hierarchy such as the priesthood in Roman Catholicism, there were medicine women who mediated between the temporal and the spirit worlds. They supervised and conducted rituals and performed sacrifices. These women were usually elderly and considered wise because of their experience. As elders, these women were transmitters of culture, language, and sacred knowledge. They functioned as healers, ceremonial experts, and prophets within their respective communities. If one of these medicine women were to enter another village, for example, her status and office would be respected but the new community would not be obligated, religiously or otherwise, to obey her commands. Some of these medicine women exist today but with Christian titles. This, however, is not unique to the Philippines. Recent research has shown that there have been similar interactions between Christianity and indigenous religious traditions throughout the world. Local religion and indigenous practices in general, even in western Europe, tend to be closely related. Many indigenous religious traditions are decentralized, without a single governing body to shape or form beliefs or practices; they are, in fact, governed by traditions—traditions that are subject to interpretation by community religious leaders and elders, which inevitably result in religious variations. The lack of a centralized authority whose function it is to regulate the beliefs and practices of a religion enables religious diversity to flourish more rapidly and with greater ease than if a governing body or a rigid hierarchical structure were present.

Religious variation can also be found in Protestantism. To be sure, many Protestant denominations are decentralized as well, which, as with indigenous religions, leads to a diversity of beliefs and practices. Although most Protestant denominations do have a governing structure of sorts, they are loosely united and maintain that scripture is the final authority on certain core issues. Since many Protestants believe that each individual's interpretation of scripture is as authoritative as that of any other Protestant, inevitably there arise theological and legal disputes. If these disputes are not resolved, in many cases, as a result, churches will branch off, with the new congregation modifying its practices based on the culture, language, and tradition of law of the surrounding community. The manifestations of these diverse beliefs and practices are examples of local religion.

As an academic concept, local religion does not necessarily denote a conflict between those who practice a religion in a particular region and those who officially regulate the religion. In Local

Religion in Sixteenth Century Spain, the historian William Christian Jr. gives the best scholarly account of local religion. For him, as an expert on early modern religion in Spain, there is no folk religion/official religion dichotomy. Rather, there is local and translocal religion. At times, the local dominates a given religious tradition in a particular location; at other times, the translocal dominates; and sometimes, though rarely, local and translocal are in harmony or act in concert. Local and translocal become similar, mirroring each other. As it pertains to the Catholic Church, the translocal consists of the overall aims and goals of the religious organization. The local, on the other hand, consists of the various aims and goals of small organizations or communities—that is, villages, prayer groups, and/or confraternities within the larger organization, which is the Catholic Church. Although the Bishop of Rome (the pope) and his advisors, for instance, may promulgate a law that decrees that all Catholic marriages must take place in a church, it may be the prerogative of an individual community to determine what in fact constitutes a church. The former is translocal religion, and the latter is local religion.

For William Christian, those responsible for producing, implementing, and regulating the official views of the Catholic Church were themselves products of communities that maintained their own traditions and practices, which may or may not have been in keeping with the Church's official system. Given the existence and acceptance of micropatriotism or hometown pride in early-modern Spain, Church officials were reluctant to formally condemn all the traditional beliefs and practices of a given community. Local religion was not always identified as a threat but was, in most cases, seen as a common occurrence in any religious community. In some ways, this also explains the diversity of beliefs and practices within the Catholic Church. Historians and scholars of religion are now examining the manifestations of local religion in colonial and modern Latin America. Indeed, some scholars are even researching local religion within the United States, although the focus of these studies has been immigrant and ethnic/racial minority religious communities.

Although the translocal/local religion distinction is one that is relatively easy to make, the designation of who belongs to what religion is more difficult for scholars of religion to make. As for what is meant by a Christian or a Catholic community, it is safest to make things simple: A Catholic community is one that identifies itself as such. The Manobos of the southern Philippines, for example, although they have combined the theological and ritual aspects of Catholicism with their animist beliefs, do not, nor have ever, defined themselves as Catholic. However, the Tagalogs of the central Philippines have defined themselves as Catholics and have done so since the late 16th century, although they have persistently resisted European colonialism. Indeed, in the late 16th century, Catholic religious movements in indigenous communities in the Philippines and the Americas became commonplace.

Many of these religious movements are usually dismissed by scholars as being “fanatical” disruptions, merely focusing on the externals of religion such as rituals, rather than manifestations of local religion. Although it may be problematic for some scholars, the proposed definition allows a group to define itself. This way of determining who is a member of what religion is less problematic than having someone foreign to a tradition determine who is of what religious persuasion. From a historical-theological perspective, one could argue that Protestants are not Christians because they do not acknowledge the authority of the Bishop of Rome. It works in the other direction as well. One could argue, as Martin Luther did, that Catholics are not truly Christians because they do acknowledge the authority of Rome, which is not based on scriptural authority. Although the local religion concept helps scholars little in determining religious identity, it does enable scholars to identify and explain regional variance or diversity within a given religion without creating a false division between the beliefs and practices of the common people and those of the elites within the same community. Even more, scholars can find one form or another of local religion in indigenous religious traditions, Christianity, and other global religions.

Robert L. Green Jr.

See also Folk Saints in Latin America; Indigenous Religions; Liberal Protestantism; Postcolonial Theology; Roman Catholicism

Further Readings

- Cannell, F. (1999). Power and intimacy in the Christian Philippines. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Christian, W. A., Jr. (1981a). Apparitions in the Late Medieval and Renaissance Spain. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Christian, W. A., Jr. (1981b). Local religion in sixteenth century Spain. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Nalle, S. T. (1992). God in La Mancha: Religious reform and the people of Cuenca, 1500–1650. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Nesvig, M. A. (Ed.). (2006). Local religion in colonial Mexico. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press.
- Orsi, R. A. (1985). The Madonna 115th Street: Faith and community in Italian Harlem. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Restall, M. (1997). The Maya world: Maya culture and society, 1550–1850. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Schroeder, S., & Poole, S. (2007). Religion in New Spain. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press.
- Taylor, W. (1999). Magistrates of the sacred: Priests and parishioners in eighteenth-century Mexico. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press.

LONDON

See Global Cities; United Kingdom

LONG, CHARLES H. (B. 1926)

Through more than 40 years of teaching, lectures, and writings, Charles H. Long has influenced hundreds if not thousands of scholars in religious studies, African American studies, sociology, and related disciplines. In the field of history of religions, he is arguably the preeminent African American scholar. His career began at the University of Chicago as a professor of history of religions, where he served as chair of the field as well as chair of the Committee on African Studies. His seminal volume, Significations: Signs, Symbols, and Images in the Interpretation of Religion, is widely recognized as an insightful articulation of how religion and the field of religious studies are to be understood within the hegemonic structures of western European culture, particularly in the Americas.

Charles H. Long's studies of religion interrogate a wide range of human activities—cultural, political, and global developments—as well as activities formally designated as religious. Religion, he contends, is the fundamental work of human beings; it constitutes sets of values that have evolved from human interactions and exchanges. From such a perspective, Long has described and illuminated religious activities and expression in economic domains such as the U.S. stock market. This exemplifies how religious studies can contribute to general discussions of human life.

For Long, religion is far from notions about the superiority of one group over another, as such superiority is not inherent to religion but a product of the values that evolve from human interaction. Superiority of ideas, processes, and proposed solutions is something that diverse groups achieve when engaged in significant exchanges. It is only through the critique embedded in interactional exchange that the truth of a person or group is recognized and valued. Truth is not inherent or self-evident.

Born in Little Rock, Arkansas, Long attended that city's public school system through Dunbar Junior College; during World War II, he volunteered for the U.S. Air Force. His first interest was mathematics, and he considered the profession of engineering but began to understand and acknowledge the integrity, validity, and truth of his experiences as an African American in a White racist and segregated society. This knowledge undergirded his experiences at Moody Bible College and as he progressed in the field of religious studies. He matriculated at the University of Chicago in 1949, where he received the bachelor of divinity degree and later the PhD. His established sense of self and self-worth refused to succumb to racism or racial segregation as he pursued his education. At the University of Chicago, Long studied with Professor Joachim Wach, a pioneer in the history of religions as an academic discipline in the United States. With other colleagues, he inaugurated the first curriculum for the study of religion at the University of Chicago undergraduate college and, together with Professors Mircea Eliade and Joseph Kitagawa, two other trailblazers in religious studies, Long established the international journal History of Religions.

His first book was Alpha: The Myths of Creation, published in 1963, and with his colleague Joseph Kitagawa, he edited The History of Religions: Essays on the Problem of Understanding in 1967. He was a founding member of the American Society for the Study of Religion and the Society of Black Religious Studies. He served as president of the American Academy of Religion. He is a member of the International Association of Historians of Religion, the National Humanities Faculty, and the American Society for the Study of Religion. He was chosen as the University of Chicago's Divinity School's Distinguished Alumnus of the Year in 1984 and received the Professional Achievement Citation of the University of Chicago Alumni Association in 1991. He was a senior editor of the second edition of The Encyclopedia of Religion.

Charles H. Long has served on faculties at major universities in and outside the United States; has taught in Australia, Japan, South Africa, and elsewhere; and has lectured on most major U.S. campuses, including historically Black colleges and universities. His intellectual legacy has influenced generations, and his work remains highly influential in religious studies and other related fields.

Jualynne E. Dodson

See also Christianity

Further Readings

- Long, C. (1999a). Passage and praise: The origin of religion in the Atlantic World. In Q. H. Dixie & C. West (Eds.), The courage to hope: From Black suffering to human redemption (pp. 11–21). Boston: Beacon.
- Long, C. (1999b). Significations: Signs, symbols, and images in the interpretation of religion. Aurora, CO: Davies. (Original work published 1986)
- Long, C. (2005). Transculturation and religion: An overview. In L. Jones (Ed.), Encyclopedia of religion (2nd ed., Vol. 12). Detroit, MI: Thomson-Gale.

L'ORDRE DU TEMPLE SOLAIRE

See Solar Temple Order

LOS ANGELES

The effects of globalization have endowed several geographical locations with economic, political, social, and cultural significance. Los Angeles, California, is the second largest city in the United States, and although it is not considered to be one of the urban sociologist Saskia Sassen's three "global cities"—referring to New York, London, and Tokyo—it is regarded as a major contributor to several cultural aspects of California and the larger United States. As the county seat, the city of Los Angeles is surrounded by 88 other cities, incorporating more than 10 million residents.

From its very inception in the mid-18th century, the city of Los Angeles has been associated with religion and has contributed widely to the diversity of faith-based communities. The current distribution of religious congregations and centers attests to the transnational history and culture of religion within a global context.

The name Los Angeles originates from a Spanish-Franciscan missionary expedition that took place in 1769. On August 2 of that year, the Franciscan priest Father Juan Crespi named the Los Angeles River after Nuestra Señora de los Ángeles de Porciúncula (Our Lady of the Angels of the Small Portion). Adhering to the Franciscan calendar, Crespi's choice of names referred to the celebration of the Feast of Perdono, which takes place at the chapel of St. Francis de Assisi. As this chapel is particularly small, its name was accompanied by the Italian word porziuncola, or "small parcel of land." Crespi gave the river its name in honor of the chapel and the calendar date when the river was found by the expedition.

In 1781, the Spanish governor Felipe de Neve founded the city of Los Angeles, naming it El Pueblo de Nuestra Señora la Reina de los Ángeles de Porciúncula (The Town of Our Lady, the Queen of the Angels of the Small Portion). Forty years later, following Mexico's independence from Spain, Los Angeles became part of Mexico, only to be ceded to the United States of America according to the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848.

Since the time of Father Crespi's visit to the banks of the Los Angeles River, the "City of Angels," as it is popularly known, has grown to become a cultural hub for more than 3.5 million residents, making Los Angeles well known for its international diversity. According to the U.S. Census Bureau data for the year 2000, of these 3.5 million Angelenos within Los Angeles proper, roughly 50% are listed as Latin American, another 30% are listed as White, while African and Asian Americans make up some 10%. The remainder are a mix of various ethnic and national identities, largely immigrants from other countries, or do not identify themselves in these terms.

Along with this racial and ethnic diversity comes a variety of religious communities scattered throughout the city's nearly 500 square miles (1 mile = 1.609344 kilometers). The religious fabric of Los Angeles is largely composed of five major religious traditions, including Catholicism, Protestantism, Judaism, and Islam. There are also significant, though considerably smaller, representative populations from Buddhism, Hinduism, Sikhism, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and the Jehovah's Witnesses faiths.

Despite the Catholic predominance established by the tradition of the Franciscan missionary expeditions during the late 18th and early 19th centuries, Catholicism faced an encroaching Protestant immigration from the Midwest during the late 19th century. From the 1960s onward, however, Catholicism has managed to increase and maintain the largest membership in Los Angeles County—an estimated 4 million members. Cardinal Roger Michael Mahony has overseen the Archdiocese of Los Angeles since 1985, presiding over the building of the Cathedral of Our Lady of the Angels, completed in September 2002.

Along with the Catholic Archdiocese, the spectrum of Christianity in Los Angeles encompasses a variety of Protestant traditions. The First Congregational Church is the oldest active Protestant denomination in the city of Los Angeles. The congregational lineage of the First Church can be traced to the original Pilgrim Separatists of the early 17th century, and it was founded in 1867 by holding meetings in the Los Angeles home of the church member Amanda Scott. Today, the church continues to serve thousands of Angelenos.

In addition to the presence of the First Congregational Church, a significant event in Protestantism took place in Los Angeles at the turn of the 20th century. In 1906, a Pentecostal gathering known as the “Azusa Street Revival” took place at the Stevens African Methodist Episcopal Church in downtown Los Angeles. Led by the preacher William J. Seymour, the Pentecostal revival continued for the next 9 years, until 1915. Although the revival led to the rise of several ethnic-oriented missionary sects, the original Azusa Street event is popularly referred to as the birthplace of the Pentecostal movement.

With nearly 500,000 Jewish residents, the second largest population of Jews in the United States, Los Angeles County is home to the Conservative, Orthodox, Reconstructionist, and Reform branches of Judaism. In addition to the religiously oriented enterprises, several Jewish community organizations geared toward social, cultural, and educational well-being exist throughout Los Angeles proper, including the Jewish Federation, the Simon Wiesenthal Center, and the Museum of Tolerance.

Islam accounts for another major portion of religious practitioners in Los Angeles County. More than 90,000 Muslims practice in an estimated 50 mosques or centers. Like the Jews, Muslims in Los Angeles have a number of Islamic centers of worship and resource venues, including the Masjid Omar ibn Al-Khattab and Islamic Center of Los Angeles.

Salvador Jiménez Murguía

See also Global Cities; Missions and Missionaries; North America; Roman Catholicism

Further Readings

- Abu-Lughod, J. L. (1999). New York, Los Angeles, Chicago: America's global cities. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Albanese, C. (2006). America: Religions and religion. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth.
- Davis M. (1990). City of quartz: Excavating the future in Los Angeles. New York: Vintage Books.
- Dear, M., & Flusty, S. (1998). Postmodern urbanism. Annals of the Association of American Geographers, 88, 50–72.
- Sassen, S. (2000). The global city: New York, London, Tokyo (New Updated Ed.). Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

LOTUS

The lotus plant and its flower have long been symbols of purity and nonattachment in the myriad religious traditions of diverse cultures spanning Asia, from Afghanistan and India to Indonesia and Japan, although worldwide the lotus is perhaps most commonly identified with Hinduism and Buddhism. Due to the natural characteristics of the plant, the lotus has persisted as a symbol of a variety of spiritual virtues for thousands of years. Moreover, the seeds, roots, young leaves, and flowers of the lotus plant are all edible and are common features of the Asian diet as well as being used in traditional medicine. Both India and Vietnam have honored the plant as symbols of their nations, naming the lotus as their national flower.

The roots of the lotus plant draw their sustenance from the mucky bottoms of waterways, rivers, lakes, and ponds, and from these depths, the plant's stalk grows until it reaches the water's surface, where the lotus leaves unfold like a lily pad. The leaves of the lotus plant are water resistant, with any rain or water poured on them simply running off into the river or pond. It is these features of the plant that have allowed for it to become such a lasting symbol of the nonattachment to worldly desires that is so highly sought after in many Asian religious movements. Indeed, the Bhagavad Gita at one point likens those who act in the world without attachment to the world to the leaves of the lotus, which are unaffected by the water's touch. For Buddhists, the fact that the lotus has its roots in the mud while its leaves and flowers float untouched above the water demonstrates the ultimate nondistinction between samsara and nirvana.

The lotus flower, which can range in color from pink to yellow to white, displays a beauty that has long been a feature of the iconography of Indian religions, including Buddhism as it spread to the east. Vishnu, Lakshmi, and other deities of Hindu traditions, as well as various Buddhas and bodhisattvas, are commonly depicted sitting on, adorned with, and/or holding up lotus flowers. The lotus is referenced in India's religious literature such as the Puranas and the Vedas and has lent its name to one of the most important Buddhist scriptures of East Asia, the Lotus Sutra.

The lotus position is the name given to what is arguably the most famous body position to be found in the tradition of hatha yoga. This pose, in which one sits with the legs folded so that the soles of one's feet face upward from one's lap, is also one of the most common forms of seated meditation in Buddhism.

Ryan J. T. Adams

See also Hinduism; Mahayana Buddhism

LOURDES

Lourdes, located in the Hautes-Pyrénées area in France, is among the world's most important places of Catholic pilgrimage. Each year, Lourdes welcomes nearly 6 million visitors.

The religious significance of Lourdes originated in the events of February 11, 1858, when young Bernadette Soubirous, a 14-year-old girl from a modest family and in poor health, claimed to have seen a "young lady" who appeared to her in Massabielle's grotto, close to the village of Lourdes. According to Bernadette's account, she was the chosen witness of 18 apparitions, during which she was given the task of messenger. Afterward, a water spring was discovered thanks to the "young lady's" indications and was soon credited with having miraculous properties, which has contributed notably to the increase in the thaumaturgic fame of the locale. Father Peyramale, the village abbot, pressed Bernadette to identify the apparition's nature, while some local residents already speculated that it could be the Virgin Mary. During the 16th apparition, Bernadette claimed that she received, in local dialect, the following answer: "I am the Immaculate Conception." This claim echoed the dogma of the Immaculate Conception that had been proclaimed by the Vatican 4 years previously. From this date on, ecclesiastical authorities have stood up for the authenticity of Bernadette's apparitions, and the little village of Lourdes has attracted more and more people.

On January 18, 1862, after 3 years of investigation, the Bishop of Tarbes, his lordship Laurence, declared acknowledgment of the authenticity of the apparitions, based on evaluation of Bernadette's mental health, on seven cases of healing officially recognized as miraculous, and on the impressive religiosity that had characterized the locale since the events. Since then, the Church has erected large sanctuaries and developed a whole infrastructure necessary to receive thousands of pilgrims. Bernadette Soubirous, determined to become a nun in the Congrégation des sœurs de la Charité de Nevers, left Lourdes in 1864 and did not return. To the present day, pilgrims flock to this little village of the Hautes-Pyrénées, which fate has irrevocably changed.

After the apparitions of the "rue du Bac" (Paris, 1830), of La Salette (1848), of Lourdes (1858), and of Pontmain (1871), Marian pilgrimages have experienced an important renewal; in consequence, ecclesial institutions have been willing to control and to organize them. During the 19th century, places of Marian apparition posed a double challenge for the Church: On the one hand, the stimulation of Marian religious faith resulted in the questioning of ecclesiastic authorities, and on the other, the miraculous healings, which were necessary for the Church to authenticate the apparitions, generated exchanges of polemics between Church authorities and members of the medical science community during that positivist century. With the medical commission of 1959, the Bureau des Constatations Médicales in 1883, and then the International Medical Committee of Lourdes in 1947, Lourdes has become the pioneer of implementation procedures that aim to appeal to medical judgment for authenticating miraculous healings.

As the primary site of contemporary Catholic pilgrimage, Lourdes continues to welcome great numbers of pilgrims. At the same time, the nature of the pilgrimage itself underwent a change during the latter 20th century. Related perhaps to broader changes in religious observance in Western societies, the devotion to "Notre Dame de Lourdes" lost its character of religious duty and focused more on issues of inner healing. If pilgrims formerly came to Lourdes in the hope of healing their own physical ailment or that of a close relative, today pilgrims are more inclined to see Lourdes as a suitable place to express their pain and to acquire a new vision of the meaning of their own life.

Laurent Amiotte Suchet

See also Pilgrimage; Virgin Mary

Further Readings

- Harris, R. (1999). Body and spirit in the Secular Age. London: Penguin Books.
- Laurentin, R. (1961–1964). Lourdes, histoire authentique des apparitions (6 vols.). Paris: P. Lethielleux.

LUCKMANN, THOMAS (B. 1927)

Thomas Luckmann was born in Slovenia and was educated at the universities of Vienna and Innsbruck in Austria and at the New School for Social Research in the United States. A professor of sociology, he has taught in the Graduate Faculty of the New School for Social Research (New York) and at the University of Constance, Germany (among other institutions). His work focuses mainly on social theory with significant implications for the sociology of religion and also for philosophy and sociology in general.

Luckmann is widely viewed as an interesting figure in the historical trajectory of secularization theory, not the least for his markedly open-ended, functional definition of religion. In his The Invisible Religion (1967; originally published in 1963 in German as Das problem der Religion), Luckmann defines religion as a “transcendence of biological nature by the human organism” (p. 49), the process by which humans create a meaningful world for themselves. The breadth of the definition renders secularism more or less impossible, but Luckmann distinguishes between religion as a human constant, on the one hand, and organized, social forms of institution-related religion, on the other, allowing for the serious decline of the latter in modern societies. Luckmann’s definition of religion has exposed him to a string of criticisms. These include the assessment that the definition leads to excessive conceptual confusion, which cannot be resolved through empirical study, and that it bears relevance for individualistic forms of religion but is unable to account for more collective forms of religion and is thus of limited applicability beyond certain parts of the West.

At the same time, Luckmann is lauded by some scholars for firmly embedding the study of religion in wider social theory by locating religion centrally in the debate on the position of the self in modern society. The trend is continued with The Social Construction of Reality, cowritten with Peter Berger, where religion appears as one element of the construction of reality (the book was published directly in English in 1966 and is thus often mistaken to have preceded Luckmann’s thinking in The Invisible Religion). According to its authors, The Social Construction of Reality was intended as a systematic, theoretical treatise in the sociology of knowledge. The book was critical as a move away from the sociology of the 1950s and 1960s, which saw religion and religious values as central to the social order in place. The Social Construction of Reality proclaimed that the social order is not “in place” but is constructed by individuals, or groups of individuals, as part of their own constructions (and maintenance) of their definitions of reality; religion enters the process here.

Luckmann delved further in-depth with these themes in The Structures of the Life World, co-authored with the phenomenologist Alfred Schütz, under whom he had studied at the New School of Social Research (1973; a second volume appeared in English in 1989, and both were published posthumously for Schütz). Here, the elementary structures of everyday life were examined as the underpinnings of social experience, language, and social action and, by extension, of the history of humankind. Some of Luckmann’s other influential texts are listed in the Further Readings.

Effie Fokas

See also Berger, Peter; Local Religion

Further Readings

- Beckford, J., & Luckmann, T. (Eds.). (1989). The changing face of religion. London: Sage.
- Berger, P., & Luckmann, T. (1995). Modernity, pluralism and the crisis of meaning: The orientation of modern man. Gütersloh, Germany: Bertelsmann Foundation.
- Luckmann, T. (1983). Life world and social realities (A collection of Luckmann’s essays in social theory). London: Heinemann.

LUXEMBOURG

Luxembourg, a small western European country bordered by Belgium, France, and Germany, counted around 500,000 inhabitants in 2010, of whom 43% are foreigners. Most of the migrants have come from European Union (EU) nations, chiefly from Portugal but also from Italy, France, and Belgium, and therefore are mostly of Roman Catholic origin.

According to the European Values Study (EVS) of 2008, 75% of the populace declare themselves as belonging to a religion: 69% Catholic, around 2% Protestant, 2% other Christian religions, and around 2.5% non-Christian religions. One out of four inhabitants declares not belonging to any religion.

Relationships between the state and religions are organized by bilateral agreements signed between the state and official representatives of most of the religious bodies. This model of relationship is issued from the “Concordat” of 1802 with the Catholic Church. Five criteria must be fulfilled to be eligible to sign a convention with the state: The religion must (1) have international recognition, (2) be recognized in at least one EU country, and (3) be ready to submit itself to law and order in Luxembourg and (4) to be established in the country (5) in sufficient members. This convention gives a legal status to the designated church and affects the number of its clergy. The state is allowed to intervene in their nomination and takes charge of their salaries and pensions as they are assimilated to the civil service.

The last convention signed with the Catholic Church (represented by the Archbishop) was in 1997. Conventions exist also with the Protestant Church of Luxembourg, the Jewish communities, the Hellenic Orthodox Church of Luxembourg, and the Anglican Church. During the Balkan war, the influx of refugees increased and modified the religious landscape so that conventions were also signed with the Rumanian Orthodox Church of Luxembourg, the Serbian Orthodox Church of Luxembourg, and the Assembly of Muslim Worship in Luxembourg.

During the past decade, a certain distance can be observed regarding religious institutions. While the percentage of people who declared affiliation with a religion remained stable, religious attendance shows deep changes. The proportion of those who observe regular religious practices decreased dramatically, reaching 13% in 2008 (21% in 1999); 53% do not attend religious services (48% in 1999). But at the same time, the proportion of those considering religion important in life remains stable (around 43%), and religious identity is still shared by more than 55% of the population, who consider themselves religious.

In a 2008 survey in Luxembourg, one’s particular religion was not seen as the only possibility of a true religion as 60% of people declared that all great world religions contain some basic truths. Almost half of those who belong to a religion share this opinion, as do almost half of those who declare that they do not belong to any religion.

Monique Borsenberger

See also Belgium; France; Roman Catholicism

Further Readings

- Boeglin, J. G. (2006). Etats et religions en Europe [States and religions in Europe] (Vol. 2). Paris: L’Harmattan.
- Borsenberger, M., & Dickes, P. (2011). Religion au Luxembourg: Quelle évolution entre 1999 et 2008? [Religion in Luxembourg: What evolution between 1999 and 2008?]. Luxembourg, Germany: Les Cahiers du CEPS/INSTEAD No. 2011–03.
- Majerus, B., Kmec, S., & Margue, M. (2009). Inventing Luxembourg (national cultivation of culture). Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF GLOBAL Religion

Editorial Board

Editors

Mark Juergensmeyer
University of California at Santa Barbara

Wade Clark Roof
University of California at Santa Barbara

Advisory Board

Säid Amir Arjomand
State University of New York at Stony Brook

Peter L. Berger
Boston University

David Chidester
University of Cape Town

Grace Davie
University of Exeter

Diana L. Eck
Harvard University

Danièle Hervieu-Léger
École des hautes études en sciences sociales, Paris

T. N. Madan
University of Delhi

Vasudha Narayanan
University of Florida

Jacob Olupona
Harvard University

Susanne Rudolph
University of Chicago

Rita Laura Segato
University of Brasilia

Wai Lun Tam
Chinese University of Hong Kong

Managing Editors

Kendall Busse
University of California at Santa Barbara

Emily Linthicum
University of California at Santa Barbara

Jonathan H. X. Lee
San Francisco State University

Martha L. Smith-Roberts
University of California at Santa Barbara

John Soboslai
University of California at Santa Barbara

Stephanie J. Stillman
University of California at Santa Barbara

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF
GLOBAL Religion

2

MARK JUERGENSMEYER
WADE CLARK ROOF
University of California, Santa Barbara
EDITORS

Los Angeles | London | New Delhi
Singapore | Washington DC

Los Angeles | London | New Delhi
Singapore | Washington DC

FOR INFORMATION:

SAGE Publications, Inc.
2455 Teller Road
Thousand Oaks, California 91320
E-mail: order@sagepub.com

SAGE Publications Ltd.
1 Oliver's Yard
55 City Road
London, EC1Y 1SP
United Kingdom

SAGE Publications India Pvt. Ltd.
B 1/1 Mohan Cooperative Industrial Area
Mathura Road, New Delhi 110 044
India

SAGE Publications Asia-Pacific Pte. Ltd.
33 Pekin Street #02-01
Far East Square
Singapore 048763

Publisher: Rolf A. Janke
Assistant to the Publisher: Michele Thompson
Developmental Editors: Diana E. Axelsen, Yvette Pollastrini
Reference Systems Manager: Leticia M. Gutierrez
Reference Systems Coordinator: Laura Notton
Production Editor: Jane Haenel
Copy Editor: QuADS Prepress (P) Ltd.
Typesetter: C&M Digital (P) Ltd.
Proofreaders: Kris Bergstad, Sandy Zilka
Indexer: Virgil Diodato
Cover Designer: Candice Harman
Marketing Manager: Kristi Ward

Copyright © 2012 by SAGE Publications, Inc.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or utilized in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

Printed in the United States of America.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of global religion / edited by Mark Juergensmeyer and Wade Clark Roof.

p. cm.
"A SAGE reference publication."
Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-0-7619-2729-7 (cloth)

1. Religions—Encyclopedias. I. Juergensmeyer, Mark.
II. Roof, Wade Clark.

BL80.3.E52 2012
200.3—dc23 2011019305

11 12 13 14 15 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Contents

Volume 2

List of Entries vii

Entries

M	723	T	1255
N	865	U	1315
O	951	V	1335
P	965	W	1369
Q	1037	Y	1391
R	1045	Z	1399
S	1109

Index 1409

To the Memory of Ninian Smart, Pioneer in the Study of Global Religion

List of Entries

Abakuá Secret Society
‘Abbāsīd Caliphate
Abduh, Muhammad Abortion
Adams, James Luther Afghanistan Africa Aging Ahmaddiya
Akbar
al Qaeda
Al-Azhar
Albania
al-Banna, Hasan
Alexander the Great Algeria
Amsterdam Ancestors
Ancient Near Eastern Religions
Andorra
Anglicans
Angola
Anguilla Animals
Anti-Americanism
Antiglobalism. See Globalization
Antigua and Barbuda
Antimodernism. See Modernism
Anti-Semitism
Apocalypticism Apostle Paul Arabic
Argentina
Armenia
Art
Aruba
Aryans
Asahara, Shôkô
Asceticism
Ashkanaz
Asoka
Assimilation
Assyrian Church of the East
Astronomy
Atheism
Atta, Mohammad
Augustine
Aum Shinrikyô
Auroville Australia
Austria
Authority
Autochthonous Christians in Latin America
Axial Age
Ayahuasca Religious Movements
Ayodhya Mosque Attack
Azerbaijan
Aztecs

Bab, Sayyid ‘Ali Muhammad
Babi
Baha’i
Bahamas
Baha’u’llah
Bahrain
Bali. See Southeast Asia Baltic Countries
Banaras
Bangladesh
Barbados
Barker, Eileen
Base Communities in Latin America
Bataille, Georges
Battle of Badr
Batuque de Porto Alegre
Beijing

- Belarus
Belgium
Belgrade
Belize
Bellah, Robert
Benedict XVI
Benin
Berger, Peter Bermuda Bhakti
Bharata Natyam
Bharatiya Janata Party
Bhutan
Bible bin Laden, Osama. See al Qaeda Black Muslims
Blavatsky, Helena P.
Bodh Gaya
Bolivia
Borderlands
Borobudur. See Southeast Asia
Bosnia and Herzegovina
Botswana
Brahmanical Hinduism
Branch Davidians
Brazil
Bricolage
Brunei Darussalam
Buddhism. See Mahayana Buddhism;
 Theravada Buddhism; Vajrayana, Tibetan
Buddhist Compassion Relief
 Tzu Chi Foundation
Buddhist Law Bulgaria
Burka
Burkina Faso
Burma. See Myanmar
Burundi

Cairo. See Egypt
Cambodia
Cameroon
Campbell, Joseph
Canada
Candomblé Canterbury
Cao Dai
Cape Verde
Cargo Cults

Caribbean
Catholic Charismatic Renewal
Catholic Charities
Center for the Study of World Religions.
 See Smith, Wilfred Cantwell
Central African Republic
Chad Charisma
Chechnya
Chile
China
Chinese Popular Religion
Christian Democratic Parties
Christian Identity
Christian Militia
Christian Reconstructionism
Christianity
Christmas
Church of Latter-Day Saints. See Mormons
Church World Service
Churches
Cinema
Civil Religion
Civil Society
Clash of Civilizations Thesis Clothing
Colombia
Colonialism (Historical).
 See Postcolonialism
Comunione e Liberazione
Communism
Comoros
Compostela
Confucianism
Conspiracy Theories Constantine
Constantinople
Consumer Culture
Conversion
Cook Islands
Coptic Christianity
Cosmic War and Cosmic Conflict
Costa Rica
Council of Nicea
Creationism
Croatia
Crusades
Cuba
Cultural Revolution (China)
Curaçao

-
- Cyberspace. See Internet
Cycle of Rebirth
Cyprus Czech Republic
- Da Vinci Code, The* Dalai Lama
dan Fodio, Osman
Daoism
Death Ritual
Democratic Republic of the Congo
Deng Xiaoping
Denmark
Desecularization
Detainees
Detraditionalization and Retraditionalization
Dharma, Karma, and Samsara
Diaspora
Divination
Divine Law
Divine Light Mission Djibouti
Dōgen
Dominican Republic
Douglas, Mary
Dubai. See United Arab Emirates
Dumont, Louis
Durkheim, Émile
- East Asia. See China; Japan; Korea, Democratic People's Republic of (North Korea); Korea, Republic of (South Korea); Taiwan
East Timor
Easter
Eastern Orthodox Christianity
Ebenezer Baptist Church
Eckankar
Economic Issues and Religion
Ecuador
Ecumenicalism
Egypt
El Salvador
Eliade, Mircea
Emergent Religion
Encyclicals
Engaged Buddhist Groups England Enlightenment
Enuma Elish
- Environment Equality
Equatorial Guinea
Eritrea
Estonia
Ethics
Ethiopia
Ethnic Cleansing. See Refugees
Ethnic Nationalism
Ethnogenesis Europe
European Court of Human Rights
European Union
Evangelical Movements
- Faith Tourism
Falun Gong
Faraj, Abd al-Salam
Faroe Islands
Father Divine and the Peace
Mission Movement
Fátima
Fatwa
Fellowship of Reconciliation
Feng Shui (Geomancy) Festivals
Fez
Fiji
Finland
Flood Myth
Fo Guang Shan
Folk Saints in Latin America
Foucault, Michel
France
French Polynesia
French Revolution
Freud, Sigmund
Fulani Jihad
Fundamentalism
- Gabon
Gambia
Gandhi, Mohandas
Ganga
Gautama, Siddhartha
Gay and Lesbian Theology Gaza
Geertz, Clifford
Gender
Generation X. See Generational Change

-
- Generational Change
 Geneva Convention
 Georgia
 Germany
 Ghana
 Ghazali
 Ghost Dance Religion
 Gilgamesh Epic
 Girard, René
 Global Capitalism and Religion
 Global Cities
 Global Migration
 Global Religion
 Global Secularization Paradigm
 Globalization
 Globalization and Conversion
 Glocalization
 God
 Goddess
 Golden Rule
 Google
 Gospel of Judas
 Gospel of Thomas
 Granada
 Greece
 Greenland
 Grenada
 Guadeloupe
 Guam
 Guatemala
 Guernsey
 Guinea
 Guinea-Bissau
 Gulen Movement
 Guru Nanak
 Guyana

 Haiti
 Hajj
 Halakha and Shari'a
 Halal
 Hallelujah Movement
 Hamas
 Hare Krishna (International Society for Krishna Consciousness)
 Hawai'i
 Heaven
 Heaven's Gate Hebrew

 Hell
 Henotheism
 Heresy
 Hezbollah
 Hijab
 Hindu Law
 Hindu Nationalism
 Hindu Orthopraxy
 Hindu Traditions in Southeast Asia.
 See Southeast Asia
 Hinduism
 Hiroshima and Nagasaki
 Hoa Hao
 Holidays
 Holistic Spirituality
 Holocaust
 Honduras
 Hong Kong
 Human Rights
 Hungary
 Hybridization

 Ibn Khaldūn
 Iceland
 Igreja Universal
 Immigration
 Incas
 India
 Indigenous Religions
 Indo-European Religion
 Indonesia
 Indus Valley Civilization
 Inquisition
 Intermarriage
 International Monetary Fund
 International NGOs
 Internet
 Iran
 Iraq
 Ireland, Republic of ISKCON. See Hare Krishna
 Islam
 Islam in China
 Islam in Latin America
 Islamic Modernism
 Islamic Reform
 Islamic State
 Islamism (Political Islam)
 Ismailis

-
- Israel
Israeli-Palestinian Peace Negotiations.
 See Israel; Palestine
Italy
Ivory Coast
- Jainism
Jamaat-e-Islami
Jamaica
Japan
Japanese Religions in Latin America
Jemaah Islamiyah
Jerusalem. See Israel
Jesus
Jewish Diaspora
Jihad
John Paul II
Jordan
Judaism
Jung, Carl Gustav
Jurema of the Brazilian North
Just War
- Kabir
Kali
Kant, Immanuel
Karbala
Karma
Kashmir
Kazakhstan
Kenya
Khalistan Movement
Khariji
Khomeini, Ruhallah Ayatullah
Kierkegaard, Søren
Killing Fields (Cambodia)
King, Coretta Scott
King, Martin Luther, Jr.
Kingship
Kiribati
Korea, Democratic People's Republic of (North Korea)
Korea, Republic of (South Korea)
Kosovo
Kumbha Mela
Küng, Hans
Kurdistan
Kuwait
Kyrgyzstan
- La Luz del Mundo Church
Laicization
Laos
Latin America
Latvia
Lebanon
Left Behind Series
Lesotho
Lévi-Strauss, Claude
Li
Liberal Islam
Liberal Protestantism
Liberation Theology
Liberia
Libya
Liechtenstein
Lithuania
Local Religion
London. See Global Cities; United Kingdom
Long, Charles H.
L'Ordre du Temple Solaire. See Solar Temple Order
Los Angeles
Lotus
 Lourdes
Luckmann, Thomas
Luxembourg
- Macau
Macedonia
Madagascar
Madrid
Mahayana Buddhism
Mahdi
Mahdi of Sudan
Malawi
Malaysia
Mali
Malinowski, Bronislaw
Malta
Manichaeism
María Lionza Cult of Venezuela
Marian Cults and Apparitions in Latin America
Marshall Islands
Martin, David
Martinique
Martyrdom
Marx and Religion
Marxism

- Mashhad
Material Culture
Mauritania
Mauritius
Mawdudi, Abu'l-a'la'
McDonaldization
McVeigh, Timothy
Mecca
Medina
Meditation
Mediterranean World
Megachurch
Men's Roles
Mesoamerican Religions
Mexican Concheros
Mexico
Mexico City
Micronesia
Middle East
Millenarian Movements
Missions and Missionaries
Mithras Cult
Modernism
Modernization
Moldova
Monaco
Monasticism
Mongol Empire
Mongolia
Monotheism
Montenegro
Mormons
Morocco
Moscow
Mosques
Mother Teresa
Mozambique
Mughal Empire
Muhammad
Mujtahid-Shabistari,
 Muhammad
Müller, Max
Multiculturalism
Multiple Faiths
Multiple Modernities
Music
Muslim Brotherhood
Myanmar (Burma)
Mysticism
Myth
Najaf
Namibia
Nation-State
Native Latin American Religion
Native North American Religion
Natural Law
Neo-Pagan Movement
Neo-Shamanisms
Neo-Sufism (Sufi Renewal)
Nepal
Nestorians. See Assyrian Church of the East
Netherlands
Netherlands Antilles. See Curaçao;
 Sint Maarten
New Age Movements
New Caledonia
New Religions
New Religions in Africa
New Religions in Cuba
New Religions in Japan
New Religions in South America
New Religions in the United States
New York City
New Zealand
Nicaragua
Niebuhr, Reinhold
Nietzsche, Friedrich
Niger
Nigeria
Nile Civilization. See Egypt
Niue
Nonviolence
Nordic Countries
Norfolk Island
North Africa
North America
Northern Ireland
Northern Mariana Islands
Norway
Oklahoma City Federal Building Bombing
Olcott, Henry Steel
Oman
Opus Dei
Order of the Solar Temple.
 See Solar Temple Order
Orientalism
Orthodox Christianity. See Christianity
Orthopraxy. See Hindu Orthopraxy

-
- Other (The Other)
 Otto, Rudolf
 Ottoman Empire
 Our Lady of Guadalupe

 Pacific Islands/Oceania
Pajelanca of the Brazilian North Pakistan
 Palau Palestine
 Pāli
 Pana Wave Laboratory
 Panama
 Panikkar, Raimon (Raimundo)
 Panjabi
 Papua
 Papua New Guinea
 Paraguay
 Paris. See France
 Pentecostal Movements
 Pentecostal Movements in Latin America.
 See Latin America
 Peoples Temple
 Perennial Philosophy
 Peru Philippines Pilgrimage
 Pluralism
 Poland
 Politics and Religion
 Polytheism
 Popular Religion
 Portugal
 Postcolonial Theology
 Postcolonialism
 Postmodernism
 Prabhupada, Bhaktivedanta
 Pramukh Swami
 Prayer Beads
 Prison Religion
 Prophecy
 Protestant Buddhism
 Protestant Christianity
 Public and Private Religion
 Puerto Rico
 Pure Land Buddhism

 Qatar
 Qigong
 Queer Theory

 Qum
 Qur'an
 Qutb, Sayyid

 Racism
 Radhakrishnan, Sarvepalli
 Radhasoami
 Rahman, Fazlur
 Ramakrishna. See Reform Hinduism
 Ramanuja
 Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh
 Reconstructionism (Jewish). See Judaism Reform Hinduism
 Reform Judaism Refugees
 Religion and State
 Religions and World Federation
 Religious Dialogue
 Religious Freedom
 Religious Identity
 Religious Minority-Majority Relations
 Religious Nationalism
 Réunion
 Rites of Passage
 Roman Catholicism
 Romania
 Rome
 Rudolph, Eric Robert
 Russian Federation
 Rwanda

 Sacred Places
 Saint Lucia
 Saint Vincent and the Grenadines
 Saints
 Salt Lake City, Utah. See Mormons
 Samoa (American and Independent State of) San Marino
 Sangha
 Sanskrit
 Santería
 São Tomé and Príncipe
 Sārnāth
 Sarvodaya Movement
 Satan
 Satya Sai Movement
 Saudi Arabia
 Scapegoating
 Schleiermacher, Friedrich
 Scientology

- Scotland
Scripture
Secularism
Secularization
Self-Realization Fellowship
Senegal
September 11, 2001
Serbia
Serra, Father Junípero
Sexuality
Seychelles
Shaivism
Shamanism
Shankar, Sri Sri Ravi
Shankara
Shari'a. See Halakha and Shari'a
Shariati, Ali
Shi'a Islam
Shimazono, Susumu Shinto
Siddha Yoga
Sierra Leone
Sikhism
Silk Road
Singapore
Sint Maarten
Slovakia
Slovenia
Smart, Ninian
Smith, Huston
Smith, Wilfred Cantwell
Social Justice
Soka Gakkai
Solar Temple Order
Solomon Islands
Somalia
Somaliland
Soroush, Abdulkarim
South Africa
South Asia
South Sudan
Southeast Asia
Spain
Spiritualism
Sports
Sri Lanka
Srinivas, M. N.
St. Kitts and Nevis
Stupa
Sudan
Sufism
Suicide Bombing
Sunnī Islam
Suriname
Sutras
Suzuki, D. T.
Swaminarayan Movement
Swastika
Swaziland
Sweden
Switzerland
Sword Symbol Synagogue
Syncretism
Syrian Arab Republic

Tabligh
Tagore, Rabindranath
Taiping Rebellion
Taiwan
Taizé
Tajikistan Taliban
Tambor de Mina Tanzania
Taoism. See Daoism
Tattooing and Piercing Televangelism Television
Temples. See Sacred Places Terrorism
Thailand
Theosophy
Theravada Buddhism
Thich Nhat Hanh
3HO (Sikh Dharma Fellowship)
Tiananmen Square
Tibet
Tillich, Paul
Timur
Togo Tokyo
Tolerance Tonga Torah Torture
Transcendental Meditation
Translocalization Transnational

-
- Transvestites and Transsexuals
Trinidad and Tobago
Tunisia
Turban
Turkey
Turkmenistan
Tutu, Bishop Desmond
Tylor, Edward Burnett
- Uganda
Ugaritic Religion Ukraine
Umayyad Dynasty
Unification Church
Unitarians
United Arab Emirates
United Kingdom
United Nations
United States of America
Unity Movement
Universalism. See Unitarians
Uruguay
Uzbekistan
- Vaishnavism
Vajrayana, Tibetan
Vale do Amanhecer
Vanuatu
Vatican City State and the Holy See
Vatican Council, Second
Veda
Vedanta Society
Venerable Master Cheng-yen
Venezuela
Vietnam Violence
Virgin Islands (British) Virgin Islands (U.S.)
- Virgin Mary
Vivekananda
Vodou
- Wahhabis
Wales
War on Terrorism
Weber, Max
Westernization. See Modernization;
 Secularization
Women's Roles
World Congress of Faiths
World Council of Churches World Economic Forum World Religions
World Social Forum
World Theology
World's Parliament of Religions
- Yagé
Yarmulke/Kippah
Yemen
Yiddish
Ying Yang and the Five Phases.
 See Chinese Popular Religion;
 Daoism
YMCA, YWCA
Yoga
Youth With a Mission
Yugoslavia
- Zambia
Zedong, Mao. See China; Cultural Revolution (China)
Zen Buddhism
Zimbabwe
Zionism
Zoroastrianism (and Parsis)

MACAU

Macau (Macao, Aomen), like its neighbor Hong Kong, is a special administrative region of the People's Republic of China in the southern Guangdong province; it is heavily Buddhist, even though it was once an important locale for Christian missionaries. Although founded by the Portuguese as a colony in 1557, only around 3% of its population is currently Portuguese, with ethnic Chinese accounting for approximately 95% of its residents by the end of the 20th century. Due to the colonial Portuguese administration, Macau was heavily Catholic in the past, but now Buddhism claims more than 79% of the devoted and Catholicism retains about 5%; the remainder is divided between Protestants, Baha'is, Muslims, and a small Falun Gong community. Although Protestant Christianity does not account for a large portion of the populace, many different denominations are active, including the Anglican, Baptist, and Lutheran congregations. The Union of Christian Evangelical Churches in Macau was founded in 1990, which has resulted in greater cooperation between the faiths, something that was lacking in the past. A temple to the Chinese deity A-ma was active when the Portuguese first anchored in Macau and has remained operational till date.

Claimed by Portugal as an overseas territory until the end of 1999, Macau is one of only two Chinese special administrative regions (Hong Kong being the other) and has historically served as Christianity's foothold in Asia. The Italian Jesuit Mateo Ricci first brought Catholicism from Beijing to Macau in the 16th century, and missionary activity has long been launched from Macau into China, Japan, and the islands of Southeast Asia. The Catholic identity furnished by the Portuguese kept Macau's populace connected with the colonizing country even in times of discontent, and the Diocese of Macau historically retained jurisdiction over ecclesiastical territories in China, Japan, Vietnam, and Malaysia. However, due to its positive stance on Chinese immigration and settlement, Buddhism has reigned as the most popular religion for years and is still the fastest growing religion of the region. Confucianism has also played a role in Macauan culture since the early 10th century, with the Basic Law of Macau, the constitution by which freedom of religious practice is guaranteed, being heavily based on Confucian teachings.

Macau's willingness to be multicultural has fostered an environment conducive to the free practice of religion, and in 1998 the Religious Freedom Ordinance was put into effect to lend the power of law to what has traditionally been respected. This part of Macau's Basic Law furnishes freedom of conscience; freedom of religious belief, assembly, and education; and the right to hold religious processions. This ordinance may help explain the Macauan Catholic bishops' reluctance to enter into the political arena, something their brethren in Hong Kong have been more willing to do. To enjoy the status of religion, and thereby be protected under the Religious Freedom Ordinance, groups must register with the Identification Services

Bureau of Macau. This requirement essentially enables the administration to define what is and is not religion. Groups such as the Falun Gong pose a problem in this realm, as they neither fit neatly into what is generally considered a religion nor universally agree on their coherent religious status. Their lack of registration with the Identification Services Bureau, compounded by their not registering under the Societies Ordinance (to which all nongovernmental groups are required to register), has led sometimes to violent confrontations with the police during Falun Gong activities in public parks.

John Soboslai

See also China; Confucianism; Falun Gong; Hong Kong; Mahayana Buddhism; Missions and Missionaries; Portugal; Postcolonialism

Further Readings

- Boxer, C. R. (1974). Macao as a religious and commercial entrepôt in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Acta Asiatica, 26, 64–90.
- Coates, A. (1987). A Macao narrative. Hong Kong, SAR: Oxford University Press.
- Gunn, G. C. (1996). Encountering Macau: A Portuguese city-state on the periphery of China, 1557–1999. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Miu Bing Cheng, C. (1999). Macau: A cultural Janus. Hong Kong, SAR: Hong Kong University Press.
- Pina-Cabral, J. de. (2002). Between China and Europe: Person, culture and emotion in Macao. London: Continuum.
- Porter, J. (1996). Macau: The imaginary city. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

MACEDONIA

By virtue of its geographical position, located in the Balkan peninsula of southeastern Europe adjacent to the countries of Albania, Bulgaria, Greece, and Serbia, the region of Macedonia has been continually exposed to the influence of several world religions and has thus been the locus for their strong competition. The earliest arrival of Christianity in Macedonia occurred around the middle of the first century. (St. Paul's letter to the Thessalonians was written in approximately 52 CE, after Timothy had returned from the region, which then incorporated the territories of Epirus, Vetus, Thessaly, and parts of Illyria and Thrace.) The arrival of Islam in Macedonia happened as early as the 11th century CE.

Following World War II, the territory of what is today the Republic of Macedonia was constituted in 1946 as the People's Republic of Macedonia and incorporated as a constituent republic in the former Yugoslav Federation. After the breakup of Yugoslavia, Macedonia was admitted to the United Nations on April 8, 1993, as the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM) pending an agreement with Greece, which claimed that some of the articles of the new Macedonian constitution made territorial claims on the Greek province of Macedonia. The issue regarding Macedonia's name has still not been resolved; thus, FYROM and Republic of Macedonia are commonly used as synonyms.

The present-day religious composition of the Republic of Macedonia is predominantly Eastern Orthodox, represented by the Eastern Orthodox Church (Macedonian Orthodox Church) to which approximately 60% of the population belong. About 30% of the population are members of the Islamic religious community. The remaining 10% belong to all other religious communities, including members of the Catholic Church, the Jewish community, Protestants, Evangelicals, and so on.

The first church officials in Macedonia were Archbishop St. Clement of Ohrid and St. Naum, both disciples of the brothers Saints Cyril and Methodius, who were the founders of the Slavonic literacy and the Glagolitic alphabet, on which the Cyrillic alphabet was based. St. Clement was the first Archbishop in what is now Macedonia, in Ohrid in 893 CE. However, the tradition goes back even earlier than this. Parigorius—the first Metropolitan of Skopje (the present-day capital of the Republic of Macedonia)—took part in the Second Synod in Serdica, in 343 CE, thus supporting Orthodoxy. At that time, there were two Metropolitan dioceses in the region: Thessaloniki and Skopje.

The Ohrid archdiocese was established in 893 CE under the jurisdiction of Prince Boris of Bulgaria. By the end of the 10th century (996 CE), Tsar Samuil, without the approval of the Ecumenical Patriarch in Constantinople, proclaimed its autocephalous (self-governing) status, with five eparchies (dioceses): Voden, Meglen, Serres, Ohrid, and Skopje. The aim of this action was to proclaim ecclesiastic authority independent of Byzantium and to make it closer to the secular authority of Tsar Samuil. Its center was on the small island of Achilles in the Prespa Lake. Two years later, the center was moved to Ohrid. In 1018, after the defeat of Tsar Samuil in the battle of Belasica, the Ohrid archdiocese lost its autocephalous status but did not cease to exist, being legally strengthened and included in the Byzantine ecclesiastic institutional system.

In 1346, the Serbian Tsar Stefan Dušan established the archdiocese in Peć (Kosovo) and took control over the Ohrid archdiocese, giving both an equal status. Because this action was carried out without the approval of the central Orthodox institutions in Constantinople, the expulsion of the Serbian Church from the ecumenical body followed; the archbishop of the Ohrid archdiocese, as well as the circles around him, then systematically engaged in a process of reconciliation of the Serbian Orthodox Church with the Ecumenical Patriarchy, which resulted in its return to the Orthodox community.

On the arrival of the Ottomans, the Ohrid archdiocese was again institutionally given autonomy, and its rights were strengthened. After 1453—the overtaking of Constantinople by the Ottomans—both the Ohrid and Peć archdioceses came under the ecumenical jurisdiction of Constantinople. In 1767, under the strong influence of the Thessalonian archbishop, the Ohrid archdiocese lost its autonomous status. This was a grievous blow to the centuries-old ecclesiastic and cultural autonomy of the local population.

During World War II, on October 21, 1943, the First Assembly of Macedonian clergy was held in the village of Izdeglavje, Ohrid, with the aim of making the Macedonian church autocephalous. Finally, at the Third Church-and-People Assembly in Ohrid in July 1967, the autocephalous status of the Macedonian Orthodox Church was officially proclaimed.

Today, the Macedonian Orthodox Church (Makedonska Pravoslavna Crkva; MPC) has its eparchies at Skopje; Prespa and Bitola; Debar and Kičevo; Bregalnica; Polog, and Kumanovo; Vardar; and Strumica; there are also the American and the Canadian eparchies as well as the Australian eparchy; the European Macedonian eparchy is still in the process of foundation.

There are about 1,200 churches and approximately 800 mosques in the Republic of Macedonia today. There is also a Catholic church in Skopje, and a Jewish synagogue is under construction. In addition, there are several Protestant and evangelical churches, as well as five active Dervish communities. The dispute, however, with the Serbian Orthodox Church (Srpska Pravoslavna Crkva, SPC) remains unresolved, owing to the SPC's refusal to accept the autocephalous status of the MPC.

Islam has a relatively long tradition in Macedonia, one of the earliest regions in which Islam took permanent root. Sporadic cases—warrior groups of Tatars, Seldüks, čerkes, and Kumans, engaged by local feudal lords, as well as early traders and missionaries, have been present as early as the late 11th century. However, by the end of 14th century, Islam became the second largest religious group in Macedonia and has remained so until the present days. The adherents are predominantly from the following ethnic groups: Albanians, Turks, “Goranci” (Torbeši, Pomaks, or Macedonian Muslims), Bosnians, and Roma (Gypsies).

Maja Mubic

See also Albania; Bulgaria; Eastern Orthodox Christianity; Greece; Serbia; Yugoslavia

Further Readings

АЧОМ, Педесет години македонска држава, 1944–1994 [ASNOM, Fifty years of the Macedonian state, 1944–1994]. (1995). Прилози од научен собир одржан на 17–18 ноември, 1994 [Proceedings of the scientific meeting held on November 17–18, 1994]. Skopje, Macedonia: Macedonian Academy of Arts and Sciences/Institute of National History.

Македонија во војните [Macedonia throughout the wars]. (1991). Прилози од научен собир одржан во Скопје, на 15–17 ноември, 1988 [Proceedings of the scientific meeting held in Skopje on November 15–17, 1988]. Skopje, Macedonia: MANU.

Popovski, V., & Vein, A. (1999). Македонското прашање во документите на Коминтерната [The Macedonian question in the documents of the Comintern] (Vols. 1 and 2). Skopje, Macedonia: Rypra.

MADAGASCAR

The Republic of Madagascar, formerly known as the Malagasy Republic, is located off the southeastern coast of Africa on the fourth largest island in the world. It has a diverse population of 20,654,000, chiefly of mixed Afro-Malaysian and Indonesian descent; there are 18 distinct ethnic groups in the country. Its official languages are French and Malagasy. Most residents follow traditional African religious practices.

The first settlers of Madagascar were the Indonesians. Later, refugees from the wars that followed the death of the prophet Muhammad, in the seventh century CE, arrived from Arabia and the surrounding lands, bringing the religion of Islam with them. Over time, slave traders settled along the west coast; other Arabs from East African settlements came to the island and settled in the northwest. Although outnumbered by Bantu and Indonesian settlers, they had a great impact on the area; many beliefs and practices are directly traced to the Arabs, including the practice of circumcision, as well as various greetings and many words, including those for days and months. Their family and clan systems, based on patriarchal principles, also prevailed over other, matriarchal systems.

The vast majority of people in Madagascar are non-Muslims; fewer than 10% adhere to Islam. However, there is clear evidence that Islam is growing rapidly in the area. There is a great concentration of Muslims in Mahajanga and Antsiranaana on the west coast. Additionally, with the aid of young university graduates who have attended Islamic universities in other countries, the Muslim community has begun to build medical facilities and schools and to provide recreational services. National radio and television are also aiding in the spread and knowledge of Islam.

It is important to note that the majority of people in Madagascar are followers of the traditional religion; indeed 55% of the population are traditionalists. Forty percent are Christians, Protestants, and Catholics, and the rest are Muslims. The traditional religions of Madagascar's people vary, but there are certain basic elements found in common. There is a belief in a chief divinity, a creator god named Andrianahary or Zanahary, and subordinate ones. There is also reverence toward great ancestors, including certain rulers and the original settlers of Madagascar. Inhabitants make pilgrimages to sites of special importance in the lives of these people and perform sacred rites at these places because they believe that there are close ties between the dead ancestors and themselves. The important values of their culture come from these ancestors.

Dead ancestors are termed gods on earth and serve as intermediaries with the creator god. They can also influence daily fortunes, for good or ill. Accordingly, people are careful to perform the rituals and show due respect. Great care is taken to construct tombs for the dead, which are costly and often better arranged than the home of the living. It is as if the people have dual existences—one in their everyday surroundings and a spiritual one in the tombs, which may be quite far from their everyday lives.

Followers of the traditional religion also believe that a person has different souls depending on the different stages of life and death. Moreover, there is a strong belief in fate. However, there are ways of avoiding aspects of fate through the use of divination and amulets of Arabic origin. There are also many taboos that regulate daily life. Thus, particular foods are forbidden at certain times. These taboos vary among the different ethnic groups in Madagascar.

Of the two main ethnic groups, Betsileo and Merina, the Betsileo people are Roman Catholics and the Merina people are Protestants. After persecution at the hands of traditionalists, especially at the urging of their rulers, Christianity gained strength, particularly with the backing of French colonialism.

The French established colonial rule in Madagascar at the end of a long chain of events. From the 17th- through the 18th-century scramble for Africa, the British and the French were in competition for influence on the island. In 1885, the French gained control and made Madagascar a colony in 1890. Madagascar gained its independence in 1960. In return for recognition of French rule in Madagascar, the French accepted British control of Zanzibar. The movement into Madagascar was one seeking to end piracy and competition in the area. French rule led to a government based on French principles, the spread of Christianity, and major changes in education over a foundation of traditional African culture.

The current government of Madagascar guarantees religious freedom. The government is basically a democratic republic in which the prime minister is the head of government. Many political parties are represented in the legislative branch, and there is an independent judicial system. The period since independence in 1960 has been marked by episodes of struggle and violence, including riots, disputed elections, and coups d'état. Interestingly, none have been particularly religious in nature; most have been over economic issues and the vast poverty of Madagascar, which grew worse with the global economic downturn in 2009.

Frank A. Salamone

See also Africa; Indigenous Religions; Indonesia; Islam

Further Readings

- Bloch, M. (1986). From blessing to violence: History and ideology in the circumcision ritual of the Merina of Madagascar. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Bloch, M. (1989). Ritual, history, and power: Selected papers in anthropology. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Athlone Press.
- Campbell, G. (1988). Currency crisis, missionaries, and the French takeover in Madagascar, 1861–1895. International Journal of African Historical Studies, 21(2), 273–289.
- Kottak, C. P. (1980). The past in the present: History, ecology, and cultural variation in highland Madagascar. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Sharp, L. A. (1990). Possessed and dispossessed youth: Spirit possession of school children in northwest Madagascar. Culture, Medicine, and Psychiatry, 14(3), 339–364.

MADRID

From a historical perspective, the city of Madrid has been the site of Spain's greatest religious pluralism, because, as the capital city, Madrid has attracted many immigrants from around the world, with different religions and cultures. About 83.8% of the inhabitants are Spaniards, while people of other origins, including immigrants from Latin America, Europe, Asia, North Africa, and West Africa, represented 16.2% of the population in 2007. Furthermore, the majority of Spanish religious communities have established their representative bodies in Madrid.

Religious Statistics

Considerable statistical evidence indicates that the number of minority religions in Madrid is increasing. This growth is taking place within a general framework of legal freedom that possesses both a domestic and a European side. Roman Catholicism is the major religion in Madrid, with Islam the second largest faith. A large Jewish community is also found in Madrid, but it was only after the 19th century that Jews were permitted to enter the country. Madrid hosts the largest number of religious confessions, according to government officials. The most recent government census, taken in 2009, indicated that the largest communities of immigrants from predominantly Islamic countries were located in the autonomous communities of Catalonia, Andalucía, Madrid, Valencia, and Murcia. Madrid also hosts a number of foreign missionaries of evangelical Christian, Mormon, Orthodox, Buddhist, and Islamic faiths.

The democratic political system established by the Spanish constitution of 1978 promoted the religious pluralism that currently characterizes Spain in general and the city of Madrid in particular. The legal regulation applicable to Madrid in religion, as in the rest of Spain, protects religious freedom and prohibits discrimination for religious reasons. Consequently, today Madrid civil society is defined by multiculturalism, religious pluralism, and one of the highest European levels of religious freedom. Apart from the Catholic community, which constitutes the great majority of religious adherents, the major religious communities established in Madrid are the Evangelicals, Muslims, Jews, Orthodox Christians, Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, Jehovah's Witnesses, Hindus, Buddhists, Sikhs, Baha'is, Unification Church, and Church of Scientology.

Religious History

The religious culture of Madrid is based on a variety of influences. The Visigothic kingdom left a sense of a united Christian Hispania that would later be consolidated in the Reconquista period following centuries of Muslim rule. The first settlements of Muslims and Jews occurred in the ninth century, when the city of Madrid was founded. Protestant minorities were settled in Madrid in the first half of the 19th century. However, intolerance against religious minorities in the period 1492 to 1609 defined Madrid until the 19th century as a Catholic city.

The Spanish Constitution of the Second Republic (1931) recognized religious freedom and supported the establishment of several religious minorities in Madrid, but following the Civil War (1936–1939), religious freedom and religious pluralism did not exist under the military dictatorship of General Francisco Franco, until his death in 1975 and the restoration of the monarchy. During the military dictatorship, Roman Catholicism was the only religion with a legal status; other worship services could not be advertised, and only the Roman Catholic Church could own property and exercise rights. This close cooperation was formalized in a Concordat with the Vatican in 1953, which granted the Church an extraordinary set of privileges: mandatory canonical marriages for all Catholics; exemption from government taxation and payment of priests' salaries and the establishment of a budget for the Church; subsidies for new building construction and the reconstruction of church buildings damaged by the war; censorship of materials the Church considered offensive; the right to establish universities, to operate radio stations, and to publish newspapers and magazines; protection from police intrusion into Church property; mandatory Catholic religious instruction, even in public schools; and exemption of the clergy from military service. Franco secured in return the right to name Roman Catholic bishops in Spain as well as veto power over appointments of clergy down to the parish priest level.

Religion and the Law

The 1978 constitution recognized the historical role of the Catholic Church and opened the doors for a relationship of independence and cooperation between the state and the religious groups. Under the constitution, all religious groups are able to practice their religion freely, with no impediment on the rights of individuals to live and develop their personality according to their faith.

The main consequence of the new constitutional framework has been the beginning of a new era of religious freedom, but in practice a clear distinction exists between the Catholic Church, religious minorities (Jews, Evangelists, and Muslims), and other religious groups. All of them have the right to free exercise of religion, but the relations and privileges of the religious groups depend on their respective agreements with the state.

Relations between Madrid's religious communities and the local government are very fluent, especially in the case of Catholic, Islamic, Jewish, and Evangelical communities, due to the existence of legal agreements of cooperation between the state and the religious communities.

National cooperation agreements between the state and the various religious groups have been developed at the municipal level, through agreements between the religious communities and the regional and municipal governments. In 1995, three committees were created to devise a local plan to promote religious freedom in Madrid. The purpose of the agreements between the religious communities and the city of Madrid is to promote religious culture, preserve the historic and artistic heritage of the Jewish and Muslim communities, and promote tolerance toward religious minorities.

Some examples of Madrid's public policies in this area are the following:

- As per the Madrid historic landmark regulation, the special needs of all religious communities regarding their buildings dedicated to religious worship should be respected.
- By law, Madrid's public broadcasting stations have to give adequate space for religious programs.
- Religious organizations are free from regional taxes on the income they receive to develop their religious objectives, they can enjoy regional tax exemptions, and donations to them can be deducted from the donors' income tax.

Religious Architecture

Given the centrality of the Catholic Church in the history of Spain, there are many religious buildings in important cities, especially in Madrid, and each church is a museum in itself. Some of the city's architecture shows a Moorish influence, but because the Muslim invasions did not reach Madrid itself, there are no historical Muslim buildings in the city. The best examples of Catholic architecture located in Madrid are the monastery of El Escorial, monastery of Las Descalzas Reales, Royal Monastery of La Encarnación, and Royal Monastery of Santa Isabel; there are numerous hermitages and convents and hundreds of beautiful churches, some of them centuries old, distributed throughout the city. In fact, one could say that the city of Madrid is, on the whole, an authentic Catholic museum.

Religious Cemeteries

In accordance with the Christian practice of burial, based on the principle that human beings come from the earth and must therefore return to it, there are many cemeteries in Madrid. Martyrs or saints were buried in churches, usually under the altar, because, for a mass to be celebrated, it is traditional that a relic from a saint be placed within the altar. In the 13th century, church grounds began to be used for burial, but in the 16th century, King Carlos III forbade the practice owing to concerns of sanitation and prevention of pestilence. In 1804, King Carlos IV tried again to reverse this policy, and two cemeteries were built; but few wished to be buried there. In the 16th century, Pope Julius III had created the sacramental brotherhoods; they were dedicated to worship the Holy Sacrament and established themselves in different parishes in Madrid. Their members did not want to be buried in cemeteries belonging to other churches, so they created their own.

From the legal point of view, religious cemeteries and places of worship in Madrid included in the National Registry of Religious Entities enjoy immunity under the terms laid down by law. In the event of expropriation of land, the hierarchy of the Catholic Church, the Federation of Evangelical Entities of Spain, the Federation of Israelite Communities of Spain, or the Islamic Commission of Spain must first be heard, and the properties may not be demolished unless first divested of their sacred nature, except where otherwise provided by law in the event of emergency or hazard. With respect to Muslim burials, there are plots reserved in Madrid's municipal cemeteries; in addition, local regulations allow the Muslim community to own private cemeteries; and in accordance with regional regulations, all due measures shall be adopted to observe traditional Islamic rules regarding interments, graves, and funeral rites, which shall be conducted by the local Islamic community.

Religion and Food Products

According to their respective religious laws and traditions, neither Muslims nor observant Jews are permitted to consume certain food products. To protect Muslim religious freedom, Madrid's regional regulation establishes that the denomination category halal serves to distinguish food products prepared in accordance with the requirements of Islamic law; the slaughtering of animals in accordance with Islamic laws must abide by the health standards in force; and in public centers or establishments and military premises as well as in public and publicly subsidized private educational institutions, Islamic religious precepts relating to food products and mealtimes during the month of Ramadan should be respected. In the case of the Jewish minority, the Madrid regional regulations establish that the denominations kosher, casher, kasher, and kashrut serve to distinguish food products prepared in accordance with Jewish dietary laws. The humane slaughtering of animals in accordance with Jewish law must also abide by the public health standards in force.

Religious Festivities and Labor Law

Most festivals in Madrid have a Christian meaning and significance. Religious holidays include Epiphany (January 6), Holy Thursday and Good Friday, Assumption (August 15), All Saints' Day (November 1), the Feast of the Immaculate Conception (December 8), and Christmas (December 25).

Madrid's most important religious festivals are the following:

1. Saint Isidro's Feast Day is celebrated on May 15. Saint Isidro is Madrid's religious patron, born in the 11th century; he was a farmer and was well-known for his many miracles.
2. The typical Madrid Christmas decoration is the Nativity scene with a cradle, and some very beautiful ones can be seen in different churches during this time. On January 5 (Epiphany), many Spanish cities organize a procession of the Three Wise Men. One of the biggest ones is in Madrid, and it usually starts in the Retiro Park and ends at Plaza Mayor.

3. The Feast of Almudena Virgin is celebrated on November 9. According to legend, there was an image of the Virgin Mary that the apostle James had brought to Spain. In the eighth century, during the period of the Arab conquest and occupation, the people of Madrid were afraid that the occupiers would destroy this image, and they decided to hide it in a niche in a wall. Following the expulsion of the Arabs, King Alfonso VI of Castilla wished to reclaim the long-hidden image, but there was no one who knew its exact whereabouts. The king asked the people of Madrid to pray for the rediscovery of the image. A procession went along the possible places where the image might be located, and when the procession arrived at the spot, the wall suddenly crumbled, and the image was found.

4. The processions during Holy Week have their origin in the Passion of the Christ as related in the Gospels. According to Catholic customs, those who were found guilty by the Inquisition had to expiate their sins through penance. The images that take part in a procession are called pasos. The word paso refers both to the image and its carriage. The carriages can be mounted on wheels, usually pushed by the cofrades (celebrants) or carried by them directly.

In the context of labor law, religious feast days according to Protestant, Islamic, Catholic, and Jewish beliefs are religious holidays and subject to an agreement between employers and workers that during religious observances the workers will not attend work; or workers can give up their religious holidays for the established (secular) holidays in the state labor calendar. This is not a compulsory regulation but an option, because prior agreement must be reached between workers and employers, and the hours not worked must be made up with no compensation.

Protestant, Islamic, Catholic, and Jew students enrolled in public or publicly subsidized schools in Madrid shall be excused from attending class during their religious festivities, at their own request or at the request of their parents or guardians.

Religious Matrimony

In accordance with national regulations, religious marriages celebrated in Madrid will have civil validity if the marriage is administered in accordance with the religious ceremony established under religious law and the parties meet the legal capacity requirements established by the civil code. Full recognition of such validity shall call for registration of such marriages in the civil registry. Persons who wish to register their religious marriage must furnish prior witness of their qualification to marry, consisting of a certificate issued by the corresponding civil registry. This means that residents of Madrid can get married according to their religious faith with civil effects if they abide by the civil code; but with the exception of the Catholic Church, the decisions of religious authorities concerning divorce have no civil effects.

For full recognition of these effects, the marriage must be registered in the civil registry; this may be done with the presentation of the church certificate of the existence of the marriage. The marriage partners, in accordance with the provisions of canon law, may go to the ecclesiastical courts to request a declaration of annulment or to request a pontifical decision concerning a valid but unconsummated marriage. By request of either of the parties, the said ecclesiastical resolutions shall be considered valid under civil law if declared in compliance with state law by sentence of the competent civil court.

Religious Assistance in Public Institutions

National regulations guarantee the right of religious minority members (Muslim, Jewish, and Protestant) serving in the Spanish armed forces stationed in Madrid to receive spiritual support and participate in their religious services subject to authorization from their superiors. Religious assistance for the minority religious groups in the armed forces shall be rendered by ministers designated by the religious community and authorized by the army commanders. The national regulation guarantees the right of Muslims, Jews, and Protestants living in Madrid to receive religious assistance when they are confined to penitentiaries, hospitals, or other public institutions. Spiritual support is to be provided by persons designated by the religious communities, subject to authorization by the corresponding administrative authority. As far as penitentiaries are concerned, religious services are to be conducted in accordance with the security provisions of the corresponding legislation. With regard to other religious groups, the state has not created mechanisms for their members to receive religious assistance in the public institutions.

Religion and Education

In Madrid, the Catholic population attends religious private schools owned and financed by the regional government, but students from families belonging to other religious groups attend public schools. In fact, there are no private schools financed by the state for religious groups other than Catholic. The reason for this clear case of discrimination is to be found in the political influence of the Catholic Church historically in this area.

The model of religious education in public schools in Madrid can be described as a secular and neutral public school with religious education only for the majority religious groups. The teaching of Catholic religion in public schools is regulated through the Agreement of 3 January 1979, Between the Spanish State and the Holy See, Concerning Education and Cultural Affairs, which establishes that educational plans at the levels of preschool, Elementary School (EGB) and High School (BUP) and technical colleges for students of the corresponding ages, shall include the teaching of the Catholic Religion in all Educational Centers, in conditions equal to those of the basic subjects. . . . This religious education shall not be obligatory for all students. However, the right to receive it is guaranteed. . . . Religious instruction shall be imparted by those persons who, each school year, shall be appointed by the academic authority from among those proposed by the diocesan Ordinary. (<http://spcp.prf.cuni.cz/dokument/esp4a.htm>, accessed May 17, 2011)

In the case of Muslims, Jews, and Evangelical Christians, their pupils have the right to receive religious teaching in public schools, and the content of religious teaching as well as the textbooks relating thereto shall be provided by the respective communities. Faculty status and salaries for the teachers responsible for such religious instruction, however, are not uniform.

Religion and Public Economic Subsidies

Religious associations dedicated to religious, charitable, teaching, medical, hospitable, or social activities enjoy the special benefits provided by the national and Madrid tax regulations. Such groups may freely request services and donations from their followers, organize public donation campaigns, and receive offerings and other contributions. The amounts donated to the religious group will have the same deductions on income tax as the amounts given to organizations classified or declared as charitable or of public utility.

The Catholic Church receives 0.7% of the personal income taxes of those taxpayers who, on their respective tax forms, expressly declare their decision concerning how they wish to make use of the money concerned. Religious minorities, however, do not receive direct economic subsidies as is the case with the Catholic Church. For this reason, religious minorities have requested repeatedly to be treated like the Catholic Church and to receive public funding. In an answer to these petitions, the current government created in 2005 a foundation that reports to the Ministry of Justice located in Madrid, whose purpose is to promote and improve the knowledge society has of its religious minorities.

The beneficiaries of the foundation are exclusively the religious groups that signed agreements with the state in 1992 (evangelical Christian, Jews, and Muslims) and other religious groups that the Ministry of Justice has recognized (Church of Latter-Day Saints, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Buddhists). The foundation funds (€4.5 million in 2008) are used for cultural, educational, and social integration programs (not for religious activities). The foundation does not finance worship services; rather, it seeks to benefit religious groups as they carry out activities relating to education, cultural development, and community service.

Oscar Celador Angón

See also Global Cities; Roman Catholicism; Spain

Further Readings

- Christian, W. A. (1998). Spain in Latino religiosity. In P. Casarella & R. Gomez (Eds.), El Cuerpo de Cristo: The Hispanic presence in the U.S. Catholic Church (pp. 325–330). New York: Crossroads.
- Kamen, H. (2003). Church, religion and society in early modern Spain. English Historical Review, 118(475), 209–210.
- Larson, P. (2000). Religion and politics in Spain: The Spanish church in transition. Journal of Church and State, 42, 862–864.
- Marcos, M. (2009). The study of religions in Spain. Bandue: Revista de la Sociedad Española de Ciencias de las Religiones, 3, 191–214.
- Marcos Alonso, J. (1965). Etudes socio-religieuses Espagnoles Socio-religious studies in Spain [A social and psychological typology of religious identification in Spanish Catholicism]. Social Compass, 12(3), 217–243.

MAHAYANA BUDDHISM

From its beginnings as a small religious community of mendicants and householders in northeastern India in the sixth century BCE, Buddhism developed into a global religion with a significant presence today in India, Southeast Asia, Tibet, Bhutan, Mongolia, China, Taiwan, Korea, and Japan and, more recently, in Europe, the Americas, Australia, and New Zealand. Buddhism's vitality and adaptability have allowed it to transform civilizations and to shape and be shaped by the cultures with which it came into contact. Mahayana, or the "Great Vehicle," is one of two major schools or branches of Buddhism. This entry reviews the history of Mahayana Buddhism, its tenets, and the diverse forms that it has assumed from its origins to the present day.

Origins

Arising in the Indian Buddhist community in the first century CE as a reform movement, Mahayanaists sought to restore what they considered to be the original purpose of Buddhism—the enlightenment of all people—from an increasingly withdrawn monasticism where practitioners focused primarily on personal salvation through a monastic regimen based on precepts and doctrinal exegesis.

In contrast, these new Buddhists promoted the "bodhisattva ideal." A bodhisattva is a "Buddha-to-be," that is, one who renounces complete entry into the realm of nirvana (freedom from suffering) to save others enmeshed in samsara, or cyclical rebirth. For only bodhisattvas who have not abandoned the realm of imperfect living beings can be trusted to respond to their suffering. The bodhisattva path involves the cultivation of the virtues of wisdom and compassion; the former involves an understanding of the self as without "essence," and the latter represents an active striving for the benefit of others. This attitude is expressed in the vow taken by all Mahayanists, lay and clergy alike, to seek enlightenment for the sake of all beings.

Another important innovation of the Mahayana movement was a new interpretation of the focal concept of "merit." Whereas in earlier Buddhism, a person could generate merit only for himself or herself alone, Mahayanists argued that merit could be shared and transferred to others, thus expanding the meaning of ritual into an altruistic dimension. Because Mahayanaists valued a versatile approach that opened the way of liberation to many people, its adherents referred to the elitism of the earlier school of Buddhism as "Hinayana," or the "Lesser Vehicle." But those who adhered to the Buddha's original teachings considered the label Hinayana offensive. Instead, they referred to their own school as "Theravada," or "the way of the elders." They emphasized the liberation of the individual achieved through his or her own efforts.

As the older school began to close its canons, the Mahayanaists were composing a set of texts that would distinguish them from the older scholastic tradition. These works claimed antiquity for Mahayana, stating that the historical Buddha (Shakyamuni) convened a special assembly of bodhisattvas on Vulture Peak Mountain in Rajagriha from which other Buddhists were excluded. Referred to as the "Second Turning of the Wheel of Dharma" (the first being the sermon the Buddha gave in the Deer Park in Sarnath after his awakening), they believed the sutras (canonical texts) produced from this event to have been concealed for several centuries until the world was ready to engage their wisdom.

One of the key texts of the Mahayana tradition is the Lotus Sutra, written down around 200 CE.

This sutra represents a discourse the Buddha delivered on Vulture Peak at the end of his teaching career and therefore considered by followers to contain his most complete teachings, in contrast to the partial teachings of the earlier Theravada canon. A central Mahayana concept expounded in the Lotus Sutra is that of “skillful means,” or upaya in Sanskrit (the ecclesiastical language of Mahayana). The use of this concept attempts to reconcile the new Mahayana movement with the older Buddhism. The early texts are interpreted as provisional rather than ultimate since the Buddha adapted his message skillfully to the time, place, and level of his audience. Therefore, many temporary methods (“vehicles”) exist that may lead a person to enlightenment. These methods may range from the seemingly mundane to the miraculous. Skillful means is epitomized in the salvific power of Avalokiteśvara, the bodhisattva of compassion, who vows to assume any form necessary to save sentient beings.

In the sixth century CE, another major movement of Buddhism, referred to as Vajrayana, the “Diamond Vehicle” (known also as Tantrism), emerged from within Mahayana. While Theravada and Mahayana both elaborated a gradual path to enlightenment over many lifetimes, Vajrayanists felt that individual enlightenment could be accomplished more quickly, even in a person’s present lifetime. Vajrayanaists shared the basic approach and goal of Mahayana but incorporated “magical” practices, elaborate fire rituals, and psychological techniques employing mandalas, and introduced a transmission of secret knowledge from master to disciple that became the basis of esoteric lineages. This new form of Mahayana (for Vajrayana should be thought of as such) arose at a time when Mahayana philosophy was no longer at its creative height. When introduced to Tibet in the seventh century CE, it produced a rich monastic culture whose influence radiated to the neighboring kingdoms of Bhutan, Sikkim, and Ladakh, and to Mongolia, all of which adopted this new religion as their own.

Globalization of Buddhism

From India, Mahayana and Theravada spread in every direction, with certain areas becoming predominantly one or the other. Thus, in Southeast Asia, Theravada became the dominant form of Buddhism. But this does not mean that Mahayana was not also present at certain times and places in Theravada countries, and vice versa. As Buddhism spread across Central Asia, Mahayana came to dominate the region and eventually became the primary form of Buddhism in China, Korea, Japan, and also Vietnam, which remained under Chinese influence for much of its history.

A striking innovation in Buddhism occurred along with Mahayana’s development both inside and outside India. For the first time, artisans began to make images of the Buddha as a human being. Previously, only aniconic or symbolic representations of the historical Buddha existed, such as his stylized footprints or eight-spoke dharma wheels, expressive of the Noble Eightfold Path. The new freedom to depict the actual person of the Buddha was evidence of the growing prominence of Mahayana, a movement that stressed the fact that everyone had a Buddha nature and therefore was capable of enlightenment.

In Gandhara, a region between Pakistan and Afghanistan, Greek artisans who worked in domains Hellenized by Alexander the Great made Greco-Buddhist images of Shakyamuni modeled after a toga-clad Apollo. The monumental Buddha figures in the sandstone cliffs of Bamiyan in Afghanistan (destroyed by the Taliban government in 2001) demonstrate the suppleness and astonishing cultural diversity to which the Mahayana tradition was continually giving form. But with the gradual Islamization of the region, which culminated in the 8th century CE, Buddhist culture disappeared in Central Asia. From the 8 to the 10th century CE, waves of Muslim invaders from Afghanistan crossed northern India and sacked the Buddhist universities and monasteries. By 1200, the Buddhist monastic culture no longer existed in northern India.

The closure of India as a repository of Buddhist culture facilitated the development of a distinct form of Chinese Mahayana. Of China’s two great religious systems—Confucianism and Daoism—the encounter between Mahayana Buddhism and Daoism proved the most fertile. Intellectuals found a natural affinity between certain key concepts in Buddhism and Daoism. They translated the Buddhist dharma, or teachings, as dao and nirvana as wu-wei, meaning “no action.” In particular, Daoism proved congenial to Ch’an (“Meditation”) monks, such as the eighth-century CE Huineng, who stressed the human capacity for sudden enlightenment. In this manner, Daoism transformed Buddhism from an abstract philosophical religion into one that was altogether more “Chinese”—pragmatic, down-to-earth, and much closer to nature. Chi-i, the founder of T’ien’tai (“Heavenly Terrace”), one of China’s two schools of Vajrayana, tried to find some unity in the multiplicity of sutras from India and settled on the Lotus Sutra as the most inclusive of all. The Ching-t’u (“Pure Land”) school promoted salvation through repeating the mantra of Amitabha (“Buddha of Infinite Light”). These Sinified schools of Buddhism came to be adopted and adapted in different ways in both Korea and Japan.

Japan produced important innovations within Mahayana as early as the 13th century. Reformers such as Honen had received monastic training in the Tendai (T’ien’tai) school on Mt. Hiei in Kyoto. The rigorous training undertaken by Hiei’s “marathon monks” sometimes finished with the monk’s death rather than the completion of the training. In this context of a Mahayana that had become the province of religious virtuosi, Honen sought a way to restore the bodhisattva ideal and return Buddhism to its original purpose according to Mahayana belief—the enlightenment of all people. Honen came to reject Tendai orthodoxy and its extremist and exclusive path to salvation. In embracing Jôdo (Ching-t’u) or Pure Land Buddhism, he salvaged only one of Tendai’s practices as necessary and suitable for the path to enlightenment—the recitation of the mantra of Amida (Amitabha).

The impulse to make Buddhism relevant and accessible to all people represents a recurring theme in the history of Mahayana in east Asia. It reiterates the reason for the emergence of the Mahayana schism in India in the first place. In a very different and remarkable way, Zen (Ch’an) Buddhism evangelized through an aesthetic dominance that came to permeate virtually every aspect of Japanese culture, from landscape gardens to the martial arts. In promoting ordinary work as a legitimate path to enlightenment, Zen also succeeded in aestheticizing and sacralizing work.

Mahayana in the West

Nineteenth-century Theosophists and the Transcendentalists of New England esteemed the Mahayana traditions they had come to know chiefly through books such as Eugène Burnouf’s Introduction to the History of Indian Buddhism. Although Chinese and Japanese immigrants of diverse schools of the Mahayana faith had settled on the West Coast of the United States, Hawai‘i, and Latin America in the 1800s, their religion remained largely sequestered in the ethnic communities in which they resided. For these immigrants, a major function of Buddhism in the new environment was to help them maintain their cultural identity intact. This “traditionalist” Buddhism did not readily welcome (nor did it attract) those outside the ethnic enclave. The result was that few non-Asian Americans knew much about the Mahayana traditions in their own country for more than 100 years.

After the World Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893, this situation began to change; interest in both Mahayana and Theravada expanded in the West. For the most part, Europe fostered the Theravada tradition and America the Mahayana. Among the many prominent religious leaders from Asia who attended the event was the Zen master Soen Shaku from Japan, who arranged for two monks to teach in the United States. Despite their years of labor, not until the young scholar-translator D. T. Suzuki arrived for an extended stay in the 1950s did interest in Zen explode. Suzuki spoke excellent English and lectured and published widely. Zen’s popularity grew among intellectuals who were disaffected with their own Judeo-Christian tradition and sought an alternative faith. What they received was a Zen filtered through the theosophizing imagination of Suzuki. This new sensibility with a focus on meditation became a staple of the countercultural movements of the beats and the hippies.

Two subsequent developments facilitated the growth and acceptance of Mahayana among non-Asian Americans. Zen enthusiasts who had sojourned in Japan to undergo traditional religious training returned and established meditation centers in the United States and Europe. At the same time, the loosening of immigration regulations allowed influential Asian Buddhist teachers to remain in the United States. Until this time, Buddhism was largely equated with Zen as shaped by Suzuki to capture the Western imagination. But another form of Mahayana began to attract the attention of Westerners—Tibetan Buddhism. The Chinese occupation of Tibet in 1959 had forced the Dalai Lama, Tibet's political and religious sovereign, to flee to India, where he reestablished his community in exile. From the South Asian subcontinent, Tibetan lamas took various trajectories and resettled mostly in the United States and Europe.

Four years earlier, a Kalmyk-Mongolian lama emigrated to the United States from India to serve the refugee Kalmyk community in Howell, New Jersey. This community built the first Tibetan Buddhist monastery in the West. Tibetan lamas of several lineages, doubtful of the possibility of repatriation, established meditation centers and Buddhist educational institutions in many countries. The intensification of exchanges such as these on a global scale led to a qualitative shift in orientation: Theravada no longer dominated Buddhist Europe, Buddhism in the United States was no longer necessarily Mahayana, Neo-Buddhist groups began to emerge in various Asian countries, and India also had regained the most intact expression of its early Buddhist monasticism. A common feature of the modern world was the plurality of Buddhist traditions that began to exist side by side. The close proximity increased the cross-fertilization and resulted in both unwitting and self-conscious forms of Buddhist eclecticism.

Buddhism experienced a new wave of popularity beginning in the 1970s. Common to both Asia and the West was the high degree of lay participation. In the United States, Buddhism was no longer perceived as the exclusive province of intellectuals or of Asian immigrants as in the 19th century, or even as the badge of the counterculture of the mid-20th century. Instead, people sought Buddhism as a personal faith as often as an addendum to other therapeutic techniques. Mahayana's success in the industrialized West was partly attributable to the perceived affinity of some of its tenets with the postmodern condition itself. The doctrine of impermanence resonated with the increased mobility and uncertainty of people in an increasingly globalized world. The belief that no essential self exists captured the labile, fragmented, yet multiple sense of identity characteristic of people who must occupy an increasing number of roles. The bodhisattva ideal appealed to Western egalitarian values. Finally, Zen Buddhism reinvigorated the traditional Protestant work ethic.

A New “Yana”: Transcending Mahayana and Theravada

The classical distinction between Mahayana and Theravada—the bodhisattva ideal—has blurred in recent decades largely because of two major developments in Buddhism worldwide—Neo-Buddhism and Engaged Buddhism. Neo-Buddhism represents the emergence of new religions that either self-identify as Buddhist or draw significantly from Buddhist philosophy and doctrine. They are primarily lay movements often with charismatic leaders and characterized by a syncretism that may draw from both Mahayana and Theravada and also not infrequently from non-Buddhist and even nonreligious traditions. These movements are found today in countries that were traditionally Mahayana or Theravada.

The Japanese lay-Buddhist association Agonshū combines elements from Theravada with Japanese and Tibetan forms of Vajrayana, along with the psychological theory of Lipot Szondi, and pastlife counseling inspired by Edgar Cayce. Agonshū has built social welfare institutions in its own country and endowed a Buddhist research center in the United Kingdom. The Thai lay-Buddhist group Santi Asoke, described sometimes as “born-again Buddhism,” forbids the use of tobacco and alcohol and combines a traditional forest monk simplicity with activist projects. Members build self-sufficient villages in the poorest regions of Thailand, drawing from the tenets of Buddhist economics and Buddhist ecology. Asoke rejects traditional Theravada meditation since the organization considers the entire life as a meditation in action. Won Buddhism in South Korea defines itself as Neo-Buddhist and as a “New Religion.” It incorporates under its Buddhist umbrella elements from Confucianism, Daoism, Tonghak (Eastern Learning), and Christianity and is one of the most popular Buddhist movements in Korea today.

The second significant development within Mahayana is Engaged Buddhism. The Chinese Ch'an monk Taixu first developed the concept in the early 20th century. His reforms inspired a Buddhist revival movement in Vietnam that promoted Buddhism as a national religion. But the actual phrase—Engaged Buddhism—was coined and popularized in the West by the Vietnamese Zen monk Thich Nhat Hanh. Engaged Buddhism represents the application of Buddhist principles to the solution of social problems within a modern discourse based on universal human rights. It is a global, Pan-Buddhist movement that has reinvigorated traditional schools of Buddhism and provided inspiration for the emergence of new ones.

Engaged Buddhism is evidence of the bodhisattva ideal reinterpreted in the context of late modernity. It addresses the systemic causes of social suffering and the necessity to take action to alleviate them. Engaged Buddhism represents a new “vehicle” or yana within Buddhism because both Theravada and Mahayana have embraced various versions of it and find the possibility to reunite under its banner. Thich Nhat Hanh exemplified the spirit of Engaged Buddhism when he visited members of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives calling for the cessation of U.S. bombing of his country during the Vietnam War.

Engaged Buddhists are especially active in two areas: Buddhist economics and Buddhist ecology. The roots of the former have been strongly present in the Japanese Zen tradition, in which a person’s work is considered a legitimate path to enlightenment. The term itself was coined by the British economist E. F. Schumacher as a reflection of his experience with Burmese Buddhists. Japanese Buddhists embraced the concept and elaborated on it. Buddhist economics constitutes a theory of development critical of Western capitalism without being an endorsement of Marxism. Buddhist economics often dovetails with Buddhist ecology. The Thai monk-reformer Buddhadasa Bhikkhu, an extreme critic of the self-serving merit making of the Thai Buddhist establishment, combined aspects of early Buddhist forest practice with a vision of a just society that included the natural world.

A softer form of Engaged Buddhism, launched by Taixu and known as “Humanistic Buddhism,” developed in Taiwan in response to mainline Buddhism’s overemphasis on funeral rites and Buddha worship rather than assisting living people who might actually attain enlightenment. It redefined the focus of Mahayana for modern society as a vehicle of welfare and education. This new role is exemplified in two widely successful Taiwanese Neo-Buddhist sects rooted in the Pure Land tradition that subscribe to Humanistic Buddhism—Tzu Chi and Foguang Shan. Both organizations are heavily committed to charitable enterprises. Tzu

Chi has organized Western-style hospitals, an international bone marrow registry, and global disaster relief with the help of the voluntary services of professionals. In Japan, all of the major Neo-Buddhist organizations—Sôka Gakkai, Risshô Kôsei Kai, Shinnyoen, and Agonshû—have developed novel forms of counseling to help members cope with the psychological stresses and practical problems of modern life in the metropolis.

Mahayana has been globalizing since its early origins in India. As it migrated across Asia, Mahayana demonstrated its capacity to generate new and relevant expressions of the faith. Mahayana is now undergoing another great transformation in its accommodation to the West. The affordability of air travel and the presence of virtually every Buddhist tradition in close proximity in many Western cities have led to an eclectic approach to being a Buddhist. Since it is frequently equated with meditation, interest in Buddhism is often driven by therapeutic considerations that have exerted a secularizing influence conducive to the formation of nonsectarian spiritualities. Buddhism’s encounter with Western civilization has led Asian Buddhists to reflect on their own tradition as never before and to rediscover their own common heritage as Buddhists beyond sectarian divisions. The confrontation of Buddhism with Christianity and its tradition of charitable works has invigorated and provided a new direction for many East Asian schools of Mahayana.

Christal Whelan

See also China; Engaged Buddhist Groups; Gautama, Siddharta; India; Japan; Korea, Democratic People’s Republic of (North Korea); Korea, Republic of (South Korea); New Religions in Japan; Pāli; Sangha; Theravada Buddhism; Vajrayana, Tibetan; Zen Buddhism

Further Readings

- Buswell, R. E., Jr. (1992). The Zen monastic experience: Buddhist practice in contemporary Korea. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Dreyfus, G. B. J. (2003). The sound of two hands clapping: The education of a Tibetan Buddhist monk. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Kitagawa, J., & Cummings, M. D. (Eds.). (1989). Buddhism in Asian history. London: Macmillan.

- Learman, L. (Ed.). (2005). Buddhist missionaries in the era of globalization. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
- Ling, T. O. (1980). Buddhist revival in India: Aspects in the sociology of Buddhism. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Mackenzie, R. (2007). New Buddhism movements in Thailand: Towards an understanding of Wat Phra Dhammakaya and Santi Asoke. New York: Routledge.
- Queen, C. S. (Ed.). (2000). Engaged Buddhism in the West. Boston: Wisdom.
- Snellgrove, D. (1957). Buddhist Himalaya: Travels and studies in quest of the origins and nature of Tibetan religion. New York: Philosophical Library.

MAHDI

Mahdi is the title reserved for the future savior of the Muslim community. The name means “divinely guided person.” Muslims believe that the Mahdi, as God’s caliph, will launch a revolution to deliver people from tyranny and oppression in order to usher an era of justice and equity on earth at the “End of Time,” prior to the final resurrection and judgment. Messianism is a salient feature of Islamic salvation history. Major compilations of Muslim traditions, both Sunnī and Shi’a, have long sections dealing with the final days of the world, foretelling the apocalyptic signs that will appear before the Mahdi launches the restorative justice. Messianic expectations were part of the early Muslim belief in Prophet Muhammad being the “apostle of the End of Time” (nabi akhīr al-zaman). This was the source of the doctrine about the universal mission with which Prophet Muhammad was commissioned to usher humanity toward an ideal global community. The Qur’anic preoccupation with the impending Day of Judgment and the Signs of the Hour, which announced cosmic disorder and a period of terror and fear preceding the Final Days, points to the millennialism announcing a future utopian age of joy, peace, and justice, especially one created through revolution, under the descendant of the Prophet, al-Mahdi.

The responsibility to create an ideal public order that carried within itself the revolutionary challenge to any inimical order that might hamper its realization was historically assumed by the prophet Muhammad himself when he established the first Muslim polity in Medina in 622 CE. The decisive connection between the divine investiture and the political mission of creating an Islamic world order is the integral facet of the idea of Mahdi. Hence, the Mahdi, through his investiture as Prophet Muhammad’s successor and God’s caliph, is awaited by all Muslims to implement the divinely ordained public order on earth.

Historical and sociological factors in the first century, following the Prophet’s death in 632 CE, were instrumental in heightening the messianic expectations in the Muslim community, especially among those who were persecuted as Shi’a—partisans of ‘Ali (d. 661), the cousin and son-in-law of the Prophet, and sympathizers of his claim to the caliphate. The idea of a perfect leader, the divinely guided, continued to be emphasized more specifically among the religious-minded Muslims in general and among the Shi’i in particular. The outbreak of the civil wars and the perturbed condition that followed greatly contributed to the notion of the messianic savior whose function was, first, to redress the wrongs committed against the downtrodden and establish justice—by which the Shi’i meant abolition of the caliphate of the oppressors and return to a pure Islam—and, second, to achieve the conversion of the world to Islam. Among the various factions of the Shi’i, disagreement on the identification of the Mahdi was one of the chief factors separating each sect. Shi’i hope for justice was an expression of radical social protest. The expectation meant not merely a hope for the future but a reevaluation of present social and historical life. Every generation found reason to believe that it was likely that the Mahdi would appear in its own time and test the faithful by summoning them to launch the great social transformation themselves under his command, with the promise of divine help when it would be needed. Hence, belief in the Mahdi became the source of heretical and even combative tendencies among the Shi’i. Their revolutionary insurrections were feared and severely crushed by the ruling authorities for their potentially destructive and chaotic repercussions.

However, all Shi’a attempts were not successful, and once its adherents met with repeated failures and persecutions, they ceased to attempt revolutionary transformation. With this change in fortunes, the Shi’a ideology became the chief vehicle for any Muslim who entertained radical change, and it was perpetuated in terms of esoteric messianic teaching. The title “Mahdi” ceased to connote immediate and direct political action. It continued to express the idealism of the Muslim community, the hope that one day Islam, with all its political and social implications, will return to its pristine purity. It is believed that the original historical mission of Islam—namely, the establishment of the ideal society under divine guidance—will attain fulfillment in the future under the Mahdi, whose emergence as the restorer of ideal Muslim order is awaited by all Muslims.

Abdulaziz Sachedina

See also Apocalypticism; Iran; Islam; Shi’a Islam; Sunnī Islam

Further Readings

- Sachedina, A. A. (1981). Islamic Messianism: The idea of Mahdi in Twelver Shi’ism. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Sachedina, A. A. (1991). Activist Shi’ism in Iran, Iraq, and Lebanon. In M. E. Marty & R. S. Appleby (Eds.), Fundamentalisms observed (pp. 403–456). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MAHDI OF SUDAN (1844–1885)

Muhammad Ahmad, also known as the Mahdi of Sudan, was a 19th-century Sufi Muslim religious reformer, revivalist, and militant. The Mahdi’s messianic resistance movement mobilized Northern Sudanese Muslims to fight against the Ottoman Egyptians, who had exploited Sudan for slaves and ivory since the early 1820s. The British, who occupied Egypt in the early 1880s, oversaw and participated in Egypt’s expansionist project in Sudan, to protect British financial interests in the region. The Mahdi and his followers successfully ousted the British-supported Turko-Egyptian regime in 1885.

The son of a boat builder, Muhammad Ahmad was born in Labab, an island in the province of Dongola, and was raised in the Nile Valley near Khartoum. An apt student, he studied theology and Sufism (mystical Islam) and later joined the Sammaniyya Sufi order, eventually becoming a Sufi shaykh. Sufism and Sufi orders were widespread in Sudan during the 1800s. Muhammad Ahmed became progressively more frustrated with the mismanagement of Sudan by the Turko-Egyptian invaders and with what he felt was their low morality. His own sense of mission, combined with his study of the concept of the Islamic Mahdi, led him to proclaim himself to be the Mahdi in 1881, successor to the prophet Muhammad and a representative of God on earth. The term Mahdi refers to a divinely guided messianic figure who returns to earth rid the world of evil, tyranny, and oppression and establish justice in its place. The belief in the return of the Mahdi is prevalent in Shi’a and Sufi doctrine; Sunnī mahdist movements have also taken place, but to a lesser extent.

Muhammad Ahmad’s followers swore an oath of allegiance to him as Mahdi and were known as the Ansar, or “helpers.” This term, also given to the prophet Muhammad’s followers in Medina, served to link the Sudanese struggle with that of the early Muslim community, thus lending legitimacy to the Mahdi’s efforts. His political and revivalist movement was known as the Mahdiyya.

The Egyptian ulema (religious scholars) were severely critical of Muhammad Ahmad’s claim, leading him to call those who challenged his mahdship infidels, further fueling hostilities. In favor of an independent Sufi Muslim Sudan, he was critical of the imperial foreign power structure and also of Egypt’s orthodox form of Islam, which differed from the Sudanese indigenous Sufism. Because of this, and because the Turko-Egyptian invasion was supported by the non-Muslim British, the Mahdi considered the entire occupying group to be religiously suspect and his battle against them to be a holy war.

Claiming victory over the Turko-Egyptian regime in 1885, the Mahdists famously decapitated General Gordon, the British general sent to Khartoum to evacuate the surviving occupying forces. The Mahdi died shortly after, perhaps of typhus, and the Khalifa ‘Abdullahi took his place. The Mahdi had established an Islamic Mahdist state in Khartoum, which survived from 1885 to 1898; in 1898, the British defeated Abdullahi and dominated the region until Sudan’s independence in 1956.

The Mahdi was one of the most influential figures in the contemporary history of Sudan. He is remembered by some as a “resistance hero,” and he left a legacy of Sudanese Islamic nationalism. The Ansar later became known as the Umma Party, which is still active today. The Mahdiyya today is one of five Muslim sects in North Sudan, and they are represented by the Umma Party. Sadiq al-Mahdi, the great-grandson of the Mahdi, is a prominent politician and head of the Umma Party, who has twice served as the prime minister of Sudan (1967–1969 and 1986–1989), before being overthrown in a 1989 coup by ‘Umar Hasan Ahmad al-Bashir.

Sophia Pandya

See also Islam; Islamic Modernism; Mahdi; Sudan; Sufism

Further Readings

- Holt, P. M. (1970). The Mahdist state in the Sudan 1881–1898: A study of its origins, development and overthrow. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Robinson, D. (2004). Muslim societies in African history. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Voll, J. O. (1991). Sudan: State and crisis in society. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

MALAWI

Malawi is a small, landlocked republic located in southeastern Africa, bounded by Tanzania, Mozambique, and Zambia. Its diverse geography includes semiarid savannas in the central region, mountains in the north, and the third largest African freshwater body, Lake Malawi. The country has two urban centers in Lilongwe, the capital, and Blantyre; however, the population remains mostly rural and survives on subsistence farming and wage labor. Malawi is one of the poorest countries in the world with more than 50% of its population living below the poverty line. Christians make up the overwhelming majority among the Tumbuka and Chewa peoples of the central and northern regions, whereas Muslims are the majority among the Yao people of the southern region.

Malawi was settled by groups of Bantu people from the north in the 10th century CE, and by the 16th century these tribes had established three neighboring kingdoms to the west and south of Lake Malawi. Rich oral histories indicate that these civilizations shared many common religious elements, including a Supreme God associated with rain and the sky, worship of divinized royal ancestors, and tribal kings who functioned as rain callers and spiritual leaders of the community. In the 1600s and 1700s, these kingdoms had some contact with Portuguese traders and settlers. Muslim influence came slightly earlier through contact with Arab traders but was limited in scope. The Scottish missionary and explorer David Livingston reached Lake Malawi in 1859, and the Scottish Presbyterian mission of Livingstonia was founded in 1894. Malawi, then called Nyasaland, was ruled by the British from 1894 until independence in 1964. Malawi was ruled by the dictator Hastings Banda until 1994, when his peaceful overthrow resulted in the establishment of a multi-party democracy.

Roughly 75% of Malawi’s population are Protestant Christian, 10% are Catholic, 10% are Muslim, and 5% follow traditional African religions or other religions exclusively. However, these numbers have been changing quickly since independence due to a rapid increase in new religious movements, particularly African-initiated Pentecostal groups, Seventh-Day Adventists, Jehovah’s Witnesses, and other new Protestant sects. Malawi is the birthplace of several vibrant Pentecostal denominations that are extending their reach beyond its borders, including Living Waters Church International, Agape Life Church, and Destiny Ministries. All of these groups preach the importance of supernatural power and the necessity of a puritan moral lifestyle. These groups have also been hostile to participation in indigenous rites and religious beliefs, which has contributed to the decline of traditional African religious elements in Malawi. Nevertheless, among Malawian Christians and Muslims, there is still a fairly widespread belief in witchcraft, use of traditional healers, and, to a lesser degree, participation in traditional initiation rites.

Nicolette D. Manglos

See also Africa; Ancestors; Christianity; Indigenous Religions; Islam; Missions and Missionaries; Mozambique; New Religions in Africa; Pentecostal Movements; Protestant Christianity; Tanzania; Zambia

Further Readings

- Chanock, M. (1985). Law, custom, and social order: The colonial experience of Malawi and Zambia. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Englund, H. (2003). Christian independency and global membership: Pentecostal extraversions in Malawi. Journal of Religion in Africa, 33, 83–111.

MALAYSIA

In the Southeast Asian nation of Malaysia, located south of Thailand and north of Indonesia, religion and ethnicity are the primary components of social identities. Although Islam is the state religion, freedom of religion is guaranteed. Ethnic Malays, who are Sunnī Muslim, are a little more than 50% of the population, and an additional approximately 10% of Malaysians are Muslims from other ethnic backgrounds. Chinese Malaysians, who compose approximately 24% of the population, are generally syncretic Mahayana Buddhists, with small numbers who identify as Daoist, Confucian, or Christian. Christianity has had a much greater impact in east Malaysia, where missionaries were allowed to convert natives with animist traditions; overall 9% of Malaysians are Christian. Indians, who are 7% of the population, are mostly Hindu. Other religious minorities include animists, Sikhs, and Baha'i. This ethnic and religious diversity is a result of the increase of non-Malay peoples from the beginning of colonization in the 18th century up to the formation of the Malayan Federation in 1948.

Islam

According to the Sejarah Melayu (Malay Annals), the Sultan of Malacca converted to Islam in the beginning of the 15th century. The prophet Muhammad is said to have appeared to the ruler in a dream, taught him the profession of faith, and given him the name Muhammad. The next day, a ship arrived from Jeddah with a Sayid, descendant of the Prophet, who converted the other nobles in the court. In the 15th century, with the Malacca Sultanate dominating the sea lanes in Southeast Asia, Islam spread to coastal ports throughout the area. The Islam that Indian traders brought to Malaysia was deeply Sufi, and among the populace, more generally, Islam was combined with shamanic and animist beliefs.

In the early decades of the 20th century, an Islamic reform movement known as Kaum Muda (Youth Faction) spread from the Middle East to Malaysia. Influenced by the writings of Muhammad Abduh (1849–1905) and Rashid Rida (1865–1935), the Kaum Muda attacked Sufi ritualism and sought to modernize Islam through the establishment of religious schools (madrasas). In the 1970s, a revival movement known as dakwah arose in the aftermath of anti-Chinese race riots in 1969. It was inspired by disillusionment with secular nationalism after the defeat of Egypt and Syria in the 1967 Arab-Israeli War and by the civil rights movement in the United States. At the University of Malaya, students who were influenced by writings of the Muslim Brotherhood (Ikhwan-al-Muslimeen) in Egypt and reformers such as Abdul Ala Maududi of Pakistan formed the Malaysian Islamic Youth Movement (Angkatan Belia Islam Malaysia, ABIM). ABIM began to work in the slums around Kuala Lumpur and in 1974 organized demonstrations protesting against Malay poverty. Although Anwar Ibrahim, ABIM's leader, was imprisoned for 2 years as a result of the protests, the Malaysian government began to accommodate the demands of Islamic activists. The dakwah movement was particularly strong in the states of Kelantan and Terengganu and in rural Kedah, the base of the Pan-Malaysia Islamic Party (PAS), formed in 1951 to struggle for an Islamic state. The Iranian Revolution in 1979 and government efforts to suppress PAS fortified the commitment of Islamic activists. In 1986, 14 villagers in Kedah were killed by the police when they tried to prevent the arrest of a PAS preacher.

To combat the appeal of militant Islam and co-opt PAS supporters, the ruling party, the United Malay National Organization (UMNO), adopted a range of pro-Islam policies. The Islamic Center, established in 1980, was a government-sponsored dakwah organization. In 1983, the International Islamic University and the Islamic Bank were established. And in 1992, the Institute of Islamic Understanding Malaysia (Institut Kefahaman Islam Malaysia, IKIM) was set up to support a government program of modernization called "Vision 2020." According to its publication, An Inspiration for the Future of Islam, IKIM's goal was to "provide a clearer picture of Islam in line with the demands and needs of modern times." An alternative vision of progressive Islam formulated by Anwar Ibrahim was Islam Madani, which drew on the writings of the reformer Muhammad Iqbal and stressed the development of civil society and individual rights. In 2004, Abdullah Ahmad Badawi, who succeeded Mohamad Mahathir as prime minister, introduced the idea of Islam Hadhari. Drawing on the teachings of Ibn Khaldun, Islam Hadhari stresses the importance of education, social order, and the restraints that are required for the development of a great urban civilization.

Each of the 11 states of peninsular Malaysia has its own Religious Council and Islamic judiciary. The Sharia courts are governed by judges trained in Sharia law. Muslims are obliged to follow the decisions of Sharia courts in matters concerning their religion, which include marriage and divorce, inheritance, apostasy, conversion, and custody. Non-Muslims who marry Muslims must renounce their religion and convert to Islam. This last provision has caused great controversy in recent years and led to legal challenges that have reached the Supreme Court.

Buddhism and Chinese Religious Traditions

Kuan Yin, the bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, is the most popular deity among Chinese in Malaysia. She is worshipped as the compassionate one who rescues people who suffer. Wesak, the birthday of the Buddha, is a public holiday on which a great procession is sponsored jointly by Mahayana, Theravada, and Vajrayana Buddhists. The latter are represented by the Karma Kagyu sect, established in Malaysia in 1976 after a visit by the Karmapa. The Venerable Zhu Mo from Taiwan, who established the Malaysian Buddhist Institute in Penang in 1959, brought the anapanasati meditation tradition of Mahayana Buddhism to Malaysia. This tradition has appealed to the Mandarin-speaking Chinese. In the 1950s, a Theravada reform movement emphasizing vipassana meditation, brought to Malaysia by the Venerable K. Sri Dhammananda from Sri Lanka, attracted many English-speaking Chinese. In the 1980s, Achaan Yantra from Thailand renewed the vipassana teaching. While few Buddhists in Malaysia become monks, lay meditation training has become very popular.

Folk traditions of spirit mediumship, divination, and ancestor worship are also strong among the overseas Chinese. The Chinese New Year, the Ch'ing Ming Festival, the Feast of the Hungry Ghosts, and the Nine Emperors Festival are major occasions for worship of the ancestors and the gods and for appeasement of wandering spirits. A rich variety of southern Chinese ritual traditions has been preserved in Malaysia, including worship of T'ien Kung, the God of Heaven (sometimes identified with the Jade Emperor) and worship of Tuah Peh Kong, who is often associated with the visit of the Ming Admiral Cheng Ho (Zheng He) to Southeast Asia in the 15th century.

Hinduism

Archaeological research in Kedah provides evidence of Hindu influence in Malaysia in the fifth century CE, but this early contact has little connection with Hinduism as practiced today. At the beginning of the 19th century, the British began to recruit indentured laborers from South India and English-educated clerks from Ceylon (now Sri Lanka) for plantations they had established in Malaya. The low-caste and untouchable laborers built shrines to the lineage deities, such as Muniandi and Maduraiveeran, they had worshipped back home. In almost every rubber estate and in the neighborhoods where the dock workers and manual laborers settled, a temple was built to the Amman (Goddess), who was at the center of community life. In the Goddess Temple, an annual fire-walking ritual was performed. In the cities, the upper-caste Chettiars and English-educated Tamils from Jaffna built temples to Siva and the Goddess, where Brahmin priests who were brought from India performed agamic rituals. The major festival of all Tamils in Malaysia is the Thaipusam, during which devotees fulfill their vows to Murugan, the son of Siva, by participating in a kavadi (a dance) and performing vow fulfillment.

E. V. Ramasami Naicker brought the Adi Dravida "self-respect" movement, calling for the end of the caste system from Tamil Nadu to Malaysia in 1929. Tamil dockworkers and Tamil employees of the George Town municipality organized the "temple entry movement,” which led to the opening of the Queen Street Mariamman Temple in Penang to lower castes and untouchables in 1933. Since then, there have been several reform movements to end rituals of blood sacrifice, fire walking, and forms of vow fulfillment that involve piercing the body, but none of these movements has succeeded in eradicating these practices.

In the late 1970s, two dozen Hindu temples were attacked by a small group of Islamic extremists. As the government adopted pro-Islam policies, Malaysian Hindus responded with rising anxiety. In 1992, the Perak state government initiated a campaign of temple demolition on state land. The destruction of the Babri Masjid by Hindu extremists in India that same year provided fuel for further sporadic attacks on Hindu shrines in Malaysia. In 2007, the rising tensions led to mass demonstrations by ethnic Indians protesting government policies favoring ethnic Malays.

Christianity

Under the Portuguese (1511–1640), Melaka became a Catholic city, and the Roman Catholic Church proved resilient under Dutch rule. Protestant missionary activity in the Straits Settlements of Penang, Melaka, and Singapore began under the British in the 18th century, but in 1874 the colonial power committed to upholding the status of Islam in the Malay states. In Sarawak on Borneo, Raja Brooke invited missionaries to work among the animists Iban and Dayak. Today, Christians are more numerous than Muslims in Sarawak. Since the 1970s, evangelical Protestant organizations, such as the Assemblies of God, have been active in Malaysia.

Elizabeth Fuller Collins

See also Islam; Islamic Modernism; Liberal Islam; Muslim Brotherhood; Singapore; Southeast Asia; Thailand

Further Readings

Chong, T. (2006). The emerging politics of Islam Hadhari. In S. Swee-Hock & K. Kesavapany (Eds.), Malaysia: Recent trends and challenges (pp. 26–46). Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies.

- Collins, E. F. (1997). Pierced by Murugan's lance: Ritual, power, and moral redemption among Malaysian Hindus. Dekalb: Northern Illinois University Press.
- DeBernardi, J. E. (2004). Rites of belonging: Memory, modernity, and identity in a Malaysian Chinese community. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Lee, R. L. M., & Ackerman, S. E. (1988). Heaven in transition: Non-Muslim religious innovation and ethnic identity in Malaysia. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i.
- Lee, R. L. M., & Ackerman, S. E. (1997). Sacred tensions: Modernity and religious transformation in Malaysia. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- Muzaffar, C. (1987). Islamic resurgence in Malaysia. Selangor, Malaysia: Fajar Bakti Sdn. Bhd.
- Nagata, J. (1984). The reflowering of Malaysian Islam: Modern religious radicals and their roots. Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada: University of British Columbia Press.
- Wong, E. S. (1967). Chinese festivities in Malaysia and Singapore. Singapore: Malaysian Publishing House.

MALI

The Republic of Mali is a large, northwest African country with 14 million citizens, who live in a terrain bordered and landlocked by seven other nations, including Algeria, Burkina Faso, and Mauritania. Mali stands at the crossroads of global exchange in Africa, weaving a hybridity of Arab, West African, and European cultures enmeshed through centuries of trade, conquest, empire, and colonial relationships. Though poverty-stricken and consisting of predominantly nonarable desert, Mali is considered to be one of the most democratic nations in Africa, with free and fair elections, an open and variegated press, and a successfully practicing multiparty republic. Formerly called the French Sudan under colonial rule and later the Sudanese Republic, at independence in 1960, the nation of Mali faced a two-decade dictatorship and military coup before the country's first president was democratically elected in 1992. Amadou Toumani Toure played a significant role in bringing Malians out of dictatorship in 1991, and perhaps because of this, as twice-elected and current president, the former general is trusted and highly regarded as a sign of national stability.

Financially, loans from the IMF and other international agencies have kept Mali afloat as it works to improve social and industrial development. Malian cotton, a significant national industry, has not become a viable export commodity due to drought and overly subsidized global produce. Ethnically, Mali is made up of the Mande, Fulani, Voltaic, Songhai, Moor, and Tuareg peoples, among others. Linguistically, Malians speak the official language, French, as well as Arabic, Berber, and Bambara. The Bambara (or Bamana), who are predominantly agricultural, provided the nation with the Chiwara symbol, a carved wooden antelope, which represents vitality, perseverance, and social responsibility to community.

Religiously, Mali is markedly Sunnī and Sufi Muslim. Adherents of Christianity and indigenous practices constitute only 1/10 of the Malian population. Islam peacefully came to the region in the ninth century and spread across what is now present-day Mali via the trans-Saharan trade routes and the ancient Mali, Ghana, and Songhai empires, which were collectively active between the 9th and 17th centuries. Just as the Great Mosque of Djenné is known across Africa as an architectural feat and a site of Muslim pilgrimage, the Malian city of Timbuktu, famous for its kingdom of gold, was a thriving Islamic scholastic center with a university, libraries, transcribers, and clerics by the 12th century. Malian griots, who were traditionally poet-historians, spiritual-political advisors, and singers, are continentally recognized for their keen insights and stories, which are still readily available today in works such as The Epic of Sundiata. As in other West African nations, Islam in Mali is often combined with local practices that can include farming ceremonies, rites of passage, the honoring of ancestors, and traditional arts. In recent years, Mali has faced increasing pressures from al Qaeda, and with threats of kidnapping and harboring of terrorist cells in the countryside, Mali is struggling to rid itself of Islamic extremism and protect its many borders.

Christi M. Dietrich

See also Africa; Algeria; Burkina Faso; Islam; Mauritania; North Africa

Further Readings

- Bingen, R. J., Robinson, D., & Staats, J. M. (Eds.). (2000). Democracy and development in Mali. East Lansing: Michigan State University.
- Brenner, L. (2001). Controlling knowledge: Religion, power, and schooling in a West African Muslim society. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

MALINOWSKI, BRONISLAW (1884–1942)

The Polish-born British anthropologist Bronislaw Malinowski was a professor at the London School of Economics and an early exponent of extensive systematic field research and empathetic study of small-scale traditional societies. He was a pioneer of the functionalist approach to anthropology, in which society is seen as serving the biological and psychological needs of its members, the individual becoming the focus of anthropological study rather than institutions.

Born on April 7, 1884, to parents of upper-middle-class standing in Krakow, Poland, then still part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Malinowski early on determined to follow in the footsteps of his father, a professor of folklore at Jagiellonian University in Krakow. At Jagiellonian, Malinowski studied mathematics and physical sciences, receiving a doctorate in 1908. Shortly thereafter, as Malinowski later recounted, he read James Frazer's The Golden Bough, and his interests immediately shifted to the study of religion and culture. He ventured first to Leipzig University to study psychology under Wilhelm Wundt and then, in 1910, to the London School of Economics (LSE), where he undertook advanced studies in anthropology under C. G. Seligman and Edward Westermarck and became a lecturer in 1913.

The pivotal point in Malinowski's career came in 1914, when he traveled to the western Pacific for what was to have been a relatively brief expedition. The advent of World War I prevented his return to England until 1920. During that time, Malinowski spent 6 months among the inhabitants of the island of Mailu, off the southeast coast of New Guinea, and then a total of 26 months in the Trobriand Islands, about 100 miles (1 mile = 1.609 kilometers) northeast of New Guinea. Malinowski became the first European anthropologist to live day in and day out among the subjects of his study, observing firsthand the lives and routines of the Trobrianders. Though the field methods that he developed were anthropological, Malinowski was interested not merely in rituals and customs but in the feelings and motivations that guided an individual's daily actions. He also noted that the Trobrianders employed magic, not as "primitive science" but as a response to frustrated desires.

The result of his fieldwork was the publication of Argonauts of the Western Pacific (1922), a work that secured his reputation as the leading anthropologist of his generation. He spent the next two decades at the LSE, when, in 1939, he accepted visiting lecturer appointments in the United States. World War II once again prevented his return to England. He died on May 16, 1942, in New Haven, Connecticut. His later works included Myth in Primitive Psychology (1926); Sex and Repression in Savage Society (1927), which owed much to Malinowski's interest in applying Freudian psychoanalytic theory to non-Western cultures; A Scientific Theory of Culture (1944); and Magic, Science, and Religion (1948).

Jon R. Stone

See also Indigenous Religions; Myth; Pacific Islands/Oceania

Further Readings

- Hatch, E. (1973). Theories of man and culture. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Malinowski, B. (1922). Argonauts of the western Pacific. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Malinowski, B. (1926). Myth in primitive society. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Malinowski, B. (1927). Sex and repression in savage society. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Malinowski, B. (1944). A scientific theory of culture. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Malinowski, B. (1948). Magic, science, and religion. New York: Free Press.
- Stocking, G. W., Jr. (1995). After Tylor: British social anthropology 1888–1951. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Strenski, I. (2006). Thinking about religion: An historical introduction to theories of religion. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.

MALTA

The Maltese archipelago of islands is centrally situated in the Mediterranean Sea. Its strategic location made it an important trading post and point of cultural interaction in antiquity, and various Christian and Muslim powers vied for possession of the islands until Malta's independence from Britain in 1964. Nevertheless, since St. Paul founded its church in the mid-first century, Malta has remained a predominantly Christian nation. Its constitution establishes Roman Catholicism as the state religion but guarantees freedom of religion to the approximately 5% of non-Catholics on the islands, which include Protestants (mostly British expatriates and tourists), Jehovah's Witnesses, Mormons, Muslims, Jews, and very small populations of Zen Buddhists and Baha'is.

Malta's Muslims currently number less than 1% of the total population of approximately 415,000, a mere trace of the islands' Fātimid heritage. Muslims from Sicily and North Africa immigrated to Malta in the late ninth century and remained until the early 13th century, when the last Muslims were expelled. In 1973, however, the Maltese government symbolically contributed toward restoring the country's Islamic legacy by donating land for construction of a mosque. The Libyan World Islamic Call Society also sponsored the project, and until today the mosque serves some 3,000 Muslims. Ahmadiyya Muslims maintain a noticeable public presence in Malta, especially by hosting interfaith conferences.

Despite the recent diversity in religious minority groups, Malta's historically Catholic identity has traditionally defined its national character. Home to one of the earliest Christian communities, Malta features several important sites, including the supposed location of Paul's shipwreck as described in the Bible (Acts 27–28) and the Mosta Rotunda, a Catholic church bearing the world's third largest unsupported dome.

The eponymous Knights of Malta are descendants of the Knights Hospitaller, a Catholic monastic and military order founded in Jerusalem prior to the Crusades, and governed the islands from 1530 until the arrival of Napoleon in 1798. In addition to performing acts of faith-inspired valor and ministering to sick pilgrims, the Knights dedicated much of their energy to fending off attacks by Ottoman corsairs, including a 4-month siege in 1565. Although defunct militarily since 1798, the Sovereign Military Hospitaller Order of St. John of Jerusalem of Rhodes and of Malta, as the Knights have come to be officially known, continues to serve the suffering worldwide in obedience to its motto, Tuitio Fidei et Obsequium Pauperum, or “Defence of the faith and service to the poor.” Now based in Rome, the independent organization enjoys permanent observer status in the United Nations and 18 other international organizations, as well as bilateral diplomatic relations with more than 100 states.

Emily Pollokoff

See also Ahmaddiya; Christianity; Crusades; Mediterranean World; Roman Catholicism

Further Readings

- Brief history of Malta.* (2010, November). Hill Monastic Manuscript Library. Retrieved December 26, 2010, from <http://www.hmml.org/centers/malta/history/history.html>
- Goodwin, S. (2002). Malta, Mediterranean bridge. Westport, CT: Greenwood.
- Rossi, E., Isserlin, B. S. J., & Vanhove, M. (2010). Malta. In Encyclopaedia of Islam (2nd online ed.). Retrieved December 27, 2010, from http://www.brillonline.nl/subscriber/entry?entry=islam_COM-0654

MANICHAISM

Manichaeism is an Iranian Gnostic religion that was founded by the prophet Mani in the third century CE. Manichaeism was at its greatest prevalence from the third through the sixth centuries, although it remained active through at least the ninth century and at its peak was one of the most popular and influential religions in the ancient world. Although it began in the Persian Empire (modern Iran), the religion quickly spread from the Roman Empire all the way to China through the Silk Road trade route. Manichaeism was seen as a serious threat to Christianity, Islam, Buddhism, and Zoroastrianism, and it was deliberately targeted by these religious traditions, its followers persecuted and its sacred texts destroyed. It was not until the beginning of the 20th century that Manichaean texts began to be discovered buried in deserts and hidden in secret vaults.

Mani (216–276 CE) was born during the Sassanian period in the Persian Empire and raised in an ascetic Christian and Jewish environment. Mani came into contact with various other religions through his travels, including Buddhism and Zoroastrianism, and incorporated aspects of these traditions into his teachings. He claimed to have received two revelations from a spirit he called the “Twin,” and after the second revelation took up the role of a prophet. Manichaeism presented itself as the complete vision of a variety of teachings that had only partially been revealed by figures such as Jesus and the Buddha. Because of this, the religion appealed to followers from many different religious backgrounds, who saw Mani’s teachings as the culmination of their beliefs.

Manichaeism’s complex ideology combined aspects of the dualistic creation myth of Zoroastrianism, another ancient Persian religion, and Gnosticism, a term used to describe a variety of religious systems that emphasized gnosis, or knowledge, as the key to salvation. The Manichaean creation myth saw the world as a struggle between the forces of good, found in the spiritual world of light, and the forces of evil, manifested in the physical, material world of darkness. Throughout history, this light is gradually freed from its imprisonment in the physical world and returned to the spirit world. Mani preached the virtues of knowledge, self-denial, vegetarianism, chastity, and fasting; Manichaean communities followed ascetic practices and were divided into the “elect,” male and female monks, and the “hearers,” the lay people who supported them.

Manichaeism was able to gain strength rapidly because it attracted a number of influential adherents, including members of the ruling house of Persia. However, its message proved to be too threatening, and it became the target of intense persecution, disappearing entirely in many places by the end of the sixth century, though it lasted longer in China and the Far East.

Victoria J. Ballmes

See also Christianity; Iran; Mediterranean World; Middle East; Silk Road; Zoroastrianism (and Parsis)

Further Readings

- Foltz, R. C. (1999). Religions of the Silk Road: Overland trade and cultural exchange from antiquity to the fifteenth century. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Lieu, S. N. C. (1985). Manichaeism in the later Roman Empire and medieval China: A historical survey. Manchester, UK: Manchester University Press.

MARÍA LIONZA CULT OF VENEZUELA

María Lionza is a matriarchal goddess, an erotic symbol, and a water deity celebrated by an indigenous religion that originated in Venezuela; the places of worship of this deity are Sorte, Quiballo, Falcón, and Carabobo, sacred spaces of aboriginals from Nirgua, in the state of Yaracuy. It has also extended to Colombia, Spain, Central America, The Antilles, and the United States. The core value of the cult is freedom; it does not have a common doctrine and rejects unified rituals.

There are different versions regarding the origins of the religion. One of them affirms that María Lionza was the daughter of a cacique caquetío (pre-Columbian tribal chief of the Caquetío ethnic group) who hid aboriginals from the Inquisition's courts (created in 1610) and appeared naked riding a tapir to intimidate the Spaniards. A second version from the 17th century portrays her as a woman of mixed European and Moorish heritage who survived a shipwreck and was adopted by the arahuacos (Nívares and Caquetíos ethnic groups), who gave her the name María Lionza, which means "Queen emerged from the waters." She was tall, white, green-eyed, and a snake charmer. She married the cacique Chivacoa, who died leaving her in power, which explains why she is called Queen, Goddess, or Mother.

Another version establishes that a Nívar shaman predicted the birth of a tribal chief's daughter whose eyes were so extraordinary that when their pupils were reflected on water, it would make a destructive serpent emerge. A green-eyed girl was born, and her father protected her until the day she was reflected on the lagoon and from her eyes a giant snake jumped, creating the Tacarigua lagoon, now known as Valencia Lake. This myth turns María Lionza into a sacred woman-snake typical of the Amazonic cosmic vision and a protector of nature.

The cult originated with the arrival of the Spaniard conquerors between 1499 and 1515 and remained, with a few followers, until the beginning of the 20th century. In the 1920s, the cult leaders were incarcerated, and toward 1930, aboriginalists compiled oral traditions about María Lionza and registered cases of disease cures performed in her name.

In 1950, the sculptor Alejandro Colina created a symbolic statue for the III Bolivarian Sport Games, held in 1951 in Venezuela: a huge statue of María Lionza riding a tapir and raising a pelvic bone over her head; in 1954, the statue was placed on the Francisco Fajardo highway in Caracas. Subsequently, the statue became a place of worship, where flowers, money, and rituals are offered.

In the cult, there are only priestesses, bancos, and mediums. The banco uses the medium to bring down a healing spirit and help in the trance. In rituals, María Lionza is offered perfume and liquor, which are poured into the water, on the altars, and on the followers; tobacco is also smoked since it is considered a purification resource.

Laura Fuentes Belgrave

See also Goddess; Indigenous Religions; Latin America; New Religions in South America; Shamanism; Venezuela

Further Reading

- Parentelli, G. (2004). The Goddess-Queen: Not mother neither virgin. In G. Pujol (Ed.), Virgins and Goddess in Latin America: The new significance of the sacred (pp. 139–154). Montevideo, Uruguay: Colectivo Conspirando/Red Latinoamericana de Católicas por el Derecho a Decidir.

MARIAN CULTS AND APPARITIONS IN LATIN AMERICA

Since the final decades of the 20th century, there has been an expressive proliferation of Marian manifestations in Catholic countries, especially in Latin America. They contain the structural patterns of older European phenomena recognized by the Church, such as messages, supernatural visions, and sanctuary building, but they also have new elements relating to their local and national contexts, characteristics of contemporary globalized Catholicism and the visionaries' performance. This mixture of breaks with the past and historical continuity places the manifestations on a long diachronic line, which is being updated within traditional parameters while also revealing to devotees unknown aspects of the Virgin, since the Gospels and official documents tell us little about her.

The symbolic starting point of these Latin American phenomena is the apparitions of Medjugorje, Bosnia-Herzegovina, beginning in 1981, representing the unfolding and reinterpretation of modern Marian ideology based on the following apocalyptic points: the world's end; divine justice; God's wrath; Maria the Intercessor, who is compassionate toward the suffering of humans and advocates in their favor; humankind's sins; and castigation and atonement through conversion and salvation. What distinguishes this manifestation from previous ones is that it has existed over a period of years and is no longer confined to its original socio-geographic niche. It can happen anywhere the visionaries happen to be, as a single complete rite or as an interrelated series of rites within a specific story. The phenomena have acquired a strong public character, involving the consecrating of settings, the breaking of denominational boundaries and institutional controls, and considerable use of the media and the Internet.

In Latin America, following the fading of the intense presence of Liberation Theology in Catholic communities, the cults and apparitions emerged again, principally among poorer groups, or took a contrary stance to the capitalist political and economic logic, whereby the threatened traditional system struggled to resist contemporary tribulations, thus recovering an idealized order (e.g., indigenous people in Mexico and Colombia). Led by people considered pure, oppressed, and lacking formal religious knowledge, such as beggars in Chile and peasant children in Brazil, these phenomena showed themselves to be subversive by becoming organized, expressing their force, and appropriating the sacred without ecclesiastical mediation. Charismatic Renovation was the Catholic movement that came closest to these Marian manifestations, especially where Catholicism attempted to remain dominant in the face of ground lost to other religions. However, this approximation was not totally accepted by devotees, despite its having been able to communicate to the urban middle classes meanings of the manifestations proper to the poorer rural communities.

The message announced in these contexts does not have the same strong eschatological content it has in Europe; rather it is benign and welcoming, coming from an accessible Virgin. In addition, among Latin people, the events have brought together in communitas the faithful from different social classes, races, ethnic groups, educational levels, gender, and age, capable of investing the visionaries and messengers with a virtually sacerdotal power of mediation between divinity and humans, bringing popular devotion into the bosom of the Church.

Tânia Mara Campos de Almeida

See also Colombia; Indigenous Religions; Latin America; Mexico; New Religions in South America; Roman Catholicism

MARSHALL ISLANDS

The Marshall Islands (also called the Republic of the Marshall Islands) is a Pacific island nation that, along with Saipan, Guam, the Caroline Islands, and others, constitutes the Federated States of Micronesia, located in the center of the Pacific Ocean. The islands contain more than 60,000 people and lie to the north of Kiribati and Nauru, while to the south lies the American territory of Wake Island.

Christianity is the primary religion throughout the islands, and most citizens are Protestant. The single largest religious denomination is the United Church of Christ, with slightly more than half of the population (approximately 55%). The Pentecostal Church (found within the Assembly of God) is also well represented, with 25% of the population considering themselves adherents. Roman Catholicism has slightly more than 8% of the population. Smaller Protestant denominations include the Pentecostal faith called the Bukot Non Jesus, which is also known by the title "Assembly of God Part II." In addition, there are Seventh-Day Adventists and Full Gospel believers (holiness beliefs similar to Pentecostals).

Mormonism (Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints) may also be found in the Marshall Islands, as are believers of the Baha'i Faith (a small church accentuating monotheism that was started in 19th-century Persia). Followers of Ahmadiyya Islam and Jehovah's Witnesses are thought to have small enclaves of believers, measuring somewhere in the hundreds. Missionaries of any faith are welcome in the Marshall Islands to evangelize to the citizens, and it is the same throughout Micronesia.

Indigenous beliefs throughout Micronesia were polytheistic; that is, there were a number of gods of both sexes, and each had a specific function. Many chief gods were symbolized as being instrumental within the annual succession of regeneration and renewal that secures the prospects of humanity's continued existence on earth. Other gods were minor and were linked with neighborhood shrines. Spirits from one's ancestors were understood to frequently intermingle with people; those who knew how to contact them often did so. These ancestors were believed to monitor the day-to-day behavior of the living, pondering whether the individual in question acted in a forbidden manner or contravened any of the ethical rules that the major gods had established.

Death was considered the stealing of a person's ability to breathe and the complete absence of the animating force that keeps each person alive. Moreover, it occurred as a result of the behavior of other beings, both alive and deceased. One's personality does not change at death; on the contrary, each individual carries his or her personality characteristics throughout life and death. If a person was friendly or cruel in earthbound existence, he or she would remain so in the afterlife. Spirits of the dead intermingle with the living, and individuals newly deceased stay close to the living, often shielding family members or good friends from harm. However, cruel spirits often enjoy scaring people, and those that are the nastiest enjoy bringing death or bad luck to the living.

Cary Stacy Smith and Li-Ching Hung

See also Christianity; Guam; Micronesia; Missions and Missionaries; Mormons; Northern Mariana Islands; Pacific Islands/Oceania

Further Readings

- Cole, G. (2006). South Pacific and Micronesia. Melbourne, Australia: Lonely Planet Productions.
- Galbraith, K., Bendure, G., & Friary, N. (2000). Lonely planet Micronesia. Melbourne, Australia: Lonely Planet Productions.
- Levy, N. (2003). Moon handbooks Micronesia. Berkeley, CA: Avalon Travel.

MARTIN, DAVID (B. 1929)

David Alfred Martin is an emeritus professor of sociology at the London School of Economics and an adjunct professor at Liverpool Hope University. He is the author of about 20 books and 300 articles on a wide variety of subjects, including the relation between religion and politics and the rise of Pentecostalism, but is probably best known for his writings on secularization.

Martin was born in London in 1929. He attended Sheen Grammar School, spent his 2 years of compulsory National Service in the Non-Combatant Corps and obtained a diploma in education with distinction from the Methodist Westminster College of Education. He then earned his living as a primary school teacher from 1952 until 1959, when, having undertaken private study for an External London University degree, he gained a first-class honors in sociology. This led to his being awarded a postgraduate scholarship, which, together with a year's assistant lectureship at Sheffield University, followed by an appointment as a lecturer at the London School of Economics (LSE), enabled him to study the history and sociology of pacifism under the supervision of Donald MacRae at the LSE. The resulting PhD was published in 1965. Martin remained at the LSE, becoming a professor of sociology in 1971, until taking early retirement in 1989 and has since held various posts as visiting professor at universities in England and the United States.

Martin's questioning of the secularization thesis gained much attention in the mid-1960s, when he suggested that the concept of secularization was so laden with ideological distortions that it interfered with a proper examination of the complexities of religious reality and should, therefore, be erased from the sociological dictionary. However, rather than abandoning it, Martin spent much of the following decades employing the concept to illuminate those very complexities that lie in the different geographical, political, economic, cultural, and spiritual aspects of religious life. His work on the spread of Pentecostalism, especially in South America and Africa, has provided but one illustration of the ways in which contemporary religiosity continues to play a crucially significant role in the lives of both individuals and society.

Martin's strongly held belief in the importance of religious symbolism as an upholder of cultural tradition has led to accusations that his work is occasionally more theological than sociological. Others laud the richness of his distinctive and often poetic style. Born into a Methodist family, Martin practiced as a Methodist lay preacher for several years but became increasingly attracted to the Church of England and its heritage and stoutly defended the 1662 Book of Common Prayer in opposition to the introduction of modern liturgies. In 1984, he was ordained as a priest in the Church of England. He was elected a fellow of the British Academy in 2007.

Eileen Barker

See also Anglicans; Politics and Religion; Protestant Christianity; Secularization

Further Readings

- Martin, D. A. (1978). A general theory of secularisation. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.
- Martin, D. A. (1990). Tongues of fire: The explosion of Protestantism in Latin America. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.
- Martin, D. A. (2005). On secularization: Notes towards a revised general theory. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate.

MARTINIQUE

Often referred to as the Paris of the Caribbean, the heavily Catholic island of Martinique is the largest of the Windward Islands, surrounded by the Caribbean Sea to the west, the Atlantic Ocean to the east, and the islands of Dominica and St. Lucia to the north and south, respectively. The islands' residents are French citizens with all the rights, privileges, and responsibilities of French nationals, including military duties, and at the beginning of the 21st century, nearly one third of all Martinicans reside in France. More than 90% of the population are of African or mixed descent, with about 5% of the population White and the remainder Indian and/or Chinese. About 2,500 residents are direct descendants of the original French settlers known as békés. Békés have long constituted an island élite, while Whites from France are regarded as "outsiders." More than 86% of the population identify themselves as Roman Catholics, though church attendance is relatively low. Pockets of Protestant, Hindu, Rastafarian, and syncretic Afro-Caribbean Quimbois practitioners are found also on the island. A variant of 19th-century Hinduism—brought to Martinique by South Indian immigrants via the West Indies—survives, but many Hindus and quimboiseurs also consider themselves Roman Catholics.

French settlers first came to the island in 1635 and established a plantation economy based on African slavery. Slavery was not abolished until 1848, after which Chinese and Indian laborers were brought to the island to replace African slave labor. The Catholic Church was established with the first French settlers in Martinique, and the first missions were started by members of the Dominican, Jesuit, and Capuchin orders. In 1909, the island was placed under the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith at the Vatican, which transferred the responsibility for Martinique to the Holy Ghost Fathers. At the beginning of the 21st century, an archbishop administered 47 parishes and more than 60 priests. In 1946, the National Assembly in Paris voted to make Martinique an overseas department of France; thereafter, Martinique became one of the 100 départements (states) of the French Republic and one of the 5 overseas departments (DOMs). The island sends four deputies (representatives) to the National Assembly.

As noted, Roman Catholicism has long been the dominant religion on Martinique. But recently, other religions (e.g., Seventh-Day Adventist Church, Jehovah's Witnesses, Baha'i, Judaism, Mormonism, and Islam) have grown in influence. Protestant denominations, for example, increased their membership from 3% of the population in 1983 to 12% of the population in 1998. The Seventh-Day Adventist Church began missionary work on the island in 1924, with Evangelical Baptists and Jehovah's Witnesses beginning work following World War II. Martinique has a small community of Orthodox Jews in Fort-de-France and a synagogue in Schoelcher. A Baha'i assembly was opened in the 1960s. There are currently about 300 Muslims and 80 Mormons in Martinique. As on other Caribbean islands, the Ancient and Mystical Rosicrucian Order has established a number of lodges.

A parallel system of belief and practice, known locally as quimbois, has long existed alongside Christianity. Deeply embedded in popular culture, Quimbois encompasses a variety of plant and herbal remedies, sorcery, and various forms of spiritual healing. Government documents suggest that European medicine has largely supplanted traditional medical practices and that traditional healers (guérisseurs) are less prevalent than in the past. Belief in sorcery and the "evil eye" is said to be declining. Still earlier beliefs persist, including belief in zombies ("the living dead") and vampires.

As elsewhere in the Caribbean, religious pluralism abounds. The cult of Maldevidan, a blending of Hinduism and Catholicism, in which the principal cult deity, Maldevidan, is identified with Jesus Christ, is primarily found in the northern part of Martinique. Most religions are supportive of the French government, but Rastafari—a religion that began in Jamaica—is highly critical of European politics, culture, and Christianity. As a department of France, citizens of Martinique enjoy religious freedom and separation of church and state. A French law passed in 2000 punishes sects for using "mental manipulation" by imposing up to 5 years' imprisonment and a $75,000 fine. France's armed force in Martinique constitutes the third largest military presence in the Caribbean after the United States and Cuba.

Stephen D. Glazier and Christi M. Dietrich

See also Caribbean; Diaspora; France; Missions and Missionaries; Roman Catholicism; Syncretism

Further Readings

- Benoit, C. (2001). African-derived religions in Guadeloupe and Martinique. In S. D. Glazier (Ed.), Encyclopedia of African and African American religions (pp. 130–131). New York: Routledge.
- Bernabe, J., Chamoiseau, P., & Confiant, R. (1992). Towards 1992: Political-cultural assimilation and opposition in contemporary Martinique. French Cultural Studies, 3, 61–86.
- Delawarde, J.-B. (1983). La sorecellerie a la Martinique. Paris: Tequi.
- Horowitz, M., & Klass, M. (1961). The Martinique East Indian cult of Maldevidan. Social and Economic Studies, 10(1), 93–100.
- Khan, A. (2003). Isms in schisms: Interpreting religion in the Americas. Anthropological Quarterly, 76(4), 761–774.
- Masse, R. (1966). Fishing rights and recipes in a Martinique village. Caribbean Studies, 6(1), 3–24.
- Masse, R. (1978). Les adventistes du septieme jour aux Antilles. Montreal, Quebec, Canada: University of Montreal, Centre de Recherches Caraibes.

MARTYRDOM

Martyrdom is a death marked with religious or ideological significance because of the martyr's refusal to betray a deeply held belief, often in obedience to a deity. Martyrdom includes three components: (1) the sufferer, (2) his or her community, and (3) opposition. Stories of martyrdom often describe in great detail the bodily torture inflicted on the martyr, emphasizing the fierce, even supernatural, cruelty of the opponents and the martyr's exchange of corporeal life for a greater afterlife. The act of martyrdom, a self-sacrifice, is thus a powerful means of identity formation, for both the martyr and the martyr's community. Yet because of the exclusivity of this identity, martyrdom is also a contentious and potentially divisive act. The death of the martyr has historically been and continues to be a poignant symbol of the power of belief.

History of Martyrdom

The word martyr comes from the Greek word martus, or witness, and was employed in the Greco-Roman world to identify one who provided testimony in legal proceedings. However, martyrdom became closely associated with the Christian tradition, largely because of the death of its progenitor, Jesus. Brought by Jewish leaders before the Roman governor of Judea for blasphemy, Jesus was crucified. After his death, the term martyr was increasingly used by the burgeoning Christian sect to denote one who testified to Jesus' resurrection, which sometimes resulted in punishment by death. The Acts of the Apostles recounts the story of Stephen, who was stoned by Jewish religious authorities and came to be known as the proto-martyr, the first to die for his Christian beliefs. According to tradition, most of the original followers of Jesus similarly underwent martyrdom.

Antecedents for martyrdom appear in both Greek and Jewish traditions before the time of Jesus. An early example in the Western tradition comes from the death of the philosopher Socrates in 399 BCE. Tried and convicted of teaching impiety, Socrates chose the sentence of drinking poison rather than being exiled from Athens. Speaking shortly before his death, he attributed his actions to divine compulsion. There were martyrs in the Jewish tradition before Jesus as well, most notably the Maccabees, seven brothers who were executed by the Seleucid Emperor Antiochus Epiphanes for their refusal to defame the Jewish God by worshipping Greek deities. As Christianity spread throughout the Roman world, however, Christians' refusal to participate in the social and civic functions earned the notice of public officials. Refusal, on questioning, to deny a Christian identity earned martyrs a public death. Martyrdom became the leitmotif of early Christianity, for the martyr was thought to act in imitation of Jesus Christ and provide an example to others. Furthermore, in death the martyr gained forgiveness and a place in heaven.

There were brief periods of Roman imperial action against Christianity during the first three centuries. This culminated with the Great Persecution, instituted by Diocletian in 303 and lasting until 313. It ended with the triumph of Constantine over his rivals. As the first Christian emperor, Constantine extended religious freedom to Christianity, and the time of active martyrdom came to a close.

With the backing of previously antagonistic emperors, the power of the Christian church began to increase. Beginning in the east and spreading to the west, bishops and local Christians began to establish cults around individuals who had suffered martyrdom. They were celebrated in annual festivals where the presiding bishop would retell the story of the martyr's death, often at an edifice constructed near his or her place of execution. Stories and celebrations of martyrdom multiplied throughout Roman territory, and the trafficking of martyr relics increased, most often with the support of the Church.

Stories of martyrdom remained a critical component of Christianity in the Byzantine Empire and in growing European nations. During the Reformation in the 15th and 16th centuries, both Catholic and Protestant groups claimed new martyrdoms in their internecine struggles. As Christian groups sent out missionaries to Asia and the newly discovered Americas, martyrdoms sometimes occurred among native populations unwilling to accept the intervention of foreign religion and culture.

In its early centuries, Islam also showed a propensity for martyrdom. Jihad entailed a nonviolent and defensive struggle against other groups, and the martyr, or shahid, was a witness to the faith. As the religion grew and encountered increasing conflict in its second century, martyrdom gained a more specific meaning, eventually denoting one who died for the faith in the course of battle. As in Christianity, death for Allah gained the martyr eternal paradise. The aggressive tone of later Islamic tales of martyrdom was similar to and influenced by the tales of Christian sects who were at odds with orthodox Christianity and often found refuge in Muslim territory.

More recent religious traditions likewise revere martyr figures. Sikhism, founded in the 15th century in India, emphasizes defense of the faith and potential martyrdom. Sikhs violated the norms of Hindu practice and struggled against the larger Hindu and Muslim communities. In particular, the 18th-century warrior Banda Singh Bahadur is renowned for his martyrdom in his retaliation against the Mughal Empire for its persecutions of Sikhs. Contemporary conflicts in India, such as the siege of the Golden Temple Complex in 1984, continue to foster martyrdoms.

Issues Concerning Martyrdom

There are several issues in dealing with martyrdom, both within a single tradition and between different ideological or religious traditions. One is martyrdom's potential incompatibility with tradition, and another is the exclusivity of martyrdom claims. Both of these problems are present in a larger paradox between peace and violence within religious traditions that affects the larger global society.

A critical question regarding martyrdom is whether or not the death is justifiable by the martyr's community. The martyr must be willing to suffer unto death, and in stories of martyrdom, the martyr is usually resolute. However, ideally, the religious adherent ought not to seek death aggressively but accept martyrdom willingly. Within the Christian tradition, support can be found both for aggressively seeking death and for fleeing persecution as well. Religious leaders have often attempted to outline parameters for acceptable martyrdom that exclude destruction of property or other acts of violence to gain notice, yet so-called voluntary martyrs are often accepted nonetheless. This seeming contradiction parallels the tension between conflicting tenets of pacifism and violence within many traditions. Religions that advocate peace also remember and treasure stories of martyrdom.

The ambiguous connection between martyrdom and self-killing is also a source of tension. Many saw the death of the Vietnamese monk Thich Quang Duc in protest against the persecution of Buddhists by South Vietnam's Diem administration during the Vietnam War as martyrdom. However, the monk's death by self-immolation prompted others to label it suicide. The action prompted a series of additional self-immolations by Buddhists and Christians. This is indicative of the power of self-sacrificial death. Despite causing tension within existing tradition, martyrdom is often incorporated within the dominant tradition.

The contention over the manner of death begs the larger question of who has the power to label a "martyrdom." This is a concern within religious traditions, but it can also be a source of further violence between traditions. For the followers of some Islamic groups, what is seen as a suicide bombing to those outside the tradition is justified as a martyrdom pleasing to God. Likewise, the death of a religious missionary, which is seen as a martyrdom to his tradition or her may be viewed by indigenous groups as the result of unwelcome cultural interference.

Even when religious traditions are not directly opposed, the question of what constitutes a martyrdom remains important. In the wake of the Columbine school shootings, some students were called martyrs for professing belief in God before being killed. The immediacy of that situation raises an important question of whether the supposed martyrs intended to be so and whether intention is necessary for martyrdom. Interrogation before death fills one important criteria of martyrdom, but this may seem to imply that the others who died were not martyrs, rendering those deaths less meaningful. Thus, the necessary requirements and clear boundaries of the martyr's identity potentially threaten the identity of others.

In an age where global conflict is often expressed in religious terms, martyrdom has tremendous sway in creating a sense of identity for the martyr and his or her community. A power to unite is matched by a potential divisiveness within traditions and a penchant for promoting further violence between them. For this reason, martyrdom remains a contentious force as a witness to religious traditions and the global community.

Matt Recla

See also Asceticism; Missions and Missionaries; Religious Identity; Suicide Bombing; Torture; Violence

Further Readings

- Cook, D. (2007). Martyrdom in Islam. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Droge, A. J., & Tabor, J. (1992). A noble death: Suicide and martyrdom among Christians and Jews in antiquity. San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco.
- Frend, W. H. C. (1967). Martyrdom and persecution in the early Church: A study of a conflict from the Maccabees to Donatus. Garden City, NY: Anchor Books.
- Mann, G. S. (2004). Sikhism. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.

MARX AND RELIGION

The political economist and philosopher Karl Marx (1818–1883) viewed religion as the very basis of the self-conscious knowledge of oneself as a social being; thus, the criticism of religion was the required starting point of all social critique. Marx's understanding of how religion is closely coupled with political economy renders him crucial for considering how global religions and global economic forces intersect and may become interdependent on one another for their expansion. Such a critical perspective has been central to anti-globalization social movements and has informed anticapitalist religious movements such as the Base Communities of Latin America. This short entry describes the distinct functions Marx attributed to religion and then explores Marx's relevance to discussions of global religion.

First, religion functions as a consolation and otherworldly compensation. Religion works in this way for those deprived of material comforts and agency—those whose numbingly repetitive and underpaid labor alienates them from the hope or capacity of exerting control over their destinies. Religion expresses alienation, since the gods' control over humanity mirrors and replicates people's impotent suffering in earthly life, yet it also protests alienation by trying to transform its conditions, even if, from Marx's perspective, such religious protest misrecognizes the real sources of oppression.

Second, for the ruling classes—formerly the land-owning nobility and, later, capitalists who own the productive infrastructure—religion functions as an ideological justification. Religion provides a language and rationale justifying unequal distributions of wealth as providentially ordained or as the reward of moral virtue. Just as European kings once presented themselves as not only the agents but also the very vessels of God's presence on earth, ruling classes and nation-states of the modern period present, and may actually perceive, their favored positions as a manifestation of divine favor. Furthermore, the “ruling ideas” of a given period that typically institutionalize the rights of the powerful (who are also those ideas' authors) may be claimed to reside in a transcendent authority beyond political contest. The “right to private property” is a key example.

Third, Marx understood religion and political economy to be intimately related. Like the sociologist Max Weber after him, he viewed certain religious ideas as providing fertile ground for specific economic forms. For example, in the first section of Das Kapital (Capital), Marx described Christianity, with its “cult of abstract man,” as the perfect religion for societies based on the production and exchange of commodities abstracted from any particular local meaning. In this sense, Marx remains salient for the discussion of global religions. For example, Marx pioneered the by now commonplace recognition not only that the West's Christian missionary projects were closely imbricated with colonial demands of economic reform, but that conversion to Christianity and conversion to capitalism were frequently two facets of a single social process.

Christianity and other global religions are easily transmitted in part because they are abstracted from any particular territory and context of meaning. Commodities exchanged in capitalist economies share this ease of circulation. Both capitalism and global religions acquire their vitality from the prospect of relentless expansion into new markets, and both transform the very meaning of human social exchange and relations with their arrival. Thus, Marx viewed capitalism as itself akin to a global religion, a religion best opposed by a different “specter,” namely, communism.

Paul Christopher Johnson

See also Base Communities in Latin America; Communism; Consumer Culture; Conversion; Economic Issues and Religion; Globalization; Liberation Theology; Local Religion; Marxism; Weber, Max

Further Readings

- Marx, K. (1978). Contribution to the critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right: Introduction. In R. C. Tucker (Ed.), The Marx-Engels reader (pp. 53–65). New York: W. W. Norton.
- Marx, K. (1992). Capital: Vol. 1. A critique of political economy (B. Howkes, Trans.). London: Penguin Classics. (Original work published 1867)
- Marx, K., & Engels, F. (1998). The German ideology. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books. (Original work published 1888)

MARXISM

Perhaps no other modern idea has spread as quickly and as widely as the sociopolitical ideas of the 19th-century thinker Karl Marx (1818–1883). Any concept that draws on the discourse of Marx’s teaching is considered Marxism. More specifically, Marxism entails a critique of the political economy from a proletarian point of view, where seemingly natural underpinnings of inequality can be interpreted through the concepts of exploitation, alienation, and profit seeking. Although the globalization of Marxism was largely a late-19th-century and 20th-century phenomenon, the impact of this type of ideological reasoning has served to create enormous changes in the world’s economic systems and poses challenges to the social structures developed through the capitalist mode of production. The ideas within Marxism have incited wars, transformed ways of living, inspired intellectual revolutions, and formed political alliances that still remain in the second decade of the 21st century.

Life and Works of Karl Marx

Karl Heinrich Marx was born on May 5, 1818, in Trier, Prussia. Educated in the University of Bonn, Friedrich Wilhelm University, and the University of Jena, Marx officially studied law yet retained an interest in several other disciplines including philosophy, economics, and politics. As a student, Marx was heavily influenced by the classical works of Aristotle, Democritus, Plato, Pythagoras, and Thales. In addition to more modern works by Erasmus, Kant, Ricardo, and Machiavelli, Marx was especially concerned with the ideas of Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831) and his own contemporary Ludwig Andreas von Feuerbach (1804–1872).

It was Hegel’s philosophy of history and his notion of advancing humanity through contradictory ideas—termed dialectics—that first attracted Marx. However, Hegel had already died by the time Marx began to study his work, and hence, Marx was exposed to the ideas of his peers who had studied under Hegel, chiefly Feuerbach. Feuerbach advocated putting Hegel’s ideas into practice, something Marx would later use to fortify his notion of the need to interact with material items in nature rather than concentrating on the ideational concepts that Hegel had proposed.

In late November of 1843, Karl Marx met Friedrich Engels, a young and ambitious advocate for laborers’ role in achieving justice. Engels and Marx soon developed a friendship that lasted throughout much of their adult lives. Engels went on to assist Marx financially and support his literary endeavors as a coauthor in much of his work. Given the importance of his affiliation with Marx and his contributions to his career as a social philosopher, Friedrich Engels is regarded as a central figure in the development of Marxism.

Apart from secondary works that grew out of mid-20th-century reinterpretations of Karl Marx’s works, his original writings remain the foundation on which much of Marxism is based today. Some of the more influential pieces composed by Marx and Engels include Thesen über Feuerbach (Theses on Feuerbach) in 1845, Die heilige Familie, oder, Kritik der kritischen Kritik, gegen Bruno Bauer und Consorten (The Holy Family) in 1845, Die deutsche ideologie (The German Ideology) in 1846, Manifest der kommunistischen Partei (Manifesto of the Communist Party) in 1848, and the first volume of Das Kapital: Kritik der politischen Ökonomie “Das Kapital” (Capital: A Critical Analysis of Capitalist Production) in 1867.

Though Marx only held trivial jobs throughout his life, the support from Engels sustained his writing endeavors. As his works were often seen as instigating revolts against states and the owners of the means of production, Marx experienced several expulsions from European nations until he finally arrived in London in 1849. Shortly after his wife’s death in 1881, Marx developed several illnesses that led to his death in 1883.

Dialectical Materialism

Dialectical materialism refers to Marx’s view that interaction with material resources is the impetus for social, political, and economic change. Within Marxism, this type of dialectics functions within a tension between two opposites, the thesis versus the antithesis—defined by class as the interests of the ruling class versus the interests of the subservient classes. As these two types of interests contradict and cancel out each other, they also preserve the foundation for their respective existences based on class. When thesis and antithesis clash, they allow for the emergence of a synthesis.

A historical example that demonstrates this dialectical model is found in the French Revolution of 1789. According to some Marxists, this conflict occurred because of the French monarchy’s accumulation of wealth and control (thesis) over the resistant bourgeoisie (antithesis). As the end result of the clash between the interests of the monarchy and the interests of the bourgeoisie, the proletariat class (synthesis) emerged. With this small creation of a new class, production would also be affected. The rise of the proletariat class would increase the output from production, thereby improving the overall conditions under which society would meet future challenges and foster community.

Hegel, preceding Marx, was fully aware of the dialectical process, yet rather than emphasizing the material conditions within a given social setting, he focused on ideas. This inversion of the dialectical process from one based on ideas to one based on material is popularly known as Hegel's dialectics operating on its head, whereas the ideas of Marx and Engels placed it on its feet. In Marxism, interaction with material, not ideas, would be necessary to solve burgeoning new challenges.

Marxism and Religion

Although Marxism plays a central role in the study of religion, the original works of Karl Marx contributed less to any paradigmatic approach to studying it as such. However, a number of works by Marx and Engels indicate an extensive interest in religion, including the essay "On the Jewish Question," "Theses on Feuerbach," and brief references to the oppressive features of institutionalized religion. A rather famous example of this type of religious interest is found in Marx's (1844) "Introduction to a Contribution to the Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right." Though often misquoted through a paraphrased version that reads "Religion is the opiate of the masses," the original quote is as follows: "Religious suffering is, at one and the same time, the expression of the real suffering and heart of a heartless world, and the soul of the soulless conditions. It is the opium of the people." With this sweeping statement, Marx and Engels cast an underlying theme that presents religion as simply another institution that serves to undergird the false consciousness of the laborers and hold them captive to the exploits of the owners of the means of production.

On the Jewish Question

Marx's (1843) essay titled "On the Jewish Question" is one of the more misunderstood literary pieces within Marxism as is it written in an ironic style, lending itself to misinterpretations with regard to tenor and intention. In actuality, this essay is a theoretical exercise with Marx's notion of historical materialism, where he focused on the Jews in Prussia and their mode of achieving political emancipation. Marx's piece was also a response to the works of his peer Bruno Bauer, who felt that for Jews to achieve political emancipation, they must first abandon their religion, as in Bauer's view only a secular state could offer political emancipation. Marx, however, rejected Bauer's assertions by explaining how the secular state does not abolish religion but instead considers the people who interact with religion as separate from it.

Theses on Feuerbach

Written in 1845, Marx's "Theses on Feuerbach" outlines 11 theses that analyze, and at times scrutinize, the potential uses of Feuerbach's views on religion. Where Feuerbach's overall critical model held that man's affinity with attributing the qualities of humanity to the omnipotence of God was backward, Marx sought to advance the notion of ideational concepts as the product of human reasoning and not the other way around. That is, for Feuerbach—and by extension, Marx—God did not create man but was instead a creation of man. In many ways, this grounding of the Divine provided the reinforcing means for Marx to affirm his concentration on materialist conditions while challenging Hegel's emphasis on idealism.

However, Marx not only found Feuerbach's work to be useful but also noted the shortcomings in his reasoning. Although Feuerbach poses a break with divine sacralization of royalty and thus established a realistic basis for interpreting inequality, in Marx's view Feuerbach failed to consider human activity as objective activity. In this way, Marx advocates for praxis in his famous statement from the 11th thesis: "Philosophers have hitherto only interpreted the world in various ways; the point is to change it."

Marxism and Liberation Theology

Liberation Theology is a largely Roman Catholic theological perspective that locates sin within the institution of poverty and attempts to combat this sin through a synthesis of Christianity and socialism. Within this perspective, poverty is at once an indication of God's mercy on the poor and oppressed in the face of avarice as well as the epitome of class struggle whereby the teachings of Jesus Christ and Karl Marx are complementary in achieving justice.

Marxism and Religious Eschatology

The trajectory of realizing a communist society has often been compared with a series of eschatological developments. In what has been called Marx's historical materialism model, various stages of history have been defined by the economic mode of production. As each stage experiences a dialectical contradiction between groups vying for the material means of production, history advances toward a state of improved material conditions that increase productivity. An example of this progressive trajectory can be found in the transformation from feudal states, where the means of production were the property of the aristocratic lords, to capitalist states, where the bourgeoisie seized these means and established a new economic system of production. An eschatological approach to Marxism focuses on the stages from capitalist states to socialist and communist societies. The struggle between "good and evil" would be played out in the final days before the realization of a utopian society that would be classless and thus free from inequality.

Given the progressive movement toward an ideal scenario of this magnitude, the similarities between an eschatology within Marxism and traditional Christian eschatology have inadvertently given rise to ideas about Marx as a prophet, socialists as religious practitioners venerating iconic figures and the literature of communalism, and the state of communism as an enterprise in establishing a "heaven on earth."

Marxism and Religious Movements

The general tenets of communalism found within Marxism have attracted religious practitioners, who appropriate such ideology as their own. An example of this type of appropriation can be found within The Universal Industrial Church of the New World Comforter (UICNWC), whose members have been described as "millenarian utopians."

Founded in 1973 by Allen Michael, this small movement is one of very few groups that openly avows an association with socialist-leaning tenets.

Despite the more contemporary examples of the religious uses of Marxism, there were also some groups that held similar beliefs and practices prior to the writing of Marx and Engels. These movements include the True Levelers (established in 1649), later known as the Diggers; Robert Owen's settlement of New Harmony (1814); and the League of the Just (1836), which later became The Communist League.

Influence of Marxism on Revolutions and Social Movements

The sheer immensity and far-reaching diffusion of Marx's works have inspired revolutions and major social movements in several nations, including Russia, China, Cuba, Mexico, Nicaragua, Guatemala, Bolivia, Columbia Chile, Korea, Vietnam, Cambodia, India, Israel, Cyprus, Greece, Hungary, former Czechoslovakia, Germany, Italy, France, and the United States. In conjunction with these revolutions and major social movements, Marxism has influenced popular historical figures from every corner of literary, political, social, and cultural worlds, such as Vladimir Lenin, Fidel Castro, Sigmund Freud, Mohandas Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru, Hồ Chí Minh, Betty Friedan, Julius Nyerere, Martin Luther King Jr., Angela Davis, and César Chávez.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

Perhaps the most well-known and longest running experiment with Marxism emerged in Russia, just after the turn of the 20th century, with the Bolshevik movement of Vladimir Ilyich Lenin (1870–1924). The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) was created in 1922 after a series of uprisings initially against the Czar and later against a provisional government that succeeded the reign of the Romanov Dynasty. The USSR operated for nearly seven decades as the superpower in opposition to the United States of America within the framework of the Cold War. Supporting Marxist-based revolutions in a number of countries throughout the second and third worlds, the USSR was often viewed as the ideological, economic, and political foundation for all other socialist movements.

China

In China, Marxism was most famously advanced by Mao Zedong (1893–1976). From 1949 to 1976, Mao governed the People's Republic of China as the chairman of the Communist Party of China. Marxism's influence on Mao is credited with the most drastic changes in history of China, including the introduction of sweeping social, political, and economic policies that transformed a succession of imperial dynasties and divided republics into a single-party socialist republic operating under a planned economy. After Mao's death, his successor, Deng Xiaoping, advanced the modernization and industrialization of China through a socialist market economy.

Cuba

In 1959, the Cuban regime of Fulgencio Batista was overthrown by Marxist-leaning guerillas, including Ernesto "Che" Guevara (1928–1967), Camilo Cienfuegos (1932–1959), Raúl Castro (b. 1931), and his brother Fidel Castro (b. 1926). In 1961, Fidel Castro introduced Cuba as a socialist state and in the years to come effectively employed the Soviet model of a Marxist-Leninist state.

Marxism and Communism

Although the terms Marxism and communism are often used synonymously, there is a significant difference between the two. As it would seem impossible to speak of these two terms as unrelated, their distinction is best described as a difference between theory and practice. Whereas the former refers to the broader sociopolitical theories of Marx, the latter denotes a particular enterprise of practices based on the applied theoretical concepts intended to create a communist social reality. In short, Marxism embodies theoretical notions that, when put into action, are geared toward the realization of a communist society.

Marxism and Academia

Along similar lines pertaining to the distinction between Marxism and communism that rests almost exclusively within the practice of discursive strategies is the use of Marxism as a theoretical framework for interpreting social phenomena. Within academia, there are several paradigmatic approaches to the study of topics such as race, class, gender, nationalism, sexuality, and age that draw on the interpretive theories of inequality, exploitation, and alienation found within Marxism. Although the use of Marxism could be found within any academic discipline, its use is concentrated mainly within the social and literary sciences.

Salvador Jiménez Murguía

See also China; Communism; Liberation Theology; Marx and Religion; Russian Federation

Further Readings

- Appelbaum, R. P. (1988). Karl Marx. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.
- Lefebvre, H. (1982). The sociology of Marx. New York: Columbia University Press.
- McLellan, D. (Ed.). (2000). Karl Marx: Selected writings. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Wolf, R. P. (1984). Understanding Marx: A reconstruction and critique of Capital. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

MASHHAD

Mashhad, the capital and largest city of Khorasan-e Razavi province in the mountainous region of northeastern Iran, is considered to be Iran's holiest city. Mashhad, which literally means "place of martyrdom," has a population of more than 2.5 million and is the second largest city in the country. Located about 530 miles (1 mile = 1.609 kilometers) northeast of Tehran, Mashhad is home to many tourist attractions; but most important, it is the location of the tomb of Imam Reza, the eighth imam (head spiritual leader) of Shi'a Islam, who was martyred in 818 CE.

Following the 13th-century Mongol invasions, Mashhad underwent a period of growth and development. The Mongol raids had left many cities in the Greater Khorasan area devastated but had left Mashhad relatively intact. As a result, people in the area migrated to Mashhad and began to expand and develop the city. Previously known as Sanabad, the city changed its name after Imam Reza was killed and then buried there.

Imam Reza is the only Shi'a saint buried in Iran; his shrine, managed by the Razavi Foundation, is one of the holiest and most visited sites in the Islamic world and is believed to be Iran's single wealthiest institution. The foundation owns vast tracts of land, hotels, and factories; has funded the building of new highways and an international airport; and has established investment banks with foreign investors. Its net asset value is estimated at a minimum of $15 billion. The foundation also receives year-round contributions from the millions of pilgrims who visit the shrine from countries such as Afghanistan, Iraq, Turkmenistan, Pakistan, Indonesia, Kazakhstan, and the neighboring Persian Gulf countries. The total revenues generated are believed to be in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

The complex that contains the Imam's tomb also includes the 15th-century Gohar Shad Mosque, an ancient museum, several courtyards and seminaries, the Razavi University of Islamic Sciences, and the Central Library Complex. With a history dating back more than six centuries, the Central Library Complex of Astan-e Quds Razavi is one of the oldest libraries in the Middle East, shelving about 70,000 rare manuscripts and 6 million historical documents.

The city is visited by more than 20 million pilgrims annually. In the same way as many faithful Muslims travel to Saudi Arabia to complete the hajj (a pilgrimage to Mecca and one of the five pillars of Islam), becoming hajjis, many other Muslims visit Mashhad, becoming mashtees.

Also contributing to the city's popularity is the fact that Mashhad is the birthplace of many influential Islamic leaders, including Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei—the figurative head of the Muslim conservative establishment in Iran—and Grand Ayatullah Ali Sistani—the highest-ranking Shi'a Muslim religious scholar in Iraq.

While the city is a popular place to visit because of its religious sites, Mashhad is also known for its cultural contributions. Mashhad is dubbed the "City of Ferdowsi" after the highly revered 10th-century Iranian author Hakīm Abu'l-Qāsim Firdowsī Tūsī, known for his national epic Shahnameh (Book of Kings). The book is seen as a work that has preserved Iranian culture, as Ferdowsi took care to use a pure form of Farsi in his book, which celebrates ancient Persian culture undiluted by Arab culture and the Arabic language. The city therefore celebrates a combination of ancient Persian culture and Shi'a Islam.

Grace Nasri

See also Hajj; Iran; Islam; Middle East; Mongol Empire; Shi'a Islam

Further Readings

- FarsiNet, Inc. (2009). Mashhad. Retrieved September 30, 2009, from <http://www.farsinet.com/mashhad>
- Higgins, A. (2007). Inside Iran's holy money machine. Wall Street Journal, p. A1.
- Imam Reza Network. (2009). Mashhad. Retrieved September 28, 2009, from <http://www.imamreza.net/eng/list.php?id=03>
- Iran Chamber Society. (2009). Cities of Iran: Mashhad. Retrieved September 30, 2009, from <http://www.iranchamber.com/cities/mashhad/mashhad.php>

MATERIAL CULTURE

Material culture can be defined as the embodiment in various media of the impulse and ability of living creatures for survival, communication, and creativity in the world. For humans, it encompasses both mundane and artistic creation and use, and reciprocal relationships between objects and individuals, and it often reflects and influences societal values, ideas, attitudes, and assumptions.

Religion and Material Culture

Religious material culture includes artifacts, texts, interior and exterior environments or landscapes, and architecture that expresses communal and individual belief, affiliation, or faith. Material culture in the historical and contemporary perspective of global religious traditions can be further delineated using sacred, decorative (or aesthetic), and more utilitarian categories. As with material culture, generally, artifacts that are specifically religious can be observed in paintings, drawings, prints, sculpture, photography, books, foodways, clothing, bodily alterations and adornment, architecture, agriculture, town planning, furniture, furnishings, and even machines and devices. In a country such as the United States, where, for example, many variations of European Christianity are present, religious material culture encompasses diverse traditions. A brief survey may include seemingly disparate items such as a plaster statue of St. Joseph placed in a prominent location in a contemporary Catholic's kitchen because of a promise made to the saint to honor him if the family's former house was sold; a porcelain figure commemorating the Methodist founder John Wesley, found in a church library; a rural one-room church building of an Independent Baptist congregation in the South; the red door of an Episcopal church in Chicago; the printed sign of the American indigenous sect Father Divine's Peace Mission movement found in one of his Philadelphia hotels, summarizing the religious leader's "International Modest Code"; the cast-iron plates with biblical scenes or texts adorning the "picture stoves" of German colonists in 18th-century Pennsylvania; the plain-style furniture of 19th-century Shakers; a white clerical collar of a minister; the silver crucifix of a Roman Catholic nun; a lithographed reproduction of Warner Sallman's "Head of Christ" adorning the dining room of a Methodist couple; or the seven forms of fish that constitute the celebration of the Italian Christmas Eve tradition of the "Seven Fishes."

Each culture and religious tradition articulates its own beliefs about the relationship between the sacred and the material. In terms of the world's historical religious traditions, images of deities that are a genre of religious material culture are approved in Christianity, Hinduism, and Buddhism, but such iconography is forbidden in Judaism and Islam. Religious material culture can have multiple meanings, varying uses, and dramatic effects for coreligionists within contemporary pluralistic societies: Some contemporary Catholics may keep holy corners of saintly images, but it is not necessarily an expected practice; contemporary practitioners of earth-centered religions, such as Wicca and Neo-Paganism, will vary about exactly which objects they might choose to populate holy spaces in their domestic environments. Religious material culture evokes passionate responses to its misuse or perceived desecration by members of different religious traditions coexisting in the same space, country, or region. Significantly, religious objects, used in worship and venerated as sacred or sacramental in one community, might be treated as a mere commodity or even as a symbol of emotion, the spiritual, or moral hegemony by individuals with differing worldviews. One only has to look at contemporary online auction and shopping websites to find a lively contemporary trade in religious objects of all varieties, from pieces of the "true cross" on which Jesus died to jade representations of Gautama Buddha.

To understand the meaning of religion, one must be prepared to study not only religious institutions, doctrines, philosophical outlooks, texts, and significant leading personalities but also the faithful believers who energize those religions with their observant practices and thoughtful considerations. Religious practice, be it daily devotionals, petitionary prayer, quiet meditation, public group ritual, or committed service, can be complemented, inspired, or enhanced by religious material culture in its various forms: a sacred structure, a deity's image, a holy person's relic, a photograph of a deceased loved one, a burning votive candle, a string of prayer beads, a censer, or a musical instrument as elaborate as a pipe organ or as simple as a rattle. A multitude of material expressive forms in various shapes, sizes, colors, densities, conditions, and surfaces and—for believers—of differing spiritual energy, vibration, sacredness, and power define the world's religious traditions on both institutional and very personal levels of enactment and use. Historical narratives of religious traditions often dwell on the art, architecture, and artifacts associated with religious elites but lack documentary or ethnographic evidence revealing how individuals and communities actually used and understood material culture in everyday religious belief and practice. Such explanations are profoundly limited in scope and questionably useful for scholars, students, and believers alike working to understand those traditions.

In many nations, religious material culture, especially those objects deemed of particular historical, cultural, or aesthetic value by elites or by popular consensus have been preserved, protected, studied, and appreciated in museums, archives, and even libraries. Other objects are housed, if not continuously on public display, within the sanctuaries and collections of world religious traditions.

Still, it is not possible to appreciate fully a religious object if it is only experienced standing alone among many other objects in a display unless an institution has worked to contextualize it (as found, e.g., in the Miho Museum near Shigaraki, Japan; St. Mungo Museum of Religious Art and Life in Glasgow, Scotland; or the Museum of Biblical Art in New York City). Whenever possible, it is best to attempt to understand the context of meaning and use of religious artifacts for the individual and community through ethnographic and archaeological fieldwork within the concerned communities.

Religious material culture is also ever present in contemporary environments that may be perceived as primarily secular. Religious architecture in the form of churches, cathedrals, synagogues, temples, mosques, and shrines—formally planned or instantaneously assembled on a roadside—marks many urban and rural locales, turning even the remotest areas into destinations for pilgrimage, contemplation, or healing. Religious objects have been and continue to be made, given, and purchased for placement in workplaces, in modes of transportation, or on one's person. Even their creation and purchase as souvenirs do not necessarily undermine their religious meaning. Religious materials act as ethnic, regional, political, or religious markers. They also can be used for very personal institutionally and noninstitutionally sanctioned religious reasons. They give protection from evil or sickness, encouragement through difficult times, and specific religious witness. Thus, some Roman Catholics distribute to family and friends at the funeral of a deceased loved one "memory cards" bearing the person's name and year of birth and death, along with an image of Jesus, the Virgin Mary, or a saint, which they may also attach to their home refrigerators or keep in their pockets; Mormons have worn and continue to wear religious ritual garments after their consecration in Mormon Temples; Greek Orthodox have a tradition of wearing cloth amulets under their garments for protection from evil; Jews may wear a gold Star of David or Chat sign on a chain around their necks; evangelical Protestants might keep a wooden cross in their pocket or purse or have a keychain with a biblical verse on it to remind them of their personal relationship with Jesus; Muslims may wear the name of God or select Qur'anic verses as a medallion, hang an Islamic rosary called the subha from their car mirror, or place a poster or sign embossed with Qur'anic verses in their car window or on its bumper or in their place of business. In India, families are apt to bring a cow or buffalo to a Hindu priest for blessings; in modern urban India, what is often blessed is a new automobile or truck.

Directions for Future Research

Remarkably, the subject of religious material culture remains among the submerged and understudied aspects of the world religious expression. The life reflected in things and artifacts, as well as the beliefs that lie behind the material, remain understudied and underused, in particular by religious studies scholars. It remains possible, for example, to take a survey course in world religious history or contemporary religious traditions, or to read a contemporary text ostensibly explaining religion and contemporary culture, and yet never see any image or touch any artifact that relates to the vernacular religion of the people who are actually living that story. The exhibition of religious material culture in museums of art and anthropology, its relevance to everyday life, and its relationship to a contemporary culture of consumption remain fertile areas for future research. Historical and contemporary ethnographic research into material culture can provide evidence of the world appetite for sacred materiality in the home, on the street, in the car, or on one's person. Such discoveries can even be made in traditions that are ostensibly against materializations of the deity. Focusing attention on religious material culture opens a student of religion to the creativity involved in the material expression of religion, to the function of sacred materiality to illustrate religious affiliation, and to the sensuality of religious imagery. The human response to embodiments of religion is especially significant evidence of the personal negotiations of religion intrinsic to its experience in everyday life.

Leonard Norman Primiano

See also Clothing; Festivals; Islam; Judaism; Local Religion; Mahayana Buddhism; Neo-Pagan Movement; Prayer Beads; Public and Private Religion; Roman Catholicism; Sacred Places; Symbol; Syncretism; Tattooing and Piercing; Theravada Buddhism; Vajrayana, Tibetan; Vodou

Further Readings

- Arthur, L. B. (Ed.). (1999). Religion, dress and the body. New York: Berg.
- Campo, J. E. (1991). The other sides of paradise: Explorations into the religious meanings of domestic space in Islam. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press.
- Cosentino, D. J. (Ed.). (1995). Sacred arts of Haitian Vodou. Los Angeles: UCLA Fowler Museum of Cultural History.
- Dewhurst, C. K., MacDowell, B., & MacDowell, M. (1983). Religious folk art in America: Reflections of faith. New York: E. P. Dutton.
- Diner, H. R. (2002). Hungering for America: Italian, Irish and Jewish foodways in the age of migration. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Editorial. (2005). Material Religion, 1(1), 4–9.
- Glassie, H. (1999). Material culture. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Glassie, H. (2000). Vernacular architecture. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Kilde, J. H. (2008). Sacred power, sacred space: An introduction to Christian architecture and worship. New York: Oxford University Press.
- McDannell, C. (1991). Interpreting things: Material culture studies and American religion. Religion, 21, 371–387.
- McDannell, C. (1995). Material Christianity: Religion and popular culture in America. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Primiano, L. N. (2004). Bringing perfection in these different places: Father Divine's vernacular architecture of intention. Folklore, 115, 3–26.
- Tilley, C., Keane, W., Kuechler, S., Rowlands, M., & Spyer, P. (Eds.). (2006). Handbook of material culture. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.

MAURITANIA

The globalization of West African religion likely began nearly a millennium ago in the nation of Mauritania. Berber traders brought Islam from across the Sahara to coexist with African rituals in ancient Ghana. This coexistence is still evident in the talismans that Muslim occult experts (marabouts) prepare. But in the 11th century, Ibn Yasin spawned the al-murabitun movement—meaning “ready for battle”—and thus, the word marabout made its way into Europe, where Muslims became known as the Almoravids, or Moors. Their expansion into Algeria and Spain coincided with Ghana's fragmentation. From the 1200s to 1500s, Mali (then Songhay) encompassed Ghana, spreading Islam through its Mande-speaking juula trade diaspora. The Bedouins arrived between 1300 and 1500, Arabizing Berbers and introducing the Qadiriyya Sufi order. In the early 1800s, the Tijaniyya brotherhood arrived, finding few followers but spreading from Mauritania across West Africa.

A lasting Bedouin legacy was Mauritania's castelike hierarchy. The Hassan oversaw war and politics, and Zwaya held religious authority. Each of these White Moor groups (bidan) held slaves: whether Black Moors (haratin) or Black “Afro-Mauritanians” (Fulbe, Toucouleur, Soninke, Wolof, Bamana/Bambara). Muslim reformists criticized slavery but mostly condemned the enslavement of Muslims as opposed to non-Muslims. The colonial French banned slavery but did little to eradicate it. They considered themselves a Muslim power, defending Islam and the social order by allying with certain Zwaya leaders while provoking resentment and resistance among others. The enslaved, meanwhile, reputedly used sorcery against their Mauritanian and French overlords. Today, Mauritania has the highest proportion of enslaved persons of any country despite slavery's illegality. In 2010, it outlawed female genital cutting, locally associated with Islam, but whether this ban will be enforced remains to be seen.

Mauritania is an Islamic Republic and the only West African country where virtually the entire population practices Islam, but it has repressed Islamism since its global emergence in the 1970s. The state fears Islamism's appeal among the haratin, while the non-bidan deplore its anti-Sufi attitudes. Many Islamists have left for the United Arab Emirates. Meanwhile, the Gulf states and Morocco finance Mauritanian mosques and non-governmental organizations; international students study Mālikī jurisprudence in the country's Islamic schools (mahadir); and some Mauritanians have assumed prominent positions in violent international Islamist networks. Global connections are as crucial to Mauritanian Islam today as a millennium ago.

Joseph R. Hellweg

See also Africa; Algeria; Global Religion; Globalization; Islam; Islamism (Political Islam); North Africa; Sufism

Further Readings

- Jourde, C. (2007). Mauritania: Clash of authoritarianism and ethnicity. In W. Miles (Ed.), Political Islam in West Africa. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner.
- Levtzion, N., & Pouwels, R. (Eds.). (2000). The history of Islam in Africa. Athens: Ohio University.
- McDougall, E. A. (2001). Slavery, sorcery and colonial "reality" in Mauritania, c. 1910–60. In C. Youé & T. Stapleton (Eds.), Agency and action in colonial Africa (pp. 69–82). Houndmills, UK: Palgrave.
- Ould Ahmed Salem, Z. (2007). Islam in Mauritania between political expansion and globalization. In B. Soares & R. Otayek (Eds.), Islam and Muslim politics in Africa (pp. 27–46). Houndmills, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Ould el-Bara, Y. (2007). Morsures de serpent: thérapie et magie chez les Bidân de Mauritanie [Snake bites: Therapy and magic among the Mauritanian Bidan]. In C. Hamès (Ed.), Coran et talismans (pp. 175–208). Paris: Karthala.
- Robinson, D. (2000). Paths of accommodation. Athens: Ohio University Press.

MAURITIUS

The Republic of Mauritius is an island nation in the Indian Ocean with a total area of 718 square miles (1 mile = 1.609 kilometers) and a population of approximately 1.2 million, half of which is Hindu. French colonial rule lasted from 1767 to 1810, when the British captured the island. Mauritius became independent in 1968. The French settlers brought slaves from Africa and India, and following the abolition of slavery, Indian indentured workers were brought in great numbers. The Chinese came to the island as traders and merchants. Mauritius did not have any indigenous population. The Mauritius constitution provides for freedom of religion, and there is no state religion in the country. Religious organizations that were present prior to independence, namely, the Roman Catholic Church, the Church of England, the Presbyterian Church, the Seventh-Day Adventists, Hindus, and Muslims, are recognized by parliamentary decree. These religious groups receive government subsidies in the form of an annual lump-sum payment from the Ministry of Finance based on the number of adherents (the minimum required is 7).

The 2000 census showed that approximately 50% of the population were Hindu, 32% Christian, and 16% Muslim. Less than 1% of the population claimed to be Buddhist, atheist, agnostic, or of another faith. About 85% of the Christians are Roman Catholic, while the remaining 15% are members of the following churches: Adventist, Assembly of God, Christian Tamil, Church of England, Pentecostal, Presbyterian, Evangelical, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. Ninety percent of the Muslims are Sunnīs, and the rest belong to the Shi'a community. In Mauritius, there is a strong correlation between religious affiliation and ethnicity, whereby citizens of Indian ethnicity are usually Hindus or Muslims and citizens of Chinese ancestry practice Buddhism or Roman Catholicism. Creoles, who are of African descent and descendants of the French settlers, are Catholics. Inter-marriage between different religious and ethnic groups is rare and is discouraged. Nevertheless, Mauritian society is renowned for its high degree of religious tolerance and peace. Mauritius has more than 20 public holidays, representing the country's multireligious and multiethnic population. The country also has a number of places of worship catering to all religious groups.

Foreign missionary groups present in the country include the Baptist Church, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and the International Society for Krishna Consciousness. There are also a number of New Age religious and spiritual groups originating from India that are operating in the country. These include the Satya Sai Centers, Swami Ramdev Yoga, the Ramakrishna Mission, and the Art of Living. There has been growing concern among the representatives of Hindu organizations that evangelical Christian churches are converting Hindus to Christianity. This has led to the destruction of the property of some of these churches by Hindu fundamentalist groups. Voice of Hindu, an extremist group, has even called for the government to pass an "anticonversion" law to prevent religious conversions of Hindus.

Ramola Ramtohul

See also Africa; Conversion; France; Hinduism; India; Roman Catholicism

Further Readings

U.S. Central Intelligence Agency. (n.d.). The world factbook: Seychelles. Retrieved December 20, 2010, from <https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook>

U.S. Department of State. (1994). Annual report on international religious freedom. Washington, DC: Author.

MAWDUDI, ABU'L-A'LA' (1903–1979)

A seminal figure in Islamist thought and organization, Abu'l-a'la' Mawdudi influenced several generations of Muslim activists in South Asia and beyond. He is especially well known for his rejection of Western-style modernization and insistence on Muslim societies adopting a political system rooted in Islam. (“Mawdudi” is also transliterated as “Maududi” or “Maudoodi,” and he is often referred to as “Maulana Mawdudi.”)

Mawdudi came of age in an India rife with anti-imperialist politics and heightened (religious) communal identities. After his father's death, he left school to take up journalism. Early in his career, Mawdudi wrote for nationalist publications that supported the Congress Party's vision of independence. It was his involvement with the failed Khilafat movement—a body of nationalist-minded Indian Muslims organized around a pro-Ottoman and anti-British politics—that led Mawdudi to turn away from the nationalist movement and toward an Islamic political identity. This shift brought him to the forefront of Muslim communal politics in India and set his future course of Islamist writing and activism.

In 1932, he began publication of the monthly Tarjuman al-Qur'an, a journal that gave voice to his developing ideas about Islam in Indian social and political life. He went on to write scores of books and pamphlets on issues ranging from jihad to human rights, Islamic economics to Muslim women. Perhaps his most lasting written legacy is his commentary on the Qur'an, which emerged slowly over the course of decades and was eventually translated into many languages, including English. It was from his reading of the Qur'an that Mawdudi developed his Islamic political theory.

For Mawdudi, as for many Islamists, the Qur'an contains a total system of life—one that meets the same practical challenges as secular political and economic systems but is superior because it takes into consideration the spiritual dimension of humans. Mawdudi's goal was the creation of an Islamic state that would be ruled by Islamic law (Shari'a). He saw this goal, however, as the end point of a larger grassroots, social transformation of Muslim hearts and minds. Once Qur'anic values had been fully embraced by individual Muslims, so Mawdudi believed, the political revolution would come naturally and quietly.

No armchair ideologue, Mawdudi founded a movement, Jamaat-e-Islami (JI), in 1941, to model Islam's potential to govern modern life and to contribute to the transformation of society. Before the India-Pakistan split, JI served as a counterweight to the Muslim League's secular political agenda for India's Muslim community. After the split in 1947, Mawdudi took charge of JI in Pakistan and became a leading proponent of Islamizing society in the newly created nation. The ostensible religious nationalism that defined Pakistani politics provided Mawdudi and JI with activist legitimacy. But Mawdudi's willingness to challenge the policies of successive governments often put him at odds with the state. He and JI enjoyed special social status during the rule of General Zia al-Haq (1977–1988), a period of heightened and divisive Islamic politics.

Mawdudi's writings and activism provided a model for Islamists around the world. His diagnosis of the modern Muslim condition and his prescription for it made a deep impression on the Egyptian Islamist Sayyid Qutb, the ideologue of Muslim Brotherhood. The ongoing appeal of Mawdudi's ideas among Muslims speaks to the perceived failure of secular politics in Muslim-majority nations and to the hope that Islamic values hold the key to future success.

Jeffrey T. Kenney

See also India; Islamism (Political Islam); Jamaat-e-Islami; Pakistan; Politics and Religion; Qutb, Sayyid; Turkey

Further Readings

- Kepel, G. (2002). Jihad: The trial of political Islam (A. F. Roberts, Trans.). Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press. (Original work published in 2000)
- Nasr, S. V. R. (1994). Mawdudi and the Jama'at-I Islami: The origins, theory and practice of Islamic revivalism. In A. Rahnama (Ed.), Pioneers of Islamic revival (pp. 98–124). London: Zed Books.
- Nasr, S. V. R. (1996). Mawdudi and the making of Islamic revivalism. New York: Oxford University Press.

McDONALDIZATION

McDonaldization is the process by which the principles of the fast-food restaurant and popular consumer culture in general are coming to dominate more and more sectors of American society as well as the rest of the world, extending even to the realm of religion. Max Weber argued that the bureaucracy served as the ideal type of the rationalization process; the McDonaldization thesis serves as a modification and extension of Weber's argument by replacing the ideal type of the bureaucracy with that of the fast-food restaurant, both of which facilitate widespread standardization. Importantly, the fast-food restaurant represents the extension of standardization and rationalization from the realm of production to that of consumption. The five key components of McDonaldization are (1) efficiency, (2) calculability, (3) predictability, (4) control through the replacement of human with nonhuman technology, and (5) their culmination in the irrationality of rationality.

Efficiency, by definition, is the optimal way of achieving a solution to the problem at hand. With the fast-food industry, efficiency is achieved by providing the most direct way to make the transition from hunger to satiety. This quest for efficiency is similarly demonstrated in other realms of society (hence the McDonaldization of society)—online dating offers an efficient, goal-directed means for meeting “the right one”; televised evangelical sermons afford viewers a daily religious experience without their having to leave the comfort of their own homes; standardized tests enable universities to efficiently evaluate applicants by reducing them to a series of numbers; and so on.

The second defining tenet of McDonaldization is that of calculability. At the heart of such a process is the assumption that all value has been standardized and can be quantified and reduced to variables such as size and price; as a consequence, more of that standardized unit must be better. Such an emphasis is to be found in McDonald's tactic of offering “Big Macs,” “supersizing,” to be rendered as a quality-enhancing option, and “value meals.” They invoke the idea that the consumer is getting “more food for less money.”

The third significant basic characteristic of McDonaldization is that of predictability. In the fast-food restaurant, patrons know what to expect when they order a Big Mac—because the hamburger is almost exactly the same in every McDonald's. In a globalized culture in which the number of choices continues to grow exponentially, people come to need, expect, and demand such predictability. The expectation that much the same product or service will be delivered each time one visits any McDonald's at any time or at any location has been extended to many different contexts—from clothing stores to religious sects. People develop a relationship with the brand, product, or political party and thus come to expect consistent experiences when dealing with them.

McDonaldization affords increased control through the replacement of human with nonhuman technology. Nonhuman technology (e.g., automated or semiautomated machinery) that is not subject to human fallibility helps facilitate the standardization of services and contributes to the other components of McDonaldization—efficiency, calculability, and predictability.

Such a formalized, rational process, which focuses on details rather than on the holistic product/idea, often results in a wide range of irrational outcomes—as illustrated by the dehumanizing experience of working or eating in fast-food restaurants or the obesity and poor health caused by frequenting such restaurants on a regular basis. Though Ritzer gives equal weight to each of these five components of McDonaldization, it is the final thesis that focuses on the consequences of such detail-oriented, mean-ends calculation and their culmination in the ultimate irrationality of rationality.

Michelle H. Smirnova and George Ritzer

See also Consumer Culture; Global Religion; Globalization; Material Culture

Further Readings

- Ritzer, G. (2008a). The McDonaldization of society (5th ed.). Thousand Oaks, CA: Pine Forge Press.
- Ritzer, G. (2008b). The McDonaldization thesis. London: Sage.

MCVEIGH, TIMOTHY (1968–2001)

Though often described as a lone-wolf terrorist, Timothy McVeigh, the perpetrator of the 1995 Oklahoma City Federal Building bombing, was part of a larger right-wing culture of religious extremism in the United States that identified the secular agenda of the federal government as the enemy. In what became increasingly apparent during the 1990s, a tension between perceptions of secular activities on the part of the U.S. government and the religious principles of the loosely connected Christian Identity movement gave way to a spectacular act of terrorism in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

On April 19, 1995, Timothy James McVeigh (1968–2001) executed a plan to bomb the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building, killing a total of 168 people and injuring an estimated 450 others. He parked a rented truck carrying 4,400 pounds of ammonium nitrate fertilizer and nitromethane fuel at the front of the building, ignited the explosives on a timed fuse, and abandoned the scene. The blast effectively destroyed the building, as the remaining structure underwent a controlled demolition shortly afterward.

Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) agents traced the vehicle identification number of the rental truck; the rental company employees provided information for a sketch of “Robert Kling,” the alias used by McVeigh in the rental agreement. McVeigh was later stopped and arrested by an Oklahoma State Trooper for driving with no license plates and possessing a loaded firearm. McVeigh was indicted on eight counts of first-degree murder, conspiracy to use a weapon of mass destruction, use of a weapon of mass destruction, and destruction by explosives.

In addition to citing the infamous William Pierce novel The Turner Diaries, McVeigh also appeared to have used the book as a blueprint for the bombing. In a particularly uncanny resemblance to the actual events, Pierce tells a story about a fictitious character who blows up a federal building using explosives identical to those used by McVeigh. Pierce’s character was also combating the perceived evils of the government’s secular activities that encroached on what Pierce held to be Christian liberties.

In accordance with one of sociologist Mark Juergensmeyer’s characterizations of religious violence, McVeigh targeted the federal building to enact a symbolic drama that conveyed a message beyond the actual violence itself. This symbolic act was evidenced by McVeigh’s self-described motives for the bombing as retaliation for the U.S. government’s aggression at Ruby Ridge, Idaho, and at Waco, Texas, during the siege of the Branch Davidian compound. Housing regional offices for federal agencies such as the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the FBI; Social Security Administration; and recruiting offices for the Army and Marine Corps, the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building was an ideal target for McVeigh’s symbolic motives.

McVeigh was found guilty of all counts and received the death penalty by lethal injection on June 11, 2001. Ten years later, his act was compared with the Oslo bombing and killing carried out by Norwegian Christian terrorist Anders Brevik on July 22, 2011.

Salvador Jiménez Murguía

See also Branch Davidians; Christian Identity; Globalization; Terrorism; Violence

Further Readings

- Juergensmeyer, M. (2003). Terror in the mind of God: The global rise of religious violence. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Robertson, R. (2006). Anti-global religion? In M. Juergensmeyer (Ed.), The Oxford handbook of global religion (pp. 597–623). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

MECCA

In the Islamic tradition, the holiest city on earth, Mecca (also transliterated as Makkah) is situated in the present-day Saudi Arabian province of Hijaz about 70 kilometers east of the coastal city of Jeddah, about 280 meters above sea level. It is known in the Islamic tradition by a variety of names, each carrying its own connotation: Mecca, Bakkah, Umm al-Qura, al-Qaryah, al-Balad, al-Balad al-Amin, and Ma'ad. There is reason to believe that Ptolemy's Macoraba is Mecca. Situated in a valley surrounded by bare hills and no vegetation, Mecca's climate is hot (with temperatures regularly reaching 45 degrees Celsius in summer), and there is little rainfall. Currently, the population of Mecca is 1.71 million, which skyrockets to several million during the annual hajj (pilgrimage) season.

Muslims hold Mecca sacred for a number of reasons. First, in Mecca is situated the House of God (Kaabah), built by the prophet Ibrahim (Abraham) and Ismail (Ishmael) according to the Qur'an (other prophetic traditions [Hadith] ascribe its construction to the prophet Adam). Since then pilgrims have been visiting Mecca to perform the annual pilgrimage during the month of Dhu al-Hijja in commemoration of several rites intrinsically related to Ibrahim, Hajirah (Hagar—his first wife, Sarah's handmaiden), and Ismail. Second, it is the birthplace of the prophet Muhammad, the messenger of Islam.

Traditionally, Muslim scholars have held the belief that Mount Paran and the Desert of Paran mentioned in the Bible (Genesis 21:21) are allegedly the area surrounding Mecca, and that is where Hagar and Ismail were left by Ibrahim and where Ismail grew up. The Jewish tradition, on the other hand, situates Paran on the east coast of the Sinai Desert. There is salutary evidence on both sides, however, according to which Ismail is considered the progenitor of the Arabs.

Before the advent of Islam, Meccans were generally known to be polytheists, given to idol worship. Islamic sources mention the names of Lat, Manat, Hubal, and al-'Uzza as idols worshipped by Meccans and other Arabian tribes, to whom various kinds of sacrifices would be made. In addition to idol worship, the Qur'an alludes to occasions when the pagan practices of Makkans would give way to absolute monotheism in times of dire need (Yunus 31–32). Two other religious groups that enjoyed a distinct position in this Arabian community are the Hanifs and the Christians. The former were a handful of individuals who were concerned with faithfully adhering to the original religion of Ibrahim, thereby upholding the absolute oneness of God. The Qur'an portrays Abraham as the ideal Hanif. There were also a few Christians residing in Mecca (some of them monks) who were tolerated, even respected, as long as they showed deference to the status quo of Meccan society.

Culturally, Arab men used to place a great deal of importance on traits such as generosity, chivalry, and honor and could get into violent confrontations when challenged on this account. The poetry of the early Jahiliyyah period ("Period of Ignorance") adequately vindicates this claim. There were families in Mecca that used to enjoy particular respect for catering to specific functions. These functions included, for instance, siqayah and rifadah, or provision of adequate water supply and provisions for pilgrims to Mecca, respectively; other families held the office of liwa', or carrying the standard in war.

Situated in desolate desert conditions, Meccans had only one source of income, that is, trade, particularly during the season of pilgrimage. Although some prominent historians have questioned the status of Mecca as a major trade center, there seems to be ample historical evidence supporting the contrary position. Most historians are of the view that from the sixth century onward, Mecca had acquired the status of a major trade center. This was done through the grants of security that travelers received from the kings of the powerful neighboring states. As a result of this security, the Quraysh (the tribe in control of Mecca and its surrounding areas and to which the prophet Muhammad also belonged) could travel with their merchandise without the fear of being looted.

It was in Mecca that the prophet Muhammad started his da'wah (missionary) activity in the year 610 CE, and within a relatively short period of 13 years, his small band of men and women had become a threat to the sociopolitical fabric and status quo of Meccan society. As a result, they were forced to migrate to distant Medina (Madinah) in 622 CE (and earlier a group had left for Abyssinia), where after entering into a truce with local Arab and Jewish tribes, an Islamic state of a sort was formed. Eight years later, Muhammad entered Mecca with a huge army of 10,000 men, conquered it without bloodshed, and purged the Kaabah of all idols. After proclaiming general amnesty for all, it was declared that no polytheist may set foot in Mecca thereafter. Muslims living in and around Mecca have generally maintained this declaration, and this has possibly been all the more reason for some Western scholars in modern times, intrigued by the hallowed environs of this city, to try their luck in sneaking into Mecca by disguising themselves as Muslims, though many have genuinely embraced Islam. This perilously dangerous act has paid off well, as we have a number of interesting accounts providing exotic descriptions of Mecca and its life, particularly in the 19th century, from an outsider's perspective.

In the Islamic spiritual tradition, several prophetic episodes are cited to portray the prophet Muhammad's deep-seated love for Mecca, his hometown. To have lived in Mecca and borne its climatic hardships merely for the love of this city or to have died and been buried therein is almost to have guaranteed salvation through the mercy of God. It is for this reason that Muslims generally pray and aspire to be in Mecca when death overtakes them, as this is considered extremely auspicious. Moreover, prophetic traditions regarding al-Sa'ah—the Hour or End Times—(more or less equivalent to the Judeo-Christian apocalyptic literature) specifically mention the area of Hijaz in general and Mecca and Madinah more specifically as the only place on earth that would be spared the ravages of the end of times. Moreover, these two cities would be the only place where Dajjal (the anti-Christ) would not be able to set foot.

Mecca has also been viewed as the center of the world. Much has been written on Islamic sacred geography on the basis of this assumption. Some contemporary scientists have employed the mysterious Golden Ratio (also known as Golden Mean or Divine Section) to demonstrate that Mecca is the Golden Ratio point of the world. Although the Golden Mean is well established in geometry, in works of art, and now in its various depictions even in natural phenomena, its application in the arena of religion is regarded quite suspiciously.

On a more pragmatic note, however, Saudi Arabia unfolded its plans to make Mecca the center of world time by erecting the Royal Mecca Clock Tower right next to the Holy Mosque, which presently makes it the second tallest building at around 2,000 feet and the world's largest clock tower, which started ticking on August 12, 2010, with the start of the holy month of Ramadan. Many Muslims around the world today aspire to have Greenwich Mean Time replaced by Mecca Mean Time, as Mecca is considered the "true center of the earth."

With the introduction of satellite television and the induction of Muslim anchorpersons in many TV channels, Mecca has finally reached the homes of millions. The media now more frequently employ images of Muslims prostrating and bowing in unison around the Kaabah to create a softer image of both Islam and Muslims, after having portrayed Muslims for several decades as weapon-brandishing, bearded, and turbaned hardliners.

The Saudi government continues to pursue its cherished goal of modernizing and expanding Mecca for the ever-increasing Muslim populace that visits it every year. On the other hand, traditional Muslims the world over have started wondering whether all the modernization hype has actually deprived the environs of Mecca of some of its spirituality.

Muhammad Modassir Ali

See also Arabic; Hajj; Islam; Medina; Muhammad; Qur'an; Saudi Arabia; United Arab Emirates

Further Readings

- Al-Fasi, T. D. (2001). Al-Zubur al-Muqtatafah min Ta'rikh Makkah al-Musharrafah [Plucked flowers from the history of the ennobled Makkah]. Bur Sa'id, Egypt: Maktabat al-Thaqafah al-Diniyyah.
- Crone, P. (2004). Meccan trade and the rise of Islam. Piscataway, NJ: Gorgias Press.
- Hurgronje, C. S. (2007). Mekka in the latter part of the 19th century: Daily life, customs and learning. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill Classics.
- Muhammad (Ibn Zahirah), J. D. (1340 AH/1921 CE). Al-Jami' al-Latif fi Fadl Makkah wa Ahliha wa Bina' al-Bayt al-Sharif [A pleasant collection regarding the excellence of Makkah and its inhabitants and the erecting of the noble house]. Cairo, Egypt: Isa al-Babi al-Halabi.
- Ralli, A. (1909). Christians at Mecca. London: William Heinemann.
- Watt, M. (1991). Makka: 1. The pre-Islamic and early Islamic periods. In C. E. Bosworth, E. Van Donzel, B. Lewis, W. P. Heinrich, & Ch. Pella (Eds.), The encyclopaedia of Islam (Vol. 6, pp. 144–147). Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.

MEDINA

Medina (also Madinah) is a city of more than 1 million inhabitants in the Hijaz (western) region of Saudi Arabia. For Muslims, it is considered the second holiest city after Mecca. It was an important haven and base for the prophet Muhammad during the early formation of Islam, and its significance as a religious and pilgrimage site continues today. The term medina itself simply means “city” in Arabic, and the full name al-Medina al-Munawwara (“Radiant City”) is often used in the Arab world. The city is also sometimes known as Medinat an-Naby (“City of the Prophet”) or Medinat ar-Rasul (“City of the Messenger”) by Muslims.

Before Muhammad’s arrival, the oasis town was inhabited by a number of rival Arab and Jewish tribes. At that time, it was called Yathrib. Conflicts between the tribes led a delegation in Yathrib to invite Muhammad to serve as an arbitrator there. Muhammad’s new religious claims based on his revelations (inscribed in the Qur’an) had threatened the status quo of the ruling Meccan Quraysh tribe and brought persecution from them, so the move to Yathrib in 622 (the first year of the Muslim calendar) was advantageous for Muhammad as well as for the battling tribes. Muhammad’s presence indeed proved to alleviate conflict in Yathrib, as many people of the main rivaling tribes converted to Islam and unified under their identity as Muslims. Eventually, the city came to be known by its current names, reflecting Muhammad’s role there and the large-scale conversion to Islam. Although the Jews of Medina did not convert, they signed a peace agreement with the new Muslim community that allowed for coexistence within the city.

Muhammad and his followers in Medina successfully defeated Meccan attacks in a series of battles, until his opponents finally surrendered. From then on, the Muslims of Medina focused more on political and religious expansion outside the city, although it remained a crucial base and Muhammad’s home. There he continued to receive revelations until his death in 632 CE.

Medina served as the capital of the Islamic caliphate until the reign of the fourth caliph, when the capital moved to Damascus under the Umayyad caliphate, only later to move to Baghdad under ‘Abbāsīd’s rule. Although Medina was not Islam’s political capital for long, it endured as a vital religious center, and it produced the Medinan (Mālikī) school of Islamic law.

One of the city’s most important sites is the Mosque of the Prophet, al-Masjid an-Nabawy, the large mosque where Muhammad is buried. Prayers are said to have special weight there, and the mosque attracts thousands of pilgrims each year. Many visit Medina on their way to Mecca during the hajj pilgrimage. To accommodate these travels, the city is home to the Prince Muhammad bin Abdul Aziz Airport, which was opened in 1974.

Medina also houses the tombs of the caliphs Abu Bakr and ‘Omar, as well as that of Muhammad’s daughter Fatima. The Quba Mosque (Masjid Quba’), the first mosque that was built after the establishment of Islam, is another revered site. Universities in Medina include the Islamic University of Medina and Taibah University.

Kristin Tucker

See also Hajj; Islam; Mecca; Mosques; Muhammad; Pilgrimage; Saudi Arabia

Further Readings

- Lecker, M. (1995). Muslims, Jews, and Pagans: Studies on early Islamic Medina. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill.
- Seyyed Hossein, N., & Nomachi, A. K. (1997). Mecca the blessed, Medina the radiant: The holiest cities of Islam. New York: Aperture Foundation.

MEDITATION

Meditation practices develop mental focus, which is used for the attainment of particular states of consciousness. Meditation is most readily associated with Hinduism and Buddhism; however, it is also practiced in Islam, Christianity, Judaism, numerous indigenous traditions, and a variety of new religious movements. The global dissemination of meditation practice is traced in this entry from India through China as well as from the Middle East through Europe and the Americas.

India: Yoga, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Tantra

Among the earliest representations of meditation practice are figures sitting in what appear to be meditative postures on seals from archaeological sites in the Indus Valley civilization (ca. 2700 BCE). The first extensive recorded treatment of meditation practice in Hinduism is found in the Yoga Sutras of Patanjali (100 BCE to 200 CE). In this classic text, dhyana (meditation) focused on the cessation of thought. Samkhya philosophy, a dualist philosophy that sees the cosmos as consisting of two radically different forces, purusha (consciousness (spirit) and prakrti (matter), is the metaphysical foundation of the Yoga Sutras. Yoga meditation practices were designed as psychophysical disciplines to unite these two cosmic forces. The mind is understood as being continuously engaged in thoughts of past actions, and these thoughts shape the present and create the future. Yoga meditation techniques are a means for stopping this constant stream of thoughts. When the mind becomes still, it can gain awareness of the essential reality that is beyond the subject-object dualism.

Hindu Tantric practices reached maturity during the 10th century CE and focused on the acquisition and use of energy. In its classical form, Tantra is an amalgam of Samkhya philosophy and regional religious traditions focused on The Goddess and Shiva. Tantric meditation differs from that described by Patanjali in its extensive use of visualization, recitation of sacred mantras (sounds), and hand mudras (gestures). As a result of its use of erotic imagery and metaphor, Tantra captured the imagination of the early British colonialists and has generated a contemporary cultural phenomenon often quite different from the classical teachings. Classical Tantric meditation is a discipline for the transcendence of the cosmic duality via the full integration of the spiritual consciousness into the human body.

Nepal, Southeast Asia, Japan, and China: Buddhist Expansion and Chinese Meditation

At the same time when the teachings of the Yoga Sutras were circulating orally (sixth century BCE), the meditation practices of Buddhism were being developed in India. In contrast to Hindu teachings, Buddhism focused on the attainment of nirvana, the ultimate freedom from suffering. According to Buddhism, suffering results from the misperception that appearances, sensory perceptions, and mental formulations are real. In the two major schools of Buddhism, Theravada and Mahayana, bhavana (meditation) focuses on creating a consciousness of samatha (calm) and vipasyana (insight or higher vision). Together these states constitute the mindfulness practice, which develops an awareness of the body and a general sensation of tranquility that prepares the consciousness for absorption in a state of sunyata (emptiness). Once emptiness is achieved, then nirvana can be experienced. Vajrayana or Tantric Buddhism developed as a branch of Mahayana and, like the Hindu Tantra, matured in the 10th century CE. Once Vajrayana practice entered Tibet, it underwent further development, and today, it remains at the core of Tibetan Buddhist practice. Theravada Buddhism spread to Sri Lanka, Thailand, Burma, Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam, whereas Mahayana Buddhism progressed eastward into China (second century CE) and Japan (fifth and sixth centuries CE). In both instances, Mahayana developed into Zen (in Chinese, Ch'an) and its meditative practice zazen by the eighth and ninth centuries CE. The goal of Zen practice is the attainment of knowledge that results from a radical change of perception (satori). Zen satori, like the attainment of nirvana, is an experience beyond subject-object dualism and results in union in absolute reality.

Outside Buddhism, Chinese traditions of meditation focus on the practice of quiet sitting and are rooted in the philosophical traditions of Daoism and Confucianism. Daoist meditation, like that of the Buddhist traditions, develops the attainment of mental focus for the achievement of absorption in the absolute reality. Confucian meditation employs quiet sitting for accessing the absolute that resides within the individual. In many of the traditions that developed from India and Asia, the states of consciousness that result from meditation are meant not only for attainment of spiritual goals but also for use in the living experience and actions of the adept.

The Middle East and Continental Europe: Monotheistic Meditation Practices

Monotheistic traditions became the primary religious practices of Europe and the Middle East by the medieval period. In these traditions, meditation is a part of the practice of intensely focused contemplation and contemplative prayer. The goal of these practices is to bring oneself into the presence of God and into communion with Him. Once communion is achieved, the participant can enjoy a state of rapture in the divine presence and engage in conversation with God. From its earliest inception, Judaism employed intense contemplation on the Torah for the attainment of knowledge of the texts' meaning as well as a way of accessing the presence of God and knowing His mind. In Islam, the prophet Muhammad received the Qur'an during extended periods of contemplation in the desert, and meditation practice is prescribed for all Muslims in the Qur'an. Another Muslim practice for the achievement of communion with God is the trance state that can be produced by dhikr, or continual remembrance of God. Medieval Catholic mystics employed intense contemplation and trance states for the attainment of an ecstatic form of communion with God. Today in Catholic and Protestant sects, contemplative prayer is practiced for the attainment of knowledge as well as communion. The focus on communion with God as opposed to absorption in or awakening of absolute reality is one of the key differences between Western and Eastern forms of meditative practice, respectively.

Meditation: Contemporary Global Phenomenon

In the late 18th century, along with European political and economic expansion, a process of religious exchange was initiated by early Christian missionaries. Christian missionaries, many of whom were linguists and early social scientists, were responsible for some of the earliest expositions on non-Christian religious traditions and their practices. By the late 19th century, scholars such as Max Müller and Rhys Davis began producing the first widely disseminated translations of Hindu and Buddhist texts. These texts greatly influenced the early Transcendentalist thinkers: Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry David Thoreau, and Walt Whitman, as well as the Theosophist Madame Blavatsky. During the 1893 World Parliament of Religion in Chicago, Swami Vivekananda introduced Hindu teachings, and the Zen priest Shaki Soen those of Buddhism, to Western scholars and theologians. Following the World

Parliament, Vivekananda lectured extensively in Europe and the United States and established the Vedanta Society. Zen teachings were later disseminated in the West by Soen's disciple D. T. Suzuki, who first came for an extended lecture tour at Columbia University in 1931. Among Suzuki's early students were several future authors who would exert a profound influence on the "beat generation" of the 1950s and the counterculture of the late 1960s: Alan Watts, Allen Ginsberg, and Jack Kerouac.

In 1959, the Dalai Lama was forced into exile in India, and Tibetan Buddhism began its movement westward. Chögyam Trungpa and Tarthang Tulku were among the first Tibetan teachers to travel west in the early 1960s. Chögyam Trungpa came to Oxford in 1963 to study Western philosophy and comparative religion. In 1968 and 1970, respectively, both Tarthang Tulku and Chögyam Trungpa arrived in the United States and established meditation centers. During this time, students from the United States and Europe began traveling to Asia in greater numbers to study meditation. Also, in the late 1960s, teachers such as Swami Sivananda (Sivananda Yoga), Maharishi Mahesh Yogi (Transcendental Meditation), and A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupada (Krishna Consciousness) left Asia and established centers in the Americas and Europe.

Focus on Christian meditation increased during the late 1960s, in part due to the teachings of the Trappist monk Thomas Merton and his integration of Zen practices. The rise of Hindu and Buddhist meditation in the West has resulted in increased interest in other forms of meditation practice such as those found in Islam (Sufism) and Judaism (Kabbalah). While the concepts and techniques for meditation vary, many traditions recognize the value of mental focus.

Sherry L. Morton

See also Christianity; Confucianism; Daoism; Hinduism; Islam; Judaism; Mahayana Buddhism; Theravada Buddhism; Vajrayana, Tibetan; Zen Buddhism

Further Readings

Baumann, M. (2001). Global Buddhism: Developmental periods, regional history and a new analytical perspective. Journal of Global Buddhism, 2, 1–43.

- Finley, J. (2004). Christian meditation: Experiencing the presence of God. New York: HarperSanFrancisco.
- Maw, M. (1990). Visions of India: Fulfillment theology, the Aryan race theory, and the work of the British Protestant missionaries in Victorian India. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Long.
- Nagao, G. M. (1991). Mādhyamika and Yogācāra (L. S. Kawamura, Trans.). Albany: State University of New York Press. (Original work published 1978)
- Schimmel, A. (1975). Mystical dimensions of Islam. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

MEDITERRANEAN WORLD

The areas surrounding the Mediterranean Sea have seen some of the highest levels of religious activity and interaction in the world. A fully comprehensive account of the complex interplay at work over the 5,000 plus years around the Mediterranean basin is beyond the scope of this entry, but the broad strokes of the religious dynamics will be delineated. Stretching back to Egyptian and Mycenaean/Minoan civilizations founded earlier than 3000 BCE, for years the territory surrounding the Mediterranean Sea was the most sought-after real estate, due to the fertile land and avenues of trade it provided. No single religion can lay claim to dominance in the area, and the centers of power on the Mediterranean coast relocated with the different cultures that gained ascendancy. The following sections trace the chronological progression of the various religious cultures that held sway over the area, alongside the shifting political structures and movements of the centers of power.

Early Polytheism

The earliest civilizations interacting around the Mediterranean World were Egyptians and the Phoenicians in the area of Syria-Palestine. By 2000 BCE, the Egyptians and Phoenicians were trading with each other and the Minoans of Crete. The religions of the time were largely polytheistic, where the hierarchy of the gods in the pantheon was reflected and replicated in the political structure of the ruling country; the religious communities of the time were entirely continuous with the political communities. There was no state without its religion; even speaking of religion as an institution separate from the political structure is to misunderstand religion during the period. The priests of the state religion served as members of the administration, and the head of the state was the ritual leader as well. This double status also allowed the leader to ritually enact his power, for when the sacrifices were performed the community could literally see the leader's connection with the divine.

Some syncretism occurred between the religious communities, mostly through conquest or trade. Due to the prevalence of polytheism during the period, this syncretism rarely posed a problem for the community and could present as a shared representation of similar gods or be understood as a legitimate hierarchy that presided over a different area. This highlights the importance of place to religion during this time; gods were connected to the place of their community's origin.

Henotheism became evident in Egypt in 13th century BCE. Akenhaten is generally considered the first to promote henotheistic practices, as he raised the god Aten to a status above the other gods. Sometimes classified as monotheistic, Aten's religious practices recognized the existence of multiple gods while declaring only one as worthy of worship. Often other gods were considered hostile, because the effect of henotheistic practices was generally to unite the particular god with a specific community.

The Blending of the World

In 336 BCE, Philip II, King of Macedon, was assassinated. At the time of his assassination, his army had begun the invasion of Persia, and his son and successor, Alexander the Great, continued the conquests of his father to great effect. At its height, Alexander's empire stretched from Macedon (modern-day Greece), around the Mediterranean coast through Egypt, and through the Middle East to India. One of the key power centers during this time was the newly founded city of Alexandria on the Nile Delta, a site of much religious and political importance prior to Alexander's reign.

More important than Alexandria, however, was the mixing of the "civilized" world. The military routing of Alexander resulted in a single cosmopolitan culture, at least at the levels of leadership. Widespread syncretism was evident throughout the empire; foreign gods of conquered lands were at times integrated into the Greek pantheon, and the forms of worship were aligned with the Greek model. Besides providing uniformity with the rest of the conquered world, religion provided a means of control and reinscribed the control of the leaders.

Moreover, the political aspects of religion mentioned above were taken to new heights with Alexander, who considered himself a god. He was not the first to claim divinity; Greek heroes from Homer's epics provided precursors, and myriad Roman emperors followed this model. Alexander also made regular use of oracles and seers, and the practice of consulting the oracles continued with the Romans, who soon assumed control of the Mediterranean.

Roman Dominance

Alexander's achievements generally marked the beginning of the Hellenistic Age, which came to an end with the death of Antony and the ascension of Octavius, who became Augustus, the first Roman emperor, in 30 BCE. In that same year, Egypt was annexed to Rome, and the sea was named mare nostrum ("our sea"), a pond in the middle of an empire. Power became concentrated in a few cities: Rome, obviously, and also its sister cities of Antioch and Alexandria.

Roman religion took a great deal from the Greek forms preceding its rule and integrated many foreign cults into the religious milieu. These were mostly initiation cults, promising secrets of the afterlife to its adherents and claiming great numbers of Roman citizens. The foreignness of the cults was a draw to potential initiates; foreign gods and lands were thought to contain new wisdom not otherwise available. The Roman administration also inculcated religion in a number of ways, from boundary drawing to political advising to the legal system.

Like the Greeks before them, Romans believed that the gods were active and interacted with humans. Gods were approached mostly through sacrifice rather than prayer, and they were invoked to seal promises in personal, professional, and political life. The Capitoline Triad of Juno, Jupiter, and Minerva continually held the highest place in the Roman pantheon, but these gods were not understood to be essentially singular, and the god Jupiter Capitoline was both the same and different from Jupiter, who was recognized as protector of a particular area. As with the Egyptians and Phoenicians, Roman religion was not a discrete institution that could be separated from the political body. The initiation cults were less connected to the political leadership, but the celebrations in honor of the cultic gods played a large role in the communal life and Roman identity, an identity that would change with the conversion of Constantine the Great and the institution of Christianity.

Christian Rome

Christianity was known in the Roman Empire since the first century CE but only within small groups of believers. The early centuries saw the Diocletian persecutions against the Christians, but their status drastically changed in 312 CE, with the conversion of the emperor Constantine on the eve of a decisive battle. Constantine claimed that he dreamed victory against Maxentius would come if he was to order his soldiers to mark their shields with the chi rho, a symbol of the Christian faith, and on his victory he issued the Edict of Milan, granting religious freedom to the Christians. The imperial power became increasingly engaged with the Christian faith, holding the first ecumenical Christian council in 325 CE and lending its power to the decision on orthodoxy.

When the empire was divided in 396 CE into east (centered in Constantinople since Constantine) and west (still based in Rome), Theodosius I declared Christianity to be the official religion of the empire. The meshing of the newly empowered Church and the political leadership continued, and the coronation of Charlemagne in the ninth century marked the beginnings of the Holy Roman Empire, which would be a major player in the Mediterranean for the next several centuries along with its sibling Byzantine Empire. However, by the time of Charlemagne's inauguration, Christianity's influence around the mare nostrum was being eclipsed by a new religion, Islam.

The Islamization of the Sea

With the advent of the Arabs to the Mediterranean region in the seventh century, the lands around the sea changed in a short time. The Umayyad Caliphate was the first Muslim empire to make gains, with their center of power in Damascus (though their religious center remained in Mecca), and at its height the empire stretched from modern-day Turkey through the entirety of the south over to the southern areas of Spain and into France. Their expansion was halted in 732 by the stand of Charles Martel at Poitiers, but by that time their empire rivaled that of Rome at its peak and was attained at a much greater speed.

During this period, people were voluntarily converting to the dominant religion, but the rule of the Umayyads did not recognize converts as full citizens—an approach opposite to that of the Roman Empire, which gladly accepted foreign people into its folds as equals. Christians and Jews, known as dhimmis (people of the book), were the vast majority of citizens, and their religious practices were treated with tolerance by the rulers. The Umayyads had opposed Muhammad's rise, and they soon received comeuppance in the form of the 'Abbāsids, a community founded by the uncle of Muhammad, who would engage the Umayyads in battle by 747 CE.

The 'Abbāsīd rebellion was spurred on in part by religious considerations and disgust with the lascivious mode of life the Umayyads enjoyed. The 'Abbāsīds quickly claimed the lands previously under Umayyad rule and attempted to completely annihilate the Umayyad Dynasty, though the former Umayyad caliph Abd al-Rahman escaped assassination and fled to Spain to set up the caliphate of Cordoba.

The 'Abbāsīd Caliphate and the Founding of al-Andalus

The 'Abbāsīds embraced Sunnī Islam, and under 'Abbāsīd rule, the power center of the Mediterranean shifted for the first time away from its shores to the capital of Baghdad. The 'Abbāsīd army was created mostly from Turkish slaves known as Mamluks (Mamelukes), and outsiders who had converted to Islam, known as malawi, played a large part in 'Abbāsīd rule. Both of these decisions were compelled by the 'Abbāsīds' desire to bypass traditional Arab systems of kinship, and the dynasty was an attempt to replace traditional modes of identity with those of religion. The Mamluks took control of Egypt from the 'Abbāsīds in the 870s, and in the 7 years following conquered the lands through Syria, though they were unable to retain control.

The escaped Abd al-Rahman met with the Umayyad loyalists and set up an opposing Muslim kingdom based in Cordoba in 755 CE. The al-Andalus state became a center of religious learning, and due to the prevalence of Christians in the nation, a particular syncretic form of Islam developed, a form that combined celebratory practices that Christians had taken from pagans. The often persecuted Jewish people knew 300 years of peace in the state they called Sefarad, from where the designation "Sephardic Jews" stems. The Cordoba kingdom conquered many of the surrounding lands by sea, including Crete, Sicily, and southern Italy, squeezing the Holy Roman Empire farther from the shores of the Mediterranean and up into the hinterlands of Europe. Following a revolt by the Christian convert Umar ibn Hafsun, Almanzor took control of the kingdom in the 10th century, and after a period of campaigns against tribes in the north with a hodgepodge army and a rebellion in Cordoba, the caliphate was dissolved by 1031.

The Crusades

The area known as Hungary today was converted to Christianity by King Stephen in 1000, and the Roman Catholic Church began making pacts of peace with the warring religions in the area. In 1054, the Great Schism of the Christian church occurred, splitting the Christian world into the Catholic West and the Orthodox East. The theological basis of the schism revolved around the addition of the filioque to the Nicene Creed, questions of the proper celebration of the Eucharist, and the requisite celibacy of the clergy.

In 1071, the Byzantine Empire lost all of Asia Minor to the Muslim armies, and the Church felt the need to regain the thrice-holy city of Jerusalem (revered by Jews, Christians, and Muslims alike). Motivated by the loss of territory to a religious enemy, Pope Urban II called for all Christians to join a holy war and promised the remission of all sins for those who perished in the attempt. Franks constituted the majority of the crusading soldiers, and after sacking Antioch in 1098 and slaughtering the Muslim and Jewish inhabitants therein, the Crusaders reached the city of Jerusalem in 1099.

On their victory over the combined Jewish and Muslim forces, the atrocities committed at Antioch were repeated within the walls of Jerusalem.

Almost 50 years after the First Crusade, Muslims conquered the Crusader territory known as Edessa County, spurring a second crusade composed mainly of European and British armies. In 1187 CE, the Sultan of Egypt, Saladin, led his armies into Jerusalem, recapturing the city after nearly a century of Christian rule. Again this resulted in a call to Christian arms, and the Third Crusade was launched, in part under the control of Richard the Lionheart of England. Neither Saladin's conquest nor the responding Crusade aimed for destruction; Saladin looked to secure the benefits of taxing the occupying Franks, and the Third Crusade looked to gain safe pilgrimage for Christians. The Fourth Crusade did aim to recapture the holy city but ceased efforts after sacking the Orthodox city of Constantinople in 1204, effectively completing the great schism started over a century ago.

Inquisitions, Turks, and the Ottoman Empire

By the 12th century, it was no longer possible to speak of a single history of the Mediterranean world. The divide between the eastern and western empires begun nearly eight centuries prior had solidified into two regions with their own destinies. The Catholic Church of the West, ostensibly to root out heresy, began a series of efforts to collect and convert masses of those practicing heretical traditions. In France, the effort was aimed at the Cathar sect, while in Italy the Waldensians were the chief target. Jews in both nations suffered during the inquisitions, and as the religious project continued, it was increasingly turned to political ends with religion as a mere cover. The Knights Templar, champions of the Crusade, were targeted, likely out of the jealousy of France's king, Philip the Fair. In 1492, the Muslims and Jews were forced out of Spain during the Inquisition, only to be given refuge by the Ottoman Sultan Bayezid II.

The Islamic Seljuk Turks had made inroads into the lands of the Byzantine Empire by the 13th century, and 100 years later, the land of modern-day Turkey underwent major civil wars, which allowed the Turks further gains. Setting their capital near the Byzantine capital of Constantinople illustrated the extent of their influence and that of the Ottoman Empire, which soon followed them and expanded the lands under their control. The Seljuk Sultanate perished at the beginning of the 14th century, and the area it ruled was divided into independent states, one of which was ruled by Osman I, who gave his name to the empire that would dominate most of the Mediterranean coastline for centuries to come.

The Islamic Ottoman quickly expanded their frontiers, capturing the Balkans by the 16th century, and at its height dominated the entire region minus Italy, France, and Spain. The capital of the empire was eventually returned to Constantinople, and while the Muslim community was tolerant of Christian and Jews, that tolerance did not extend to perceived practitioners of polytheism. The Greek Orthodox Church was allowed to retain its institutions, but the legal system of the empire was based on Shari'a law, with different court systems for Muslim and non-Muslim citizens.

The Decline of the Mediterranean

By the 16th century, the Mediterranean Sea had lost its prominence as the lake around which civilization thrived. Increasing colonization of areas around the globe had moved the center of power to the north, and eyes turned to wander the undiscovered lands of the oceans. With the Peace of Westphalia in 1648, secular nation-states became the model, a consequence of the religious Thirty Years' War and the recognition of the power of religion in such conflicts—a lesson that took nearly 4,000 years to be learned. Even at the end of the 20th century, the lesson was still being worked out on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, with the violence between the Jewish state of Israel and the indigenous Palestinian people, whose claims to the land on which the state was founded remain contested and unresolved. While religion did not begin the conflict, it has since become bound up in the political goals of both sides.

By the 21st century, the empires had been dismantled, and the lands of the Mediterranean were divided into sovereign, independent nations. The states on the southern shore turned their gaze south, to engage with African interests, while the northern nations turned north to help form the European Union. The countries of the eastern shore along with Egypt look east to become involved more with the Middle Eastern nations. These statements, while broad, are meant to illustrate the fragmentation of an area that had for years been unified under banners of various ethnicities and religions.

John Soboslai

See also ‘Abbāsid Caliphate; Alexander the Great; Ancient Near Eastern Religions; Constantinople; Crusades; Eastern Orthodox Christianity; Greece; Henotheism; Inquisition; Italy; Manichaeism; Ottoman Empire; Rome; Umayyad Dynasty

Further Readings

- Abulafia, D. (2000). Mediterranean encounters, economic, religious, political, 1100–1550. Burlington, VT: Ashgate.
- Alpher, J. (1986). Nationalism and modernity: A Mediterranean perspective. New York: Praeger.
- Beard, M., North, J., & Price, S. (1998). Religions of Rome: Vol. 1. A history. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Boardman, J., Murray, O., & Griffin, J. (Eds.). (2001). The Oxford history of Greece and the Hellenistic world. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Brown, P. (1989). The world of Late Antiquity. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Cameron, A. (1993). The Mediterranean world in Late Antiquity, A.D. 395–600. New York: Routledge.
- Cerutti, F., & Ragionieri, R. (Eds.). (2001). Identities and conflicts: The Mediterranean. New York: Palgrave.
- Crook, Z. A. (2004). Reconceptualising conversion: Patronage, loyalty and conversion in the religions of the ancient Mediterranean. New York: Walter de Gruyter.
- Foltz, R. (2010). Religions of the Silk Road: Premodern patterns of globalization. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Freeman, C. (1996). Egypt, Greece and Rome: Civilizations of the ancient Mediterranean. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Holland, G. S. (2009). Gods of the desert: Religions of the ancient Near East. New York: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Hunt, L.-A. (1998). Byzantium, eastern Christendom and Islam: Art at the crossroads of the medieval Mediterranean. London: Pindar Press.
- Husain, A. A., & Fleming, K. E. (2007). A faithful sea: The religious cultures of the Mediterranean, 1200–1700. Oxford, UK: Oneworld.
- Kepel, G. (1994). The revenge of God: The resurgence of Islam, Christianity and Judaism in the modern world. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- O’Shea, S. (2006). Sea of faith: Islam and Christianity in the medieval Mediterranean world. New York: Walker.

MEGACHURCH

The term megachurch has come to refer to huge Protestant congregations with an average attendance of more than 2,000 adults and children in all weekend worship services. The weekly attendance at U.S. megachurches accounts for more than 7% of all attendees at religious congregations each week. The largest megachurch in the United States, Lakewood Church in Houston, Texas, currently averages more than 40,000 in attendance at its four weekend services. The vast majority of megachurches range between 2,000 and 4,000 weekly attendees, with less than 20% (less than 300 churches) having an attendance of more than 5,000. Additionally, significant numbers of megachurches are scattered throughout the world, especially in South Korea, Brazil, Australia, Singapore, and several African countries, including Nigeria and South Africa, although no exact count exists for this worldwide phenomenon. Many of these megachurches, which generally range from 5,000 to 50,000 attendees, dwarf the U.S. ones, with several, such as Yoido Full Gospel Church in South Korea, claiming more than 100,000 attendees weekly.

Although very large congregations have existed throughout history, since the 1960s the rapid proliferation of churches with massive attendance indicates a unique contemporary appeal of this form of religious organization. The total number of U.S. megachurches has increased from fewer than 50 in 1970, to 350 in 1990, to more than 600 in 2000, and now more than 1,300. Similar, although not as dramatic, growth of large churches is evident throughout the globe. Scholars suggest that the megachurch congregational form is a distinctive response to contemporary cultural shifts and changes in societal patterns throughout the industrialized, urban, and suburban areas of the world.

Although size is the most immediately apparent characteristic of these congregations, the Protestant megachurches generally share many other traits. Virtually all these megachurches have a conservative evangelical theology, even those within mainline denominations. Roughly two thirds of U.S. megachurches are denominational, but globally, significantly more are nondenominational.

The majority of U.S. megachurches are located in the suburban areas of rapidly growing sprawl cities such as Los Angeles, Dallas, Atlanta, Houston, and Orlando, with the states of California, Texas, Georgia, and Florida having the highest concentrations. Most megachurches outside the United States can be found in densely populated urban centers such as Seoul, Korea; São Paulo, Brazil; and Lagos, Nigeria.

Megachurches often grow to their great size under the tenure of a single senior pastor within a very short time. Nearly all megachurch pastors are male and are viewed as having considerable personal charisma. The senior minister often exhibits an authoritative style of preaching and is the singular dominant visionary leader of the church. Leadership teams of dozens of assistant ministers, hundreds of staff, and thousands of volunteers often support these senior pastors.

Megachurches generally have contemporary praise-style worship, including drums, electric guitars and keyboards, huge projection screens, and robust sound systems. These churches host a multitude of social, recreational, and aid ministries. Additionally, megachurches employ intentional efforts, including home fellowships and small-group gatherings, to enhance the community. These congregations promote intense personal commitment in many attendees but also support large percentages of less committed attendees among their ranks.

Scott Thumma

See also Churches; Evangelical Movements; Korea, Republic of (South Korea); McDonaldization; Protestant Christianity; Televangelism

Further Reading

Thumma, S., & Travis, D. (2007). Beyond megachurch myths: What we can learn from America's largest churches. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.

MEN'S ROLES

Though much attention has been paid to women's roles in society, men's roles are equally important and are also changing in many parts of the world in the global era. Issues of gender have become increasingly important in understanding how religious traditions have developed and how they function. Although the focus on gender emerged first in Western cultures, where feminist movements of the 20th century called for rethinking traditional gender roles in every aspect of society, today it permeates virtually all cultures and religions. That concern reflects an awareness that many traditions have historically granted men the more powerful roles in overseeing religious life, from serving as religious professionals to presiding at rites, although women were more likely to engage in religious activities, especially those associated with devotion, and to avail themselves of religious services. The disparity between gender when it comes to leadership and actual involvement has in turn raised many other questions, from whether being religious has a biological basis to whether religion provides a mechanism men use to assert control and authority over women. This entry does not address issues of biology or control of one gender over the other but explores men's roles in the formation and transmission of religious traditions and the ways in which men themselves are religious.

Men as Founders and Religious Professionals

In the historic religious traditions, men emerged as major founder figures and official leaders. In some agricultural and tribal societies, women had key leadership roles; in the rest, men have dominated. For example, Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, Jainism, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam all claim male founders—Siddhartha Gautama, Zoroaster, Mahavira (Nataputta Vardhamana), Moses, Jesus, and Muhammad, respectively.

Even in traditions with more nebulous beginnings, males have dominated. In the Hindu tradition, for example, although female sacred beings abound, males have dominated the professional priesthood, and the caste system based its religious ideals on male experience, with a woman's status tied to that of a man (her father and then her husband). In some cases, historians have posited that men intentionally suppressed texts and alternative approaches that gave greater status to women. For example, one theory advanced for the suppression of Gnosticism(s) in the early centuries of Christianity holds that the favorable views of women in Gnostic texts and religious practice, showing women with religious authority equal to that of men, led men to attempt to eradicate them as a male priesthood and church hierarchy evolved. This action also indicates that in most traditions, men have had primary responsibility for the preservation and transmission of sacred texts and, until well into the 20th century, provided the bulk of philosophical and theological reflection.

Orthodox Judaism illustrates men's roles well. Historically, 10 males were necessary to constitute a minyan, or quorum, for prayer; men went to the synagogue to study the Torah and thus could become rabbis; and men marked the transition into adulthood with the rite of passage known as the bar mitzvah. Yet the heart of Jewish practice remained in the home, increasingly the domain of women, where Sabbath celebration began when the wife/mother lit the Sabbath candles.

In other traditions also, gender difference prevails. In the indigenous Chinese traditions, the practice of filial piety or deference made gender distinctions. If children were expected to defer to parents, the wife/mother was in turn expected to defer both to her husband and to her in-laws. Ideologically, deference did not denote an inherent superior-inferior relationship but the bipolarity (yin and yang) undergirding all reality. The practical consequence, however, was different. Lived reality generally meant that the balance between male and female became the preeminence of the male over the female within the extended family as well as within the social and political orders.

In the Buddhist heritage, some strands posited that women as well as men could attain nirvana and could form religious orders akin to those that served monks. In most cases, however, such female orders have remained subordinate to monks. In traditional Muslim practice, men are expected to attend prayer services at the mosque on Fridays, although in non-Muslim cultures where there is little social support to do so, adherence drops.

However, within the mosque, men and women are separated (as is also the case in Orthodox Judaism), not to make men superior to women but in part because the presence of women might distract men from their religious obligations. Imams and others who lead services, however, are always male.

Both the Jewish and Christian traditions long restricted professional leadership roles to men, with Roman Catholicism requiring celibacy for priests. This posture has sparked controversy in recent years; in some cases, the practice has changed. Many Protestant Christian bodies and some Jewish groups (e.g., Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist) have admitted women to the professional ministry, beginning in the second half of the 20th century. Among Roman Catholic Christians, a celibate male priesthood remains the norm. Recent uproars over priests accused of molesting young men or otherwise breaking vows of celibacy brought consternation and debate but not abandonment of that ideal. Perhaps the most inclusive, although still male based, is the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons), in which, theoretically, standing in the priesthood is open to all male members since the 1970s without regard to race or ethnicity.

Men's Spirituality

Even though the major traditions tend to acknowledge men as founders and, at least until recently, as those suited to serve as religious professionals, women gradually became regarded as having a more spiritual orientation or an inherently more religious nature than men. In India, for example, even if Hindu men pray as an act of devotion, women for many years have been more likely to perform daily puja in the home, to visit temples to pray and to receive a blessing, and to develop a host of rituals relating to their experience as women—even if they cannot serve as priests. Hindu men are more likely to become engaged in the life of a temple in the immigrant context, where the temple helps preserve ethnic identity as a focus for prayer and devotion. In a few Hindu immigrant communities, however, women have taken on functions akin to priests and officiate at temple rites.

One reason frequently advanced to account for the presumably greater spirituality of women is their role in bearing and rearing children. Because women give birth, they “naturally” take on the primary role of nurturing children, inculcating moral values, and providing religious instruction. That perception grew in cultures where families ceased to be working, functioning economic units and men turned increasingly to waged labor outside the home to provide support for the family.

Trends among Protestant Christians in the United States illustrate this perception. In 17th-century New England, for example, where Puritan Protestants dominated, the patriarch of the household was expected to lead daily devotions and ensure that all children and indentured servants received religious instruction. At that time, in most cases, the household functioned as an economic as well as social unit; everyone had a role to play to support the household’s well-being. By the early 19th century, as nascent industrialization brought differentiation between the family as a social unit and the economic structures that supported the family, emergent gender roles became more defined. Men, absent from the household much of the day, became less directly engaged in religious nurture and other aspects of child rearing. Consequently, men were increasingly regarded as being less religiously inclined than women.

In the West, this differentiation has meant that measures of religiosity are likely to reflect ways in which women are religious because they tend to highlight activities perceived culturally to be more feminine than masculine, although exceptions always appear, particularly when male religious professionals are included among those whose religious practice is examined. Measures such as time spent in devotional reading of sacred texts or in prayer, meditation, and other contemplative pursuits as well as attendance at religious services and formal membership in religious groups show women to be more religious than men. All such activities are also perceived to be more characteristically feminine than masculine. In 19th-century America, as this differentiation became more apparent, the clergy profession itself was widely seen as feminized, even though virtually no group then allowed women to serve as clergy. However, emphasizing positive action rather than contemplation, pragmatic results rather than devotion, suggests that men may also be religious but express that religiosity in ways different from women.

The ways in which men relate to religion, regardless of the tradition or society examined, reflect how that culture or tradition constructs models for behavior construed as appropriate to men. Gender differences remain, as do difference in religious behavior. Increasingly, though, religions and their leaders and adherents recognize that difference does not require labeling certain roles or behaviors as inherently superior to or better than others. Rather, just as men and women are biologically different, they may be religious in different ways.

Charles H. Lippy

See also Gender; Globalization; Rites of Passage; Sexuality; Women’s Roles

Further Readings

- Capps, D. (2002). Men and their religion: Honor, hope, and humor. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press.
- Culbertson, P. L. (1992). New Adam: The future of male spirituality. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress.
- Haddad, Y. Y., & Esposito, J. L. (Eds.). (1998). Islam, gender, and social change. New York: Oxford University Press.
- King, U. (Ed.). (1995). Religion and gender. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.
- Lippy, C. H. (2005). Do real men pray? Images of the Christian man in White Protestant America. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press.

MESOAMERICAN RELIGIONS

Mesoamerica, the area of Mexico and northern Central America, encompasses a diverse region that developed complex societies. The civilizations of ancient Mesoamerica include Olmec, Teotihuacan, Tula, Mixtec and Zapotec, Maya, and Aztec. While these civilizations differed from one another, they shared similar polytheistic belief systems that focused on veneration of the natural world. All Mesoamerican cultures recognized the vitality of the world around them and were animistic, believing that the earth and all of the elements of the natural world had spiritual power. They understood the world as having two important components: (1) the material world that humans live in and (2) the spiritual world. Unlike Western ways of thought, however, the two worlds were not separated; rather, they worked together symbiotically and were completely interchangeable. The Mesoamericans also venerated their ancestors and believed that they had the capacity to communicate with their ancestors and supernaturals by journeying between the worlds. Unlike the character of religion in Europe and the Old World, Mesoamerican civilizations did not have religious institutions, because the belief systems, ceremonies, and rituals were intrinsically linked with politics, economics, and kingship. Since there is no direct textual written record that reveals Mesoamerican religious beliefs, scholars use pictorial codices, alphabetic ethnohistories, and material culture to interpret ancient Mesoamerican thought.

Olmec

The Olmec, the first complex society in Mesoamerica, arose around 1200 BCE. The Olmec region includes the modern Mexican states of Veracruz and Tabasco near the Gulf of Mexico, particularly the sites of San Lorenzo, La Venta, Laguna de los Cerros, and Tres Zapatos. The truncated pyramids acted as the ceremonial centers of these cities. Olmec religion was primarily an extension of agricultural practices; the Olmec venerated ancestors and food plants, and ceremonies tended to follow hydrological cycles. A number of figurines and mosaics have been excavated in the Olmec region, suggesting the spiritual importance of the earth and the underworld.

Olmec rulers were spiritual leaders because they were likely to be shamans as well as rulers, acting as intermediaries between the human and spiritual worlds. This is exemplified in stone monuments at the site of La Venta, which depict rulers in niches that represent caves in the shape of jaguar maws that act as entrances to the underworld. These monuments are cosmological models visualizing the Olmec ruler as the interface between the natural and supernatural realms. In addition, Olmec iconography and myth indicate spiritual and ancestral ties between humans and jaguars. The artistic combinations of animal and human forms, including jaguars, birds, and reptiles, demonstrate the importance of shamanism. Ascribing human characteristics to inanimate objects, animals, or natural phenomena is known as anthropomorphism. The attribution of animal characteristics or qualities to a deity is known as zoomorphism.

Teotihuacan

The civilization that centered on Teotihuacan flourished between 100 and 700 CE in central Mexico. The Pyramid of the Sun and the Pyramid of the Moon are the principal ceremonial structures at Teotihuacan. They echo the natural environment, and both fall along the major axis of the site, which was named the Street of the Dead by archaeologists. This street has a series of ascending and descending platforms that may have had ceremonial functions, acting as sites for various public rituals.

Religion at Teotihuacan emphasized the natural world, especially the importance of water and caves. There is a cave within the Pyramid of the Sun, and its location and form were important in the founding, planning, and ritual life of Teotihuacan. The cave was considered a religious and mythical center, or axis mundi, and was understood to be a place of creation and emergence. The offerings and evidence of ritual activity there indicate that it may have functioned as an oracle.

The most prominent deities at Teotihuacan were depicted as a feathered serpent (Quetzalcoatl), a goggle-eyed deity (Tlaloc), and the "Great Goddess." Quetzalcoatl and Tlaloc figure prominently in sculpture on the Temple of the Feathered Serpent in the complex called the Ciudadela. The Great Goddess, however, is often represented in mural painting. For example, the Tepantitla patio mural depicts this deity with droplets of water streaming from her hands and plants adorned with butterflies and spiders sprouting from her head. Below the goddess, dynamic individuals move among mountain and water imagery. Thus, the Great Goddess is associated with fertility and renewal.

Small ceramic mold-made figurines are found in great abundance at Teotihuacan. They were mass produced, and many had articulated limbs. It is likely that they were used for ritual purposes at the household level.

Tula

Tula was a site in the Central Highlands of Mexico that flourished between 900 and 1150 CE. Tula's ceremonial precinct was a rectangular plaza. The images in and around the plaza indicate that several major deities were venerated there. As at Teotihuacan, ritual practices and visual culture at Tula provided inspiration for much of Aztec religion; thus, prevalent Tula deities are identified with Aztec names. These deities include Tlaloc, Quetzalcoatl, Tezcatlipoca, Ehecatl (“Wind Deity”), Xipe Totec (“The Flayed One”), Tlazolteotl (“Filth Deity”), Xochiquetzal (“Flower Quetzal”), and Itzpapalotl (“Obsidian Butterfly”). Deities were widely disseminated in Mesoamerica and were often borrowed, reinvented, and renamed by subsequent cultures. According to Aztec mythology, Quetzalcoatl peacefully ruled the people at Tula as a priest-king until Tezcatlipoca tricked him into getting intoxicated and sleeping with his sister. Quetzalcoatl left Tula in shame, sailing away to the east but vowing to return someday.

As at Teotihuacan, a number of mold-made ceramic figurines have been found in domestic contexts at Tula. It is possible that these figurines were used in household rituals.

Mixtec and Zapotec

The Mixtec and Zapotec flourished in the Valley of Oaxaca between 600 and 1000 CE. Mixtec historical codices recount dynastic alliances, achievements of important individuals, and conflicts. Religious images were primarily depicted in monumental sculpture and as a part of the architecture rather than in the codices. The iconography at the site of Monte Albán included a number of images of deities representing the natural elements: lightning, wind, clouds, hail, and rain. In addition, there are also a number of maize deities depicted. While it was likely that they also believed in a supreme creator deity, no visual references to this deity exist.

Maya

The Mayan region includes southern Mexico, Honduras, Belize, and Guatemala. Although the archaeological record shows that the Mayan region has been inhabited for 10,000–12,000 years, the Mayan civilization that built the renowned pyramids and stele and had elaborate calendar and writing systems began to rise around 250 BCE.

As Maya society developed into highly structured city-states, the Mayan religion became a key component of Maya culture.

In Mayan mythology, there are three domains of the world: (1) the heavens, (2) the Middleworld that humans inhabit, and (3) the Underworld in the core of the earth. These three domains are described in the colonial period written record of the Quiché Popol Vuh, as well as being a part of the oral tradition that has been recorded in ethnographic studies of this region. The ancient Maya believed that the Middleworld, where humans reside, floated on the back of a caiman or a turtle in a sea that had existed since the beginning of time. The Underworld, or Xibalba, was also known as the Otherworld; it looked like the Middleworld, with a similar landscape and structures, and could be visited in trance by Mayan rulers or spiritual leaders. These three regions were not distinct and mutually exclusive but constantly alive and dynamic because they had sacred power.

The Popol Vuh is the Mayan creation myth, which tells of the beginning of the Mayan world through the efforts of many humans and deities, who worked together and acted as a cohesive team. It recounts the founding gods who brought the earth into being by raising it up out of a watery place and giving it plants and animals. In the cosmogonic process, the world was created, destroyed, and then re-created on at least three separate occasions before the present time period, or the current creation. The story focuses on the adventures of the twin boys Hunahpu and Xbalanque as they venture into Xibalba to avenge the death of their father, known as First Father, who was killed by the Lords of Death. While in Xibalba, the twins use their wits to defeat the evil gods and endure a series of difficult tests. As a result of their triumph, the Mayan rulers were created. Overarching themes of the Popol Vuh include sustenance and cyclical patterns of death and regeneration.

The Popol Vuh, in describing the twins’ quest, also describes the three domains of the Mayan world. The Maya understood their world to be on an axis that included all three domains and followed the path of the sun. Each of the four cardinal directions had a bird, a tree, a color, and a god associated with the domains. The heavens had 13 layers, and the Underworld had 9 layers, with each layer having a different god. In addition, each god had rituals associated with him or her. The four directions converged in the Middleworld, and through this axis grew the Wakab-Chan, or World Tree. The World Tree went through all three domains, with its branches in the heavens, its trunk in the Middleworld, and its roots in the Underworld. The most commonly used motif throughout the Mayan region, the image of the World Tree can be seen today on numerous stele, in frescos, and on architectural structures.

The World Tree could materialize in nature or could be embodied by the ruler. There was an association between the World Tree and life and renewal, as well as a tie to noble ancestral lineage. Mayan spiritual ideology, in which only the rulers and appointed spiritual leaders in a state of trance could pass between the Otherworld and Middleworld, also helped define a political ideology that set the nobles apart from the commoners. When the ruler communicated with the Otherworld, he was represented by two distinct images: (1) the vision serpent, which is the image of a serpent rising out of a bloodletting bowl with a human ancestor coming out of its mouth and (2) a double-headed serpent bar, which is the image of a bar with a serpent deity on either end. Thus, there was a direct connection between the ruler and the spiritual world.

Mayan histories, genealogies, and information about astronomy, deities, and rituals were recorded in codices, or folded books. In addition to the Popol Vuh, other surviving texts about Mayan spirituality include the Annals of the Kaqchikel, the Rabinal Achi, the Ritual of the Bakabs, and the Books of the Chilam Balam. Spiritual leaders were responsible for understanding the calendar and astronomy as well as ritual activity. Agricultural rites and various ceremonies took place throughout the year to ensure bounty, health, and success. These sacred rituals included autosacrifice by piercing the ears, cheeks, lips, tongue, and penis; spattering the blood onto paper; and then burning the paper. They also sometimes included human sacrifice. At Yaxchilan, the lintels of Shield Jaguar and Lady Xoc visually refer to the spiritual and ceremonial responsibilities of the Mayan rulers, especially those having to do with autosacrifice. In the first lintel, Shield Jaguar stands over Lady Xoc as she pulls a rope of thorns through her tongue. In the second lintel, a vision serpent rises out of Lady Xoc's blood sacrifice. Sacrifices allowed rulers to maintain their authority, attain visions, and communicate with ancestors and deities.

Aztec

The Aztecs thrived between 1325 and 1521 CE in central Mexico. The Aztec religion was closely associated with the state and appropriated cultural aspects from Olmec, Tula, and Teotihuacan. This state religion likely coexisted with older vernacular traditions such as ancestor veneration, but public ceremonies, monumental public art and architecture, and a strict hierarchy of authorities helped centralize the formal religion. However, the religion of the populace and philosophical speculation were also prevalent in Aztec society.

Like other Mesoamerican cultures, Aztecs believed that time is cyclical and that the present world is one in a series. For the Aztecs, the four previous worlds were catastrophically destroyed, and the present age is the fifth world. Humans were re-created in the fifth world by the gods, who mixed the bones of human ancestors with the blood of the gods. Humans repaid the debt to the gods by offering them blood sacrifice in the form of autosacrifice or human or animal sacrifice, thereby ensuring that the sun would continue to rise.

According to Aztec mythology, the Aztec people began a mythohistoric migration from Aztlan, or the place of the seven caves, led by their patron deity Huitzilopochtli ("Hummingbird on the Left"). When they saw a sign from Huitzilopochtli, an eagle with a snake in its beak perched on a cactus that grew out of a rock, they settled on a marshy island in the middle of Lake Texcoco in the valley of Mexico. This sacred place became the Aztec city of Tenochtitlán.

Tenochtitlán's Templo Mayor was the locus of the Aztec religion and functioned as a ceremonial platform. It was also the primary site for human sacrifice. The initial stage of this building was built in 1325 CE, but it was enlarged at least seven times. Smaller twin temples capped the structure, with the southern side dedicated to Huitzilopochtli and the northern side dedicated to Tlaloc. These dual temples indicated that the Templo Mayor was symbolically connected to the sun as well as war, tribute, and renewal. Monumental sculpture, figurines of deities, beads, animal skeletons, marine artifacts, ceramic jars, and the remains of sacrificial victims have been found at the Templo Mayor.

Aztec ideology included ideas of dualism, fluid reality, nepantla, and animism. Duality involved the oppositional but complementary forces of life and death, inside and outside, and ideas and representation. However, these categories existed in a fluid reality, consistent with the belief in the transitory nature of reality. The Aztecs believed that their world had dynamism, equilibrium, and ephemerality and it was their responsibility to find a balance. Nepantla (in the middle) was a negotiation of positions in which oppositions and complements were recognized and moderated.

The Aztecs believed that there were animating forces inside their bodies as well as in the natural world. There were different levels of animacy, with deities as highly animate entities, followed by planets and stars, the elements, humans, and animals. The Aztecs used the term teotl to talk about the supernatural, whereas they used the term teixiptla to describe manifestations or images of a teotl, which could be embodied by human beings in the forms of impersonators or in sculptures or painted images. The Aztecs were responsible for the ritual activities that surrounded these physical representations.

Religious specialists were appointed officials in charge of ceremonies and shamanic functions in monumental ceremonial buildings. They were also dedicated to worship and the care of specific temples. Men trained to be religious specialists at a young age, learning Aztec myths and preparing for their duties. These duties included performing of rituals, overseeing monthly ceremonies, preparing for the New Fire Ceremony that took place every 52 years, caring for idols and sacred objects, purifying temples, teaching, and reading sacred books. Like the Maya, Aztec religious specialists and diviners used illustrated texts for spiritual purposes. The Codex Borgia is a divinatory text in which the images and their placements are important for their understanding. The Codex Fejérváry-Mayer is also a divinatory text that depicts an abstract map of time and space. Religious specialists and diviners also specialized in reading and understanding the calendar of 260 days.

After the Conquest

The Spanish conquered the Aztecs in 1521 and the Maya in 1697. In 16th-century Mesoamerica, conquest and conversion went hand in hand. This was apparent by the number of missionaries, mainly Franciscans and Dominicans, who closely followed the Spanish conquistadors, and the conquistadors who took it on themselves to spread Christianity to the New World. Catholicism was deeply embedded in the Spanish cultural and political systems, and those who believed otherwise were not tolerated. Catholic ideology legitimized invasion because, in the midst of conquering and dominating the people, land, and resources, the Spaniards saw themselves as doing God's work by spreading Christianity. By 1620, the viceroy was the religious leader in New Spain, giving him a significant amount of power over the indigenous populations.

The missionaries began their work by converting the native people to Catholicism as quickly as possible. Churches were also built rapidly after the conquest, and they were often located on top of demolished platforms of native pyramids. Native idols, images, and texts were destroyed, and patron deities were often replaced by patron saints with similar characteristics. Points of convergence between the two religions were used to make Catholicism more understandable to the native converts. These similarities included a formal priesthood, sacred rites for various stages of life, and the importance of the body and blood of a sacrificial victim.

Ultimately, Catholicism was very different from any Mesoamerican religion: It was exclusive, fixed, and intolerant of other religions or thoughts. A monotheistic religion, Catholicism emphasized the difference between good and evil. Conversion to Catholicism in colonial Mesoamerica required a change in values, customs, and worldviews, as well as participation in Catholic rites and rituals. Often, conversion in the Americas was not necessarily a sign of capitulation, either political or religious; it was a survival technique, a sort of cultural self-defense, yet it developed into a reinvention of Christianity, which also accommodated traditional practices and beliefs.

Elizabeth Aguilera

See also Ancestors; Aztecs; Indigenous Religions; Material Culture; Mexico; Mexico City; Roman Catholicism; Shamanism

Further Readings

- Benson, E. P. (Ed.). (1981). Mesoamerican sites and world-views. Washington, DC: Dumbarton Oaks.
- Boone, E. H. (2007). Cycles of time and meaning in the Mexican books of fate. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Burkhart, L. (1989). The slippery earth: Nabua Christian moral dialogue in sixteenth century Mexico. Tucson: University of Arizona Press.
- Carrasco, D. (1990). Religions of Mesoamerica: Cosmovision and ceremonial centers. San Francisco: Harper & Row.
- Coe, M. (Ed.). (1995). The Olmec world: Ritual and rulership. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University, Art Museum.
- Freidel, D., Schele, L., & Parker, J. (1993). Maya cosmos: Three thousand years on the shaman's path. New York: Perennial.
- Miller, M., & Taube, K. (1993). An illustrated dictionary of the gods and symbols of ancient Mexico and the Maya. London: Thames & Hudson.
- Sahagún, B. (1950–1982). Florentine codex: General history of the things of New Spain [1575–1578] (A. J. O. Anderson & C. E. Dibble, Trans.). Santa Fe, NM: School of American Research.
- Tedlock, D. (1996). Popul Vuh: The Mayan book of the dawn of life. New York: Simon & Schuster.

MEXICAN CONCHEROS

The term concheros is derived from concha, the name of the musical stringed instrument that Mexican dancers use. Regardless of their precise origin, concheros have been performing with their colorful garments for a long time in the atriums of the Catholic churches of several cities and towns in the center of Mexico. In recent decades, their costumes, musical instruments, and ideology have undergone a transformation and a great expansion within Mexico itself, in the United States, and in Spain.

The concheros are organized in brotherhoods called mesas (tables), referring to the altar around which many of their ceremonies are performed. On this altar are placed the images of their revered Catholic saints and other sacred objects. This altar, or oratorio, is in the home of the “captain” or leader of the mesa. They are hierarchically organized, following a military pattern: captain, sergeant, alferez, soldiers, malinches or censors (a rank held only by women), and a few generals.

They have two types of rituals: (1) the dance, which is diurnal and public, and (2) the velación (wake), which takes place privately at the captain’s oratory, usually in the night before the dance, and which includes a ritual called the “spreading of the flower” while praises, accompanied by conchas, are sung. The following day, without any sleep, they go to the church to dance the whole day.

The concheros of Mexico City have to go to dance yearly, at least in five shrines placed at the cardinal points plus a center at Saint James’s Church in Tlatelolco. Saint James is considered the “patron of the four winds.” These four shrines are (1) the Virgin of Guadeloupe, (2) the Christ of Chalma’s (a famous place of pilgrimage), (3) Our Lady of Los Remedios, and (4) the Christ of Amecameca.

In Chalma, the concheros stay for several days, where they dance and take part in several other rituals. They also have a sort of assembly where they discuss matters related to their mesas or elect new generals.

Each mesa celebrates its own patron saint with a velación and a dance, inviting the members of other mesas as a net of reciprocal “obligations.”

In the past few decades, many of the conchero costumes have changed. The old conchero dress for both men and women, which is still worn by some groups, was a long skirt and a shirt and a headdress made of colored ostrich feathers. The Aztec dress, copying the ancient garment used by the Mexica, was introduced around the 1940s, and many mesas, especially the ones called Aztec, have adopted it. Drums have become popular instruments. Rules have relaxed. To become a conchero, there were very strict rules, which if not followed, resulted in severe punishment.

No longer confined to poor, uneducated people, the ideology and social composition of the concheros has changed; now influenced by New Age thinking and the Mexicanidad (“Mexican-ness”) movement, which has also appropriated the dance, arguing that it is of pre-Hispanic origin, and instead of dancing for the saints, they dance for the pre-Hispanic gods.

Yolotl González Torres

See also Guadeloupe; Indigenous Religions; Mesoamerican Religions; Mexico; Mexico City; Native Latin American Religion

Further Readings

- González Torres, Y. (2005). Danza tu palabra: La danza de los concheros [Dance your word: Dance of the Concheros]. San Rafael, Mexico: Plaza y Valdés Editores, CONACULTA, Instituto Nacional de Antropología e Historia.
- Stone, M. (1975). At the sign of midnight: The Concheros dance cult of Mexico. Tucson: University of Arizona Press.

MEXICO

Mexico is characterized by a historical paradox. It is a North American country with a large Catholic majority known for the vitality of its popular religiosity and a powerful Catholic Church, which has profoundly penetrated the social and private lives of the population. At the same time, Mexico is a Latin American nation that has undergone the most radical process of laicism and of separation of church and state.

Spanish Colonization and Evangelization

The historical process of the development of Mexican Catholicism, which is rooted in the Spanish colonization, explains the paradox. The Catholic Church was one of the pillars of the colonial order, from the 16th century to the beginning of the 19th century, and expanded during this period with the evangelization of the indigenous peoples and the development of a racially mixed (mestizo) society. As a parallel development, indigenous resistance to Spanish evangelization and the clergy's structural deficit favored the genesis of a religious syncretism that articulated autochthonous elements with the Catholic faith and prospered in mestizo and indigenous society. The Catholic Church motivated the construction of this religious syncretism, which was contained by the end of evangelization and was constitutive of popular Mexican religiosity. The latter was tamed by the Catholic clergy, exceeding, nonetheless, its capacity for social and territorial control. The most important expression of this popular Catholicism, which precisely characterizes the aforementioned ambiguities, is the cult of the Virgin of Guadeloupe. The popular and syncretic dimensions of the cult are seen to justify the perennial assertion that Mexicans are, more than being Catholics, "Guadalupanos." Nevertheless, the Catholic Church itself established the cult. According to the legend, the Virgin appeared to Juan Diego five times between December 9 and 12, 1531, which was affirmed by Bishop Zumarraga, thus symbolically sealing the pact of adherence of the indigenous population to the Catholic faith.

Catholic Church and Mexican State

Beginning with Mexican independence in 1821, the Catholic Church was challenged by demands by liberals for the separation of church and state, which culminated in the Juárez reforms of 1859 to 1860. The reform was based on the lay concept of a nonconfessional state, legitimized by the principle of popular sovereignty and guarantee of pluralism of religious and civic convictions. Despite their considerable minority status, Protestants and Freemasons exercised an important role in the development of Mexican liberalism. The Mexican Revolution of 1910 assumed the lay legacy of the liberals, which led to a confrontation with the Catholic Church in the Cristero War of 1926 to 1929. The Catholic opposition to the revolutionary state was motivated by ecclesiastical sectors but constituted an active popular movement in the central area of the country, particularly in the highlands of Jalisco, where the level of violence frightened the clergy. Subsequent negotiations between the state and the Catholic Church initiated a long period of Church exclusion from the public sphere and limitation of the clergy's civic rights, the extent of which even contradicted the lay principle of state neutrality in religious affairs. The constitutional reforms of 1992 restored some of the clergy's civic rights and sought to improve guarantees of freedom of religion, thereby reducing the schism between church and state while also responding to the increased religious pluralization of the country. However, laicism remains the distinctive feature of Mexican cultural and political institutions despite the fears raised by the ascension of the National Action Party (Partido Acción Nacional, PAN), whose affinity with the Catholic Church is notorious, to the presidency in 2000.

Religion and Secularization

The Catholic Church's social importance contrasts with its political weakness. Accordingly, some observers see in Mexico a case of national schizophrenia due to the high level of laicism in its public life, which is encouraged by the political elite, and the low level of secularization of the society, particularly at lower socioeconomic levels. This idea should be relativized; there have also been processes of separation of the mundane and religious spheres as well as processes of rationalization and pluralization of social life, albeit limited, without which this laity would not have been possible. Furthermore, as some observers have noted, the Catholic Church's capacity for social control must not be underestimated. The imperfect restraint of popular Catholicism explains, in part, its political weakness.

The Pluralism of Mexican Catholicism

Finally, the pluralism of Mexican Catholicism should be considered; this oscillates between conservative, even integrationist, positions, such as the Legion of Christ and the Yunque, the latter being active within the PAN; a moderate opposition, also linked with the PAN, which attempted to reconcile their Christian ideal of society with the values of progress and democracy; and sectors identified with the social radicalism of Liberation Theology. Mexican Liberation Theologians shared the Latin American postulations of a theology that denounced the complicity between the Catholic Church and the prevailing sociopolitical order; they were also firmly situated in the continuity of the traditional Catholic opposition to the revolutionary state, demanding, in this sense, a greater political commitment. Additionally, they revived the Cristero ambition of mobilizing the popular religion but from the perspective of revolutionary socialism and in open breach with the social control of the Catholic Church. Yet they never ceased being agents of the church, diminishing their capacity for popular mobilization; furthermore, their political commitment was restricted to building civil movements, due to the constitutional prohibitions. Nonetheless, in the intellectual tradition of Liberation Theology, the "autochthonous Church" project of the San Cristobal de las Casas diocese, active in the indigenous communities of Chiapas, produced important sociopolitical effects, contributing to the Zapatista uprising of 1994.

Religious Pluralization

The social strength of popular religion in Mexico is historically linked, but always irreducible, to Catholicism. Today, that strength exceeds the limits of the Catholic world. Contemporary religion in Mexico is marked, as in other parts of the region, by the erosion of Catholic hegemony and the growth of new churches, mainly evangelical and Pentecostal. According to the INEGI (Instituto Nacional Estadística y Geografía) Census of 2000, the Catholic population in Mexico is still officially 88%, but the erosion is more pronounced in southern states such as Quintana Roo (73.17%), Campeche (71.28%), Tabasco (70.45%), and especially Chiapas (63.87%). In contrast, Catholic hegemony remains solid in the central-northern states, such as Guanajuato (96.41%), Aguascalientes (95.64%), Jalisco (95.39%), Queretaro (95.27%), Zacatecas (95.13%), and Michoacan (94.76%). Explanations for this religious diversification are varied and occasionally contradictory. The deregulation of religion is certainly an effect of globalization, exacerbated in Mexico by migration to the United States and the effectiveness of a religious proselytism that alternates marketing strategies with contact work. Deregulation is also a sui generis phenomenon that, confronted with the effects of globalization, responds to the necessity of social solidarity and mobility within vulnerable groups. Moreover, this religious recomposition responds to the increased pluralization of Mexican society and the country's shift toward democracy. Even when many churches adopt an attitude of separation from modern values, their growth is an expression of the relative social autonomy from traditional religious control. Previously, there existed reciprocity between the hegemonies represented by the revolutionary state and the Catholic Church in the public and private spheres, respectively. Political deregulation, accentuated in Chiapas by the impact of the local conflict and the Central American civil wars, has contributed to the loss of the Catholic Church's hegemony. Finally, the map of this religious change reflects the social dynamic of Mexican popular religiosity. Erosion has been very limited in areas where mestizo culture predominates and where the Catholic Church's social and territorial control have traditionally been the most effective; in the poorer southern states, characterized by important indigenous populations and notable structural weaknesses of the Catholic Church, the erosion is accentuated.

Malik Tahar Chaouch

See also Guadeloupe; Latin America; Mesoamerican Religions; Mexico City; Native Latin American Religion; North America; Roman Catholicism; Secularization

Further Readings

- Bastian, J. P. (1989). Historia y sociedad en América Latina. Los disidentes: sociedades protestantes y revolución en México, 1872–1911 [History and society in Latin America. The dissidents: Protestant societies and revolution in Mexico, 1872–1911]. Mexico City: Colegio de México, Fondo de Cultura Económica.
- Bastian, J. P. (1997). Los efectos sociales y políticos de la desregulación religiosa en México [The social and political effects of religious deregulation in Mexico]. Eslabones. Revista Semestral de Estudios Regionales, 14, 16–27.
- Blancarte, R. (1992). Historia de la Iglesia católica en México [History of the Catholic Church in Mexico]. Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica.
- Blancarte, R. (2001). Laicidad y secularización en México [Laicization and secularization in Mexico]. Estudios Sociológicos, 19(57), 843–855.
- Blancarte, R. (2004). Entre la fe y el poder: política y religión en México [Between faith and power: Politics and religion in Mexico]. Barcelona, Spain: Grijalbo.
- Giménez, G. (Ed.). (1996). Identidades religiosas y sociales en México [Religious and social identities in Mexico]. Mexico City: IIS-UNAM.
- Legorreta Díaz, M. C. (1998). Religión, política y guerrilla en las Cañadas de la Selva Lacandona [Religion, politics, and war in las Cañadas de la Selva Lacandona]. Mexico City: Cal y Arena.
- Loeza, S. (1985). Notas para el estudio de la Iglesia en el México contemporáneo [Notes for the study of the Church in contemporary Mexico]. In C. A. Reilly & M. De la Rosa (Eds.), Religión y política en México (pp. 42–58). Mexico City: Siglo XXI.
- Loeza, S. (1999). El PAN: la larga marcha, 1939–1994. Oposición leal y partido de protesta [PAN: The long march, 1939–1994. Loyal opposition and the party of protest]. Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica.
- Martin, D. (1990). Tongues of fire: The explosion of Protestantism in Latin America. Oxford, UK: Basil Blackwell.
- Meyer, J. (1973–1975). La Cristiada (3 vols.). Mexico City: Siglo XXI.
- Meyer, J. (2000). Samuel Ruiz en San Cristóbal [Samuel Ruiz in San Cristóbal]. Mexico City: Editorial Tusquets.
- Reyes Heróles, J. (1988). El liberalismo mexicano [Mexican liberalism]. Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica.
- Rivera Farfan, C. (Ed.). (2005). Diversidad religiosa y conflicto en Chiapas [Religious diversity and conflict in Chiapas]. Mexico City: CIESAS/UNAM.
- Stoll, D. (1990). Is Latin America turning Protestant? The politics of evangelical growth. Berkeley: University of California Press.

MEXICO CITY

Mexico City is a global city, affected by the growing transnationalism of the world, and a vital cultural center where the history of the Americas and the expansion of Western religions can be traced. Known in Spanish as La Ciudad de México, Mexico City is home to more than 19 million residents throughout 14,869 square miles (1 mile = 1.609 kilometers). As Mexico City also houses the Federal District of Mexico (Distrito Federal, D.F.), it holds the seat of powers for Mexico's union of 31 states.

History of Mexico City

Prior to the arrival of Europeans, the area where Mexico City is now located was known as Tenochtitlán. The establishment of the city is linked to an ancient prophetic vision that held that a city would be founded on the site where an eagle devouring a snake and perched on a cactus was located. On March 18, 1325, this prophecy was fulfilled by the Mexican peoples of the Aztec Empire on the island of lake Texcoco. This prophetic vision is commemorated through an illustration of the eagle, the snake, and the cactus on the national flag of Mexico.

In spite of the swampy terrain, the Mexica displayed a rather innovative show of technological ability by creating a foundation for the city through a system of floating lands that would gradually take root in shallow waters.

Though Tenochtitlán grew to become the largest thriving city in Mesoamerica, the turn of the 16th century brought about an unexpected change in the civilization of the Aztec Empire. In 1519, the Spanish conquistador Hernán Cortés de Monroy y Pizarro arrived on the shores of the present-day Yucatan Peninsula. By 1521, Cortés and his forces had successfully conquered Tenochtitlán. The new Spanish territory—inclusive of the former Tenochtitlán—was renamed the Vierreinato de Nueva España (“Viceroyalty of New Spain”).

It is widely accepted that the indigenous peoples of the Americas were brutally beaten and terrorized during the years following Cortés’s conquest. Despite the religious influence that followed from the Roman Catholic Church, for the next three centuries much of the native population was destroyed through disease and maltreatment.

The years that followed brought revolution and independence from Spain in 1821, a war with the United States between 1846 and 1848, a brief monarchy from 1864 to 1867, an internal revolution from 1910 to 1920, and the Cristero religious conflict from 1926 to 1929. Notwithstanding these events, Mexico City has survived well into the 21st century as major cultural, economic, and industrial city in Latin America.

Culture of Religion in Mexico City

After the Spanish conquest, the majority of the indigenous religions were suppressed. As the colonization of Mexico by the Spanish Empire expanded, the Roman Catholic Church also established its presence, which is still evident today. According to recent census data, nearly 90% of the religious population in Mexico is Roman Catholic.

The Virgin of Guadeloupe

Very few cultural icons are as evocative of Mexican identity as La Virgen de Guadalupe (The Virgin of Guadeloupe). As a religious symbol, the Virgin represents the inclusivity of the indigenous ancestry nearly erased during the Spanish conquest. In contrast to a European depiction, the Virgin of Guadeloupe is often portrayed with darker, indigenous features, reflecting the ethnic, racial, and national mixture of Mexican history.

On December 12, 1531, Juan Diego Cuauhtlatoczin (or Juan Diego) is reported to have encountered a young woman whom he believed to be the Virgin Mary in the village of Guadeloupe, just outside Mexico City. According to Diego, the young woman requested that a church be built on the site where she appeared, and when Diego conveyed the request to the local bishop-elect, Juan de Zumárraga, he responded by asking that Diego provide certain proof of the apparition.

Diego returned to the site and conveyed Zumárraga’s request to the Virgin Mary. The Virgin directed Diego to collect a bouquet of rare and out-of-season Castilian roses and take them to Zumárraga, and before doing so, the Virgin arranged the flowers in Diego’s tilmàtli (or cloak, an apron-like piece of cloth made from maguey cactus material). When Diego presented the tilmàtli to Zumárraga, an imprinted image of the Virgin appeared on it.

Over time, the apparition was scrutinized as an event with unofficial recognition because of Zumárraga’s status as bishop-elect. In addition, further criticism ensued about framing the event as a conversion ploy on the part of the Spanish. This argument held that the story of the apparition was manufactured to convert indigenous peoples to Catholicism, citing the similarities between the appearance of the Virgin and the local Aztec goddess Tonantzin—a goddess who was associated with the site where the Virgin appeared to Diego.

Regardless of the subsequent interpretations, the Virgin of Guadeloupe has been memorialized through two architectural constructions. From 1531 to 1709, construction of a shrine named Templo Expiatorio a Cristo Rey (“Church of Expiation to Christ the King”) took place to commemorate the apparition. After Pope Pius X bestowed the title of basilica on the shrine in 1904, the site soon became an unofficial place of pilgrimage for many Roman Catholics. However, due to the gradual submersion of much of the Mexico City basin—a consequence of the original foundation having been built on the swampy area near the 14th-century Lake Texcoco—the basilica was closed in 1974, to make way for the construction of a new basilica. In 1976, the new basilica was completed, and some 471 years after the apparition, Juan Diego Cuauhtlatoatzin was canonized as a saint in 2002.

The Day of the Dead

The Day of the Dead (El Día de los Muertos), a cultural celebration honoring the deceased, embodies two distinct religious traditions that emerged prior to the first interactions between the Americas and Europe. In the indigenous tradition at the time of the Spanish conquest, the Aztecs observed a monthlong celebration for the dead through the worship of the goddess Mictecacihuatl, Queen of the Underworld. Similarly, in the European tradition, the contiguous 2-day celebration from All Saints' Day to All Souls' Day honors the passing of beatified saints and nonbeatified souls, respectively. Celebrated on November 1 and/or 2, the Day of the Dead coincides with All Saints' Day and All Souls' Day, thus integrating a synchronization of these two traditions and thereby making their original forms much less discernible.

The Day of the Dead is truly a global event. The synchronization of pre-European culture and the religious practices of European arrivals demonstrates how the history of the Day of the Dead celebration encompasses an intergeographical and cultural merger, where both original forms of celebrating death and dying have given rise to a new tradition within a global context. In addition, the cultural maintenance and movement of this new tradition, due in part to the political remapping of Mexico's borders in the late 19th century and the migration patterns of Mexicans during the 20th and early 21st centuries, the Day of the Dead event suggests further transnationalization.

Salvador Jiménez Murguía

See also Aztecs; Global Cities; Guadeloupe; Indigenous Religions; Latin America; Los Angeles; Mesoamerican Religions; Mexico; North America

Further Readings

Berdan, F. F. (1982). The Aztecs of Central Mexico: An imperial society. Orlando, FL: Harcourt Brace.

Fuentes, C. (1992). The buried mirror: Reflections on Spain and the New World. New York: Houghton Mifflin.

Joseph, G. M., & Henderson, T. J. (Eds.). (2002). The Mexico reader: History, culture, politics (The Latin American Readers). Durham, NC: Duke University Press.

Leon-Portillo, M. (2007). Broken spears: The Aztec account of the conquest of Mexico. Boston: Beacon.

Ruiz, R. E. (1992). Triumphs and tragedy: A history of the Mexican people. New York: W. W. Norton.

Sassen, S. (2000). The global city: New York, London, Tokyo (Rev. ed.). Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

MICRONESIA

Micronesia (formally called the Federated States of Micronesia) covers an area within what is known as Oceania and includes a number of islands within the western Pacific Ocean, including Saipan, Guam, the Marshall Islands, the Caroline Islands, and others. Melanesia lies to its south, while to its east is Polynesia. To the west lie the Philippines.

Christianity is the most practiced religion in Micronesia. A number of Protestant and Roman Catholic churches are found in each Micronesian state. The majority of Protestants are direct descendants of the original American Congregationalists who came to Micronesia to engage in missionary activities. For example, in Kosrae, one of the islands within the chain, the population is around 8,000, with 95% Protestants. In Pohnpei, there are 35,000 inhabitants, with an even split between those calling themselves Protestant and those stating that they are Roman Catholic.

On the islands of Chuuk and Yap, approximately 60% of churchgoers are Roman Catholic, whereas the remaining 40% attend Protestant services. Religious organizations with adherents in Micronesia include the Protestant groups, Baptists, the Pentecostals (primarily found within the Assembly of God), and the Seventh-Day Adventists, as well as other beliefs not classified as Protestant or Roman Catholic, that is, Jehovah's Witnesses, Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and the Baha'i Faith (a monotheistic faith founded in Persia during the 1800s). One can also find a minor enclave of Buddhists on Ponhepi. Members of the various churches often attend ceremonies; thus, the churches perform a crucial function in Micronesian society.

During the last decade of the 19th century in Ponhepi, quarrels arose between the various faiths and their missionaries, which caused religious partitions that are still visible today. For example, individuals living in the western side of Ponhepi tend to be Protestant, whereas Roman Catholics primarily inhabit the eastern side. In today's world, missionaries from a number of denominations are free to travel and spread their faith anywhere within Micronesia. One primary reason for this freedom comes from the Micronesian constitution, which permits personal autonomy for religious beliefs. While Christianity is the majority religion, indigenous religious beliefs are still adhered to in Yap and in several of the Coral Islands found within the central Carolines.

Before the importation of nonnative religious beliefs, Micronesians worshipped a small number of "high gods" and felt that a great number of spirits performed explicit tasks while protecting particular locales. In addition, they believed that it is possible for dead ancestors and deceased neighbors to make contact with living progeny and friends.

The native islanders believed that there were a varying number of heavens—a common belief throughout Oceania at that time. Ancient myths and folk tales state that the islanders descended from a group of individuals who either were the first to find the islands or took them from the natives originally living there. The Micronesians never believed that supernatural beings were the creators of anything—that is, "God" or a number of "gods" did not create humanity or the world.

Cary Stacy Smith and Li-Ching Hung

See also Guam; Marshall Islands; Northern Mariana Islands; Pacific Islands/Oceania; Philippines

Further Readings

- Hanlon, D. (1998). Remaking Micronesia. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
- Peattie, M. (1988). Nan'Yo: The rise and fall of the Japanese in Micronesia, 1885–1945. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.

MIDDLE EAST

The Middle East refers to the "fertile crescent" between the Nile River basins in the west and the Euphrates and Tigris in the east and historically consists of one of the world's most important regions for the emergence of settled life, cities, state institutions, and civilizations. It is the birthplace of three of the most significant global religions—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, all monotheistic. The Middle East has thus had a global impact on human culture and society and has been influenced by global trends and powers from ancient times. The Nile and its fertile floodplain gave rise to Egyptian civilization beginning around 3500 BCE, which created the world's first imperial orders; and Mesopotamia—which literally means "the area between the two rivers" (Euphrates and Tigris)—became the cradle of the great empires of the Acadians, Sumerians, Babylonians, Assyrians, and Persians. The Middle East has been called the crossroads of the world: Relations between the early civilizations involved wars, crises, treaties, colonies, and trade, producing social, cultural, and religious interactions and influenced from ancient to modern times by imperial expansions from Mesopotamia to Egypt.

Egypt

Egypt is located in the fertile lands of the Nile Valley, surrounded on both sides by deserts. The land along the Nile is divided into two regions: Upper Egypt, in the south, covers the area where the Nile flows from the highlands of East Africa north to the Mediterranean. Lower Egypt is the area of the Nile Delta on the Mediterranean coast. "Egypt is the gift of the Nile," says an Egyptian proverb, marking the Nile's importance for life in this valley. Ancient Egyptian civilization started around 3000 BCE with the Old Kingdom, when phonetic pictographs (hieroglyphs) were first seen. The Pharaoh Menes united the two kingdoms of Upper and Lower Egypt under his central authority in 2900 BCE and made the city of Memphis the capital of his empire. Historians divide ancient Egypt into three ages, ruled in turn by 31 dynasties. The Old Kingdom started in 2660 BCE and ended in 2160 BCE; kings such as Djoser, Snefru, Khufu, Khafre, and Menkaure created an empire of social stability and high achievement in the arts, architecture, literature, mathematics, medicine, and astronomy. The power struggle among principalities dissolved the unity of the Old Kingdom and resulted in a period of independent provincial administrations. After this interval, the Middle Kingdom began circa 2040 BCE with the reunification of Egyptians and lasted until 1785 BCE when the Indo-European Hyksos hordes from the east ended the 12th dynasty's rule in the capital city, Thebes. The Hyksos's domination in Egypt ended in 1552 BCE, followed by the New Kingdom period under the rule of the pharaohs Tutmosis I, Tutmosis III, Queen Hatsephut, Amenhotep IV (Akhenaten), his wife Nefertiti, Tutankhamen, Ramses I, and Ramses III. The New Kingdom's rule expanded to the Levant, and the Kadesh Treaty was signed with the Hittites in 1285 BCE. In the beginning of the first millennium BCE, the New Kingdom was beset by economic crises, social problems, rebellions of subject populations, and attacks by seafaring peoples. From 1070 on, Egypt was ruled by the military in the Lower regions and by the priests of Amon in the Upper regions. In the seventh century BCE, the Egyptians became the vassals of the Assyrian and Persian rules. The Persians were rulers of a disunited Egypt until Alexander the Great conquered it in 332 BCE and brought the Ptolemaic Dynasty to power. Egypt remained under Hellenic culture until 30 CE, when Marcus Antonius and Cleopatra lost the country to the Roman armies.

Ancient Egyptian society organized its social affairs around observances in honor of a number of gods. The belief in Amon-Ra was the center of belief, but numerous other gods also had their places in the afterlife. Because the Egyptian religion focused strongly on ideas of the afterlife, the Egyptians built monuments for their dead and sent the deceased to the afterlife with elaborate rites that included mummifying the corpses and interring with them the belongings they would require in the world beyond. The pyramids were built as elaborate tombs for the kings the Egyptians believed to be earthly gods. Various animal-shaped gods and goddesses embodied ideals of justice, order, and truth. Only the pharaoh Akhenaten, who reigned as Amenhotep IV in the 14th century BCE, embraced a monotheistic religion. Akhenaten's worship of the sun god Aten gained the enmity of the Egyptian clergy, and after his death polytheism returned, aided by the fact that the religion of Aten had produced no body of holy scripture.

Sumeria

Contemporary with the establishment of the Old Kingdom in Egypt, the Sumerians settled in Mesopotamia at the other end of the Middle East and built their civilization of city-states. Unified in and centralized by the first kingdom in 2800 BCE, the Sumerians organized an advanced irrigation system on the Euphrates and Tigris rivers for agricultural development. Mesopotamia was also called Aram Naharayim in the Hebrew Bible, which like its Hellenic-Roman equivalent, meant "the land between two rivers." Trade also developed among the Sumerian cities Ur, Uruk, and Lagash and with neighboring Assyrian and Babylonian cities. The Sumerians also engaged in seafaring commercial activity from their Basra port to the coastlines of the Indian Ocean. Cuneiform writing, perhaps the earliest form of record keeping, originated in the Sumerian city-state Uruk, ruled by the legendary king Gilgamesh. Sumerian society had strong hierarchical differences and was formed by the ruling elite, the clergy, and the producers. The wealthy Sumerian civilization sustained attacks by Akkadian and Elam forces in 2100 BCE, who then took over the rule of Sumerian cities. Northern Mesopotamia was settled by the Assyrians and Babylonians, who established their own warring empires around 1850 BCE. In the first half of the 18th century BCE, the monarch Hammurabi ruled the Babylonians and oversaw the first codification of law, which was named after him. The Assyrians and Babylonians were rivals until Babylonia won over the Assyrians in the seventh century BCE, and Nebuchadnezzar II became king in Babylonia in 605 BCE. The Babylonians reached the Mediterranean in 586 BCE, conquered the indigenous Jewish kingdoms, and exiled the Israelites to Babylonia as slaves. Babylonia was militarily defeated by the Persians in 539 BCE.

Persia and Syria

Northern Mesopotamia was dominated by local kingdoms as well as by the Persians and the Romans in the first millennium BCE. The Persians were Indo-Europeans, or Aryans, including the Parthian, Persian, and Mede masses who had migrated to the Iranian plateau around 1500 BCE. The Medes were the first to establish a kingdom, Media, in the Zagros region. The Parthians and Persians settled in Parsis, along the Persian Gulf. The Achaemenid ruler Cyrus the Great unified the Persian communities under his empire in 550 BCE, making Persepolis its capital. Cyrus, Darius, and Xerxes were the most noteworthy rulers of ancient Persia, expanding the imperial order to Mesopotamia, Anatolia, the Caucasus, Greece, and Egypt. Darius invaded Greece in 490 BCE; the Mede-Greek wars over hegemony in the Eastern Mediterranean lasted for decades. Zoroastrianism, the set of guidelines of the semimythical teacher Zoroaster, was the religion of the ancient Persians. The basic teaching of Zoroastrianism was the cosmic struggle between Ahura Mazda, who represents good, and Ahriman, who represents evil.

The forces of Alexander the Great overcame Persia in 324 BCE; but the Roman Empire became the long-standing rival of the Achaemenids until the third century CE. The Macedonian Alexander died in 323 BCE, and his empire was dissolved, but he left behind Greek culture and language and a Hellenic civilization—the Seleucids in Mesopotamia and in the Fertile Crescent, the Antigonid Dynasty in Asia Minor, and the Ptolemaic Dynasty in Egypt—until it was superseded by Roman rule. Concurrently, the Sassanids succeeded Persian rule in Iran and became the main challenger to the eastern Roman Empire over trade routes to the East.

Mesopotamia was also part of Syria, which geographically extends from the Taurus Mountains in the north to the Sinai Desert in the south, from the Mediterranean in the west to Arabia in the east. The Amorites and Canaanites were among the Semitic masses who settled in Syria in 3000 BCE, and they established city-states and commercial centers such as Byblos and Ugarit. The Palestinian and Aramaic communities came in around the 13th century BCE. The Phoenicians established their port-cities in the 9th century BCE and created a web of land and naval commerce covering the Mediterranean, the Atlantic, and South Africa. The most important Phoenician cities were Tripoli in Lebanon, Phoenicia in Anatolia, and Carthage in Tunisia. Living in Egypt as migrants and emigrating due to social pressures, the Hebrews, or Israelites, were united under King Saul in 1020 BCE and fought against the Canaanites settled on the shores. The peak of Israelite success came during the rule of King David in 1004 BCE, when the kingdom extended from Mesopotamia to the Red Sea and Jerusalem became the capital. David's son, Solomon, came to power in 971 BCE, built the Temple in Jerusalem, and established close political and cultural contacts with the Phoenicians and others, but his tolerance of other religions and cultures created discontent among his own people. After his death in 926 BCE, the kingdom was divided into two—Judah in the south (the capital of which was Jerusalem) and Israel (Samaria) in the north. Samaria fell to the Assyrians in 722 BCE; Judah survived a little longer until the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar II's conquest in 586 BCE. The Temple, central for the Jewish identity and faith, was destroyed. When the Persians invaded Babylonia, Cyrus the Great permitted the Hebrews to return to their lands and ordered Solomon's temple to be rebuilt with finances from the Persian treasury. Having discovered similarities in their faiths, Judaism and Zoroastrianism, the Persians and Israelites acted as allies against the pagan Roman and Orthodox Byzantine interests in the eastern Mediterranean. Some historians have pointed out that on the return of the Israelites from Babylonia, the Jewish religion was influenced by the Zoroastrian dualism between good and evil and the idea of the return of the savior.

The religious map of the Middle Eastern civilizations is more complex than their ancient political histories. The centralized rules and the city-states required the division of labor between the producers and the rulers, the military and the artisans. The top of the sociopolitical hierarchy was generally occupied by men of religion, since they were the intermediaries between the gods, the living gods (kings), and the public. The temples they built everywhere in the ancient Middle East became not only the house of faith but also the treasury for taxes, the storehouse for products, and the seat of knowledge. Given the priestly monopoly of establishing relations with the gods to protect the social order, the men of religion provided legitimacy to political rulers' affairs; thus, the political rulers depended on religion and the temple to protect their power.

The Sumerians developed mathematics and astronomy; they also had multiple natural gods and a belief in an afterlife. The Sumerian kings erected enormous temples and constructed enormous stepped pyramids (ziggurats), and the priests wrote numerous religious tablets. The Sumerian goddess Inanna (Ishtar) was believed to animate nature and to cause creatures to live and die. Inanna was the owner of the skies; her symbol was Venus, the evening star. As Magna Mater (the mother goddess), Inanna provided fertility and was represented in statues as breastfeeding a child in her lap. As a young shepherd, Dumuzi was believed to go underground each summer because of the heat and drought and to return six months later. Inanna and Dumuzi (Tammuz) were believed to marry each spring, Dumuzi (later Adonis) represented by the king and Inanna by the head priestess in real life. From this marriage, nature was made fertile again and again. The belief in fate was important in the Sumerian religion; the gods An and Enlil would order men to come into existence and to die. The Sumerians believed that even the other gods could not challenge the power of these two primary gods. Therefore, the Sumerians had to build temples to the gods, devote themselves to worship, ask for blessings, and give sacrifices to gods. The gods of land and later of war (Nergal), of fertility (Abba), of grain (Ashnan), and of the land of the dead (Ershkigal) and the goddess of rivers and order (Nanshe) were part of the Sumerians pantheon. Enki, the god of deep waters, told Ziusudra, the king of Shuruppak, to build a ship, take his family and couples of each kind of living thing, and save them from the flooding sea. The divine trinity of An (Uranos), Enlil, and Enki represented the sky, the land, and the underworld. The Sumerian dependence on Mother Nature heavily influenced the belief systems of other civilizations, including the monotheistic religions.

The Monotheistic Religions

Judaism

The religion of the Hebrews differed from the religions of other ancient peoples by being monotheistic, despite some similarities in other respects. The Hebrew unification in the 13th century BCE in the Fertile Crescent started as a theocratic formation; the Hebrew scriptures focus on the events surrounding the three patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Abraham and his teachings became the foundation of the so-called Abrahamic religions, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. The founding fathers Moses and Joshua not only were the leaders but also ruled the homeland as prophets on behalf of one God. This was the monotheistic revolution in the religious history of the Middle East, since the Hebrews believed that the single, supreme God had created and was the ruler of the whole universe according to a divine arrangement, which also placed ethical and religious responsibilities on individuals and communities. And it was a small community, the Hebrews, not the great Sumerian, Babylonian, or Egyptian civilizations, that produced monotheism.

Abraham is credited with initiating the seminomadic Hebrew tribes' move westward from the city of Ur; some of the tribes settled in Palestine, and some went further to Egypt. Later, Moses delivered his people from slavery and took them away from Egypt; he received the Ten Commandments from God on the journey to Canaan. The Exodus, which lasted several decades, united the Hebrews around a common identity formed by a common faith. Joshua, Moses' successor, led the Israelites to the Promised Land. The Israelite faith was also different from its contemporaries in that the community did not select their gods from nature; rather, God chose them, with Moses as intermediary, to receive the foundation of their religion. The Jewish texts, the Torah (the Pentateuch, or "five books": Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy), Nevi'im, and Ketuvim together make up the Hebrew Bible, or Old Testament. The Scriptures commanded human beings to believe in only one God, who is eternal, is sovereign over human affairs, and knows people's thoughts and deeds. The Talmud, the other central text of mainstream Judaism, is a compilation, dating to the first millennium CE, of rabbinic discussions pertaining to Jewish law, ethics, philosophy, customs, and history.

The strict religious discipline of Jewish culture emerged out of a long history, and the monotheistic belief that God is a unitary and invisible entity became a threat to Roman paganism in the first century BCE following the Roman commander Pompey's conquest of the Middle East in 63 BCE. The Hasmonean king Herod ruled the region of Judah as a Roman vassal. Herod repaired the Temple but could not achieve the integration of the Jews under his rule. The Jewish rebellion in 70 CE was violently suppressed by Emperor Titus Flavius, the temple in Jerusalem was destroyed, and the Israelites were exiled from their land. Again, the Roman emperor Hadrian exiled the Jews from Jerusalem in 132 CE following the Bar-Kochba popular revolt.

Christianity

Jewish ethical monotheism strongly influenced the religious doctrines of Christianity and Islam. Christianity emerged from the plurality of faiths of the Roman Empire, which included various sects of Judaism ranging from the strict orthodoxy of the Sadducees and Pharisees to the more liberal teachings of the Essenes. Influenced by the idea of the ideal king and savior of Egyptian religion, the Jews, forced to live under Roman occupation and persecution in the first century CE, believed that the Messiah would appear and establish the glorious kingdom of David. Jesus, or Yeshua, of Nazareth was born in Galilee, worked as a carpenter in Nazareth, and when he was about 30 years old began his 3-year public ministry after he was baptized by John in the Jordan River. Jesus, as a Jewish teacher, started his teaching in villages and towns and taught that people should abandon worldly concerns and follow the moral code of the Sermon on the Mount. His divine mission found a tremendous following among the poor. His teachings were seen as harmful to the religious establishment, however, and in 30 CE, he was accused by the Roman governor of the province, Pontus Pilate, of creating a rebellion in Jerusalem, and his crucifixion was ordered. The new faith was expanded by Paul of Tarsus to the Fertile Crescent and to Asia Minor, and soon the new religion extended beyond the Roman Empire and was organized by the religious leaders, bishops, within its institutional structure. As the Christian religion was thought to pose a threat to Roman paganism, its adherents became subject to Roman persecution, which in turn developed a greater unity among the believers. In the second century, the Catholic Church was organized as the central (universal) faith with its canon that included the Hebrew Bible, the Gospels, and the Epistles of Paul. Christianity expanded rapidly to the Roman cities Antioch, Alexandria, and Rome. The church in Rome became superior to the others, since the apostles Peter and Paul were martyred there in their work to expand Christianity to the pagan world. While Rome fell under the barbarian invasions in the fourth century, Emperor Constantine, in his power struggle with Rome, consolidated his power in the east by providing liberty to the Christians, taking Christianity under his protection and helping the church become institutionalized in his new center, Constantinople, built on the ancient city Byzantium. The Eastern Roman Empire was made by him a unique formation of Christianity, Roman law, and Greek culture. When, in 325, Constantine congregated the Council of Bishops at Nicea to bring a solution to the theological controversy created by Arius of Alexandria concerning the Trinity, the council decreed the Nicene Creed, which put forward the bases of the Orthodoxy of Eastern Churches. Emperor Theodosius prohibited paganism and made Christianity the state religion in 394 CE.

Islam

The Orthodox Byzantines and the Zoroastrian Persians were rivals for the hegemony of the trade routes from India and China to Byzantine domains and Europe. Manufactured goods, textiles, and spices moved from east to west throughout the Middle Ages, and Byzantium wanted to found its sovereignty on the trade routes. The fifth century was a long peace period, but the struggle between the two empires started in the sixth century. The Middle East, as one of the main routes, was subject to wars between the Christian Abyssinians, Rome's allies, and the Jews settled in the Red Sea area and Yemen as Persian allies. In 507, the Christian Abyssinians won over the Jews and Persians in southern Arabia, but they could not succeed in taking over Mecca (Makkah). The Persians took control of Aden. Both empires weakened and lost their interest in the region in the sixth century; the Byzantine Empire had crises within the church, and the Persians had conflicts within Zoroastrianism. The Arab Peninsula was either under foreign occupation or ruled by local dynasties. However, the Arabs by then had developed a rich culture due to intensive commercial activity, developed their own alphabet, and learned military techniques and the religious practices of their neighbors. Paganism and disorder did not fit in with the requirements of their age; Islam brought not only a religion to believe in but also a state and political order to unite the people.

Muhammad was born in 571 in Mecca, an important center on the trade route in the Aden-Aleppo line. In 610, he received the first messages, and the new religion developed secretly among his family members. The Arab faith was pagan before Islam, and though the Arabs believed in a superior, transcendental entity, their belief depended on polytheism. Divine entities like Lat, Menat, and Uzzah were thought to rule the earth on behalf of the superior God, and the power rested on the tribal leaders, notables, and the wealthy. Muhammad preached that he was the last of the prophets, Islam was the last monotheistic religion, and the Qur'an was sent to him by God. Conversion to Islam was uncomplicated: Before two witnesses, the initiate asserted his acceptance that there is no god but the one God and that Muhammad is his messenger, and thereby the believer became a Muslim. The leaders of Mecca considered the new religion, which required complete submission to God, as a threat to their powers and to Mecca's social and economic relations. Their oppression and persecution led the believers of Islam to migrate from Mecca to Yathrib in 622, the first year of the Muslim calendar. Yathrib, another commercial center in competition with Mecca, became Medina (the city of the Prophet) and the new religious and political center for the Muslims. When Muhammad died in 632, Islam had already spread to Mecca and other Arab cities in Hejaz. Ebubekir, Osman, Omar, and Ali in turn succeeded Muhammad as caliph, but economic competition, political opposition, and leadership crises caused wars among the believers. The main split occurred during Ali's caliphate. The believers of the teachings and sayings of Muhammad (the Sunnī Muslims) wanted the power to rest in them, whereas the followers of the Prophet's cousin and son-in-law Ali (the Shi'i) demanded that the caliphate remain within the family. Ali lost the war in 661. Despite the power struggle, Islam extended its borders to the Fertile Crescent, North Africa, Iran, and Central Asia during the time of the first four caliphs.

Islam realized its greatest expansion during the reign of the Umayyad Dynasty (650–750). The capital was moved to Damascus, which had been conquered in war with Byzantium. Egypt was taken in 639; Cairo was built near Memphis and Kayrawan in Tunisia early in the eighth century. The Arab armies moved toward Spain in 712. The Muslim expansion was halted in 717 by Byzantine armies in Anatolia and in Europe in 732 by Charles Martel's Frankish cavalry troops in the Battle of Poitiers. When the 'Abbāsids came to power in 751, the new religion and the Islamic empire covered an area from Mesopotamia to Andalusia in the Iberian Peninsula and from the Byzantine Caucasus to India. The 'Abbāsids were the descendants of Muhammad's uncle, Abbas; as the caliphate moved to Baghdad, the only Umayyad rule was the one in Andalusia. During the reign of the 'Abbāsīd sultan Harun al-Rashid (768–809), the empire expanded geographically, so that it was difficult to rule it from one center, Baghdad. In the ninth century, the semi-independent local dynasties established their sovereignty in the frontiers. The Berbers set up their rule in North Africa in 801, the Buyids established their authority in the Caspian in 945, and the Fātimids founded a Shi'ite state in Egypt in 969. The 'Abbāsīd caliphate's power barely extended beyond Baghdad; in 1055, 'Abbāsīd rule was replaced by that of the Seljuks.

Christians and Jews were accepted as peoples of the book in Muslim empires and granted dhimmi status: Their faith and communities were assured of protection, provided certain conditions were satisfied. Therefore, millions of Christians (Coptic Christians in Egypt and Arab Christians in the Middle East) and Jews could survive in the Middle East and continue to do so until the present day. The Sassanid Persians accepted Shi'ism, while protecting their unique Persian identity and defending themselves against Arab expansion.

The Ottoman Empire

Starting from the ninth century, the Central Asian nomadic Turks arrived in the Middle East and established the Great Seljuk Empire. In the 11th century, the Seljuk imperial power extended from Anatolia to Central Asia. Centered in Baghdad, the Turks provided a new spirit and power to Islam and were victorious over the Byzantine armies in 1071. Anatolia, Mesopotamia, and Syria came under Turkish rule, and Jerusalem became a Muslim city. The Byzantine emperor Alexis Comnenius called for help from the west, and Pope Urban II organized the first Crusade against the Muslims to save the Judeo-Christian holy city. The Crusaders took western Anatolia and Syria back for the Byzantines and established Latin kingdoms in Antioch, Urfa (Edessa), and Jerusalem in 1099. Salah Al-Din Ayyubi reestablished Muslim authority in the city in 1187, and the Third Crusade was organized by Philip Auguste of France, Richard the Lionheart of England, and Frederick Barbarossa of Germany. Another Crusade was organized in 1204, but the Latin Crusaders ended by invading the Orthodox Byzantine capital and establishing a Latin kingdom there until 1261. The Mongolian Empire established in 1206 on the Silk Road, the trade route to Asia, and led by Genghis (also transliterated as Chinggis) Khan, weakened the Seljuk empire, and the Seljukids moved their center to Konya in Anatolia to establish the Anatolian Seljuk state. The Mongolian army ended Anatolian Seljuk rule in 1243, invaded Mesopotamia, ended the 'Abbāsīd rule, and sacked Baghdad in 1258.

The Ottoman Empire emerged as a small principality in western Anatolia around 1300 amid the sociopolitical chaos created by the Mongolian invasion. The Ottoman state took Islam to Europe with the conquest of Kosovo in 1389. After a short interval following Tamerlane's invasion of the Middle East and Anatolia in 1402, Constantinople was taken by the Ottoman Empire in 1453, and the Byzantine Empire came to an end. The Ottomans established control in Bosnia in 1463, Belgrade in 1521, and Buda in 1526, and the empire's borders reached almost up to Vienna in 1529. Eastern Anatolia and Mesopotamia were ruled by the Akkoyunlu Turcoman ruler Uzun Hasan, who lost the war against the Ottoman Empire in 1473 and left most of his domains under Ottoman control. Uzun Hasan's grandson Shah Ismail was to establish the Safavid rule in Iran in 1501. In 1514, the Ottoman sultan Selim defeated the Shi'i troops of Shah Ismail and conquered the Iranian capital, Tabriz. After the 'Abbāsīd fall in 1258, the Mamlukes (Kölemen, the slave soldiers) ruled Mesopotamia, Levant, and Egypt, the main trade route to the east through the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea. As the last great Muslim state, the Ottoman Empire established its hegemony in the Middle East against the Mamluk sultanate with the conquest of Baghdad and Syria in 1516 and Egypt in 1517. Thereafter, the southern trade routes, including the Horn of Africa, were ruled by the Ottomans. In the 16th century, Ottoman power extended from the Indian Ocean in the east to the Red Sea, East Africa, and Morocco. The Mamluks remained as vassal rulers of the Ottoman Empire until Napoleon's invasion of Egypt.

The 19th century was the reform age for the Ottoman Empire and an age of revolt, invasion, and change for its Arab territories. The Ottoman Empire was the declining power, the "Sick Man of Europe," and the Great Powers determined the fate of the eastern Mediterranean. The Ottoman sultans appointed the members of the Mehmet Ali Paşa's dynasty to rule Egypt in the 19th century, but in 1882 the British occupied this important passageway to its Indian trade. France invaded Algeria in 1830 and Tunisia in 1880. Iraq and Syria remained under Ottoman control until World War I, and British and French mandates ruled in both countries in the interwar years. The establishment of the Israeli nation-state led to four Arab-Israeli wars, in 1948, 1956, 1967, and 1973. The intercommunal conflict created a civil war in Lebanon in 1975; Iran and Iraq fought from 1980 to 1988 for regional hegemony. The last two Gulf wars, in 1991 and 2003, changed the Iraqi political system.

The Middle East in the Present Day

The modern Middle East has a population of about 300 million, with the majority living in three large but ethnically and religiously different countries: Egypt, Iran, and Turkey (each about 70 million). Of the 15 states, 12 are Arab, and Sunnī Muslims constitute two thirds of the Middle Eastern population. Most of the Shi'i live today in Iran, Iraq (the Twelvers), Yemen (the Zaydis), Oman (the Ibaidis), and the Levant (the Ismailis). The Jews of Israel number about 6.5 million. The Christian population numbers about 15 million. There are a variety of Christian denominations affiliated with the Phanar Orthodox Patriarchate in Istanbul and the Orthodox churches in Antioch, Alexandria, and Jerusalem. Eastern Orthodox churches, the Coptic Orthodox Church (Alexandria), the Armenian Orthodox Church (Beirut), the Armenian Gregorian Church (Istanbul), the Syrian (Jacobite) Orthodox Church (Damascus), and the Nestorian Church (Baghdad) have the biggest Christian communities in the Middle East. The Roman Catholic Church and the Armenian, Coptic, Chaldean, and Syrian Catholic churches have less than 1 million members throughout the Middle East.

Recep Boztemur

See also Ancient Near Eastern Religions; Christianity; Coptic Christianity; Eastern Orthodox Christianity; Egypt; Gilgamesh Epic; Iraq; Islam; Israel; Jordan; Judaism; Lebanon; Monotheism; Saudi Arabia; Syrian Arab Republic

Further Readings

- Catherwood, C. (2006). A brief history of the Middle East. New York: Carroll & Graf.
- Craig, A. M. (2000). The heritage of world civilizations. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Prentice Hall.
- Goldschmidt, A., Jr. (1999). A concise history of the Middle East. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Lewis, B. (1997). The Middle East: A brief history of the last 2000 years. New York: Touchstone.

MILLENARIAN MOVEMENTS

The terms millenarianism or millennialism are used by scholars to refer to movements expecting an imminent transition to a collective salvation (i.e., a condition of permanent well-being enjoyed by a group), which may be believed to be earthly and/or heavenly. Millenarians believe that the transition to the collective salvation will occur as the result of the intervention of a divine or superhuman agent, perhaps using human assistance. Many millenarians expect the transition to occur via a cataclysmic destruction of the current order so that the “millennial kingdom” can be created—this pattern can be termed catastrophic millennialism. Other millenarians have a strong belief in “progress” and therefore believe that humans working under divine or superhuman guidance can create the millennial kingdom—this pattern can be termed progressive millennialism.

Millenarian movements have been found all over the world and in all historical periods. Protomillenarian ideologies as far back as the second millennium BCE supported the authority of Egyptian and Mesopotamian rulers in consolidating their power and extending their kingdoms. The global dissemination of the Christian Bible has contributed to the formation of millenarian movements in different parts of the world. Millenarian movements have inspired oppressed peoples to revolt against colonial governments and socioeconomic forces. Millenarian movements can provide hope that injustice will be corrected, the perpetrators of injustice will be punished, and the faithful will be vindicated and rewarded with permanent well-being. Millenarian movements can stimulate social work to create the millennial kingdom on earth. They have motivated people to migrate to new locations to build their millennial kingdom by creating new communities, settling new territories, and founding new nations. They can also inspire millenarians to commit acts of terrorism (when the movement is not socially dominant) or fight revolutions and even world wars (when the movement has gained a sufficiently large number of adherents). All millenarian movements seek a condition of permanent well-being (salvation) for a designated group of people, often called “the Elect” by the believers or by scholars.

Related Terms

The terms millenarianism and millennialism come from the assertion in the Christian New Testament Book of Revelation (Apocalypse) that the Kingdom of God on earth will last 1,000 years (a millennium) (Revelation 20:2–7). Scholars have applied these terms to movements found in diverse religious traditions, not just Christian ones. The term apocalypticism can be used as a synonym for catastrophic millennialism.

A millenarian movement may or may not have a “prophet” or a “messiah.” It is possible for millenarian movements to be inspired by scriptures interpreted by people who do not claim to be prophets or messiahs. This can be seen in the millennialism associated with British Israelism, which contributed to the development of the American Christian Identity movement. Most millenarian movements do have prophets and/or messiahs.

A prophet is someone who is believed to speak for God or some other divine or superhuman source. Thus, a prophet can be said to have charisma; he or she is believed to have access to an unseen source of authority. Charisma is always socially constructed. If no one believes an individual's claim to have access to an unseen source of authority, then that person does not have charisma. A prophet is not necessarily a messiah.

The Hebrew word messiah has been used by scholars to refer to a person who is believed by millenarians to be empowered by the unseen source of authority to create the collective salvation. Thus, a messiah is a prophet, but a messiah has a more powerful status than a prophet. Millenarians believe that the messiah will actualize the millennial kingdom.

Catastrophic millennialism, in particular, is associated with a radically dualistic worldview in which good is seen as being locked in a battle with evil. Thus, catastrophic millennialists believe that humans are called to support the good and the divine side or else perish in the imminent destruction and/or be judged and sentenced to eternal punishment. The phrase radical dualism indicates that this can be a rigidly held dualistic outlook. This perspective expects, and may create, conflict.

Progressive millennialism is often linked with movements for social reform and nondualistic worldviews. But not all progressive millennial movements are peaceful. Some progressive millennialists are revolutionaries who seek to speed up progress by violent means. At the revolutionary end of the progressive millennial spectrum, a radically dualistic perspective is found. The German Nazis, the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia, and the Maoist Great Leap Forward in China can be seen as revolutionary progressive millennial movements.

Range of Behaviors

A range of behaviors is associated with both catastrophic millennialism and progressive millennialism. Catastrophic millennialists, such as Jehovah's Witnesses, Seventh-Day Adventists, and many other Christian millenarians, may wait in faith for divine intervention to destroy the current evil order. Catastrophic millennialists may be pacifists who actively put themselves in harm's way, expecting to achieve salvation by martyrdom, such as some early Christians and some practitioners of Falun Gong in the People's Republic of China. Catastrophic millennialists may arm themselves for protection and fight back if attacked, as did the Branch Davidians residing at Mount Carmel Center near Waco, Texas, in 1993, and Black South Africans calling themselves "Israelites," who were massacred by the police at Bulhoek in 1921. Catastrophic millennialists may be revolutionaries carrying out violent acts, such as participants in the international radical Islamist (Jihadist) movement or the Taiping Rebellion in 19th-century China.

Progressive millennialists manifest a similar range of behaviors. They may engage in social work and/or proselytizing to build God's kingdom, as in the Protestant Social Gospel movement and the Catholic "special option for the poor" emerging from Vatican II. They may arm themselves for self-defense and fight back if attacked, for instance, Israelis seeking to establish and protect the state of Israel. Progressive millennialists may become active revolutionaries, as in the movements mentioned above.

Nativist Millennial Movements

A nativist millennial movement consists of people who feel under attack by a foreign colonizing government or socioeconomic political order, which is taking their land and destroying their traditional religion and way of life. Frequently, nativist millennialists identify with the stories of the oppression and deliverance of the people of Israel, which they learn about from the Christian Old Testament. Members of such movements might identify themselves as being the "true Israelites," as in the cases of the Black South Africans at Bulhoek and contemporary White American believers in a racist and anti-Semitic expression of Christianity called Christian Identity. Identity Christians are part of what may be termed a "European American nativist millennial movement" in the United States, which also includes Christian Patriots, Neo-Nazis, and Odinists. This movement's participants regard the federal government as being the satanic oppressor. Nativist millennialists long for a restoration of their land, prosperity, and an idealized conception of their former way of life.

Nativist millennialism may manifest in catastrophic or progressive patterns. A range of behaviors is also associated with nativist millennial movements. Nativist millennialists may await divine intervention to remove their oppressors in response to their faith expressed in concrete actions, as in two 19th-century movements—the Ghost Dance movement among Native Americans and the Xhosa cattle-killing movement in South Africa. Nativist millennialists may become revolutionaries bent on eliminating their perceived oppressors to establish their idealized ancestral way of life, such as the German Nazis. The international radical Islamist movement, of which al Qaeda is a part, is an interesting example of a transnational nativist millennial movement. It seeks to restore the idealized umma (community, conceptualized as being a “nation”) (Qur’an 3:110), ruled by a restored (and idealized) khilafa (“caliphate,” a pious state), which will enforce Shari’a (Islamic law) in the manner the believers desire. Jihadists see Western social, political, and economic forces as disrupting the traditional Muslim way of life. They accuse Western nations of removing Muslims from their lands, stealing Muslims’ natural resources and wealth, desecrating Muslim holy lands and places, and propping up puppet Muslim regimes. They are particularly angry at American support for the state of Israel, which has displaced Palestinian Muslims from their homes and land. Radical Islamists wage jihad with the goal of defeating the foreign powers considered to be al-ahzab (“the Confederates”), removing false Muslim regimes, and reinstating the pious umma under the authority of the khilafa.

Millenarianism and New Religious Movements

Intense millenarianism is often found at the beginning of new religious movements. Catastrophic millennialism stresses the need for conversion from the old, corrupt religion and way of life to the new faith in order to be “saved” from imminent destruction and judgment. Thus, catastrophic millennialism can motivate people to adopt a new faith and religious practice even in the face of persecution. Catastrophic millennial ideas were prominent in the early Christian movement and in the early revelations given to Muhammad. Catastrophic millennial concepts were also found in the 19th-century Babi movement in Iran, which saw its founder, the Bab, executed and his followers attacked, besieged, arrested, tortured, and killed.

Catastrophic millennial movements are often viewed as a challenge to the established social order and government because they envision the imminent establishment of a new order under the rule of God’s agent(s). Thus, it is not unusual for these prophets and messiahs to be attacked and put to death—as happened to John the Baptist, Jesus, and the Bab—or, alternatively, forced to flee and fight for their lives—as did Muhammad.

Progressive millennial movements also expect imminent change to occur in society, but if the believers do not resort to revolutionary violence, progressive millennial movements are less threatening to the status quo and current government. The Baha’i founding prophets, the Bab (of the Babi movement), and Baha’u’llah, were progressive millennialists, but it took some time for these new views to permeate the Baha’i movement since it emerged out of a Shi’ite Islamic context, which was oriented toward catastrophic millennialism.

Contemporary progressive millennial movements include those among the New Age movements expecting an imminent transition to the Age of Aquarius through a change in human consciousness, as well as different UFO (unidentified flying object) millennial groups, who look to extraterrestrials as being the superhuman agents and unseen source of authority. UFO millennialists may also be oriented toward catastrophic expectations, for instance, the 39 members of the Heaven’s Gate “class” who committed group suicide in 1997 to “beam up” to the mothership before the expected cataclysm.

As a new movement becomes established and comfortable in the wider society, it is common for millenarian expectations to diminish. The leaders of the movement will seek to control and dampen the antisocial enthusiasm and challenges to institutions that often accompany catastrophic expectations. Diminished millennial expectations coming under control of the institutionalized religion’s leaders has been termed “managed millennialism.” However, the intense millenarian ideas, including of the apocalyptic variety, will be preserved in the scriptures and thus will be rediscovered and emphasized by subsequent new religious movements in that tradition.

Millenarianism and Violence

Millenarianism is often, but not necessarily, related to violent episodes in complex ways.

The radical dualism associated with much of millenarian thought can stimulate opposition by members of mainstream society, leading to millenarians' belief in confirmed prophecies when a group becomes an assaulted millennial group. The radically different values and lifestyles adopted by millennialists can contribute to their being assaulted, as with the Mormons in 19th-century America and the Branch Davidians at Mount Carmel Center in 1993.

When millenarians are assaulted or feel threatened, they can in turn initiate violence. Such appears to have been the motivation for the attack by some Mormons of approximately 129 settlers traveling across Utah in a wagon train in 1857 in the Mountain Meadows massacre.

Some millenarians commit violence—against themselves, perceived enemies, or both—because they have become fragile millennial movements. Their group is suffering from internal stresses and weaknesses and often from pressures originating from outside the group, which cumulatively threaten the group's "ultimate concern," their religious goal—which in millenarian groups relates to the collective salvation. The members of Peoples Temple who committed murder and group suicide in 1978 at Jonestown, Guyana, resulting in more than 900 deaths, and the 39 members of Heaven's Gate are examples of fragile millennial groups. It is possible that the Branch Davidians, in the final moments of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's tank and CS gas assault against their community on April 19, 1993, became a fragile millennial group, with some members starting the fire to convey the Branch Davidians to heaven, in anticipation of being resurrected, and initiating the violent events of the end-time predicted in the Book of Revelation.

This entry has already mentioned several examples of revolutionary millennial movements, whose members carry out violent acts to destroy the old order and establish the collective salvation on earth for the elect.

These three categories of millenarian movements involved in violence are not mutually exclusive. For instance, Aum Shinrikyô in Japan had revolutionary aims when its scientists were exploring the acquisition of weapons of mass destruction. But at the points in time when the Aum devotees carried out violence—against defectors and perceived enemies of the movement, by releasing sarin gas in the town of Matsumoto in 1994 and on the Tokyo subway in 1995—they were seeking to protect their guru, and hence the ultimate concern based on his authority, from disconfirming failure, thus making Aum Shinrikyô a fragile millennial group. The Mormons in the 19th century and the Branch Davidians in 1993 were assaulted on multiple occasions, but they may have been responding to a sense of fragility if and when some of them initiated violent acts in the Mountain Meadows massacre and the fire at Mount Carmel Center, respectively.

Violent incidents involving millenarians typically occur in interactive contexts. Law enforcement agents and the policy makers of nations need to give consideration to how the quality of interactions with believers may increase or decrease these movements' potential for volatility.

Millennialists may change their methods to achieve the collective salvation if particular methods fail to produce the desired result. Ian Reader has termed this phenomenon the "pragmatics of failure." Peaceful millennialists may resort to violence to preserve their millennial goal, as in several of the cases described above. Violent millennialists who suffer a resounding defeat may become pacifists, such as the Nichiren Buddhists, who supported Japanese militarism and imperial expansion through World War II but changed after atomic bombs were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki and subsequently contributed to the formation of pacifist movements working for peace.

Conclusion

The millenarian patterns that may be termed catastrophic millennialism and progressive millennialism are not mutually exclusive. Believers may shift from one to the other in response to events. Catastrophic expectations may increase if believers experience intense opposition or repeated disasters, perhaps including colonial oppression. Catastrophic millennialism involves a pessimistic view of humanity and society. People are seen as getting so bad that the old order has to be wiped out in a cataclysm so that the new order may be created. Progressive expectations may increase when believers feel more at ease in society but still wish to remove evidence that contradicts their optimistic belief in human nature and progress. They will then be motivated to engage in social work and proselytization to create the collective salvation, believing that they work under the guidance of a superhuman agent. In extreme cases, progressive millennialists come under the sway of revolutionary ideologies and resort to murder to speed up progress. Even apparently secular revolutionary progressive millennialists have believed that they were called to carry out violent actions by a superhuman agent, ranging from God to “Nature” or “history.”

Millenarian movements are responses to the human desire to establish a condition of permanent well-being, which drives all religious expressions. Millenarians dare to dream large in their anticipation of imminent salvation for a collective elect.

Catherine Wessinger

See also al Qaeda; Anti-Semitism; Apocalypticism; Asahara, Shôkô; Aum Shinrikyô; Bab, Sayyid ‘Ali Muhammad; Babi; Baha’i; Baha’u’llah; Bible; Branch Davidians; Charisma; China; Christian Identity; Cultural Revolution (China); Falun Gong; Ghost Dance Religion; Heaven’s Gate; Islamism (Political Islam); Jihad; Killing Fields (Cambodia); Mormons; New Age Movements; New Religions; Taiping Rebellion

Further Readings

- Adas, M. (1979). Prophets of rebellion: Millenarian protest movements against the European colonial order. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Bagley, W. (2002). Blood of the prophets: Brigham Young and the massacre at Mountain Meadows. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press.
- Barkun, M. (1986). Disaster and the millennium. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.
- Barkun, M. (1997). Religion and the racist Right: The origins of the Christian Identity movement (Rev. ed.). Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Cohn, N. (1970). The pursuit of the millennium: Revolutionary millenarians and mystical anarchists of the Middle Ages (Rev. and expanded ed.). New York: Oxford University Press.
- Crossan, J. D. (2007). God and empire: Jesus against Rome, then and now. New York: HarperOne.

- Fisher, G. (2003). Resistance and salvation in Falun Gong: The promise and peril of forbearance. Nova Religio: Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions, 6(2), 294–311.
- Gnuse, R. (2011). Ancient Near Eastern millennialism. In C. Wessinger (Ed.), Oxford handbook on millennialism. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Hunt, S. (Ed.). (2001). Christian millenarianism: From the early church to Waco. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Momen, M. (2008). Millennialism and violence: The attempted assassination of Nasir al-Din Shah of Iran by the Babis in 1852. Nova Religio: Journal of Alternative and Emergent Religions, 12(1).
- Newport, K. G. C. (2006). The Branch Davidians of Waco: The history and beliefs of an apocalyptic sect. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Wessinger, C. (2000a). How the millennium comes violently: From Jonestown to Heaven’s Gate. New York: Seven Bridges Press.
- Wessinger, C. (Ed.). (2000b). Millennialism, persecution, and violence: Historical cases. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.
- Wessinger, C. (2006). New religious movements and violence. In E. V. Gallagher & W. M. Ashcraft (Eds.), Introduction to new and alternative religions in America: Vol. 1. History and controversies (pp. 165–205). Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- Wessinger, C. (Ed.). (2011). Oxford handbook on millennialism. New York: Oxford University Press.

MISSIONS AND MISSIONARIES

Missions and missionaries are related terms referring to the organizations (missions) and people (missionaries) who communicate their religion in words and actions across cultural and linguistic boundaries with the aim of encouraging the adoption of the religion by people unfamiliar with it. Missions are the agencies in particular times and places that send out the communicators of religious messages. Missionaries are the ones sent to articulate those messages in words and actions, in the form of witness and embodiment, what is believed to be the universal truth of their religious tradition. Undergirding missionary action is the belief that the religion they represent does indeed have answers to the ontological, physical, and spiritual problems of human beings and, more broadly, that it encompasses and addresses environmental and cosmic disharmonies. Although many scholars of religions commonly classify the “missionary religions” as chiefly Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam, any religious tradition claiming to possess universal truth can function as a missionary religion, since followers of those religious traditions affirm that their religion offers a way—some might say the only way—to alleviate the problems that plague the human condition. Even so-called nonmissionary religions, such as Hinduism or Sikhism, can be missionary in nature as followers of those traditions communicate the universality of their religion with the intent of changing others’ worldviews.

The history of the global expansion of religions is the story of the uneven collusion with, sometimes collision against, missionaries and state power, cultural and social forces, and nation-making schemes. Nowadays, however, the term missions applies broadly to both religious and secular activities, exemplified by the requirement of most businesses, educational institutions, and nongovernmental organizations to have a “mission statement” defining their purpose of existence. Even governments employ the term missions when referring to their military strategies (e.g., “Our [military] mission in X country”). Although missions can be understood in this broad sense of providing a standard vision for diverse groups such as revenue-generating multinational corporations, nonprofit organizations, or cottage industries, the origin of the English term missions has an explicitly religious meaning, originating within Christian circles. And it is crucial to note that there were both missions and missionaries sent out by other religious traditions prior to the emergence of Christianity. Nevertheless, because “missions” and “missionaries” are associated so heavily with Christianity and are themselves English words, we begin with the English origins of the terms.

Distinction Between Mission and Missions

The English term missions is the plural form of mission, a term coined by the Jesuits in the 16th century to refer to the Trinity’s action of sending. In the context of the Protestant Reformation, the Jesuits used the term mission (Latin missio) in a twofold sense. First, “mission” (sending) referred to the Trinity’s movement of the Father sending the Son (Jesus Christ), who sends the Holy Spirit, who sends the church into the world. That is, the Jesuits affirmed that the church was sent into the world to do the business of the one who sent it. Second, the Jesuits employed the term mission to refer to the sending of Roman Catholic missionaries into regions of the world that were either not Christian (e.g., heathen) or Protestant, which in both cases required conversion to Roman Catholicism to obtain salvation. Since the Protestant Reformation (16th century), it was common for Protestant churches to employ the term missions instead of mission, referring to the outreach activities of the various Protestant churches. However, in the mid-1960s, many Protestants began to distinguish between mission and missions, with the intention of demonstrating that the identity of the Christian church is based on its relationship to the Godhead (Father, Son, and Holy Spirit), who sends the church into the world, missions being the particular outgrowth of the single mission of the Godhead (Latin missio Dei). Despite the distinction between mission and missions recognized by scholars and leaders of Christian missions, most Christians fail to distinguish between the two terms.

Missions refers to the particular agencies, organizations, and practices of Christian church work in specific times and places. As such there are countless “missions,” since every year more Christian outreach agencies are established all over the world. Missions are often directed toward particular groups, such as those defined along ethnic lines (e.g., Batak, Dinka), religious communities (e.g., Muslims, Christians, Hindu), ideological perspectives (e.g., secularists, atheists), age groups (e.g., children, youth, the elderly, post-Gen X), economic status (e.g., affluent, poor), education level (e.g., scholars, uneducated), social location (e.g., recent immigrants to urban centers, students, Brahmins), occupation (e.g., scientists, artists), or world region (e.g., the West, Asia, Africa). The particular foci of missions are equally quite broad, for they can entail humanitarian efforts (e.g., establishing health care centers, improving living conditions of communities) or educational endeavors (e.g., teaching literacy or computers). Yet the work of (religious) missions is distinct from the efforts of secular humanitarianism by their intention of communicating a divine message, truth, or wisdom through the words and actions of their representatives (missionaries). Some scholars of Christian mission further distinguish between the broader category of mission and the narrower concept of evangelism, which is the verbal proclamation of the Christian message that Jesus Christ is God's Son who died for the sins of the world. That is,

God showed how much he loved us by sending his one and only Son into the world so that we might have eternal life through him. This is real love—not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son as a sacrifice to take away our sins. (I John 4:9–10)

The South African scholar of Christian mission David Bosch asserts that mission without evangelism is humanitarianism, since verbal proclamation of the distinctives of Christianity (i.e., evangelism) is what animates Christian mission worldwide. Furthermore, many scholars of Christian mission have noted that the term missions implies the presence of a sender, one sent, and a message. In the Christian perspective, God is the sender, the missionary is the one sent, and the message consists of the communication in word and deed that in Jesus Christ something radically new has occurred for all creation that can provide the reconciliation of human beings with God.

Missionaries

Missionaries are human actors who communicate in word and deed a universal divine message to specific people and communities. Missionaries believe that they possess the answers to the problems of the human condition. Although there are similarities between missionaries and other religious workers, such as priests, pastors, monks, and nuns, there are also vast differences that make the work of missionaries quite unique and that have necessitated the establishment of a wide variety of missionary orders, which, for example, in the Roman Catholic Church include orders such as the Benedictines, Augustinians, Marists, Divine Word Missionaries, Sacred Heart Missionaries, Dominicans, Franciscans, and Jesuits, each with different emphases of ministry and service. Perhaps the most universal characteristic of missionaries is that they are boundary crossers in their attempt to communicate to new audiences. Since missionaries are, like all human beings, embedded in social, cultural, economic, and religious systems, their activities are far from neutral. Given that missionaries are sent into new regions with their message, they are usually religious and cultural minorities, a social position requiring that they learn new languages and cultures to be able to communicate. Yet it is instructive to note that missionaries can be religious minorities while being members of the cultural majority, such as those within a given culture who adopt a religion and then proceed to communicate that religion to people within their own culture. Since missionaries have learned new languages and cultures, they often become knowledge brokers, bringing fresh knowledge of distant places, cultures, beliefs, practices, and values into discourse within their home culture. Consequently, the history of the expansion of religions across cultural and linguistic borders is a story of mutual encounter, which in some cases has led to greater appreciation of various peoples and cultures and in other cases to increased conflict between communities, in part because of the transformation or reinforcement of social and religious identities by the new knowledge introduced by missionaries or as a result of the reinterpretation of local religious perspectives as an identity-maintaining strategy. The transformation of individual and communal identities occurs in all directions, with some people becoming more fervently committed to their first religion, while others find the new religion so compelling that they follow its religious tradition. The trajectory of the global expansion of religions is marked by continuity and discontinuity between religions and local cultures. As social carriers of new knowledge, values, and spiritual and religious insights, missionaries occupy a crucial role in individual and communal identity formation and, thus, through time have helped transform the world as they have often been among the first ones to enter territories and engage local people in a sustained way.

Constraints on the activities of missionaries reveal the struggles many religionists experience globally, especially if they are religious minorities. As a consequence of their boundary-crossing activities, missionaries have encountered countless obstacles that can be categorized broadly as structural and personal constraints. Structural constraints include obstacles such as legal prohibitions enacted by local or national governments forbidding the communication or practice of religions not sanctioned by the powers that be; ideological resistance, when the local people refuse to accept the message of the missionary; and the logistical challenges of getting from a missionary's home country to his or her intended destination. Other constraints on missionary work include the personal and physical costs involved. Most missionaries reside outside their home country and can experience feelings of personal isolation from their home culture and language. Many missionaries have paid for their work with their lives, becoming martyrs respected for the ultimate sacrifice they made to further their religion.

Missionary Activity Today

Christian

Christian missions are divided broadly into denominational and "faith mission" groups. Missionaries who are sent out by particular Christian denominations (e.g., Presbyterian, Southern Baptist, Lutheran, Roman Catholic) are considered denominational missionaries and receive most or even all of their financial support from the sending denomination, whereas missionaries sent out by para-church organizations (e.g., Wycliff Bible Translators, New Tribes Mission, InterVarsity) raise their funding by "faith," from friends, family members, and colleagues, believing that the successful garnering of financial support is an affirmation of the validity of their missionary call. Additionally, each Christian missionary organization has its own set of emphases that may include goals such as starting new churches, translating the Bible into vernacular languages, or caring for orphans. Such societies span Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant branches of Christianity.

In the midst of the diversity and competition among Christian missions, Christian ecumenism commenced with the convening of the Edinburgh Conference of 1910, beginning a new movement of large Christian mission conferences that sought to bring unity to the burgeoning of Christianity around the world. Today, the larger ecumenically oriented Christian bodies include the Roman Catholic Church (i.e., Servizio de Documentazione e Studi); the World Council of Churches (i.e., Commission on World Mission and Evangelism), which includes mostly Protestant and some Orthodox denominations worldwide; and the Lausanne movement, consisting primarily of evangelical church denominations. Although Christianity is the largest religion in the world, the terms missions and missionaries apply equally to a host of other religious traditions as well, some of which are much earlier traditions than Christianity. While most scholars refer to Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam as the great missionary religions, such a narrow reading of religious history overlooks the fact that most religions, particularly the so-called world religions, claim that they contain universal truth and that truth is for everybody. That is, while a religious tradition may not articulate itself as missionary in nature, the fact that religionists seek to express a meta-truth, principle, or insight applicable to all people throughout time, with the aim of having the hearers adopt the perspective, makes them function like a missionary religion.

Buddhist

Buddhism was the earliest missionary religion of the world religions. Following Prince Siddhartha Gautama's experience of enlightenment, when he became "The Buddha" (lit. "The Awakened One"), as though waking from a dream, the Buddha gathered male and female disciples and sent them on a mission to teach the truths he had discovered, instilling a desire in them to show compassion and love to all living beings. The truth was not of a personal god or deity, as in Christianity, but the Four Noble Truths that enabled followers to penetrate the world of appearances in order to experience deeper realities of the transitory nature of all things and reach a state of "awakeness," or enlightenment. Metta ("lovingkindness") is a concept that should animate Buddhist action in the world, where the faithful demonstrate Buddha dharma, or dhamma (Buddha's teaching). One of the most important early converts to and proponents of Buddhism was King Asoka (304–232 BCE), the emperor of the massive Mauryan Empire in the Indian subcontinent, who sent out missionaries who functioned as emissaries to several outlying regions, including Nepal, Thailand, and Sri Lanka. King Asoka sent his son, Mahinda, as a Buddhist missionary to Sri Lanka, thereby founding the religion in that region and establishing a base from which Mahinda sent his sister, Sanghamitta, as a Buddhist nun to begin a female Buddhist monastic order (Bhikkhunis). Today, Buddhism is one of the fastest growing global religions, its attractiveness due in part to the seriousness with which it analyzes and seeks to remedy suffering, a putatively universal experience.

Hindu

Hinduism, although a so-called nonmissionary religion, does claim to possess ultimate truth that transcends the insights of other religious traditions. From the perspective of some Hindus, Hinduism, in fact, is the pinnacle of all religions. During the British Raj, Hindus were misunderstood by the British colonizers, who, taking an evolutionary perspective on religion, saw them as followers of the animistic and polytheistic religions of South Asia and not as “advanced” as the monotheistic traditions. It was the great Hindu missionary to the West, Swami Vivekananda (1863–1902), who proclaimed at the World Parliament of Religions in Chicago in 1893 that behind the many deities stands the One, “the common centre to which all these widely diverging radii [religions] converge.” On the relationship between the religions, Vivekananda followed the insights of his teacher, Ramakrishna Paramahansa (1836–1886), who claimed to have discovered through deep meditation that all religions are paths to the same ultimate reality, a perspective that Vivekananda himself promoted so articulately at the World Parliament of Religions that Hinduism came to be seen as an intellectually stimulating and spiritually vibrant religion, not the substandard religious tradition that some had supposed it to be. Vivekananda’s visit to the West put Hinduism on the intellectual map of many who had not thought of the religion as a serious tradition, compatible intellectually and spiritually with the monotheistic faiths. As a mission outreach, Vivekananda established numerous Ramakrishna Missions worldwide, which provided charity, education, disaster relief, health care, and worship as a form of outreach and service. New Hindu movements that have been active in the West, such as the Hare Krishna movement, Transcendental Meditation, and Radhasoami, may also be considered a form of Hindu missionary activity.

Muslim

Islam is a missionary religion, with explicit scriptural and theological warrant to advance its teaching and presence globally. Islamic da’wa (Arabic “invitation” or “mission”) is a theological and practical call to Muslims to propagate their faith worldwide, with the aim of encouraging people to submit to God. Those who explicitly seek to propagate the teachings of Islam are referred to in Arabic as either muballigh (“preacher”) or du’at (plural da’ee, “missionary”). The communication of da’wa is often through humanitarian projects, such as health care, welfare, and educational endeavors, as well as preaching, but the history of the global expansion of Islam is a story in which Islamic mystics (Sufis) often acted as missionaries by being the first to communicate Islamic ideals, with some having political and others spiritual ends in mind. The robust growth of Islam from its emergence in the Arabian Peninsula, a region that by the time of the death of Prophet Muhammad (632 CE) had nearly entirely submitted to the religion, to becoming the second largest religion in the world testifies to the success of its global mission to see human beings live under submission to God.

Conclusion

It is practically impossible to be neutral about the topic of missions and missionaries, since by definition the endeavor to win over the commitment of human beings to new values, relationships, perspectives, and spiritual realities has weighty personal, social, and cultural implications and, some would say, tremendous divine or cosmic repercussions. Furthermore, it is important to acknowledge that the presence of missions and missionaries always blends with social, political, and ideological forces. The space limitations of a summary article do not allow a more detailed exploration of the complex nature of religious missions; therefore, it is recommended that the reader who wishes to pursue the topic further should engage the following queries. First, what is the relationship between missions, missionaries, and political power? The history of the global expansion of religions reveals an uneven story of collusion, competition, and resistance between missionaries and political forces, but with little uniformity or predictability. How have missionaries provided a countervailing force against other forms of power or domination (political, spiritual, or otherwise), and how have they used those powers to propagate their faith? Second, what is the relationship between missions, missionaries, and culture? Each religion has a variety of perspectives on culture that are embodied by their representatives (i.e., missionaries) whether they oppose or embrace, either selectively or in total, the cultural elements of the recipients. Why are certain cultural elements embraced (and what are they), while others are rejected? Third, how does the translatability or nontranslatability of the religion's message into local vernacular languages and cultural idioms affect the transformation of an individual and communal self-understanding? For instance, Christian advance worldwide succeeds by translation, where its fundamental affirmations (e.g., the Bible) find their final destination in the local languages of its recipients, whereas Islam's mission success is the result of bringing people under the word of the nontranslated Qur'an, thus valorizing the Arabic language as the supreme vehicle of Divine truth. What are the social and cultural implications of a religion's ability or inability to be translated into vernacular languages and cultures? Fourth, what carries the religion of the missionary? Some religious traditions believe that God speaks through people or scripture to communicate a divine message, whereas other traditions suggest that a cosmic law or set of principles can be intuited, such as through a mind-to-mind transmission. How do recipients receive the message—through written or spoken words, intuition, or actions? What role do missionaries play in the transmission, interpretation, and maintenance of the religion through time?

Astute students of religion cannot skirt the complicated nature of missions and missionaries in the context of wider globalizing forces that have changed the social, economic, political, and religious face of the world. These organizations and representatives believe that they know and communicate truth. As such they have been vilified aggressively, tolerated passively, and even venerated enthusiastically. What is clear is that religions have expanded globally in large part because of religious representatives who have moved across cultural and linguistic boundaries convinced that they have something unique to say and do that benefits all human beings. As social carriers of new knowledge, missionaries have introduced transformations in the understandings of self, community, the natural world, cosmos, and the divine that have in an unparalleled way affected the world.

Charles E. Farhadian

See also Christianity; Conversion; Global Religion; Globalization and Conversion; Hinduism; Islam; Mahayana Buddhism; Postcolonialism; Theravada Buddhism

Further Readings

- Bosch, D. J. (2006). Transforming mission: Paradigm shifts in theology of mission. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Burridge, K. (1991). In the way: A study of Christian missionary endeavours. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press.
- Kirk, J. A. (2000). What is mission? Theological explorations. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.
- Newbigin, L. (1989). The Gospel in a pluralist society. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans.
- Richardson, D. (1974). Peace child. Glendale, CA: Regal Books.
- Robert, D. (2009). Christian mission: How Christianity became a world religion. Oxford, UK: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Sanneh, L. (1989). Translating the message: The missionary impact on culture. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Walls, A. (1996). The missionary movement in Christian history: Studies in transmission of faith. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.

MITHRAS CULT

The cult of Mithras was an initiation cult extant from the first to the fourth century CE in the Roman Empire. The eponymous cult god, hailed as Sol Invictus ("The Unconquered Sun") has roots in the Persian god Mitra, the god of loyalty and guarantor of pledges. Centering on the god's sacrifice of a bull, which promised salvation to initiates, and strongly astrological in nature, the Roman cult was extremely popular with soldiers, who disseminated it throughout the empire.

The Persian cap and trousers of the god hearken to its past and remain the cult's most recognizable referent. Believed to have been introduced to the Roman world by Cilician pirates, the first mention of the cult comes from the time of Nero, when the god was invoked during a pledge of loyalty to the emperor.

It was a cult that celebrated no public rites and excluded women entirely from its ranks. Members would meet at temples known as Mithraea (singular Mithraeum). Meant to represent caves or crypts and designed as an area for devotees to share the principal ritual meal, the temple's focal point was the glyph known as the tauroctony, which illustrated Mithras's sacrifice and important characters in the cult's myth.

Mithras was believed to have been born from a stone on December 25. His first miracle was obtaining water from a stone by shooting it with an arrow, an event ritually remembered by his disciples. The central event was the slaying of the bull, preceded by a hunt where Mithras overcomes the beast through great feats of strength and drags it by its hindquarters into a cave. The bull's death is associated with transformation, and the magical force released turns the wounds and tail into food, which certain creatures of astrology ingest. As the bull is also linked to the moon and death, with this act Mithras is seen to defeat death and offer new life to those participating.

The torchbearers of the tauroctony, Cautes with his torch raised and Cautopates with his torch lowered, continue this depiction. They have been linked with various dualities: the rising/setting sun, life/death, and the higher/lower worlds, among others. Scholars such as Manfred Clauss have interpreted them to locate Mithras as the intercessor after death who brings the initiate into new life.

For his believers, Mithras clearly had a prominent place within the Roman pantheon, separate but related to Sol, the Sun. The sun and the moon are regular features on cult images, and some scholars believe along with David Ulansey that Mithras was seen as the greater sun, abiding behind the universe we know.

John Soboslai

See also Ancient Near Eastern Religions; Christianity; Hybridization; Manichaeism; Mediterranean World; Rome

Further Readings

- Beck, R. (2006). The religion of the Mithras cult in the Roman Empire: Mysteries of the unconquered sun. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Clauss, M. (2000). The Roman cult of Mithras (R. Gordon, Trans.). New York: Routledge. (Original work published in 1990)
- Ulansey, D. (1989). The origins of the Mithraic mysteries. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

MODERNISM

Modernism is a set of ideas about individual and public life that emerged in 17th-century Europe and spread around the world, ideas that clashed with nonscientific traditions, religion, and superstition. Apart from representative events and periods that mark its onset and conclusion, there are no clear dates that define the period of modernism. As early as the Renaissance, which gave way to the Age of Enlightenment, premodern intellectualism was gaining momentum for the thrust toward technological, economic, cultural, and industrial revolutions that would bring advanced societies into the Age of Modernism. The sociologist Anthony Giddens (b. 1938) has described the emergence of the modern era as resulting from the development of the nation-state as well as the rise of industrialism. Within this notion of modernism lies a tenor of belief in (the attainability of) progress, objectivity, rationality, and truth, running through the gradual development of ideas that would provide a foundation for modern societies.

The features within the transition from premodern to modern were well noted within the social sciences. Ferdinand de Tönnies's (1855–1936) analysis of the societal shifts associated with modern life drew out the distinctions between the social groupings known as Gemeinschaft and Gessellschaft. Where the former refers to a community generated by close bonds of affect, the latter describes a society bound by mutual agreements tied to local or national organizational structures. Although Tönnies's ideas have been met with criticism on account of their reductionist character, they nevertheless illustrate a transition from traditional communities to modern societies.

Georg Simmel (1858–1918), a pioneering sociologist, also wrote extensively about the culture that arose out of modernity. In his 1903 essay titled “The Metropolis and Mental Life,” Simmel commented on the ecological effects of large urban settings on the minds of the individuals who inhabit them. Simmel emphasized a culture of individuality that was often mistaken for impolite behavior yet in actuality was more of a self-defense mechanism that sustained one's independence within the harsh environment of modern city life. Although the burgeoning individualism that Simmel described appeared to be an entirely personal phenomenon, he also commented on the broader social constraints of rationalization that contributed to this modern milieu. For Simmel, the modern city had perpetuated a technical rationality that would move toward dismal ends.

Simmel's assessment of modernity was not unlike Max Weber's (1864–1920) bleak outlook of a world confined to unyielding rationalization. Weber criticized the functions of bureaucracies within modernity as institutions organized around hierarchies and goal-oriented operations. Using his famous metaphor, Weber believed that this type of rationality would leave individuals trapped within an “iron cage.”

Criticisms of the modern age would continue through the 20th and 21st centuries, leading to the debate about whether modernity had adapted to the emerging challenges and transformed into something new or ended entirely. The postmodern theorist Jean-Francois Lyotard (1924–1998) certainly recognized a distinctive phenomenon that grew out of the 20th century, characterized by skepticism toward modernity. Lyotard referred to this phenomenon as the “postmodern condition,” which constituted a break with knowledge building and the legitimization of logic found within the grand narratives of modernity.

In an insightful essay, the architecture critic Charles Jencks suggested a symbolic end to modernity when he zeroed in on the controlled demolition of the Pruitt-Igoe public housing project in St. Louis on July 15, 1972. Initially considered an emblematic example of the promise of prosperity within modernity, the Pruitt-Igoe complex had overcome initial plans as a segregated building and was promoted as fostering community values in a futuristic vision of social wealth and productivity. Yet, as Jencks's observation suggests, the U.S. government's attempt at urban renewal failed to live up to any such utopian promise. Although Jencks's comments refer more to the end of modern architecture and the beginning of postmodernity, the example of the literal rise and fall of this symbolic building offers insight into the futility of the project of modernism.

Enlightenment

The term Enlightenment refers to any number of intellectual and cultural changes associated with the period beginning in the late 17th century and ending in the late 18th to mid-19th centuries. The Enlightenment designates a break with traditional forms of reasoning based on the influence of superstition, religion, and repressive governing bodies.

The work of the early-modern philosopher René Descartes (1596–1650) symbolizes this transition through his discourse on existence. Concerned with arriving at truth, Descartes famously developed the dictum of Cogito ergo sum (“I think, therefore I am”), wherein he is said to have evidenced the existence of the individual as a thinking being. The methods through which Descartes arrived at his conclusions changed the course of philosophy and reasoning for modern thinkers to come.

Isaac Newton (1643–1727) advanced scientific discourse, establishing a contemporary foundation for which logic could be used to direct inquiry. As an innovator of new ideas within a host of natural scientific disciplines, Newton established new research ground for the most advanced modern thinkers to explore.

Well after the death of Descartes and during the later years of Newton's life, François-Marie Arouet (1694–1778), known by his pen name Voltaire, contributed to Enlightenment ideas that would inspire future thinkers to question precepts entrenched within the institutions of authority. An ardent critic of the French monarchy and the Catholic Church, Voltaire scrutinized the constraints imposed on civil liberties and the freedoms of religious expression. In this way, Voltaire's influence added extensively to the modern processes of reasoning.

In addition to Descartes, Voltaire, and Newton, the influence of Enlightenment thought on modernity can be attributed to a host of European intellectuals, including Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679), John Locke (1632–1704), George Berkeley (1685–1753), Charles Montesquieu (1689–1755), Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–1778), Denis Diderot (1713–1784), and Immanuel Kant (1724–1804).

Religion

Though it was the poet Friedrich Schiller (1759–1805) who first introduced the phrase Die Entzauberung der Welt (“the disenchantment of the world”), it was Max Weber who popularized this idea as a consequence of formal rationalization. Weber pessimistically foresaw a world of overarching rational systems characterized by the devaluation of magic and religion in favor of secular forms of reasoning, ingenuity, and technological advancements. According to Weber, the emphasis on rationality would lead to the secularization of religious traditions and the gradual eradication of the irrational beliefs and practices of the premodern era.

In contrast to what Weber foresaw, religion has prevailed—albeit in a characteristically different fashion. The emergence of new global religious movements associated with mystical New Age beliefs, a media-oriented consumer culture tied to a cult of commodities, and the aggrandizing of religious venues of worship are just a few examples of how religion has made a significant resurgence and reinvigorated the irrationalism of the premodern traditions.

Industrialism

The French sociologist Émile Durkheim (1858–1917) examined theoretical explanations about the formation and continuity of social communities. In his 1893 book The Division of Labor in Society, Durkheim introduced two forms of social cohesion that he referred to as “mechanical solidarity” and “organic solidarity.” Mechanical solidarity describes a type of organizational structure of labor associated with premodern societies where participants were capable of performing a variety of tasks. For Durkheim, this form of solidarity fostered a highly competitive environment as workers were independent of one another and thus less interactive in attaining their specific needs. In contrast, the organic form of solidarity describes a type of organizational structure of labor associated with modern societies where participants are more interdependent in obtaining their needs. As laborers become more specialized, Durkheim suggested, this organic solidarity would cultivate cooperation between laborers of different trades based on needs that could not be met by one person’s skills alone.

Durkheim’s division of labor provides a model for illustrating how modern societies have come to operate under extremely complex and interconnected organizations. As the development of communication and transportation technologies increased and the space within which interaction took place decreased, industrial settings intended to produce mass output began to emerge. The capitalist mode of production drew heavily on labor forces to meet the demands of a burgeoning consumer class; at the same time, work management schemes that served to maintain order and cultivate certain ideal notions about production were devised.

Taylorism and Fordism

Fredrick Winslow Taylor (1856–1915) is considered a fundamental contributor to the methods of operation found within modern industrialism. Working under the premise that the routines of modern life were highly inefficient, Taylor sought to minimize unnecessary steps and digressions from the production process by streamlining movement within the workplace. Seeking to arrive at an ideal method for producing goods, Taylor actually timed physical operations and weeded out unnecessary stages as well as any needless activities in the production line. In his 1911 essay The Principles of Scientific Management, Taylor illustrated how the workplace could undergo this transformation toward organizational efficiency. Ultimately, Taylor believed that his type of production arrangement could be applied to any venue of social activity.

Sharing a vision similar to Taylor’s, Henry Ford (1863–1947) created an industrial automotive empire through the development of his Model T automobile. With the creation of fast and efficient production, Ford is considered the founder of the modern assembly line. Although Ford's objective has been said to be the creation of an inexpensively produced and affordable automobile, admirers of this organizational structure carried it over into endeavors well beyond automobile production. Today, this emphasis on rational schemas of operation can be found within just about every modern social institution.

McDonaldization

The term McDonaldization refers to a global rationalization process associated with modernity whereby the world becomes more and more accustomed to adopting the organizational structure of the fast-food industry. Developed by George Ritzer (b. 1940) during the late 1980s and early 1990s, the McDonaldization thesis applies a Weberian model of bureaucratic organizations to the system of production and marketing of output by McDonald's fast-food chain restaurants. Ritzer illustrates this rationalization process through the following four dimensions: (1) efficiency, or the ideal means by which to achieve a given end; (2) calculability, which refers to the privileging of quantitative objectives over qualitative ones; (3) predictability, which describes the standardization of production and the product regardless of the setting; and (4) control, or the use of modern technology to replace the daily functions of the employee. Ritzer draws connections between McDonaldization and other institutions that have adopted this model, including education, politics, health care, tourism, entertainment, professional athletics, and recreation.

In spite of the advantages that accompany the McDonaldization process, there are also several disadvantages to operating under this model. These disadvantages can be found within a fifth dimension referred to as the "irrationality of the rational process." This fifth dimension reveals the extent to which the other four dimensions create counterproductive and disenchanting outcomes, ultimately associated with Weber's outlook on modernity and his metaphor of the iron cage.

Salvador Jiménez Murguía

See also Durkheim, Émile; Enlightenment; McDonaldization; Modernism; Modernization; Postmodernism; Weber, Max

Further Readings

- Gerth, H. H., & Mills, C. W. (1946). From Max Weber: Essays in sociology. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Giddens, A. (1990). The consequences of modernity. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press.
- Ritzer, G. (2008). The McDonaldization of society (5th ed.). Thousand Oaks, CA: Pine Forge Press.
- Turner, B. (Ed.). (1990). Theories of modernity and postmodernity. Newbury Park, CA: Sage.
- Weber, M. (1968). Economy and society. Totowa, NJ: Bedminster.

MODERNIZATION

Modernization involves a complex set of political, economic, technological, and cultural developments originating in Europe and now operative, in varying degrees, throughout the world. The key characteristics of modernization include the formation of nation-states, the development of capitalist economies, the differentiation of social spheres, and the transformation of religious life. Throughout the 20th century, modernization was thought to be closely tied to secularization, or the decline of religion, but major events of the past few decades have forced scholars to reconsider this assumption. Although modernization often involves a set of forces that are hostile to traditional religion, the link between modernization and religion is complicated for at least two reasons. First, modernization is in many ways a product of religion, and second, the idea of "traditional" religion as the counterpart to "modernity" is itself a product of modernization. In addition, disagreement continues as to what constitutes modernity and how religious traditions encourage, accommodate, or resist the logic of modern life.

There is no commonly accepted period in which modernization began, but there is a general agreement that modernization developed in Europe. At the most basic level, modernization begins with the problematization of a society's relationship to time. For a community to understand itself as "modern," it must construct its identity in distinction from its past, such that the past appears as an antiquated origin, even if it also figures nostalgically as an ideal utopia to which to return. Scholars have located the problematization of time as far back as the experience of ancient Israel, which is distinguished by its unique idea that it was called by God to leave its homeland and seek God's providential future. This distinctly historical understanding of religious experience is common to Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, and in this sense, each of these religions may be understood to have modernizing characteristics.

Medieval Europe

The development of an explicitly "modern" identity in contrast to an antique and outmoded past, however, can be located fairly precisely in late-medieval Europe. In the 12th and 13th centuries, twin developments in popular religiosity and in theological reflection gave rise to the sense that European culture was "modern" and had distanced itself from its past. First, the movement known as devotion moderna ("modern devotion") fostered a renewed sense of religious interiority and emotional forms of religious practice. Second, the theological movement known as the via moderna ("the modern way") encouraged a break with church tradition and emphasized the use of human rationality for making judgments about empirical realities. These movements combined with a heightened sense of historicity, thanks to the millennialism surrounding the year 1000, to create the foundations of the modern West. The distinctive characteristics of this modernity include a heightened sense of individual human subjectivity in the context of an inert, objective world, alongside a new appreciation for the possibility of manipulating the empirical world so as to achieve an idealized future.

The late-medieval period therefore laid the groundwork for a revolutionary shift away from a sacred cosmos to an empirical world increasingly available for use and calculation. The rejection of the "ancient way" was also a significant step toward the equalization of individuals and a new appreciation for human liberty. The poverty debates of the Franciscans in the 13th and 14th centuries gave way to the first invocation of the human "rights" discourse, and the retrieval of ancient Roman law in the 12th and 13th centuries became the foundation for political systems based on the right to own property. At the same time, the Catholic Church was undergoing significant transformation as it began to rationalize its administrative and legal systems.

The bureaucratic expansion of the Church came into conflict with the nascent experience of human individuality, rationality, and the "modern way," however. These conflicting tendencies reached a breaking point in the Protestant Reformation of the 16th century.

The Protestant Reformation

The Reformation is significant in the history of modernization for a number of reasons. For one, the reformers rejected the authority of church tradition. Instead, they argued that Scripture alone is a reliable source of God's revelation, and they used Scripture to defend the doctrine of salvation by faith alone. According to this doctrine, all individuals stand alone before God and depend entirely on God for salvation. Salvation was understood as a gift of God, independent of one's participation in the sacraments and the life of the church. Therefore, the reformers' soteriology posed a fundamental challenge to the role of priests, since the reformers believed that the individual confronted God directly and that there was no difference between the priest and the layperson. This reinterpretation of the relationship between God, the self, and the world had two consequences. On the one hand, it heightened the role of internal spirituality, for the individual believer was understood to confront God directly through prayer, Scripture, and the sacraments. On the other hand, the reformers' emphasis on God's sovereignty, otherness, and transcendence meant that the world was stripped of sacred value. The world was no longer a place where God was immanent everywhere; rather, the world became a profane object, subject to control and manipulation by human activity.

Although the Reformation was in essence a theological controversy, it had profound political and economic consequences as well. First, the reformers' emphasis on the equality of all humans, the human capacity for reason, and the value of human freedom contributed to the development of liberal political theory. By circumscribing the role of the church in the everyday affairs of individuals, the Reformation also emancipated aspects of social life from church regulation. This process is known as differentiation, in which spheres of life that were formerly under the control of the church came to be organized according to their own principles. This process made possible a new conception of state sovereignty in which the state was founded not on religious authority but on principles of contract, the rational self-determination of the individual, and the guarantee of human liberty. As political institutions were differentiated from religious structures, there were widespread movements to emancipate property from church control as well. Secularization, or the seizure and redistribution of church property, along with the transfer of economic regulatory powers to political leaders, laid the foundation for liberal, free-market economies.

Enlightenment Rationalism and Christian Pietism

The political, economic, and theological upheavals of the 16th century also had important ramifications for the development of the empirical sciences. Whereas the medieval church cautioned against the overextension of human curiosity, early-modern Europeans were beginning to experience the benefits of a this-worldly, instrumental rationality. Breakthroughs in science and technology in the 17th and 18th centuries, such as the development of a uniform, multigenerational scientific method, culminated in what Hans Blumenberg has called the “triumph of theoretical curiosity.” In turn, technological developments contributed to the expansion of trade and exchange around the globe, especially during Europe’s colonial period. Colonialism enabled a massive transfer of wealth to Europe, and with it an unprecedented accumulation of power, which radically transformed Europe’s position in world politics. The 18th and 19th centuries saw two major adaptations to these changes: Enlightenment rationalism and Christian pietism. These movements celebrated the role of reason and the possibility of progress, on the one hand, and the centrality of the individual, on the other. Both movements bolstered the transformations already under way in politics, economics, and science, and together with Europe’s colonial endeavors, they contributed to the marked accumulation of wealth and power in the West.

Secularization, Progress, and the Self- Contradictions of Global Modernization

By the 19th century, the European experience of cultural, political, and economic development created a distinctly “modern” notion of historical progress. Technological development, economic growth, and scientific advances such as Darwin’s theory of evolution all contributed to the organization of human consciousness around a linear notion of time, pointing toward an ideal future of human liberation. Debate about the origins of the notion of progress is ongoing. Some scholars have located variants of a teleological, progressive vision of history as far back as St. Augustine around 400 CE, while others have related the origins of linear time to the development of clocks in the 14th century and the rationalization of labor time. Regardless of the precise origin of the notion of progress, however, scholars agree that the ideology of progress is one of the hallmarks of the “modern” world, and the 19th century is distinguished by the formation of progressive philosophies of history, such as those of G. W. F. Hegel and Karl Marx. Both Hegel and Marx expected that history would result in an era of human liberation once humanity had overcome its servitude to religion and superstition.

Europe’s cultural successes and its confidence in the triumph of secular rationality over religion led to its profound expectation that world history would follow its example. The founders of modern social theory (Karl Marx, Max Weber, Émile Durkheim) generally believed that modern rationalization, bureaucratization, and the spread of the Enlightenment principles of reason and democratic liberalism would lead to a worldwide decline of religion. Weber, perhaps the most influential thinker on the relationship between modernization and secularization, argued that modernity was the denouement of a tendency latent within Christianity, especially within Calvinist Protestantism. Weber argued that Calvinism fostered what he called “inner worldly asceticism,” or a thrifty work ethic that shares an “elective affinity” with capitalism. In turn, capitalism encourages the rationalization of the world and the privatization of religiosity, with the result that religion in modernity is forced to adapt itself to capitalist modes of organization and exchange. Religion becomes just one more commodity for private consumption, and a plurality of religious traditions compete for religious adherents. Hence, pluralization and privatization of religion constitute the structural features of modernization as secularization, and both processes are commonly understood to result in a decline in the social significance of religion.

The reality has proven much more complex, for several reasons. First, modernization can engender religious resistance, as evidenced by the recent increase in politicized religion across the globe. Even in the absence of such historical examples, the very concept of modernity depends on the continued existence (real or imagined) of its “other,” which it construes as a reactionary and traditional mode of life that belongs in the past. The same dynamic is operative within the idea that modernity offers a uniquely secular future. For example, Talal Asad has argued that the concept of “the secular” must be understood as part of a political project of secularism, in which the modern world positions itself over and against a religious “other” so as to purify itself from it.

Second, modernizing tendencies can be found in different combinations in religious traditions worldwide. Scholars have shown that, for instance, Buddhism encourages resistance to desire, interiority, and personal discipline, and the period of Buddha’s preaching is marked by urbanization, the appearance of a monetized economy, and the spread of contractual relations across society. All of these are aspects of modernization, even though they do not result in the same constellation of political, economic, and scientific institutions as in the West. Similarly, Confucianism helped stabilize and rationalize the bureaucratic systems of ancient Chinese empires, which in some cases rival modern bureaucracies. Thus, modernization is not entirely unique to the West, and modernization may proceed in many different ways.

Third, modernization has self-contradictory tendencies. For example, one of the most important processes of modernization is “polity secularization,” or the separation of religion from the state. However, modernization also involves extending political power to individuals who often have religious motivations. This means that polity secularization can coexist—albeit problematically—with the politicization of religion. Examples of politically active religions within the context of modern states include the resurgence of Protestant fundamentalism in the United States in the 1980s, the socialist agitation by the Catholic Church in Latin America in the 1960s and 1970s, and Hindu nationalism in the 1990s and early 2000s. Thus, modernization proceeds unevenly and unpredictably, with different consequences around the globe.

What differentiates the global experience of modernization from the European experience is that while Europe’s modernization was immanent within its own history, non-European cultures are experiencing modernization as an external and often unwanted process. Currently, the stakes of modernization are being contested most urgently within the context of Islam in the Middle East. In the past two centuries, Islam’s history has been marked by its experience with colonial Europe. Europe’s colonizing presence in the Middle East engendered two responses within Islam: moderate reform movements among Islamic elites and intellectuals, on the one hand, and resistance movements, on the other. Examples of the latter include the formation of organizations such as the Muslim Brotherhood and the Islamic Society, which emphasize the self-sufficiency of Islam. This categorization of Islam into accommodating and resisting tendencies is complicated, however, by events such as the Iranian Revolution of 1979, which wed modern political forms with Islamic fundamentalism. Since then the Middle East has been marked by increasingly virulent forms of politicized religion that explicitly oppose “Westernization,” although this phenomenon must be compared with the growing presence of Islam in the West, as the presence of Islam has increased dramatically in Europe, the United States, and Africa and around the globe.

The revitalization of Islam after the colonial period can be compared with the resurgence of Hinduism in India. India also experienced a long period of colonial influence, followed by a nationalist effort to revive the core of “Hindu-ness.” Historically, Hinduism is marked by flexibility, multiplicity, and the absence of any one priestly or authoritative class. It has proven remarkably adaptive, mixing new forms along with a traditional core, thereby contradicting secularist expectations that modernization would diminish religious participation. For example, Hinduism has proven remarkably adaptive to technology and has used the mass media quite successfully for religious renewal. Hinduism has also accommodated modern political forms; the success of the Hindu nationalist party, the Bharatiya Janata Party, is the best example. Hence, India is experiencing a religious resurgence alongside political liberalization, economic growth, and technological development, belying the Western model of modernization as secularization.

Buddhism and Confucianism have their own experiences of modernization as well. Neither conforms to the European model, but both are affected by the colonial and neocolonial democratic policies of Europe and the United States. Following World War II, political leaders across Malaysia, Vietnam, Korea, and other parts of Southeast Asia tended to view Buddhism as backward and superstitious and attempted to achieve modernization by revolution and reform from above. The failures of political reform led to popular resistance, however, which was largely informed by the Buddhist ideal of compassion. Although Buddhism has ascetic tendencies that otherwise encourage withdrawal from worldly life, its emphasis on compassion has provided a platform for nonviolent political response to trauma. Buddhism has also achieved worldwide influence, particularly since World War II, when great numbers of Southeast Asian peoples were displaced around the globe.

The modernizing ambitions of revolutionary campaigns in Buddhist countries could be compared with the rise of secular nationalism in China after the revolution of 1911. Throughout the first half of the 20th century, secular elites blamed Confucianism for a spate of cultural, economic, political, and geological disasters. Since the rapid expansion of China's economy starting in the 1980s, however, scholars now argue that China's Confucianism may be responsible for its rapid modernization. The strength of the Confucian tradition, strong family ties, the value placed on education, and the state's commitment to welfare and economic growth have brought China to the forefront of economic and political power in the 21st century. Once again, China's example undermines the idea that modernization is inimical to religious life.

In conclusion, modernization cannot be understood as a uniform, linear, or singular process. In fact, this model of history and development is itself a fantasy produced by modernization. Instead, modernization has multiple origins and contradictory tendencies, and it produces its own enemy so as to cleanse itself from it. The last words on modernization might just be those of Bruno Latour's provocative thesis: "We have never been modern."

A. R. Bjerke

See also Enlightenment; Fundamentalism; Global Religion; Globalization; Internet; Modernism; Postmodernism; Religious Nationalism; Secularization

Further Readings

- Asad, T. (1993). Genealogies of religion: Discipline and reasons of power in Christianity and Islam. Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press.
- Benavides, G. (1998). Modernity. In M. C. Taylor (Ed.), Critical terms for religious studies (pp. 186–202). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Blumenberg, H. (1983). The legitimacy of the Modern Age. Boston: MIT Press.
- Esposito, J. L. (Ed.). (2008). Religion and globalization: World religions in historical perspective. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Fox, J. (2008). A world survey of religion and the state. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Latour, B. (1993). We have never been modern (C. Porter, Trans.). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

MOLDOVA

In ancient times, what we call today the Republic of Moldova, located in southeastern Europe between Romania and Ukraine, was part of Dacia, which became a protectorate of the Roman Empire. During the Middle Ages, the majority of what we call Moldova was part of the Principality of Moldavia. The eastern section of the principality was taken by Russia in 1812 and renamed Bessarabia in 1812, and it is this area that is the present-day Republic of Moldova.

Moldova allows freedom of religion and has this basic civil right written in its constitution. However, religious groups might find themselves unable to carry out daily activities due to constraints imposed by the authorities. Usually, the assorted religions throughout the country treat each other with tolerance, and relations are basically harmonious, but disagreements abound between the diverse groups of Christian Orthodox believers. In addition, accounts from several sources indicate that members of the Jehovah's Witnesses have experienced persecution, as have the priests and followers of the Orthodox Church.

The principal faith throughout Moldova is Christianity, with up to 90% of the people stating their adherence to the Eastern Orthodox Church. Within the umbrella of the Eastern Orthodox Church two independent churches exist that are members of two autocephalous (the hierarchical practice where the church head need not answer to anyone else, including bishops) structures. The sovereign Metropolis of Chişinău and Moldova (both are Russian Orthodox) possesses almost 1,200 churches, whereas the Metropolis of Bessarabia (Romanian Orthodox) has 124 churches. Almost 4% of the Moldovan population adhere to the religious tenets of the Old Rite Russian Orthodox Church, which is composed of what is called “Old Believers” (an allusion to the churches and its members that did not acknowledge the reorganization and restructuring started in the 1600s by Patriarch Nikon). It is sometimes hard to pinpoint where the Eastern Orthodox religious customs and practices begin and end, as they pervade Moldovan culture. Following traditions is considered highly important throughout the entire country; for instance, many atheists genuflect and kiss icons as though they believed in God, because it is what is expected. If they abstained, social pressure would likely force them to do so.

Other Christian groups include Roman Catholics, Baptists, Holiness (primarily Pentecostal in nature: speaking in tongues, charismatic preachers, etc.), Seventh-Day Adventists, Muslims (judged to be around 3,000), Jehovah’s Witnesses, Baha’is (a monotheistic group that originated in Persia during the 1800s), Jews (approximately 32,000), Unification Church members, Molocans (a Protestant group that refused to abide by the dictates of the Russian Orthodox Church during the 1600s), Messianic Jews (those who believe the doctrines of Judaism but also believe that Jesus was the promised Messiah as foretold in the Hebrew Bible), Lutherans, Presbyterians, and Hindus (primarily Hare Krishna followers). Mormonism has also made headway in Moldova as there are 250 members comprising two different congregations.

The constitution states specifically that if a church wishes to organize and function in Moldova, it must inform the government and register itself. If the church does not acquiesce, it is impossible for it to own any property, have employees, or acquire burial plots in cemeteries. In addition, the constitution says that anything told within the walls of a confessional is considered sacrosanct and may not be violated by the government.

Cary Stacy Smith and Li-Ching Hung

See also Eastern Orthodox Christianity; Global Religion; Romania; Russian Federation; Ukraine

Further Readings

- Juergensmeyer, M. (2006). The Oxford handbook of global religions. New York: Oxford University Press.
 Reid, R., & Pettersen, L. (2006). Romania and Moldova. Melbourne, Australia: Lonely Planet.

MONACO

Monaco is located in the northern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, surrounded on three sides by France. Monaco is divided into five different areas: (1) Monaco-Ville, the old fortified town; (2) the Condamnie, the harbor area; (3) Monte Carlo; (4) Fontvieille, a man-made waterfront area; and (5) Moneghetti, which shares a border with Cap d’Ail.

Monaco has been ruled by the Grimaldi family since 1297, when Francesco Grimaldi disguised himself as a monk and seized the fortress of Monaco. He led an army into the fortress, retrieving it in the name of the pope. In 1793, French Revolutionary forces captured Monaco, and Monaco remained under French rule until 1814. The Franco-Monagasque Treaty of 1861 granted sovereignty to Monaco; despite Monaco being a sovereign state, France is still responsible for Monaco’s national defense.

Monaco has been a constitutional monarchy since 1911, with the sovereign prince of Monaco as head of state. The head of the government is the minister of state, who presides over a five-member Council of Government. The parliament, the National Council, is unicameral, and the sovereign prince shares power with this body of government. Each member of the National Council is elected to 5-year terms. The local affairs of the principality are presided by the Communal Council, whose 15 elected members are led by the mayor.

Monaco is the second smallest country, by size, in the world. The Monagasque constitution allows for religious freedom, and in this small principality of 485 acres, six religions are represented.

The official religion of Monaco is Roman Catholicism, and approximately 95% of the population are Roman Catholic. There is one cathedral and five Roman Catholic churches. An archbishop presides over the official duties of the Roman Catholic diocese in Monaco. Roman Catholic celebrations hold a special significance in Monaco and are observed in the principality.

The holy festivals and feasts celebrated in Monaco are Holy Week and Easter Sunday and the feast days of St. John, observed on June 23, St. Roman, observed on August 9, and St. Devote, the patron saint of Monaco, celebrated on January 27, when there is a torchlight parade, which signifies St. Devote's arrival at the principality.

Other religions are also practiced in Monaco. There is one Anglican church in Monaco, St. Paul's. The church is a member of the Anglican Dioceses of Gibraltar in Europe. One hundred and thirty-five Monagasques are members of the church, but church membership varies, serving Anglicans who come to the church as parishioners but those who come to the principality as tourists.

Monaco has one Jewish association, The Association Culturelle Israelite de Monaco, founded in 1948. The association has a synagogue, a community Hebrew school, and a kosher food shop, all located in Monte Carlo. The Jewish community consists of Jews from Britain and northern Africa, with one third being Ashkenazi and two thirds being Sephardic.

Religious beliefs also practiced in Monaco are Greek Orthodox (one temple), Protestantism (two churches), and Islam.

Laila Kamali

See also France; Roman Catholicism

Further Readings

- Hintz, M. (2004). Enchantment of the world series: Monaco. Danbury, CT: Scholastic Library.
- King, D. C. (1997). Cultures of the world: Monaco. Tarrytown, NY: Marshall Cavendish.

MONASTICISM

Monasticism is a way of religious life, typically in the form of an institutionalized practice that involves separation from the rest of society and various rules and ascetic disciplines, adopted by individuals who seek a higher level of spiritual attainment or religious experience than they deem possible by ordinary participation in the world. Etymologically, monasticism is derived from the Greek monachos ("living alone"), yet monastic lives, although commonly celibate, may be conducted either in an eremitic mode (as a hermit or an anchorite, hence a religious recluse) or in a cenobitic mode (living in community). Monastic systems developed primarily in two faith traditions: Christianity and Buddhism. Jainism also has a monastic tradition similar to that of Buddhism but less influential, and Hinduism has its own monastic component, which is in some ways similar to Buddhist monasticism.

Christian Monasticism

Christian monasticism is a consecrated form of life, neither clerical nor lay, pursued by men or women voluntarily to engage in loving God above all else through active and contemplative disciplines. Living ascetically, they seek renunciations corresponding to the three evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

Cenobitic monasticism includes monastic communities proper (observing liturgical hours and living together in enclosed compounds), mendicant orders or friars (centered on poverty, mobile preaching, and service), and apostolic communities (focusing on good works as a social ministry). Eremitic monasticism typically emphasizes solitariness and contemplation rather than codified behavior, while semi-eremitic lavras consist of a loose structure of eremitic or anchorite cells and huts, providing a degree of community yet without ties to an external hierarchy.

The first person to structure a cenobitic community was Saint Pachomius (ca. 290–346). Saint Anthony of Egypt (ca. 251–356) is, however, largely considered the founder of organized monasticism, primarily because his rule was the first model for a monastic life of austerity and penitence.

The rule of Saint Augustine (354–430) followed thereafter as a code of monastic rigor. Saint Anthony himself lived as a hermit and is credited with being the model for the Desert Fathers—fourth- and fifth-century quasi-eremitic monks in Egypt and Palestine who sought individual accountability with a spiritual elder and practiced celibacy, asceticism, and separation from family and society. Desert Mothers also existed, yet their asceticism occurred in more cenobitic settings. In spite of this broad common root, monastic developments occurred differently in the West and the East.

Western monasticism developed primarily after a model established by Saint Benedict of Nursia (ca. 480 to ca. 550), whose famous Rule remains archetypal for cenobitic monastic life in the West even today. Its adaptability to novel settings as well as its accent on moderation and a family spirit ensured its longevity. The Rule's two vows focus on stability, consisting of tying oneself to a monastic community till death, and conversion of life, whereby one seeks lifelong perfection under the explicit call to obedience and the implicit call to poverty and chastity. Toward the end of the first millennium, Benedictine monasteries became central to the intellectual and ecclesial life in Europe. Prayer, work, and lectio divina ("meditative reading of the scriptures") made up a balanced monastic day. A major movement starting at the abbey of Cluny in Burgundy in the 10th century disrupted this balance, skewing the monastic preoccupation toward extended community prayer and creating a centralized monastic confederation known as the Cluniac system, with a vast hierarchy of monasteries scattered throughout Europe. Vigorous reactions against it appeared as a resurgent pro-eremitic monasticism, especially among Carthusians and Cistercians, who desired to return to the solitary poverty of the early Egyptian monks. A further change started around the 13th century, when the rise of urbanization occasioned the need for fewer stable, self-enclosed communities; friars appeared on the monastic stage, most notably Franciscans, Dominicans, and Carmelites, serving as itinerant preachers and, with the advent of universities, as professors. Women had been part of the monastic tradition from its inception, either as nuns attached to double houses or in female-only monasteries. However, a thoroughly women's movement had not originated until around 1200s in northern Europe; known as the Beguines, these were Catholic laywomen living a monastic life yet without taking permanent vows or establishing a monastic order. Once the Reformation spread on the European continent, monasteries of all kinds were often closed, especially in the areas where Protestantism dominated. However, in the 20th century some Protestant denominations, such as the Anglicans and the Lutherans, founded several monastic communities; an ecumenical contemplative center was also established at Taizé, France.

Eastern monasticism developed differently from its Western counterpart. The writings of Saint Basil (ca. 330–379) provided a foundation, while the later work of Saint Theodore of Studios (759–826) added a Byzantine reinforcement. Eastern monasticism grew and thrived during the Byzantine Empire, and it further spread in the Orthodox Slavic countries, especially Russia; yet it came to a halt there in 1917 during the Bolshevik Revolution. It revived again throughout eastern Europe after 1989. Eastern Christian theology and monasticism grew as two sides of the same coin; the ascetic and contemplative character of this theology calls for a purification and conversion of life that coincides with the monastic ideal. Monks or nuns do not have different moral obligations from other Christians; poverty, obedience, and resisting worldly thinking are common duties, although monastic life opens up the possibility of achieving perfection in these virtues. Eastern Orthodoxy does not include monastic orders or a centralized rule. Monks and nuns live either in cenobitic and idiorhythmic monasteries, or in lavras (or sketes) as hermits to various degrees. Eastern eremitic monasticism is sometimes referred to as Hesychasm, although this term also denotes a dynamic mystical experience of silence and a psychosomatic practice known as the "Jesus prayer." Each ethnic group where Orthodox Christianity found a home also has women's monasteries. One significant Orthodox site from which women are excluded is Mount Athos in Greece, which has housed Orthodox monks since 961 and which has every national Orthodox Church monastically represented.

Buddhist Monasticism

Buddhist monasticism is the oldest known monastic system in the world, with cenobitic and eremitic forms having coexisted from the very beginning. Monks (bhikkhus) and nuns (bhikkunis) do not seek isolation from society. Since monastics depend on donations from lay people for survival, while the laity receives the teaching that only monastics can provide, monasteries have typically been established in the proximity of other settlements.

The movement began in India in the sixth century BCE with Siddhartha Gautama (586–483 BCE) seeking salvation from human suffering and finding enlightenment and a salvific path, and with both men and women consequently joining the quest. This path, both monastic and lay minded, is a “middle way” between ascetic and self-indulgent extremes, and it presupposes an allegiance to the “triple jewel,” which includes (1) the dhamma or dharma (Buddhist doctrine), (2) the sangha (the monastic community and, by extension, all who call themselves Buddhist), and (3) Buddha himself. Monasticism is paramount for the survival of Buddhism because monks and nuns provide the continuity of dhamma by teaching it to others as Buddha himself did. Their lifestyle alternates between wandering in order to preach and being stationed in monasteries. In addition to following the same precepts as lay Buddhists, monks and nuns must take vows of chastity and celibacy. The rules of daily monastic discipline are contained in the Vinaya-pitaka, which has historically functioned as a textual support for the sustenance and systematic growth of the sangha. Buddhist rules tend to be flexible, however, allowing for emendation when regional conditions require it.

While there are no monastic orders in Buddhism, the three main Buddhist schools gave rise to rather different monastic institutions. Theravada, the oldest monastic school and the most enduring form of Hinayana Buddhism, is described in the Pāli canon as “the way of the elders,” emphasizing self-reliance, personal experience, and one’s own enlightenment and reaching of nirvana. It is predominant in Sri Lanka, Myanmar, Thailand, Laos, and Cambodia. The Mahayana school, or the “great vehicle,” has spread in India, China, Korea, Japan, Vietnam, and Tibet as a reform against solitary enlightenment, suggesting that one delays it to teach and offer compassion, hence acting as a bodhisattva so that others may attain nirvana too. Whereas the Theravada sangha includes only monastics, the Mahayana community has made room for lay followers. On the other hand, the ordination of nuns died out in the Theravada tradition, while Mahayana preserves it. To become a Buddhist monk or nun, one must receive a lower ordination into the novitiate, then a higher one for full inclusion. However, no Buddhist ordination is necessarily permanent: A monk or a nun may voluntarily return to lay life. The third Buddhist school, the Vajrayana, or the “thunderbolt vehicle,” although of Indian origin, is especially known among the monastics of Tibet, who practice the visualization of deities and repetition of mantras and believe that they have insight into the best teachings of Buddha. Heads of Tibetan monasteries or important teachers are known as lamas, of whom the highest is the Dalai Lama.

Jain monasticism is highly similar to its Buddhist counterpart. Its founder, Vardhamana Mahavira, was Buddha’s contemporary and, like him, pioneered a movement in which monastic communities were central from the start. The code of behavior for Jain monks and nuns is close to the Buddhist one, yet the ascetic severity of Jainism is stronger. Jain monasticism is practiced today chiefly in India. Hindu monasticism is primarily practiced in sadhu sects and by individual holy men seeking after ultimate truth. In Hinduism the first stage of life—the student stage—is one reserved for celibacy, as is the fourth stage of life, in which the elderly search after truth.

Natalia Marandiuc

See also Asceticism; Christianity; Dalai Lama; Eastern Orthodox Christianity; Gautama, Siddhartha; Hinduism; Jainism; Mahayana Buddhism; Mysticism; Protestant Christianity; Roman Catholicism; Sexuality; Theravada Buddhism; Vajrayana, Tibetan

Further Readings

- Creel, A., & Narayanan, V. (Eds.). (1990). Monastic life in the Christian and Hindu traditions: A comparative study. New York: Edwin Mellen Press.
- Gombrich, R. (1988). Theravada Buddhism: A social history from ancient Benares to modern Colombo. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Gombrich, R., & Bechert, H. (Ed.). (1984). The world of Buddhism: Buddhist monks and nuns in society and culture. New York: Facts on File.
- Johnston, W. M. (Ed.). (2000). Encyclopedia of monasticism. Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn.
- Kardong, T. (1996). Benedict’s rule: A translation and commentary. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press.

Leclercq, J. (1982). The love of learning and the desire for God: A study of monastic culture. New York: Fordham University Press.

Nichols, A. (1995). Light from the East: Authors and themes in Orthodox theology. London: Sheed & Ward.

MONGOL EMPIRE

As the largest land empire in history, the Mongol Empire (1206–1260) embraced an immense diversity of cultures and religious traditions throughout Asia and Europe. The vast religious pluralism that characterized the Mongol Empire enriched the Mongolian indigenous culture and influenced the vocabulary of the Mongolian language. Genghis (also transliterated as Chinggis) Khan, the father of the Mongol Empire, and his successors believed that his ruling lineage was given sovereignty over the earth by the mandate of Eternal Heaven (Möngke Tenggrī), which destines all things. He and his successors regularly worshipped Eternal Heaven and consulted it at times of need through their chief shamans. A tent for the chief shamans always stood in front of the khan's palace, while the tents of other shamans who performed various functions stood behind his palace. Shamans had an important political role at the khan's court; they made astrological observations and predictions, presided over calendarical ceremonies, performed magic in times of war or to control the weather, and so forth.

The Mongols' interest in religion centered primarily on the pragmatic concerns of pastoral and nomadic life and on immediate goals. This facilitated their receptivity to any religious practice that could potentially yield desired results.

Despite the fact that shamanism was a dominant religion at the court of the Mongol Empire, the Mongol rulers never imposed shamanism or any other unified religion on their empire. The religious pluralism that characterized the Mongol Empire was due to the policy of religious tolerance first espoused by Genghis Khan and later upheld by his ruling heirs. Out of respect for other religious traditions, Genghis Khan spared religious buildings from destruction during his military campaigns. His policy of religious tolerance was rooted in the Mongolian civic religion revolving around Eternal Heaven, which the Mongols considered unitary and thus the same as Allah for Muslims, God for Christians, and Heaven (tian) for the Chinese. Once the Mongols came into contact with Buddhism, they also thought of supernatural entities (deva) from the Buddhist religion as tenggrīs. For this reason, the Mongol rulers viewed the major religions of their empire as converging on the same God and therefore as deserving equal status and support. Starting with Genghis Khan onward, the Mongol emperors exempted the clergy and scholars of Islam, Christianity, Daoism, and Buddhism from military service and taxes, and in turn, these religious scholars were expected to serve the empire and pray for the well-being of their Mongol rulers. However, such religious egalitarianism was by no means all-inclusive or free from sectarian intrigues—the supported religious groups were limited to the major orthodox traditions and to religious authorities who held state power within the individual territories of the empire. At times, the Mongol rulers suppressed and even eliminated religious groups (e.g., Isma'illīs, Dhutaists, or “heretical” Ch'an Buddhists) that were subversive to the empire or were deemed heretical by the religious authorities of the recognized traditions. Prior to 1260, the Mongol khans also denied Jewish, Zoroastrian, and Manichean priests the status and privileges of the recognized clergy; however, they never attempted to persecute these traditions.

Vesna A. Wallace

See also China; Islam; Ismailis; Mahayana Buddhism; Manichaeism; Mongolia; Shamanism; Shi'a Islam; Silk Road; Vajrayana, Tibetan; Zoroastrianism (and Parsis)

Further Readings

- Amitai-Preiss, R., & Morgan, D. O. (1999). Mongol Empire and its legacy. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill.
- Folts, R. (1999). Ecumenical mischief under the Mongols. Central Asiatic Journal, 43(1), 42–69.

MONGOLIA

The Central Asian region of Mongolia has had a diverse and significant religious history. From the formation of the Mongol state in the 13th century until the second conversion of the Mongols to Tibetan Buddhism in the latter part of the 16th century, the religious landscape of Mongolian territories was characterized by religious pluralism, which resulted from the Mongols' contact with other cultures through their military campaigns, diplomatic relations, and trade.

Although shamanism was the predominant religion among the Mongol tribes prior to the formation of the Mongol state in the early 13th century, Nestorian Christianity was also practiced. According to a letter of the 11th-century Nestorian metropolitan of Marv to the Patriarch in Baghdad, about 200,000 Turks and Mongols had converted to Christianity by 1009. The mother of the famous 13th-century Mongol khans—Möngke, Qubilai, and Hülegü—was also known to be a Nestorian Christian. Catholic and Russian Orthodox missionaries competed in their conversionary activities among the Mongols; and when Pope Innocent IV sent a letter to Güyük Khan, calling for the Mongols' conversion to Catholicism, Güyük Khan scorned him for claiming Catholicism as the only true form of Christianity.

Berke Khan of the Golden Horde (the latter part of the 13th century) was the first Mongolian ruler to become a Muslim, but by the end of the 13th century, many ordinary Mongols and Mongol lords in Il-Khanate had converted to Islam.

During the reign of Qubilai Khan, Tibetan Buddhism exerted an important influence on the Mongol court and peacefully coexisted with shamanism. The Mongols' conversion to Tibetan Buddhism in the 13th century was limited to Qubilai's court and the Mongolian nobility. The second conversion of the Mongol khans to the Gelugpa (dGe lugs pa) school of Tibetan Buddhism, which began in 1575, was accompanied by the persecution of shamanic practices and those who performed them and by the burning of shamanic ongghon figurines. Mongol khans used Buddhism to consolidate their powers and enforced it on their territories. This resulted in the widespread conversion of the Mongols to Buddhism and to the systematic destruction of shamanism as an organized religion. Owing to the support of the Manchu Qing Dynasty, which ruled Mongolia from the latter part of the 17th century until 1912, Buddhism became Mongolia's predominant religion. By the middle of the 18th century, shamanism was almost entirely extinct in Mongolia. During the theocratic period of the Bogd Khan state (1911–1921), ruled by the Eighth Jebtsundamba Khutukhtu, the religious and political head of the Buddhist community, the power of Buddhism reached its peak in Mongolia.

With the formation of the Mongolian People's Republic in 1924, which adopted Soviet communist policies, Mongolia was declared a secular state, which resulted in the subsequent suppression of religious expression, the destruction of Buddhist institutions, and the persecution of monks. After 70 years of religious suppression, in the late 1980s, the democratization of Mongolia facilitated a revival of Buddhism and shamanism and the inflow of diverse religious traditions from Europe, America, and Asia. Once again, the Mongolian landscape is characterized by religious pluralism, in which Buddhism stands out as the most dominant religion.

Vesna A. Wallace

See also China; Eastern Orthodox Christianity; Islam; Mahayana Buddhism; Mongol Empire; Roman Catholicism; Russian Federation; Sangha; Tibet; Vajrayana, Tibetan

Further Readings

- Bawden, C. R. (1989). The modern history of Mongolia. London: Kegan Paul.
 Moses, L. W. (1977). Political role of Mongol Buddhism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

MONOTHEISM

The concept of monotheism characterizes various religious traditions throughout the history of humanity. No boundaries have banned the interaction between religions around the globe, whereby diverse characteristics and cultural components are transferable. The term monotheism comes from the Greek mono (μόνο) meaning “only” and theos (θεός) meaning “god.” Hence, monotheism is the belief in the existence of a single God or in the oneness of God or simply that God is one. Monotheism is contrasted with polytheism, which is the belief in the existence of many gods, and with atheism, which is the denial of the existence of any god. In its recognition of God's presence and activity in every part of creation and its belief in a conscious, free God distinct from the physical world, monotheism is opposed to the religious philosophies of deism and pantheism.

The term itself was coined in fairly modern times by Henry More in 1680. In its contemporary use, monotheism designates the belief in the one supreme God, the Creator and Lord of the world, the eternal Spirit, almighty, all-wise, and all-good, the rewarder of good, and the punisher of evil.

As an ancient religious concept, it is argued that monotheism is a generalization that cannot be reduced to any modern category. Also, it always carries with it political constructs. This can be felt through the struggle for ideological and economic domination and for political legitimacy and power. In this world of differences, religious, political, and scholarly factors have furthered the dominance of a monotheistic system of belief, which has enabled humans to unite and mobilize in pursuit of great causes and, also, has forced them into brutal conflicts.

When, how, or even where the belief in one God first occurred will probably never be known, but the remarkable results are apparent in almost every aspect of the cultures and histories of the great monotheisms. In ancient Middle Eastern and Mediterranean religions, monotheistic elements are found. The monotheistic idea may have been derived from the centralized power of ancient empires, where everything seemed to flow from a single source. It can be said that one of the earliest instances of monotheism occurred in ancient Egypt in the 14th century BCE, during the rule of Akhenaton, who declared the one God. However, it did not long survive his death. Whether this reform is judged positively or not, it is apparent that Akhenaton's theology, if not fully monotheistic, strongly tends toward monotheism.

At the beginning of the sixth century BCE, and continuing into the early centuries of the Christian Era, Judaic monotheism developed in the same direction, as did Christianity and also later Islam under the influence of Greek philosophy, becoming monotheistic in the strict sense of the word and affirming the one God for all humans everywhere. Judaism, Christianity, and Islam are the three most significant religions from the Middle East, which are called the Abrahamic faiths because they trace their origins to Abraham. Though these three are known as the monotheistic faiths, there are monotheistic dimensions to Buddhism, Hinduism, Sikhism, and other religious traditions of Asia as well.

Some theologians and philosophers believe that monotheism evolved from polytheism, holding that monotheistic faiths are more advanced ethically, culturally, and philosophically than polytheistic faiths. Also, as a system of belief, many scholars consider monotheism as a higher form of religion than polytheism, and they consider the former as a later development of the latter. But the difference is not just a question of many gods as opposed to the one God; it is more related to the attributes of God, such as His "uniqueness" as the embodiment of divine might and power.

It is perhaps debatable whether the terms monotheism and polytheism are helpful in thinking about divinity both in ancient cultures, with their systems of beliefs and practice, and in our time. In recent years, this distinction has been recognized as limited, reductive, and, thus, inadequate to accommodate the beliefs of the many spiritual practitioners around the world, with all the complexities involved.

We find exclusive monotheism at one extreme and unlimited polytheism at the other. Judaism, Christianity, and Islam adopt in the main exclusive monotheism, where only one God exists—the one and only true God. On the other hand, there is the extreme position of unlimited polytheism as, for instance, in the classical religions of Greece and Rome, where the number of divinities is large, and in principle unlimited, and the deities vary in their status, power, function, and influence.

Between the extremes of exclusive monotheism and unlimited polytheism are the middle positions of inclusive monotheism and "henotheism." According to inclusive monotheism, which is related to the ancient Hellenic religions, there exist a great number of gods, but all gods are essentially one and the same. Henotheism is the belief in the worship of primarily one God, though the existence of other gods is acknowledged. The term monolatry is also used to refer to the worship of one God, whether or not the existence of other deities is posited. As a religious concept, henotheism was especially prevalent in some periods in the history of Babylonia and Egypt.

To regulate their experiences and their lives, people may adopt different positions regarding the transcendent reality. They can be theists, if they believe that there is such a transcendent reality, or they can be atheists, if they deny such existence. They can be monotheists, if they believe that there is only one such reality, or they can be polytheists, if they believe that there are many. They can be gnostics, if they believe that this transcendent reality is knowable, or they can be agnostics, if they believe that this transcendent reality is unknowable.

The monotheistic mentality is not limited to adherence to one of the three major monotheistic religions. Its most important aspect is the belief in absolute truth, which may be retained by people who are detached from any formal religious affiliation.

New forms of spirituality have emerged in the modern world, in which the revolutions in communication and information, migration, and globalization have all contributed to increased pluralism and religious interaction. This has affected all religions, which, in turn, has had a significant impact on globalization within the context of the diverse cultures of the world.

At various levels, religion and globalization share the concern for the meaning and purpose of human life. Both raise fundamental questions concerning self-identity and focus on our shared humanity. Spirituality, as an alternative to religion, has been characterized as transforming the tenets of religion into matters of personal opinion and has therefore been regarded by some as a threat to “authentic” religion.

World religions advocate both a worldview and a code of morality. They embody dissimilarities that reduce the possibility of finding common ground for cooperation as well as similarities that enhance it. Constructive dialogue among religious followers leads to greater tolerance and comprehension and brings greater peace and justice into our globalized world. The philosopher of religion John Hick argues that the ideals of interfaith dialogue correspond to their respective models of religious pluralism. He argues that all religions reflect the same ultimate reality and aspire to arrive at a fuller vision of the same reality. Hence, to achieve the best possible response to the reality is the principal condition of interfaith dialogue. Hick further claims that this may lead to the establishment of a world ecumenism, where differences between religious traditions appear less significant. However, he realizes that such a world ecumenism cannot be a single world religion. Rather, it should be a global theology of religions, which would consist of theories or hypotheses designed to interpret the religious experience of mankind.

Wilfred Cantwell Smith, a major contributor to interfaith dialogue and the field of comparative religion, regards different religious traditions as having “faith” in common, which is an essential human quality. In his view, what distinguish the various religions from each other are the respective forms the common faith takes. In this sense, monotheism and polytheism are simply different expressions of this common faith.

Majeda Omar

See also Christianity; Global Religion; God; Goddess; Henotheism; Hinduism; Islam; Judaism; Mahayana Buddhism; Polytheism; Sikhism; Theravada Buddhism; Vajrayana, Tibetan; World Theology

Further Readings

- Armstrong, K. (1993). A history of God: The 4,000-year quest of Judaism, Christianity and Islam. New York: Ballantine Books.
- Goodman, L. E. (1981). Monotheism: A philosophic inquiry into the foundations of theology and ethics. Totowa, NJ: Allanheld, Osmun.
- Hick, J. (1980). God has many names. London: Macmillan.
- Smith, W. C. (1979). Faith and belief. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Stark, R. (2001). One true God: Historical consequences of monotheism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

MONTENEGRO

Montenegro is a small southern European nation situated in the Balkans along the Adriatic coast, named after the black basalt-tinged mountains that dominate its landscape. Montenegro has a unique historical identity. Unlike their neighbors in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Albania, Serbia, and Kosovo, the Montenegrins were largely successful in thwarting substantial Ottoman influence from the 13th century onward, when the Ottomans began to advance on the Balkans. This has had the effect of uninterrupted Eastern Orthodox influence, to the point of the area having been ruled by the regional bishops of Cetinje for 300 years from 1516 to 1815 (while paying tribute to Istanbul) and by a secular government from 1815 to 1918. After World War I, Montenegro was a part of Yugoslavia in its multiple incarnations, with varying degrees of contentment over the arrangement, first under the Pan-Slavic state of Yugoslavia, then under the communist state of Yugoslavia, then in 1992 in the post-Cold War state known as the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (which consisted of Serbia, Montenegro, and Kosovo), then in 2002 as a federation of independent states with a combined military and foreign service known as Serbia and Montenegro, and most recently in 2006, autonomously as Montenegro. Montenegrins have traditionally felt an affinity for their Serbian neighbors mainly due to their common ethnicity and religious identity and have retained union with them until recently. The break was predominantly over increased Serbian nationalistic rhetoric and action, mostly under the tutelage of Slobodan Milošević. This has had the effect of making many Montenegrins nervous about their partner in the federation and suspicious of its activity on behalf of both nations. The bonds are strong between the two despite the recent schism, as both are Slavic and Eastern Orthodox countries. Montenegro has joined Slovenia in escaping the religious and ethnic bloodshed that has been the price of independence in the region since the fall of communist rule. Montenegro is staunchly Eastern Orthodox, with estimates ranging from 85% to 95% of the population. There are small minorities of Bosniaks (Muslim) and Albanians (Orthodox, Catholic, and Sunnī Muslim), yet the country's religious identity is thoroughly dominated by the Orthodox Church.

If Kosovo is the birthplace of Serbian Orthodoxy in regional Slavic mythology, Montenegro is its preserver. After the defeat of the Albanian and Slavic forces at the Battle of Kosovo in 1389, Slavic Christian culture and its various aristocratic lines were preserved in the remote monasteries of Montenegro. There has been dissatisfaction in recent years within the Orthodox community that has given rise to the proclamation of the Montenegro Orthodox Church (MOC) in 1993, claiming that the Montenegrin diocese operated autonomously prior to World War I. As it stands, Montenegro remains under the Autocephalous Serbian Orthodox Church, which has denounced the MOC as heretical and schismatic. The Serbian Patriarchate maintains control of the majority of Montenegro's church property and the official appointments of bishops and priests; the MOC, on the other hand, has been unable to gain control over the ever-important Cetinje monasteries despite several attempts to do so.

Christopher M. B. Allison

See also Eastern Orthodox Christianity; Kosovo; Russian Federation; Serbia; Yugoslavia

Further Readings

- Morrinson, K. (2009). Montenegro: A modern history. London: I. B. Tauris.
- Roberts, E. (2007). Realm of the Black Mountain: A history of Montenegro. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

MORMONS

Mormons are people who, through membership or ethnicity, are connected to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (LDS), a religious tradition that came into existence in the United States in the 19th century. Its founder, Joseph Smith Jr., published a book in 1830 that, according to its title page, was a history of tribes from the house of Israel who settled in the Western Hemisphere centuries before the birth of Christ. Said to have been written by an ancient warrior named Mormon, who inscribed the text on golden plates, the work, according to Smith, had been buried in western New York. An angel called Moroni directed Smith, a young farmer who lived near their burial place, to take possession of the plates in 1827. This still youthful adult deciphered Mormon's engravings, dictating what he read to a series of scribes, particularly Oliver Cowdery.

In the Bible-like volume the young seer filled with words he dictated to his scribes, the third and fourth chapters of the second book reveal that the coming forth of this work would be accompanied by the coming forth of a prophet—one whose name, like that of his father, would be Joseph. This revelation in a text that appeared to be as sacred as the Old and New Testaments meant that the young “seer and translator” who produced it would become the initiator of the movement that became Mormonism.

Origins and Early History

When Mormons describe the beginning of their faith, they are apt to tell the story of the prophet’s “First Vision,” which he had in 1820 when he was 14 years old. In it, he saw two anthropomorphic beings dressed entirely in white, whom he identified as God the Father and God the Son. As they were separate personages, the youngster concluded that the doctrine of the Trinity was a theological fiction. In addition, he learned from them that the true church was not then on the earth. Because the prophet did not describe this vision until 1832 and his full account of it was not published until 1838, it is obvious that for his early followers, the Book of Mormon legitimated Smith’s prophetic status. The signal import of the proclamation that a prophet called Joseph Jr. would arise when the prophetic Book of Mormon would speak out of the ground to the children of men came in 1829, when the first revelation addressed to anyone other than the young prophet himself was addressed to his father. The novice seer foretold to Joseph Sr. that “a marvelous work [was] about to come forth.” The “field was white to the harvest,” and those who thrust in their sickles with all their might “may stand blameless before God at the last day,” thereby bringing salvation to their souls.

Virtually identical revelations were addressed to several other religious seekers, including additional members of the Smith family, some neighbors from the Manchester area where the family lived, and a few others who traveled there when they heard about the religious events occurring at the western end of the Erie Canal. The revelation recipients, all members of a tiny group of followers who came together to await the completion of the “marvelous work,” were told that they were all called to embark on service to God. Most of them did so, first by becoming the salespersons who marketed the Book of Mormon from door to door with the result that, as charged to do so in the final chapter of the last book of the work, a surprising number of readers of the text asked God if the content of the work they had just finished was true. If, according to Moroni 10:4, they asked “with a sincere heart and real intent, having faith in Christ, he [would] manifest the truth of it . . . by the power of the Holy ghost.”

Because the “truth of it” included the promise that along with the book, the prophet would come forth, these Book of Mormon converts became some of the most dedicated of all the followers of the prophet. Others who had no opportunity to read the Book of Mormon were nevertheless convinced of its scriptural character by family members or friends who had read it. Yet others who met the young farmer who claimed to have found the plates and deciphered the engravings thereon became believers because they heard the revelations that came pouring through him and accepted the claim that he was a prophet. In particular, these followers heard of the establishing of Zion and warnings about the coming of the end-times.

Those who gathered around the prophet were also introduced the concept of restoration, the first event of which had occurred as the dictation of the new Scripture to Oliver Cowdery was moving toward completion. On May 15, 1829, John the Baptist, a resurrected messenger from God, who said he was acting under the direction of Peter, James, and John, the apostles who held the “keys to the priesthood,” conferred the ancient Priesthood of Aaron on the two men. A month later, a revelation through the prophet disclosed that the Council of the Twelve Apostles would likewise be restored. Both of these were, respectively, restorations of organizational units of Israel and the Church of Christ in earlier dispensations, before they were removed from the earth at the time of a “great apostasy,” when humanity departed from the pure Christianity that had been restored in what the Mormons call “the meridian of time.”

The restoration that would connect Mormonism more fully to understanding the great apostasy occurred in the spring of 1830, when the restored Church of Christ was again organized on the earth. It differed from other Christian bodies in that it was led by a prophet, its members had access to a new scriptural work, and it claimed to be the only Christian institution that was the actual restoration of the New Testament Church, returned now to the earth after an absence of nearly 19 centuries. Although the formal documentation of this event refers to a new church with only six members, in light of the growing size of the following congregating around the prophet, in all likelihood the number of actual members was much larger. In any event, the new church was regarded as ecclesiastical competition by the members of other Christian churches and other Christian ministers especially. As a consequence, Smith's followers were subjected to ridicule—they were called Mormonites, for example—and they suffered a fair amount of genuine persecution.

The Move Westward

One of the first actions of the newly restored church was the sending of missionaries westward to find and reveal to Native Americans that they were of the house and lineage of Israel. Traveling westward along Lake Erie, the first missionaries stopped in Kirtland, Ohio, a small town east of Cleveland. There they preached in a Campbellite church a restoration message of such power that they converted the minister, Sidney Rigdon, and many of his church members to the new faith. This more or less mass conversion led to an invitation to the prophet, his family, and his followers to move to Kirtland, an invitation that was gladly accepted by the leaders and many of the members of the new Church of Christ, which was beginning to call itself the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, in order to differentiate itself from another new Christian restoration body also organized in 1830, the Disciples of Christ.

In Kirtland, many of the radical ecclesiastical, doctrinal, and theological innovations that separated (and still separate) Mormons from other Christians were put in place in response to revelation. Many of these were a part of the extension of the concept of restoration. Here, the reality for believers of the restored New Testament Church became more the church of the apostle Peter than that of the apostle Paul. A critically important innovation was the gathering that, in accordance with a September 1830 revelation, called for Mormons to settle together, creating congregations that would be true communities headed by the swiftly emerging church hierarchy. Of equal significance was the calling of Joseph Smith Sr. to be the patriarch of the church and the initiation of the practice of giving patriarchal blessings, in which, among much else, the LDS were informed of their lineage in the various tribes of Israel.

Perhaps even more important, the construction of a sanctuary proposed by the prophet differed from other Christian churches in that the LDS built their first temple in Kirtland. Unlike most other Mormon temples, this one served as both temple and meeting house, but its dedication as a temple in the Solomonic style proclaimed the Mormon movement's understanding of itself as the restoration of Israel. The restoration of the Melchizedek priesthood, which came about in Kirtland, required that the internal architecture of the temple provide specific places for the quorums of the Aaronic (or lower) priesthood and the Melchizedek (or higher) priesthood, while a unique system of pulleys and heavy canvas curtains made it possible for veils to be lowered or lifted. During the temple dedication, the prophet and his first counselor, Sidney Rigdon, went behind the veil, where they saw Christ, who accepted the temple and said his name would always be there. In a second vision, Moses appeared and committed unto them the keys of the gathering of Israel, while Elias appeared and committed to them the dispensation of the gospel of Abraham, saying that in them and their seed, all generations would be blessed.

Kirtland, however, was only one of the "stakes," or geographical units. The other, more noteworthy theologically and important historically, was in Missouri. The Mormon colony that was established in that state's Jackson County came not in answer to an invitation from people already settled there but instead was organized pursuant to a revelation about the proper location of the city of Zion. In the summer of 1831, the prophet identified Independence as Zion's "center place" and a place west of the town as its temple site. The extent to which Mormonism was becoming the restoration of Israel was illustrated when 12 Mormons, representing the 12 tribes of Israel, laid the foundation for the temple by starting to construct a building on the spot that revelation affirmed as the place the prophet envisioned as the New Jerusalem. While this particular structure was never completed, so many LDS settled in the area that the old settlers, overwhelmed by their numbers and their industry, rose up and drove them from Jackson County, the nucleus of the new Mormon Zion.

The opposition faced by the Mormons in Ohio and Missouri often shaded over into persecution, which resulted in their being driven out of the state. In Ohio, the failure of a Mormon bank in the 1837 financial crash, combined with the old settlers' fears of being overrun by the gathered LDS, led to the tarring and feathering of the prophet and other leaders. Escaping the wrath of the Ohioans by fleeing to Missouri, the leaders were accompanied by the great bulk of their followers. In Missouri, the pattern was more complicated. When the Mormon settlers were driven from Independence, they first settled in a nearby county. But as increasing numbers of followers gathered in the area they regarded as Zion, the old settlers who governed Missouri set aside a county for the Mormons, called Far West, on the western edge of the state.

The Missouri Mormons flooded into the new county, where they were joined by their leaders, their Ohio brethren and their families, and an astonishing number of new converts. Sidney Rigdon, Smith's first counselor, preached an Independence Day sermon that warned non-Mormons (Gentiles) that persecution of the LDS would result in their extermination at the hands of God's Chosen People. A subsequent election-day fracas among Missourians and the LDS instigated so much violence that the state's governor issued an order decreeing that because of their open and avowed defiance of state laws, the Mormons must be exterminated or driven from Missouri. The ensuing state of war was the occasion of a horrid massacre (at Haun's Mill), the imprisoning of the Mormon prophet and other Mormon leaders, and an entire population of Mormon refugees being driven back across the Mississippi River to Illinois.

The Nauvoo Settlement

Commerce, a struggling town on the banks of the Mississippi River, was purchased by the Mormons, who renamed it Nauvoo. There the first (more or less true) LDS kingdom came into being. Once the gathering truly got under way, Nauvoo became—at least for a time—the largest urban settlement for Mormons in Illinois. Granted a city charter by the Illinois State legislature, Nauvoo was empowered to pass any laws not repugnant to the U.S. Constitution or the Illinois constitution. This essentially made the town a state within a state, a city with its own administration (nine alderman, four councilmen, and a mayor), its own court system, and a military organization known as the Nauvoo Legion to protect it. A temple site was selected, and construction was started. As liberal as was the Illinois legislature with its Mormon citizens, it did not concede their desire to separate Nauvoo from the rest of Hancock County. Consequently, the LDS' effort to turn their gathering place into a kingdom on the Mississippi miscarried.

As in Kirtland, Independence, and Far West, the "old settlers" took offense at the growing political power of the Mormons within the county, offense that was exacerbated by the LDS' block voting patterns. At the same time, rumors that the LDS leaders were practicing polygamy were spreading rapidly in the non-Mormon areas of the county. Although the LDS denied that polygamous relationships were being instituted, in fact the practice of what the Mormons called plural marriage had begun. It was a part of a third restoration layer, the restoration of the "Ancient Order of Things," which sought to re-create the world of ancient Israel by practicing marriage as was the custom in the days of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and other Old Testament patriarchs.

Unlike the restoration of the Church of Jesus Christ and the restoration of Israel, this third restoration layer included not only an esoteric practice such as plural marriage but also temple ordinances such as Endowments (in which LDS learn about exaltation in the world to come), marriage for time and eternity, sealings of children to parents, as well as baptism for the dead. Because most of these ordinances took place in private sacred space and generated no obvious change in the social order, plural marriage, which did generate change in the social order, initiated the greatest anxiety about what was happening both within and outside the Mormon community. The people the Mormons called Gentiles saw this alteration in the Mormon movement as ominous, especially since the Mormon leaders believed that, if needed, the well-armed and trained Nauvoo Legion would protect the community. Additionally, a significant number of LDS were likewise so disturbed by the situation that they launched a newspaper, the Nauvoo Expositor, that denounced the actions of the prophet Joseph Smith and called for the “unconditional repeal of the Nauvoo Charter” and the abolition of polygamy.

As mayor, Joseph Smith summoned the city council and, after 14 hours of deliberations, concluded that the Expositor was a public nuisance and should be destroyed without delay. This action—seen as extinguishing freedom of the press—so sharpened anti-Mormon sentiment that it, in turn, led to the murder of the prophet by the county militia, who wore disguises when they attacked the county jail where the prophet and his brother were being held, supposedly under the protection of the state’s governor.

Following the prophet’s death, the Mormons remained in Nauvoo for 3 more years until they were driven out by Hancock County’s old settlers. During that 3-year period, a struggle for the role of Mormon leader occurred that has taken on a mythical character. The story goes that on a Sunday soon after the prophet’s death, all the contestants for the prophetic role were given an opportunity to speak to the Mormon multitude. Every speaker had a claim to the prophetic post. Brigham Young, for example, was the president of the Council of the Twelve; William Smith was the brother of the prophet; Sidney Rigdon was the prophet’s first counselor, and so on. As they spoke, each one had a particular position on the level of restoration that henceforth should be the Mormon way, no matter what the prophet’s position at the end of his life. Brigham Young held that the church should be the restoration of the Church of Jesus Christ, the restoration of Israel, and the restoration of the Ancient Order of Things. Others believed that rather than being Nauvoo Mormonism, the movement should go back to being Kirtland Mormonism—without the restoration of the Ancient Order of Things, while some of the LDS were so worried that the gathering had led to so much non-Mormon opposition that they preferred to go all the way back to Mormonism when it was simply the restoration of the Church of Jesus Christ.

A good number of the Mormons who were in the audience as the various leaders spoke reported that when Brigham Young went up to speak, they saw (or felt) the prophet’s mantle settle on his shoulders. The future he held out to the LDS devastated by Joseph Smith’s murder was a Mormonism that re-created the movement as it had been when it was first led by Smith. This position appears to have appealed to many—or perhaps most—of Smith’s followers who had lived in Nauvoo. It was this group that followed Young across Iowa and onto the pioneer trek to the Great Salt Lake Valley. Because this group’s numbers were increased by the addition of converts who had joined the church in England, Scandinavia, and elsewhere in Europe, it became the largest group of Mormons to become institutionalized after the prophet’s death. The history of Young’s followers in the intermountain West has so dominated LDS history that many people assume that the entirety of the movement relocated to Utah.

Schisms and Migration

The reality is that at the time of Smith’s death in 1844, the tradition fragmented. The formation of multiple configurations of the tradition followed, each one holding on to some, but not all, of the theological, doctrinal, and ritual elements of the original. The two largest groups are the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, headquartered in Salt Lake City, and the Community of Christ (long known as the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints), headquartered in Independence, Missouri. Now almost a shadow of its former self, the Community of Christ is a small body that holds onto various parts of the Mormon tradition, especially its history, but neglects other parts, especially the Book of Mormon. When it was “reorganized” in 1860 under the leadership of the prophet’s eldest son, Joseph Smith III, the plan was that the church would always be led by a direct descendant of the first Mormon prophet, Joseph Smith. But that pattern was broken in 1996, when W. Grant McMurray became the president of the church. Even before 1996, dramatic change came to the church; in 1984, the ordination of women was adopted by the Reorganized Church. In that same year, another change, perhaps not equally important, but important enough, was a revelation that came through the church president that the Reorganized Church should build and dedicate a temple—something the “Saints who never practiced polygamy,” as they thought of themselves, had never had. These changes led to a schism that created the Remnant Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

In the years since its formation, a variety of factions have separated from the “Utah Church,” as it is often called. Thus, it has also had to deal with schisms. In most cases, the groups that have broken away from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints have been groups whose leaders and followers are convinced that the church’s decision to give up plural marriage in 1890 (at the behest of the U.S. government) was wrong. Consequently, most, if not all, of the schismatic groups that have left the church in Utah have been “fundamentalists,” who reinstated the practice of plural marriage.

Mormonism Today

Despite these schisms, the largest and most well-known clerical institution to come into being as a constituent part of Mormonism is the church headquartered in Salt Lake City, Utah. In 2010, this organization’s 14 million members were administered through 28,109 congregations in 166 different nations of the world. But this extraordinary diversity was undercut by the reality that 16.5% of the institution’s entire formal membership resides in the intermountain West (which students of the tradition call the Mormon Culture Region). In addition to those who have been active enough at some point in their lives to be included in the official count of church membership, residents of the intermountain area also include an undetermined, yet significant, number of inhabitants who have an adequate genealogical and/or cultural attachment to the tradition to call themselves Mormon or to be regarded as Mormon.

Even if only the church headquartered in Salt Lake City is considered, looking at Mormonism alongside the Shakers, the Oneida community, the Seventh-Day Adventists, and the Christian Scientists, this is, by far, the most important of the indigenous American religions.

Since World War II, this, the largest Mormon body, has changed dramatically. Before the war, the church, which had barely less than 1 million members, had no bureaucracy. The church’s records were maintained by volunteers, lay members of the church kept virtually all its programs going, and a huge majority of the church members resided either in the Mountain West, southern California, and the Pacific coast or in a few large cities in the nation. The church’s Word of Wisdom (refusal to drink coffee, tea, or alcohol; refusal to smoke) was an important Mormon identifier, and the church’s activities and various meetings were spread throughout the week. But Correlation, a program to make sure that all Mormons do the same thing at the same time on the same schedule, did not exist at the time.

By the mid-1970s, however, a huge church bureaucracy had been developed to keep up with the ever-increasing number of members, not simply in the United States and Canada but also throughout the world. The Word of Wisdom was and is still very important, but there are many other Mormon identifiers, including a carefully organized Correlation program, which guarantees that all the church’s members study the same written materials, they all follow the same pattern for Sunday services, their meetings have common agendas, and, most important, at church-run institutions of higher education, a dress code (including how the hair of males should be cut) creates a student body whose members so resemble each other that a “Mormon look” is a part of what it means to be an LDS.

While Salt Lake City remains the Mormon “center place,” the presence of Mormons in every other city and state of the United States, plus their presence in Canada and South America, Asia (particularly Korea), and Europe makes it obvious that the Utah Mormons are here to stay. Although many of the other forms of Mormonism are much smaller institutional units, so many of them have held together for so long that it is extremely likely that the other forms of Mormonism are here to stay as well.

Jan Shipp

See also Christianity; New Religions; New Religions in the United States; North America; United States of America

Further Readings

- Alexander, T. (1996). Mormonism in transition. Urbana-Champaign: University of Illinois Press.
- Allen, J. B., & Leonard, G. (1992). Story of the Latter-Day Saints. Salt Lake City, UT: Deseret Book.

- Arrington, L. J. (1986). Brigham Young: American Moses. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
- Bushman, R. (2005). Joseph Smith: Rough stone rolling. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.
- Givens, T. (2007). People of paradox: A history of Mormon culture. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Gordon, S. B. (2001). The Mormon question: Polygamy and constitutional conflict in nineteenth-century America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Hardy, G. (Ed.). (2003). The Book of Mormon: A reader's edition. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Neilson, R. L. (Ed.). (2008). Global Mormonism in the 21st century. Provo, UT: Brigham Young University Religious Studies Center.
- Prince, G. (2005). David O. McKay and the rise of modern Mormonism. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press.
- Shipp, J. (2000). Sojourner in the promised land: Forty years among the Mormons. Urbana-Champaign: University of Illinois Press.

MOROCCO

Morocco is a country located on the northwest corner of Africa. Although it is predominantly Sunnī Muslim, its cultural and religious heritage is multifaceted due to its unique combination of ethnic groups and influences from Europe and the Middle East.

The native term for the country is Al-Maghreb, which means “place of sunset” in Arabic. Historically, this name also applied to greater North Africa, as its location west of the Levant identified it with the sunset. Morocco has more than 30 million inhabitants, most of whom are of Berber, Arab, or mixed Berber-Arab ethnicity. The official language is Arabic, although the spoken dialect, Moroccan Arabic, is rather different from the Modern Standard Arabic of Middle Eastern print and official speech. In addition to Arabic, French is widely used in commerce and government and is taught in schools; English is also growing as a foreign language in education. About 40% of the country’s population speaks one of three main Berber dialects, Tarifit, Tachelhit, or Tamazight.

The geographical region is likewise diverse. The coastline touches the Mediterranean Sea to the north and the Atlantic Ocean to the west.

Morocco is home to the Rif and Atlas mountain ranges, the latter separating most of the inhabited area from the Sahara Desert. The western Sahara, south of Morocco, has been claimed and controlled by the Moroccan government since 1975, but it is a disputed region whose people are seeking independence. Rabat is Morocco’s capital; other important cities are Casablanca (the largest city and commercial center), Fez, Marrakech, and Tangier.

The Berbers are the oldest known indigenous group of the region. In the seventh century CE, Arab conquerors took over the land, which was formerly ruled by the Roman and Byzantine empires, and they brought Islam to the area. Although the Berbers fought for autonomy, they slowly adopted Islam, and today more than 99% of Moroccans are Sunnī Muslim. Many Berbers retreated to mountainous areas, where their concentration remains higher than in the urban centers. After the Arab conquest of the region, Morocco was ruled under various dynasties (Almoravid, 1042–1147; Almohad, 1123–1269; Merinid, 1248–1465; Sadi, 1511–1659; and Alawi, 1664–). In 1912, the French took Morocco as a protectorate, although the Alawi sultan was able to keep his position under French control. After a long struggle, Morocco gained independence in 1956 and is now ruled by a constitutional monarchy.

In addition to the Sunnī Muslim majority, there are small Jewish and non-native Christian minorities in Morocco. Sufi elements are also present, most notably in ritual Sufi music and the visiting of shrines to saints. Veneration of saints and the use of musical instruments have been criticized by conservative reformers, particularly within the Salafi reformist movement that spread to Morocco starting in the late 19th century. This line of thinking holds that Sufi beliefs and practices hinder Muslim reform.

Morocco’s relationship with Andalusian Spain has also influenced its architecture, music, and art. When Muslims conquered Spain in the eighth century CE, the arts took on a distinctive style that incorporated Spanish and Arab elements. Andalusian Muslims gradually retreated back to North Africa when Christians began to gain rule over Spain, starting in the 10th century. Although much was lost in this migration, attempts to preserve Arab-Andalusian arts still take place, for example, in the cultural center of Fez.

Kristin Tucker

See also Algeria; Fez; Islam; Mediterranean World; North Africa; Spain; Sufism

Further Readings

Munson, H., Jr. (1993). Religion and power in Morocco. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.

Pennell, C. R. (2001). Morocco since 1830: A history. New York: New York University Press.

MOSCOW

Moscow is the capital of the Russian Federation and the largest multicultural mega-city of eastern Europe. Its present population is estimated to be more than 10 million. The majority of Moscow's population is nominally Russian Orthodox, though a significant number of Moscovites follow Islam. Other religions of its inhabitants include Judaism, Roman Catholic Christianity, various forms of Protestantism (the Lutheran tradition, Methodism, Baptism, Pentecostalism), Buddhism, Neo-Paganism, and the Hare Krishna movement. As in Russia in general, nearly half of Moscow's nominal Christian population make only occasional visits to religious sites and exercise religious rituals. Yet Moscow is Russia's biggest religious center with about 500 religious organizations, 532 registered Russian Orthodox churches, 10 monasteries, 6 mosques, 5 synagogues, a Buddhist temple, a Sikh temple, a Hare Krishna assembly hall, and others. It is popularly known in Russia as "the city of the forty of forties" of churches and "the Third Rome." Its cultural landscape is still dominated by the Russian Orthodox churches and monasteries, of which the most famous are Our Saviour (Khrista Spasitelya [Figure 1]), Novodevichiy Convent, St. Basil's Church, and the cathedrals of the Moscow Kremlin.

The first reference to Moscow as the place in the Duchy of Rostov is in 1147. In 1327, Moscow became the capital of the Vladimir-Suzdal principality. After 1480, Moscow was the capital of an independent state that started to unite other Russian lands under its control. Since the 16th century, Moscow Christians have been independent from the Constantinople Patriarchate, and the Orthodoxy has enjoyed the status of a state religion. In the 17th century, however, the state-sanctioned attempts by Patriarch Nikon to modify the Christian liturgy led to the Church Schism and open social unrest and the emergence of the Old Believers communities. In 1712, the capital of Russia was moved to St. Petersburg, which was proclaimed the center of the Russian Empire. The position of the Patriarch was abolished, and the Synod or the Ministry in charge of the Russian Christian Church was established in 1721 in the rival city of St. Petersburg. The Patriarchate was terminated. The February 1917 coup d'état ended with the establishment of the monarchy, and the October 1917 revolution ended the period of domination of Russian Christianity in the country. At the same time, the Moscow Patriarchate was revived. In 1918, the Bolsheviks returned the Russian capital to Moscow. In 1924, it became the capital of the Soviet Union. In 1992, it remained the capital of the Russian Federation, the successor state of the Soviet Union.

Figure 1 Cathedral of Christ Our Saviour in Moscow

The multinational and multiconfessional composition of Russia's population does not allow the choice of Orthodox Christianity as the only ideology of the Russian state. Thus, the Russian Federation was proclaimed a secular state. Yet the state supports four main churches as traditional or historical religions: Russian Orthodox Christianity, Islam, Judaism, and Buddhism, in opposition to other churches, particularly new Protestant churches and new religious movements of a neo-Hinduism type and neo-Pagan cults. Moscow is the headquarters of the Inter-Confessional Council of religions.

Igor Yurievich Kotin

See also Eastern Orthodox Christianity; Europe; Global Cities; Russian Federation

MOSQUES

A mosque, or masjid in Arabic, is literally a clean space for prayer, oriented so that the praying worshippers are facing the holy city of Mecca. In Cairo, a mosque can refer to a piece of carpet next to a jewelry store on the third floor of the Ramses Hilton shopping mall or a monumental 12th-century building housing the head of Husayn, the Prophet's martyred grandson. A mosque means either a small prayer space near one's home or workplace for the five daily prayers or a large building purposely constructed for the Friday afternoon congregational prayer service.

The first mosque was Muhammad's home in Medina in the year 622 in the Gregorian calendar or year 1 in the Muslim calendar. The clean and undecorated palm-fronded courtyard and mihrab (marking the direction of prayer) form what architects call the hypostyle pattern, later seen in the Great Mosque of Córdoba. Similarly elaborating on the mosque's humble origins, a caliph, king, or wealthy donor can also build a large state mosque such as the Umayyad Mosque in Damascus, Jamé Mosque in Isfahan, or Sultan Ahmed Mosque in Istanbul.

The clearest sign of a mosque today is a dome or minaret, neither of which was originally Muslim. The Church of the Holy Sepulcher and Hagia Sophia provided models for the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem and Sultan Ahmed Mosque in Istanbul. Domes are particularly useful in colder climates, where more light is admitted to illumine the prayer space. In warmer climates, a lower flat ceiling of the hypostyle variety is more conducive to serene prayer and contemplation. Domes and minarets are more popular in Muslim-minority nations as historical markers and signs of confidence to non-Muslims. The origins of minarets may include church bell towers, Mediterranean lighthouses, desert caravan signal stations, or Zoroastrian ziggurats.

In the United States and Britain, the number of mosques registered for tax-exempt status tripled during the 1990s, from several hundred to over a thousand, with 9 out of 10 of these being storefronts or private homes. Purpose-built mosques, financed by foreign governments in Los Angeles, New York, Washington, and London are frequented by diplomats, visiting dignitaries, professionals, and students. A self-financed purpose-built mosque in the United States or Britain is usually an Islamic center that includes a lecture hall, offices, bookstore, kitchen, school, gymnasium, and mortuary in addition to the prayer space. Islamic centers have both an imam to serve as religious leader and a director to manage day-to-day operations, including public relations and outreach to non-Muslims.

The design of a purpose-built mosque or Islamic center is a statement of the religious and political orientations of the community and reflects a relationship with the larger society. The first goal of the architect is to maximize the prayer space given the budgetary and property constraints, including parking and traffic regulations. Then the theological and historical aspirations of the community must be reflected in the architectural style. The signage and façade may invite, intimidate, or be completely lacking, depending on the relationship with local non-Muslims. The prayer space for women can be next to, above, or below the men or eliminated altogether. Women are more likely to serve on the boards of directors of self-financed Islamic centers than foreign-financed mosques. Arabic is used for prayer, but local languages are used for the Friday sermon, or khutbah, in mosques that are not strictly orthodox.

Saudi-financed mosques are built using a one-dome, one-minaret formula based on an Ottoman model to invoke the most recent unified Sunnī caliphate. South Asian mosques are more likely to have an iwan-shaped entrance modeled after the mosque at Isfahan. In the United States and Britain, where churches and synagogues are common, domes have become the most important architectural marker of a mosque, a statement that declares and affirms the presence of a local Muslim community. A dome is a visible sign that a Muslim community consists of citizens, not sojourners.

In contrast to domes, which are affordable and familiar to non-Muslims, minarets are subject to greater contention. When an Islamic center is self-financed, the board of directors must often choose between a purely ornamental minaret or an elementary school or soup kitchen. In addition to symbolizing theological priorities, the sound from a minaret can be annoying to non-Muslims early in the morning, and the very sight of minarets can be offensive to those who think of Islam as a threatening religious tradition. When an Islamic Center in New York City proposed to relocate its center, including a mosque, several blocks away to a location near the site of the September 11 destruction of the World Trade Center, a howl of protests emerged from around the country. The mayor of the city, however, refused to halt the plans, citing the importance of tolerance and the peaceful purposes of the planned mosque and center.

Despite the ethnic and theological diversity of mosques around the world, there is a common ideal of providing a safe refuge for any Muslim. The use of simple, rational geometry and Qur'anic calligraphy is universally familiar and comforting and serves to spiritually uplift and anchor individual souls. In contrast to private collections, mosques lack figurative representations of scriptural narratives or personages as potential distractions from the spiritually and socially unifying effects of group prayer.

Vincent Francis Biondo

See also Arabic; Art; Churches; Islam; Sacred Places

Further Readings

- Ballard, R. (2004). Popular Islam in northern Pakistan and its reconstruction in urban Britain. Manchester, UK: Centre for Applied South Asian Studies.
- Biondo, V. F. (2006). The architecture of mosques in the U.S. and Britain. Journal of Muslim Minority Affairs, 26(3), 399–420.
- Dodds, J. D. (2002). New York masjid. New York: PowerHouse Books.
- Frishman, M., & Khan, H. U. (Eds.). (1994). The mosque. New York: Thames & Hudson.
- Grabar, O. (1969). The architecture of the Middle Eastern city from past to present: The case of the mosque. In I. M. Lapidus (Ed.), Middle Eastern cities (pp. 26–46). Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Haider, G. (1996). Muslim space and the practice of architecture. In B. D. Metcalf (Ed.), Making Muslim space in North America and Europe (pp. 31–45). Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hillenbrand, R. (1994). Islamic architecture. New York: Columbia University Press.

MOTHER TERESA (1910–1997)

“Blessed” Teresa was a European Roman Catholic nun who dedicated her life to Christ through her service to the poorest of the poor. Her work began in the slums of Calcutta (now Kolkata), India, and eventually spread across the globe. She is considered by many to be a modern-day saint.

Mother Teresa was born Gonxha (Agnes) Bojaxhiu on August 27, 1910, in the city of Skopje, which was then part of the Ottoman Empire and now the capital of Macedonia. In 1928, when she was 17 years old, she entered the Sisters of Loreto, taking the name Teresa. After studying English in Ireland, she was missioned to Kolkata, where she served in a high school for 20 years, eventually becoming the principal. During this time, she suffered a bout of tuberculosis and was sent to Darjeeling to rest. On this trip, she felt what she described as her “call within the call” from God to dedicate her entire life to the poor. In 1948, she left the Sisters of Loreto to work among Kolkata’s poorest people, drawing others to her work as volunteers. In 1950, her new order of women religious, the Missionaries of Charity, was approved by the Catholic Church.

Under Teresa’s leadership, the Missionaries of Charity took care of society’s outcasts in many ways, including opening and operating homes to care for the dying, working among lepers, and being among the first to minister to people suffering with AIDS (acquired immunodeficiency syndrome). In spite of her decades-long “dark night of the soul,” which Mother Teresa communicated in her recently published personal letters, her life’s work was inspired by a deeply held religious conviction and a profound Eucharistic spirituality. As her lifelong friend Eileen Egan explained, Mother Teresa pursued a personal relationship with Christ mediated through the Eucharist, which truly was the source and summit of her devotion and service to the poor.

During the course of her life, Mother Teresa received the highest recognition for her work. In 1971, Pope Paul VI awarded her the first Pope John XXIII Peace Prize, and in 1979, she won the Nobel Peace Prize. On her death in 1997, Pope John Paul II waived the typical 5-year waiting period for considering a cause for canonization, and Mother Teresa was beatified on October 19, 2003. Her order continues her work to this day, serving on every continent of the world.

Nicholas Rademacher

See also India; Roman Catholicism; Saints; Social Justice

Further Readings

- Egan, E. (1985). Such a vision of the street: Mother Theresa, the spirit and the work. New York: Doubleday.
- Mother Teresa. (2007). Come be my light: The private writings of the “Saint of Calcutta” (B. Kolodiejchuk, Ed.). New York: Doubleday.

MOZAMBIQUE

The Republic of Mozambique is located on the southeastern African coast along the Mozambique Channel and the Indian Ocean. Bordering five nations and across from the islands of Madagascar and Comoros, Mozambique spans a land mass of approximately 800,000 square kilometers and is prone to droughts, flooding, and storms. Mozambique became an independent nation in 1975. The national language is Portuguese, a legacy of five centuries of colonial rule and trade relationships with Portugal. Portuguese migration to Mozambique led to Catholic mission stations being established, oppressive assimilado policies of citizenship afforded to “civilized” Africans who were literate and “acted Portuguese,” and backbreaking labor for many Africans forced to work in mining industries under colonial pressure. The indigenato system of racial preference aroused the ire of the people and caused an African backlash on White residents, who were exiled from the country after it gained independence. Today, African ethnic groups constitute 99% of the population and include the Makhuwa, Tsonga, Sena, and Lomwe. In addition to Portuguese, the languages of Emakhuwa, Xichangana, Elomwe, Cisena, and Echuwabo are spoken in Mozambique.

Civil war and political unrest from 1977 to 1992 caused mass emigration, violence, and national instability, exacerbated by drought and widespread poverty. Military service registration is currently required for all legal-age Mozambicans, though without major threats internally or abroad, citizens are experiencing relative peace and stability. A form of African Marxism was used in government until 1989. The current political system in Mozambique, a republic using multiparty elections, was constitutionally adopted in 1990.

After being the leader for nearly two decades, Joaquim Chissano stepped down from office in 2004; Chissano worked to expand free market trade and improve the national economy through exporting agricultural products, surplus electricity, and aluminum. Mozambique's primary trade partners today include South Africa, the Netherlands, China, and India. Much of the current nation's gross domestic product relies on foreign assistance, and debts still unpaid have left the country scrambling to stave off inflation and the AIDS (acquired immunodeficiency syndrome) crisis, with an estimated one in eight Mozambicans testing positive for HIV (human immunodeficiency virus)/AIDS. The current president, Armando Guebuza, was reelected in 2009 for a second 5-year term.

According to the 1997 census, the nation's religious makeup includes 41.3% Christians (23.8% Catholics and 17.5% Zionist Christians), 17.8% Muslims, and 40.9% who identified as other or none, most of whom are practitioners of various African Christian denominations or African traditional religions. Under the Portuguese, Catholicism was the official religion of the colony and was used in the mission education system, though K. E. Sheldon notes that of all European colonies in Africa, rates of illiteracy were among the highest and frequency of school attendance the lowest for Portuguese Africans. Marxist ideologies postindependence promoted a secular state, but presently religious freedoms are upheld and promoted by government and citizens alike. Today, Sunnī Muslims are the majority population in the north, while in the nation's central and southern provinces, many denominations of evangelical Protestants, Catholics, and African Independent Churches predominate.

Christi M. Dietrich

See also Africa; Missions and Missionaries; New Religions in Africa; South Africa

Further Readings

- Azevedo, M., Nnadozie, E., & João, T. M. (2004). Historical dictionary of Mozambique (2nd ed.). Lanham, MD: Scarecrow.
- Sheldon, K. E. (2002). Pounders of grain: A history of women, work, and politics in Mozambique. Portsmouth, NH: Heinemann.

MUGHAL EMPIRE

The Mughal Empire is among the most influential dynasties in South Asian history. Established in 1526 with the deposing of the Delhi sultanate, under the leadership of generations of charismatic, ambitious, and highly effective emperors, the Mughal Empire experienced nearly 200 years of stable rule over much of the Indian subcontinent. The empire also facilitated a cultural renaissance that blended Islamic and Indic traditions. Today, the legacy of the Mughal era is found in various artistic, literary, and architectural wonders.

In 1526, Babur, a Central Asian general, after defeating Sultan Ibrahim Lodi in the Battle of Panipat, established the Mughal Empire, which he led until his death in 1530. Humayun, Babur's eldest son, then ruled the dynasty from 1530 to 1556. His reign was marked by infighting with his brothers as well as mixed fortunes on the battlefield against his rivals.

Humayun's son Akbar, the most successful and influential of the Mughal emperors, assumed the throne in 1556 after his father's death and reigned until 1605. Conquering vast territories including Gujarat and Bengal, Akbar significantly increased the domain of Mughal rule. The expanding empire was funded chiefly through revenues collected from trade and agriculture. Akbar installed the mansabdari, a sophisticated and highly efficient bureaucracy, to both defend and administer his empire.

Akbar strived to create an Indic empire free of sectarian strife. To this end, he gained support among many Hindu rulers by appointing them to high-level positions in his court and by eliminating the jizya (taxes imposed on non-Muslims). His royal court was reputed for being a center of religious pluralism, to which the emperor invited scholars and mystics from different religions. Akbar eventually synthesized what he saw as the best elements of these disparate traditions by developing his own religion, which he referred to as Din-i-Ilahi.

The Mughal Empire continued flourishing under the rule of Akbar's next three successors: Jahangir (1605–1627), Shah Jahan (1627–1658), and Aurangzeb (1658–1707). Following the reign of Aurangzeb, the empire entered a period of decline, with subsequent emperors wielding diminishing power and influence. British officials exiled the last Mughal emperor, Bahadur Shah Zafar, after the Indian Rebellion of 1857.

The Mughal emperors sponsored the production of various illustrated manuscripts, including the translations of the Sanskrit epics into Persian. Akbar's royal studio brought together both Hindu and Muslim artists, who produced new Indo-Persian styles of painting. Included among the architectural marvels of the Mughal world are the Red Fort and Humayun's tomb in Delhi, the Lalbagh Fort in Dhaka, and the Taj Mahal in Agra.

Rohit Singh

See also Akbar; Hinduism; India; Islam

Further Readings

- Alam, M., & Subrahmanyam, S. (1998). The Mughal state 1525–1750. Delhi, India: Oxford University Press.
- Ali, A. M. (2006). Mughal India: Studies in polity, ideas, society, and culture. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Bose, S., & Jalal, A. (2003). Modern South Asia: History, culture, political economy. London: Routledge.

MUHAMMAD (CA. 570/571–632 CE)

Muhammad, literally the “praised one,” is believed by Muslims to be the last and final prophet sent by God (Allah) to guide humankind. Although from the modern historical perspective there has been much debate on the historicity of specific events related to his life, modern scholarship has conceded Muhammad's historicity, cautioning, however, that there is much that awaits research.

Muhammad was born in Mecca (Makkah) in 570–571 CE to the noble tribe of Banu Hashim. His father had died just months before his birth, and within the first 10 years of his life, he lost his mother and grandfather ‘Abd al-Muttalib and was subsequently brought up by his paternal uncle Abu Talib. He assisted his uncle in trade and traveled around Arabia and to Syria a couple of times. From a young age, he had become known as “the honest one” and “the trustworthy one.” He married Khadijah, a rich widow 15 years his senior, who bore him four daughters and two sons, both of whom died very early. Close to age 40, he took to meditation and would retire to the cave of Hira’ outside Mecca in reclusion. On one such occasion around 610 CE, he received the first revelation through the archangel Jibreel (Gabriel), and thus began his prophetic career that would last till his death in 632 CE.

Muhammad's initial message to the Arab tribes was quite simple: Believe in only one God, casting aside all forms of idol worship, and believe in him (Muhammad) as God's messenger and in an after-life where everyone would be held accountable to God for his or her actions—implying therefore moral uprightness.

Muhammad's prophetic activities are usually divided into two eras: the Makkah and the Madinan. After continuous preaching for 13 years under increasingly hostile conditions in Mecca and only being able to win a handful of followers, Muhammad migrated to Medina (Madinah), where he had been promised support and where he would spend the rest of his life.

In Medina, in addition to his prophetic and spiritual qualities, he demonstrated his skills as an intelligent statesman as he fused previously warring tribes into a brotherhood and nation (umma) unparalleled in human history. In a mere 23 years of an active prophetic career, Muhammad's message rose from the dirt alleys of Makkah to challenge the Byzantine and Persian empires, thus laying the foundations for Islam to turn into a global religion.

Muslims the world over consider the love of Prophet Muhammad and the recitation of salawat (blessing invocations) on him as the benchmark for piety; he is seen to be the model par excellence and thus needs to be followed in his words and actions.

Muhammad Modassir Ali

See also Islam; Mecca; Medina; Qur'an; Saudi Arabia

Further Readings

- Ibn Hisham, A. M. (1975). Al-Sirah al-Nabawiyyah li Ibn Hisham [The life of the prophet by Ibn Hisham] (4 vols; Taha ‘Abd al-Ra’uf Sa’d, Ed.). Beirut, Lebanon: Dar al-Jil.

- Lings, M. (1997). Muhammad: His life based on the earliest sources. Lahore, Pakistan: Suhail Academy.
- Motzki, H. (2000). The biography of Muhammad. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.

MUJTAHID-SHABISTARI, MUHAMMAD (B. 1937)

Muhammad Mujtahid-Shabistari is a contemporary Shi'a Muslim theologian who is one of the leading thinkers behind the reform movement challenging the clergy's political supremacy in the Islamic Republic of Iran. Born to a clerical family, Muhammad Mujtahid-Shabistari entered the Qum seminary at the age of 14 and pursued his religious studies for the next 18 years. He was also interested in contemporary trends in philosophy and modern Western thought. Mujtahid-Shabistari went to Germany in 1970 and became the director of the Hamburg Islamic Center. While holding that position until 1979, he studied the hermeneutic trend in modern theology. He returned to Iran after the Islamic Revolution of 1979 and was elected to the first Islamic parliament (Majlis) in 1980.

Mujtahid-Shabistari emerged as one of the most forceful theorists of the religious reform movement in postrevolutionary Iran in the 1990s and early 2000s. He made a decisive epistemic break with the apologetic modernism of the earlier generation and offered a more rigorous critique of the foundations of theocratic government in legalistic Islam with the publication of Hermeneutik, kitāb va sonnat (Hermeneutics, the Book and Tradition) in 1996. Drawing on the mastery of modern hermeneutics he had acquired during his years in Germany, he elaborated a critical theory for rethinking Islam in the contemporary world. The interpretation of religious experience was mediated by language and depended on the historical context. Islam, like religious experience generally, had to be read afresh and reinterpreted by each generation. This was followed by Naqdi bar qirā'at-e rasmi-ye din (A Critique of the Official Reading of Religion) in 2000, approaching Islam hermeneutically from the historical perspective of modernization. The key to the hermeneutic conception of Islam is that it is capable of different readings. The official reading (qirā'at) of Islam is historically contingent and only one of its many possible readings. This reading is severely criticized from the perspective of modernity. Modernization began about 150 years ago with the resolution of the Muslims to overcome backwardness by adopting a new style of life and has variously been called progress and development. The process of modernization radically changed the character of Muslim societies and consequently the social functions of Islamic jurisprudence. The "official reading of religion" originated in a phenomenon called "jurisprudential Islam" (Islām-e fiqāhati), which justified totalitarian control of culture by the theocratic government and gradually gained the upper hand after the revolution.

The political implications of Mujtahid-Shabistari's religious hermeneutics were spelled out further. In Hermeneutik, kitāb va sonnat, he used the hermeneutic principle that the meaning of religious norms is determined by their historical context to refute the fundamental claim that it is possible to base the state, or for that matter any social institution, on Islamic jurisprudence. No political regime was founded on the basis of the science of Islamic jurisprudence in the past, nor could one be so founded in the future. This is because the science of jurisprudence can only offer answers to certain questions that arise in a specific historical context and within the institutional framework of existing political regimes. Mujtahid-Shabistari thus explicitly refuted the two cardinal tenets of the official clericalist reading of Islam, namely, that "Islam as a religion has political, economic and legal regimes based on the science of Islamic jurisprudence" suitable for all ages and that "the function of government among the Muslims is the execution of the commandments of Islam" (A Critique of the Official Reading of Religion, p. 12).

Mujtahid-Shabistari's fundamental idea that different readings of Islam are acceptable was adopted by President Muhammad Khātami (1997–2005) and became a major tenet of the reform movement in Iran, thereby undermining the claim of the clerical elite to exclusive authoritative interpretation of Islam.

Saïd Amir Arjomand

See also Iran; Islam; Islamic Reform; Politics and Religion; Religion and State; Shi'a Islam

Further Readings

- Mujtahid-Shabistari, M. (1996). Hermeneutik, kitāb va sonnat [Hermeneutics, the book and tradition]. Tehran, Iran: Tarh-e Naw. (Original work published 1375)
- Mujtahid-Shabistari, M. (2000). Naqdi bar qirā'at-e rasmi-ye din [A critique of the official reading of religion]. Tehran, Iran: Tarh-e Naw. (Original work published 1377)

MÜLLER, MAX (1823–1900)

Max Müller was a German-born Vedic scholar and fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, who painstakingly edited the first critical edition of the Rig-Veda Samhitā (6 volumes) and oversaw publication of the monumental series The Sacred Books of the East (50 volumes, to which he contributed translations of the Dhammapada and the Upanishads). Son of the German Romantic poet Wilhelm Müller (1794–1827), Max Müller was born in Anhalt-Dessau and educated at the University of Leipzig, completing his PhD in 1843. Müller continued his studies at Berlin under Franz Bopp and Friedrich Schelling, the former known for his work identifying the linguistic links among the so-called Indo-European (or Aryan) family of languages, the latter inspiring Müller's interest in comparing the historical developments in language with those of religion. After further studies in Sanskrit at Paris under Eugène Burnouf, Müller, encouraged by Burnouf and supported by Baron Christian von Bunsen, received a commission from the East India Company and Oxford University Press to edit the Rig Veda (published in 1849–1873). Shortly after arriving in London, Müller secured various appointments at Oxford University, eventually receiving a chair in comparative philology in 1868. Because of his research, and his unwavering support for Indian nationalism, Müller gained admirers throughout India, his home soon becoming something of a pilgrimage site for students and pundits.

Müller first gained prominence in 1856, when he published “Comparative Mythology,” a book-length essay wherein he expertly applied the then current linguistic theory to the question of the origin of mythology. Müller believed that the chief source of ancient myths was the Sun (hence the term solar mythology) and argued that the earlier names (nomina) that people gave to solar and other natural phenomena were later confused for divine beings (numina). To account for these names, stories developed around them. But far from being a case of mistaken personification, ancient mythology also provided evidence for the evolutionary development of human thought and language. For Müller, mythology represented an earlier “mythopoeic” strata of human thought, a vestige of the distant past that still impressed itself on present-day cultures and religions.

In addition to his work in philology and comparative mythology, Müller also championed the comparative study of religion as a “science” over and against theology. Müller coined the term science of religion in 1870 and, through several series of public lectures he gave over the next quarter century, laid out a methodology that he hoped would ensure its success as an academic enterprise. These included Lectures on the Science of Religion (1872); Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion, as Illustrated by the Religions of India (1879); Natural Religion (1889); Physical Religion (1891); Anthropological Religion (1892); and Theosophy, or Psychological Religion (1893).

Jon R. Stone

See also Hinduism; India; Indo-European Religion; Veda

Further Readings

- Chaudhuri, N. (1974). Scholar extraordinary: The life of Professor Friedrich Max Müller. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Müller, M. (1901). My autobiography: A fragment. New York: Scribner.
- Stone, J. R. (Ed.). (2002). The essential Max Müller: On language, mythology, and religion. New York: Palgrave.

MULTICULTURALISM

Multiculturalism as a contemporary ideology should be understood as a response to assimilationism, that is, as a movement toward greater respect for the cultural differences within nation-states. In the broadest sense, it signals an extension of the “human rights revolution,” defined originally with respect to individuals and then extended to groups. Within Western countries with large streams of immigrants of diverse origins—Canada, Australia, and the United States, especially during the 1970s and 1980s—new trends and policies emerged, recognizing and celebrating the cultural differences. In Europe, multiculturalism took the form mainly of public recognition of and public policies relating to religions, especially Islam. Generally, its meaning and expression vary depending on the national context and the extent to which it is defined primarily as a social or as a political ideology. Typically, it involves a normative framework (dealing with how to build a society respectful of human differences), but it can also be understood as a category of praxis (how a pluralistic, civic-minded society should function in everyday life).

History

The first nation to adopt multiculturalism as official policy was Canada in 1971. Prime Minister Pierre E. Trudeau, contesting the assimilationist (“melting-pot”) perspectives, argued that adherence to cultural community was a matter of individual choice but that for members of immigrant groups, their ability to choose their own was threatened without government intervention. His multicultural policy was intimately linked with the promotion of Canadian unity, after the rise of French Canadian nationalism. The policy legitimated belonging to both Canadian society and the immigrant’s country of origin; it pressured political leaders to make some accommodations for ethnic minorities. By 1973, the term multiculturalism had been introduced into Australian policy, in an effort to shift away from expectations of assimilation and to recognize, respect, and celebrate the cultural differences of non-European migrants. Social expenditures on immigrant assistance and welfare increased sharply, as did the role of ethnic organizations in helping minority communities. Policies in other countries, particularly Britain, the Netherlands, and Sweden, soon followed. In the United States, even though there is no legally established policy of multiculturalism, the ideology has flourished; however, it has also sparked significant negative reaction as ethnic and religious diversity has expanded in recent decades.

Criticisms

Cultural essentialism has been identified as the core problem with multiculturalism as an ideology. Many educational curricula, media images, public funding programs, professional training courses, and handbooks (e.g., in the social services) promote uniform, essentialist views of minority cultures and identities. Consequently, the politics of recognition risks becoming a politics of coercion when members belonging to a particular cultural community are stereotyped. Other critiques of multiculturalism point to the intensification of group barriers and interests, which when carried too far can lead to a weakened national cohesion, the underestimation of internal group differences and inequalities, and the problematic relationship of multiculturalism to the building of nation-states, especially in young countries where there are large populations of native peoples who experienced European colonialism and where Eurocentrism is still strong. Hence, in all diverse societies, young and old, some sense of balance between internal group bonding and nation binding is necessary.

Today, there is discussion of the “crisis of multiculturalism,” and at a global level, we can observe two opposite discourses. The first seeks to legitimate a return to an assimilationist ideology, in the context of post 9/11 and of increased perception of the threat of religious extremism; the second refers to the necessity of rethinking and improving multiculturalism, with attention to a shift toward “interculturalism,” a new pluralistic model that conceives culture as an emerging process, more fluid and less bounded than in earlier thinking. Forces favoring these two are apparent in much public discussion across many countries. Religion is under scrutiny in both the pro-assimilationism and the pro-new multiculturalism arguments.

Multiculturalism and Religion

Religious followers tend to think generally that their religion is the best. This sense of superiority can be mitigated in societies where pluralism becomes a shared public value. Yet for many religious people, this introduces a plurality instead of a cultural hegemony, puts their own religion on a par with others' religion, and exposes them and their children to the influence of other religions and secular cultures. For these reasons, conservative religious and political leaders often feel uncomfortable with multiculturalism; a discursive strategy for attacking it is the charge that it promotes cultural and religious relativism. Cultural relativism is a central concept in the history of anthropology, its classical formulation stemming from the 1930s and 1940s as a strong refusal of Nazi-style racism and 19th-century evolutionism, which theorized a hierarchy of cultures and peoples and thereby legitimated colonialism and other systems of oppression. Today, cultural relativism easily becomes synonymous with immorality and ethical indifference. Thus, traditionalists call for the defense of "our values and traditions," which are more or less explicitly opposed to "others' values and traditions." An example is the case of Joseph Ratzinger, the current Pope Benedict XVI of the Catholic Church, and Marcello Pera (ex-president of the Italian Senate), who wrote a book titled Without Roots: Europe, Relativism, Christianity and Islam (2004). Their main ideas are that Europe suffers from relativism and that the moral superiority of Christianity should be reaffirmed and the presence of Muslims perceived as a threat. Even many European liberals—the champions of minority rights, cultural diversity, and civic nationalism—feel threatened by Muslims.

In many societal settings, two areas that have emerged as particularly contentious relate to the values of freedom of speech and expression, and gender equality.

Freedom of Speech and Expression

In recent years, no other event has generated as much tension relating to freedom of expression than the publication of Salman Rushdie's The Satanic Verses (1988) in Britain. As a part of his new theorizing on political multiculturalism, Bhikhu Parekh argues that the sacred (for Muslims) has been treated in a mocking manner throughout the book. Soon after the publication of the novel, British Muslims began to protest. The response in much of the liberal as well as conservative press was hostile, accusing Muslims of preferring a theocratic as opposed to a liberal secular society. There was public discussion about whether multiculturalism was a dangerous doctrine and whether it was acceptable to tolerate the intolerant. Even Roy Jenkins, the father of Britain's Race Relations Act (1976), lamented that politicians should be more cautious in allowing the growth of a more substantial Muslim community in Britain. Muslim protests received a standard reply based on the fundamental principles of British society that were generally nonnegotiable, freedom of expression being among them.

The controversy over Satanic Verses offered insights on multicultural society, that is, the relevance of memories of the past (and fears of the future) in which political debates are embedded. Thanks to the painful memories of religious wars during the early-modern period, many Britons were deeply suspicious of the political role of religion, and because of the role of radical Islam in some Muslim countries (e.g., Iran under Ayatollah Khomeini, who pronounced a death sentence on Rushdie), they feared the militancy of Muslims within Britain. On the other side, Muslims brought to the debate their memories of centuries of European Islamophobia, colonialism, and racism and their current experience of social marginalization, interpreting Rushdie's book and the British debate surrounding it as further proof of these realities.

Multiculturalism often lacks a strong religious sensitivity in situations of group defamation. At issue are the scope and limits of free speech. Moreover, the political theorist Bikhu Parekh affirms that what is troublesome about the Muslim political reasoning is not so much its religious character but rather its unfamiliarity in non-Muslim settings and the need for greater social interaction with host populations, more education, and more intercultural dialogue. While Muslims need to acquire more competence in secular languages and develop more internal criticism, European societies have to rethink what secularism means in practice and question anew the historical compromises with secular thinking they now take for granted. As the sociologist Tariq Modood argued in recent essays, there is a secular bias in much of the discourse and policies of multiculturalism in Europe. In a society where some of the disadvantaged minorities are religious ones, a policy of public multiculturalism requires a stronger public recognition of religious minorities and their rights. Scrutinizing the compromises in the church-state relations in each European country is necessary for extending the principles associated with the plural state. The challenge of existing power structures and the cultivation of more inclusive forms of democracy are therefore required.

Gender Equality

What should be done when the claims of minority cultures and religions clash with the norms of gender equality endorsed by liberal states? Feminist scholars such as Susan Moller Okin worry about political multiculturalism. Polygamy, forced marriage, female genital mutilation, differential access for men and women to health care/education, and many other sexist practices cannot be treated simply as “customs” to be respected. Even if defenders of multiculturalism limit the defense of group rights to those groups with acceptable practices, the skepticism of feminists is due to the fact that much of the control over women by men is informal and enforced in the private sphere. Thus, those who defend group rights on liberal grounds need to address carefully these very private, culturally/religiously reinforced kinds of discrimination. According to the feminist classical perspective, the personal is political, and the household is the main battlefield. In other words, the separation of the private from the public sphere makes little sense when applying this distinction to gender issues.

Gender biases are deeply connected, of course, with patriarchal religious teachings and practices. True, too, in almost every religious tradition, it is possible to find a rationale for progressive social change and voices of dissent in the struggle for gender justice. The public recognition of cultural complexity and of religious changes is politically useful in establishing alliances between progressive citizens across religious communities who are involved in antiracism and antisexism. A feminist, more egalitarian multiculturalism ideally would include teaching about religion (i.e., the study of comparative religion with attention to gender) in public schools, not only to educate children on the norms of pluralism but also to empower them through education so that they can reflect seriously about their religious traditions and promote more gender equality from a religious perspective.

Everyday Multiculturalism

“Everyday multiculturalism” is not about the normative debate on the foundations of a fair multicultural society but instead focuses on lived practices that support and reinforce pluralism as a culture. As an analytical perspective, it goes beyond the banal observation that difference is a social construction to focus on the ways it is constructed and to link the microlevel of everyday life to macrolevel policies and structures. As a category of practices, it refers to how social actors, in specific situations, interpret group-based cultural differences and by their actions give support to the principles of fairness and equality in their daily lives. As individuals, people often concur with the views and practices of their ethnic or religious group in relation to other communities; at other times, they must break with their group in the interest of more universal human values.

Moreover, religious beliefs and practices can have paradoxical consequences. In her research on American Hinduism, Prema Kurien shows this to be the case. Hindu Indian American spokespersons promote themselves as patriotic Americans, emphasizing the intrinsic pluralism of Hinduism and its possible contribution to solving global problems. But at times they also use the discourse of multiculturalism to promote a more militant, nationalistic Hindutva (“Hinduness”) movement, with criticism against Muslims, Christians, and secular Hindus. Even more paradoxically, in the name of their rights as a global minority, supporters of this movement demand a Hindu state in India where they would deny to India-based minority groups some of the basics rights that Hindu Indians enjoy in the United States (and that allow for their activism). All this simply points to the fact that religion as a basis for political mobilizing can lead to many, often contradictory, expressions; thus, any single religion is itself potentially a multicultural and multipolitical force within a social context.

Annalisa Frisina

See also Canada; Diaspora; Gender; Global Migration; Global Religion; Globalization; Hinduism; Inter marriage; Islam; Multiple Faiths; Pluralism; Roman Catholicism; Tolerance

Further Readings

- Baumann, G. (1999). The multicultural riddle: Rethinking national, ethnic and religious identities. London: Routledge.
- Colombo, E. (2006). Le società multiculturali [Multicultural societies] (5th ed.). Roma, Italy: Carocci.
- Colombo, E., & Semi, G. (Eds.). (2007). Multiculturalismo quotidiano: Le pratiche della differenza [Everyday multiculturalism: Practices of difference]. Milano, Italy: Franco Angeli.
- Kurien, P. (2004). Multiculturalism, immigrant religion and diasporic nationalism: The development of an American Hinduism. Social Problems, 51(3), 362–385.
- Modood, T. (2005). Multicultural politics: Racism, ethnicity and Muslims in Britain. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Modood, T., Triandafyllidou, A., & Zapata-Barrero, R. (Eds.). (2006). Multiculturalism, Muslims and citizenship: A European approach. London: Routledge.
- Moller Okin, S., Cohen, J., Howard, M., & Nussbaum, M. C. (Eds.). (1999). Is multiculturalism bad for women? Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Parekh, B. (2006). Rethinking multiculturalism: Cultural diversity and political theory (2nd ed.). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.

MULTIPLE FAITHS

In the global era, it is not uncommon for individuals to draw on beliefs and practices from multiple faiths or even to identify with more than one faith. Among the many cultural changes likely contributing to the increasing number of individuals with ties to more than one faith are the prioritization of individual freedom and choice, greater tolerance toward marriages between people from different religious backgrounds, and increased contact with other religious traditions through globalizing forces such as the spread of technology and migration. In this entry, a definition of multiple religious ties is offered, examples from both Eastern and Western cultures are presented, related phenomena are explored, and the historical context is examined.

Definition

Given the continuous and rapid changes acting on contemporary society, an individual who has ties to multiple faiths may accordingly be broadly defined. An individual who consciously identifies with more than one faith, regardless of beliefs or practices, would be considered to have ties to multiple faiths. However, an individual also may be considered to have ties to multiple faiths if he or she draws on beliefs and/or practices from more than one faith, regardless of whether or not he or she consciously identifies with or declares ties to more than one faith. This definition includes individuals who practice, adhere to the beliefs of, or identify with more than one established denomination or subgroup of the same larger religious tradition but excludes institutionalized group practices or identities involving the syncretism of multiple faiths.

Examples

There is a wide difference in how individuals may have ties to more than one faith. In the Eastern context, Catherine Cornille, who is skeptical of contemporary Westerners' claims to belong to more than one faith, describes how the Chinese can easily experience a sense of simultaneous belonging to Confucianism, Daoism, and Buddhism. Jan Van Bragt observes that more than half of all Japanese people claim to be adherents to both Shinto and Buddhism. And Elizabeth Harris describes how 19th-century Sri Lankan Buddhists reinterpreted existing identities and expressions of religiousness to incorporate the Christianity brought to them by British evangelical missionaries.

Examples from the West are less common but still readily available. One typical respondent from Gideon Goosen's research in Greater Sydney, Australia, was a woman who considered herself Hindu but, having been influenced by the Catholic schools in which she had been educated, often attended Catholic churches to pray to Jesus and Mary and was inspired by the Ten Commandments. A particularly illustrative case from Nancy Eiesland's study of an exurb of Atlanta, Georgia, was a family that had ties to several different denominations of Christianity; the family members' religious narratives simultaneously incorporated elements from all of these diverse ties, which included their affiliation with the local United Methodist Church, a nearby Baptist megachurch where the wife participated in a "Grief Relief" support group, the influences of her Catholic and Presbyterian siblings, and the husband's upbringing with little attachment to any faith.

Related Phenomena

Other, closely related phenomena have been documented in studies of the U.S. population. Robert Wuthnow found that a large minority of young adults were engaged in spiritual tinkering in two particularly common ways—"church shopping" and "church hopping." Church shopping involves attending various religious institutions while presumably seeking one in which to settle and become a regular member. Church hopping, however, involves staying in the market or tinkering with several possible selections rather than settling down with one, which appears to Wuthnow to be intentional among those who find variety appealing. An examination of people who claim no religious preference in national surveys found that many of them still held a weak sense of attachment to a religious tradition and thus might identify with the tradition sometimes, if not always; for this group, religious identity was a situational trait rather than a stable one and could vary from one context to another.

History

Catherine Cornille contends, however, that for much of history, ties to multiple religions may have been the rule rather than the exception, at least on a popular level. She believes that religion in the West, which has been shaped around comparatively rigid and exclusive boundaries by a combination of political and religious forces, may just be coming to terms with a practice or form of religiosity that has been prevalent for ages in most of the rest of the world, especially in the East. Yet even Christianity did not always demand exclusive adherence. For example, Gideon Goosen describes how the first disciples saw themselves as Jews and Christians simultaneously, going to the synagogue on the Sabbath and then coming together to celebrate the Lord's supper on the first day of the week—at least until they were thrown out of the synagogue. References to "Jewish Christians," who were an early source of controversy in the church, can be found through the middle of the fifth century.

Conclusion

The prevalence of individuals with ties to more than one faith will likely only continue to grow. Nancy Ammerman observes that if religious identity ever was a given, it certainly no longer is so. Within the everyday marketplace of modern identity narratives, people can choose how and whether to be religious. Robert Wuthnow points out that the geographic mobility and the general unsettledness of our contemporary society allows for unprecedented opportunities to make spiritual choices. And Catherine Cornille describes how the heightened and widespread awareness of religious pluralism has left the religious person with a choice not only of which religion but also of how many religions he or she might belong to. Cornille credits the radical sense of individual autonomy evident everywhere in Western culture today with the fact that individuals no longer feel compelled to accept every single aspect of a religious tradition without question, which can result in a more piecemeal approach to doctrine, symbols, and practices, governed by personal judgment and taste.

Liza G. Steele

See also Diaspora; Global Religion; Globalization; Multiculturalism; Pluralism; Protestant Buddhism; Public and Private Religion; Religious Identity; Syncretism

Further Readings

- Ammerman, N. T. (2003). Religious identities and religious institutions. In M. Dillon (Ed.), Handbook of the sociology of religion (pp. 207–224). New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Cornille, C. (Ed.). (2002). Many mansions? Multiple religious belonging and Christian identity. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Cornille, C. (2003). Double religious belonging: Aspects and questions. Buddhist-Christian Studies, 23, 43–49.
- Eiesland, N. L. (2000). A particular place: Urban restructuring and religious ecology in a southern exurb. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Goosen, G. (2007). An empirical study of dual religious belonging. Journal of Empirical Theology, 20, 159–178.

- Harris, E. J. (2002). Double belonging in Sri Lanka: Illusion or liberating path? In C. Cornille (Ed.), Many mansions? Multiple religious belonging and Christian identity (pp. 76–92). Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Van Bragt, J. (2002). Multiple religious belonging of the Japanese people. In C. Cornille (Ed.), Many mansions? Multiple religious belonging and Christian identity (pp. 7–19). Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books.
- Wuthnow, R. (2007). After the baby boomers: How twenty- and thirty-somethings are shaping the future of American religion. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.

MULTIPLE MODERNITIES

Multiple modernities, a concept that emerged at the end of the 20th century, represents a new paradigm in understanding the contemporary world. It moves forward from the “classical” analyses of Émile Durkheim, Karl Marx, and Max Weber, whose works implicitly assumed that the social, economic, and political processes taking place in Europe around the 18th century, such as urbanization, industrialization (capitalism), secularization, rationalization, the emergence of the nation-state, and bureaucratization were not only unique but also universal. The concept of multiple modernities was developed to refute mainstream sociological thought around the 1950s—particularly modernization theories. These theories conceived that the peculiar features of modernity in the West (the United States and some parts of Europe), such as individual emancipation and future-oriented progress together with the development of democracy, technology, and advanced communications media, appeared as goals that all nations will eventually achieve.

The notion of multiple modernities was developed by many social scientists during the last decades of the 20th century. However, it is generally recognized that the most important work was by Shmuel N. Eisenstadt (1923–2010). He stood up against theories that suggested that the world was going to collapse due to the confrontation of modern and not modern societies—that is, Western and non-Western societies. He also criticized works that suggested “the end of history” and those who considered that modernity was an incomplete program. He believed that developing an idea of multiple modernities was the best way of understanding contemporary societies and, as a consequence, modernity as a process of “constitution and reconstitution of a multiplicity of cultural programs.” That is why he suggested that the notion of multiple modernities implies making a distinction: Modernity is different from Westernization. This means that there are distinctive patterns of modernity, with a capacity for self-correction, throughout the world. Finally, Eisenstadt sustained that institution building, protest, and the relation between centers and peripheries caused the acceleration of the transposition of the project of modernity to non-Western (non-European) societies.

To sum up, the notion of multiple modernities implies that modernity itself, as it was conceived in the mainstream sociological approaches in the late 19th and 20th centuries, can be reduced to a phenomenon only present in some parts of western Europe in a specific period of time. It also implies that the diverse and complex non-Western societies are not exceptions to modernity but are modern in themselves.

Classical Approaches to Modernity

There are some classical interpretations of modernity that are necessary to understand before analyzing the main aspects of the idea of multiple modernities.

During the 18th century, at the time of the Enlightenment, a project of modernity was developed by many influential philosophers. This project implied the development of reason, an objective science, a new form of morality, and universal laws separated from religion. They believed in the ideas of unlimited progress and the reign of reason. The accumulation of a refined culture meant the enrichment and rational organization of life. There was a positive consideration of the idea of progress and the virtues of reason for humankind.

During the 19th century, some of the high expectations of progress and reason were questioned by social scientists, and new explanations of modernity arrived. These explanations were dominant in the social theory until the end of the 20th century.

It was considered that the social spheres, such as literature, the arts, science, economy, and the state, were institutionalized apart from religion. This process of secularization, as a separation of spheres, was one of the main contributions of classical sociology. According to Max Weber, the modern concept of the world was attached to principles, ideas, and customs derived from Protestant doctrines. This process allowed the rationalization of everyday life and the rational-capitalist organization of labor. Such economic rationalism depended not only on the development of technique and the law but also on the capacity and aptitude of man to develop a certain type of rational behavior. The economic mentality that emerged in the origins of capitalism—and modernity—was influenced by a religious ethos. The rational ethics of ascetic Protestantism, transferred to the modern economic ethics, was analyzed as a new compulsive mentality for work and saving that emerged as a base of capitalism. This rational organization of life included the development of new ways of increasing bureaucratization, considered as an inexorable “iron cage.”

The consumption of goods was considered, by other social theories, as a characteristic of modernity. The emergence of a monetary economy influenced new styles of life and consolidated a new kind of individual who was prone to consumption. Production and consumption were important to the objectivation of social relationships and the personality of individuals. This also meant the suppression of subjectivity, because people turned into anonymous shoppers.

Some social scientists considered that in industrial societies, typical of modernity, there was a characteristic process of individuation, secularization, and increasing functions of the state. This process meant interdependence among individuals, differentiation, solidarity, and civil responsibility. It also implied anomie, because a society based on social pluralism and individual values contained intrinsic possibilities of tension.

It was also considered that the development of modern capitalism, with the consequent emergence of private property, entailed an inherent conflict. Alienated individuals without the means of production became a salaried labor force that was traded in the market like merchandise. Exploitation and oppression were the distinctive characteristics of modern capitalism.

The classical explanations of industrial societies and modernity of the 19th century were influential for the social sciences in the next century. One major influence was structural-functionalism. This theoretical framework, developed in the United States, was adopted within the social sciences internationally.

The assumptions of Weber and Durkheim (and even those of Marx and Simmel) were condensed in a newly developed concept: modernization. The idea of modernization entailed a sense of the evolution of society and progress. It was a concept that was used to analyze social change.

Modernization consists of the reciprocal action of two complex processes of differentiation and reintegration that enable society to adapt to the environment.

During the course of economic development, society and its institutions become more complex and heterogeneous. The relationship between the different sectors of society diversifies. The growth of urbanization establishes a competitive environment for individuals in the great cities. Traditional roles lose their specific characteristics, and individuals feel uprooted. Modernization implies social evolution as a process of increasing differentiation during industrialization. The growth of industrialization leads to the professionalization of the labor market and to better conditions of life for the population and, also, democracy as a system of government.

Modernization involves a notion of progress as an idea that is linear, accumulative, and oriented to the achievement of a goal: a successful industrial revolution and democracy. It implies that all societies in the world are going to evolve toward the same pattern of social change that occurred in some European countries and the United States.

Some of these aspects of differentiation can be found in many societies around the world: family life, education, economy, politics, individualistic orientations, and mass communications. The definition and organization of these arenas differ from one place to another, thereby giving rise to multiple ideological and institutional patterns.

The dominant paradigm in the social sciences during the 19th and 20th centuries assumed that modernity, as it was developed in some European countries, would be adopted by all countries. The institutional framework that emerged in those countries would have been a goal for every society in the world. The force of this linear and accumulative progress appeared as a process of modernizing all societies. However, the social scientists who formulated the concept of multiple modernities criticized these theoretical approaches. They considered that there are processes of reappropriation, rejection, distortion, and reshaping in the course of reproducing modernity.

The Political and Cultural Program of Modernity: Autonomy and Destructive Tendencies

The classical approaches to modernity have been criticized by the social scientists who developed the notion of multiple modernities. However, these authors recognize that there is a common core of promissory notes about modernity that they call the cultural and political program. This program refers to different notions of human agency and the fact that there is a future that can be shaped by the autonomous agency of humankind.

This autonomy entails exploration, reflexivity, transformation of nature, and the possibility of participation of human beings shaping the political and social order. This program also implies the emergence of radical changes of the political order's premises and the building of a political arena.

The political process of modernity, according to Eisenstadt, is characterized by some dynamics focused on center-periphery relations, the politicization of demands as a general tendency of different sectors of society. This situation establishes a continuous conflict for the definition of the political realm.

The program of modernity also implies the building of limits for collective identities that are not taken for granted or defined by a transcendental authority. It further implies internal conflict, tensions, and contradictions derived from different developments in the capitalist system and the demand for democratization in the political arena.

Contrary to the interpretations of modernity as a peaceful path to progress and the evolution of reason, its program has internal conflicts that are increased by the development of imperialist landscapes and the rise of violence. Modern states have experienced war, terror, and violence, all bearing on citizenship and collective identities. World War II and the systematic extermination of European Jewry in the Holocaust are examples of the destructive and negative potential of modernity.

There are different possibilities for the experience of modernity due to the construction of diverse and multiple ideological and institutional patterns throughout the world. This diversity is instantiated by social movements and intellectual activists who struggle for different programs of modernity because they do not share the same vision of what constitute a modern social system. The articulation of distinctive sectors of society with these social actors and movements establishes the heterogeneous patterns of how modernity is expressed around the globe.

The political program of modernity implies varieties of tension. There are different modes of legitimization of the political order that are related to adherence to the system along a continuum that ranges between religious and secular ways of legitimization. This implies contradiction around the building of collective identities that were mainly promulgated by national social movements with an international scope. Among these were communist, socialist, and liberal together with national-socialist and fascist movements. These social actors oscillate between two different kinds of antinomies related to the possibility of homogenizing societies through universalistic components of collective identity and the struggle between universalizing and pluralistic orientations.

These antinomies express fights and clashes in societies in Europe, the Americas, and the rest of the world. As Europe was the first landscape where these antinomies emerged, the characteristics of the conflict follow its pattern. Different notions of the nation-state and collective identities have emerged. Some actors understand the civil society and the state as separated arenas; some opine the contrary. However, everywhere the nation-state has been a central ideological and symbolic entity, it was one of the major parts of the program of modernity that in the last decades of the 20th century became debilitated. New visions of political order and collective identities appeared and were carried out by many social movements that challenged the classical program of modernity. These movements, according to Eisenstadt, developed first in Western societies. The ecological and women's movements arrived first in the West; these were rooted in the anti-Vietnam War groups of the late 1960s. They represented a shift away from the orientation to the nation-state and proposed a local agenda in many countries. These movements did not focus on resolving macroeconomic problems or the reconstitution of the nation-state; they conceived themselves as “multicultural” or “postmodern” and represented new politics of identity to construct different cultural and political spaces. After those social forces, “fundamentalist” groups were born in different contexts such as Protestant Christian, Jewish, and Muslim communities. They had their basis not only in national societies but also in the international sphere. Moreover, there were communal religious groups developed in Asian cultures in the context of Hinduism and Buddhism that share a strong feeling against modernity or Westernization. Finally, in the last two decades of the 20th century, ethnic movements and diasporas developed and also challenged the cultural and political program of modernity. All these movements accelerated the transformation and consolidation of new social landscapes.

As noted earlier, the opposition between “modern” and “traditional” sectors of society developed first in European countries and then expanded to the American, Asian, and African countries. Europe, especially France and England, provided a mirror and reference point for other countries.

It is important to note that the premises of the modern program suffered an early transformation with the expansion of modernity in the American continent. In that landscape, different conceptions of the world and models of institutional life emerged. As Eisenstadt suggests, from the beginning of modernity’s expansion multiple modernities were developed within a Western framework.

The cultural and political program of modernity appeared first in Europe and then migrated to different Western countries. After that it traveled throughout the economic, technological, and military expansion of the West to diverse Asian societies and finally to African nations. All these societies adopted the model of the territorial nation-state and the basic institutions of the program of modernity. The encounter of modernity with non-Western countries and societies made also transformations within the cultural and political program. That is why one of the main characteristics of modernity is its capacity of self-correction.

The Religious Dimension of Modernity

One of the most widely accepted assertions about modernity in the classical approach is the fact that religion was disappearing from the public sphere and was becoming private. As rationality advanced, individuals were supposed to abandon their beliefs or practice their religion in the comfortable space of their homes. The economy, art, science, and other spheres acted as if “God did not exist.” It was expected then, due to the force of the secularization process, that religion was eventually going to disappear.

The case of the United States, where religion played an important role in the development of its project of modernity, was seen by social scientists as an exception. As J. Heideking suggests, religions in America were an important aspect in the construction of collective identities in the dawn of modernity not only because the development of an “integrative ideology” called “civil religion” but also because of the significant growth of religious denominations, mainly evangelical Christians. Americans succeeded in establishing a political order without separating individuals from religion. They could separate the relations between the church and the state in a religious social environment. The understanding of the American case as an exception of modernity was a common assumption in social theory. The United States was expected to imitate the European pattern of modernity. During the apogee of the modernization theories, the second half of the 20th century, social scientists realized that religion was not disappearing and that it still played an important role in societies. However, they still believed that religion was becoming a private matter. The influence of religion in the public sphere—at least in Western societies—was considered as null.

After the 1980s, the consensus on the privatization of religion started to break down. Many social movements based on religious beliefs exerted an influence in the public sphere. Social scientists then started to consider religions and symbolic orders as a way of shaping different programs of modernity. Moreover, modernity started to be seen as a producer of religion. The work of Danièle Hervieu-Léger was crucial for the development of this concept. What seems to be occurring is a process of individuation of beliefs. Due to the centrality of the autonomy of the individual in modern societies, social actors build their religious productions without being formally attached to institutions. Believers circulate, define, and moderate their spiritual path. This movement of individualization of beliefs does not mean the loss of searching for communal boundaries.

Gabriela Irrazábal

See also Durkheim, Émile; Modernism; Multiculturalism; Pluralism; Postmodernism; Public and Private Religion; Weber, Max

Further Readings

- Bryant, J. M. (2006). The West and the rest revisited: Debating capitalist origins, European colonialism, and the advent of modernity. Canadian Journal of Sociology, 31(4), 403–444
- Casanova, J. (1994). Public religions in the modern world. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Dube, S. (2002). Introduction: Enchantments of modernity. The South Atlantic Quarterly, 101(4), 729–755.
- Eisenstadt, S. N. (1998). Modernity and the construction of collective identities: In values and attitudes across nation and time. International Journal of Comparative Sociology, 39(1), 138–160.
- Eisenstadt, S. N. (2002). Multiple modernities. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.
- Eisenstadt, S. N. (2003). Comparative civilizations and multiple modernities (Vol. 2). Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Eisenstadt, S. N., Schluchter, W., & Wittrock, B. (Eds.). (2001). Public spheres and collective identities. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.
- Ferrarotti, F. (2003). An invitation to classical sociology: Meditations on some great social thinkers. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.
- Giddens, A. (1990). The consequences of modernity. Cambridge, UK: Polity Press.
- Goldstone, J. A. (2002). Efflorescence and economic growth in world history: Rethinking the “rise of the West” and the Industrial Revolution. Journal of World History, 13(2), 323–389.
- Harding, S. (2008). Sciences from below: Feminisms, postcolonialisms and modernities. London: Duke University Press.
- Heideking, J. (2002). The pattern of American modernity from the Revolution to the Civil War. In S. Eisenstadt (Ed.), Multiple modernities (pp. 219–248). New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.
- Hervieu-Leger, D., Dianteill, E., & Saint-Martin, I. (2004). La modernité rituelle: rites politiques et religieux des sociétés modernes [The modern ritual: Rites and religious policies of modern societies]. Paris: Harmattan.
- Kaya, I. (2004). Modernity, openness, interpretation: A perspective on multiple modernities. Social Science Information, 43(1), 35–57.
- Morrison, K. (2006). Marx, Durkheim, Weber: Formations of modern social thought. Thousand Oaks, CA: Sage.
- Rofel, L. (2001). Discrepant modernities and their discontents. Positions, 9(3), 637–649.
- Sachsenmaier, D., & Riedel, J. (with Eisenstadt, S. N.). (Eds.). (2002). Reflections on multiple modernities: European, Chinese, and other interpretations. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Spohn, W. (2010). Political sociology: Between civilizations and modernities. A multiple modernities perspective. European Journal of Social Theory, 13(1), 49–66.
- Stanford, S. (2001). Definitional excursions: The meanings of modern/modernity/modernism. Modernism/Modernity, 8(3), 493–513.
- Stanford, S. (2006). Periodizing modernism: Postcolonial modernities and the space/time borders of modernist studies. Modernism/Modernity, 13(3), 425–443.

MUSIC

Religion and musical practices are closely linked in most, if not all, societies and are interacting across cultural boundaries in the global age. Siegfried Nadel proposed that music may have had its origins in heightened speech at religious rituals—language performed in a musical way as a means of communicating with the supernatural, or at least as a way of demarcating sacred language from everyday language. We cannot know the origins of music, but it is true that religious practices around the world employ musical sounds. Yet in many, if not most, cases the relationship between music and religion is problematic, causing some religious teachings to include proscriptions against certain types of musical activity. Thus, any consideration of music and religion in a global context must be multifaceted, sensitive to the particular issues of any given religious practice and to how its adherents engage musical behavior.

Like the term religion, music can be difficult to define in a cross-cultural global context. The adage that music is the universal language has been disproved many times over by ethnomusicologists, who have shown that while music from cultural traditions unfamiliar to a listener may sound aesthetically pleasing, the meanings and uses of that music are rarely understood without substantial experience. Like language, music is a universal human behavior; and like language, but probably more so, the understanding of music varies greatly depending on one's cultural competency. This is especially true when music is associated with religious practices where organized sound art is often highly regulated and imbued with symbolic meaning. Thus, when encountering musical sounds from an unfamiliar source, one cannot make assumptions about the intended function of that music, even if one feels an aesthetic attraction. Even within the same religion, a single type of music may be deemed appropriate by one sect but banned by another, so varied is the understanding. Nor is there any universal understanding of what constitutes "music." In some cases, especially where religion and other belief systems are concerned, the symbolic meaning of sounds may be such that even what sounds like music to the uninitiated listener is not considered music at all by the informed producers and listeners—by the cultural insiders. Even within major global religions, there is no agreement about whether music is created by humans or inspired by the gods, devils, or other beings. One can also not assume that what sounds musical is considered as music to the sociocultural group that created the sounds or even if a given group has an indigenous term that approximates the European American concept of "music." For these reasons, the terms musical practices, sound art, and so on are used in this entry instead of music to avoid imposing a concept on the people.

The following sections of this entry are organized around three themes, or complementary approaches, to the question of music and religion. First, the close associations between religious and musical behaviors suggest that people attribute great power to music, thus making it a potentially volatile activity within religious communities. Second, the globalization of religions has also resulted in the globalization of some musical practices, forms, and styles. Third, and in seeming contradistinction with the second point but probably related to the first, musical practices within any single global religion tend to vary greatly, containing even opposing approaches to what musical practices are encouraged and those that are restricted or prohibited.

The Power of Music in Religion

If there is any agreement among religious traditions, it is that musical practices can be powerful and, therefore, must be monitored and controlled. The source and nature of the power of music are not fully understood, and as Ter Ellingson has proposed, music is probably the synthesis of a number of things, but at least four musical qualities or potentialities seem to contribute to its effectiveness:

1. The ability of musically organized sound to structure human's experience of time
2. The potential for collective participation in musical behaviors (including singing and playing instruments together, dancing, etc.) to effect group solidarity
3. The potential for musical sounds to elicit emotional response (through sonic qualities as well as through symbolic and associative means)
4. The combination of music with meaningful texts, which can be particularly effective in conveying meaning as well as useful for didactic purposes

The structuring of time and our experience of time are particularly interesting for religious purposes. On the macrolevel, musical sounds can mark the beginning, ending, and key moments of ritual events. For example, in Europe, there is a long tradition of setting to music key moments of the Christian liturgy of the Mass. Notable examples include several settings by Dufay (from ca. 1450 CE), 104 settings by Palestrina (middle 1500s), settings by Mozart and Handel in the 18th century, settings by Beethoven in 19th century, and so on. In Muslim-majority societies, a musical call to prayer is sounded publicly five times daily, thus structuring time for all in the community. On a microlevel, musical sounds can shape one's experience of time in the moment physically by inducing repeated action that in some circumstances leads to a trance, a key phenomenon in many religious rituals. Structuring human experience of time is also important in the second and third potential reasons for music's power: group solidarity and emotional response. Group solidarity can be created through rhythmically unified action, and the rhythmic features of music enhance one's emotional response (a calming response to repetition, the shock of sudden changes, the agitation of syncopation, etc.).

The last explanation of music's potential power, the combination of words and musical sounds, is most often cited as the reason for the close ties between musical and religious practices. In all societies, ways of producing words with special vocal technique (drawn-out speech on one or a few tones, chanting, singing) are used to demarcate important texts. Qur'anic recitation is a prominent example. Traditionally, the Qur'an is to be heard, not just silently read, for the full meaning is in the sound. Though Qur'anic recitation is melodious and shares (even dictates) the central characteristics of some musical practices in regions of the world with predominantly Muslim populations, it is decidedly not considered music in itself. Most, if not all, other religions also have performed texts that are musical, while not all are conceived of specifically as music. Though the linking of texts and musical sounds for religious purposes may seem like an obvious place to locate the power of music, ultimately it is the nonspecific, nonreferential, untexted qualities of sound art or music that give it its greatest power. The power of suggestion, unexplained affect, and aesthetic pleasure, linked with the idea of the Divine can be quite moving. This not fully understood capacity of music to move people also makes it controversial in many global and local religious practices. What does a struck gong, a trumpet blast, a chord on a pipe organ, the sigh of an end-blown reed flute, the repeated pattern on a frame drum actually mean? Nothing without cultural context, but when contextualized as signifiers of religious feeling, belief, and truth, musical sounds become deeply meaningful for individuals within that faith system—and oftentimes negatively meaningful for those outside that system.

The power of music in one context, however, does not make it immune to trivialization when decontextualized. This is especially problematic in a global context, where a sound considered sacred and evocative of deeply held beliefs to some might become little more than sonic texture or color when commoditized on a commercial recording, for example, and played for listeners on the other side of the globe, across a political border, or across a city street in a different house of worship. For example, as Mik Aide has reported, when Brian Eno and David Byrne mixed a recording of Algerian Qur'anic recitation with their own percussion and electronic music on their 1981 album My Life in the Bush of Ghosts, some Muslims were offended and the World Council of Islam protested. The offending track, "Qu'ran" [sic], was removed from subsequent releases of the album. While the potential for aesthetic beauty in musical sounds combined with an ambiguity of meaning often lulls individuals into thinking that they grasp the essence of musical sounds (hence the "Music is the universal language" fallacy), the intended meaning of human (or divine) sound art is usually much more interesting.

Globalization, Religion, and Music

The globalization of religions has also globalized certain musical practices. In Europe, the Christian church institutions were instrumental in spreading certain approaches toward music, including the early development of music notation systems that eventually became the five-line staff system used today in many parts of the world. The history of European art music is intertwined with the Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant churches. Music was and is also a tool for missionaries who have worked to make Christianity and other religions global. During colonial times, missionization was typically cultural—to be a Christian in Africa or the Americas included the cultural practice of singing European hymns, for example. Though this did globalize certain concepts of music, perhaps most notably harmonic rhythm, Philip Bohlman has pointed out that it was not a simple matter of missionary hymnody replacing the musical practices of global converts. Hymnody became the cultural possession of local communities, who reshaped it. Some, according to Bohlman, took the musical material and translated it into their own religious practices. However, even in the early years of global missionary work, some took a deliberately syncretic approach, combining local music with ritual practices introduced by missionaries. For example, during the Spanish colonization of Mexico in the 16th century, in the P'urhépecha (Tarascan) region in the state of Michoacán, although choral music and instruments from Spain were actively used to evangelize, missionaries also incorporated elements of the P'urhépecha ceremonies into religious fiestas. They also learned the P'urhépecha language and used it in religious services. In the 21st century, religious fiestas in the P'urhépecha region continue to incorporate syncretic forms, including musical elements from wider popular spheres of music, such as mariachi ensembles.

The globalization of Islam presents a different, but not unrelated, set of issues. On the one hand, the call to prayer and Qur'anic recitation are part of the soundscape of all regions of the world where Islam is the majority religion. This is especially true of the call to prayer, which is broadcast over loudspeakers from mosques five times daily—it is a public sound art, not considered music, but musical in form and heard by all in Muslim communities. Qur'anic recitation is ostensibly learned and practiced by all Muslims, though there are trained specialists who perform a more elaborate form for public audition. Recitation and the call are also always performed in Arabic. Thus, both the call to prayer and Qur'anic recitation can be considered universal experiences for Muslims and for others living in predominantly Muslim societies. However, their relationship to local musical practices varies. Neubauer and Doubleday show how, while the call and Qur'anic recitation are not considered music, they are profoundly influential in Egyptian musical practice, and Egyptian cultural productions are highly influential throughout the Muslim world. In Egypt, the call and recitation as practiced by specialists are related to the modal and melodic construction (maqām) of Middle Eastern art music. In other Islamic societies, such as Indonesia (with the largest Muslim population), the call and recitation of the Qur'an borrow certain sonic qualities from the Middle East, especially through the obligatory use of Arabic, and while the influence of maqām can be heard in many places, different locations also add distinct regional qualities to the call and recitation.

Sufism within Islam has employed musical practices for mystical rituals, sometimes emphasizing trance. Sufi practices tend to be local, but a global concept of Sufi music and performance was invented by the music industry from the early 20th century on, a phenomenon studied in depth by Regula Qureshi. Various internationally touring troupes of so-called Whirling Dervishes and the popularity of Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan's devotional songs exemplify this development. Katherine Hagedorn has documented and theorized a community of listeners who access qawwali (sung Sufi devotional poetry) as well as Afro-Cuban Ocha (Santería) tambores (religious drumming with singing and dance) via the Internet. This global virtual community is deeply interested in the ecstatic or spiritual experience, if not the practice of religion itself. Here, musical interest leads a global network of consumers to religious and spiritual practices.

One could propose many additional examples of musical practices that are globalized by religious practices, and religions that are globalized by music—for example, Rastafarianism. Though perhaps not always considered a global religion, Rastafarianism is known to many in the world through the popular music genre of reggae. Though not all reggae music can be considered Rastafarian, and though reggae is not the first or only music associated with the religion, basic Rastafarian tenets are often emphasized in the lyrics of reggae. For example, in the 1990s, a Rastafarian reggae band, the Twinkle Brothers, performed together and made several commercial recordings with a Polish Tatra Mountain family folk ensemble, Trebunia-Tutka. For at least some individuals in the Polish band, the idea that the God of their Roman Catholicism might be considered the same as the Rastafarian's Jah was an important point of connection, as was their history of actively resisting oppression. To the extent that reggae is the music of Rastafarianism, the religion has a relatively stable musical identity compared with the other global religions considered here. Though this in itself is interesting, it must be considered in the context of Rastafarianism being a young religion (emerging in the 1930s), contrasting with two millennia history of Christianity and the 1,300 years of Islam.

Global Religions and Musical Diversity

Though global religions do help globalize some musical practices and ideas, it is equally true that within any global religion there is great diversity, and even contradictions, in the musical practices of its adherents. Christianity and Islam provide ample examples. There is no single “Christian music” despite the efforts of hierarchical church structures to standardize many aspects of the liturgy. This includes macrodivisions of liturgical practice between the many primary branches of the church, including but not limited to Roman Catholicism, Eastern Orthodoxy, and Protestantism. Some macrodivisions in the church have particular musical implications. For example, the Reformation, beginning in Zürich in 1525, broke from the Roman Catholic ritual focus on the Mass (which had many sung or chanted sections and a tradition of composed musical settings as noted above) in favor of services that focused on the sermon. The liturgy was almost entirely spoken, rather than sung, and congregational singing was rare. In contrast, the reformer John Calvin in Geneva favored metrical psalms for congregational singing. Martin Luther’s roughly contemporary reforms in Germany retained the basic structure of the Mass but emphasized congregational participation, including congregational singing. Luther himself composed a number of chorales, some of which are still sung in Protestant churches. The Reformation also encouraged the use of vernacular languages and other cultural forms, including music, as opposed to Latin, the official language of the Roman Catholic Church.

The tension between top-down liturgical practices given to a congregation by church leaders and vernacular cultural practices brought to the church by congregants remains especially in evangelical churches, some of which are defined as much by the music they use as by the theology that may distinguish them from other churches. These tensions are explored in Frank Burch Brown’s writings. In any city in North America, one can find a church with paid professional musicians, such as an organist/choir director and soloists within the choir, who perform new and old music from a European American art music tradition. In the same town, another church will prefer newly composed popular music and may also hire professional musicians. Other churches will rely on the musical talents of their congregation or offer several services each week that feature different styles of music or no music at all. The decisions about what music (if any) is appropriate may be left to the clergy or members of any one congregation, or it may be part of the doctrine of the church denomination, though doctrinal statements about music tend to be restrictive. Prominent examples include the Amish, who use only unaccompanied, nonmetrical singing, and the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers), who often have no music in worship services.

The situation in Islam may at first seem a little more straightforward, but this is not the case. As noted above, the universal expectation that Muslims recite the Qur’an in Arabic provides a level of sonic uniformity in global Muslim communities. The generally suspicious view of secular music by many Muslim teachers may also be seen as a unifying factor. However, musical practices within the global Islamic community are ultimately as varied as other religious demographics. The range of opinions about the idea of music runs from severe bans on musical behavior by groups such as the Taliban in Afghanistan and restrictions on some kinds of music in Iran since the 1979 revolution, all the way to the many Sufi sects that cultivate music as a central part of their religious practice. Other global religions provide their own unique situations. Hinduism includes performing arts as forms of worship; Buddhism is relatively tolerant of musical practices.

In India, music has been part of Hindu and Buddhist religious traditions from antiquity. The earliest forms of music were rhythmic chants of Vedic passages and selections from sutras. The growth of bhakti (devotional) Hinduism was the occasion for music to be composed to accompany the poetry of the saints of medieval Hinduism, including Guru Nanak, Kabir, Ravidass, and others. In the case of the female saint Mirabai, folk music emerged to tell her story of devotion to Lord Krishna. The music of the Hindu saints was influenced by Sufi music traditions, and the followers of Hindu and Muslim saints interacted with each other; Kabir was a Muslim saint who was devoted to the Hindu notion of a formless God; he was venerated by both Hindus and Muslims. In modern India, popular Hindu religious music is often conveyed through the soundtracks of Hindi-language religious films.

Conclusion

The three-pronged approach suggested here is intended to aid contemplation of the paired mysteries of religion and music. The power of either is not readily defined, but how their powers play out in human societies can be observed. The globalization of religions has globalized some musical practices and ideas, but the same processes of globalization have introduced a dizzying array of musical practices within any given religion. Thus, even as global awareness increases, religious and musical practices must be considered locally.

Timothy J. Cooley

See also Art; Christianity; Cinema; Global Religion; Globalization; Hinduism; Islam; Popular Religion

Further Readings

- Aide, M. (2006, October 12). David Byrne about self-censorship: "We didn't want to provoke." Freemuse: Freedom of Musical Expression. Retrieved April 21, 2009, from <http://www.freemuse.org/sw14816.asp>
- Becker, J. (2004). Deep listeners: Music, emotion, and trancing. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Bohman, P. V. (1997). World musics and world religions: Whose world? In L. Sullivan (Ed.), Enchanting powers: Music in the world's religions (pp. 61–90). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Brown, F. B. (2000). Good taste, bad taste, and Christian taste: Aesthetics in religious life. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Cooley, T. J. (2005). Global village. In Making music in the Polish Tatras: Tourists, ethnographers, and mountain musicians (pp. 162–202). Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Ellingson, T. (2005). Music and religion. In L. Jones (Ed.), The encyclopedia of religion (2nd ed., pp. 6248–6256). Detroit, MI: Macmillan Reference USA.
- Hagedorn, K. (2006). "From this one song alone, I consider him to be a holy man": Ecstatic religion, musical affect, and the global consumer. Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion, 45(4), 489–496.
- Leaver, R. A. (2009). Lutheran church music. In Grove Music Online. Retrieved April 18, 2009, from <http://www.oxfordmusiconline.com/subscriber/article/grove/music/46760>
- Marti, A., & Polman, B. (2009). Reformed and Presbyterian church music. In Grove Music Online. Retrieved April 18, 2009, from <http://www.oxfordmusiconline.com/subscriber/article/grove/music/48535>
- Nadel, S. (1930). The origins of music. Musical Quarterly, 16, 531–546.
- Nelson, K. (1985). The art of reciting the Qur'an. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Neubauer, E., & Doubleday, V. (2009). Islamic religious music. In Grove Music Online. Retrieved April 18, 2009, from <http://www.oxfordmusiconline.com/subscriber/article/grove/music/52787>
- Qureshi, R. B. (1992/1993). "Muslim devotional": Popular religious music and Muslim identity under British, Indian and Pakistani hegemony. Asian Music, 24(1), 111–112.
- Rouget, G. (1985). Music and trance: A theory of the relations between music and possession. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD

Founded in 1928 by Hasan al-Banna, the Muslim Brotherhood is perhaps the most influential and enduring Islamist organization of the modern period. On the heels of the Islamic reformist projects of Muhammad Abduh, Jamal al-Din al-Afghani, and Rashid Rida, and within the context of British imperialism in Egypt, al-Banna envisioned the brotherhood as an authentic Islamic alternative to modern political ideology and as a sustainable decolonization program. Concentrating its efforts on community service and basic education, the brotherhood has been a central component in the social and political life of modern Egypt despite suffering a considerable period of persecution by successive regimes since its founding. As both a formal organization and an international movement, it has also greatly influenced the Islamist politics of other Arab countries. Throughout its history and in various contexts, the brotherhood's political strategies have varied from radical opposition to pragmatic accommodation, making it one of the most enigmatic political forces of the modern period.

Hasan al-Banna was a primary schoolteacher in Ismailiyya, a major city in the Suez Canal zone. With the city's economic livelihood dependent on the British-controlled commercial trade in the area, al-Banna was in a unique position to witness the pressures and dynamics of the British colonial administration in Egypt. While rapid modernization and capital expansion benefited the aristocratic elite, the disparity in wealth and educational opportunities among the classes became increasingly problematic. In this context, he envisaged the brotherhood both as a platform through which to fundamentally “revive” Islam as a holistic religious system and as a forum through which to address the necessities of a changing society.

Early Years

Hassan al-Banna was reared in traditional Islamic learning by his father, a reputable Muslim scholar in his own right. He was also exposed to a wide network of religious figures and intellectuals through his participation in the al-Hassafiyya Sufi order. In fact, it was a social welfare organization created under the auspices of the Hassafiyya that served as an immediate precursor to the brotherhood’s initial inception—a school (a room rented in a local mosque) dedicated to Islamic education such as Qur’anic recitation, interpretation, and history.

In 1931, the organization embarked on its first project to build a mosque and begin its social services. Weary of potential interference by elites, al-Banna sought financial support from middle-class and underprivileged locals instead of seeking funds from traditional patronage networks. Likewise, he regularly placed working-class, or other nonestablishment, individuals in positions of leadership within the organization, against the advice of his closest aids. A boys’ school and club were built above the mosque, followed by a girls’ school a year later. Also in 1931, the Cairo branch of the brotherhood was founded by al-Banna’s brother. Such actions afforded the early movement a reputation of popularism, piety, and integrity.

From its founding years, the brotherhood breached the fine line of political and religious separation that had conventionally governed the activities of Islamic welfare societies in Egyptian society. It addressed issues of public concern, including the legality of alcohol, prostitution, economic inequality, labor rights, British control of national resources, and European colonialism in Muslim lands more generally. It, nonetheless, did not actively involve itself in conventional politics. Thus, the brotherhood was positioned as a popular voice just as the Palestinian revolts of 1936 to 1939 cemented the anti-imperial sentiments of large segments of Egyptian society. By that time, the brotherhood had established approximately 100 branches across Egypt, founded a publishing house, owned their own pharmacy, and created a series of vocational schools for uneducated and unskilled initiates.

After establishing a network of contacts with like-minded Islamic welfare organizations abroad and supporting anti-Zionist political parties, it became increasingly difficult for the brotherhood to maintain its nonconfrontational posture against the British occupation of Egypt and the monarchical regime conducive to it. Splinter groups and underground militant cells began to form in the late 1930s, often without the knowledge of the organization’s top leadership. As World War II ended, Palestine was partitioned by the United Nations, and the Egyptian military confronted the emergent state of Israel, the brotherhood was transformed from a broad social service network of up to 0.5 million members to an active oppositional political party. Attacks on the government and popular protests against British and Jewish interests in 1948 led to a massive crackdown on the brotherhood. Increasing confrontations led to the assassination of Prime Minister Mahmud Fahmi al-Nuqrashi by a member of the brotherhood, which in turn resulted in the assassination of al-Banna in 1949.

In a united effort to oust King Farouk, the brotherhood joined forces with the Free Officers headed by Gamal Abdel Nasser. As a national socialist movement, it shared many of the populist sentiments of the brotherhood. However, when the group came to power in 1952, its nationalist agenda bypassed the Shari’a-oriented Islamic reforms sought by the brotherhood. Increasing tensions between the two groups led to political violence. An attempt on Nasser’s life in 1954 was attributed to the brotherhood, leading to widespread arrests and exile of the leadership, the dismantling of the organization’s infrastructure, and a ban on its activities. It has since then remained a banned political party.

After the assassination of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in 1981 by the radical group Al-Jihad, headed by Abdul Salam al-Faraj, the Muslim Brotherhood further distanced itself from violent political tactics. Increasing radicalism in Egypt has placed the brotherhood in a position of moderation between the regime and its militant Islamist challengers. Sadat's successor, Hosni Mubarak, released the brotherhood's Supreme Guide from prison in 1981, introducing a cautious policy of tolerance and accommodation. This policy has allowed the brotherhood to field candidates in parliamentary elections under the auspices of other parties or as independents despite remaining a banned political party.

Throughout the 1980s, the brotherhood gained a foothold in government institutions through a prudent policy of nonconfrontation coupled with a strategic use of legal channels of political participation. The brotherhood's political achievements took place alongside increasing radical Islamist violence, albeit by groups unassociated with the brotherhood, and soon the regime's accommodationist policy began to reverse. Despite the brotherhood's entrenchment in the civil and political life of Egyptian society, 54 of its members were convicted for participation in an "illegal organization" in 1995. After the convictions, the Mubarak regime pursued the organization more forcefully by restricting its activities and arresting its top leadership. Nonetheless, the brotherhood continued to increase its participation and success in parliamentary elections, winning roughly 20% of the seats in 2005. The end of the Mubarak regime in 2011 provided new opportunities for the brotherhood to achieve electoral success.

Beyond Egypt: Arab Nationalism and Militant Islamism

The Muslim Brotherhood's most radical ideologue emerged within the context of the brotherhood's persecution by the Nasser regime. Sayyid Qutb (d. 1967) was editor of the brotherhood's primary publication. His most cited work, Milestones, which justifies jihad against fellow Muslims on doctrinal grounds, was written in prison and reflects more the pressures of a persecuted activist than it does the organization's strategy and philosophy as a whole. Seen as a threat to the state, its publication and wide dissemination led to Qutb's execution and further persecution of the organization's members. Nonetheless, Milestones and Qutb's wider pronouncements more generally have inspired Muslim political activists the world over.

The group's tactics in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan exemplify the diversity of the movement's political philosophy and strategy. Unlike the organization's Egyptian counterpart, under King Farouk and the Nasser regime, the Jordanian Muslim Brotherhood has fully supported the monarchy and the country's political institutions since the inception of the state in 1946.

The results of an oppositional political orientation proved disastrous for the brotherhood when the Syrian-based group challenged the Ba'athist regime of Hafez al-Asad through a series of bombings and assassination attempts. In 1982, the Asad regime moved its military on the brotherhood in Hama. Continuous shelling resulted in the complete destruction of the city, placing the lowest estimated death toll at 10,000.

In contrast, the brotherhood's activities in the Sudan led to some political "success." Active in the country since the mid-1940s, the brotherhood gained a considerable following among the urban and educated middle classes but failed to penetrate the lower and rural classes, whose politics were dominated primarily by traditional networks of Sufi brotherhoods and tribal dynasties. The Sudanese brotherhood evolved into the Islamic Charter Front (now the National Islamic Front) under the leadership of Hasan al-Turabi in the early 1960s; it has since fallen in and out of favor with Sudan's various regimes.

One of the brotherhood's most enduring legacies abroad can be seen in its activities in the Palestinian territories. Like its Egyptian program, the Palestinian-based brotherhood focused on social services and Islamic revivalism before and after the creation of Israel. With the rise of Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO), the Israeli government allowed the brotherhood to expand its efforts, which it thought would serve as a political counterweight to rising Arab nationalism. Ironically, such policies led to the release of Shaykh Ahmad Yassin from prison in 1973—Yassin became the future founding figure of Hamas. Founded in 1987 out of the social network affiliated with the brotherhood's charitable institutions, Hamas was established as an alternative resistance movement to the secular nationalist orientations of Arafat's PLO, and it rejected the peace process with Israel. It has since maintained a dual character as a community service and a guerilla organization.

Abbas Barzegar

See also al-Banna, Hasan; Egypt; Hamas; Islam; Islamism (Political Islam); Palestine; Politics and Religion; Qutb, Sayyid; Religion and State; Terrorism; Violence; War on Terrorism

Further Readings

- Campagna, J. (1996). From accommodation to confrontation: The Muslim Brotherhood in the Mubarak years. Journal of International Affairs, 50(1), 278–304.
- Gilles, K. (2002). Jihad: The trail of political Islam. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Leiken, R. S., & Brooke, S. (2007). The moderate Muslim Brotherhood. Foreign Affairs, 86(2), 107–121.
- Lia, B. (1998). The society of the Muslim Brothers in Egypt. Reading, PA: Ithaca Press.
- Mitchell, R. P. (1993). The society of the Muslim Street Brothers. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Situated adjacent to India, China, and Thailand, the Southeast Asian country of Myanmar, previously known as Burma, was the region referred to as Suvarnabhumi (“Golden Land”) in the Buddhist Jatakas. With a population of more than 47,758,000, about 89% of the people profess Buddhism. Christians and Muslims constitute 4% each, and the rest practice different religions. The religion of Myanmar has been influenced chiefly by Indian Buddhist and Hindu traditions. The spread of Buddhism also was due to close cultural contact with Sri Lanka.

The account of the advent of Buddhism in Myanmar before the Common Era period can be gleaned from legends, traditions, and literary sources. It was believed that Gautama Buddha (567–487 BCE) himself visited the region. Two merchants from the Utkala region in the eastern coast of India (roughly corresponding to parts of modern Orissa), Tapussa, and Bhallika had installed three hairs of Gautama Buddha in the stupa (“reliquary mound”) at Yangon (former Rangoon), where the magnificent Shwedagon Pagoda was constructed. The missionary activities of Emperor Asoka (who ruled from 273 to 226 BCE) resulted in the spread of Buddhism in Myanmar.

The commercial contact between Myanmar and northeast India, Bengal, and Orissa witnessed the coming of traders with the message of Buddhism. There also were regular visits of Buddhist scholars between Myanmar and India. Archaeological excavations in Myanmar have yielded Buddhist monuments with square bases and a drum-shaped superstructure as well as images of bodhisattvas and Buddha Dipankara. For centuries, Buddhism dominated the life of the people of Myanmar along with elements of Hinduism. The influence from India was closely interwoven with ancient beliefs of the local people. The king was proclaimed as an avatar (incarnation) of Vishnu. Images of Brahmanic gods such as Vishnu, Brahma, and Siva were found in various locations in Myanmar. Whereas in the Indian tradition, Buddha is an incarnation of Vishnu, the reverse is true of Myanmar.

As noted above, Sri Lanka’s relations with Myanmar in medieval times also shaped the religious life of Myanmar. The Sri Lankan king Vijayabahu I (1065–1120 CE) requested Anawratha (1044–1077 CE), the ruler of Myanmar, to depu-tize monks for restoring the sangha, or Buddhist community, in Sri Lanka. King Kyanzitta (1084–1113 CE) made revisions of the Tripitaka, basing it on the version from Sri Lanka. He also visited Bodh Gaya in India and helped in repairing its Buddhist shrines. The king tried to bring about the assimilation of different religious traditions prevalent in Myanmar. Close ties between the two regions continued. In the mid 15th century, thousands of monks of Myanmar were being ordained in the Sri Lankan form of ordination. Gradually, the art, architecture, and literature of Myanmar were influenced by the Theravada Buddhism of Sri Lanka.

Religion has played an important role in the life of the people of Myanmar, where Buddhist monks and nuns have been in the vanguard of efforts to uphold democratic rights under the current dictatorship. The military junta’s brutal suppression of religious protestors has been widely condemned.

Patit Paban Mishra

See also China; India; Laos; Politics and Religion; Religion and State; Sangha; Southeast Asia; Sri Lanka; Thailand; Theravada Buddhism

Further Readings

- Aung, U. H. (1978). Folk elements in Burmese Buddhism. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press.
- King, W. L. (1964). A thousand lives away: Buddhism in contemporary Burma. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Mishra, P. P. (2005). Cultural rapprochement between India and Southeast Asia. New Delhi, India: National Book Organization.
- Oo, T. M. (2003). Aspects of Myanmar culture. Yangon, Burma: Cho-Tay-Than.
- Smith, B. L. (1978). Religion and legitimation of power in Thailand, Laos, and Burma. Chambersburg, PA: Anima Books.
- Smith, D. E. (1965). Religion and politics in Burma. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Spiro, M. E. (1970). Buddhism and society: A great tradition and its Burmese vicissitudes. New York: Harper & Row.

MYSTICISM

Mysticism is a spiritual experience that is virtually universal in religious traditions. It is also a problematic category for analysis, though it nonetheless retains heuristic value in the contemporary study of religion, culture, and society. The original Greek term mystikos and its English derivative mystical have a specific history. Historically, the dimensions of what has been deemed mystical include, as Louis Bouyer notes, initiatory and esoteric religiosity, hermeneutics, liturgy, and experience. The term has also been used in an imprecise way in popular culture and nonspecialist discourse, but such uses will not be the focus of this entry.

In the field of religious studies, the term is probably best understood as synonymous with mystical experience; such experiences differ according to particular mystics and religious traditions. Mystical experience is a subcategory of “religious experience” or “anomalous experience,” but it is not reducible to “altered states of consciousness.” Such anomalous events include glossolalia, lucid dreaming, near-death experiences (NDEs), out-of-body experiences (OBEs), psi-related experiences (“paranormal” abilities), and synesthesia. This is not to mention other, more “mundane” religious experiences such as a feeling of communal belonging while sitting as a member of a religious congregation. Although mystical experience is often elevated to the highest form of religious experience and as the essence of religions, greater reflection on the accuracy and dangers of that characterization is required.

On the most basic level, mystical experience may be defined as an experience of that which a given individual or community identifies as sacred or ultimate. There is no single, essential, and “ultimate” form of mystical experience; there are, in fact, many types of mystical experiences, which differ according to the community and tradition involved and which assume different soteriologies and theologies. The present definition also does not preclude the possibility that there are “nonreligious” mystical experiences, such as a feeling of oneness with Nature or the cosmos (Zaehner’s panenhenic category), or that, as noted by Louis Komjathy, some individuals may have had “trans-tradition” experiences that lead to religious conversion. “Nonreligious” experiences would still be “mystical” because an individual or a group defines them as sacred or ultimate.

Mystical experience consists of four primary dimensions: (1) the trigger (source), (2) the actual experience (not reducible to physiology), (3) its interpretation, and (4) the context. This is not to claim that one of these is more primary than another or that they are independent. Instead, the study of mysticism requires one to investigate the relationships.

The above “definition” is phenomenological, not normative. It does not privilege one type of mystical experience, one conception of self, or one theology over another. From this perspective, some interpretative challenges include studying the specific views of self, specific types of mystical experiences, and specific theologies (conceptions of the sacred) among different adherents and religious communities. Among certain mystics, and unfortunately among many scholars of mysticism, a monotheistic/monistic theology is assumed, that is, the informing worldview is that “reality” is unitary rather than pluralistic in nature.

Specific views of self, related practices, as well as the relationship among self, community, and society also deserve careful attention. The slatter point is key: Mystical experiences always occur in a sociohistorical and religiocultural context. This recognition does not deny the potentially transformative effects on the individual involved, but it begs the question of how such experiences are conditioned by, received within, and framed inside specific contexts. Mystical experience is thus simultaneously individual and communal; in relation to religious traditions, mystical experiences may be either conservative or subversive. Some communities value and affirm such experiences, whereas others de-emphasize or reject the relevance. An example of the latter would be the emphasis on grace and the Bible as the revealed/inspired word of God in certain forms of Protestant Christianity, or the Church and its ecclesiastical representatives as interpretative authorities in Roman Catholicism. In addition to the medieval heresy trials, one finds an example of such concern in the “Norms of the Congregation for Proceeding in Judging Alleged Apparitions and Revelations,” issued by the Papal Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith on February 25, 1978. There are similar reservations concerning the relevance of “mystical experiences” in certain Zen Buddhist movements and in specific Daoist internal alchemy communities, not to mention contemporary secular-materialist dismissals of mystical experience as nothing more than social constructions or neurophysiology (see below). The underlying motivations and political dimensions of such attempts to corral mystical experiences also deserve consideration.

Toward a Typology of Mystical Experiences

Throughout the history of the academic study of mysticism, scholars have attempted both to define mysticism and to typologize mystical experiences. In The Varieties of Religious Experience, published in 1902, which includes one of the earliest and most influential studies of mysticism, William James attempted to set parameters around “the mystical” by identifying four defining characteristics: (1) ineffability, (2) noetic quality, (3) transiency, and (4) passivity (Wainwright, 1981, pp. 1–53). Each of these is debatable, as many mystics actually describe their apprehension of the sacred (e.g., Hildegard of Bingen), claim that knowledge itself is a problem (e.g., the early Daoist inner cultivation lineages), attain an enduring state of mystical experiencing or mystical being (e.g., Rūmī), and directly initiate mystical experiences through religious praxis (e.g., Dōgen). Nonetheless, James’s characteristic-based analysis established some of the dominant interpretative questions for the field of “mysticism studies,” with particular attention being given to epistemological issues. Later researchers, using a more informed comparative approach, have sought to categorize mystical experiences according to types. Important initial attempts include R. C. Zaehner (monistic, theistic, panenhenic), Walter Stace (extrovertive and introvertive), and Roland Fisher (ergotropic and trophotropic). There have also been recent, problematic attempts to limit mystical experience to trophotropic experiences (Forman, 1990) and to categorize mystical experiences in a hierarchical ordering of states of consciousness (d’Aquili & Newberg, 1999). Much of the latter type of research assumes a specific worldview and is protective in intent: If affective or visionary types of mystical experiences are included (those “dangerous medieval Christian women”), some modern researchers seem concerned that mystics will be defined as pathological, as in the mode of the modern psychiatric category of “schizophrenic.”

If one accepts the above definition of mystical experience and adopts a more phenomenological and comparative approach, then a composite and expanded interpretative framework of the above typologies provides significant contributions to the study of mysticism. One may focus on the linguistic tendencies of mystics: kataphatic (based on affirmations), apophatic (based on negations), or translinguistic (silence as primary). Mystics, mystical texts, and mystical communities may also be studied in terms of the relationship of the sacred with self and world: immanent (in self and world) or transcendent (beyond self and world), and dualistic (separate and different categories of being), unitive (separate but able to be unified), or nondualistic (distinctions as illusory). Attention may also be given to the type of sensory activity involved, including visionary, auditory, gustatory, olfactory, tactual, synesthetic, or “extrasensory,” as well as the degree of emphasis on sensory perception—extrovertive/ecstatic (outward directed, with sensory engagement) or introvertive/enstatic (inward directed, with sensory disengagement). The physiological dimension of mystical experiences includes the degree of arousal or quiescence, charted along a spectrum from the most ergotropic (hyper-aroused) to the most trophotropic (hypoaroused/hyperquiescent). The former involves high levels of perceptual, emotional, and/or intellectual stimulation, while the latter involves low levels. One may also focus on “theological dimensions,” in the sense of conceptions of the sacred: monistic (one reality), monotheistic (one, high God), pantheistic (everything is God), panentheistic (God is simultaneously in all things but beyond all things), polytheistic (many gods), animistic (all things inhabited by gods), and panenhenic (Nature as sacred). Another dimension of mystical experience is the view of self involved: docetic (eternal soul), spiritualist (ephemeral spirit), psychosomatic (mind-body), composite (self composed of different ephemeral elements), transpersonal (divine Self beyond individuated identity), and illusory (“self” as illusion). Finally, a psychological typology would include at least the following categories: perceptual (sense based), affective (emotion based), speculative (intellect based), contemplative (transconceptual with meditation as primary), erotic (sexuality-based), or somatic (body based). Although every mystical experience involves the body, “somatic mysticism” involves mystical experiences within which the sacred is experienced in/as/through the body (Komjathy, 2007). Many more cartographies could be added.

Placing these categories in conversation with mystics and mystical texts, certain patterns emerge. There tends to be overlap among the following: monotheistic, kataphatic, dualistic, transcendent, affective or speculative, and ergotropic. A similar connection is found among monistic, apophatic, unitive, immanent, contemplative or somatic, and trophotropic. Specific soteriologies, including diverse practices, are also implied in these.

Some examples that have informed the above typology may provide clarification. The Syrian Neo-Platonic Christian Pseudo-Dionysius’s (early sixth century CE) experience of the Transcendent One is a monistic, unitive, transcendent, speculative, and trophotropic mystical experience. The Benedictine Catholic nun Hildegard of Bingen’s (1098–1179) experience of the “Living Light” is a monotheistic, dualistic, transcendent, visionary, affective, and ergotropic mystical experience. The Japanese Zen Buddhist monk Eihei Dōgen’s (1200–1253) realization of his own Buddha nature is a monistic (possibly panenhenic), nondualistic, immanent, contemplative, and trophotropic mystical experience. Such examples clarify the challenges of a comparative approach to mysticism: One finds equally viable and mutually exclusive accounts of the human condition and ultimate reality.

Interpretative Approaches

There are many interpretative approaches to the study of mysticism. Some are more developed than others, and each has its contributions and limitations. Some are also more applicable to certain mystics than others. Each requires deep familiarity with mystics, mystical literature, and religious communities to be able to provide an accurate account.

Contextualist Approaches

This approach emphasizes understanding the given mystic/mystical text within its overall religious-cultural, sociohistorical, and political context. Area studies related to each religious tradition have major researchers using historical contextualist approaches, with some placing more emphasis on the tradition itself and others on the overall socio-political context. This might include the relationship of mystical experience to the larger religious system in which it occurs, including asceticism, ethics, meditation, prayer, ritual, and so forth. A historical contextualist approach to the study of mysticism is most often associated with Steven Katz and the contributors to his many edited volumes, but most modern researchers acknowledge the importance of context.

Philosophical and Theoretical Approaches

This approach emphasizes philosophical questions, with particular attention to epistemological issues. Some dominant questions are the following: Is experience mediated or unmediated? If knowledge is gained through mystical experiences, what type of knowledge is it? Can mystical experiences, especially as documented in texts, provide any evidential support for claims about the nature of “reality”? Philosophical approaches include specific conceptions of self, including consciousness and mind (though rarely the body), that involve various assumptions. Here, there is overlap with postcolonial studies, psychology, consciousness studies, and neuroscience. Normative judgments are often involved. The field of mysticism studies has been dominated by philosophical approaches in combination with historical contextualist ones. Some major voices using this approach include Robert Forman, Steven Katz, and Wayne Proudfoot.

Phenomenological and Comparative Approaches

A phenomenological approach emphasizes studying mystics and mystical texts on their own terms, with particular attention given to defining characteristics and internal concerns. It is primarily descriptive and avoids privileging either normative claims on the part of mystics or questions brought to the material by scholars (“bracketing”). Although comparative approaches often overlap with contextualist and philosophical ones, such approaches must begin as an extension of a phenomenological approach. The comparative approach studies different mystics and mystical communities in terms of the similarities and differences among them. Comparative approaches may involve using insights gleaned from the study of one mystic to study another, developing larger theoretical frameworks through comparison, or placing different mystics in conversation with each other. Comparative approaches may also be intra- or interreligious. The comparative study of mysticism reveals many unquestioned assumptions on the part of both a given religious community and researchers of mysticism. This interpretative approach is not yet fully developed. It begins with the work of scholars such as William James, R. C. Zaehner, and W. T. Stace. More recent contributions have come from Robert Ellwood and Robert K. C. Forman.

Theological Approaches

This approach emphasizes the relationship between mystical experiences and conceptions of the sacred (“theology”), most often from a Christian theological perspective. The latter tends to focus solely on Christian mystical experiences, assume monotheism as a self-evident given, and engage in normative discourse. It often also conflates “theology” with existentialist questions (meaning and purpose), believing that only a “relationship with God” can provide a framework for meaning and purpose. A major question focuses on the soteriological import and theological relevance of mystical experiences. Do mystical experiences enable the Christian adherent to know God? Such is a Christian normative approach, and additional issues such as the importance of grace and Scripture play a central role. An alternative theological approach, yet to be fully developed, would focus on descriptive and historical “theology” and refrain from privileging one religious tradition over another. One might enquire into the specific conception of the sacred and the corresponding world-views involved. Normative issues would be bracketed or explored from a comparative perspective. There can be no doubt that the comparative study of mysticism reveals alternative, mutually exclusive but perhaps equally viable, theologies (contra Perennial Philosophy). Theological approaches to the study of mysticism have generally fallen out of favor, but a major voice using such an approach is Bernard McGinn in his The Presence of God series on the history of Christian mysticism.

Psychological Approaches

These approaches emphasize the psychological dimensions of mystical experiences. They may be skeptical or sympathetic, reductionistic or integral. The skeptical and reductionistic approaches tend to interpret mystical experiences as pathological in nature and to categorize certain mystics according to modern psychiatric or medical categories (e.g., schizophrenic, migraine sufferer). Such approaches tend to begin with the assumption that religion itself is a social pathology, when there is, in fact, much evidence that mystics actually live in more “optimal states” and differ significantly from “the diseased.” Sympathetic and integral psychological approaches tend to see mystics as providing glimpses into human potential and higher levels of consciousness. In this way, there is overlap with consciousness studies. In either case, psychological approaches tend to de-emphasize or ignore the soteriological and theological dimensions of “mystical psychology,” although contemplative, spiritual, and transpersonal psychologies are beginning to explore mystical experiences in a more comprehensive way. Some major voices in the psychological study of mysticism include Arthur Deikman, Robert Forman, Sigmund Freud, Stanislav Grof, William James, Abraham Maslow, and David Wulff.

Neuroscientific Approaches

These approaches emphasize the scientific study of mystical experience in terms of the nervous system and the brain (“mind”). Neuroscientific approaches tend to involve various forms of technological interventionism (e.g., functional magnetic resonance imaging [fMRI], single-photon emission computed tomography [SPECT]) to create “neuro-images” of different “brain states.” Neuroscientific approaches focus on the neurophysiological and neurostructural dimensions, including biochemical and neuroregional associations, of mystical experience. Like psychological approaches, with which they sometimes overlap but with a stronger biological basis, these approaches may be skeptical or sympathetic, reductionistic or integral. Among skeptical and reductionistic neuroscientific approaches, one finds experiments to re-create “mystical experiences” through brain manipulation (through drugs or machines) in laboratories. Note that this is a very different context from a meditation hut in the Himalayan mountains and begs the question about the influence of community and place on religious praxis and experience. Among the more sympathetic and integral perspectives, researchers seek to map out dimensions of human consciousness related to the “mystical mind” or higher levels of consciousness. There is also overlap with research on meditation and contemplative studies, and we are only just beginning to see the use of “critical first-person” approaches. Some major voices in the neuroscientific study of mystical experience include Eugene d’Aquili, Richard Davidson, Andrew Newburg, Walter Pahnke, and Michael Persinger.

Postcolonialist and Postmodern Approaches

Postcolonialist approaches to the study of mysticism emphasize the ways in which Western scholarship has tended to colonize “the other,” especially “non-Western” religious traditions. These approaches attempt to understand mystics and religious traditions on their own terms and examine the unquestioned assumptions of many earlier accounts of mysticism. This includes the specific conceptions of self and existence among mystics and the ways in which those views challenge received worldviews and enculturation. While postcolonialist approaches might require one to see the world from multiple perspectives without hierarchical ordering, postmodern approaches tend to see all knowledge as relative and “reality” as perspectival. This approach challenges the very relevance of the study of mysticism. Postmodern approaches also give greater attention to the social and political dimensions of mystical experience, so much so that some researchers would reduce mystical experiences (mystical texts) to political critique and deny the possibility of “unmediated experience.” Both postcolonial and postmodern approaches challenge the privileging of “personal experience” in the study of mysticism. We have yet to see the logical culmination of a postcolonialist perspective: scholarly studies that place mystics and mystical texts (“data”) as equals in the conversation or that are written from the perspectives of mystics. Some major voices in the postcolonialist and postmodern study of mysticism include Grace Jantzen, Richard King, Jeffrey Kripal, Robert Sharf, Mark Taylor, and Steven Wasserstrom.

Methodology

In terms of methodology, the study of mysticism has been dominated by the study of texts. While earlier Perennialist accounts most often used inaccurate translations, selective citation, and decontextualized interpretation, the contemporary study of mysticism is characterized by a generally high-level linguistic competence, complete translations of primary sources from their original languages, and historically informed interpretations.

However, the reliance on texts reveals various interpretative issues. First, the present entry seems to suggest that the study of “mystical literature” is synonymous with the study of mystical experience. In fact, that relationship is a complex and problematic one. A written account of a mystical experience, if such an account is considered “mystical literature,” is not the same as having a mystical experience. How much more compelling then is the case for hearing or reading such written accounts? (Note, however, that mystics such as Eihei Dōgen, Eckhart, Hildegard of Bingen, and Jalāluddīn Rūmī might dispute this statement.) The study of mystical texts begs the question of the relationship of those texts to the author's interpretation or construction of specific events and the relationship of the text to both the originary event and the interpretation, assuming that there is a distinction (see Katz, 1978, 1983; Proudfoot, 1985; Sharf, 1995, 1998). A similar problem with respect to reliance on texts is the categorization of certain works as "mystical literature," especially if one believes that they are part of some "universal wisdom tradition." For example, is Pseudo-Dionysius's Peri Mustikes Theologias (Mystical Theology) a "mystical text" or a "theological treatise"? Without assuming that such categories are mutually exclusive, is that text about personal mystical experience? Another challenge in a text-based methodology is the fact that the autobiography is a relatively recent genre of literature. Before the European Enlightenment, and outside of modern Western contexts, it is relatively rare to find autobiographical accounts of mystical experience. (Note the fact that many received texts were transcribed.) One possible explanation is that the emphasis on direct experience of the sacred is a modern preoccupation, but the careful study of religious traditions provides evidence that this is not the case.

Because of the inherent limitations of textual study, especially that of texts written in different cultures during diverse historical periods, many contemporary scholars of mysticism have sought to supplement classical texts with other forms of support. This includes contemporary firsthand and autobiographical accounts, interviews, as well as personal testimonials. Among the latter, some scholar-practitioners have used autobiographical accounts of their own mystical experiences as evidential support for their interpretations of mysticism. Examples include Robert Ellwood, Robert Forman, Jeffrey Kripal, and Jordan Paper. Although this approach is interesting, it also proves problematic because of issues of "objectivity" and hegemonic academic standards of "scholarship." As is the case in contemplative studies, this is the beginning of a new methodology in mysticism studies: combining third-person approaches with critical first-person approaches. What requires attention here is the fact that mystical experience easily becomes decontextualized and secularized, and thereby domesticated. Perhaps the soteriologies and theologies (adherence/observance) are essential features of mystical systems.

The study of mysticism is thus as engaging as it is challenging. In addition to familiarity with specific texts and religious traditions, it requires careful investigation of and reflection on various interpretative and methodological issues. Guiding interpretative questions are multifaceted and diverse. What is the relationship among mystical texts, mystical experience, and interpretation (individual, communal, and academic)? How are mystics and mystical texts located and placed within their specific religious tradition? What roles do gender and power relationships play? What is the relationship between views of self, religious praxis, and mystical experience? What is the larger soteriological and theological framework in which mystical experiences occur? What kinds of challenges do mystics pose to religious authorities and interpreters of mysticism? Are there dangers in reducing the study of mysticism to the study of mystical experience and in identifying mystical experiences as the culmination of religious adherence and human potential? Is there a state of being, an ontological condition, beyond the static idea of "mystical experience" (linear and transitory), in which the individual abides in a constant state of mystical being and mystical experiencing?

Interpretations of mystical experiences are as diverse as the corresponding mystics, religious texts, religious traditions, and the experiences themselves. Those interpretations emerge within specific contexts and specific discourse communities, and there may be an indeterminacy of translation among them.

Louis Komjathy

See also China; Christianity; Daoism; Hinduism; Islam; Mahayana Buddhism; Meditation; Modernism; Monasticism; Theravada Buddhism; Vajrayana, Tibetan

Further Readings

- Bouyer, L. (1990). The Christian mystery: From pagan myth to Christian mysticism. Edinburgh, UK: T&T Clark.
- Cardeña, E., Lynn, S. J., & Krippner, S. (Eds.). (2000). Varieties of anomalous experience: Examining the scientific evidences. Washington, DC: American Psychological Association.
- d'Aquili, E., & Newberg, A. B. (1999). The mystical mind: Probing the biology of religious experience. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press.

- David, C. F. (1989). The evidential force of religious experience. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press.
- Ellwood, R. S. (1999). Mysticism and religion (Rev. ed.). New York: Seven Bridges Press.
- Forman, R. K. C. (Ed.). (1990). The problem of pure consciousness. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Jantzen, G. M. (1995). Power, gender, and Christian mysticism. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Katz, S. T. (Ed.). (1978). Mysticism and philosophical analysis. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Katz, S. T. (Ed.). (1983). Mysticism and religious traditions. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- King, R. (1999). Orientalism and religion: Postcolonial theory, India and "the mystic East." London: Routledge.
- King, R. (2005). Mysticism and spirituality. In J. Hinnells (Eds.), The Routledge companion to the study of religion (pp. 306–333). New York: Routledge.
- Kohn, L. (1992). Early Chinese mysticism: Philosophy and soteriology in the Taoist tradition. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Komjathy, L. (2007). Cultivating perfection: Mysticism and self-transformation in early Quanzhen Daoism. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Proudfoot, W. (1985). Religious experience. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Roth, H. D. (1999). Original Tao: Inward training (Nei-yeh) and the foundations of Taoist mysticism. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Sharf, R. (1995). Buddhist modernism and the rhetoric of meditative experience. Numen, 42(3), 228–283.
- Sharf, R. (1998). Experience. In M. C. Taylor (Ed.), Critical terms for religious studies (pp. 94–116). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Wainwright, W. J. (1981). Mysticism: A study of its nature, cognitive value, and moral implications. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press.
- Wallace, B. A. (2004). The taboo of subjectivity: Towards a new science of consciousness. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.
- Yandell, K. (1994). The epistemology of religious experience. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Zaehner, R. C. (1961). Mysticism, sacred and profane. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press.

associated with religion. It is derived from the Greek word mythos, meaning “word of mouth.” In general, myths are understood to take place in an unspecified time either before recorded history or in the early history of a group’s existence, but they carry a meaning that makes them significantly relevant to a group’s system of beliefs as they continue to exist in society. Myths are not necessarily false, as common usage of the word is concerned. Rather, they are regarded as part of a group’s spiritual beliefs, so they are not considered either true or false.

In attempting to explain the worldview of a particular group of people, myths contain images, symbols, and metaphors that represent a number of different ideas shared by a group. Unlike legends, folktales, fables, or fairy tales, myths play an important role in society and are taken more seriously by scholars due to their spiritual and religious significance. They are not simply stories conjured up by members of a group today, but rather, they have gained acceptance by a group of people through generations of oral and written tradition. They are an integral part of a group’s religious and cultural identity.

Myths have been a part of society for as long as people have sought to explain the world around them. In a sense, myths can be seen as alternatives to science, with science being the modern method of describing natural phenomena. For instance, the Big Bang theory is science’s way of explaining the origin of the universe, whereas nearly every group of people throughout history has come up with its own creation myth. The Greek myth of the creation of the world out of chaos is an example of this type of myth. As science increasingly becomes the more accepted version of describing natural phenomena, even among groups with strongly held traditional beliefs, myths have somewhat decreased in importance. They are still, however, vital to the identity and cultural heritage of groups of people. They are so important, in fact, that even as different civilizations and societies have disappeared, their myths have persevered, offering scholars a close look into their systems of beliefs.

Myths are a part of nearly every culturally and religiously distinct group’s heritage. Some of the most well-known myths today come from the ancient Greeks, who incorporated numerous myths about their gods and heroes into their religion and society. These myths were a central aspect of ancient Greek culture, and these sacred stories were intertwined into their religious rituals. Other prominent sources of mythologies that are still well-known today include the Norse (Scandinavian) myths, Egyptian myths, Judeo-Christian myths, Mesopotamian myths, and a variety of myths from the native North American tribes.

MYTH

A myth is a sacred narrative that seeks to explain the worldview of a group of people and is usually

Creation myths, as earlier stated, are a popular type of sacred story that can be found in nearly every culture's collection of mythologies. These narratives tell the story of how the world was created by a supernatural power out of a scene of chaos and disorder, with each different culture inserting its own respective symbols and superpowers into the myths. In addition to creation myths, founding myths are another common type of myth and serve to explain the origins of a people, place, or idea. Founding myths are featured prominently in Greek mythology, as nearly every different subsection of the ancient Greeks was accounted for by a founding myth. Many of their cities, such as Athens, Delphi, and Corinth, also had founding myths behind them. Apart from Greek mythology, one prominent founding myth comes from Roman mythology, telling the story of how the city of Rome was founded by the twins Romulus and Remus.

With nearly every culture and religion having its own myths, it is not surprising that there are some similarities among the myths of different cultures. Looking at myths from a cross-cultural perspective, there are many familiar patterns and symbols that recur among different groups of people, which might be more than mere coincidence. The story of a resurrecting savior of humankind is one that does not belong only to followers of the Christian faith, referring to Jesus Christ. In Buddhism, the story of Siddhartha Gautama, the Buddha, is noted for certain parallels to Jesus' life; this is also the case with the Aztec god Quetzalcoatl. Even the theme of Jesus' crucifixion occurs, with some variations (e.g., the Greek god Ixion), in myths of different cultures and religions.

Another very common myth that is shared by several different cultures around the world is the story of the flood. The most well-known version of this story in Western culture comes from the Hebrew Bible. In this account, Noah built a great ark according to God's instructions and was able to save only his family and a select few animals from the subsequent great flood caused by God, which killed every animal and human outside the ark. After the flood, God instructed Noah to repopulate the earth with the people and animals from the ark that were saved. Scholars have been able to identify hundreds of distinct cultures that tell the story of a great flood that occurred at the hands of a higher power, where only a select few were allowed to be saved. Although not all accounts share the same details of the flood story from the Bible, many of them, even ones told by cultures from different regions of the world, are remarkably similar. The Maori people of New Zealand, for example, tell a very similar account of the flood story, with only a few differing details, some of which are the result of their worshipping many gods as opposed to just one.

The similarity of all these flood stories leads many to believe that there may have been some type of natural disaster involving water that occurred in ancient times. Archaeologists, theologians, and even geologists offer different theories about the possibility of an actual deluge that may have occurred. A more mythographical approach to the flood story, as well as the many other analogous myths among different cultures, is the idea of the monomyth. The writer and scholar Joseph Campbell (1904–1987) introduced this idea in his book The Hero With a Thousand Faces. The monomyth, according to Campbell, is the idea of a basic pattern found among myths throughout different cultures around the world. He claims that all myths follow the same basic framework that divides them into three basic stages: the social separation, initiation, and return of a hero. Campbell thus claims that there is a universal quality that all myths from every culture or religion around the globe share, which is the result of the similar way that all humans understand themselves. The only differences among the different myths are each culture's varying use of symbols and characters to represent their ideas. The psychologist Carl Jung (1875–1961) was also an influential proponent of a universal theory of myths, which he attributed to a collective unconscious shared by all humans.

The theory of the monomyth became popular in the mid-20th century, when it was first introduced, but has since been criticized for its simplicity.

Scholars have opted for a less universal approach to the study of mythology, siding instead with a theory more closely identified with particularism. Particularism, which is also mentioned in conjunction with many other academic fields, explains myths in a more individual context. In this view, myths are products of each culture's disparate struggles with life, and they reiterate their own society's beliefs about nature and its own existence. The fact that many myths are similar in nature is due to common aspects of the human condition around the world.

Regardless of the theory one accepts for the explanation behind myths, they are clearly an important tool for researchers to study different cultures and religions around the globe. Studying Greek myths gives scholars an idea of how the Greeks practiced their religion, as myth and ritual mirrored each other to a great extent. Egyptian myths also entailed elaborate religious rituals. In Mesopotamian civilization, many myths dealt with vegetation and drought, as the climate had a huge impact on their survival. Celtic mythology contains narratives of a number of different gods and spirits, offering a look at the traditions and beliefs of pre-Christianized Europe.

Zion Zohar

See also Ancient Near Eastern Religions; Campbell, Joseph; Christianity; Greece; Hinduism; Islam; Jung, Carl Gustav; Lévi-Strauss, Claude; Mahayana Buddhism; Pluralism; Theravada Buddhism; Vajaryana, Tibetan

Further Readings

- Campbell, J. (1968). The hero with a thousand faces (2nd ed.). Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Doniger, W. (2006). The woman who pretended to be who she was: Myths of self-imitation. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Doniger, W. (2010). The implied spider: Politics and theology in myth. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Lincoln, B. (2002). Discourse and the construction of society: Comparative studies of myth, ritual, and classification. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Patton, L., & Doniger, W. (Eds.). (1996). Myth and method. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press.

NAJAF

The city of Najaf in Iraq has been a religious center of the Shi'i branch of Islam since the eighth century. A popular destination for pilgrims, Najaf is located south of Baghdad and 6 miles west of Kufa (1 mile = 1.609 kilometers). It is the site of the mausoleum of the first Shi'a imam, Alī ibn Abī Ṭalīb, whose gravesite was revealed to the public in the early 'Abbāsīd period by Ja'far al-Ṣādiq (d. 765) during one of his visits to Kufa. Under al-Ṣādiq and his disciples, Najaf also became heir to the Shi'a learning that had flourished in Kufa, where, in the grand mosque, al-Ṣādiq's narrations were disseminated among some 900 teachers of traditions.

Muslim armies entered the Najaf region in the year 633. Four years later, they chose the adjacent city of Kufa as a garrison city. The army took up permanent residence in Kufa and its environs in the direction of Najaf (then called the "Back of Kufa"). The main mosque in Kufa was built in 637, around which the Arab tribes soon began to gather. Kufa flourished in no time, particularly following the year 656, when 'Alī took up residence in the city. 'Alī found the city agreeable and moved the seat of the caliphate from Medina. According to Muslim tradition, the prophets Adam, Noah, Hud, and Salih are buried in Najaf. At one stage, 'Alī informed his household of his impending martyrdom and willed to have his body buried at a specified place in the valley, which he pointed out to them. His sons, al-Hasan and al-Husayn, buried him in that spot, which now lies inside the city of Najaf.

Following the founding of Baghdad (754–775), a number of Shi'i scholars from Kufa migrated to this new capital. Some others chose the mausoleum at Najaf as the base from which to teach and spread Shi'a traditions. Although Kufa retained its importance as the locus of Shi'a activities until the 15th century, Najaf gradually replaced it. During this transition, Najaf's shrine and the seminary attached to it received much needed patronage from Shi'i rulers. The ruler of Tabaristan, Muhammad ibn Zayd al-'Alawī (d. 900), ordered the construction of the dome and the Sufi zāwiyah (cells). The Būyid sulta added the arched halls and hospices that provided residence for the students who came to study in Najaf. During his visit to Najaf in 1336, Ibn Batūtah, the famous traveler, noted the existence of a number of seminaries, hospices, and Sufi convents attached to the shrine.

In the 11th century, Muhammad bin al-Hasan al-Ṭūsī (d. 1067), a great Shi'a scholar and leader of the community, migrated from the Karkh region of Baghdad to Najaf in 1057, following the Sunnī-Shi'i riots and destruction of his library, and established his own school based on a text-oriented Shi'a curriculum. The present-day Shi'i mujtahids regard themselves as the intellectual heirs of al-Ṭūsī's school, but in the 20th century, Najaf lost its leadership of Shi'a learning. With the establishment of Shi'ism as the state religion of Iran under the Safavids in the early 1500s, there was a flow of Shi'i scholars from Iraq and Lebanon to Isfahan and other places in Iran. In the 19th century, Iraq and Iran witnessed the modernization of educational and political institutions along with the development of an intense nationalism that created a different challenge for the jurists in Iran. Under the leadership of Ayatullah ‘Abd al-Karīm Hā’irī Yazdī (d. 1937), the religious hierarchy in Iran found it appropriate to establish a seminary in Qum that would respond to the growing needs of the times and would equal and even surpass Najaf as the hub of Shi’a religious sciences. Moreover, the highly centralized religious leadership of the marja’ al-taqlīd (supreme religious authority) had passed on to prominent jurists of Qum, overshadowing the apolitical leadership of Najaf in the growing turmoil of the 1950s and 1960s. It was not until the rise of Ayatullah Khomeini (d. 1989) and Muhammad Bāqir al-Ṣadr (executed 1980) that Najaf reversed its tradition of shunning politics and actively sought to combat the secular ideology of the Baathists in Iraq. Today, Muqtada al-Sadr wields enormous political influence among the downtrodden in the city; whereas Ayatullah Sayyid ‘Ali al-Sistani remains influential among the secularists and well-to-do Iraqis.

There are several historical sites in the vicinity of Najaf that form an important part of Shi’a piety. One of the most sacred places is the grand mosque of Kufa, where ‘Ali was assassinated. In Shi’i estimation, the Kufa mosque is equal in status to the mosques of Mecca (Makkah) and Medina. The other important spot of pilgrimage is the Sahlah mosque, where the Shi’i believe that the 12th messianic imam, al-Mahdi, appears every Tuesday evening to perform the sunset prayer. Accordingly, a large crowd of pious Shi’i assembles in Sahlah at that time in the hope of meeting the “Hidden Imam.” The surrounding environs consist of tombs and sanctuaries, including ‘Ali’s house. One of the most extensive cemeteries in the Muslim world, Wadi al-Salam (the Valley of Peace), is located in Najaf on the way to Karbala, where everyday hundreds of dead bodies of both Shi’i and Sunnī Muslims are brought for burial.

Abdulaziz Sachedina

See also Iran; Iraq; Islam; Karbala; Pilgrimage; Qum; Shi’a Islam

Further Readings

- Algar, H. (1969). Religion and state in Iran, 1785–1906: The role of the ulama in the Qajar Period. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Ayoub, M. M. (1978). Redemptive suffering in Islam: A study of the devotional aspects of ‘Āshūrā’ in Twelver Shi’ism. The Hague, Netherlands: Mouton.

Mottahedeh, R. P. (1985). The mantle of the Prophet: Religion and politics in Iran. New York: Simon & Schuster.

NAMIBIA

The religious diversity of the southern African nation of Namibia, dominated since colonialism by Christianity, stems from centuries of cultural interaction. Before colonialism, the supreme deity, Kalunga, presided over the Bantu-speaking Ovambo. With their onganga ritual, experts regulated relations with ancestors and healed illness. Today, Herero flag associations, composed of Christian men, commemorate colonial-era heroes and ancestors by visiting their graves and asking for good health. European missionaries saw such ideas as both bridges and challenges to Christianity, but populations of African descent, which also include San, Khoi, Nama, and Damara, have struck a balance with the mainline Christian heritage of the “mixed-race” Baster and Colored populations, both of whom speak Afrikaans, and the country’s small White minority.

The London Missionary Society began evangelizing the Nama in the early 1800s, translating the Bible into Nama. The Rhenish Mission Society of Germany (RMS) and the Finnish Missionary Society (FMS) followed. The RMS targeted the Herero, translating the Bible into Herero in the late 1800s, at a time when Herero and Nama were warring over grazing lands. RMS field reports strongly influenced German colonial perceptions of Africans as indolent, arrogant, and devious, helping justify the ruthless colonial repression of armed Herero and Nama anti-colonial resistance and to incite the Herero genocide of 1904. Herero and Nama survivors were interned in concentration camps with some assistance from the RMS, whose members ministered to the refugees. Herero survivors converted to Christianity, in part to restructure their decimated society. But in 1955, they initiated the autonomous Oruano Church. Other African-initiated churches also emerged, including the FMS-derived Evangelical Lutheran Ovambo-Kavango Church.

During and after World War I, South Africa occupied Namibia, imposing its apartheid system of racial segregation. African-initiated churches and the Anglican, Lutheran, and Catholic Churches opposed South African rule before and during the long rebellion led by the South West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO). Then, after Namibia became independent in 1990, Christians sharpened their focus on issues related to gender and sexuality in the era of HIV/AIDS. In the 1990s, many pastors discouraged condom use, but the nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) fought back, winning President Nujoma's backing in 1999 for the distribution of female condoms. But in 2001, he ordered the police to "arrest, deport, and imprison" lesbians and gays, invoking Christian rhetoric. And in 2003, the U.S.-PEPFAR (President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief) initiative, influenced by conservative U.S. Christian groups, began funding AIDS treatment and programs promoting sexual abstinence over prevention education and harm reduction. In response, Namibian women have sustained their say in making sexual decisions with their partners, closed illicit bars known as places of sexual license, and worked to maintain the availability of female and male condoms in their country. Once again, Namibians have articulated their faiths amid global influences.

Joseph R. Hellweg

See also Africa; Anglicans; Gender; International NGOs; Postcolonialism; Protestant Christianity; South Africa

Further Readings

- Ellis, J. (1981). The church in mobilization for national liberation. In R. Green, K. Kiljunen, & M.-L. Kiljunen (Eds.), Namibia: The last colony (pp. 132–144). Burnt Mill, UK: Longman.
- Hahn, C., Vedder, H., & Fourie, L. (1966). The native tribes of South West Africa. London: Frank Cass.
- Hendrickson, H. (1996). Bodies and flags. In H. Hendrickson (Ed.), Clothing and difference (pp. 213–244). Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Katjavivi, P., Froston, P., & Mbuende, K. (1989). Church and liberation in Namibia. London: Pluto.
- Steinmetz, G. (2007). The devil's handwriting. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Susser, I. (2009). AIDS, sex, and culture. Malden, MA: Wiley-Blackwell.

and language; state refers to a legal and political entity that is a defined sovereign territory. While the origins and early history of the nation-state are disputed, most theories view the nation-state as a 19th- and 20th-century Western phenomenon deriving from the Treaty of Westphalia (1648), which many historians identify as marking the beginning of the modern European idea of a nation-state in which the national community and the sovereign ruler are identified as a single entity.

The earliest predecessors of modern nation-states are the city-states of ancient Greece, or polis. In the Medieval and Renaissance periods, this notion of localized government existed in return for loyalty to an absent central leader or monarch. With improvements in communications and transportation, the state then began to assert more authority, leading to the elaboration of the relationship between a citizen and the monarch or state. The Treaty, or Peace, of Westphalia in 1648, ending the Thirty Years War, laid the foundation for modern nation-state sovereignty. Coinciding in part with the Protestant Reformation, this treaty further weakened papal authority throughout much of Europe, marking the transition from feudal principalities to sovereign states. The treaty also established the concepts of territorial integrity and sovereignty—nonintervention of one state in the internal affairs of another state, legal equality between states, and the state's right of self-determination.

Throughout the subsequent period of the Enlightenment or Age of Reason (dated from roughly 1650 to 1800), French and British philosophers such as Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Baron de Montesquieu, and David Hume also sought to lessen the role of religion and the church in state affairs, to replace it with a political system advocating human reason and common identity. After the French Revolution, which ended in 1799, the nation-state was cemented in international relations as society became increasingly secularized and the dynastic state was replaced.

The nation-state is challenged both by globalization and by the rise of civil society as they signal the increasingly interconnected nature of the world's regional and transnational forms of networks. The porous nature of international economy, communications, and technology arguably lessens the significance of the nation-state, and in its place, a global political system based on international agreements and exchanges plus supranational blocs, such as the European and African Unions, now characterizing

NATION-STATE

The term nation-state reflects both a geopolitical and a political entity. Nation refers to a sociocultural entity—peoples who share the same culture, history, the developing economic and geopolitical world of the 21st century, has substantially altered the conditions under which nation-states function.

Sara Kamali

See also Assimilation; Civil Society; Global Cities; Global Religion; Globalization; International NGOs; Multiculturalism; Politics and Religion; Religion and State; Religious Nationalism; Transnational

Further Readings

- Baylis, J., Smith, S., & Owens, P. (Eds.). (2008). The globalization of world politics: An introduction to international relations (4th ed.). New York: Oxford University Press.
- Ohmae, K. (1996). The end of the nation-state: The rise of regional economies. New York: Free Press.

NATIVE LATIN AMERICAN RELIGION

Many of the tensions in the indigenous areas of Latin America are due to the globalization processes in the region and the response of local and communal identities to these global pressures. The religious aspect of this tension is manifest in the relationship between indigenous belief systems and the established Christian churches. There is a dynamic and ambiguous relationship between the indigenous communities and the religious groups (both Roman Catholic and evangelical Protestant) that circulate through the country, in no small part because of global influences. In some cases, the response is an increasing vindication of the rights of indigenous peoples and a recognition of their cultural and political identities.

Changes and Continuities

The study of the religious belief systems in the indigenous regions of Mexico and other contemporary Latin American countries must include as a point of departure the historical processes of colonization. These brought about widespread changes in their social, political, religious, and economic relationships; in their internal hierarchies; in their interracial contacts; and, of course, in the resulting processes of religious conversion, all of which substantially modified their cultures. Also to be mentioned are the processes of resistance and revitalization within these cultures as a result of these many influences.

Indigenous religious expression did not take shape solely through the natives' conversion to Catholicism but assumed different forms depending on the varying degrees of adoption of Catholic symbolism and practice. This expression reflected the particular experiences of colonization, the specific indigenous groups concerned, and the shape that each community and people gave to those Catholic practices, as well as the extent to which their worldview became restructured, reflecting new religious and cultural realities. Therefore, we may simultaneously find religious expressions that are closer to Catholicism and others that are clearly the opposite, more akin to indigenous religious practices.

Elements derived from the religious framework of indigenous peoples are also deeply embedded in their cultural ethos. Hence, discussion of the socio-political rights of indigenous peoples involves the religious rights and the religious freedom both of these peoples and of those converts who have been more broadly incorporated into globalized religious networks through various religious organizations—known as religious associations—that may be found across Latin America today.

The domain of religious rights is allied to the political sphere in which social inequities can cause a society to neglect the religious rights of the indigenous peoples. Despite the modifications to the 130th Article of the Mexican Constitution in relation to religious cults, the “religious” rights of the indigenous peoples as cultures or as collectives are not included in the updated Bill of Human Rights, even though the 2nd Article of the Constitution grants political recognition to the indigenous peoples, without acknowledging their legal status as collectives.

In the 21st century, we may still observe a great plurality and a significant local differentiation, as a result of both the conversion to the various forms of “Protestantism” (i.e., to evangelical and para-Christian groups) and the reassessment and exposure of the indigenous religious expressions, in which tension and conflict are still part of the social-religious scenario.

A variety of new religious forms arise through syncretic processes in which the cultural appropriation of those Protestant or evangelical referents is selective and may also bring about social-cultural and religious resistance. Notwithstanding this cultural appropriation, the clash between both religious expressions is evident because of the symbolical and social power these imply and because they bring diverse views of the world face-to-face within the same space.

Occasionally, conversion to an evangelical or para-Christian faith results in the disintegration of indigenous peoples due to the social-cultural change that it entails and, consequently, due to the fragmentation of the communities as well as an ethnic renunciation in the form of a cultural and often linguistic substitution. This creates new intra- and interreligious power relations in the new social structure, in which not only ecclesiastical institutions play a part—though always a minor one in the case of Catholicism, since what is under dispute is not part of the Catholic referent as such—but also new relations of power among the national and international legal authorities. Also affected is public opinion, which may or not favor the right to engage in missionary work covertly or in a manner that privileges only individual rights. Cultural rights are not necessarily defended by public opinion.

Complexity, Diversity, and Tension

The study of religion today occurs within an ever more complex social reality, with multiple networks that transcend local boundaries and thus become global-local networks. What follows is the creation of frames of reference that fail to be captured in the traditional propositions of anthropology or sociology. As a consequence, contemporary religion has become more complex, more difficult to understand.

The idea of religious cohesion and stability has been called into question by contemporary religious conversions and the new identities thereby developed, which show discontinuous, dislocated religious systems, which nevertheless continue to provide life-meaning systems.

It can hardly be assumed that all individuals within a given community share a common way of identifying with religious symbols, due to the variety and complexity of individual and collective identities. An example of this is the conversion processes in indigenous areas in Mexico, which fragment the unity of the indigenous society and create divisions among the authorities in charge. Inevitably, this situation questions the authorities' cultural ethos and, consequently, triggers diverse, complex, and conflicting actions and reactions.

Although some stability of religious symbols is still possible for certain types of religious groups, the fractures, disruptions, and adaptations of those common religious symbols escape our understanding, so that explanations for their transformations, tensions, and conflicts are often sought outside the sphere of religion. The divisions, transformations, and creations of new religious forms require new approaches to understanding religion; they must be viewed from a perspective mainly of symbolic discontinuity. Equally, they call for the examination of the restructuring of ethnic religions and religious traditions such as Buddhism, Islam, Hinduism, and Christianity, whose symbolic elements undergo a slow but persistent transformation.

This strain between symbolic stability and discontinuity implies theoretical and methodological challenges; however, it allows for a better understanding of the internal dynamics within the groups and communities facing these fragmentations of the individual and collective experience. Recognition of symbolic discontinuities enables us to study not only the new religious movements but also the fragmentations of Christianity and the transformations of indigenous religions; both become apparent in the contemporary world. This may be observed especially in urban areas and in those societies where the individualization and modernization processes are more advanced.

Nevertheless, the perspective of the unity of the religious field is still pertinent in groups and peoples where religion continues to play a significant role in influencing social identity. Herein lies one of the greater tensions now manifest between continuity and discontinuity, erupting in the religious conflicts of the indigenous areas of Mexico and in other places, particularly in Africa.

Belief Systems, Culture, and Identity

To understand the conversion processes, the religious conflicts, and the rights of the peoples, we must also consider the relationship between the creation of the symbol systems and a group's identity. Indigenous peoples establish a relationship between the cultural and the religious systems, which remain in force over time in spite of the transformations that inevitably occur. Rather than being a separate institution, religion and culture in this context coalesce to create a symbolic map defining a worldview and thus a foundation for individual and collective identity.

For instance, in the Huichol areas, to prove their renunciation of the indigenous religiosity and bonds, converts to Christianity break their gourd bowls and burn their feathers; both of these Huichol ritual artifacts connect them to their view of the world and to their ethos, transcending the Christian religious referents and reminding them of who they are and where they come from. The gourd bowls and the feathers are part of the “real reality,” of the world of the possible; transgression of this latter shatters their sense of what is reasonable, moral, or human; it destroys the sense and effectiveness of what they do, as well as the cause and the purpose of their doing it.

Unlike contemporary societies, they cannot separate religion from the social sphere. Most indigenous cultures do not have a specific word for religion. To speak of religion is to speak of the view of the world—of their makeup as peoples and as individuals—where nature, individuals, the community, the territory, and the gods are all one. It is equally clear that among the indigenous peoples, the Catholic religion is part of this cultural-religious ethos. What differs in this Catholic expression is its absorption into and its relationship with the indigenous view of the world.

In spite of the existing separation between religious and secular institutions in contemporary societies, religious systems still establish themselves as cultural systems. Also, in this sense, it is possible to interpret the new religious expressions among the indigenous communities as widely shared belief systems. Often, however, they base their new religious expressions on a secularized perspective and less so on symbolic discontinuities, which can result in even deeper tensions and conflicts. Hence, the appearance of the religious conflicts is an important manifestation of the complex power relationship between the indigenous peoples and the larger society, which includes them as citizens but not as different cultures within the same territory; and as a consequence, their religious rights are also easily blurred, subordinated, or made nonexistent, depending on the type and degree of juridical and social clashes.

Indigenous Peoples Today: Religion and Conflict

In the last decades of the 20th century, many new religious belief systems asserted themselves as exclusive cultural systems, often in conflict with the larger society. Such is the case of sects and cults that sever themselves from the larger society and sometimes, moreover, challenge it; some of these groups even result in collective suicide or homicide. An instance of this is the New Jerusalem in Puruarán, in the state of Michoacán, a movement that proclaims the end of the world and comprises a large number of followers who live apart from society and cannot leave the town without authorization. Equally, some indigenous people in Mexico and in other Latin American countries have been expelled from their own communities as a consequence of their conversion to the sectarian forms of Protestantism. There are also the Christian and Islamic fundamentalist movements, which not only sever themselves from the larger society but also create a major clash between the Eastern and the Western worlds.

Although Mexico has made some progress in relation to religious liberty in general, it leaves—as we mentioned before—much to be desired in terms of the indigenous peoples because they are not regarded specifically as different cultures, a fact that affects, among other things, the coherence of their social-religious ethos. This brings about various reactions, including violence and conflict. In this sense, the indigenous peoples of Mexico find themselves in a subordinate and often suppressed relationship. As a result, dispute and tolerance go hand in hand in our societies today. This situation is evident in the religious conflicts in the indigenous zones of our countries, as well as in the persisting historical conflicts due to colonization processes and religious proselytism. Important are the specific relationships of power and the social and economic relationships that pervade the religious sphere. Consequently, the religious and nonreligious factors deeply mix and do so in ways that take many different forms.

The result is the differentiation and stigmatization of many religious expressions and social groups. Such is the case mainly with the indigenous expressions, whose existence has been largely denied historically. Only the Catholic popular Latin American religious expressions are regarded as normative, with the indigenous religions still viewed largely as pagan expressions that remain to be adequately evangelized, as has happened with the arrival of Protestantism or with the efforts at reinforcing Catholic evangelization.

Once again, the conversions and the new strategies to reinforce Catholic evangelization both question the bases on which the intelligibility of the world has hitherto rested. This has been detrimental to family and community ties, to marital relationships, as well as to those relationships determined by social, economic, and political power. In other words, it damages the deeper layer of meaning and the sense of belonging to the group, and of the group's relationship to the larger society.

The emblematic expulsions of the Huichols throughout the history of the presence of Franciscan monks and, today, of the evangelical groups are a sign of the revitalization and vindication of their culture and religious expression. Equally, the systematic, widespread nature of the conflicts in Oaxaca and Chiapas is a sign of this difficult relationship, on which the globalization processes have various effects. They generate diversification and a loss of the communal identity and reinforce those religious expressions that circulate through global networks following the forces of power and efforts at attaining human rights and religious freedom. They also bring about through these same international networks the vindication of the cultural rights of the native population and the reassessment of their sense of themselves as indigenous peoples. Here, we find a confluence of diametrically opposed and conflicting influences that not only hamper the litigation of religious conflicts but also challenge a true legal equity and obstruct the already difficult task of finding solutions to religious conflicts.

Religious pluralism in Mexico—which exists as a fact but is not legally acknowledged—finds itself immersed in complex globalized networks and at the same time calls for prompt local solutions. However, these cannot be easily attained due to the inequity and complexity of the social situations, and consequently, the clear absence of cultural and religious rights of the indigenous peoples remains to be addressed within the national agenda.

Artemia Fabre Zarandona

See also Globalization; Hybridization; Indigenous Religion; Native North American Religion; Postcolonialism; Roman Catholicism; Syncretism

Further Readings

Carvalho, J. J. D. (2000). A religião como sistema simbólico: Um atualização teórica [Religion as a symbol system: A theoretical update] (Serie Antropológica, No. 285). Brasilia, Brazil: University of Brazil, Center Selection and Promotion of Events, Department of Anthropology.

Riis, O. (1999). Modes of religious pluralism under conditions of globalization. International Journal on Multicultural Societies, 1(1), 20–34. Retrieved May 14, 2011, from <http://unesdoc.unesco.org/images/0013/001385/138565e.pdf#page=2>

Segato, L. R. (1998). Alteridades históricas/identidades políticas: Una crítica a las certezas del pluralismo global [Historical alterations/identity politics: A critique of the certainties of global pluralism] (Serie Antropológica, No. 234). Brasilia, Brazil: University of Brasilia, Department of Anthropology.

Spickard, J. V. (1999). Human Rights, religious conflict, and globalization: Ultimate values in a new world. International Journal on Multicultural Societies, 1(1), 2–19. Retrieved May 14, 2011, from <http://www.unesco.org/most/vl1n1spi.htm> or <http://unesdoc.unesco.org/images/0013/001385/138565e.pdf#page=2> or www.unesco.org/shs/ijms/vol1/issue1/ed

NATIVE NORTH AMERICAN RELIGION

Religion in Native American culture is an entire way of life, understood as engaging all that is vital and relating the individual to everything that matters. Despite centuries of colonization and Christianization, many Native Americans have persevered in sustaining their native religious traditions and practices. A steadfast revival of the Native North American spiritual heritage has resulted in religious innovations as well as the rebirth of traditions long suppressed. Native Americans have put forward presentations intended to provide others with diverse perspectives on American Indian spirituality. At the same time, for nearly half a century, both the general public and scholars have increased their awareness of and attention to American Indian religions and sacred places. This has led to federal legislation such as the Civil Rights Act of 1968, which extended to American Indians under tribal jurisdiction the “free exercise of religion” clause of the U.S. Constitution’s First Amendment, which was meant to “protect and preserve Native American religious cultural rites and practices,” and the American Indian Religious Freedom Act of 1978, or AIRFA.

When they reached the “New World,” the European explorers and settlers encountered peoples who had no written language but who kept rich oral traditions and maintained records of important historic and religious events through petroglyphs, the winter count, totem poles, and wampum belts. Their religions included sophisticated myths and rites, as well as spiritual concepts that were totally alien to the Europeans. For a long time, European Americans thought that native tribes had no religion. Explorers pointed out that native languages contained no words for god or soul. Such statements were understandable as long as there were reports only from poorly educated explorers or officials. In fact, no tribe is devoid of spirituality. On the contrary, all traditional tribal religions offer an elaborate and highly developed spiritual imaginary. Individuals and groups formerly lived within a rich network of religious rites, which today are often the only remains of ancient Native American cultures. The reports of French Jesuits in New France, as early as the 17th century, testify that tribal life revolved around religion.

In any discussion of Native American religion in general terms, it must of course be borne in mind that the whole continent was inhabited by hundreds of tribes, each with its own language, customs, and religion according to the geographic area where they lived or based on whether they were hunters and gatherers, such as the Sioux in the Plains, or horticulturists, such as the Pueblo in the Southwest. Their religious ceremonies ranged from simple hunting rites to elaborate calendrical rites adapted to the economies of sedentary farming communities, through the hunting and war-related religions of the Great Plains. Nevertheless, most indigenous religions evolved within a common framework of life processes affected by a familiar natural environment. They all claim the existence of an invisible force that pervades the universe and the divine origin of the cosmos. Some features are common to a great number of tribal groups. They share a similar worldview: the notion of cosmic harmony, direct experience of powers and visions, and the interrelationship of humans and animals. Ancestral lands and sacred places are important; some knowledge is to be kept secret, and initiation is necessary to have access to it. And everywhere, generosity is a religious act.

Worldview

The world Native Americans live in is characterized by a dichotomy between the natural and the supernatural and between the secular and the sacred. All groups believed in spirits that are present in everyday life, in dreams, and in natural phenomena; they become real as masked gods in ritual dances and sacred ceremonies. The line drawn by cultural tradition between the natural and the supernatural is a fuzzy one because both domains are closely intertwined. Deities and spirits, humans, animals, and plants all inhabit the sacred circle.

The boundary between spirits and animals and between plants and geographic features is not clear-cut: For the Navajo, some mountains are the embodiment of Holy People, while others are just elements of a landscape. A bear may belong to the ordinary world or may be a spiritual being materialized. In fact, each earthly form is supposed to have a corresponding spiritual form.

Guardians and Totems

Native American spirituality is based on a metaphysics of nature. The animal guardian was prevalent generally in the hunting cultures of North America, especially among big game hunters.

As is appropriate to peoples whose lives depended on the hunting of game, a rich and varied lore concerns all the animals present in the Native American world of experience. Animal qualities can be transmitted to humans, so that animals are in a way superior to them. That is why many groups have animal totems and why individuals enter secret societies of animal lodges.

But there are other “guardians.” For farming communities, good crops are essential, although they are threatened by parasites and other natural phenomena. Therefore, among the agrarian peoples, the plant guardian, such as the Corn Goddess, naturally occupies a prominent place. This does not mean that in some instances guardians do not occur side by side. Not every species has its own guardian. Usually, the most economically important species are believed to have guardians. The Great Guardian is conceived by many peoples as the ruler over all animals and plants. The guardian spirit gives guidance in the hunt, mainly concerning the animals whose shape it has chosen to assume. Good health and fortune in the hunt and in war were what the Indian expected most from his or her guardian spirit. The latter exercises control over animals. He is a protector, making sure that if an animal has been slain, it has been given adequate respect and attention, with the proper rites. If the hunter has not observed the rules, the guardian may prevent him from killing other game. On the other hand, the guardian is favorable to hunters who have observed taboos and gone through the proper rites.

Each animal species has its “master of the animals,” the guardian soul of an animal collective. The principle is the same for all living beings that have their supernatural guardians. As regards humans, that role is played by the Supreme Being. Prayers are made to game before the kill or to medicinal plants during gathering, so that the animal or plant spirits will return in tangible form to again feed and heal the people. Most important, Indians care about nature because it is sacred when they experience the supernatural through visions or meditation.

Spirit helpers act as totems—that is, as entities that watch over a group of people, such as a family, a clan, or a tribe. They are thought to possess supernatural power and express a mysterious bond between human groups and their guardians.

The guardian spirits of North America have always possessed dual forms: human and animal. When humans arrived, the spirits withdrew to the forests and the waters, but they retained their ability to put on a human appearance when they wished. A whole range of “nature beings” can be found everywhere, from animals to thunder, the winds, rain, and heavenly bodies. Therefore, the world is full of distributed power, so that humans live constantly among potential helpers, provided they respect the rules.

The Supreme Being

In the Native American spiritual world, the universe is controlled by a deity that presides over all events, a being that is never clearly defined, whose nature and role are not universal. That Supreme Being is not always the Creator, but He (or She) rules the world and decides matters of life and death; the Supreme Being created initiation rites and was at the origin of tribal ethics.

In north-central California as well as in the Southwest, the Creation resulted from the Supreme

Being’s power of thought and word. Words and thoughts have a compelling potency, a creative force, especially in a ritual context. Consequently, a song that describes an episode of a myth actually re-creates the event. The Sioux call that Supreme Being Wakan Tanka, while the Omaha call Him Wakan or Wakanda, which means “the Sacred,” “the Divine.” Those names are often translated as “the Great Spirit,” although it really means “the Great Mystery,” since those peoples are not monotheists. For the Algonquin, “manitou” is a central concept that also translates as “supernatural” or “spirit.” One “Great Spirit” stands out: the main god, called manitou as well. Belief in manitou clearly predates the arrival of Europeans in North America; the first missionaries in New France had already mentioned him. The Algonquin populations, at least south of the Great Lakes, were exposed to the influence of the Mississippian culture of the Mound Builders. Their concepts of a Supreme Being are extremely varied. In the North, He is the master of animals; known as manitou by the Montagnais (also called Innu), He is the protector of caribous and the master of the world, although He does not preside over the dead. In the South, for the Delaware (or Lenape), He thought the world into existence; the Laguna Pueblo also believe the Thought Woman did the same, which testifies to the mystic nature of the act of creation. As for the other tribes, mainly in western Canada, a cosmic tree, a sacred pillar, supports the sky and prevents it from falling to the earth. It unites the underworlds and the upper worlds that form the universe. An eagle is seated at the top of that pillar. For the Flat Head, the roots of the world tree sink deep into the earth, while at the summit resides Amotken, the Benevolent Creator. This North American myth is found mainly among agrarian peoples, although sometimes among hunters and gatherers as well. From its roots, the Iroquois, at the beginning of times, climbed from an underworld up to the surface of the earth.

The Supreme Being may also consist of various spiritual powers that interact freely with humans, particularly in dreams and visions and also for food giving or healing when, during a ceremony, the medicine person becomes a holy being. The Supreme Being is at the same time the multiplicity of spiritual powers and the quintessence of these powers.

The Cosmogonic Myths and Cosmic Harmony

Myths and Symbols

The Supreme Being does not show his power to hunting tribes and agrarian tribes in the same way. For hunters, there is the sky and the world of humankind. For agrarian peoples, there are three or more successive worlds.

The sacred circle is the prevalent symbolism in the Southeast, the Plains, and the Prairie. It is seen in the organization of camps, the medicine wheels, the arrangements of buffalo skulls, the emblems painted on tepees and garments, and the architecture of homes and religious spaces. The circular Sun Dance lodge is supposed to represent the universe, and the central pole is its axis. The symbolism of the cross is also omnipresent for the four directions. The Tewa scholar Alfonso Ortiz has also shown that the tribes in New Mexico have specific cosmological images, but everywhere the cosmos concept mixes the natural and the supernatural. The cosmogony is totally based on mythology. Each tribe has its own Creation story. In one of the most common versions, the earth-diver motif prevails: An animal-like figure dives to the bottom of the primeval sea to bring back a little mud, from which the cosmos is then shaped. In the Southwest, sexual relationships between Father Sky and Mother Earth are preparatory to creation. All myths refer to an undetermined past when people and animals lived together and spoke the same language. This is when philosophies and rules for order were created. Those myths draw the guidelines for ritual performance. The culture heroes or tricksters and their adventures participate in the creation and transform the world for the benefit of people. As for humans, they mainly believe in the Emergence myth: They acceded to the Glittering World by climbing up from the womb of the Earth through successive worlds. In the meantime, there was a gradual metamorphosis of humans, animals, and all living creatures.

However, Native American religions usually place greater emphasis on action in this world rather than on speculations on a possible life after death that would bring reward or punishment. The physical universe is accepted as the place where humans can interact with the spiritual entities. Therefore, people must strive to discover the correct forms of behavior in order to preserve harmonious relationships between the natural and the supernatural, to ensure fertility, long life, good health, and social stability. As the notion of cosmic harmony is at the core of the spiritual systems, people have the responsibility of preserving a balance between what is taken and what is given, so as not to disturb the world harmony. Consequently, no plant and no animal should be destroyed without a good reason, because animals, plants, and even plain matter are inhabited by spirits that intervene in the fate of humankind.

Nature and Religion

Among hunting tribes, such as the Algonquin hunters in eastern Canada and in the northeastern United States, there is a close relationship between hunter and game that gives birth to a ritual complex of "animal ceremonialism": The hunters adopt a ritual attitude toward the game animal and its supernatural masters. During ceremonies, dancers adopt animal attire and imitate the animal's behavior; they become an eagle or a buffalo. The vision quest complex shows the same intimate association between humans and animals. As regards gathering, attention is directed to the well-being of seeds, plants, and trees. The same attitude can be noticed in tribes that combine hunting and agriculture. In agricultural areas such as the Southwest, the Pueblo have a belief and ritual complex centered on grains and other crops.

According to their various modes of subsistence, Native American groups have a diversified attitude to nature that expresses an appreciative view of nature's gifts. The Plains Indians offer a good example of the connection between religion and nature: For them, the Supreme Being dwells in all living beings. Therefore, it is the people's duty to care for the well-being of nature. For the Choctaw, the Great Spirit manifests itself in thunder, wind, and waves, and for the Menominee, all living beings are manitou. Whether for hunters or farmers, belief in Mother Earth is prevalent in large parts of North America. Even among many Native Americans who have experienced disruptions in the continuity of their traditional culture and religion, such views are commonly shared.

Taboos

Certain taboos developed because the focus of power in a being or in an object could be dangerous to someone who was not in a sacred state. The most widespread taboos refer to certain stages of life: birth, puberty, old age, and death. As those events are uncontrollable, specific rituals are used to avoid harmful consequences. Offerings to animal or plant spirits are made, purification rituals may be necessary, periods of withdrawal might be observed after a death for fear that the spirit of the dead should refuse to leave or should want revenge, or a ceremony is held to restore cosmic and spiritual balance.

Visions and Rituals

Each tribe has its own Creation story that explains the natural and the supernatural worlds. Ceremonies are performed according to the instructions given by the mythic heroes, to preserve harmony in the universe, to heal the sick, and to maintain relationships with spiritual beings. They also aim at ensuring good crops and having abundant game. Today, as in the past, native peoples worship by chanting, praying, and dancing. Purification rites, vision quests, sun dances, and rituals of the pipe are being increasingly revived and practiced by the Plains peoples.

Spirits appear in dreams or in visions, adopting many forms that often include an animal guide. Vision quests are made through seclusion and fasting, or through ordeals of self-inflicted pain, as in the sun dance.

Most rituals are symbolic expressions of religious thought. They usually correspond to human needs and desires and contribute to carrying them out. Some reiterate the cosmic creation in dramatic performances of the mythic events at the beginning of time. Hunting and fishing rites show reverence for the animals: In the Northwest, the first salmon caught in the season is honored, and the fish bones are given back to the water, so that many more salmon may come and feed the people. The North is home to bear ceremonialism. Agrarian cultures practice fertility rites, determined by a calendar, to ensure rain and bountiful crops. Most tribes have initiation rites, such as puberty rites for girls among the Apache and the Navajo or for entering secret societies among the Kwakwaka'wakw and the Ojibway (or Chippewa). Shamanistic rituals concern mostly men in their quest for guardian spirits, for healing ceremonies or for divination, as in the Sioux shaking-tent ceremonial. All those rites are preceded by ritual cleansing, by taking emetics and sweat baths.

Such rituals help obtain the aid of the supernatural in controlling the natural and social world. Individuals try to gain the benevolence of spiritual entities with prayers or offerings (e.g., tobacco, semiprecious stones, feathers, shells). In the Woodlands and in the Great Plains, the smoking of a pipe usually precedes ceremonies and, in earlier times, peace talks. But when entire communities wished to ensure a good hunt, victory in warfare, or bountiful crops, they called up a shaman, or a medicine man (or a medicine woman), supposed to have acquired supernatural powers, to act as a mediator between the visible and the invisible worlds. Medicine persons have often facilitated their contacts with spirits by the use of psychotropic substances that affect consciousness and behavior.

Dynamics of Native North American Religions

Since the first contact with Europeans, a vast spectrum of change has taken place within and across Native American cultures. Tribes have had to adapt and submit; they were compelled to give up their lands, sometimes forbidden to speak their languages and to practice their traditional religions, and subjected to the "civilizing" role of Christianization and colonization. As a result, some peoples have totally embraced Christianity, while others pray in church but also attend Indian healing ceremonies, finding comfort in both traditions, mixing Christian and ancient rites. Usually, Indians did not simply replace one faith with another. They dynamically adapted to the disruptions brought about by colonization. Native Americans responded to the efforts of Christianization with new religious movements that promised that the land would be theirs again, the dead would return, and the buffalo would come back. The main movements were the Handsome Lake religion, the Indian Shaker religion, the Ghost Dance, and the Native American Church (or NAC), which uses peyote as a sacrament.

Today, there is a rebirth of tribal religions in a world almost totally different from what it used to be. Tribes have also been in contact with one another. Therefore, many young Indians attracted by Pan-Indianism wish to revert to a “North American religion” as a system of beliefs and rituals common to all tribes. For them, its foundation is still the ancient notion of cosmic harmony, in which all beings live together. As long as their interrelationships last, the favorable cyclical changes will continue to occur in nature. Insofar as core elements of myths, values, and native languages are still held today by at least some parts of the populations, such “new” religious movements should be understood in terms of a continuity of traditional elements.

Marie-Claude Feltes-Strigler

See also Animals; Ghost Dance Religion; God; Indigenous Religions; Myth; Native Latin American Religion; North America; Rites of Passage; Shamanism; Symbol; Syncretism

Further Readings

- Allen, P. (1992). The sacred hoop: Recovering the feminine in American Indian traditions. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Benedict, R. (1964). The concept of the guardian spirit in North America. New York: Kraus Reprint. (Original work published 1923)
- Deloria, V., Jr. (2000). God is red: A native view of religion. Golden, CO: Fulcrum. (Original work published 1973)
- Hirschfelder, A., & Molin, P. (2000). Encyclopedia of Native American religions: An introduction. New York: Facts on File.
- Hultkrantz, Å. (1987). Native religions in native North America: The power of visions and fertility. San Francisco: Harper.
- Ortiz, A. (1969). The Tewa world: Space, time, being and becoming in a Pueblo society. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Sullivan, L. E. (Ed.). (2000). Native religions and cultures of North America: Anthropology of the sacred. New York: Continuum Press.
- Underhill, R. (1972). Red man's religion: Beliefs and practices of the Indians north of Mexico. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Vecsey, C. (Ed.). (1991). Handbook of American Indian religious freedom. New York: Crossroad.

NATURAL LAW

Natural law may be described as law whose content is set by nature and is thus universal. It is an idea that exists in most religious traditions; Hinduism, for instance, has the notion of dharma, an enduring moral order underlying all reality. In the West, a similar notion is known as natural law. The first developments related to such law can be found in the work of the Greek philosopher Aristotle (4 BCE), the Stoics (3 BCE to 3 CE), and Cicero (106–43 BCE). However, the works of Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274), a Christian philosopher and member of the scholastic tradition, were some of the greatest contributions to the development of a natural law doctrine. During the 17th century, a vivid debate emerged about natural law and the foundations of society. Since the last decades of the 20th century, there is a process for the “revival of Thomism.” Theologians and Christian philosophers appeal to the natural law doctrine as a basis for intervention in the public spheres.

Thomas Aquinas

Aquinas wrote many theological and philosophical treatises; the most influential of them was Summa Theologiae. There, he deepened the work of Aristotle and Augustine of Hippo and developed a new approach to the understanding of natural law. Aquinas established that God exists and is the beginning and end of all things. All creatures come from God and depend on him. Moreover, God is the creator and the entity that settles the order of things in the world, and everything that exists, exists because of and for God. The natural order is a hierarchically created order. God is the foundation of natural law, and mankind receives it. In this process, humans participate in the eternal law that God has established for the universe.

Aquinas established that natural law prescribes actions according to virtues. The notion of natural law refers to a series of precepts enacted by human reason. There are some basic principles, intellectually known, that help reason to differentiate if the ends pursued are according to virtue. Mostly, all people are capable of knowing these principles, which are principles of practical reason. The first principle, known and understood by everyone, is that good must be done and evil avoided. The second principle, not known by everyone, establishes an order among human inclinations. Finally, there are principles known only by wise people. One of them is the prohibition of usury. Natural law, as a moral law, is the core of evident universal principles that help people direct their actions.

This common core includes rules, values, rights, and duties such as the conservation of human life, the union of women and men, the education of offspring, avoiding ignorance, not harming others, reasonable behavior, and living in society. These are all goods that must be pursued.

Natural law, as the first and essential set of norms that rule moral life, refers to the own original nature of mankind: a person in unity of soul and body. The human person is a unified totality, it is a soul expressed in a body that is informed by the spirit.

Natural law refers to a moral dimension that regulates the natural order that consists of biological and physical laws. There is an order in nature. There is a disposition that settles that everything occupies its own function.

The law exists as a rule, and because it is a rule, it belongs to reason. Natural law is the first rational order to the good. Positive laws come from natural law, and they are only valid if they are consistent with it.

Snapshots of the 17th Century

During the 17th century, at the beginning of modernity, Contractualists made some developments regarding natural law. In Leviathan, Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679) held that natural law is a general precept regarding the preservation of human life. According to natural law, founded by God and reason, man must avoid everything that may destroy his life. Hobbes describes nature in terms of a state of nature, a space or time before man surrenders to the sovereign to preserve his life. In this state of nature, nothing is perfect, virtuous, or good. Violence, death, and conflict are the main characteristics of this state. In Leviathan, Hobbes mentions that the main good is the preservation of life. Natural law is based on God, and the laws of nature contribute to human self-preservation. Man establishes a set of laws that are mainly related to obtaining peace, even if these laws limit human freedom.

In his two treatises on civil government, John Locke (1632–1704) mentions that natural law is an order of justice prior to the creation of positive laws and the government itself. He conceives natural law as an ideal duty that must be respected. It is a state of complete freedom where people can establish an order for their actions and dispose freely of properties. Reason coincides with natural law. Positive laws are just when they are based on nature and reason. Human laws are thus below the laws of nature and God.

After these developments in natural law, centuries have passed in discussions about the theoretical approaches to this concept. Most of the works consisted of discussions about natural law versus positive law, which is humanly established to rule social behavior. According to the heritors of the natural law doctrine, positive law must be surrogated to natural law. Human beings participate in the eternal law designed by God when they follow the evident precepts of natural law, which drives them in the direction of legislating reasonably.

Current Debates Concerning Natural Law

During the last decades of the 20th century, a group of philosophers started to review the work of Thomas Aquinas. Among them are Stephen Theron, Alasdair MacIntyre, Ralph McInerny, John Finnis, Germain Grisez, and Joseph Boyle. Moreover, the catechism of the Roman Catholic Church has many lessons on T. Aquinas. In 2010, Pope Benedict XVI encouraged Catholics to follow Aquinas's teachings. Because the Catholic Church sees natural law as the source of universal moral law, it appeals to some of its core principles as a basis for some of its positions on public policy. For instance, some of the values established in Aquinas's Summa Theologiae with respect to the pursuit of good, preserving human life, procreation, parents' education of offspring, and not harming others are used in current debates about abortion, sexual education, and marriage between people of the same gender. The Catholic Church believes that humanity has diverged from natural law and the natural hierarchical order. This deviation began on a massive scale with the beginning of modernity and the process of secularization. The separation of religion from other social spheres lessened the influence of churches in the regulation of people's behavior. Not only Roman Catholics but also other Christians and other religious groups support the teachings of Aquinas related to the moral law. According to this notion, positive law must be subject to natural law; thus, they do not consider as proper the advances that some countries have made within the framework of sexual and reproductive rights. As procreation and the preservation of life are one of the goods to pursue, the Vatican suggests to Western governments around the world that their countries should avoid legislation on abortion and marriage between people of the same gender. They believe that it is possible to restore the reign of reason and natural law if there is a universal legal framework that is based on the teachings of their religious doctrine. Since the 1970s, when international organizations and governments established policies in the area of reproduction and women's rights and feminist movements exerted pressure to achieve sexual and reproductive rights, religious groups and scholars have returned to the teachings of Thomas Aquinas and his natural law doctrine. With this approach, they believe that they can establish the reign of God on Earth.

Gabriela Irrazábal

See also Dharma, Karma, and Samsara; Enlightenment; Ethics; Li; Religious Nationalism; Roman Catholicism

Further Readings

- Aquinas, T., St. (1950). Summa theologiae. Rome, Italy: Marietti Taurini.
- Biggar, N., & Black, R. (2000). The revival of natural law: Philosophical, theological, and ethical responses to the Finnis-Grisez School. Burlington, VT: Ashgate.
- Boyle, M. J. (2004). Natural law and the possibility of a global ethics (Philosophical Studies in Contemporary Culture, Vol. 11, section 1, pp. 1–15). Norwell, MA: Kluwer Academic.
- Cunningham, L. (Ed.). (2009). Intractable disputes about the natural law: Alasdair MacIntyre and critics. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press.
- George, R., & Wolfe, C. (2000). Natural law and public reason. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press.
- Grabill, S. (2006). Rediscovering the natural law in reformed theological ethics. Cambridge, UK: Eerdmans.
- Murphy, M. (2006). Natural law in jurisprudence and politics. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

- Theron, S. (2008). Thomas Aquinas: Happiness, desire, virtue: An interpretation. Munich, Germany: Grin.
- Westerman, P. C. (1997). The disintegration of natural law theory: Aquinas to Finnis. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.

NEO-PAGAN MOVEMENT

Neo-paganism can be described as a postmodern, almost worldwide, new religious and spiritual movement that evokes the spirit of Europe's pre-Christian pagan culture. This movement finds its origins in a dissatisfaction with what its adherents perceive as the stifling modernist religious models prevailing within contemporary cultures of Christian tradition; it is also born of a longing, akin to the romantic fascination for the primitive world, for more satisfactory models, long gone, reclaimed from antique or even prehistoric times. As shown by the links to be found on the Internet, where many neo-pagan groups or associations have created sites (e.g., the World Pagan Network or Witchvox, which give access to thousands of neo-pagan addresses worldwide), neo-pagans have emerged all over the world, particularly in Great Britain; in French Brittany; in northern, central, and eastern Europe; in Russia; in the United States; and in Canada, Australia, and New Zealand. These neo-pagans have decided to reconstruct old religious models for their own purposes. It is worth mentioning that the pagan revivals born within the nationalist and Romantic movements of the 19th century, some of which eventually became connected to the fascist European movements in Europe in the 1930s, cannot be called neo-pagan, because of their specific political orientation and essentially folkloric character; born in the context of international tensions, mostly concerned with the revival of their own national traditions and their supposedly superior characteristics, they did not share the world vision and did not have the spiritual dimension of what is called neo-paganism today.

Origins and Characteristics

For the purpose of this entry, the focus will be on the neo-pagan groups that appeared in Europe after World War II, some of them (Wicca particularly) crossing the Atlantic almost 20 years later, in the beginning of the 1960s. In the United States, neo-paganism flourished rapidly, finding new sources of inspiration in the New American Social Movements, and it started expanding and spreading back to Europe and the other continents. Although in some places, especially in Europe, neo-paganism is still often linked to local movements aiming at the revival of traditional cultures, most neo-pagans are characterized by a syncretic and eclectic spirit, and the cultural roots of neo-pagan cults are often planted very far from their members' native lands: "Neo-Druids" can be found everywhere, for instance, and not only in the countries of ancient Celtic traditions, as also "witches" worshipping the god and goddess of the re-imagined old European religion (Wicca), neo-pagans attracted by the spirituality of Australian Aborigines or of Native American Indians and various brands of native shamanisms, and people worshipping the gods of ancient Egypt or ancient Greece. As a consequence, most neo-pagans remain a nonconformist minority and an oddity wherever they are and often cultivate the esoteric character some of them (e.g., Wiccans) have partly inherited from Theosophy or other Western esoteric traditions. They must therefore not be confused with those pagans of indigenous religions whose native cults and traditions have actually survived through the ages, despite the combined normalizing pressures of Christianity and modernity, and have been recently officially acknowledged as the national cultural heritage in some countries such as Finland.

If most neo-pagans, wherever they are, share a common vision (tentatively described below), it is important to emphasize the great variety of the neo-pagan landscape. Contrary to the truly universal Christian churches and in spite of the denominations some have adopted for themselves (the U.S.-born Church of All Worlds, to cite only one), neo-pagan groups have been unable, and unwilling, to develop either a common dogma or any kind of centralizing institutions that would hinder their free will. However, since the 1980s, numerous gatherings, the neo-pagan festivals, are organized here and there every year, during solstices or equinoxes or on the full moon, for instance, according to the neo-pagan solar and lunar calendar. These festivals often have an ecumenical character, facilitate exchanges, and contribute to the development of what some improperly call the neo-pagan tribe, or community.

It is difficult to assess the numerical importance of the movement worldwide since, except for the United States, no scientific sociologically oriented study, either of the movement as a whole or of the movement in Europe or anywhere else, has been conducted. Estimates postulating the existence of at least 10 million neo-pagans in the world at the beginning of the new millennium have been circulated by neo-pagans, but there is no way to check this figure. On the other hand, for the United States alone, where specialists in religious studies are at work on the subject and where an abundant scientific literature has been provided by the neo-pagans themselves, the figure of 1 million neo-pagans in the first decade of the 21st century seems a conservative estimate. However, the most interesting fact about the neo-pagan movement is not its actual numerical importance but the impressive rate of its development. Some speak of an "explosion" of neo-paganism within the past 20 years. The U.S. author Gordon Melton, for instance, asserts that it is the fastest growing religion in the world today. If there were almost no neo-pagans in the United States before the 1960s, there are at least 1 million of them today, and the membership continues to grow.

The social profile of neo-pagans worldwide has not been thoroughly studied either. The only existing observations have been conducted on members of American groups by local sociologists or foreign observers. Nevertheless, it can be assumed from the nature, history, and implantation of the movement that, on the whole, neo-pagans outside the United States are similar to American neo-pagans: The latter have been shown to be predominantly White, mostly young adults (except for those of the first generation of the 1960s, who are now getting on in age), with a slight majority of women; contrary to a common misconception, they are not overwhelmingly female, they do not survive on the margins of society, and they are evenly distributed on the social scale, well integrated in their human economic environment, with slightly better incomes and higher academic levels on average than most of their contemporaries. They have been described as avid readers, interested in cultural and religious traditions from all over the world, and, apart from their religious models, not particularly nostalgic for the past or otherwise different from their countrymen and contemporaries.

What distinguishes them from their fellow citizens, however, is their critical outlook on modern contemporary societies and on the negative heritage of “Christianism” and the monotheistic religions in general. From a strictly religious or theological point of view, neo-pagans do not believe in the existence of a unique, patriarchal, transcendental deity; their conception of the divine is a combination of pantheism and panentheism. But their religious choices are not always inspired by considerations of a strictly religious nature; they are widely motivated by intellectual, ideological, and psychological factors. Modernism and monotheism are jointly accused of having produced totalitarian systems; generating technological, environmental, or human disasters; crushing and despising cultures that did not conform; and unable to adapt to their self-proclaimed superior and universal models. Neo-pagans are convinced that polytheism was and still is culturally and psychologically better adapted to the complexity of human nature and human societies. Each pagan divinity is often considered as being the expression of one of the many archetypal images conflicting in the human mind; the possibility of worshiping several deities at the same time is a way of reconciling humans with their own complexity. The return to ancient gods enables neo-pagans to choose the deity best suited to their aspirations; the absence of dogma enables them to choose another deity or another system freely whenever they feel like it. Culturally speaking, neo-paganism may be just a way of recovering a past heritage, or of syncretically adopting the most attractive models of alien cultures. Last but not least, in a general context of growing concern for environmental issues, old and new pagan cults are considered by neo-pagans as closer to and more respectful of nature than are the monotheistic religions. Choosing neo-paganism is a way of adapting their spirituality to their secular concerns.

Implications

The philosophical and ideological implications of this worldview are becoming increasingly visible. Although the political convictions of neo-pagans were originally as varied as the political convictions of Christians, which entailed widespread disagreements in the political field, most neo-pagans today no longer adhere to the liberal modernist view of the necessity of separating the private (and religious or sacred) from the public (and profane or political) spheres of their lives. In spite of the variety of their religious experiences, almost all of them are worshippers of nature and/or of the Goddess and have become convinced of the necessity of activism in favor of protection of the environment, in the defense of native peoples deprived of the natural resources of their native lands, and in the fight of people in developing nations against the growing pressure of globalized trade and inhuman financial rules. As a consequence, most neo-pagans have become today either actively involved or objective allies of the altermondialist, ecological, and feminist movements, both locally and internationally.

Anne-Marie Carassou

See also Goddess; Neo-Shamanisms; New Religions; New Religions in the United States; Shamanism

Further Readings

- Adler, M. (1997). Drawing down the moon: Witches, druids, goddess worshippers and other pagans in America today. New York: Arkana. (Original work published 1979)
- Ellwood, R. S., Jr. (1973). Religious and spiritual groups in modern America. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.
- Ellwood, R. S. (1994). The sixties' spiritual awakening: American religion moving from modern to postmodern. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press.
- Lassallete-Carassou, A.-M. (2002). Nouvelle spiritualité Américaine, magie et néopaganisme aux Etats-Unis à l'aube du troisième millénaire: Essai d'interprétation [New American spirituality, magic, and neo-paganism in the United States at the dawn of the third millennium: Test interpretation]. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Université Michel de Montaigne, Bordeaux, France.
- Lassallete-Carassou, A.-M. (2008). Sorciers, sorcières et néopâiens dans l'Amérique d'aujourd'hui [Sorcerers, witches, and neo-pagans in America today]. Pessac, France: Bordeaux University Press.

NEO-SHAMANISMS

Neo-shamanisms are new religious movements that are part of neo-paganism, inspired by worldviews and techniques of non-Western tribal peoples from different parts of the world. These shamanist elements are adapted and changed to the context of modern, urban Western life. Notions and techniques have been appropriated mainly from Siberian, Native American, South American, and Scandinavian indigenous shamanic traditions. Neo-shamanistic adepts are very eclectic and are inspired by very different manifestations, which justifies the speaking of neo-shamanisms. Meeting modern urban needs, they have been adapted to individual needs and psychologized by reformulating traditional worldviews and methods in modern terms. The “darker” sides of traditional shamanism, such as fights with dangerous spirits, have hardly been adopted in neo-shamanism.

Neo-shamanism has been greatly influenced by two anthropologists. The descriptions by Carlos Castaneda (1968), telling of his training with a Yaqui shaman and the use of hallucinogenic plants to gain supernatural power and knowledge, became a source of inspiration for many Westerners. After research with different indigenous peoples of South and North America, Michael Harner (1980) introduced “core shamanism,” a set of presumed traditional shamanic techniques that displays no specific cultural features and that is recontextualized for modern Western societies. Harner established the Foundation for Shamanic Studies, which organizes neo-shamanic seminars all over the world.

The most significant techniques of the core shamanism are journeys in an altered state of consciousness—named the shamanic state of consciousness—induced by drumming. The journeys lead to different shamanic worlds and allow for interaction with different spirit helpers and power animals to receive guidance and healing. The search for a power animal, which is a spirit guide to the underworld, is a popular technique in neo-shamanisms.

Other common practices are the originally Native American sweat lodge ceremony, the vision quest, and the medicine wheel, which have been appropriated from the Lakota and Blackfeet tribes. During the sweat lodge ceremony, people are made to sit in a small hut of blankets with heated with steam while praying and singing to the spirits. The vision quest is a retreat to nature, where people fast and pray, seeking guidance from the spirits. The medicine wheel is a spiritual concept in which earth consciousness is connected with the directions of the wind and specific animals.

Some indigenous tribes, such as the Lakota Native Americans, have protested against the use of their cultural and spiritual heritage by Westerners and have prohibited the use of some of their traditional ceremonies. Other traditional shamans feel the need to expand the knowledge of their tradition all over the world.

Peter G. A. Versteeg and Hanneke Minkjan

See also Indigenous Religions; Native Latin American Religion; Native North American Religion; Neo-Pagan Movement; New Religions; New Religions in the United States; Shamanism

Further Readings

- Castaneda, C. (1968). The teachings of Don Juan. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Harner, M. (1980). The way of the shaman: A guide to power and healing. New York: Bantam Books.
- Wallis, R. J. (2003). Ecstasy, alternative archaeologies and contemporary pagans. London: Routledge.

NEO-SUFISM (SUFİ RENEWAL)

The term neo-Sufism was coined by Fazl ur Rahman in 1966 to describe reform movements among Sufi orders (turuq, singular tariqa) of the 18th and 19th centuries. More recently, the term neo-Sufism has been applied to certain 20th- and 21st-century Sufi-inspired groups in the West as well as to movements in Muslim-majority countries among the globally engaged middle and upper classes.

Islamic reform (or “renewal”; in Arabic, tajdid) in Sufi orders in the 18th and 19th centuries responded to a mood of religious conservatism widespread across the Muslim world. While the anti-Sufi Wahhabi movement represents one expression of that conservatism, historians have documented parallel expressions in Sufi orders in Africa (initially in orders inspired by the Moroccan Ahmad ibn Idris) and across the Middle East to South and Southeast Asia.

John Voll, Nehemia Levtzion, and others adopted Rahman’s term, neo-Sufism, to designate a complex of changes commonly found in reformist turuq. That complex included a renewed emphasis on studies of religious law (Shari'a) as the basis of the spiritual quest, a new social activism directed at moral and social reform, and the transformation of loose networks of disciples into hierarchical organizations.

Rahman, a leading proponent of modernist Islamic reform, saw in the premodern neo-Sufi orders not only a new valorization of this-worldly works of moral renewal but also a repudiation of ecstatic practices, identified as heterodox local cultural accretions (bid'ah). The notion that renewalist turuq turned away from the mystical quest has not been endorsed. Nonetheless, others have pointed to a widespread change in the way the goal of the mystical quest was understood: from unity with God (e.g., as theorized by the monist Ibn Arabi) to merely union with the spirit of Prophet Muhammad. Rex O'Fahey, Bernd Radtke, and others have critiqued that formulation, judging it as being oversimplified and overgeneralized, but allow that many renewalist turuq did increase the popularity of practices focusing on the figure of the Prophet, not only by promoting Hadith studies but by teaching meditation exercises aimed at opening the inner sight to the presence of the Prophet as guide.

Mark Sedgwick and others contrast Western neo-Sufi movements, which adapt the Sufi heritage for their mostly non-Muslim recruits, with the classical Sufi orders followed in the West by Muslim migrants. Some of the Western neo-Sufi movements preserve at least notional links with Islam, while others, such as Inayat Khan's "Universal Sufism," are deconfessionalized.

In contrast, contemporary groups identified as "neo-Sufi" in Muslim-majority societies form part of the Islamic revival movement. These institutionally innovative movements (e.g., the Turkish Fethullah Gulen movement and the Indonesian Sufi groups inspired by intellectuals in Nurcholish Madjid's circle) use Sufi ethical disciplines and meditative rituals to promote increased religious devotion along with this-worldly achievement.

Julia Day Howell

See also dan Fodio, Osman; Gulen Movement; Islam; Islamic Modernism; Islamic Reform; New Religions; New Religions in the United States; Sufism

Further Readings

- O'Fahey, R., & Radtke, B. (1993). Neo-Sufism reconsidered. Der Islam, 70(1), 52–87.
- Sedgwick, M. (2008). European neo-Sufi movements in the interwar period. In N. Clayer & E. Germain (Eds.), Islam in interwar Europe (pp. 183–215). New York: Columbia University Press.
- Voll, J. O. (1982). Islam, continuity and change in the modern world. Boulder, CO: Westview Press.

NEPAL

Nepal is a democratic republic located along the southern region of the Himalayan range, bordering India to the south, west, and east and the Tibetan autonomous region of China to the north. Though a small country in geographic terms (approximately 54,362 square miles [1 mile = 1.6093 kilometers]), its population of approximately 29.5 million people is a complex and heterogeneous mix of both Indo-European and Tibeto-Burman ethnic groups and castes, each with distinct languages and religious and cultural traditions. It has the highest percentage of Hindus in its population than any other nation in the world, including India.

In the late 18th century, the Gorkha king Prithvi Narayan Shah consolidated the territories of what is today Nepal, and his descendants ruled Nepal as a Hindu kingdom throughout most of the country's history. Following a 10-year Maoist insurgency and decades of off and on protests and grassroots movements for democracy by political parties and marginalized ethnic and religious groups, in May 2008, Nepal was declared a federal constitutional republic, and Nepalis elected their first president in the newly secular state. Nepal's contemporary religious landscape is highly diverse, and regional and ethnic variations are found within each religious tradition. Through an increase in international travel and migration alongside the growing movements of social and political reform of recent decades, Nepal's religious traditions have begun to be shaped by global religious movements as Nepalis become increasingly involved in transnational religious networks.

Hindus constitute approximately 80% of Nepal's population, Buddhists 11%, Muslims 4.2%, and Sikhs, Christians, and others the remaining 5%. Nepal's Hindus are predominantly Shaivites and Shaktas, practicing rituals and rites similar to, but distinct from, those in contemporary India. For example, in Nepal, animal sacrifice is still a common practice, and major Hindu holidays such as Dashain—Dussera in India—are uniquely Nepali in practice and narrative. Hinduism in Nepal shares features with Vajrayana (Tantric) Buddhism, and there are syncretic forms of both Hinduism and Buddhism unique to Nepal, particularly prevalent in the Kathmandu Valley. Buddhism in a distinctively Tantric form has been practiced by the Kathmandu Valley's indigenous Newar residents since the medieval period, and throughout the northern regions of Nepal, various forms of Tibetan Buddhism are practiced. Islamic and Christian traditions have also been present in Nepal since the late medieval period, the former arriving through trade routes and migration from Kashmir and the terai (the Gangetic lowland plains in the southern region of Nepal) and the latter through European missionaries.

Religion in Nepal has historically been, and continues to be, highly local in orientation. Today, however, Nepalis of various religious traditions increasingly participate in translocal, global religious movements. With the rise of Hindu nationalism in India and the weakening of Hindu royal power in Nepal, Hindu nationalist groups formed in Nepal in the 1990s and since then continue to agitate, sometimes violently, for a Hindu national identity and the suppression of religious freedoms for minorities. Participation in aspects of global Hinduism is further evidenced by the immense popularity, among urban Nepalis in particular, of Baba Ramdev, an Indian guru who is leading a massive revival of interest in Hatha yoga. Among Nepali Buddhists, a movement of Theravada Buddhism has been growing since the mid-20th century, when it was introduced from Sri Lanka and Burma as a reform alternative to the highly ritualized Tantric Buddhism practiced by the Newars. Among Nepal's Muslim population today, many are involved in transnational Islamic reform and revival movements and increasingly seek Islamic study opportunities in Gulf countries or other parts of South Asia.

Megan Adamson Sijapati

See also China; Hindu Nationalism; Hinduism; India; Mahayana Buddhism; Shaivism; Syncretism; Theravada Buddhism; Tibet; Vajrayana, Tibetan

Further Readings

- Gellner, D. (1987). Nationalism and ethnicity in a Hindu kingdom: The politics and culture of contemporary Nepal. Amsterdam: Harwood Academic Press.
- Levine, S., & Gellner, D. N. (2005). The Theravada movement in twentieth-century Nepal. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.

NESTORIANS

See Assyrian Church of the East

NETHERLANDS

The Netherlands is a western European kingdom located in the delta between Belgium and Germany. Also known as Holland and the Dutch Republic, the Kingdom of the Netherlands was established as a parliamentary monarchy in 1848, a process that was completed with the constitutional reform of 1917. Its predecessor was the Dutch Republic (1581–1795). The origin of the Netherlands lies in the struggle for political independence in the Eighty Years War with Spain (1568–1648). The political-religious antagonism between Protestants and Catholics was an important factor in this conflict. In 1572, the Low Countries' governments installed a reorganized (“reformed”) church for the people, following a model that was partly inspired by John Calvin's ideas. Despite the popular image of Calvinist confessional dominance, the Low Countries have been in practice a multiconfessional society since the early-modern period. Most notably, the two southern provinces of the Netherlands have always had a strong Catholic presence.

Typical for the development of religion in Dutch society is “pillarization,” which is a situation whereby differences of class and religion shaped the formation of four dominant interest groups—Catholics, Protestants, Socialists, and Liberals—around which people's political and social affiliations were based. Although comparable with similar processes of ideological identity formation in other European countries in the same age, the idea behind the pillar was that the ideological subculture to which one belonged was the highest moral community, instead of the nation. This form of ideological organization persisted from the second half of the 19th century into the 1960s, permeating many dimensions of public life.

In present times, the Netherlands is known for both its rapid church decline and its great religious diversity. Between 35% and 40% of Dutch people are still religiously affiliated, but this number is decreasing every year. At the same time, a relatively high number of Dutch people indicate that they have some sense of belief in a transhuman power (almost 70% according to recent figures). A portion of this group are interested in newer forms of religiosity, which often do not require a strong religious affiliation but which treat practitioners as consumers. Diversity is also increasingly reflected in the religious lifeworlds of migrants in the Netherlands, in which Christianity and Islam, in their many different cultural and confessional forms, are dominant. The growing presence of migrant religiosity in the Netherlands certainly adjusts the picture of religious decline, without, however, counteracting its reality.

Peter G. A. Versteeg

See also Amsterdam; Belgium; Europe; Indonesia; Protestant Christianity; Roman Catholicism; Suriname

Further Readings

- Becker, J., & De Hart, J. (2006). Godsdienstige veranderingen in Nederland [Religious changes in the Netherlands]. The Hague, Netherlands: SCP.
- Bernts, T., Dekker, G., & De Hart, J. (2007). God in Nederland, 1996–2006 [God in the Netherlands, 1996–2006]. Baarn, Netherlands: Ten Have.
- Jansen, M., & Stoffels, H. C. (Eds.). (2008). A moving god: Immigrant churches in the Netherlands. Zürich, Switzerland: LIT.
- Lijphart, A. (1968). The politics of accommodation: Pluralism and democracy in the Netherlands. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Sengers, E. (Ed.). (2005). The Dutch and their gods: Secularization and transformation of religion in the Netherlands since 1950. Hilversum, Netherlands: Verloren.
- Van Eijnatten, J., & Van Lieburg, F. A. (2005). Nederlandse religiegeschiedenis [Dutch religious history]. Hilversum, Netherlands: Verloren.

Van Rooden, P. (2005). Long-term religious developments in the Netherlands, 1750–2000. In H. McLeod & W. Ustorf (Eds.), The decline of Christendom in western Europe, 1750–2000 (pp. 113–129). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.

NETHERLANDS ANTILLES

See Curaçao; Sint Maarten

NEW AGE MOVEMENTS

The term New Age has been widely and variously used to refer to a range of beliefs, theories, practices, and lifestyles that do not fit into traditional religious belief systems and that have emerged primarily in modern, postwar, postindustrial societies, particularly in the United States, Canada, Europe, Australia, and New Zealand. Moreover, there is evidence of the increasingly global presence of identifiably New Age ideas and practices, particularly in the large cosmopolitan cities and conurbations of Brazil, South Africa, Japan, India, and many of the post-Soviet states.

Spiritual Eclecticism and Consumerism

New Age is a slippery term that not only means different things to different people but is also rejected by many of those who have been identified as “new agers” by scholars and the media. (This is, no doubt, because, it has, in recent years, become a derogatory term, suggesting idiosyncratic and superficial spiritualities and lifestyles.) Hence, some scholars prefer terms such as alternative spiritualities, self-spiritualities, or spiritualities of life. However, because such terms are not synonymous with what is meant by the New Age, the latter term is still widely used to refer to a bewildering array of self-oriented beliefs and practices that are understood to be at odds with, or at least on the periphery of, mainstream thinking in Western societies. Indeed, whether they are still on the periphery of the mainstream or have, to a large extent, moved into the mainstream is a matter of some debate.

The emergence of the New Age is a part of a wider subjective turn in contemporary Western societies. Individuals may belong to particular religious groups, follow particular paths, and submit to particular disciplines, but, generally speaking, the New Age encourages “epistemological individualism”: Its sources of authority are subjective; the final arbiter in matters of religious truth is the self; one is guided not by any external revelation or authority but by what one perceives to be the spiritual requirements of one’s self. This is reflected in the widespread suspicion of “religion” and the embracing of “spirituality,” leading to the familiar statement of New Age belief: “I’m spiritual but not religious.” Religion is identified with institutional hierarchies, tradition, and sources of authority that transcend the self (e.g., texts and deities), and spirituality is identified with “life as sacred,” the “self,” and subjective “well-being.” Bearing this context in mind, servicing the self became increasingly important, not to say commercially profitable for those trading in ideas, therapies, and consumables. Especially in the 1980s, the New Age became an increasingly commercialized “spiritual supermarket” within which seekers were encouraged to browse among and experiment with a broad range of ideas and practices without subscribing to any particular system of belief.

An emphasis on choice is conspicuous in New Age religion. The spiritual seeker is a late-modern consumer. This goes some way in explaining the appeal of the New Age religions in Western societies over hierarchical, authoritarian, exclusivist forms of religion. However, the spiritual consumerism of the New Age has also led to criticisms of cultural appropriation and religious commodification. As with wooden statues of Shiva or the Buddha carved in India and sold relatively cheaply in Western stores, so also traditions, cultures, beliefs, and rituals from around the globe have become lifestyle choices—items to be tried, tested, and acquired with other spiritual products. Without the least sense of dissonance, a European spiritual seeker with an interest in indigenous religions might sit before a statue of the Buddha—made in Nepal but purchased in the local shopping mall—inhale the fragranced smoke of several Nag Champa incense sticks—made in India by followers of the late Sathya Sai Baba—while meditating on words from the Dao De Jing, the Bible, or one of numerous channeled texts.

Problems of Definition

The New Age is often defined as a movement. However, it is not a new religious movement in the accepted sense of that term, in that it lacks leadership or, indeed, any tightly bound organizational structure that could determine orthodoxy and criteria for membership. While there are identifiable religious organizations involved in the New Age, it is not itself an organization. Indeed, it is not a religion, a particular spiritual tradition, a church, a sect, or a denomination. It is rather a rapidly changing milieu within which groups, movements, teachers, gurus, and trends wax and wane.

In 1980, Marilyn Ferguson, a founding member of the Association of Humanistic Psychology and the author of one of the most influential texts on the New Age, The Aquarian Conspiracy, described the New Age as “a conspiracy without a political doctrine” and “a leaderless but powerful network . . . working to bring about radical change” (p. 8). These are helpful definitions. Having said that, the New Age has progressed significantly since the early 1980s. Principally, as a result of the advent of the Internet, the New Age is far broader and more diverse than it used to be. Indeed, it is difficult not to pluralize as a default position. That is to say, in the 21st century, largely because of the enormous volume of unregulated information and the New Age’s epistemological individualism, almost every interpretation, belief, and practice is contended. Hence, there is no single network. Rather, there is a loose and constantly shifting culture of overlapping networks, groups, and communities, through which numerous teachers, spokespeople, and therapists pass. Hence, in the final analysis, however one defines the amorphous phenomenon of the New Age, its fluidity, plurality, and heterogeneity need to be borne in mind.

Occulture and the New Age

The New Age can be understood as a manifestation of global “occulture.” Occulture is a constantly changing reservoir of ideas and practices that informs everything from extreme right-wing conspiracy theories to New Age teaching about angels and popular films such as The Matrix or television series such as Supernatural. As well as in popular culture, occultural theories and myths are regularly rehearsed, expanded, and disseminated on the Internet and in many popular international magazines such as New Dawn (1991–) and Nexus (1986–), based in Australia; Fortean Times (1973–) and Kindred Spirit (1987–), based in Britain; Fate (1948–) and Gnosis (1985–1999), based in the United States; and Der Golem (2000–), based in Germany. Moreover, because occulture resources and is resourced by, among other things, popular culture, many people are familiar with its ideas.

Developing the idea of what Colin Campbell has called “the cultic milieu,” occulture expands the narrow, technical definition of the term occult to include a vast spectrum of beliefs and practices sourced by the world religions (particularly their mystical traditions)—such as paganism, spiritualism, Theosophy, alternative science and medicine, popular psychology, and a range of beliefs stimulated by a general interest in the paranormal. Occulture is the environment within which new methodologies and worldviews are passed on to an occulturally curious generation. While one may think in terms of a general global occulture, there are, of course, numerous local occultures that may or may not supply and receive from a global occulture. Hence, in the final analysis, occulture, like the Internet (an important occultural space), is constantly growing and changing as it absorbs, modifies, and disseminates new ideas, practices, and trends. Indeed, there is very little that cannot find a home within occulture (although that may mean significant reinterpretation), from chaos theory to deep ecology, from indigenous animism to angels, from depth psychology to astral projection, from geophysics to crystal therapy, from the Ancient Near East to Atlantis, from astronomy to astrology, and so on.

Indeed, as good examples of the way ideas become fungible, occultural concepts are the various series of very basic introductions to spirituality and well-being. For example, some years ago, two very popular series of books were published: “Principles of . . .” and “Elements of . . .” Overall, they constituted a general introduction to a range of occultural beliefs and practices. Although some of the books, such as Principles of Numerology, Principles of Wicca, Principles of Tarot, and Principles of Your Psychic Potential, were clearly “occultic” in the narrower sense of the term, others, such as Principles of Buddhism or Principles of Colonic Irrigation, discussed subjects that were not occultic in themselves but had, nevertheless, become occultural ingredients. In other words, within occulture, it is not, for example, Buddhism per se that people are interested in but rather the principles or elements of Buddhism. As such, as we have seen, traditional religious practices are reinterpreted in the service of the self—they are de-traditionalized. In this sense, they become occulturally commodified. Consumers of occulture, such as those in the New Age, may not be particularly interested in becoming devout Buddhists but rather want to acquaint themselves with some elements of Buddhist belief and practice, which can then be merged with other spiritual, esoteric, or paranormal elements. Of course, in the most flagrant cases of occultural commodification, religious symbols become little more than jewelry and household ornaments. They function as indicators of an individual’s tastes and values but are detached from their original constellations of meaning.

The Emergence of the New Age

Locating the genesis of such an amorphous and fluid phenomenon as the New Age is fraught with problems. It is possible nevertheless to identify some antecedents and trace some influences. Although one could trace certain New Age ideas back many centuries, in recent history, its roots can be found in 19th-century occult traditions, notably spiritualism, American metaphysical movements, and Theosophy. Of these, it was perhaps the Theosophical Society that most successfully absorbed and communicated the principal ideas that would shape early New Age thought. Indeed, whereas the contemporary New Age is an amorphous phenomenon and the confluence of numerous streams of thought, being characterized by eclecticism and spiritual nomadism, initially it was theosophically oriented and unified around the Theosophical Society’s spiritual idealism and ethic of service to humanity.

The Theosophical Society, founded in 1875 by Helena P. Blavatsky (1831–1891) and Henry S. Olcott (1832–1907), was the cradle in which several important influences on early New Age thought would be nurtured. These include, most notably, the English occultist Alice Bailey (1880–1949), founder of the Arcane School, and also the Austrian thinker Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925), the founder of Anthroposophy.

The key ideas taught by the Theosophical Society, which can be identified in early New Age thought, are summed up in its three objectives:

- (1) To form the nucleus of a Universal Brotherhood of Humanity without distinction of race, colour, or creed.
- (2) To promote the study of Aryan and other Scriptures, of the World's religion and sciences, and to vindicate the importance of old Asiatic literature, namely, of the Brahmanical, Buddhist, and Zoroastrian philosophies.
- (3) To investigate the hidden mysteries of Nature under every aspect possible, and the psychic and spiritual powers latent in man especially. (Blavatsky, 1889, p. 39)

These teachings, Blavatsky claimed, were the result of her instruction in an “ancient wisdom” that was, in turn, the source of the principal spiritual themes and ethical ideals found at the heart of the world's religions. Indeed, she claims that enlightened masters or mahatmas throughout history, including the Buddha and Jesus, taught theosophical truths and that her own instruction had been imparted by certain “hidden adepts.” The mission of the Theosophical Society was to communicate the teachings of these advanced spiritual beings to humanity and thereby to contribute to the moral and spiritual evolution of the race.

The spiritual/ascended masters were living persons who had fully evolved through many incarnations, had acquired and become the custodians of “ancient wisdom,” and now sought to impart that wisdom to humanity through specially chosen intermediaries in order to lead it into a new age of peace, spirituality, and global community.

Central to much of this thinking and informing core themes within the New Age was a fascination with the East, particularly India. In 1878, Blavatsky and Olcott traveled to India, where they eventually established headquarters in Adyar, Madras (now Chennai). Their frequent contact with Hindu and Buddhist leaders; their teaching about occult mahatmas living in Tibet; their liberal use of Sanskrit terminology; their identification of a young Indian child, Jiddu Krishnamurti, as the coming “world teacher”; and the development of “esoteric Buddhism” gave this Western esoteric organization a distinctly Indian bias. This confluence of the Eastern and the Western has significantly accelerated since the 1960s, contributing significantly to Western occulture and shaping the New Age.

As to the more recent origins of the New Age, Wouter Hanegraaf has argued that proto-New Age ideas and rituals can be found in the UFO (unidentified flying object) groups of the 1950s and 1960s. On June 24, 1947, Kenneth Arnold, a businessman from Boise, Idaho, reported a sighting of 10 shining disks flying over the Cascade Mountains when flying his private plane near Mount Rainier in western Washington. Occulture looked to the skies. Almost immediately, there was widespread public interest in alien contact, including the emergence of several flying-saucer clubs and UFO religions as well as the inevitable interest in the media and popular culture. Concerning the UFO groups, that these were started by those with an interest in the occult and Theosophy is hardly surprising, since Blavatsky had herself claimed that some “ascended masters” resided on Venus. Indeed, even before Arnold's sighting, the first new religion to have a specific interest in alien contact was the theosophical group “I AM Religious Activity,” whose founder, Guy Ballard (1878–1939), claimed to have been introduced to 12 Venusians who revealed Venus to be the home of a race of spiritually advanced beings. In the 1950s, groups such as the Aetherius Society, founded by George King (1919–1997), developed specifically theosophical, proto-New Age ideas, central to which was speculation about extraterrestrial beings seeking to guide humanity into the next stage of its evolution. This was identified with the astrological Age of Aquarius, within which there would be the emergence of a new spiritual consciousness.

Interestingly, early New Age thought had an apocalyptic core, in that it envisaged a difficult transition into the new age. There would be a period of global catastrophe, including wars, famine, floods, earthquakes, social unease, and economic collapse. The occupants of flying saucers, therefore, sought to warn humanity, particularly those who were spiritually sensitive to their paranormal methods of communication. These people would be guided through or otherwise saved from the coming events to be pioneers in the postapocalyptic world, a world in which humanity would live peacefully in accordance with universal cosmic laws.

Key elements of this proto–New Age thinking became central to the spiritual counterculture of the 1960s and early 1970s. Immersed in the prevailing occulture, there were groups, such as the Findhorn Community in Scotland, within which UFO apocalypticism merged with numerous other ideas. Eventually, this served to dilute and eventually transform it. A new progressive spirituality emerged. The passive attitude of waiting for the apocalyptic transition into the New Age was replaced by a pioneering activism, which encouraged people to live “as if” the New Age had dawned. As such, spiritual seekers were to be living examples of the New Age. They were “tomorrow’s children,” challenging others to live and think differently. By doing so, they hastened the advent of the new spiritual age. However, again, this early manifestation of the New Age was far more coherent than what was to emerge in the 1980s. It was rooted in theosophical ideas, particularly those developed by Bailey and Steiner. Although the American David Spangler (b. 1945) was a key thinker in this early period, it was largely a British phenomenon. Other influential teachers of the “theosophical New Age” were George Trevelyan (1906–1996) and Benjamin Creme (b. 1922).

At the end of the 1970s, the theosophical New Age was diluted still further. Not only were a greater variety of occultural ideas flowing into the milieu, but a growing variety of spiritual seekers were beginning to establish connections and pool ideas. This, we have seen, is what Ferguson refers to as the “Aquarian conspiracy”—the “emerging network.” Indeed, it was during the mid-1980s that New Age emerged as the principal term for this network. While the network was not oriented around the apocalypticism of the early theosophical thinkers, many did envisage a cosmic evolution, a major shift into a new age of peace, holism, and spiritual consciousness and a humanity that would, by default, favor the creative, intuitive right hemisphere of the brain over the more rationalist, atomist left hemisphere.

Geographically, in the 1980s, the movement shifted from Britain to America. As it did, so did ideas molded by transcendentalism and the American metaphysical movements, such as New Thought, begin to shape it. It was also influenced by ideas that can be traced back to the emergence of humanistic psychology. Of particular note is the Group Gestalt Therapy of Fritz Perls (1893–1970), introduced in the 1960s at the Esalen Institute, Big Sur, California. This led not only to what became known as the human potential movement, which produced numerous self-help books and therapies, but also to New Age–sacralized human-potential ideas, rooting them in spiritual belief and practice. Hence, psychology and therapy became core to New Age thinking and practice.

Global New Age

Central to the emergence of the New Age has been a globalizing agenda. With roots in the Theosophical Society’s project “to form the nucleus of a universal brotherhood of humanity without distinction of race, colour, or creed,” (Blavatsky, 1889, p. 39) there is often a utopian vision of planetary wholeness, in which religions and cultures transcend their differences, adopt a fundamentally common spirituality, and live together in harmony. As to how this might happen, for many it is the inevitable next stage in the spiritual evolution of humanity. Others seek to contribute to the formation of a “critical mass” of enlightened people, which will lead to a spiritual tipping point in world history. Some, like the early UFO religionists, speak of the intervention of superior spiritual beings.

One might ask, of course, how a new global spirituality will accommodate, without coercion, those who prefer traditional, exclusivist religion or, indeed, no religion at all. The argument is that in the new era, humanity will have evolved the spiritual consciousness necessary for a peaceful global community. Because this spiritual consciousness will be a development of current New Age thinking, the new spiritual seekers are understood to be the vanguard of a new humanity.

A notable manifestation of this type of thinking was the “Harmonic Convergence” on August 16–17, 1987. José Argüelles (b. 1939), a Mexican American spiritual teacher, encouraged numerous spiritual seekers (“light beings”) from around the world to gather at sacred sites (e.g., Stonehenge) in order to mark the shift into a new age of universal peace. He believed that the Mayan calendar, as well as other systems of astrology, indicated that a “major energy shift” was about to occur that was powerful enough to cause a global shift in human thinking toward universal cooperation. While there is little discernible evidence for these claims, he and others have also argued that the Harmonic Convergence inaugurated a period of 26 years, at the end of which, on December 21, 2012, the Mayan “long count” would mark the end of the current era, the thirteenth b’ak’tun cycle (which began on August 11, 3114 BCE). Hence, 2012, the Mayan calendar, and the coming global apocalyptic transformation have become key themes within much of the New Age and, indeed, in occulture more widely.

As to the spread of the New Age, it is, to a large extent, a deterritorialized transnational culture. However, because it has traveled as part of the baggage of Westernization (even Americanization) and has tended to retain its fundamentally Western characteristics, including the use of English as its lingua franca, it is difficult not to interpret it in terms of spiritual colonialism. While the New Age is, almost by definition, spiritually acquisitive and, therefore, naturally absorbs local occultural elements, the cultural flow is typically one-way; the location of cultural power is recognizably Western. That is to say, studies demonstrate that while there is an explicit interest in local spiritualities and indigenous traditions, in fact, the interest typically extends to the incorporation of appealing elements into an essentially Western spirituality, shaped by a utopian, unifying, and fundamentally relativizing project. Ideas are adopted (and reinterpreted) when they are recognized to cohere with the New Age. (Of course, this has also meant that certain cultures, particularly monotheistic cultures, are neglected. Indeed, not only is there little attention given to Islam, for example, but African cultures have also been neglected in the New Age.) However, as is widely recognized, not only does this lead to the maintenance of Western hegemony, but, as such, it has also led to denunciations and postcolonial critiques of the New Age by indigenous peoples. For example, on June 10, 1993, with specific reference to the New Age, an international gathering of the North American and Canadian Lakota, Dakota, and Nakota Nations issued a “Declaration of War Against Exploiters of Lakota Spirituality.”

Christopher Partridge

See also Blavatsky, Helena P.; Hinduism; Indigenous Religions; Neo-Pagan Movement; Neo-Shamanisms; Neo-Sufism (Sufi Renewal); New Religions; New Religions in the United States; Shamanism; Theosophy

Further Readings

- Blavatsky, H. P. (1889). The key to Theosophy. London: Theosophical Publishing.
- Ferguson, M. (1980). The aquarian conspiracy: Personal and social transformation in our time. New York: Jeremy P. Tarcher.
- Hammer, O. (2001). Claiming knowledge. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Heelas, P. (1996). The New Age movement. Oxford, UK: Blackwell.
- Kemp, D., & Lewis, J. R. (Eds.). (2007). Handbook of the New Age. Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Lewis, J. R., & Melton, J. G. (Eds.). (1992). Perspectives on the New Age. New York: State University of New York Press.
- Partridge, C. (2004–2005). Re-enchantment of the West (2 vols). London: T & T Clark.
- Rothstein, M. (Ed.). (2001). New Age religion and globalization. Aarhus, Denmark: Aarhus University Press.

NEW CALEDONIA

New Caledonia (Nouvelle-Calédonie), a French overseas territory in the South Pacific, consists of the main island of New Caledonia (or La Grande Terre), the Loyalty Islands (Lifou, Mare, and Uvea), the Isle of Pines, and other minor islands. Its current religious landscape is the result of French colonization and Western Christian proselytizing. Of the approximately 240,000 residents, a majority of New Caledonians consider themselves Christian, with 60% identifying as Roman Catholic and 30% identifying as Protestant, mostly with evangelical and Pentecostal churches. While the indigenous Melanesian peoples, or Kanaks, make up about half of the Catholic population, they are the majority of the Protestant population, outnumbering those of European descent. Of the remaining 10% of the population, a significant portion identifies as nonreligious.

The non-Christian population is small but growing, especially adherents of Islam, Buddhism, and the Baha’i Faith. Indonesian and a few African immigrants established a Muslim presence on the islands, building the first Islamic center in the capital city of Nouméa; recently, this archipelago, like much of Oceania, has seen a growth in Islamic converts. Some South Vietnamese residents migrated to New Caledonia following the war with North Vietnam, bringing Buddhism with them. The Baha'i Faith, appearing on the islands in the 1950s, also continues to grow in New Caledonia and throughout the Pacific Islands.

While most Kanaks have identified themselves as Christian since European missionization, some maintain traditional beliefs and practices, especially as part of cultural celebrations, including ancestral religious traditions and a deep connection to the land. Ceremonies such as weddings and funerals also involve Kanak traditions, including ritual dancing.

Explored by both England and France during the late 18th and early 19th centuries, New Caledonia became a French colony in 1853 and a penal settlement in 1854. As more French missionaries and settlers immigrated to the islands, the Kanaks revolted, and many were killed. The Code de l'indigénat, laws restricting the rights of the natives, was put in place in the late 19th century, as it was across the French colonial empire. Since 1986, New Caledonia has been on the United Nations Decolonization Committee's list of Non-Self-Governing Territories. Conflict over independence erupted during the 1980s, resulting in the 1998 Nouméa Accord, which planned to gradually transfer governing authority and grant the islands more autonomy. The agreement also stipulates that France must conduct a referendum sometime in the next decade to decide whether New Caledonia is able to assume sole governance. The Kanak and Socialist National Liberation Front (Le Front de libération nationale kanak et socialiste, FLNKS) continues to push for independence and promote a distinct Kanak identity, including ethnic, cultural, and religious traditions.

Lauren Horn Griffin

See also Cargo Cults; France; Micronesia; Pacific Islands/Oceania; Postcolonialism; Roman Catholicism

Further Readings

Bullard, A. (2000). Exile to paradise: Savagery and civilization in Paris and the South Pacific, 1790–1900. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Chappell, D. (2010). New Caledonia. Contemporary Pacific, 22(2), 433–440.

Sand, C. (2000). Reconstructing “traditional” Kanak society in New Caledonia: The role of archaeology in the study of European contact. In R. Torrence & A. Clarke (Eds.), The archaeology of difference: Negotiating cross-cultural engagements in Oceania (pp. 51–78). London: Routledge.

NEW RELIGIONS

The term new religions, or new religious movements (NRMs), came into vogue in the latter part of the 20th century among scholars of religion to refer both to the influx of religions that were being brought to the West by immigrant populations and to the wide variety of innovative movements that were becoming increasingly visible and that were frequently being referred to as “cults” or “sects” in popular parlance and the media. No precise definition of either type of new religion is generally accepted, and the term is applied to phenomena that are both questionably new and questionably religious. Religions that are new to a particular society (e.g., Hinduism in North America, Shinto in Brazil, or Zoroastrianism in Europe) may have existed for centuries or even millennia in their countries of origin. ISKCON (the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, commonly referred to as the Hare Krishna) insist that they are not a new religion but trace their origins back to the 16th-century monk Chaitanya Mahaprabhu.

Several groups or movements might deny or be denied the term religious. For example, the Science of Creative Intelligence, better known as Transcendental Meditation, or TM, has fought in the courts to be defined as a technique of meditation rather than a religion; the Raelians call themselves an atheistic religion. Such ambiguities make any attempt to enumerate or make generalizations about new religions highly contentious. This entry uses the concept in very general terms to refer to groups that could be described as religious or spiritual, in that they offer some kind of answer to questions of ultimate concern, and that have at least some recognizably novel features.

Definitions and Classifications

Perhaps the most important point to be made about new religions is that it is impossible to generalize about them. Possibly, the only characteristic that they have in common is that they have been referred to as a new religion, cult, or sect. They differ from each other in their beliefs, practices, lifestyles, organization, finances, leadership, and attitudes toward women and children and in the degree to which they are considered benign or harmful. All religions were of course new at some point, and all those religions that are now considered mainstream or traditional have historically undergone schismatic movements that kept some of their features while introducing others that were different—although those who initiated such movements might claim that they were simply returning to the religion's pure form. New religions have drawn not only from traditional religions but also from a variety of ideologies, philosophies, and psychologies. They include UFO cults, which claim to be in touch with aliens from other planets, and virtual religions that exist only on the Internet. Other movements that can be classified as new religions include Wicca, witchcraft, and the various pagan groups (and solitary practitioners) that have become popular, particularly in the United States and parts of northern Europe. Sometimes associated with such groups, but more often distinguishable from them, are the numerous New Age groups, ranging from spiritual communities such the 1960s founders of Findhorn in the north of Scotland and Esalen at Big Sur in California, to the production of sacred, spiritual, and/or magic objects (e.g., the crystals, angel cards, horoscopes, and runes on offer in specialist bookshops), to the hundreds of practices in which both the committed and the curious partake at places such as Glastonbury (southwest England), Turin (northern Italy), Sedona (Arizona), Santa Fe (New Mexico), or Ojai (California).

Throughout history, there have been waves of new religions, usually at periods of unrest or rapid change, such as economic upheavals, wars, colonization, or natural disasters. Within the past half-millennium of Christendom, for example, such waves appeared in northern and central Europe in the 1530s and in England between 1620 and 1650 and again around the turn of the 19th century. In America, the Great Awakening of the late 1730s was followed by the Second Great Awakening from 1820 to 1860. According to some, it was the Fourth Great Awakening that began in California in the 1960s; others have referred to the wave of transcendental novelties that swept through most of the industrialized West during the 1960s and 1970s as the new religious consciousness or, at a more cosmic level, the dawn of the Age of Aquarius. The new religions were by no means confined to the West, however. Japan experienced what Neill McFarland called its "Rush Hour of the Gods" after the restrictions imposed during World War II had been lifted, and by 1970, commentators such as Susumu Shimazono were talking about the new new religions. Harold Turner estimated that there were 10,000 or more primal new religious movements in Africa by the second half of the 20th century. Journals dedicated to the study of new religions include Novo Religio and the Journal of Contemporary Religion.

While definitional problems make counting the number of new religions at any one time almost impossible (Should each type of coven be counted as a separate religion, or should they all be lumped together?), it is possible to say that there are several thousand identifiable groups at the present time. One London-based "cult-watching" group, Inform, has information on more than 1,700 groups that could be termed a new religion, well over 800 of which are currently active in the United Kingdom. Several hundreds have been counted in most other European countries and more than 1,000 in North America.

Counting numbers of participants is even more difficult. First, as with the older religions, there can be different levels of membership, ranging from those who do little more than display a friendly interest (and might be double-counted as a member of another religion), to those who belong to a marginal category (e.g., Unificationist "House Church" members or Children of God "Turf Supporters"), to those with further levels of commitment (as with a Christian congregation), increasing as followers approach the inner circle and devote their entire lives to the religion (like monks or nuns). Indeed, although the number of new religions is large, very few of the movements have more than a few hundred members at any one time. A handful, such as Soka Gakkai International, can claim some million members, but many of the religions have only a few score, and some have only a dozen or so committed followers. Further complications arise from the fact that different religions have different criteria for deciding who is a member and who is not, and many new religions have a very high turnover, but (as with some older religions) the statistics tend to indicate the numbers who join more frequently than they note those who have left.

The high turnover rate has been obscured not only by the movements themselves, which are not anxious to publicize the fact that members can become dissatisfied and leave, but also by the movements' opponents, who frequently resort to the "brainwashing thesis" to explain the, to them, inexplicable conversion of otherwise apparently sane persons—a thesis that was used to justify the illegal practice of "deprogramming," common between the 1970s and early 1990s, in order to "rescue victims" who, it was claimed, were unable to leave of their own accord.

Several attempts have been made to classify new religions, but these rarely do justice to the enormous variety. One of the more successful attempts has been by Roy Wallis, who drew a distinction between what he called "world-rejecting movements" (e.g., the Unification Church or the Children of God in its early days), which typically expect the world to undergo radical change, and world-affirming groups (e.g., the Church of Scientology and various groups belonging to the human potential movement), which accept the values of the wider society and offer individuals (who may be seen as "clients") the means to achieve worldly success—be this in their careers, their relationships, or other aspects of life. Members of Wallis's third type, world-accommodating movements (to which he assigns the Aetherius Society, Subud, and the Charismatic Renewal movement), are fairly content with, or indifferent to, the world as it is. Another typology, proposed by James A. Beckford, is helpful for several purposes, relying as it does not so much on a new religion's ideological attitude toward the world as on the way in which it is inserted into society—as refugees, agents of revitalization, and/or a release.

According to some commentators, one of the defining characteristics of new religions is that a tension exists between them and mainstream society. J. Gordon Melton has argued that the religions have little else in common with each other but more in common with the traditions from which they emerged. Thus, movements such as ISKCON and Ananda Marga share common characteristics with the Hindu tradition, while religions such as The Way International and The Children of God (now known as The Family International) are more recognizably of the Christian tradition.

On the other hand, it can be argued that insofar as new religions are new in the sense that they are first-generation movements, they are likely to share some features just because of their newness. First, converts to a religion, be it new or old, tend to be more enthusiastic about their beliefs and practices than those who have been born into a religion. Second, those attracted to a new religion are likely to be atypical of the population as a whole. At certain periods in the past, new religions have appealed to the economically, socially, or politically oppressed. Those attracted to the wave of new religions that became visible in the West during the 1970s and 1980s were, however, drawn disproportionately from young adults from the White middle classes (although there were exceptions, such as the Rastafarians, where the appeal was mainly to young working-class Blacks). Third, new religions are frequently led by a charismatic founder, whose followers may grant him or her authority over a wide spectrum of their lives; he or she is unlikely to be constrained by either rules or tradition and might, therefore, be both unpredictable and unaccountable to anyone (except, perhaps, to God).

A fourth characteristic that is typical of many new religions is that they entertain a relatively dichotomous worldview. In the more obviously religious movements, a sharp distinction is made between what and who are godly and what and who are satanic; a clear moral boundary is drawn between good and bad and between right and wrong; temporally, individuals' past lives fall into the time before and after their conversion, and, for some, the future may be lived with a millennial expectation that the world as we know it will undergo some kind of radical change within their lifetime. Socially (and occasionally geographically) a strong boundary may be drawn between “us” (members) and “them” (nonmembers), which may entail converts cutting ties with their relatives and former friends.

Fifth, new religions are likely to change more rapidly than older religions. The changes may be an adaptation of the belief system, particularly if it involved apparently refutable prophecies. Purely demographic factors also play a role in the changes. To take one example, the average age of members of The Family (then known as the Children of God) was 23 in the 1970s, most of the converts being around that age, with almost no young or old dependents for whom they had any responsibility. Twenty years later, the average age was still 23, but almost none of the membership was of that age. Instead, there were a large number of children, diverting time and other resources to their needs rather than efforts at proselytizing. The original converts who had stayed with the movement were now considerably more mature, and the founder, David Berg, had died. In fact, by the start of the 21st century the majority of the charismatic leaders of the new religions that had attracted public attention in the 1970s were now dead or no longer wielding the charismatic authority they had once enjoyed. Instead, the authority structures had usually (though not invariably) become more institutionalized and incorporated several “traditions,” thus becoming more accountable and more predictable.

A sixth feature that has been characteristic of many, if not most, new religions is that they have evoked suspicion, fear, and/or antagonism from the host society. This is not altogether surprising as they are offering an alternative set of beliefs and/or practices, and those with a vested interest in the status quo are unlikely to welcome what they can see as disruptive or dangerous elements. Not infrequently, the reactions have been violent: Early Christians were thrown to the lions, Cathars were burned at the stake, Jehovah’s Witnesses were gassed in Auschwitz, and there are still places in the world where members of new religions are attacked and beaten to death, sometimes by the state apparatus and sometimes by vigilante groups. More often, however, when modern states want to control religions, this is done through the passing and application of legislation, one common method being to make it difficult or impossible for new religions to function easily because the necessary registration requires a given number of members and/or presence in the country for a given number of years. It should, however, be noted that in most democratic countries most new religions can practice their faith without too many problems so long as they do not indulge in criminal activity.

This does not mean that they are welcomed with open arms. Throughout history, groups have emerged with the sole objective of combating both specific new religions and new religions in general. The current wave of what is generically referred to as the anticult movement began in the West in the early 1970s when parents, concerned about their offspring joining new religions (which sometimes involved giving up their education and promising careers and cutting themselves off from relatives and friends), got together to form groups to fight the movements (which were often referred to as destructive cults), to warn others of their actual or potential harm, and to lobby for legislation to control or ban the movements. The events in Jonestown, Guyana, in 1978, when more than 900 members of the Peoples Temple, including more than 200 children, committed suicide or were murdered resulted in public horror and outrage and raised the profile of the anticult movement, as did subsequent tragedies such as those associated with the storming of the Branch Davidian compound by the FBI (Federal Bureau of Investigation) at Waco, Texas, in 1993; the suicides and murders of the Solar Temple in Canada, Switzerland, and France in the mid-1990s; the releasing of toxic sarin gas in the Tokyo underground by Aum Shinrikyô in 1995; the suicides of Heaven’s Gate in San Diego in 1997; the burning and other murders of members of the Movement for the Restoration of the 10 Commandments of God in Uganda in 2000; and al Qaeda’s attack on the U.S. Pentagon and New York’s World Trade Center on September 11, 2001.

Terrible though such tragedies are, it should be recognized that such well-publicized atrocities are committed only by a tiny minority of the new religions, most of which indulge in neither more nor less criminal activity than adherents of older religions or those with no religion. It should also be recognized that visibility is not the same as typicality: A criminal act is far more likely to be reported in the media if it involves a member of a new religion than if it involves, for example, a Catholic or Presbyterian (and if Catholics’ or Presbyterians’ crimes are reported, the culprit's religion is very unlikely to be mentioned). Furthermore, attacks that have been carried out against new religions have not received similar coverage in the media—few remember the 1976 bombing of the Unification Headquarters in Paris, which caused severe injuries to a young woman, or the bombing of the ISKCON temple in Manipur in 2005, resulting in the death of at least five devotees. At the same time, the “good” actions of members of new religions are rarely reported (yet many of them are engaged in charitable work), or, if they are reported, they are interpreted as being a ploy to gain social status or new converts—which may, of course, be one of the motives. Nonetheless, it might be mentioned that, for example, ISKCON has provided food for thousands of hungry people in parts of the world where other aid workers have been afraid to venture, and the Family International distributes food, clothing, and medical supplies to impoverished inhabitants in the Black townships of South Africa as well as conducting literacy programs and imparting education about HIV/AIDS.

Conclusion

None of this is to suggest that new religions do not give rise to genuine problems or that the controversies can be dismissed lightly. They undoubtedly do present both individuals and societies with some very real challenges. What a study of the history of the “cult wars” indicates, however, is that it can be counterproductive to generalize about the movements, each of which has to be studied carefully as a discrete entity that can itself differ according to both the time and the place in which it is functioning.

Eileen Barker

See also Branch Davidians; Global Religion; Hare Krishna (International Society for Krishna Consciousness); Millenarian Movements; Multiculturalism; Neo-Pagan Movement; Neo-Shamanisms; Neo-Sufism (Sufi Renewal); New Religions in Africa; New Religions in Cuba; New Religions in Japan; New Religions in South America; New Religions in the United States; Radhasoami; Scientology; Syncretism; 3HO (Sikh Dharma Fellowship); Unification Church

Further Readings

- Barker, E. (1989). New religious movements: A practical introduction. London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office.
- Beckford, J. A. (1985). Cult controversies: The societal response to the new religious movements. London: Tavistock.
- Bromley, D. G., & Melton, J. G. (Eds.). (2002). Cults, religion and violence. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Chrystides, G. D., & Wilkins, M. Z. (Eds.). (2006). A reader in new religious movements. London: Continuum.
- Dawson, L. L. (Ed.). (2003). Cults and new religious movements: A reader. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Jenkins, P. (2000). Mystics and messiahs: Cults and new religions in American history. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Melton, J. G. (1992). Encyclopedic handbook of cults in America. New York: Garland.
- Partridge, C. (2004). New religions: A guide. New religious movements, sects and alternative religions. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Richardson, J. T. (Ed.). (2004). Regulating religion: Case studies from around the globe. New York: Kluwer Academic.
- Wallis, R. (1984). The elementary forms of the new religious life. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Wilson, B. R., & Cresswell, J. (Eds.). (1999). New religious movements: Challenge and response. London: Routledge.

Websites

- Center for Studies on New Religions: www.cesnur.org
- Hartford Institute for Religious Movements: http://www.hartfordinstitute.org/denom/new_religious_movements.html
- International Cultic Studies Association: <http://www.icsahome.com>
- University of Virginia Library: <http://etext.lib.virginia.edu/nrms>

NEW RELIGIONS IN AFRICA

The continent of Africa, covering about 30 million square kilometers, comprising at least 50 countries with more than 800 million people, is characterized by complex historical, cultural, religious, social, and linguistic affinities and diversities, some of which have given rise to new religious expressions. The innumerable ethnic social groups have cultures, each different from the other, that together represent the mosaic of African cultural diversity and lead to religious vitality and new forms of revitalization, especially in sub-Saharan Africa.

African religions comprise the indigenous religions of various African societies that share common affinities in their religious ideas, rituals, and worldviews. The emergence and expansion of Islam, Christianity, and Eastern- and Western-related spiritualities saw the introduction of new religious ideas and practices into indigenous religions. The encounter transformed indigenous religious thought and practice but did not supplant them; indigenous religions preserved some beliefs and rituals but also adjusted to the new sociocultural milieu. Owing to social changes, aspects of indigenous beliefs and rituals were abandoned, transformed, or reinvented with the incorporation of elements from European, Arab, and Asian cultures and religions. The change also led to the revivification of other aspects of the indigenous religions and cultures. In many cases, Islam and Christianity became domesticated on African soil. The contact produced new religions, with some appropriating indigenous symbols and giving them a new twist.

The sustained mutual influence of and interaction between the various religions that characterize the religious landscape of Africa have produced new religious constellations that continue to attract scholars, policy makers, and media and public attention. The interface of religious cultures of sub-Saharan Africa with globalization needs to be located against the backdrop of the interlocking relationships and mutual enhancement of the various old and new religions rather than in any unilateral perspective. Some new movements have appropriated symbols and employed religious imagery from one or the other religious tradition, giving them a novel interpretation and producing a new kind of religious creativity. These religious formations are hardly to be considered as new in terms of any novelty of their ideologies or the originality of their beliefs, practices, polity, and ethos. Rather, they are groups whose emergence is historically unprecedented in the specific local contexts where they have emerged and are thriving. “New religions” refers to nonmainstream religions within the African context, although some have experienced vertical-horizontal growths and increasing institutionalization, and take on public roles that ensure their visibility and social relevance.

Historical Context

The historiography of new religions in Africa spans the colonial era, particularly from the early 20th century to the contemporary period. The nexus between globalization, religion, and culture in sub-Saharan Africa can partly be understood in terms of the legacy of colonial conquest and occupation, neocolonialism, and the introduction of Arab Islam and European Christianity. The period in which virtually all African societies were subjugated under colonialism coincided with when the indigenous religions (re)encountered Christianity, Islam, and Eastern- and Western-related spiritualities in a much more dynamic way. While some new religions were indigenous and homespun, others grew out of external stimuli and influence from outside Africa. Although Islam and Christianity were introduced to various parts of Africa much earlier, it was from the colonial historical phase that there emerged renewed religious encounters, interactions, and competition.

Religion is quintessential to our understanding of African cultures in a global context. A proper grasp of the texture, shape, and complexity of the different religious traditions improves our understanding of Africa and its religious culture in conditions of globality. It also points to the significance of religion in contextualizing Africa in the framework of ongoing globalization processes. Contemporary “African religion” is itself a product of globalization. Jacob Olupona (2003) notes that African religion is less a single tradition than a sociological context in which the elements of a variety of indigenous religious experiences are combined with Islam and Christianity. All three of these dimensions—indigenous religion, Africanized Islam, and Africanized Christianity—are part of the interactive, globalized, African religious experience. (p. 78)

These initiatives attest to the continuity of African worldviews and ritual cosmos in the midst of worldwide sociocultural change.

The interconnectedness between globalization and the religious cultures of sub-Saharan Africa is marked by how new religions in Africa influence globalization and respond to the challenges and opportunities that the globalization process presents. On the one hand, African religions are integral to the processes of globalization. They also assess the impact of globalization and global change on their modus operandi, religious praxis, and cosmologies; but at the same time, they avail themselves of the opportunity for self-repositioning within the global religious scene. Olupona (2003) notes that African traditions and cultural values have been significantly affected by globalization but that “at the same time African traditionalism retains a resiliency and adaptability that enables it to maintain cohesion both in non-Western environments and in the context of faiths such as Christianity and Islam” (p. 79). Thus, African new religions within the threshold of globality and globalization are characterized by their negotiation between continuity, change, and transformation.

The raison d'être, motivations, and modus operandi of these new religions are as diverse as the movements themselves. While it is difficult to generalize as to why these new religions are emerging, any attempt to understand this religious development must take cognizance of how and where they are emerging in different historical epochs. Local and global considerations are integral to these processes. A multiplicity of factors is adduced to explain the emergence of new religions in Africa. Certain factors may be more prominent than others depending on the specific context, and the remote and immediate circumstances surrounding their emergence and expansion.

An understanding of the complex identities of new religions is central to any definition and description of their growth locally and globally. It is within this context of globalization that questions about the why and how of new religions' expansion and success have become intriguing. New religions have been defined from a variety of perspectives. The collective identities of new religions also derive from each group's self-identity. Social science approaches to new religions investigate how they respond to change. To account for the emergence and spread of new religions in Africa, some sociologists concentrate on the role of deprivation and anomie as causes of growth. New religions in Africa were largely described as an urban phenomenon—the religion of the poor, the masses, the disenfranchised, and displaced persons. Such interpretations undercut the dimensions of new religious cultures. The narrow emphasis on the why of conversion and recruitment undermines how new religions negotiate or transform the cultures into which they are introduced.

Religious fervor, charismatic vision, religious expansion and innovation, cultural renaissance, economic empowerment, personality clashes, land dispute, and social and religious protest, combined with the desire for religious and political self-determination, have inspired a variety of new religions throughout Africa. Some scholars regard the new religions that emerged during the colonial era in Africa as manifestations of social or religious protest—by-products of the struggle for political self-determination and the establishment of independent nation-states. Independent or indigenous churches, such as the Ethiopian, Zionist, Aladura, Spiritualist, prophetic, and Kimbanguist movements, that emerged and proliferated in various regions of sub-Saharan Africa in the wake of European colonialism were interpreted as one response of Africans to the loss of cultural, economic, and political control. Some of these arose in reaction to European Christianity and played a significant role in the postcolonial struggle for independence. The political factor in terms of social or religious protest hardly does justice to the complex phenomenon. The resilience of the earlier indigenous churches several decades following the independence of African societies makes this explanation tenuous. Similar movements continue to emerge that can rarely be linked to any forms of social or religious protest. As new movements of this kind are very diverse and found in different parts of Africa, any causative explanation must take into consideration the internal religious dynamic, characteristics, and peculiarities of a specific new religion and their articulation within the external social processes, conditions, and circumstances of globalization. The rich, local varieties, manifestations, expressions, and experiences of new religions in Africa shed significant light on their consideration as a global phenomenon. The next section of this entry draws, very briefly, on concrete examples of these new religious developments within the indigenous religions, particularly highlighting their responses to social change and their interplay with the globalization process.

Indigenous Religions

The historical and cultural significance of indigenous African religious traditions is partly discerned in their plurality and multivocality both in Africa and the African diaspora. In various parts of Africa, the indigenous religions have encountered other religious forms and responded to social change, leading to revitalization of indigenous religions and in some contexts synthesis, reinvention, and change.

The Afrikania Mission, also known as the Afrikan Renaissance Mission or Sankofa Faith, marks one striking example of this tendency toward indigenous religious revival. Founded in Ghana in 1982 by Rev. Dr. Osofo-Okomfo Kwabena Damuah, a Ghanaian theologian and former ordained priest of the Roman Catholic Church of Ghana, Afrikania took a reformist stance toward the traditional religion, setting for itself the task of redefining, reforming, and renaming the religion of Africa. Quite unequivocally, the group disavows any claim of Afrikania as a new concept and asserts that it is the rebirth, revival, and reorganization of the African traditional religion. Such a religious innovation, with its teaching and modus operandi, was meant as a critique of Christianity and other religious forms considered as external to African sensibilities but that were also inherently intolerant. Afrikania indicts slavery and colonization for the loss of African traditional spirituality and criticizes government, foreign diplomatic missions, and nongovernmental organizations for corrupting and demonizing traditional values and imposing foreign religious beliefs. Nevertheless, the Catholic background of its founder seems to leave significant Christian imprints in Afrikania's belief and ritual systems, thus producing a religious synthesis. The attempt to rebrand or reposition indigenous African religious traditions has also resulted in the tendency to universalize, canonize, and institutionalize them.

The Mungiki, a movement outlawed by the Kenyan government in 2002, was cofounded in 1987 by Ibrahim Wairunge (a secondary school leaver) with six other young people. Mungiki's ideology was particularly attractive to Kenyan youths and students, and also the poor and the unemployed within the society. Beyond Mungiki's self-description as a religious movement, public perception varies in considering the group as a political movement. One account suggests that the initial Mungiki members were followers of The Tent of the Living God, another new religion founded by Ngonyo wa Gakonya in Kenya. Raised as a Christian, in later life, Wa Gakonya began to question the Christian faith as professed by his parents. He was intensely involved in sensitizing people about African religious beliefs through public campaigns. He was banned by the Kenyan government under Arap Moi in 1990, arrested, and imprisoned. The Tent of the Living God eventually disintegrated, with some members forming a splinter movement, the Mungiki. Mungiki and the Tent of the Living God share a similarity in that they emerged owing to a feeling of alienation from the dominant religions in Kenya (Christianity and Islam) and an attempt to seek religious "truth" in African religious heritage. Mungiki's religious and ideological roots are also traceable to Mau Mau as a result of the distinctive nature of their political engagement and resistance. A strong desire for the resurgence of indigenous religions and cultures becomes a striking commonality between Mungiki and Mau Mau.

The Mungiki aimed to "redeem the Gikuyu (Kenyans) from Western culture; to unite the Gikuyu people, and consequently, other Kenyans to fight against both 'mental' and 'political' oppression." This political, religious, and cultural liberation was pitched against both colonial and contemporary governments in Kenya. The Mungiki movement attributes the enormous crisis and ills of the Kenyan society to the political apparatus and to the erosion of indigenous values. It demonstrates with optimism that a return to indigenous culture and religion will result in the restoration of indigenous values. To facilitate the restoration of indigenous values, Kirira, the teaching of African indigenous values, must occur, which will lead to guthera, a cleansing ritual where foreign cultures and faiths are denounced through traditional rites. Mungiki vehemently rejected Christianity and Islam until September 2000, when 13 leaders publicly announced their conversion to Islam, claiming that this would aid their fight against corruption, bad governance, poverty, immorality, and diseases in Kenya. This deflection to Islam represents a transition from a local, marginalized religious movement to a global one.

Mungiki members remained critical of successive Kenyan governments despite the alleged connections made between their activities and the ruling elite/Kenyan government. The popular understanding of Mungiki's involvement in the electoral violence of the 1997 general elections in Kenya explains the public negative image about them. The movement's emergent history and development is one characterized by incessant persecution and intimidation, with members of the group often being jailed or murdered in extrajudicial killings by the police. Their activities, mostly considered as subversive by Kenyan security agencies, attracted reprehension, leading to their eventual proscription in 2002. The government responses had been criticized in some circles as a breach of the right to freedom of religion and as gross human rights abuses.

Not all neo-traditional movements in Africa have political overtones as the examples above may suggest. There are examples of new religious creativities that are less controversial, whose activities are less prone to conflict and public criticisms. With the growing revitalization and internationalization of indigenous religions, many sub-Saharan Africans are beginning to appreciate their "indigenous" religions. Indigenous peoples have experienced something of a religious revival and have become concerned with the preservation of their cultural and religious heritage. Communal rituals, ceremonies, and festivals in commemoration of specific local divinities are becoming internationalized. The annual Osun-Oshogbo festival for the Yoruba divinity Osun has become an international event and attracts devotees and tourists from all parts of the world. This ritual has thus been transformed from an ethnic-based one to one with an international audience and participation.

African-Derived Religions in the Diaspora

The global dimension of indigenous African religions is manifest in varied forms, being introduced to new geo-cultural contexts through migration, tourism, and new communication technologies. The African diaspora influences cultures in Brazil, Cuba, and Haiti, partly leading to the development of African-derived religions such as the Santería, Candomblé, Vodou, and Yoruba-Orisa traditions across the Americas. In 1981, an Act of Parliament in Trinidad and Tobago raised the Yoruba religion to the status of an official religion. In contemporary Cuba, Orisa veneration exists as part of a larger continuum of religious change in the Americas, in which religious practices, now known as Santería but also referred to as Lukumí and Regla De Ocha, have transformed the shape of Orisa veneration outside West Africa.

These religious forms are proliferating in the diasporic context, with their practitioners and clientele widening ethnically and racially. The 20th- and 21st-century proliferation of groups of Orisa practitioners outside West Africa continues to attract millions of adherents of Yoruba and Santería religious practices. Ifa priests and devotees now include Yoruba, Africans, African Americans, and non-Africans alike. As Patrick Bellegarde-Smith points out, the growing presence of Western adepts indicates that African-derived religions have entered a new phase in their evolving tradition. Santería practitioners—some claiming Hispanic roots, others claiming Afro-Cuban national identities, and still others claiming American or African heritage—are active participants in the production of Yoruba-based practices in America. The growth of indigenous African religions in the United States and Europe has been characterized by the proliferation of virtual-based religiosity in which most Orisa and Ifa priests exist, operate, and communicate through their Internet websites with old and new clientele as well as with the wider public.

With the proliferation of indigenous religious forms in Africa and the African diaspora, Africa has become fully part of a global cosmos in religious terms. The character of African religions in conditions of globality will continue to be determined and shaped by how and to what extent they negotiate continuity, identity, and change. A consideration of religious development in Africa must be seen in terms of its relation and links with the global context and also in how and to what extent it interrogates and negotiates wider external influences and global forces. In addition, the ways in which African diasporic religions are contributing to the enrichment and pluralization of new geo-cultural and religious spaces become more and more significant. The diaspora setting provides a new space for the contestation, reinvention, and shaping of these indigenous religious ethos, polity, rituals, and worldviews in the face of globality.

Afe Adogame

See also Africa; Global Religion; Indigenous Religions; New Religions; Postcolonialism; Syncretism

Further Readings

- Adogame, A. (2007). Religion and globalization in sub-Saharan Africa. In P. Beyer & L. Beaman (Eds.), Religion, globalization and culture (pp. 527–548). Leiden, Netherlands: Brill.
- Azasu, K. (1999). African traditional religion—Afrikania: A brief exposition. Accra, Ghana: Afrikania Renaissance Books.
- Bellegarde-Smith, P. (Ed.). (2005). Fragments of bone: Neo-African religions in a new world. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Clarke, K. M. (2004). Mapping Yoruba networks: Power and agency in the making of transnational communities. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Damuah, O. K. (1998). The introduction to Afrikania. Accra, Ghana: Afrikania Mission.
- Gyanfosu, S. (1995). The development of Christian-related independent religious movements in Ghana, with special reference to the Afrikania Movement. Unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Leeds, Leeds, UK.
- Jules-Rosette, B. (Ed.). (1979). The new religions of Africa. Norwood, NJ: Ablex.
- Kagwanja, P. M. (2003). Facing Mount Kenya or facing Mecca? The Mungiki, ethnic violence and the politics of the Moi succession in Kenya, 1987–2002. African Affairs, 102, 25–49.
- Kenyatta, J. (1965). Facing Mount Kenya. New York: Vintage Books.
- Olupona, J. K. (2003). African religion. In M. Juergensmeyer (Ed.), Global religions: An introduction (pp. 78–86). New York: Oxford University Press.
- Wamue, G. N. (2001). Revisiting our indigenous shrines through Mungiki. African Affairs, 100, 453–467.

NEW RELIGIONS IN CUBA

Some religious traditions in the Caribbean island nation of Cuba could be considered “new” as they have not long been present on the island, even though most have been practiced in other locations of the Americas. For example, the Assemblies of God currently have congregations in Cuba but were not part of the island’s religious landscape earlier. Though not new in Cuba either, the Jehovah’s Witnesses are currently more visible in urban centers, among tourists if not island inhabitants. That these two traditions are now observable in the nation is a new phenomenon, and they are joined by distinctively Cuban religious practices in the novel situation of visibility. Indeed, the two observable practices as well as the distinct Cuban religious traditions have had global representation for some time. But the island’s open tolerance and recognition of Cuban religions is a new state of affairs, in sharp contrast to the clandestine existence imposed on these distinctive customs over the course of the four previous centuries. Consequently, a discussion of “new religions” in Cuba will necessarily center on what is new for religions “in” Cuba: public recognition and tolerance toward distinctively Cuban religious traditions that have been exported and practiced across the globe. This entry focuses on Cuba’s distinctive religions and their changed situation within the nation.

Cuba’s Religious Traditions

There are five to seven religious practices with origins in the history of the island but that are currently experiencing a new openness toward their sacred customs. The traditions are Palo Monte/Mayombe, Regla de Ocha/Lukumí, Arrara, Vodou, Abakuá, Espiritismo, and maybe Muertéra Bembé de Sao. Muertéra is questionable because it has yet to be confirmed as a religious practice that has history and ritual practices embedded in Cuba and separate from the others. Similarly, Abakuá should not be considered a religion because it is a secret and exclusively male fraternal organization, although it possesses rituals that come from one or more of the other practices and is particular to Cuba. For more than four centuries, all of these distinct practices were subjected to police harassment of ritual activities, persecution of their priest leaders, denial of public expression of sacred symbols, members' denial of their practice, and communities holding clandestine meetings. The intensity of official ridicule and persecution varied with sociopolitical events and with the historical time period. However, at times, practitioners could be incarcerated for their religious activities.

During Cuba's long colonial period (1500s to 1898), the Catholic clergy disdained and forbade practice of the island's unique religions. The Church's four-century opposition was mostly because nearly all of the religions were either Africa based in ethos and cosmic orientation or distinguished by their close relationship to these two aspects. Both the Catholic Church and Cuban official authorities saw no value in the unique religions but deemed them idolatrous, fetishist, or even demonic. No small part of the antagonism was based on the fact that rather than convert to Catholicism, the vast number of enslaved Africans and their descendants continued to adhere to their adapted customs. Even as Catholicism became firmly entrenched in Cuba's sociopolitical reality, the African descendant population, as well as some Black and White Cuban-born criollos, continued to revere the Africa-related traditions. When these practices began to reflect incorporations from Catholicism, clergy officials still saw no legitimacy in the distinct Cuban creations and continued to support social controls that greatly discriminated against practitioners and their sacred ways of life.

As the island's several republics moved from the colonial roots into the 20th century, disdainful and suspicious attitudes, harsh discrimination, and severe social oppression were the norm for the religions. The story is told that the future band-leader Desi Arnaz's father, mayor of Santiago de Cuba at the time, banned his son from attending the city's drumming events associated with these religions. But the prohibition was unsuccessful, for in the 1940s and 1950s, Arnaz would become internationally famous for his Cuban-derived singing and drumming. The negative attitudes and restrictions were pervasive and continued into the early 1980s, with a social norm of public attitudes that neither accepted nor allowed public visibility of Cuba's distinct religious customs. By the 1980s, changes in attitudes toward the practices took a positive turn, changes significant enough to call the national atmosphere one of "newness" for religious believers in Cuba.

The 1959 success of the Cuban Revolution did not automatically usher in religious freedom, nor did it immediately lead to religious persecution. Early in the 1960s, a failed invasion attempt by U.S.-trained military forces included religious leaders and literature that implied that the armed mission had a religious, specifically Christian evangelist agenda. This was a catalyst for citizens who supported the revolution and their new government to implement informal and formal social controls against all counterrevolutionists, including religious leaders and practitioners of a variety of belief traditions. Citizens took informal action against religious buildings, particularly churches, and the new government became repressive toward religious believers and practitioners. Religious leaders of all categories were arrested and put in "reeducation" camps, even when they or their tradition had not necessarily been part of counterrevolutionary activities. The formal national policy was stated as intending to avoid spontaneous citizen outbursts against religious structures and persons; the government also implemented procedures whereby neighborhood members could vote and petition to open a church building. The assumption was that by such a collective decision destruction of public property would cease.

The new community-based policy did not apply, however, to the sacred spaces and activities of Cuba's distinctive religions. The police continued to raid ritual sessions of these six or seven island traditions, and practitioners were officially and unofficially subjected to scorn, ridicule, and persecution. Official policy also prohibited acknowledged religious believers from being employed in several job categories, even if they had otherwise superior qualifications. The situation did not degenerate, but it also did not improve until the organization COEBAC (Co-ordination of Baptist Workers and Students in Cuba) began Christian theological studies guided by external ideas, ideas outside the boundaries of western provinces' denominational seminaries. The doctrinal explorations expanded the group's understanding of Christianity and what it meant to practice their faith. Leaders of COEBAC were particularly inspired by the life and teachings of Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., and they led the way for other groups of believers.

The organization worked collaboratively with other like-minded religious groups, took action to be more visible contributors to building their socialist society, began to challenge state prohibitions against religious believers, and engaged in dialogue with national and international thinkers open to such conversations. This series of actions opened a social space for many Cuban Christians but did not necessarily provide openness for practitioners of distinctive Cuban religions. Part of the change to full religious inclusion came from the Cuban government's observations of Liberation Theology and religious leaders' participation in the political struggles of Central and South America. Changes on the island were also due to the success of COEBAC in its dialogues with theological groups from those locations, as well as with its "Marxist Christian" Symposia with the Black Theology Project in the United States.

Several congregations of COEBAC had already begun conversations with leaders from Cuba's distinctive religions, but it was the 1984 visit between President Fidel Castro and the U.S. presidential candidate Rev. Jesse Jackson that was the catalyst to open a national review of governmental policy against the social inclusion of all religious practitioners. The two public figures attended a memorial service in a Havana church for Martin Luther King Jr. This historic meeting opened televised dialogues with governmental officials to reconfigure national policies about religion in Cuban society. Both groups in the televised events advocated more socially inclusive participation by religious practitioners of all belief systems. By the fourth meeting of the Cuban Communist Party, the constitution was changed, and in 1991, a religious minister was elected to the Cuban National Assembly. In 2000, the Cuban Institute of Philosophy released a volume that compared the ethical foundations for one of the country's distinct religious traditions and found compatibility with many of the socialist government's core values. Similarly, a large Yoruba temple in the center of Havana was opened in a renovated building with governmental approval. This temple is also part of a distinctly Cuban religion.

Implications

Of the six or so distinct religious practice systems in Cuba, only one or two have officially reached national recognition and visibility, yet the very existence of this status for Cuban religions is at least as significant as the presence of religions that have more recently become established on the island. Equally significant is the global potential for Cuban traditions, given the new societal openness. These religions have always had communities of practitioners in locations such as the United States, France, Japan, Argentina, Germany, Spain, and Italy, though their representatives have had difficulty renewing spiritual connections in Cuba. Communications were not reliable, and visits did not always allow sufficient time for successful spiritual work. Nevertheless, practitioners and communities of practitioners from outside Cuba have continued to maintain their religious commitment, and now that some barriers to open acceptance have been removed, the number of pilgrimages to the island are bound to increase.

Jualynne E. Dodson

See also Cuba; New Religions; New Religions in Africa; New Religions in South America; Santería; Syncretism; Vodou

Further Reading

Dodson, J. E. (2008). Sacred spaces and religious traditions in Oriente Cuba. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico.

NEW RELIGIONS IN JAPAN

The new religions of Japan are called shin shūkyō or shinkō shūkyō by most Japanese scholars. Shin shūkyō means "new religion," and shinkō shūkyō means "newly arisen religion." The former is usually regarded as a more value-free expression and is preferred in academic circles. Shin shūkyō include a variety of newly established religious groups in modern Japan. It has been estimated that some 10% of the Japanese population currently have some degree of adherence to or membership in shin shūkyō. This entry reviews the development, history, and chief characteristics of the modern new religions.

Shin shūkyō are often contrasted with what are called “established religions,” namely, the various preexisting, traditional sects of Buddhism and shrine Shinto. Although shin shūkyō possess deep connections with the established religions in terms of teachings and rituals, they present new features in terms of the ways in which they respond to the lifestyle changes that have resulted from factors such as urbanization and industrialization, the growth of knowledge with the spread of secondary and higher education, and other changes in modern Japanese social life. Shin shūkyō are also distinguished from small local groups of people with no particular mutual connection among themselves who visit shamans to ask for healing or counseling. Although such shamans are sometimes charismatic, similar to leaders of shin shūkyō, they do not establish continuing relationships with their clients. These groups rarely develop into successively larger entities that might be categorized as shin shūkyō.

Shin shūkyō can in a sense be seen as a kind of innovation on the established religions of premodern Japan, or as a more developed form of groups based on folk religious beliefs, that emerged in the course of modernization. As such, it might be more appropriate to call them “modern new religions.”

Modern new religions can be divided into two main groups, depending on whether their origins lay in Shinto or Buddhism. Very few new groups are of Christian origin; those that exist are quite small in scale. Modern new religions of Shinto origin include Tenrikyō (established in 1838), Konkōkyō (1859), Seichō no Ie (1930), Sekai Kyūseikyō (1935), Tenshō Kōtaijūngyūkyō (1945), Sekai Mahikari Bunmeikyōdan (1959), and Sūkyō Mahikari (1978). Modern new religions of Buddhist origin include Nenpō Shinkyō (1928), Gedatsukai (1929), Reiyūkai (1930), Soka Gakkai (1930), Shinnyoen (1936), Rissho Koseikai (1938), Myōchikai (1950), Bentenshū (1952), and Agonshū (1954). Based on a comparison of memberships, groups of Buddhist origin have more members than groups of Shinto origin. Both categories, however, are roughly equal in terms of the total number of groups involved.

Modern new religions started to make their appearance in Japan in the first half of the 19th century. This was deeply connected to the modernization process in many respects. During the Edo period, which lasted for almost 270 years, few changes could be seen among both institutionalized religions and folk religious beliefs. This was mainly due to the strict religious policies of the Tokugawa government, which ruled throughout that period. The government established the danka, or Buddhist parishioner, system in the first half of the 17th century as a means of blocking Christian influences. Under it, almost all Japanese had to belong to one or another of the Buddhist sects and were unable to change their affiliation on their own accord. In the Meiji period (1868–1912), however, the new government enacted policies that made it possible to establish new movements, albeit with several strict conditions. Social changes during those years and beyond also helped spur the birth and growth of new movements. The decline of the farming population and an increase in the industry workforce, the transfer of population from rural to urban areas, and the spread of the educational system all proved beneficial to the activities of the modern new religions.

The modern new religions began to make their appearance in the latter half of the 19th century. The conditions for these new groups to win official approval were quite strict in prewar Japan; they became relatively looser after 1945, mainly because of the new principles of religious freedom and separation between religion and state prescribed in the new constitution. Since 1945, modern new religions have been granted the same legal protections that were awarded to the traditional religions. The government was most generous in granting legal approvals to the new groups in the early years after the defeat in World War II. Conditions gradually became stricter thereafter and have become considerably so since the sarin gas attack on the Tokyo subway in March 1995 by the group Aum Shinrikyō, owing to harsh criticisms after the attack claiming that the government’s too ready approval of new groups had led to the appearance of “dangerous cults” such as Aum Shinrikyō.

Several thousand such groups have been established over the decades, and while many have died out, some have grown into much larger organizations. Several hundred new religions are thought to be active at present (2010). The largest of the groups—those with memberships in excess of 1 million—include Sōka Gakkai, Risshō Kōseikai, Reiyūkai, Shinnyoen, and Tenrikyō. Sōka Gakkai is especially large, with some 4 million active members. Groups with memberships in the hundreds of thousands include Sekai Kyūseikyō (Church of World Messianity), Perfect Liberty, Bussho Gonenkai, Sūkyō Mahikari, Myōchikai, Seichō no Ie, and Ennōkyō. Many smaller groups also exist, each with memberships between several hundred and several thousand.

Chief Characteristics of Modern New Religions

Modern new religions are chiefly distinguished from traditional religions by the strong trust members place in the group founders, the development of teachings intelligible to lay people, and the groups' utilization of active proselytizing methods.

On the first point, the founders of modern new religions are mostly individuals—both men and women—from lay rather than clerical backgrounds. Most founders expounded their teachings using the ordinary vernacular; this accessibility of thought has helped them attract large numbers of followers in relatively short periods of time. Followers obey the founder's directions during life, and frequently, they treat deceased founders as deities or buddhas. Furthermore, a large number of women have acted as founders or are currently leaders of these new groups. The most famous female founders include Nakayama Miki of Tenrikyō, Deguchi Nao of Ōmoto, Fukada Chiyoko of Ennōkyō, and Kitamura Sayo of Tenshō Kōtai Jingukyō. In a number of cases, a man and a woman have jointly founded a group. The relationships between these pairs have varied; among others, they include a wife and husband (Shinnyoen, Kōdōkyōdan), a woman and her son-in-law (Ōmoto), and a man and his brother's wife (Reiyūkai).

As to the second point, the teachings of the modern new religions are considerably simpler than those of the traditional Buddhist sects. This is closely connected with the fact that most of the founders are laypersons. For example, Nakayama Miki, Deguchi Nao, Fukada Chiyoko, and Kitamura Sayo were ordinary housewives before they had their special religious experiences. Similarly, Konkō Daijin of Konkōkyō was a farmer, Makiguchi Tsunesaburo of Sōka Gakkai was the principal of a primary school, Taniguchi Masaharu of Seichō no Ie was a clerk, and Okada Mokichi of Sekaikyūseikyō was a merchant.

These founders tended to explain their teachings by stressing morals and ethics directly related to daily life. The content, though, was mostly based on traditional Buddhist sutras or ideas from Shinto mythology. People who are not members of these groups often see their teachings as new and strange because of their unique interpretations of the sutras, Japanese mythology, and folk beliefs. Many of the modern new religions of Buddhist origin have connections with the traditional Nichiren sect and rely on the Lotus Sutra. Most of the rest have connections with esoteric Buddhist sects, while a small minority derive in some way from the Pure Land or Zen sects.

Groups of Shinto origin were frequently established by founders who experienced a specific religious conversion, sometimes accompanied by an experience of so-called divine possession. The objects of worship for these groups are various deities, who usually have been given unique names by the groups based on the polytheistic tradition of Shinto.

While priests of traditional religions tended to deal mostly with rituals, the leaders and teachers of the modern new religions usually tried to heal diseases and resolve various psychological troubles and conflicts among the people. They explained the meaning of events in life to those who were in distress. Their talks were relatively simple and effective for those who wanted mental or spiritual release, and accordingly, they appear to have been easily understood by their listeners.

The third point is quite an important one, especially in light of the rapid growth of some organizations. Traditional religions maintained their organizations based on both regional and kindred ties. During the Edo period, people were not free to move from the land where they were born, and population mobility was quite low. Shrine Shinto and Buddhist sects depended on these fixed human relationships. Even if Buddhist monks were not eager to instruct the people, the parishioners could not change temples.

However, population mobility rapidly increased with Japan's entry into its modern age in the Meiji period. The modern new religions were equipped to respond to this new social condition because the principle of their organization was basically separate from regional ties and sometimes even from kindred relations. They formed a kind of voluntary association based on the same belief.

It should be also noted that in the 1960s, the bigger organizations adopted two networking systems for their members, known as the “vertical line” and the “horizontal line.” The vertical line refers to networks based on the relationship between those who led others to a belief and those who were lead. The horizontal line refers to networks constructed based on regional unit. Followers were thus bound to their group by dual connections.

Development of Modern New Religions and Their Social Activities

Among the various changes that have occurred in Japanese society since the mid-19th century, the two biggest events that influenced every aspect of social life were the Meiji Restoration in the latter half of the 19th century and the changes in the national polity resulting from defeat in World War II. These two events influenced the development and social activities of modern new religions—whose responses to these social changes, it should be noted, were much more flexible than those of the traditional religions as a whole.

Modern new religions experienced varied treatment under prewar Japanese law. Some groups such as Kurozumikyō, Tenrikyō, and Konkōkyō were able to become independent Shinto denominations, and others found approval as branch churches of officially authorized Shinto denominations such as Ontakekyō, Shintō Honkyoku, and Shintō Shūseiha. Some Buddhist groups likewise were legally recognized as branch churches of Buddhist denominations including the Shingon and Tendai sects. Most other groups, however, including Seichō no Ie and Reiyūkai, were considered “quasi-religious,” and while they were permitted to engage in proselytization, they did not receive preferential tax treatment such as that given to recognized religious groups. Too much stress placed on faith healing or political statements, moreover, would result in oppressive treatment from the government.

The total number of modern new religions rose with the appearance of more groups in the 1930s. However, as Japan rapidly turned into a military state in the 1930s, control of religions became more severe. Some modern new religions were repressed by the government. The most famous examples were the Ōmoto incidents in 1921 and 1935, which saw Deguchi Onisaburō and pivotal members arrested and Ōmoto’s activities halted. Miki Tokuharu of Hitonomichi Kyōdan was also arrested in 1936 along with his son.

The modern new religions gained an advantage through their missionary activities from the social changes that occurred after World War II. It became quite easy for even relatively small groups to register as independent organizations under the Religious Corporations Ordinance in 1945 and Religious Corporations Law in 1951. More than 100 new groups were registered in the immediate postwar period. However, since most had engaged in religious activities even before the end of the war, it might be more appropriate to say that the postwar legal changes resulted in a rapid increase of the number of registered religious groups just after the war.

Viewed overall, the activities of modern new religions have become more influential socially in the atmosphere of postwar Japan. Some have branched out into education, establishing junior high schools, high schools, and colleges. Others have established hospitals, and still more are promoting peace movements in cooperation with the traditional religions.

It has often been said that the three main reasons why people joined modern new religions during the immediate postwar period were poverty, disease, and conflicts in human relationships. Sociologically speaking, such explanations are appropriate to some degree because many modern new religions actually insisted that people could solve such troubles and problems if they followed the teachings and practices of the group.

Around the middle of the 1970s, Japan confronted a kind of social change unprecedented in its history. The goal of achieving a relatively affluent society had been achieved, and consequently, the sense of direction that had guided the nation had been lost. As a consequence, people began to put greater emphasis on seeking spiritual or mental satisfaction than on material wealth. Reflecting this change, more people came to join modern new religions in order to solve their psychological and spiritual problems. Conversely, the percentage of people who joined them in the hope of improving their economic condition fell considerably. Moreover, an increasing number of people rejected partaking in collective activities with other members in a religious group. They tended to prefer personal guidance rather than guidance through small-group counseling.

Few large organizations have formed since the 1970s. Sōka Gakkai and Risshō Kōsei-kai seem to have experienced slight declines in their membership. An exception is Shinnyoen, which has seen a large increase in its membership since the 1970s. The activities of small religious groups came to draw more attention from scholars and journalists.

At the same time, modern new religions have come to be a stable presence in the society. While strong negative attitudes toward them remain to some degree in Japanese society, they have also gained to a degree their “civil rights” in society, so to speak.

In March 1995, core members of Aum Shinrikyō (presently Aleph) carried out an attack using sarin nerve gas on the Tokyo subway. This incident has led to strong social distrust of new religious movements as well as religion as a whole. Use of the term cult spread immediately, not as a sociological term related to the “church, sect, and cult” typology but rather in the sense of dangerous religious movements led by suspicious leaders. Wary attitudes toward religious organizations increased, especially among the younger generation.

New Types of Groups: The “Hyper Religions”

Globalization and the spread and impact of information technology progressed rapidly in the last quarter of the 20th century. The resulting social changes have promoted the formation of new types of religious groups that differ from the modern new religions. These groups have been termed “hyper religions” and seem to have begun appearing since around the 1970s.

Hyper religions have little connection with the traditional religions in Japan in terms of their teachings and rituals. They are characterized instead by their tendency to freely adapt in various ways from teachings and rituals that are not common in Japan. They also are often forthright about incorporating nonreligious elements, including scientific concepts.

The condition that led to the appearance of hyper religions may be supposed to have been a change in people’s consciousness of religious matters. That is, the objects of concern for religious thought, rituals, and religious practices have become borderless. It has become quite easy to come into contact with various kinds of religious information in daily life thanks to advances in information technology. Contact with foreign religious cultures also increased significantly as a result of the progress of globalization. Meanwhile, the influence of the traditional religious culture in their mother country has been declining. People have become more indifferent toward whether or not a religious group is associated with traditional religion when they accept its ideas, teachings, and rituals. Similar changes have been observed with respect to folk religion, and this tendency seems to be more apparent among the younger generation.

Conventional religious culture is thought to have had a great influence in the process of forming the views people have regarding morals and other important values. Now, thanks to the weakening of traditional value systems and the open acceptance of various religious cultures, people are increasingly likely to adopt religious rituals, teachings, and practices from religions that once were unfamiliar.

This hyper state of religious consciousness, so to speak, may have provided the basis for the appearance of the aforementioned hyper religions. Such groups form their teachings from various religious sources—for example, from the Judeo-Christian Bible, Buddhist sutras, Hinduism, Islam, or Shinto. Groups of this type appear to have been accepted by people to a certain degree because people tend to be less likely to feel hesitant toward the juxtaposition of plural religious ideas and rituals within a single religion.

The GLA (God Light Association) and Kōfuku no Kagaku contain elements of hyper religion. GLA was established in 1969 by Takahashi Shinji. After Takahashi died in 1976, his eldest daughter Takahashi Keiko became his successor. She made it the main goal of the GLA’s activities to deepen human existence to a new dimension by combining the spiritual world and material world. She has published several books aimed at this goal, including a three-volume work on Shin Sōseiki (True Genesis), with its “Volume of Hell,” “Volume of Heaven,” and “Volume of Apocalypse.” She has also preached about the “Total Life of Human Science” as being the “Study of Soul.” The group has become increasingly similar to a self-development group grounded in psychological theory rather than a religious body since Takahashi Keiko became its leader.

Kōfuku no Kagaku was established by Ōkawa Ryūhō. Ōkawa decided to live as a religious person in 1980, after he had resigned from Tōmen, a major trading company. Ōkawa proclaimed his true nature to be that of “El Cantare” and claims that Buddha and Hermes were previous manifestations of El Cantare in this world. He has published many books, most of which have been best sellers. Kōfuku no Kagaku has made animated films titled Hermes, Law of the Sun, and Law of the Gold as a means of carrying out its proselytizing activities. It is difficult to find reflections of Japanese religious culture in these films. A political party, Kōfuku Jitsugen Tō (Happiness Realization Party), was also established in 2009.

Aum Shinrikyō may also be thought of as having had some of the characteristics of a hyper religion. Although the founder, Asahara Shōkō, was once a member of Agonshū, one of the modern new religions, he developed his teachings and rituals without any connection with Japanese traditional Buddhist sects. Rather, he liked to use ideas such as karma from Indian religion, phowa from Tibetan Buddhism, and Armageddon from Christianity. He also introduced yoga practices for his followers.

Nobutaka Inoue

See also Asahara, Shōkō; Aum Shinrikyō; Japan; Mahayana Buddhism; New Religions; Shinto; Soka Gakkai; Syncretism; Zen Buddhism

Further Readings

- Kisala, R. (1999). Prophets of peace: Pacifism and cultural identity in Japan's new religions. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
- Stalker, N. K. (2008). Prophet motive: Daguchi Onisaburo, and the rise of new religions in Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.

NEW RELIGIONS IN SOUTH AMERICA

Despite the overwhelming Catholic majorities in most countries in South America, the populations across the continent maintain adherence to a variety of alternative religious traditions, including Amerindian, African, Spiritualist, and folk traditions. Brazil, for instance, besides being the world's largest Catholic country, is the world's most Kardecist country (it has the most followers of spiritual doctrines promulgated in the 19th century by Allan Kardec). In the decades at the end of the 20th century and beginning of the 21st, the religious map of South America has been further enriched by the presence of new religions. The novel aspect of such groups is the way in which they expand rapidly or suddenly attain visibility; in addition, many of these groups have a major presence in the region. The Baha'i religion, for example, has boasted groups in South America since 1930, and although its followers are not particularly numerous, it does have centers in all the countries in the region. In Paraguay, Chile, and Argentina, the Baha'is have also established missions among different indigenous communities. On the other hand, principally in Bolivia, Peru, and Ecuador, there are flourishing aboriginal movements and cults based on ancestral beliefs. These include the veneration of Pachamama (Mother Earth) and many autochthonic cults, such as the Vegetalist religious practices in the Amazonian and Andean regions. In addition, many new centers dedicated to studying the Kabbalah have sprung up across the region. The Bnei Baruch Center has offices in Chile, Colombia, and Argentina, while the Kabbalah International Center has affiliates in Argentina, Venezuela, and Brazil and study groups in the principal cities of Colombia, Paraguay, Peru, Ecuador, Venezuela, and Chile.

The following sections examine five of these “new religions” in South America: the Catholic Charismatic Renewal, Pentecostalism, Afro-Brazilian religions, New Age, and Asian religions.

Catholic Charismatic Renewal

Created in the United States in 1967, the Catholic Charismatic Renewal (CCR) is a movement whose members claim to receive the gifts of the Holy Spirit, especially healing, prophecy, and glossolalia (“speaking in tongues”). By the beginning of the 1970s, the CCR had arrived in Brazil (1969), Peru (1970), Bolivia (1971), Colombia, Chile (1972), and Venezuela (1973). The movement grew steadily throughout the 1980s and became fully visible in the 1990s. Currently, CCR has more than 700 prayer communities in Chile, nearly 24,000 participants in Peru, and an additional 50,000 in Argentina and Brazil. Between 1994 and 1999, the number of CCR Catholics tripled.

The CCR is organized in prayer groups and periodic meetings, in which participants read the scriptures, pray, study catechism, and recount their conversion experiences. In addition, congresses are organized for youth, consecrated lay people, and couples. Such meetings combine preaching, prayer, glossolalia, music, stories of how believers converted, and miraculous cures.

Throughout South America, Charismatic Catholic groups have a special affinity with the media. The Colombian priest Darío Betancur is renowned for his TV show Hablemos con Dios and for his books about intercessory prayer and healing. In Brazil, the singer priest Marcelo Rossi became very popular, and his CD Minha Bênção (My Blessing) was the best-selling Brazilian album in 2007. With the goal of evangelizing audiences through the media, TV Século XXI (21st-century TV) was founded in 1990 by the American Brazilian priest Eduardo Dougherty, and the CCR community Canção Nova (New Song) opened radio and TV stations across the country.

More recently, “new communities” have emerged where Charismatic Catholics seeking sanctification come to live together and share their belongings. Among the founders of these communities in Brazil are the priest Jonas Abib, who founded the community Canção Nova, and the priest Roberto Lettieri, who created the community Toca de Assis. Similar communities have been founded in many other South American countries.

(Neo-)Pentecostalism

Pentecostalism was the result of a syncretism between Protestant Christianity and ecstatic religious traditions and has become very attractive to South Americans. Since the 19th century, many Protestant missions arrived to found churches in Argentina, Brazil, and Chile. Pentecostalism began growing steadily in Chile and Brazil starting in the mid-20th century, making South America the region with the world’s highest number of Pentecostals. Pentecostalism has been strongest in Chile, followed by Brazil, where Protestants represent 15% of the population. In Ecuador, there are more than 1,000 Pentecostal churches that coexist with a population that is 90% Catholic and boast a great amount of indigenous activism. In Colombia, Dios Es Amor, a Pentecostal church created in Brazil, combines elements from Catholic rituals with symbols of the regional culture.

By the 1980s, Pentecostalism had attained greater visibility, and it was transformed into what has been called “Neo-Pentecostalism.” The Neo-Pentecostal churches are spin-offs of the missionary churches that acquire their own characteristics by adopting the religious beliefs and practices of the surrounding popular culture. Their practices are based on the presence of charismatic leaders, large-scale evangelization, the Theology of Prosperity (also known as the “Health and Wealth Gospel”), and spiritual war against Umbanda, Candomblé, oracles, and medicine men that are quite widespread among the local urban working class.

One of the most successful Neo-Pentecostal churches is the Iglesia Universal del Reino de Dios (IURD), founded by Edir Macedo in 1977. The rituals at IURD are based on driving out the demons that already exist in the local folk culture where the churches are located. At the same time, even when these Afro-Brazilian and Spiritist demons are not part of the local culture, the IURD introduces them only to later expel them. Like most Neo-Pentecostal churches, it uses the mass media for evangelization. Besides owning radio and TV stations, IURD has managed to influence political elections in Brazil. Its growth has not been limited to South America; IURD churches have opened across the globe, with cathedrals founded even in cities in eastern Europe.

Many other Brazilian, Argentinean, and Colombian Neo-Pentecostal churches also use the media and send missionaries abroad. Presence in the media and in politics is a trademark of various Neo-Pentecostal churches in South America, whose founders are mass media priests. In Argentina, charismatic pastors such as Carlos Annacondia, Claudio Freydzon, Omar Cabrera, and Héctor Gimenez have played fundamental roles in developing Neo-Pentecostalism through mass evangelization campaigns launched in the 1970s and 1980s.

Afro-Brazilian Religions

Afro-Brazilian religions are an urban phenomenon that dates back more than 150 years. Brought in by African slaves (especially the Yoruba of Nigeria and the Ewe from Benin and Togo), their religion syncretized with Spanish Catholicism, Kardecist Spiritism, and local aboriginal beliefs. The Orixás, Afro-Brazilian saints or personal deities, have different Catholic saints as their counterparts and syncretize with them. The different combination of these four elements led to regional variations: Catimbó, Tambor de Minas, Xangó, Candomblé, Macumba, and Batuques.

The first terreiro (Afro-Brazilian religious temple) of the Candomblé, which is considered the most African and most traditional of these religions, was founded in the Brazilian city of Bahia in 1830. Another of these religions, the Umbanda, originated in the southeast of Brazil in the 1920s. Although the 2000 Brazilian census reports that only 0.34% of Brazilians claim to practice religions with African roots, most analysts assume that a greater percentage of such believers are actually listed as Catholics; these individuals prefer to identify themselves as Catholics even when they participate in both religions, due to the fact that the followers of Afro-Brazilian religions are often subjected to discrimination.

Mãe de santo (Mother of Saint) designates the female leader of an Afro-Brazilian religion temple, and Pai de santo (Father of Saint) denotes the male leader, because they are understood to be the parents of the Orixás. Participation in these religions involves many steps and different degrees of commitment that are manifested in initiatory rituals. Those who go through all these rituals become Filhos de santo (Sons or Daughters of Saint).

Since 1980, participation in Afro-Brazilian religions has dropped. There has been a 20% drop in Umbanda followers in the last census. At the same time, practitioners of Candomblé are on the rise—this is due, in many cases, to followers migrating from one such religion to another. The Brazilian sociologist Reginaldo Prandi attributes this movement to the social changes in Brazil over the past century. Umbanda reflects the type of society that gave birth to these religions, one characterized by nationalism and the aspiration for rising up the social ladder. Candomblé, in contrast, attracts a greater audience because it shares the values of the contemporary postmodern society: individualism, hedonism, and narcissism. The popularity of Candomblé has been facilitated by music and the media since the 1960s. The rediscovery of African culture, on the other hand, attracted the middle (and White) classes to Candomblé centers, and these new followers also helped the religion earn its legitimacy.

In Argentina, Umbanda and Candomblé are practiced in urban centers among the working class and lower middle class. Both religions came to Argentina from Brazil and Uruguay, starting in the 1960s. There are currently more than 400 temples.

